cocaine into Canada and (ii) unlawful possession of cocaine for the purpose of trafficking. His sole defence was that he was insane at the material time. The trial judge gave effect to that defence. He found Abbey not guilty on account of insanity and the Court of Appeal of British Columbia dismissed a Crown appeal. The matter has now, by leave, reached this Court.

The Facts and History of the Case

The facts surrounding the commission of the offence are not in dispute. Pursuant to s. 582 of the Criminal Code Abbey admitted, amongst others, the following facts alleged against him, for the purpose of dispensing with proof. On Sunday, May 13, 1979, Abbey arrived at the Vancouver International Airport on C.P. Air Flight No. 421 from Lima, Peru. He entered Canada carrying a brown shoulder bag containing two clear plastic bags the contents of which weighed 5.5 ounces and analyzed to be approximately 50 per cent pure cocaine. After disembarkation, Abbey proceeded directly to the Canada Customs primary counter where he presented his passport and a signed customs declaration. He then obtained his suitcase from a baggage carousel and proceeded to the Customs secondary counter. Abbey placed the suitcase and shoulder bag on the counter. The Customs Inspector looked into the shoulder bag and observed a camera case and underneath it two plastic bags of white powder, the cocaine. The following conversation ensued between the Customs Inspector, Jung, and Abbey:

Jung: (holding the two plastic bags of white powder). "What is it?"

Abbey: "You got me."

Jung: "What is it?"

Abbey: "It's coke."

R.C.M.P. Constable Giesbrecht arrived on the scene:

ment à deux accusations, savoir (i) importation de cocaïne au Canada et (ii) possession illégale de cocaïne en vue d'en faire le trafic. Il a invoqué comme seul moyen de défense l'aliénation mentale à l'époque en question. Le juge du procès a retenu ce moyen. Il a déclaré Abbey non coupable pour cause d'aliénation mentale et la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a rejeté l'appel du ministère public. L'affaire est maintenant soumise à cette Cour, avec l'autorisation de cette dernière.

I

Les faits et l'historique de la cause

Les faits entourant la perpétration de l'infraction sont incontestés. Conformément à l'art. 582 du Code criminel, Abbey a notamment reconnu les faits suivants allégués contre lui afin de dispenser d'en faire la preuve. Le dimanche 13 mai 1979, Abbey est arrivé à l'aéroport international de Vancouver à bord du vol n° 421 de C.P. Air en provenance de Lima au Pérou. Quand il est entré au Canada, il portait un sac à bandoulière brun qui contenait deux sacs en plastique transparent dont le contenu, qui pesait 5.5 onces, était, comme l'a révélé une analyse, de la cocaïne pure à environ 50 pour cent. Une fois descendu de l'avion, Abbey s'est rendu directement au comptoir d'examen primaire de Douanes Canada, où il a présenté son passeport et signé une déclaration en douane. Il est alors allé chercher sa valise qui se trouvait sur un distributeur circulaire et s'est rendu au comptoir d'examen secondaire des douanes. Abbey a déposé la valise et le sac à bandoulière sur le comptoir. Le douanier a fouillé le sac à bandoulière et remarqué un étui pour appareil photographique et, en-dessous, deux sacs en plastique qui contenaient de la poudre blanche, savoir la cocaïne. La conversation suivante a alors eu lieu entre le douanier qui s'appelait Jung, et Abbey:

[TRADUCTION]

Jung: (tenant les deux sacs en plastique contenant la poudre blanche). «Qu'est-ce que c'est?»

Abbey: «Je suis fait.»

Jung: «Qu'est-ce que c'est?»

Abbey: «C'est de la «coke».»

L'agent Giesbrecht de la G.R.C. est arrivé sur les lieux:

Giesbrecht: (indicating the brown shoulder bag). "What's in here?"

Abbey: "Naturally cocaine."

Giesbrecht: "How much?"

Abbey: "130 to 150 grams."

Giesbrecht: "You need not say anything, however, anything you do say may be given in evidence. You understand this?"

Giesbrecht: "What's the white powder?"

Abbey: "Cocaine."

Giesbrecht: "You brought the cocaine into the country?"

Abbey: "Yes."

Giesbrecht: (indicating the brown shoulder bag). "Did you bring this suitcase into the country?"

Abbey: "Yes."

Later in the day Abbey gave the police a signed statement in which he said that in the last two weeks of April, 1979, while still in Canada, he had received $900 from three individuals on the express understanding that he would purchase 13 grams of cocaine for them in Peru. The two plastic bags contained 158.7 grams of cocaine, the "street value" of which was $76,320, if cut to 13 per cent purity, or $18,150 if sold, uncut, by the ounce. It was a profit venture. In his statement to police which was submitted in evidence, Abbey was asked if there were anything he would like to say with respect to the importation of cocaine. He replied:

It was just there. I've been down there many times and when you see it for five dollars. I was going to school and [sic] the Philippines and it was the perfect way to have a perfect year. I can't believe I did it.

As I have said, the only defence raised was s. 16(2) of the Criminal Code, insanity. Section 16 of the Code reads:

16. (1) No person shall be convicted of an offence in respect of an act or omission on his part while he was insane.

[TRADUCTION]

Giesbrecht: (pointant le sac à bandoulière brun). «Qu'y a-t-il là-dedans?»

Abbey: «De la cocaïne, naturellement.»

Abbey: «De 130 à 150 grammes.»

Giesbrecht: «Vous n'êtes pas tenu de dire quoi que ce soit, mais tout ce que vous direz peut servir de preuve. Comprenez-vous cela?»

Giesbrecht: «C'est quoi la poudre blanche?»

Abbey: «De la cocaïne.»

Giesbrecht: «Vous avez importé la cocaïne au pays?»

Abbey: «Oui.»

Giesbrecht: (pointant le sac à bandoulière brun). «Avez-vous apporté cette valise au pays?»

Plus tard dans la journée, Abbey a fait à la police une déclaration signée dans laquelle il affirmait qu'au cours des deux dernières semaines d'avril 1979, alors qu'il était encore au Canada, il avait reçu $900 de trois individus à la condition expresse qu'il achète pour eux 13 grammes de cocaïne au Pérou. Les deux sacs en plastique contenaient 158.7 grammes de cocaïne dont la «valeur de revente» était de $76,320, si elle était réduite à 13 pour cent de pureté, ou de $18,150 si elle était vendue intégralement à l'once. Il s'agissait d'une entreprise à but lucratif. Lorsqu'il faisait sa déclaration à la police, laquelle déclaration a été présentée en preuve, on a demandé à Abbey s'il voulait dire quoi que ce soit concernant l'importation de la cocaïne. Il a répondu:

[TRADUCTION] Elle était tout simplement là. J'ai souvent voyagé là-bas et quand on la voit à cinq dollars. J'étais étudiant et j'allais faire un voyage aux Philippines et c'était le moyen parfait d'avoir une année parfaite. Je n'arrive pas à croire que je l'ai fait.

Comme je l'ai déjà dit, le seul moyen de défense qu'on a invoqué est le par. 16(2) du Code criminel, savoir l'aliénation mentale. L'article 16 du Code se lit comme suit:

16. (1) Nul ne doit être déclaré coupable d'une infraction à l'égard d'un acte ou d'une omission de sa part alors qu'il était aliéné.

(2) For the purposes of this section a person is insane when he is in a state of natural imbecility or has disease of the mind to an extent that renders him incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of an act or omission or of knowing that an act or omission is wrong.

(3) A person who has specific delusions, but is in other respects sane, shall not be acquitted on the ground of insanity unless the delusions caused him to believe in the existence of a state of things that, if it existed, would have justified or excused his act or omission.

(4) Every one shall, until the contrary is proved, be presumed to be and to have been sane.

As witnesses, the Crown called the customs inspectors and R.C.M.P. officers who searched and questioned Abbey at the airport. They said that Abbey appeared "normal" in their dealings with him. Abbey did not testify. The defence called only one witness, Dr. Vallance, a psychiatrist. In rebuttal the Crown called another psychiatrist, Dr. Eaves. No other witnesses gave testimony.

Dr. Vallance testified that he first saw Abbey approximately 10 weeks after the commission of the offence. Dr. Vallance's testimony was based on his interviews with Abbey, his interviews with Abbey's mother, his review of a medical report prepared by another psychiatrist, and his discussions with other doctors who were involved in treating Abbey. In particular, Dr. Vallance relied on Abbey's description of the events surrounding his trip to South America as indicative of his mental state at the material time. Dr. Vallance's opinion was that Abbey, at all material times, was suffering from a disease of the mind, a manic illness, known as hypomania. While Abbey appreciated that he was bringing cocaine into Canada and knew that what he was doing was wrong, he believed that, if caught, he would not be punished. Dr. Vallance said:

He had a considerable disturbance of mood. He had delusional ideas. He had hallucinatory experiences. It's difficult under circumstances like that to fully appreciate what you are doing, particularly when the feelings and delusional ideas are tangled up with what you are doing. If you feel that you are for some delusional idea inordinately powerful or safe then that impairs good

(2) Aux fins du présent article, une personne est aliénée lorsqu'elle est dans un état d'imbécillité naturelle ou atteinte de maladie mentale à un point qui la rend incapable de juger la nature et la qualité d'un acte ou d'une omission, ou de savoir qu'un acte ou une omission est mauvais.

(3) Une personne qui a des hallucinations sur un point particulier, mais qui est saine d'esprit à d'autres égards, ne doit pas être acquittée pour le motif d'aliénation mentale, à moins que les hallucinations ne lui aient fait croire à l'existence d'un état de choses qui, s'il eût existé, aurait justifié ou excusé son acte ou omission.

(4) Jusqu'à preuve du contraire, chacun est présumé être et avoir été sain d'esprit.

Le ministère public a cité comme témoins les douaniers et les agents de la G.R.C. qui avaient fouillé et interrogé Abbey à l'aéroport. Ils ont affirmé que Abbey semblait «normal» lorsqu'ils avaient eu affaire à lui. Abbey n'a pas témoigné. La défense n'a cité qu'un seul témoin, le Dr Vallance, un psychiatre. Le ministère public a répliqué en faisant témoigner un autre psychiatre, le Dr Eaves. Il s'agit là des seuls témoignages rendus.

Le Dr Vallance a témoigné avoir vu Abbey pour la première fois environ 10 semaines après la perpétration de l'infraction. Son témoignage se fondait sur ses entrevues avec Abbey et avec la mère de ce dernier, sur son examen d'un rapport médical rédigé par un autre psychiatre et sur ses entretiens avec d'autres médecins qui soignaient Abbey. Le Dr Vallance a notamment jugé que la description qu'a donnée Abbey des événements entourant son voyage en Amérique du Sud donnait une idée de son état mental à l'époque pertinente. Selon le Dr Vallance, Abbey souffrait en tout temps pertinent d'une maladie mentale, d'une manie connue sous le nom d'hypomanie. Abbey se rendait compte qu'il importait de la cocaïne au Canada et il savait que cela était mauvais, mais il croyait que, si on l'y prenait, il resterait impuni. Le Dr Vallance a dit: judgment. I am sure he had some appreciation of what he was doing.

Dr Vallance further testified that, while Abbey was not rendered totally incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of his acts by reason of the disease of mind from which he suffered, there was a degree of impairment of judgment. He had the feeling that he was being looked after by some outside force that was feeding him strength and that no harm would come to him and even if he did get caught it did not matter because somehow he would be looked after. Dr. Vallance made reference to Abbey's delusional belief that he was committed to a particular path of action which he could not change and his further delusional idea, while in Lima, Peru, that he had "astro-travelled" back to Vancouver already and that in getting on the plane in Lima to fly home he was simply having the body follow where the "rest" had already gone.

Dr. Eaves, in rebuttal, was of the opinion that the disease of the mind experienced by Abbey, hypomania, would "not be substantially enough to render him incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of his actions . . . not to know that his actions were wrong".

The trial judge found that Abbey suffered from a disease of the mind. This was common ground. Both doctors agreed, however, that Abbey knew what he was doing and he knew that it was wrong. They disagreed on their assessment of the degree of Abbey's capability as of May 13, 1979. The judge found that disease of the mind incapacitated his ability to appreciate the nature and quality of his acts to the degree required to meet the test of s. 16(2). More particularly, Abbey did not "appreciate" the consequences of punishment associated with the commission of the offence. After referring to the decision of this Court in Cooper v. The Queen, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1149, the trial judge did find that Abbey "had the capacity to appreciate the nature of the act of importing and of possessing the Cocaine". He continued:

> As I understand the evidence and the submissions of counsel, the Accused had the capacity to appreciate the nature of the act of importing and of possessing the suis certain qu'il se rendait compte jusqu'à un certain point de ce qu'il faisait.

Le Dr Vallance a en outre témoigné que, si la maladie mentale d'Abbey ne le rendait pas tout à fait incapable de juger la nature et la qualité de ses actes, il n'en demeurait pas moins que son jugement en souffrait jusqu'à un certain point. Il avait l'impression qu'une puissance extérieure quelconque prenait soin de lui et lui donnait de la force, qu'aucun mal ne lui arriverait et que, même s'il se faisait attraper, c'était sans importance parce que d'une manière ou d'une autre il serait protégé. Le Dr Vallance a fait mention de l'illusion d'Abbey selon laquelle il était irrévocablement engagé dans une voie particulière et d'une autre illusion qu'il avait, savoir que, lorsqu'il était à Lima au Pérou, son esprit s'était déjà transporté à Vancouver et qu'en montant à bord de l'avion à Lima pour retourner chez lui, il faisait simplement faire au corps le voyage que le «reste» avait déjà fait.

Le Dr Eaves, en guise de réfutation, a exprimé l'avis que la maladie mentale dont souffrait Abbey, savoir l'hypomanie, [TRADUCTION] «ne suffisait pas au fond pour le rendre incapable de juger la nature et la qualité de ses actes . . . de savoir que ceux-ci étaient mauvais».

Le juge du procès a conclu qu'Abbey souffrait d'une maladie mentale. On reconnaît cela de part et d'autre. Les deux médecins étaient cependant d'accord pour dire qu'Abbey savait ce qu'il faisait et qu'il savait que c'était mauvais. C'est sur le degré de la capacité d'Abbey au 13 mai 1979 que leurs évaluations ne concordent pas. Le juge a conclu qu'une maladie mentale le rendait à ce point incapable de juger la nature et la qualité de ses actes qu'il satisfaisait au critère énoncé au par. 16(2). Plus particulièrement, Abbey «ne se rendait pas compte» des conséquences pénales liées à la perpétration de l'infraction. Après s'être référé à l'arrêt de cette Cour, Cooper c. La Reine, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 1149, le juge du procès a conclu qu'Abbey [TRADUCTION] «avait la capacité de juger la nature des actes qui consistent à importer et à avoir en sa possession de la cocaïne». Il a ajouté:

Cocaine. He also had the capacity to appreciate the immediate consequences of those acts. That is to say that they were illegal; that he should not commit them overtly; that if he succeeded he must then deliver some of the Cocaine to his friends who gave him the money for it, and find someone through another friend who would buy the rest at a large profit to himself. He had the capability, in that sense, of analysing the knowledge of what he was about, and he—in using the word "analysing" I adopt the definition given by Mr. Justice Estey in the Supreme Court of Canada decision, Regina v. Barnier (1980) 2 W.W.R. 659.

The trial judge, however, did not stop there. He went on to consider "whether the law requires that an accused also be able to appreciate, in the sense of which I have read from Mr. Justice Estey's decision, the consequences that may be personal to him. That is to say, the consequence of punishment."

In finding Abbey not guilty by reason of insanity the judge concluded that "one, who like Abbey suffers from the delusion that he is protected from punishment by some mysterious external force which comes to him, as described in the evidence of Dr. Vallance, has his ability to appreciate the nature and quality of his acts incapacitated to the degree required to meet the test of Section 16, Subsection 2. He is, by disease of the mind, deprived of the ability to assess an important consequence of his act. He is deprived of the effect of the penal sanctions . . . ."

The Crown appealed, contending that the trial judge had erred in law in directing himself to the law applicable to the defence of insanity. The appeal was dismissed.

The Crown has now appealed to this Court, on the grounds raised in the British Columbia Court of Appeal:

1) The trial judge erred in holding that a person who by reason of a disease of the mind does not "appreciate" the personal penal consequences of his actions is insane within the meaning of Section 16(2) of the Criminal Code.

en sa possession de la cocaïne. Il avait également la capacité de juger les conséquences immédiates de ces actes. C'est-à-dire qu'il s'agissait d'actes illégaux, qu'il ne devrait pas les commettre ouvertement, que s'il réussissait il devrait alors livrer une partie de la cocaïne à ses amis qui lui avaient donné l'argent pour l'acheter, et, par l'intermédiaire d'un autre ami, trouver quelqu'un qui lui achèterait le reste, ce qui lui permettrait de réaliser un profit considérable. Il avait la capacité, en ce sens qu'il était capable d'analyser la connaissance de ce qu'il allait faire, et il — lorsque j'emploie le mot «analyser», je fais mienne la définition que donne le juge Estey de la Cour suprême du Canada dans l'arrêt R. c. Barnier, (1980), 2 W.W.R. 659.

Le juge du procès ne s'est toutefois pas arrêté là. Il a poursuivi en examinant la question [TRADUCTION] «de savoir si la loi exige qu'un accusé soit également capable de juger, au sens de l'extrait des motifs du juge Estey que j'ai lu, les conséquences qui peuvent le toucher personnellement, c'est-à-dire les conséquences pénales.»

En déclarant Abbey non coupable pour cause d'aliénation mentale, le juge a conclu que [TRADUCTION] «quelqu'un qui, comme Abbey, est en proie à l'illusion qu'il est protégé contre toute peine par quelque puissance extérieure mystérieuse qui se manifeste à lui, comme le décrit le témoignage du Dr Vallance, est à ce point incapable de juger la nature et la qualité de ses actes qu'il satisfait au critère énoncé au par. 16(2). Il est, en raison d'une maladie mentale, dépourvu de la capacité d'apprécier une conséquence importante de son acte. Les sanctions pénales n'ont aucun effet sur lui . . . »

Le ministère public a interjeté appel en faisant valoir que le juge du procès avait commis une erreur de droit en se référant au droit applicable à la défense d'aliénation mentale. L'appel a été rejeté.

Le ministère public se pourvoit maintenant devant cette Cour en invoquant les moyens soulevés en Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique:

[TRADUCTION] 1) Le juge du procès a commis une erreur en statuant qu'une personne qui, en raison d'une maladie mentale, «ne se rend pas compte» des conséquences pénales personnelles de ses actes, est aliénée au sens du par. 16(2) du Code criminel.

2) The trial judge erred in giving effect to a defence of "irresistible impulse".

3) The trial judge misdirected himself with respect to the use which could be made of "hearsay" evidence introduced during the testimony of the psychiatrists who were called as witnesses.

II

The First Arm of Section 16(2)

The question raised in the first ground of appeal is therefore whether "appreciation of the nature and quality of an act" is limited to appreciation of the physical consequences of the act or also includes appreciation of the penal consequences to the accused. Taggart J.A., speaking for the Court of Appeal, said that Cooper v. The Queen, supra, and R. v. Barnier, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1124 made it clear that there is a distinction between "know" and "appreciate" and that the words "appreciate the nature and quality of his acts" connote more than a mere knowledge of the physical nature of the acts being committed. With respect, I agree. The British Columbia Court failed, however, to deal with the question of what it is an accused must fail to "appreciate" before he can be found to be legally insane. The Court simply accepted the trial judge's conclusion that somebody who, because of a disease of the mind, has the delusion that he is protected from punishment by some mysterious external force, is incapacitated from appreciating the nature and quality of his acts.

The defence of insanity in s. 16(2) of the Criminal Code has received lengthy consideration by this Court in several recent judgments: Cooper v. The Queen, supra, R. v. Barnier, supra, and, most recently, Kjeldsen v. The Queen, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 617. As stated in Cooper v. The Queen, at p. 1152, s. 16(2) of the Criminal Code "does not set out a test of insanity but, rather the criteria to be taken into account in determining criminal responsibility." With some hesitation the trial judge came to the conclusion that:

2) Le juge du procès a commis une erreur en retenant une défense d'«impulsion irrésistible».

3) Le juge du procès a commis une erreur quant à l'utilisation qui pouvait être faite de la preuve par «ouï-dire» produite au cours des témoignages des psychiatres cités comme témoins.

II

Les conséquences

Le premier volet du par. 16(2)

La question que pose le premier moyen d'appel est donc de savoir si «l'appréciation de la nature et de la qualité d'un acte» se limite aux conséquences matérielles de l'acte ou s'il porte également sur ses conséquences pénales pour l'accusé. Le juge Taggart, parlant au nom de la Cour d'appel, a affirmé qu'il se dégage nettement des arrêts Cooper c. La Reine, précité, et R. c. Barnier, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 1124, qu'il y a une différence entre le mot «savoir» et le mot «juger» et que l'expression «juger la nature et la qualité de ses actes» connote plus qu'une simple connaissance de la nature matérielle des actes qu'on accomplit. Avec égards, je suis d'accord. Il y a cependant une question que la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a omis d'examiner, savoir qu'est-ce qu'un accusé doit ne pas «juger» pour que l'on puisse conclure qu'il est un aliéné au sens de la loi. La Cour s'est contentée de faire sienne la conclusion du juge du procès voulant que quelqu'un qui, en raison d'une maladie mentale, a l'illusion que quelque puissance extérieure mystérieuse le protège contre toute peine, est incapable de juger la nature et la qualité de ses actes.

La défense d'aliénation mentale énoncée au par. 16(2) du Code criminel a fait l'objet d'une étude approfondie par cette Cour dans plusieurs arrêts récents: Cooper c. La Reine, précité; R. c. Barnier, précité, et le plus récent, Kjeldsen c. La Reine, [1981] 2 R.C.S. 617. Comme on le dit dans l'arrêt Cooper c. La Reine, à la p. 1152, le par. 16(2) du Code criminel «n'énonce pas un critère d'aliénation mentale mais, plutôt, les critères dont il faut tenir compte pour déterminer la responsabilité criminelle.» Le juge du procès en est venu, non sans hésitation, à la conclusion que:

. . . one, who like Abbey suffers from the delusion that he is protected from punishment by some mysterious external force which comes to him, as described in the evidence of Dr. Vallance, has his ability to appreciate the nature and quality of his acts incapacitated to the degree required to meet the test of Section 16, Subsection 2. He is, by disease of the mind, deprived of the ability to assess an important consequence of his act. He is deprived of the effect of the penal sanctions in restraining him from the commission of a crime as it should restrain us all.

With respect, the trial judge has confused the "ability to perceive the consequences, impact and results of a physical act" (Cooper v. The Queen, at p. 1162) with a belief, however unjustified, that the legal sanction imposed for the commission of the prohibited act, the "legal consequences", was somehow inapplicable to him. The delusion under which Abbey was supposedly labouring was that he would not get caught, or, if caught, would benefit from some undefined immunity to prosecution. Such a delusion by no means brings him under the first arm of the insanity test in s. 16(2) of the Criminal Code as developed in the recent cases.

According to s. 16(2) a person is insane when he has a disease of the mind to an extent that renders him incapable of

(i) appreciating the nature and quality of an act, or

(ii) knowing that an act is wrong.

As the recent decisions dealing with s. 16(2) have noted, the wording in the Criminal Code is slightly different than in the English M'Naghten rules which are the inspiration for the section. The concern of the recent cases has been to set the limits for the defence, limits which are broader than those in the M'Naghten rules. The M'Naghten rules, under what is termed the first arm of the test, require the accused to be incapable of knowing the nature and quality of his act. As has been pointed out by the commentators, a narrow literal interpretation of this test is such that "nobody is hardly ever really mad enough to be within it"

[TRADUCTION] . . . quelqu'un qui, comme Abbey, est en proie à l'illusion qu'il est protégé contre toute peine par quelque puissance extérieure mystérieuse qui se manifeste à lui, comme le décrit le témoignage du Dr Vallance, est à ce point incapable de juger la nature et la qualité de ses actes qu'il satisfait au critère énoncé au par. 16(2). Il est, en raison d'une maladie mentale, dépourvu de la capacité d'apprécier une conséquence importante de son acte. Les sanctions pénales n'ont aucun effet sur lui et ne l'empêchent donc pas de commettre un crime, alors que ce doit être leur effet sur nous tous.

Avec égards, le juge du procès a confondu la «capacité de percevoir les conséquences, les répercussions et les résultats d'un acte matériel» (Cooper c. La Reine, à la p. 1162) avec la croyance, si injustifiée soit-elle, que pour une raison ou pour une autre la sanction qu'impose la loi pour la perpétration de l'acte interdit, c'est-à-dire les «conséquences légales», ne s'applique pas à lui. L'illusion dont Abbey aurait été victime était qu'il ne se ferait pas attraper ou que, s'il était attrapé, il bénéficierait de quelque vague immunité contre des poursuites. Pareille illusion ne fait nullement jouer en sa faveur le premier volet du critère de l'aliénation mentale qui figure au par. 16(2) du Code criminel et qui a été interprété dans les arrêts récents.

Aux termes du par. 16(2), une personne est aliénée lorsqu'elle est atteinte de maladie mentale à un point qui la rend incapable

(i) de juger la nature et la qualité d'un acte,

(ii) de savoir qu'un acte est mauvais.

Comme il se dégage des arrêts récents portant sur le par. 16(2), la formulation qui se trouve dans le Code criminel diffère légèrement de celle des règles M'Naghten de l'Angleterre dont s'inspire ce paragraphe. Dans les arrêts récents, on s'est attaché à fixer des limites à ce moyen de défense et ces limites sont plus larges que celles établies par les règles M'Naghten. Les règles M'Naghten, aux termes de ce qu'on appelle le premier volet du critère, exigent que l'accusé soit incapable de savoir quelles sont la nature et la qualité de son acte. Comme l'ont fait remarquer les commentateurs, si on donne à ce critère une interprétation (Baron Bramwell quoted by G.A. Martin in "Insanity as a Defence" (1966), 8 Crim. L.Q. 240, at p. 243).

As the Court said in Cooper v. The Queen at p. 1161:

> To "know" the nature and quality of an act may mean merely to be aware of the physical act, while to "appreciate" may involve estimation and understanding of the consequences of that act. In the case of the appellant, as an example, in using his hands to choke the deceased, he may well have known the nature and quality of that physical act of choking. It is entirely different to suggest, however, that in performing the physical act of choking, he was able to appreciate its nature and quality in the sense of being aware that it could lead to or result in her death.

It is the use of the word "consequences" in this context which, unfortunately, led the trial judge astray. "Consequences" in Cooper v. The Queen, R. v. Barnier and Kjeldsen v. The Queen refer to the physical consequences of the act. All three cases were murder cases, violent crimes in which there was a victim who suffered the "consequences" of the accused's actions.

> The requirement, unique to Canada, is that of perception, an ability to perceive the consequences, impact, and results of a physical act. An accused may be aware of the physical character of his action (i.e., in choking) without necessarily having the capacity to appreciate that, in nature and quality, that act will result in the death of a human being. This is simply a restatement, specific to the defence of insanity, of the principle that mens rea, or intention as to the consequences of an act, is a requisite element in the commission of a crime [Cooper v. The Queen, at pp. 1162-63].

In Schwartz v. The Queen, [1977] 1 S.C.R. 673, Mr. Justice Martland said at p. 700:

> The Codere case, in my opinion correctly, decided that "nature and quality" dealt with the physical character of the act. If, therefore, a person who has committed a crime did not, by reason of disease of the mind, know what he was doing, he is not to be convicted, because it really was not his act.

littérale stricte, [TRADUCTION] «personne ne sera jamais vraiment assez aliéné pour y satisfaire» (Baron Bramwell, cité par G.A. Martin dans «Insanity as a Defence» (1966), 8 Crim. L.Q. 240, à la p. 243).

Comme l'a dit la Cour dans l'arrêt Cooper c. La Reine, à la p. 1161:

> «Connaître» la nature et la qualité d'un acte peut signifier simplement être conscient de l'acte matériel, alors que «juger» peut comprendre l'appréciation et la compréhension des conséquences de cet acte. Dans le cas de l'appelant, par exemple, en se servant de ses mains pour étrangler la victime, il peut bien avoir connu la qualité et la nature de cet acte matériel qu'est la strangulation. Il est tout à fait différent, cependant, de prétendre qu'en accomplissant l'acte de strangulation, il était capable d'en juger la nature et la qualité au sens d'être conscient que cela pouvait entraîner ou causer la mort.

C'est l'emploi du mot «conséquences» dans ce contexte qui, malheureusement, a induit en erreur le juge du procès. Le mot «conséquences» dans les arrêts Cooper c. La Reine, R. c. Barnier et Kjeldsen c. La Reine renvoie aux conséquences matérielles de l'acte. Dans chacune de ces affaires il y avait un meurtre, un crime violent dont la victime avait subi les «conséquences» des actes de l'accusé.

> L'exigence, propre au Canada, est celle de la perception, une capacité de percevoir les conséquences, les répercussions et les résultats d'un acte matériel. Un accusé peut être conscient de l'aspect matériel de son acte (c.-à-d., la strangulation) sans nécessairement pouvoir juger que, par sa nature et sa qualité, cet acte entraînera la mort d'un être humain. Il s'agit simplement d'une réitération, propre à la défense d'aliénation mentale, du principe que la mens rea, ou l'intention relativement aux conséquences d'un acte, est un élément nécessaire dans la perpétration d'un crime [Cooper c. La Reine, aux pp. 1162 et 1163].

Dans l'arrêt Schwartz c. La Reine, [1977] 1 R.C.S. 673, le juge Martland affirme, à la p. 700:

> Dans l'arrêt Codere, on a décidé, à juste titre à mon avis, que les mots «nature et qualité» visent l'aspect matériel de l'acte. Par conséquent, si une personne qui a commis un crime ne savait pas ce qu'elle faisait, en raison d'une maladie mentale, elle ne doit pas être déclarée coupable, parce que ce n'était pas vraiment son acte.

In Codere (1916), 12 Cr. App. R. 21 (C.C.A.), Reading L.C.J. considered the application of the M'Naghten rules at pp. 26-27 and in particular the expression "nature and quality of the act":

> It is said that "quality" is to be regarded as characterising the moral, as contrasted with the physical, aspect of the deed. The Court cannot agree with that view of the meaning of the words "nature and quality." The Court is of opinion that in using the language "nature and quality" the judges were only dealing with the physical character of the act, and were not intending to distinguish between the physical and moral aspects of the act. That is the law as it has been laid down by judges in many directions to juries, and as the Court understands it to be at the present time.

Although there is some controversy in academic circles, I adopt the more traditional view espoused by Glanville Williams (Criminal Law, The General Part, 2nd ed. (1961), para. 166, at p. 525) that a delusion falling under the "first arm" of the insanity defence negatives an element of the crime, the mens rea. It may also, as Martin J.A. pointed out in R. v. Rabey (1977), 37 C.C.C. (2d) 461, notwithstanding the existence of mens rea in the formal sense of intention, foresight, or knowledge with respect to the actus reus, exempt from liability if the criteria of insanity are met. As the Court observed in Cooper the requirement that the accused be able to perceive the consequences of a physical act is a restatement, specific to the defence of insanity, of the principle of mens rea, or intention as to the consequences of an act, as a requisite element in the commission of a crime. The mental element must be proved with respect to all circumstances, and consequences, that form part of the actus reus. As the Crown in this case correctly points out, "While punishment may be a result of the commission of a criminal act it is not an element of the crime itself". A delusion which renders an accused "incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of his act" goes to the mens rea of the offence and brings into operation the "first arm" of s. 16(2): he is not guilty by reason of insanity. A delusion which renders an accused

Dans l'arrêt Codere (1916), 12 Cr. App. R. 21 (C.C.A.), le lord juge en chef Reading a étudié l'application des règles M'Naghten, aux pp. 26 et 27, en portant une attention particulière à l'expression «nature et qualité de l'acte»:

Bien que la question fasse l'objet d'une certaine controverse dans les milieux universitaires, j'adopte le point de vue plus traditionnel adopté par Glanville Williams (Criminal Law, The General Part, 2e éd. (1961), par. 166, à la p. 525), selon lequel une hallucination qui relève du «premier volet» de la défense d'aliénation mentale neutralise un élément du crime, savoir la mens rea. Comme l'a fait remarquer le juge Martin dans l'arrêt R. v. Rabey (1977), 37 C.C.C. (2d) 461, nonobstant l'existence de la mens rea au sens formel d'intention, de prévision ou de connaissance relativement à l'actus reus, pareille hallucination peut également dégager de toute responsabilité si elle satisfait aux critères de l'aliénation mentale. Comme cette Cour l'a souligné dans l'arrêt Cooper, l'exigence que l'accusé soit capable de percevoir les conséquences d'un acte matériel constitue une réitération, propre à la défense d'aliénation mentale, du principe de la mens rea, ou de l'intention relativement aux conséquences d'un acte, en tant qu'élément nécessaire de la perpétration d'un crime. Il faut prouver l'existence de l'élément mental relativement à toutes les circonstances et à toutes les conséquences qui font partie de l'actus reus. Comme le ministère public le fait remarquer avec raison en l'espèce, [TRADUCTION] «Si la peine peut être un résultat de la perpétration d'un acte criminel, elle ne constitue pas pour autant un incapable of appreciating that the penal sanctions attaching to the commission of the crime are applicable to him does not go to the mens rea of the offence, does not render him incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of the act, and does not bring into operation the "first arm" of the insanity defence.

Abbey was charged with importing and trafficking in cocaine. There is no dispute as to the fact that he carried cocaine into the country. In his statement to police, it was his admitted intention to import cocaine for the purposes of trafficking. In other words, Abbey appreciated that the actus reus of each of the offences charged was being committed. Both the psychiatrist called for the defence, and the psychiatrist who testified on behalf of the Crown, stated that Abbey appreciated the nature and quality of his act. The judge erred, in my view, in going on to say that a failure to appreciate the penal sanctions ("consequence of punishment") brought the accused within the ambit of the "first arm" of the insanity defence of s. 16(2).

Should the question of "personal penal consequences" be relevant at all, it is more appropriately discussed within the context of the second arm of s. 16(2) i.e. "knowing that an act . . . is wrong". Glanville Williams in his Criminal Law, The General Part, supra, at p. 478 says:

> It has been determined that this phrase [nature and quality] refers to the physical character of the act, not its legal quality; legal right and wrong are cared for by the second question . . . [citing Codere, supra, at p. 27].

This Court having decided in Schwartz v. The Queen, supra, that "wrong" means wrong according to law, and it being established that Abbey élément du crime lui-même». Une hallucination qui rend un accusé «incapable de juger la nature et la qualité» de son acte relève de la mens rea relative à l'infraction et entraîne l'application du «premier volet» du par. 16(2): il est non coupable pour cause d'aliénation mentale. Une hallucination qui rend un accusé incapable de se rendre compte que les sanctions pénales qui se rattachent à la perpétration du crime s'appliquent à lui, par contre, ne relève pas de la mens rea relative à l'infraction, ne le rend pas incapable de juger la nature et la qualité de l'acte et n'entraîne pas l'application du «premier volet» de la défense d'aliénation mentale.

Abbey a été accusé d'importation et de trafic de cocaïne. Le fait qu'il soit entré au pays avec de la cocaïne ne fait l'objet d'aucune contestation. Dans sa déclaration à la police, il a avoué avoir eu l'intention d'importer de la cocaïne pour en faire le trafic. En d'autres termes, Abbey s'était rendu compte qu'il commettait l'actus reus de chacune des infractions dont il était accusé. Le psychiatre cité pour la défense et celui qui a témoigné pour le compte du ministère public ont tous deux déclaré qu'Abbey se rendait compte de la nature et de la qualité de son acte. A mon avis, le juge a commis une erreur en ajoutant que, puisque l'accusé ne se rendait pas compte des sanctions pénales («les conséquences pénales»), il tombait dans le champ d'application du «premier volet» de la défense d'aliénation mentale énoncée au par. 16(2).

Dans la mesure où la question des «conséquences pénales personnelles» peut être pertinente, il convient davantage de l'examiner dans le contexte du second volet du par. 16(2), c.-à-d. «savoir qu'un acte . . . est mauvais». Glanville Williams dans son ouvrage Criminal Law, The General Part, précité, affirme à la p. 478:

> [TRADUCTION] On a décidé que cette expression [nature et qualité] vise l'aspect matériel de l'acte et non pas sa qualité juridique; c'est la seconde question qui porte sur le bien et le mal au point de vue juridique . . . [l'auteur cite l'arrêt Codere, précité, à la p. 27].

Vu que dans l'affaire Schwartz c. La Reine, précitée, cette Cour a décidé que le mot «mauvais» signifie mauvais selon la loi, et vu qu'il est établi knew his act was "wrong", his inability to "appreciate" the penal consequences is really irrelevant to the question of legal insanity. There seems to be no doubt on the evidence, and on the judge's findings, that Abbey knew that he was doing an act forbidden by law.

With respect, the trial judge homogenized the first and second arms of s. 16(2), collapsing the one into the other in, for example, the following passage from his judgment:

> As I understood the evidence and the submission of counsel, the Accused had the capacity to appreciate the nature of the act of importing and of possessing the Cocaine. He also had the capacity to appreciate the immediate consequences of those acts. That is to say that they were illegal; that he should not commit them overtly. . . .

The second arm of s. 16(2) is concerned with cognitive capabilities, with knowledge, and not with appreciation of consequences. Section 16(2) speaks in terms of knowledge of wrongness, not appreciation of wrongness. One must, I think, draw a distinction between what might be termed "result" crimes and what might be termed "knowledge" crimes. In respect of the former it is correct to speak of appreciation of consequences. The capacity to appreciate the nature and quality of his act refers to the physical character of the act. It requires both an appreciation of the factors involved, and sufficient mental capacity to measure and foresee the consequences of the conduct.

With respect, however, to the second arm of s. 16(2), knowledge that it is wrong, Martland J. set out the test in the Schwartz case at p. 701:

> In brief, it is my opinion that the effect of s. 16(2) is to provide protection to a person suffering from disease of the mind who has committed a crime if, in committing the crime, he did not appreciate what he was doing, or, if he did have that appreciation, he did not know that he was committing a crime.

In a note on Schwartz v. The Queen, supra, entitled "Section 16 and 'Wrong' ", 18 Cr.L.Q. 413, Professor Mewett submits that the question that qu'Abbey savait que son acte était «mauvais», son incapacité de «juger» les conséquences pénales est vraiment sans rapport avec la question de l'aliénation mentale au sens de la loi. D'après la preuve et les conclusions du juge, il paraît ne faire aucun doute qu'Abbey savait qu'il commettait un acte contraire à la loi.

Avec égards, le juge du procès a fusionné les deux volets du par. 16(2), mélangeant l'un à l'autre, comme il le fait par exemple dans le passage suivant tiré de son jugement:

> [TRADUCTION] Si je comprends bien la preuve et les arguments de l'avocat, l'accusé avait la capacité de juger la nature des actes qui consistent à importer et à avoir en sa possession de la cocaïne. Il avait également la capacité de juger les conséquences immédiates de ces actes. C'est-à-dire qu'il s'agissait d'actes illégaux, qu'il ne devrait pas les commettre ouvertement . . .

Le second volet du par. 16(2) vise la faculté cognitive, c'est-à-dire la connaissance et non pas l'appréciation des conséquences. Le paragraphe 16(2) porte sur la connaissance du caractère mauvais d'un acte et non sur l'appréciation de son caractère mauvais. Il faut, je crois, faire la distinction entre ce qu'on peut appeler les crimes de «résultat» et ce qu'on peut appeler les crimes de «connaissance». Pour ce qui est des premiers, on peut à bon droit parler de l'appréciation des conséquences. La capacité de juger la nature et la qualité d'un acte se rapporte à l'aspect matériel de cet acte. Cela exige à la fois qu'on se rende compte de ce que l'acte comporte et qu'on ait une capacité mentale suffisante pour pouvoir mesurer et prévoir les conséquences de la conduite adoptée.

Toutefois, quant au second volet du par. 16(2), c'est-à-dire la connaissance que l'acte est mauvais, le juge Martland a énoncé le critère applicable dans l'arrêt Schwartz, à la p. 701:

> En bref, je suis d'avis que l'effet du par. 16(2) est de protéger une personne souffrant d'aliénation mentale, qui a commis un crime, si, en commettant le crime, elle ne se rendait pas compte de ce qu'elle faisait ou, si, s'en rendant compte, elle ne savait pas qu'elle commettait un crime.

Dans une note sur l'arrêt Schwartz c. La Reine, précité, intitulée «Section 16 and «Wrong»», 18 Cr.L.Q. 413, le professeur Mewett soutient que la ought to be asked is "whether the accused, because of a disease of the mind (first hurdle) was rendered incapable (second hurdle) of knowing that this act was something that he ought not to do (third hurdle)" (at p. 415). If he was capable of knowing that an act was contrary to law, and that he ought not to do an act contrary to law, then, in the opinion of Professor Mewett, the defence should not apply.

When one is considering the legal aspects of a crime such as the importation of a narcotic the principal inquiry should be directed not to appreciation of physical consequences but to knowledge of wrongness. The trial judge said, "This man knew it was a crime, knew there was penalty, but by delusion believed himself protected." Counsel for Abbey said in argument that he had to accept the fact that he could not bring Abbey's state of mind into the second half of s. 16(2). On these findings, in my opinion, the defence of insanity was not open to Abbey.

I agree with the submission of counsel for the Crown that s. 16(3) of the Code can be of no assistance to Abbey as his delusion could not in any way "justify" or "excuse" his actions. In any event, any defence which could be raised under subsection (3) could also be raised under subsection (2). See the McRuer Report [Report of the Royal Commission on the Law of Insanity as a Defence in Criminal Cases, (1956)], p. 36.

I am of the view that the trial judge erred in law in holding that a person who by reason of disease of the mind does not "appreciate" the penal consequences of his actions is insane within the meaning of s. 16(2) of the Criminal Code.

III

Irresistible Impulse

The second ground of appeal is the submission that the trial judge erred in giving effect to a defence of "irresistible impulse". The submission rests upon the following passage from the judg-question que l'on doit poser est de savoir [TRADUCTION] «si une maladie mentale (première étape) a rendu l'accusé incapable (deuxième étape) de savoir qu'il ne devait pas accomplir cet acte (troisième étape)» (à la p. 415). S'il était capable de savoir qu'un acte était contraire à la loi et qu'il ne devait pas accomplir un acte contraire à la loi, alors, de l'avis du professeur Mewett, ce moyen de défense ne peut être invoqué.

L'étude des aspects juridiques d'un crime comme l'importation d'un stupéfiant doit surtout porter sur la connaissance du caractère mauvais et non pas sur l'appréciation des conséquences matérielles. Le juge du procès a dit: [TRADUCTION] «Cet homme savait que c'était un crime et qu'il y avait une peine, mais, en raison d'une hallucination, il se croyait protégé». L'avocat d'Abbey a affirmé, au cours des plaidoiries, qu'il devait reconnaître que la seconde moitié du par. 16(2) ne pouvait pas s'appliquer à l'état d'esprit d'Abbey. Vu ces conclusions, j'estime qu'Abbey ne pouvait invoquer la défense d'aliénation mentale.

Je suis d'accord avec le substitut du procureur général qui a soutenu que le par. 16(3) du Code ne peut être d'aucun secours à Abbey, puisque son hallucination ne pouvait en aucune manière «justifier» ou «excuser» ses actes. Quoi qu'il en soit, tout moyen de défense qui peut être invoqué en vertu du par. (3), peut l'être également en vertu du par. (2). Voir le Rapport McRuer [Rapport de la Commission royale chargée d'étudier la défense d'aliénation mentale en matière criminelle, (1956)], à la p. 36.

Je suis d'avis que le juge du procès a commis une erreur de droit en statuant que celui qui, en raison d'une maladie mentale, «ne se rend pas compte» des conséquences pénales de ses actes, est un aliéné mental au sens du par. 16(2) du Code criminel.

L'impulsion irrésistible

Comme deuxième moyen d'appel, on fait valoir que le juge du procès a commis une erreur en retenant une défense d'«impulsion irrésistible». Cette prétention repose sur le passage suivant tiré ment at trial, and in particular the words "he believed himself irrevocably committed":

I must also note a second question closely connected with the delusion I have already discussed. It involves the delusion which I find existed with Abbey and which also satisfies the test of Section 16, Subsection 2, that while he was in Peru he thought he should not go through with the importing and possession of Cocaine, but he believed himself irrevocably committed to it. That was not in the sense that having arranged with his friends he was bound to honour the arrangement, but in the sense that he was committed to a path of action which he was, by reason of a force acting upon him, powerless to change.

The Crown maintains that the trial judge found that this "second delusion" independently of any other delusions, rendered Abbey legally insane. Such a finding, the Crown contends, gives effect to a defence not recognized in Canadian law, that of irresistible impulse. What was said by Cartwright C.J. in R. v. Borg, [1969] S.C.R. 551, is cited in support of this proposition.

There is no issue here at all. Both the majority and minority opinions in R. v. Borg deny the existence of a defence, as such, of irresistible impulse. Both the majority and minority opinions in Borg, however, recognize that irresistible impulse may be a symptom or manifestation of a disease of the mind which may give rise to a defence of insanity.

When an accused pleads insanity there is a sense in which it is true to say that irresistible impulse of itself is not a defence. However, there are two senses in which it is not true to say that irresistible impulse of itself is not a defence.

There is no legal presumption of insanity merely from the existence of an irresistible impulse. If an accused presents no medical evidence of disease of the mind but merely pleads that he was acting under an irresistible impulse, a jury is not entitled to infer that the man was insane. In that sense irresistible impulse is not of itself a defence. However, if there is medical evidence of disease of the mind as there was here and yet the only symptoms of that disease of the mind are irresistible impulses, the des motifs de jugement prononcés au procès, et particulièrement sur les mots [TRADUCTION] «il s'y croyait irrévocablement tenu»:

Selon la prétention du ministère public, le juge du procès a conclu que cette «seconde hallucination», indépendamment de toute autre, faisait d'Abbey un aliéné mental au sens de la loi. Cette conclusion, prétend le ministère public, équivaut à retenir un moyen de défense que le droit canadien ne reconnaît pas, savoir l'impulsion irrésistible. On cite à l'appui de cet argument ce qu'a dit le juge en chef Cartwright dans l'arrêt R. c. Borg, [1969] R.C.S. 551.

Il s'agit là d'une question qui ne se pose pas en l'espèce. Les avis tant de la majorité que de la minorité dans l'arrêt R. c. Borg, tout en niant que l'impulsion irrésistible constitue en soi un moyen de défense, reconnaissent toutefois qu'elle peut être un symptôme ou une manifestation d'une maladie mentale pouvant donner lieu à une défense d'aliénation mentale.

[TRADUCTION] Quand un accusé plaide l'aliénation mentale, il est vrai dans un sens que l'impulsion irrésistible ne constitue pas en soi une défense. Mais, dans deux autres sens, ce n'est pas vrai.

En droit, la simple existence d'une impulsion irrésistible ne crée pas une présomption d'aliénation mentale. Si un accusé ne présente aucune preuve médicale de maladie mentale, mais se contente de plaider qu'il agissait sous le coup d'une impulsion irrésistible, un jury ne peut à bon droit conclure qu'il était dans un état d'aliénation mentale. C'est en ce sens que l'impulsion irrésistible ne constitue pas en soi un moyen de défense. Si toutefois il y a une preuve médicale de l'existence jury may conclude that the accused is insane [per Hall J., at p. 570].

There is no error in the trial judgment in this respect. The trial judge did not give effect to an independent defence of irresistible impulse. His comments with respect to the "second delusion" were made in the context of his consideration of the insanity defence. He specifically rejected the existence of a defence of diminished responsibility in Canada.

I agree with the British Columbia Court of Appeal that the reasons of the trial judge should be understood in the sense that Abbey suffered from a disease of the mind which resulted in two delusions; the first was that some mysterious external force would protect him from punishment; the second that he believed himself irrevocably committed to the course of action of importing cocaine; and that these delusions taken together rendered him incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of his acts. The trial judge did not equate the "delusion" with a defence of irresistible impulse and, that being the case, such authorities as R. v. Borg, supra, R. v. Creighton (1908), 14 C.C.C. 349 and other authorities to a similar effect cited by Crown counsel have no application to the case at bar.

IV

Hearsay Evidence

As a third ground of appeal the Crown contends that the trial judge misdirected himself with respect to the use which could be made of hearsay evidence introduced during the testimony of the psychiatrists who were called as witnesses.

Dr. Vallance testified that during the course of his interviews Abbey told him of various delusions, visions, hallucinations and sensations which he had experienced in the six months preceding his arrest. Dr. Vallance also testified that Abbey had described certain symptoms of the disease to his mother several months prior to the commission of the offence. In his testimony, Dr. Vallance recounted several incidents of bizarre and unstable conduct by Abbey both before his departure for d'une maladie mentale, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce, et que les seuls symptômes de cette maladie mentale sont des impulsions irrésistibles, le jury peut conclure à l'aliénation mentale de l'accusé [le juge Hall, à la p. 570].

A cet égard, le jugement rendu au procès ne contient aucune erreur. Le juge du procès n'a pas retenu l'impulsion irrésistible comme moyen de défense indépendant. Il a fait ses observations concernant la «seconde hallucination» dans le cadre de son étude de la défense d'aliénation mentale. Il a formellement rejeté l'existence d'une défense de responsabilité atténuée au Canada.

Je suis d'accord avec la Cour d'appel de la Colombie Britannique que l'interprétation à donner aux motifs du juge du procès est qu'Abbey souffrait d'une maladie mentale qui provoquait chez lui deux hallucinations; la première était que quelque puissance extérieure mystérieuse le protégerait contre toute peine; la seconde était qu'il se croyait irrévocablement engagé dans la voie de l'importation de cocaïne; et, prises ensemble, ces hallucinations le rendaient incapable de juger la nature et la qualité de ses actes. Le juge du procès n'a pas assimilé l'«hallucination» à une défense d'impulsion irrésistible et, tel étant le cas, des arrêts comme R. c. Borg, précité, R. v. Creighton (1908), 14 C.C.C. 349 et d'autres arrêts semblables cités par le substitut du procureur général ne s'appliquent pas en l'espèce.

La preuve par ouï-dire

Comme troisième moyen d'appel, le ministère public prétend que le juge du procès a commis une erreur quant à l'usage qui pouvait être fait de la preuve par ouï-dire présentée au cours des témoignages des psychiatres.

Le D[r] Vallance a témoigné qu'au cours de ses entrevues, Abbey lui avait parlé des différentes illusions, visions, hallucinations et sensations qu'il avait éprouvées au cours des six mois qui avaient précédé son arrestation. Le D[r] Vallance a également témoigné qu'Abbey avait décrit certains symptômes de sa maladie à sa mère plusieurs mois avant la perpétration de l'infraction. Dans son témoignage, le D[r] Vallance a relaté plusieurs incidents, survenus avant le départ d'Abbey pour le Peru and during his stay. Abbey had told him, Dr. Vallance testified, that four days prior to his actual departure for Peru he had missed a flight and, in a rage, kicked in a window at Vancouver airport. Dr. Vallance was also told by Abbey of certain experiences in Peru: "he could see lights and follow the lights and would interpret those phenomenon with ideas that there was some power outside of him that was communicating with him. He would do strange things, like run out into the fields. He was licking the wetness from trees". The Crown submits that the trial judge accepted and treated as factual much of this hearsay evidence related by Dr. Vallance in the course of giving his opinion. The point is well taken.

Pérou et pendant son séjour là-bas, qui dénotent un comportement bizarre et instable chez celui-ci. Abbey lui avait dit, a témoigné le Dr Vallance, que quatre jours avant son départ pour le Pérou il avait raté un vol et que, dans un accès de colère, il avait donné un coup de pied dans une fenêtre à l'aéroport de Vancouver. Abbey a également parlé au Dr Vallance de certaines expériences qu'il avait vécues au Pérou: [TRADUCTION] «il pouvait voir des lumières et les suivre et il donnait à ces phénomènes l'interprétation qu'il existait une puissance extérieure quelconque qui communiquait avec lui. Il faisait des choses étranges comme courir dans les champs. Il léchait la rosée sur les arbres». Le ministère public prétend que le juge du procès a accepté et traité comme des faits une bonne partie de ces éléments de preuve par ouï-dire relatés par le Dr Vallance au cours de son témoignage. Cette prétention est bien fondée.

A general principle of evidence is that all relevant evidence is admissible. The law of evidence, however, reposes on a few general principles riddled by innumerable exceptions. Two major exceptions to this general principle are hearsay evidence and opinion evidence. There are also exceptions to the exceptions. "Expert witnesses may testify to their opinion on matters involving their expertise" (Cross on Evidence, 5th ed. (1979), at p. 20) and may also, incidentally, base their opinions upon hearsay.

Il y a en matière de preuve un principe général selon lequel toute preuve pertinente est recevable. Le droit de la preuve repose toutefois sur quelques principes généraux auxquels se greffent d'innombrables exceptions. Ce principe général souffre deux exceptions importantes, savoir la preuve par ouï-dire et le témoignage d'opinion. Les exceptions connaissent également des exceptions. [TRADUCTION] «Les témoins experts peuvent donner leur opinion sur des questions qui relèvent de leur domaine de compétence» (Cross on Evidence, 5e éd. (1979), à la p. 20), et ils peuvent également, soit dit en passant, fonder leurs opinions sur une preuve par ouï-dire.

A major difficulty encountered by counsel and the courts alike has been identifying hearsay. There exists a "superstitious awe . . . about having any truck with evidence which involves A's telling the court what B said to him" (Cross, "What should be done about the Rule Against Hearsay", [1965] Crim. L.R. 68, at p. 82). Phipson suggests three reasons for this:

La détermination de ce qui constitue une preuve par ouï-dire pose une grande difficulté sur laquelle butent aussi bien les avocats que les cours. Il existe une [TRADUCTION] «crainte superstitieuse ... d'avoir affaire à un témoignage dans lequel A dit à la cour ce que B lui a dit» (Cross, «What should be done about the Rule Against Hearsay», [1965] Crim. L.R. 68, à la p. 82). D'après Phipson, il y a trois raisons à cela:

(1) Failure to appreciate that the hallmark of a hearsay statement is not only the nature and the source of the statement but also the purpose for which it is tendered.

[TRADUCTION] 1) Le défaut de se rendre compte qu'une déclaration qui constitue une preuve par ouï-dire se distingue non seulement par sa nature et par sa source mais aussi par son objet.

(2) The absence of any comprehensive judicial formulation of the rule—no doubt because "it is difficult to make any general statement about the law of hearsay which is entirely accurate."

(3) The multiplicity of formulations found in textbooks upon the subject. [Phipson on Evidence 12th ed. (1976), Supplemented to 1980, para. 625 at pp. 263-64.]

2) L'absence d'une formulation judiciaire complète de la règle — sans doute parce qu'«il est difficile de faire une déclaration générale sur le droit de la preuve par ouï-dire qui soit entièrement exacte.»

3) La multiplicité de formulations qu'on trouve dans les ouvrages qui traitent de ce sujet [Phipson on Evidence 12e éd. (1976), avec suppléments jusqu'en 1980, par. 625, aux pp. 263 et 264.]

The main concern of the hearsay rule is the veracity of the statements made. The principal justification for the exclusion of hearsay evidence is the abhorrence of the common law to proof which is unsworn and has not been subjected to the trial by fire of cross-examination. Testimony under oath, and cross-examination, have been considered to be the best assurances of the truth of the statements of facts presented. Not all statements by a witness of that which he heard someone else say are, however, necessarily hearsay. A felicitous formulation of the distinction between hearsay and non-hearsay evidence is found in the Privy Council decision in Subramaniam v. Public Prosecutor, [1956] 1 W.L.R. 965 at p. 970:

La règle de l'irrecevabilité du ouï-dire vise surtout à assurer la véracité des déclarations. L'exclusion de la preuve par ouï-dire se justifie principalement par le fait que la common law a en horreur toute preuve qui n'a pas été présentée sous serment et qui n'a pas été soumise à l'épreuve du contre-interrogatoire. On estime que le témoignage rendu sous serment et le contre-interrogatoire constituent les meilleures garanties de la véracité des déclarations de faits présentées. Toutefois, les déclarations que fait un témoin concernant ce qu'il a entendu dire par quelqu'un d'autre ne constituent pas toutes nécessairement une preuve par ouï-dire. Une formulation appropriée de la distinction entre la preuve par ouï-dire et la preuve qui ne tombe pas dans cette catégorie se trouve dans l'arrêt du Conseil privé Subramaniam v. Public Prosecutor, [1956] 1 W.L.R. 965, à la p. 970:

Evidence of a statement made to a witness by a person who is not himself called as a witness may or may not be hearsay. It is hearsay and inadmissible when the object of the evidence is to establish the truth of what is contained in the statement. It is not hearsay and is admissible when it is proposed to establish by the evidence, not the truth of the statement, but the fact that it was made.

[TRADUCTION] La preuve d'une déclaration faite par une personne qui elle-même ne témoignera pas, peut être ou ne pas être une preuve par ouï-dire, selon les circonstances. C'est une preuve par ouï-dire, donc irrecevable, lorsqu'elle vise à établir la véracité du contenu de la déclaration. Ce n'est pas une preuve par ouï-dire et elle est recevable lorsqu'elle vise à établir non pas que la déclaration est exacte mais qu'elle a été faite.

What is sometimes loosely and erroneously referred to as hearsay evidence may in fact be "original evidence" as Cross terms it:

When a witness is asked to narrate another's statement for some purpose other than that of inducing the court to accept it as true, his evidence is said to be "original". Original evidence may therefore be defined as evidence of the fact that a statement was made, tendered without reference to the truth of anything alleged in the statement [Cross on Evidence, 5th ed. (1979), at p. 8, emphasis added].

Ce qu'on appelle parfois, de façon imprécise et erronée, preuve par ouï-dire, peut être en réalité ce que Cross qualifie de «preuve originale»:

[TRADUCTION] Lorsqu'on demande à un témoin de rapporter la déclaration d'une autre personne à une fin autre que celle d'inciter la cour à la tenir pour vraie, on dit que son témoignage constitue une preuve «originale». La preuve originale peut donc se définir comme la preuve qui établit qu'une déclaration a été faite, sans établir pour autant la véracité de ce qui est allégué dans la déclaration [Cross on Evidence, 5e éd. (1979), à la p. 8; les italiques sont de moi].

Opinion Evidence

Witnesses testify as to facts. The judge or jury draws inferences from the facts. "In the law of evidence 'opinion' means any inference from observed fact, and the law on the subject derives from the general rule that witnesses must speak only to that which was directly observed by them" (Cross on Evidence, supra, at p. 442). Where it is possible to separate fact from inference the witness may only testify as to fact. It is not always possible, however, to do so and the "law makes allowances for these borderline cases by permitting witnesses to state their opinion with regard to matters not calling for special knowledge whenever it would be virtually impossible for them to separate their inferences from the facts on which those inferences are based" (ibid.)

With respect to matters calling for special knowledge, an expert in the field may draw inferences and state his opinion. An expert's function is precisely this: to provide the judge and jury with a ready-made inference which the judge and jury, due to the technical nature of the facts, are unable to formulate. "An expert's opinion is admissible to furnish the Court with scientific information which is likely to be outside the experience and knowledge of a judge or jury. If on the proven facts a judge or jury can form their own conclusions without help, then the opinion of the expert is unnecessary" (Turner (1974), 60 Crim. App. R. 80, at p. 83, per Lawton L.J.)

An expert witness, like any other witness, may testify as to the veracity of facts of which he has first-hand experience, but this is not the main purpose of his or her testimony. An expert is there to give an opinion. And the opinion more often than not will be based on second-hand evidence. This is especially true of the opinions of psychiatrists.

As stated by Fauteux J. in Wilband v. The Queen, [1967] S.C.R. 14 at p. 21:

Le témoignage d'opinion

Les témoins déposent quant aux faits. Le juge ou le jury tire des conclusions à partir des faits. [TRADUCTION] «Dans le droit de la preuve, «opinion» s'entend de toute conclusion qu'on tire d'un fait observé, et le droit dans ce domaine dérive de la règle générale selon laquelle les témoins doivent uniquement parler de ce qu'ils ont observé directement» (Cross on Evidence, précité, à la p. 442). Lorsqu'il est possible de séparer les faits des conclusions tirées de ces faits, le témoin ne peut témoigner que sur les faits. Toutefois, cela n'est pas toujours possible et [TRADUCTION] «le droit fait preuve de souplesse dans ces cas limites en permettant aux témoins d'exprimer leur opinion relativement à des questions qui n'exigent pas de connaissances particulières, chaque fois qu'il leur serait virtuellement impossible de séparer leurs conclusions des faits sur lesquels celles-ci se fondent» (ibid.).

Quant aux questions qui exigent des connaissances particulières, un expert dans le domaine peut tirer des conclusions et exprimer son avis. Le rôle d'un expert est précisément de fournir au juge et au jury une conclusion toute faite que ces derniers, en raison de la technicité des faits, sont incapables de formuler. [TRADUCTION] «L'opinion d'un expert est recevable pour donner à la cour des renseignements scientifiques qui, selon toute vraisemblance, dépassent l'expérience et la connaissance d'un juge ou d'un jury. Si, à partir des faits établis par la preuve, un juge ou un jury peut à lui seul tirer ses propres conclusions, alors l'opinion de l'expert n'est pas nécessaire» (Turner (1974), 60 Crim. App. R. 80, à la p. 83, le lord juge Lawton).

Un témoin expert, comme tout autre témoin, peut témoigner quant à l'exactitude des faits dont il a une expérience directe, mais ce n'est pas là l'objet principal de son témoignage. L'expert est là pour exprimer une opinion et cette opinion est le plus souvent fondée sur un ouï-dire. Cela est particulièrement vrai en ce qui concerne les opinions de psychiatres.

Comme l'a dit le juge Fauteux dans l'arrêt Wilband c. La Reine, [1967] R.C.S. 14, à la p. 21:

The value of psychiatrist's opinion may be affected to the extent to which it may rest on second-hand source material; but that goes to the weight and not to the receivability in evidence of the opinion, which opinion is no evidence of the truth of the information but evidence of the opinion formed on the basis of that information.

In the Wilband case counsel for Wilband had attempted to have declared inadmissible as hearsay opinion evidence because it was based in part on prison records, material not proved in open court. Fauteux J. found in fact the prison records were not relied upon to any significant extent by the psychiatrists in the formation of their opinion but the decision does stand for the proposition that the second-hand nature of the basis of the opinion does not "contaminate" the opinion. This is consistent with the acceptance of expert evidence based, as it often is, upon hypothetical questions. For the judge or jury the expert's opinion is a question of fact which may be accepted or rejected as seen fit. The opinion, even if uncontradicted, is not determinative of an issue.

Thus an expert opinion based on second-hand evidence is admissible, if relevant. The problem arose in R. v. Dietrich (1970), 1 C.C.C. (2d) 49 (Ont. C.A.), as to second-hand evidence itself which formed the basis of the opinion. Gale C.J.O. reached the conclusion that "Put shortly, if an expert is permitted to give his opinion, he ought to be permitted to give the circumstances upon which that opinion is based" (at p. 65). Testimony as to circumstances upon which the opinion is based is not introduced, and cannot be introduced, in order to establish the veracity of the second-hand evidence. It is thus not hearsay evidence. Jessup J.A. correctly stated the law in R. v. Rosik, [1971] 2 O.R. 47:

1. In my view, a psychiatrist expressing an opinion as to a mental or emotional condition of an accused can relate in evidence, as Dr. Gray did, what he has been told by the accused when such information is a basis of his opinion .... The hearsay rule does not operate to exclude such evidence because it is not admitted to

Dans l'affaire Wilband, l'avocat de Wilband avait essayé d'obtenir qu'un témoignage d'opinion soit déclaré irrecevable pour le motif qu'il constituait une preuve par ouï-dire parce qu'il se fondait en partie sur des dossiers de la prison, lesquels n'avaient pas fait l'objet d'une preuve à l'audience. Le juge Fauteux a conclu qu'en réalité les psychiatres ne s'étaient pas fondés de façon importante sur les dossiers de la prison pour former leur opinion, mais l'arrêt établit qu'une opinion n'est pas «viciée» du simple fait qu'elle se fonde sur un ouï-dire. Cela est compatible avec la réception en preuve d'un témoignage d'expert fondé, comme c'est souvent le cas, sur des questions hypothétiques. En ce qui concerne le juge ou le jury, l'opinion de l'expert est une question de fait qu'ils sont libres d'accepter ou de rejeter. L'opinion, même si elle est incontestée, n'est pas déterminante.

Il s'ensuit que l'opinion d'un expert fondée sur un ouï-dire est recevable, à la condition d'être pertinente. Ce problème s'est présenté dans l'affaire R. v. Dietrich (1970), 1 C.C.C. (2d) 49 (C.A. Ont.) relativement au ouï-dire même qui constituait le fondement de l'opinion. Le juge en chef Gale est arrivé à la conclusion suivante: [TRADUCTION] «En bref, si l'on permet à un expert de donner son opinion, on devrait lui permettre de divulguer les circonstances sur lesquelles celle-ci se fonde» (à la p. 65). Un témoignage quant aux circonstances sur lesquelles se fonde l'opinion n'a pas pour objet et ne peut avoir pour objet d'établir la véracité du ouï-dire. Il ne s'agit donc pas de preuve par ouï-dire. Dans l'arrêt R. v. Rosik, [1971] 2 O.R. 47, le juge Jessup a énoncé avec exactitude le principe de droit applicable: prove the fact of what the expert has been told: see Wigmore on Evidence, 3rd ed.; vol. VI, s. 1720, p. 70, approved by Gale C.J.O., in the Dietrich case. The trial Judge should have so instructed the jury and it would have been proper for him also to point out that there was no sworn evidence that the accused ingested drugs or consumed the quantity of alcohol integral to Dr. Gray's opinion . . . [at p. 84-85, emphasis added].

Jessup J.A.'s view was recently confirmed by this Court in Phillion v. The Queen, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 18. After citing the excerpt from Subramaniam v. Public Prosecutor which is quoted above with respect to hearsay evidence, Ritchie J. went on to say, at p. 24:

> Statements made to psychiatrists and psychologists are sometimes admitted in criminal cases and when this is so it is because they have qualified as experts in diagnosing the behavioural symptoms of individuals and have formed an opinion which the trial judge deems to be relevant to the case, but the statements on which such opinions are based are not admissible in proof of their truth but rather as indicating the basis upon which the medical opinion was formed in accordance with recognized professional procedures.

The danger, of course, in admitting such testimony is the ever present possibility, here exemplified, that the judge or jury, without more, will accept the evidence as going to the truth of the facts stated in it. The danger is real and lies at the heart of this case. Once such testimony is admitted, a careful charge to the jury by the judge or direction to himself is essential. The problem, however, as pointed out by Fauteux J. in Wilband resides not in the admissibility of the testimony but rather the weight to be accorded to the opinion. Although admissible in the context of his opinion, to the extent that it is second-hand his testimony is not proof of the facts stated. Lawton L.J. in Turner, supra, spoke of this "elementary principle"which is "frequently overlooked":

n'emporte pas l'exclusion d'une telle preuve parce qu'elle n'est pas reçue en vue d'établir ce qu'on a dit à l'expert: voir Wigmore on Evidence, 3e éd., vol. VI, par. 1720, à la p. 70, approuvé par le juge en chef Gale dans l'arrêt Dietrich. Le juge du procès aurait dû donner des directives en ce sens au jury et souligner l'absence de témoignage sous serment démontrant que l'accusé avait ingéré de la drogue ou consommé la quantité d'alcool sur laquelle se fondait l'opinion du Dr Gray . . . (aux pp. 84 et 85; c'est moi qui souligne).

Le point de vue du juge Jessup a été confirmé récemment par cette Cour dans l'arrêt Phillion c. La Reine, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 18. Après avoir cité l'extrait de l'arrêt Subramaniam v. Public Prosecutor, cité plus haut relativement à la preuve par ouï-dire, le juge Ritchie ajoute, à la p. 24:

> Les déclarations faites à des psychiatres et à des psychologues sont parfois jugées recevables dans les affaires criminelles et, dans ce cas, c'est parce que ces experts dans le diagnostic du comportement humain se sont fondés sur elles pour émettre une opinion tenue pour pertinente par le juge de première instance; toutefois, les déclarations sur lesquelles ces opinions se fondent sont irrecevables comme preuves de leur propre véracité et constituent seulement le fondement de l'opinion médicale formée suivant les règles professionnelles reconnues.

Certes, le danger que présente l'acceptation en preuve d'un tel témoignage est la possibilité, toujours présente, comme on le voit en l'espèce, que le juge ou le jury conclue sans plus que ce témoignage établit l'exactitude des faits qu'il contient. Il s'agit là d'un danger réel qui touche au coeur de la présente espèce. Dès qu'un témoignage de ce genre est reçu en preuve, il est indispensable que le juge se montre prudent dans son exposé au jury ou dans sa propre appréciation de la preuve. Cependant, comme le souligne le juge Fauteux dans l'arrêt Wilband, le problème ne se pose pas au niveau de la recevabilité du témoignage, mais plutôt au niveau de la valeur probante à accorder à l'opinion qu'il contient. Bien que recevable dans le cadre d'une opinion, dans la mesure où il constitue un ouï-dire, ce témoignage ne prouve pas les faits énoncés. Le lord juge Lawton, dans l'arrêt Turner, précité, a parlé de ce [TRADUCTION] «principe fondamental» qu'on [TRADUCTION] «néglige souvent»:

Thereupon the judge commented that the report contained "hearsay character evidence" which was inadmissible. He could have said that all the facts upon which the psychiatrist based his opinion were hearsay save for those which he observed for himself during his examination of the appellant such as his appearance of depression and his becoming emotional when discussing the deceased girl and his own family. It is not for this Court to instruct psychiatrists how to draft their reports, but those who call psychiatrists as witnesses should remember that the facts upon which they base their opinions must be proved by admissible evidence. This elementary principle is frequently overlooked [at p. 82, emphasis added].

In the present case Abbey did not testify. Dr. Vallance testified, in the course of his opinion, as to many events and experiences related to him during several interviews. This testimony, while admissible in the context of the opinion, was not in any way evidence of the factual basis of these events and experiences. The trial judge in his decision fell into the error of accepting as evidence of these facts, testimony which if taken to be evidence of their existence would violate the hearsay rule. There was no admissible evidence properly before the Court with respect to: the delusions experienced by the accused; the accused having described the symptoms of his disease to his mother some six months prior to the commission of the offence; the accused having seen a psychiatrist before leaving for Peru; the accused's unstable conduct at the airport some days prior to leaving for Peru or his bizarre behaviour in Peru.

In my view the trial judge erred in law in treating as factual the hearsay evidence upon which the opinions of the psychiatrist were based.

Counsel for Abbey said that the passages in which the trial judge seemed to take symptoms as findings of fact were merely "unfortunate language". But it goes further than that. As Woods J.A. said in R. v. Perras (1972), 8 C.C.C. (2d) 209, at p. 213, "The evidence of a physician stating what a patient told him about his symptoms is not evidence as to the existence of the symptoms. To accept it as such would be to

En l'espèce, Abbey n'a pas témoigné. Le Dr Vallance, en donnant son opinion, a parlé d'un bon nombre d'événements et d'expériences qui lui avaient été relatés au cours de plusieurs entrevues. Bien que recevable dans le cadre de l'opinion, ce témoignage ne prouve aucunement l'aspect factuel de ces événements et expériences. Dans sa décision, le juge du procès a commis l'erreur de retenir comme preuve de ces faits un témoignage qui, s'il était tenu comme preuve de leur existence, contreviendrait à la règle de l'irrecevabilité du ouï-dire. Aucune preuve régulièrement recevable n'avait été soumise à la cour relativement aux hallucinations de l'accusé, à la description que l'accusé avait faite à sa mère des symptômes de sa maladie quelque six mois avant la perpétration de l'infraction, à sa consultation d'un psychiatre avant de partir pour le Pérou, à sa conduite instable à l'aéroport quelques jours avant son départ pour le Pérou ou à son comportement bizarre au Pérou.

A mon avis, le juge du procès a commis une erreur de droit en tenant pour des faits les éléments de preuve par ouï-dire sur lesquels se fondait l'opinion du psychiatre.

L'avocat d'Abbey a affirmé que les passages dans lesquels le juge du procès a semblé considérer des symptômes comme des constatations de faits ne sont qu'un [TRADUCTION] «choix de mots malencontreux». Mais cela va plus loin. Comme l'a dit le juge Woods dans l'arrêt R. v. Perras (1972), 8 C.C.C. (2d) 209, à la p. 213, [TRADUCTION] «Le témoignage d'un médecin qui relate ce qu'un patient lui a dit concernant ses symptômes ne infringe the rule against hearsay." It was appropriate for the doctors to state the basis for their opinions and in the course of doing so, to refer to what they were told not only by Abbey but by others, but it was error for the judge to accept as having been proved the facts upon which the doctors had relied informing their opinions. While it is not questioned that medical experts are entitled to take into consideration all possible information in forming their opinions, this in no way removes from the party tendering such evidence the obligation of establishing, through properly admissible evidence, the factual basis on which such opinions are based. Before any weight can be given to an expert's opinion, the facts upon which the opinion is based must be found to exist.

Conclusion

Thus the trial judge erred in two respects. There was no admissible evidence of important facts regarding Abbey's conduct upon which the medical opinions were based. And the judge misconstrued the recent cases dealing with the interpretation of the insanity defence in s. 16(2). A failure to "appreciate" the penal sanctions attaching to an offence does not render the accused "incapable of appreciating the nature and quality" of his act so as to bring the insanity defence into play.

The appeal should be allowed. The judgments at trial and on appeal should be set aside, and a new trial ordered on both counts.

Appeal allowed.

constitue pas une preuve de l'existence de ces symptômes. En le retenant comme preuve de cette existence, on contreviendrait à la règle de l'irrecevabilité du ouï-dire.» Il convenait que les médecins énoncent le fondement de leurs opinions et, ce faisant, qu'ils mentionnent ce qui leur avait été dit non seulement par Abbey mais aussi par d'autres personnes; cependant, c'est à tort que le juge a tenu pour prouvés les faits sur lesquels les médecins s'étaient fondés pour former leurs opinions. Bien qu'on ne conteste pas le droit des experts médicaux de prendre en considération tous les renseignements possibles pour former leurs opinions, cela ne dégage en aucune façon la partie qui produit cette preuve de l'obligation d'établir, au moyen d'éléments de preuve régulièrement recevables, les faits sur lesquels se fondent ces opinions. Pour que l'opinion d'un expert puisse avoir une valeur probante, il faut d'abord conclure à l'existence des faits sur lesquels se fonde l'opinion.

Conclusion

Donc le juge du procès a commis une erreur à deux égards. D'abord, il n'y avait pas de preuve recevable quant à certains faits importants relatifs à la conduite d'Abbey, sur lesquels se fondaient les opinions médicales. Ensuite, le juge a mal interprété les arrêts récents portant sur l'interprétation de la défense d'aliénation mentale prévue au par. 16(2). Le défaut de «se rendre compte» des sanctions pénales qui se rattachent à une infraction ne rend pas l'accusé «incapable de juger la nature et la qualité» de son acte, de manière à pouvoir invoquer la défense d'aliénation mentale.

Le pourvoi doit être accueilli. Le jugement rendu au procès et l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel doivent être infirmés et un nouveau procès ordonné relativement aux deux chefs d'accusation.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Criminal law — Evidence — Expert evidence — Admissibility — Mohan criteria — Accused charged with sexual assaults on two young male children — Expert witness testifying that accused's personality incompatible with any predisposition to commit such offences — Whether trial judge erred in excluding expert evidence.

The accused was charged with a series of sexual assaults on two young male children. He tendered the evidence of a psychiatrist to establish that in all probability a serious sexual deviant had inflicted the abuse, including anal intercourse, and no such deviant personality traits were disclosed by the accused in various tests including penile plethysmography. After a voir dire, the trial judge excluded the expert evidence because it purported to show only lack of general disposition and was not saved by the "distinctive group" exception recognized in Mohan. The accused was convicted. A majority of the Court of Appeal allowed the accused's appeal and ordered a new trial on the basis that the expert evidence was wrongly excluded.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and the conviction restored.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DU QUÉBEC

Droit criminel — Preuve — Preuve d'expert — Admissibilité — Critères de l'arrêt Mohan — Accusé inculpé d'avoir agressé sexuellement deux garçonnets — Expert témoignant que la personnalité de l'accusé ne permet pas de conclure qu'il est prédisposé à commettre de telles infractions — Le juge du procès a-t-il commis une erreur en excluant la preuve d'expert?

L'accusé a été inculpé d'avoir commis une série d'agressions sexuelles sur deux garçonnets. Il a fait témoigner un psychiatre dans le but d'établir que, selon toute probabilité, l'auteur des mauvais traitements qui comprenaient des relations sexuelles anales était une personne atteinte d'une déviance sexuelle grave, et que divers tests administrés à l'accusé, dont une pléthysmographie pénienne, ne révélaient aucun trait de personnalité déviant de la sorte. À la suite d'un voir-dire, le juge du procès a exclu la preuve d'expert pour le motif qu'elle paraissait démontrer seulement une absence de prédisposition générale disposition et n'était pas sauvegardée par l'exception du «groupe distinctif» reconnue dans l'arrêt Mohan. L'accusé a été déclaré coupable. La Cour d'appel à la majorité a accueilli l'appel de l'accusé et ordonné la tenue d'un nouveau procès pour le motif que la preuve d'expert avait été exclue à tort.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi est accueilli et la déclaration de culpabilité est rétablie.

Le fait que le juge du procès a évité que la recherche des faits soit faussée par la présentation d'un témoignage d'expert inapproprié, en exerçant sa fonction de exercise through the introduction of inappropriate expert testimony, deserves a high degree of respect. In this case, the trial judge was not persuaded that the Mohan requirements had been met.

Novel science is subject to "special scrutiny". In this case the psychiatrist was a pioneer in Canada in trying to use the penile plethysmograph, previously recognized as a therapeutic tool, as a forensic tool. Moreover, if expert evidence were accepted that the offence was probably committed by a member of a "distinctive group" from which the accused is excluded, it would be a short step to the conclusion on the ultimate issue of guilt or innocence. This was another reason for special scrutiny.

The "distinctive group" exception sought to be applied here requires that it be shown that the crime could only, or would only, be committed by a person having distinctive personality traits that the accused does not possess. The personality profile of the perpetrator group must identify truly distinctive psychological elements that were in all probability present and operating in the perpetrator at the time of the offence. The Mohan requirement that this profile be "standard" was to ensure that it is not put together on an ad hoc basis for the purpose of a particular case. Beyond that, the issue whether the "profile" is sufficient depends on the expert's ability to identify and describe with workable precision what exactly distinguishes the distinctive or deviant perpetrator from other people and on what basis the accused can be excluded. The expert evidence tendered in this case was unsatisfactory on both points. The definition of the "distinctive" group of individuals with a propensity to commit the "distinctive crime" was vague. While the reference in Mohan to a "standard profile" should not be taken to require an exhaustive inventory of personality traits, the profile must confine the class to useful proportions. Furthermore, the witness did not satisfy the trial judge that the underlying principles and methodology of the tests administered to the accused were reliable and, importantly, applicable. Even giving a loose interpretation to the need for a "standard profile", and passing over the doubts that only a pedophile would be capable of the offence, the evidence of the error rate in the tests administered to the accused was problematic. The possibility that such evidence would distort the fact-finding process was very real. Consideration of the cost-benefit analysis supports the trial judge's conclusion that the testimony offered as many problems as it did solutions, and it was therefore gardien dans l'évaluation des exigences de procès juste et équitable, mérite beaucoup de respect. Dans la présente affaire, le juge du procès n'était pas convaincu que les exigences de l'arrêt Mohan étaient respectées.

Une nouvelle théorie ou technique scientifique doit être «soigneusement examinée». En l'espèce, le psychiatre a fait œuvre de pionnier au Canada en essayant d'utiliser, en tant qu'outil médicolégal, la pléthysmographie pénienne auparavant reconnue comme étant un outil thérapeutique. De plus, si on acceptait une preuve d'expert que l'infraction a probablement été commise par un membre d'un «groupe distinctif» dont l'accusé est exclu, on serait très près de la conclusion sur la question fondamentale de la culpabilité ou de l'innocence. Cela justifiait d'autant plus un examen minutieux.

L'exception du «groupe distinctif» que l'on cherche à appliquer dans la présente affaire exige qu'il soit démontré que le crime ne serait ou ne pourrait être commis que par une personne ayant des traits de personnalité distinctifs que l'accusé ne possède pas. Le profil de personnalité du groupe auquel appartient l'auteur de l'infraction doit relever des éléments psychologiques véritablement distinctifs qui, selon toute probabilité, étaient présents et en action chez ce dernier au moment de la perpétration de l'infraction. L'exigence de l'arrêt Mohan que ce profil soit un profil «type» avait pour objet d'éviter qu'il soit établi de manière ponctuelle en fonction de chaque cas particulier. En outre, la réponse à la question de savoir si le «profil» est suffisant dépend de la capacité de l'expert de déterminer et décrire avec une précision réaliste ce qui, au juste, fait que l'auteur distinctif ou déviant du crime diffère des autres personnes, et du motif pour lequel l'accusé peut être exclu. La preuve d'expert qui a été produite en l'espèce était insuffisante à ces deux égards. La définition du groupe «distinctif» de personnes qui ont une propension à commettre ce «crime distinctif» était vague. Même si la mention d'un «profil type» dans l'arrêt Mohan ne devrait pas être interprétée comme exigeant un inventaire exhaustif des traits de personnalité, le profil doit ramener la catégorie à des proportions utiles. En outre, le témoin n'a pas convaincu le juge du procès que les principes et la méthode qui sous-tendent les tests administrés à l'accusé étaient fiables et, qui plus est, applicables. Même en donnant une interprétation large à la nécessité d'un «profil type» et en faisant abstraction des doutes que seul un pédophile serait capable de commettre l'infraction en cause, la preuve du taux d'erreur des tests administrés à l'accusé était problématique. La possibilité qu'une telle preuve fausse le processus de within his discretion to exclude it. The majority of the Court of Appeal erred in interfering with the exercise of that discretion.

recherche des faits était très réelle. La prise en considération de l'analyse du coût et des bénéfices appuie la conclusion du juge du procès que ce témoignage a apporté autant de problèmes que de solutions, et le juge avait donc le pouvoir discrétionnaire de l'exclure. La Cour d'appel à la majorité a commis une erreur en intervenant dans l'exercice de ce pouvoir discrétionnaire.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

BINNIE J. — In this appeal we are required to consider aspects of the "gatekeeper function" performed by trial judges in the reception of novel scientific evidence. The respondent was charged with a series of sexual assaults over a period of four months on two young males with whom he stood in a parental relationship. At the time of the offences, which involved the allegation of anal penetration, the young males were between three and five years old. The defence contended that such offences were committed by someone possessed of a highly distinct personality disorder, and tendered an expert psychiatrist, Dr. Édouard Beltrami, to testify that the respondent's personality was incompatible with any predisposition to commit such offences. The evidence was excluded by the trial judge, who convicted the respondent. A new trial was ordered by a majority of the Quebec Court of Appeal on the basis that this evidence was wrongly excluded. We are of the opinion that in the circumstances the trial judge was entitled to exclude the expert evidence and that the appeal must be allowed and the conviction restored.

Version française du jugement de la Cour rendu par

LE JUGE BINNIE — Dans le présent pourvoi, nous sommes appelés à examiner des aspects de la «fonction de gardien» qu'exerce le juge du procès lorsqu'il reçoit une preuve scientifique d'un genre nouveau. L'intimé a été accusé d'avoir commis, pendant quatre mois, une série d'agressions sexuelles sur deux garçonnets auxquels il tenait lieu de père. Au moment des infractions, qui auraient comporté des actes de pénétration anale, les garçonnets avaient entre trois et cinq ans. La défense a prétendu que la personne qui avait commis ces infractions souffrait d'un trouble de la personnalité très particulier, et a fait comparaître un psychiatre expert, le Dr Édouard Beltrami, qui a témoigné que la personnalité de l'intimé ne permettait pas de conclure qu'il était prédisposé à commettre de telles infractions. Le juge du procès a exclu cette preuve et a déclaré l'intimé coupable. La Cour d'appel du Québec à la majorité a ordonné la tenue d'un nouveau procès pour le motif que cette preuve avait été exclue à tort. Nous sommes d'avis que, dans les circonstances, le juge du procès avait le droit d'exclure la preuve d'expert et que le pourvoi doit être accueilli et la déclaration de culpabilité rétablie.

I. The Facts

2 The respondent's family situation is complex. Between February 1, 1995 and May 19, 1995, he had custody of W. and L., two children between three and five years old. The respondent testified that at the time of the events, he was living with his current wife and her son. Because W. and L. did not get along well with his wife's son, the respondent had rented an apartment for them where they lived with a female friend, who looked after them at nights and during the weekends, and a babysitter who came in on weekdays. The respondent visited the apartment on a daily basis, took about half of his meals there and was often present during the weekends.

3 On May 9, 1995, a child and youth protection centre received information alleging that L. had been sexually abused by the respondent. About a week later, the two children were removed from the respondent's custody and placed in a foster home. The foster mother did not know the respondent nor did she know why the children had been removed from his custody. She and her sister testified against the respondent at the trial.

1. Statements by the Children

4 The foster mother testified that:

(i) While giving a bath to the two children, she observed them rubbing their penises together. W. then started to hit L.'s buttock with his penis. On being questioned, the children said it was "Papi" who showed them to do that.

(ii) Another time, W. told her that "Papi" had rubbed his "coulout" on his body, had [TRANSLATION] "wet his hair", and that "when papi finished doing that . . . he put his coulout in his behind", and that when he had done doing that, there was blood in W's excrement. W. told her

I. Les faits

La situation familiale de l'intimé est complexe. Entre le 1er février 1995 et le 19 mai 1995, il a eu la garde de W. et de L., deux enfants qui avaient entre trois ans et cinq ans. Dans son témoignage, l'intimé a déclaré qu'à l'époque où les épisodes se sont produits, il habitait avec son épouse actuelle et le fils de cette dernière. Comme W. et L. ne s'entendaient pas bien avec le fils de celle-ci, l'intimé avait loué un appartement pour eux où ils habitaient en compagnie de l'une de ses amies qui s'occupait d'eux le soir et la fin de semaine; une dame les gardait durant la semaine. L'intimé se rendait quotidiennement à l'appartement, y prenait environ la moitié de ses repas et y était souvent présent la fin de semaine.

Le 9 mai 1995, un centre de protection de l'enfance et de la jeunesse a été informé que l'intimé aurait agressé sexuellement L. Environ une semaine plus tard, l'intimé s'est vu retirer la garde des deux enfants, qui ont été placés dans une famille d'accueil. La mère de la famille d'accueil ne connaissait aucunement l'intimé et ne savait pas non plus pourquoi il avait perdu la garde des enfants. Sa sœur et elle ont témoigné contre l'intimé au procès.

1. Les déclarations des enfants

Dans son témoignage, la mère de la famille d'accueil a affirmé ce qui suit:

(i) Alors qu'elle donnait un bain aux deux enfants, elle a remarqué qu'ils frottaient leur pénis ensemble. W. s'est ensuite mis à frapper le derrière de L. avec son pénis. Quand elle les a questionnés à ce sujet, les enfants ont répondu que c'était «papi» qui leur avait montré cela.

(ii) À une autre occasion, W. lui a révélé que «papi» avait frotté son «coulout» sur son corps, qu'il avait «mouillé ses cheveux», que «quand son papi a fini de faire ça, [. . .] il met son coulout dans son derrière» et que lorsqu'il eut terminé, il y avait du sang dans les selles de W.

that this was painful and caused him to walk with difficulty. According to the foster mother, W. had tears in his eyes when he gave this account. "Coulout" is a slang word for penis. The foster mother said she had never heard the word until the child mentioned it.

W. lui a dit que c'était douloureux et qu'il avait ensuite de la difficulté à marcher. Selon la mère de la famille d'accueil, W. avait les larmes aux yeux en racontant cela. «Coulout» est un mot d'argot qui désigne le pénis. La mère de la famille d'accueil a dit qu'elle n'avait jamais entendu ce mot avant que l'enfant l'utilise.

The sister of the foster mother also did not know the respondent. She testified that at one point she was watching television with the children. During an episode in which two persons were kissing, W. blurted out a similar "coulot" story with the same details about blood and difficulties in walking. W. said that "Papi" would then clean up the excrement with some paper and that "Papi's" "coulout" is quite different than his: [TRANSLATION] "it's bigger and all hairy".

5 La sœur de la mère de la famille d'accueil ne connaissait pas non plus l'intimé. Elle a témoigné qu'à un moment donné elle regardait la télévision avec les enfants. Au cours d'un épisode dans lequel deux personnes s'embrassaient, W. a lâché une histoire semblable de «coulout» avec les mêmes détails en ce qui concerne le sang et la difficulté à marcher. W. a dit que «papi» prenait ensuite un papier pour enlever les excréments et que le «coulout» de «papi» était très différent du sien: «c'est plus gros [et] plein de cheveux».

On October 24, 1995, Sergeant Binette asked W. who had put his "coulout" in his buttock. The child answered "Papi J." and quickly identified the respondent as "Papi J." when presented with pictures.

6 Le 24 octobre 1995, le sergent Binette a demandé à W. qui avait mis son «coulout» dans son derrière. L'enfant a répondu «papi J.» et a rapidement identifié l'intimé comme étant «papi J.» quand on lui montré des photos.

2. The Charges

2. Les accusations

The respondent was charged with sexual offences in relation to both W. and L., including touching for a sexual purpose the body of a person under the age of 14 years, unlawful anal intercourse, and sexual assault.

7 L'intimé a été accusé d'avoir commis des infractions d'ordre sexuel sur W. et L., notamment d'avoir touché le corps d'un enfant de moins de 14 ans à des fins d'ordre sexuel, d'avoir eu des relations sexuelles anales illicites avec une autre personne et de s'être livré à une agression sexuelle.

3. The Examining Physicians

3. Les médecins examinateurs

Dr. Desmarchais, a pediatrist retained by the Crown, examined W. on July 24, 1995, more than two months after the children were removed from the respondent's custody. She observed a 1.5 cm lesion near the anus and thought that there was no doubt that the boy had been sodomized. On the other hand, Dr. Chabot, also a pediatrist who testified for the Crown, was equivocal. He examined W. on August 31, 1995. He said that while the scar was longer than one might expect from constipa-

8 Le Dr Desmarchais, une pédiatre dont les services ont été retenus par le ministère public a examiné W. le 24 juillet 1995, soit plus de deux mois après que l'intimé eut perdu la garde des enfants. Elle a constaté une lésion de 1,5 cm près de l'anus, qui, à son avis, indiquait indubitablement que le garçon avait été sodomisé. Par contre, le Dr Chabot, un autre pédiatre ayant témoigné pour le ministère public, était nuancé dans ses conclusions. Il a examiné W. le 31 août 1995. Il a affirmé que, même si la cicatrice était plus longue que celle à laquelle on pourrait s'attendre lorsqu'il y a constipation, la blessure était compatible autant avec la constipation qu'avec la sodomie.

tion, the injury was consistent with constipation as well as with sodomy.

4. The Excluded Evidence

4. La preuve exclue

9 In the course of his trial, the respondent tendered the evidence of Dr. Édouard Beltrami, a qualified psychiatrist who works extensively in the field of clinical psychology. Dr. Beltrami's evidence was tendered to establish that in all probability a serious sexual deviant had inflicted anal intercourse on two children of that age, and no such deviant personality traits were disclosed in Dr. Beltrami's testing of the respondent. The Crown objected to the admission of this evidence and a voir dire was held. Dr. Beltrami testified in the voir dire as follows:

Au cours de son procès, l'intimé a fait témoigner le Dr Édouard Beltrami, un psychiatre compétent dont maints travaux portent sur le domaine de la psychologie clinique. Le témoignage du Dr Beltrami visait à établir que, selon toute probabilité, une personne atteinte d'une déviance sexuelle grave avait eu des relations sexuelles anales avec deux enfants de cet âge, et les tests qu'il avait administrés à l'intimé ne révélaient aucun trait de personnalité déviant de la sorte. Le ministère public s'est opposé à l'admission de cette preuve et un voir-dire a été tenu. Au cours du voir-dire, le Dr Beltrami a témoigné ainsi:

> (1) While it is not possible to establish a standard profile of individuals with a disposition to sodomize young children, such individuals [TRANSLATION] "frequently" or "habitually" exhibited certain distinctive characteristics which could be identified. The respondent had been tested for these characteristics and excluded.
> (2) The tests, which had been administered by Dr. Beltrami's assistant, but the results evaluated by Dr. Beltrami himself, consisted of two approaches, the first a series of general personality tests, and the second a test which Dr. Beltrami considered could detect individuals with serious sexual disorders.

> (1) Bien qu'il soit impossible d'établir le profil type des individus prédisposés à sodomiser de jeunes enfants, ces individus démontrent «fréquemment» ou «habituellement» certaines caractéristiques distinctives identifiables. L'intimé a été testé en fonction de ces caractéristiques et a été écarté.

10 In the first set of tests, the respondent was asked a series of questions about his family history, his schooling, his work experiences, his emotional and sexual life, his hobbies and life habits. The "Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory Test Version 2" (hereinafter "MMPI2") was also administered. The respondent's reactions, while being questioned, were monitored by electromyography (EMG), which measures anxiety. It acts as a sort of lie detector. The objective of the MMPI2 is to identify different potential personality characteristics, including the tendency to be truthful, to hide symptoms, to be subject to psychosis, to be depressive, to be hyperactive, to be anxious, to be histrionic, etc. These tests are not designed specifically for the detection of sexual disorders.

Dans la première série de tests, l'intimé s'est vu poser une série de questions sur ses antécédents familiaux, ses études, son expérience de travail, sa vie affective et sexuelle, ses passe-temps et ses habitudes de vie. On lui a également administré la deuxième version du test intitulé «Inventaire multiphasique de la personnalité du Minnesota» (ci-après «MMPI2»). Les réactions de l'intimé, lorsqu'il était questionné, étaient captées par électro-

myographie (EMG), une technique permettant de mesurer l'anxiété. L'EMG est une sorte de détecteur de mensonges. Le MMPI2 vise à déceler diverses caractéristiques potentielles de la personnalité, dont la tendance à dire la vérité, à dissimuler des symptômes et à être psychotique, dépressif, hyperactif, anxieux, histrionique, etc. Ces tests ne sont pas conçus précisément pour déceler des troubles d'ordre sexuel.

The second and more controversial test was directed to the respondent's sexual preferences. It consisted of exposing him to images and sounds of sexual activity, both normal and deviant, and measuring his physiological reaction through a gauge attached to his penis. The "strain gauge" is designed to pick up signs of physical arousal. Dr. Beltrami explained that if the subject has previously derived pleasure from a specific form of sexual activity, the pleasure is imprinted on the brain, and may be restimulated on further exposure to pictures or sounds of similar activity. This is how he explained it to the court:

Le deuxième test, qui est plus controversé, concernait les préférences sexuelles de l'intimé. Il consistait à lui présenter des images et à lui faire entendre des sons d'actes sexuels normaux et déviants, et à mesurer sa réaction psychologique au moyen d'un capteur attaché à son pénis. Le «capteur de contrainte» sert à déceler des signes d'excitation physique. Le D[r] Beltrami a expliqué que si le sujet a déjà éprouvé du plaisir en se livrant à une certaine forme d'activité sexuelle, ce plaisir est enraciné dans son cerveau, et il peut être stimulé de nouveau en présence d'images ou de sons d'actes semblables. Voici comment il a expliqué cela à la cour:

[TRANSLATION]

Q. How do you . . . how is it done?

A. The subject is shown normal and deviant images and is played normal and deviant audio cassettes.

Q. Yes.

A. And those who have derived pleasure in the past from a deviant sexual activity, this . . .

Q. This test?

A. . . . this pleasure is kind of ingrained in his brain in the form of an engram, to use the technical term . . .

Q. Okay, just to . . .

A. And when the subject is shown the same situations, it will cause either a mini-erection of which he is sometimes not aware, but a tumescence, that is, a swelling of his penis that is measured with a device for that purpose that is connected to electronic instruments that take down the resulting measurements.

Q. De quelle façon qu'on . . . que c'est fait ça?

R. C'est qu'on projette des images normales et déviantes, on fait écouter des cassettes audio normales et déviantes au sujet.

Q. Oui.

R. Et les gens qui ont déjà eu du plaisir dans une activité sexuelle déviante, cet . . .

Q. Ce test?

R. . . . ce plaisir est un peu comme enraciné dans son cerveau sous forme d'engramme, pour utiliser le terme technique . . .

Q. O.K., juste pour . . .

R. Et quand on lui représente ces mêmes situations, ça va provoquer ou une mini-érection dont il est parfois pas conscient, mais une tumescence, c'est-à-dire un gonflement de son pénis qui est mesuré avec un appareil adéquat, et relié à des appareils électroniques qui prennent des mesures en conséquence.

12 All of the tests used standardized questions, images and scenarios. The respondent was never confronted with specific images designed to replicate the offences alleged against him.

13 Dr. Beltrami testified on the voir dire that the first set of tests showed that the respondent had had an unexceptional childhood, that he had not been sexually abused, that he had a good education which allowed him to hold a responsible job and that he was ingenious and entrepreneurial. He noted that the respondent often maintained two or three intimate heterosexual relationships at the same time without his partners knowing about one another. There were several children from these various relationships. Dr. Beltrami notes [TRANSLATION] "He clearly exhibits judgment problems in his tumultuous emotional life. On the other hand, he does not seem to have the irrational ideas associated with sexual offences." Dr. Beltrami noted a tendency on the part of the respondent to deceive, but apart from some emotional instability with women, Dr. Beltrami concluded that the respondent did not have any particular pathologies.

14 With respect to the plethysmograph test, Dr. Beltrami concluded that the respondent has [TRANSLATION] "a clearly normal profile with a preference for adult women and a slight attraction to adolescents. He exhibits no deviation in respect of boys in general or prepubescent boys".

15 The trial judge ruled Dr. Beltrami's evidence inadmissible. He acquitted the respondent of the charges related to L. but convicted the respondent of having, for a sexual purpose, invited, counseled or incited W. to touch the body of the respondent, (s. 152 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46) and having engaged in an act of anal intercourse (s. 159(1) of the Criminal Code). The respondent was sentenced to imprisonment of two years on each charge, to be served concurrently. The majority of the Court of Appeal, Robert J.A. dissenting, found that Dr. Beltrami's evidence ought to have been admitted, allowed the appeal and ordered a new trial.

Tous les tests comportaient des questions, des images et des scénarios normalisés. On n'a jamais montré l'intimé des images particulières visant à reproduire les infractions qui lui étaient reprochées.

Le D^r^ Beltrami a témoigné, au cours du voir-dire, que la première série de tests montrait que l'intimé avait eu une enfance ordinaire, qu'il n'avait pas été victime d'abus sexuel, qu'il avait un bon niveau de scolarité qui lui a permis d'obtenir un emploi comportant des responsabilités, et qu'il était ingénieux et animé de l'esprit d'entreprise. Il a noté que l'intimé entretenait souvent deux ou trois relations hétérosexuelles intimes en même temps sans que ses partenaires ne soient au courant de ce fait. Plusieurs enfants sont issus de ces diverses relations. Le D^r^ Beltrami note: «Il montre clairement des troubles de jugement dans sa vie affective tumultueuse. Par contre, il ne semble pas avoir les idées irrationnelles liées à la délinquance sexuelle.» Le D^r^ Beltrami a remarqué une tendance à la tromperie chez l'intimé, mais il a conclu que, à part une certaine instabilité affective avec les femmes, ce dernier ne souffrait d'aucun trouble particulier.

Pour ce qui est de la pléthysmographie, le D^r^ Beltrami a jugé que l'intimé avait «un profil clairement normal avec une préférence pour les femmes adultes et une légère attirance pour les adolescentes. Il ne présente aucune déviation vis-à-vis des garçons en général ou prépubères».

Le juge du procès a décidé que la preuve du D^r^ Beltrami était inadmissible. Il a acquitté l'intimé quant aux accusations relatives à L., mais l'a déclaré coupable d'avoir, à des fins d'ordre sexuel, invité, engagé ou incité W. à le toucher (art. 152 du Code criminel, L.R.C. (1985), ch. C-46), et d'avoir eu des relations sexuelles anales avec une autre personne (par. 159(1) du Code criminel). L'intimé a été condamné à purger concurremment des peines de deux ans d'emprisonnement pour chaque chef d'accusation. Après avoir statué que la preuve du D^r^ Beltrami aurait dû être admise, la Cour d'appel à la majorité, le juge Robert étant dissident, a accueilli l'appel et ordonné la tenue d'un nouveau procès.

II. Judgments

1. Court of Québec, No. 500-01-015157-958, September 27 and October 18, 1996

Judge Trudel recognized Dr. Beltrami as an expert in psychiatry, sexology and physiology. He characterized his evidence, however, as evidence only of general disposition or propensity to commit this type of offence. As such, the evidence did not come within the "distinctive group" exception recognized in R. v. Mohan, [1994] 2 S.C.R. 9, which he interpreted as requiring a scientifically established standard profile of the "distinctive group" of offenders. As Dr. Beltrami had acknowledged that no such standard profile had been developed, the exception was therefore inapplicable and the evidence excluded. Convictions were entered in relation to the offences against W.

2. Quebec Court of Appeal (1998), 130 C.C.C. (3d) 541

The respondent appealed his conviction on several grounds. For present purposes, it is sufficient to summarize the opinions of the Court of Appeal in relation to the admission of Dr. Beltrami's evidence, which formed the basis of the dissent.

(a) Beauregard and Fish JJ.A., majority

Fish J.A., with whom Beauregard J.A. agreed, allowed the appeal and ordered a new trial on the basis that the trial judge erred in not admitting Dr. Beltrami's evidence.

In the opinion of the majority, even if Dr. Beltrami was unable to identify a "single set of behavioural characteristics shared by every adult, male pedophile" (p. 545), he was nonetheless able to give evidence concerning the respondent's behavioural profile and to assert, in substance, that it included none of the characteristics that were in

II. Les jugements

1. Cour du Québec, nº 500-01-015157-958, 27 septembre et 18 octobre 1996

16 Le juge Trudel a reconnu le Dr Beltrami comme étant un expert en psychiatrie, en sexologie et en physiologie. Il a toutefois considéré que son témoignage était une simple preuve de prédisposition ou de propension générale à commettre ce genre d'infraction. Ainsi, la preuve en question n'était pas visée par l'exception du «groupe distinctif» reconnue dans l'arrêt R. c. Mohan, [1994] 2 R.C.S. 9, qu'il a interprétée comme exigeant l'existence d'un profil type établi scientifiquement du «groupe distinctif» de délinquants. Comme le Dr Beltrami avait reconnu qu'aucun profil type de cette nature n'avait été établi, l'exception était donc inapplicable et la preuve a été exclue. Des déclarations de culpabilité ont été inscrites relativement aux infractions dont W. avait été victime.

2. Cour d'appel du Québec, [1998] R.J.Q. 2229

17 L'intimé en a appelé de sa déclaration de culpabilité pour plusieurs motifs. Pour les fins qui nous occupent, il suffit de résumer les opinions de la Cour d'appel relatives à l'admission de la preuve du Dr Beltrami, qui constituaient le fondement de la dissidence.

a) Les juges Beauregard et Fish, majoritaires

18 Le juge Fish, avec l'appui du juge Beauregard, a accueilli l'appel et ordonné la tenue d'un nouveau procès pour le motif que le juge du procès avait commis une erreur en excluant la preuve du Dr Beltrami.

19 Selon les juges majoritaires, bien que le Dr Beltrami ait été incapable de relever le [TRADUCTION] «moindre ensemble de caractéristiques de comportement que partagent tous les pédophiles adultes de sexe masculin» (p. 2232), il a pu néanmoins témoigner au sujet du profil de comportement de l'intimé et affirmer, pour l'essentiel, que ce profil ne comportait aucune des caractéristiques qui, selon lui, étaient [TRADUCTION] «compatibles his view "compatible with the . . . offence with which [he] was charged" (p. 545).

20 Concerning the reliability requirement, Fish J.A. did not believe that absolute reliability was the standard. He noted that the plethysmograph is generally recognized by the scientific community and is used by psychiatric facilities such as the Institut Philippe Pinel de Montréal to monitor the result of treatment for sexual pathologies. He noted that Dr. Beltrami had testified that the respondent's results show a sexual preference for adult women and no desire or preference for children.

21 Fish J.A. did not interpret Mohan, supra, as requiring "the mechanical exclusion of expert evidence on the sole ground that the scientific community has not developed a single set of personality traits — or single psychological profile — that is common to every offender who commits the crime charged" (p. 546). He observed that in Mohan Sopinka J. cited R. v. Garfinkle (1992), 15 C.R. (4th) 254 (Que. C.A.), with apparent approval. In Garfinkle, the Quebec Court of Appeal had ruled Dr. Beltrami's evidence admissible on the facts presented in that case.

22 Unlike the expert evidence rejected in Mohan, the evidence of Dr. Beltrami was to the effect that "the offence charged involves an extreme degree of sexual deviancy. It can properly be characterized as distinctive in virtue of the biological nature of the act and the very young age of the alleged victims" (p. 547). These elements point to an offender having one or more distinctive personality traits. According to Dr. Beltrami, the person who committed the offence would likely respond measurably to the penile plethysmograph test since the instrument is particularly effective in detecting extreme deviance. The respondent did not test positive, and Dr. Beltrami's evidence could therefore be "of material assistance in determining innocence or guilt": Mohan, supra, at p. 37. The avec [. . .] l'infraction dont [il] était accusé» (p. 2232).

Quant à l'exigence de fiabilité, le juge Fish ne croyait pas que la fiabilité absolue était la norme applicable. Il a fait remarquer que la pléthysmographie est généralement reconnue par la communauté scientifique et que les établissements psychiatriques tels que l'Institut Philippe Pinel de Montréal s'en servent pour contrôler les résultats du traitement de troubles sexuels. Il a souligné que le Dr Beltrami avait témoigné que les résultats de l'intimé montraient qu'il avait une préférence sexuelle pour les femmes adultes et qu'il n'éprouvait aucun désir et n'avait aucune préférence pour les enfants.

Le juge Fish n'a pas considéré que l'arrêt Mohan, précité, exige [TRADUCTION] «l'exclusion automatique d'une preuve d'expert du seul fait que la communauté scientifique n'a pas établi le moindre ensemble de traits de personnalité — ou le moindre profil psychologique — que partagent tous les délinquants qui commettent le crime reproché» (p. 2233). Il a fait observer que, dans l'arrêt Mohan, le juge Sopinka avait cité et paru approuver l'arrêt R. c. Garfinkle (1992), 15 C.R. (4th) 254 (C.A. Qué.). Dans l'arrêt Garfinkle, la Cour d'appel du Québec avait jugé la preuve du Dr Beltrami admissible d'après les faits de l'affaire.

Contrairement à la preuve d'expert rejetée dans l'arrêt Mohan, la preuve du Dr Beltrami indiquait que [TRADUCTION] «l'infraction reprochée comporte un niveau extrême de déviance sexuelle. Elle peut être qualifiée, à juste titre, de distinctive en raison de la nature biologique de l'acte et du très jeune âge des prétendues victimes» (p. 2233). Ces éléments portent à croire qu'il s'agit d'un délinquant qui possède un ou plusieurs traits de personnalité distinctifs. D'après le Dr Beltrami, la personne qui a commis l'infraction réagirait probablement de façon appréciable au test de la pléthysmographie pénienne étant donné que l'appareil utilisé est particulièrement efficace pour détecter la déviance extrême. Le test de l'intimé ne s'est pas révélé positif, et la preuve du Dr Beltrami majority allowed the appeal and ordered a new trial.

(b) Robert J.A., dissenting

Referring to Mohan, supra, Robert J.A. reviewed the criteria applicable to the admissibility of expert evidence as to disposition to commit a crime. What is required is that the person who has committed the crime or the accused has "distinctive characteristics" that allow the trier of fact to make comparisons that will help him or her to determine the issue of guilt. The dissent is based in part on the following passage in Mohan, at p. 37:

> The trial judge should consider the opinion of the expert and whether the expert is merely expressing a personal opinion or whether the behavioural profile which the expert is putting forward is in common use as a reliable indicator of membership in a distinctive group. Put another way: Has the scientific community developed a standard profile for the offender who commits this type of crime? An affirmative finding on this basis will satisfy the criteria of relevance and necessity. [Emphasis added.]

Robert J.A. agreed with the trial judge that Dr. Beltrami's evidence was inadmissible largely because science has not yet identified a standard profile for individuals who commit sodomy on young children. The fact that Dr. Beltrami considered the respondent's personality to be incompatible with characteristics that are [TRANSLATION] "frequently" or "habitually" found among people who commit the crime with which the respondent was accused does not satisfy the Mohan test. Dr. Beltrami's evidence amounted to evidence of general disposition and did not come within the limited exception to the prohibition against such evidence. Robert J.A. would thus have dismissed the appeal.

III. Analysis

Expert witnesses have an essential role to play in the criminal courts. However, the dramatic growth in the frequency with which they have been pourrait donc «aide[r] considérablement à déterminer l'innocence ou la culpabilité»: Mohan, précité, à la p. 37. La Cour à la majorité a accueilli l'appel et ordonné la tenue d'un nouveau procès.

b) Le juge Robert, dissident

23 Se référant à l'arrêt Mohan, précité, le juge Robert a examiné les critères applicables à l'admissibilité d'une preuve d'expert en ce qui concerne la prédisposition à commettre un crime. Il faut que l'auteur du crime ou l'accusé possède des «caractéristiques distinctives» qui permettent au juge des faits de faire des comparaisons qui l'aideront à décider de la culpabilité ou de l'innocence. La dissidence repose en partie sur le passage suivant de l'arrêt Mohan, à la p. 37:

> Le juge du procès devrait considérer, d'une part, l'opinion de l'expert et, d'autre part, si ce dernier exprime simplement une opinion personnelle ou si le profil de comportement qu'il décrit est couramment utilisé comme indice fiable de l'appartenance à un groupe distinctif. En d'autres termes, la profession scientifique a-t-elle élaboré un profil type du délinquant qui commet ce genre de crime? Une conclusion affirmative sur ce fondement satisfera aux critères de pertinence et de fiabilité. [Je souligne.]

24 Le juge Robert a convenu avec le juge du procès que la preuve du D^r^ Beltrami était inadmissible en grande partie parce que la science n'avait encore défini aucun profil type des personnes qui se livrent à la sodomie sur de jeunes enfants. Le fait que le D^r^ Beltrami a considéré que la personnalité de l'intimé est incompatible avec les caractéristiques qui se retrouvent «fréquemment» ou «habituellement» chez les personnes qui commettent le crime dont est accusé l'intimé ne satisfait pas au critère de l'arrêt Mohan. La preuve du D^r^ Beltrami constituait une preuve de prédisposition générale et n'était pas visée par l'exception limitée de l'interdiction de produire une telle preuve. Le juge Robert aurait donc rejeté l'appel.

III. Analyse

25 Les témoins experts ont un rôle essentiel à jouer devant les tribunaux criminels. Toutefois, la croissance spectaculaire de la fréquence de called upon in recent years has led to ongoing debate about suitable controls on their participation, precautions to exclude "junk science", and the need to preserve and protect the role of the trier of fact — the judge or the jury. The law in this regard was significantly advanced by Mohan, supra, where Sopinka J. expressed such a concern at p. 21:

> Dressed up in scientific language which the jury does not easily understand and submitted through a witness of impressive antecedents, this evidence is apt to be accepted by the jury as being virtually infallible and as having more weight than it deserves.

> There is also a concern inherent in the application of this criterion that experts not be permitted to usurp the functions of the trier of fact. Too liberal an approach could result in a trial's becoming nothing more than a contest of experts with the trier of fact acting as referee in deciding which expert to accept.

26 In R. v. Béland, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 398, La Forest J. warned at p. 434 about undue weight being given to "evidence cloaked under the mystique of science", and more recently in R. v. McIntosh (1997), 117 C.C.C. (3d) 385, the Ontario Court of Appeal rejected the evidence of an expert who was put forward by the defence to discuss the frailties of eyewitness identification. Finlayson J.A. observed that admission of such evidence would suggest that without expert help "our jury system is not adequate to the task of determining the guilt of an accused person beyond a reasonable doubt where the identification evidence is pivotal to the case for the Crown" (p. 395). The present appeal involves a provincial court judge sitting alone, but it raises the same controversy about the need to draw the line properly between the role of the expert and the role of the court.

27 In Mohan, the Court excluded expert evidence that was directed to a similar point to the one made here by Dr. Beltrami. In that case, a practising physician was charged with four counts of sexual l'assignation de témoins experts au cours des dernières années est à l'origine du débat actuel qui porte sur les restrictions qu'il convient d'appliquer à leur participation, les précautions à prendre pour écarter la «science de pacotille», et la nécessité de préserver et de protéger le rôle du juge des faits, que ce soit le juge ou le jury. L'arrêt Mohan, précité, a fait grandement progresser le droit à cet égard. Dans cet arrêt, le juge Sopinka a fait part de cette préoccupation, à la p. 21:

> Exprimée en des termes scientifiques que le jury ne comprend pas bien et présentée par un témoin aux qualifications impressionnantes, cette preuve est susceptible d'être considérée par le jury comme étant pratiquement infaillible et comme ayant plus de poids qu'elle ne le mérite.

Et à la p. 24:

> Il y a également la crainte inhérente à l'application de ce critère que les experts ne puissent usurper les fonctions du juge des faits. Une conception trop libérale pourrait réduire le procès à un simple concours d'experts, dont le juge des faits se ferait l'arbitre en décidant quel expert accepter.

Dans l'arrêt R. c. Béland, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 398, à la p. 434, le juge La Forest a fait une mise en garde sur le poids indu accordé à la «preuve empreinte de la mystique de la science», et plus récemment, dans l'arrêt R. c. McIntosh (1997), 117 C.C.C. (3d) 385, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a rejeté une preuve d'expert soumise par la défense pour analyser les faiblesses de l'identification par témoin oculaire. Le juge Finlayson a souligné que l'admission d'une telle preuve indiquerait que, sans l'aide d'un expert, [TRADUCTION] «notre système de jury n'est pas en mesure de déterminer la culpabilité d'un accusé hors de tout doute raisonnable lorsque la preuve d'identification est essentielle à la preuve du ministère public» (p. 395). Le présent pourvoi concerne un juge d'une cour provinciale siégeant seul, mais il suscite la même controverse quant à la nécessité de tracer convenablement la ligne entre le rôle de l'expert et celui de la cour.

Dans l'arrêt Mohan, la Cour a exclu une preuve d'expert portant sur un point de vue semblable à celui exprimé par le Dr Beltrami en l'espèce. Dans cette affaire, un médecin faisait l'objet de quatre assault on four female patients aged 13 to 16. The defence tendered a psychiatrist who was prepared to testify that the perpetrator of the alleged offences was part of a limited and distinctive group of individuals (pedophiles and sexual psychopaths) and that the accused did not possess the characteristics typical of members of the group. This Court accepted the trial judge's conclusion that science had not yet developed sufficiently standardized profiles of pedophiles and sexual psychopaths against which an alleged perpetrator could be matched. The evidence was therefore rejected as unreliable, and unnecessary in the sense that it was not required to clarify "a matter otherwise inaccessible" (p. 38).

chefs d'agression sexuelle sur quatre patientes âgées de 13 à 16 ans. La défense a fait comparaître un psychiatre qui était prêt à témoigner que l'auteur des infractions reprochées faisait partie d'un groupe limité et distinctif de personnes (celui des pédophiles et des psychopathes sexuels) et que l'accusé ne possédait pas les caractéristiques habituelles des membres de ce groupe. Notre Cour a accepté la conclusion du juge du procès que la science n'avait encore établi aucun profil suffisamment normalisé des pédophiles et des psychopathes sexuels auquel l'auteur présumé pouvait être comparé. La preuve a donc été rejetée pour le motif qu'elle n'était ni fiable, ni nécessaire en ce sens qu'elle n'était pas requise pour clarifier «une question qui serait autrement inaccessible» (p. 38).

In the course of Mohan and other judgments, the Court has emphasized that the trial judge should take seriously the role of "gatekeeper". The admissibility of the expert evidence should be scrutinized at the time it is proffered, and not allowed too easy an entry on the basis that all of the frailties could go at the end of the day to weight rather than admissibility.

28 Dans Mohan et d'autres arrêts, la Cour a souligné que le juge du procès devrait prendre au sérieux son rôle de «gardien». La question de l'admissibilité d'une preuve d'expert devrait être examinée minutieusement au moment où elle est soulevée, et cette preuve ne devrait pas être admise trop facilement pour le motif que toutes ses faiblesses peuvent en fin de compte avoir une incidence sur son poids plutôt que sur son admissibilité.

The Court's gatekeeper function must afford the parties the opportunity to put forward the most complete evidentiary record consistent with the rules of evidence. As McLachlin J. noted in R. v. Seaboyer, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 577, at p. 611:

29 En raison de sa fonction de gardienne, la Cour doit offrir aux parties la possibilité de soumettre la preuve la plus complète, conformément aux règles de la preuve. Comme l'a fait remarquer le juge McLachlin dans l'arrêt R. c. Seaboyer, [1991] 2 R.C.S. 577, à la p. 611:

> Canadian courts, like courts in most common law jurisdictions, have been extremely cautious in restricting the power of the accused to call evidence in his or her defence, a reluctance founded in the fundamental tenet of our judicial system that an innocent person must not be convicted.

> Les tribunaux canadiens, comme ceux de la plupart des ressorts de common law, ont beaucoup hésité à restreindre le pouvoir de l'accusé de présenter une preuve à l'appui de sa défense, cette hésitation tenant du principe fondamental de notre système judiciaire selon lequel une personne innocente ne doit pas être déclarée coupable.

Nevertheless, the search for truth excludes expert evidence which may "distort the fact-finding process" (Mohan, at p. 21). To assist in the gatekeeper exercise, the Court established a list of criteria against which, on this appeal, the admissibility of Dr. Beltrami's evidence must be judged. For ease of exposition, I will address these criteria in a sequence that differs somewhat from that followed in Mohan.

Néanmoins, la recherche de la vérité exclut la preuve d'expert susceptible de «fausser le processus de recherche des faits» (Mohan, à la p. 21). Pour faciliter l'exercice du rôle de gardien, la Cour a établi une liste de critères qui, en l'espèce, doivent servir à évaluer l'admissibilité de la preuve du Dr Beltrami. Pour des raisons de commodité, je

1. Subject Matter of the Inquiry

30 In Mohan, Sopinka J., at p. 23, approved a passage from Kelliher (Village of) v. Smith, [1931] S.C.R. 672, at p. 684, that "[t]he subject-matter of the inquiry must be such that ordinary people are unlikely to form a correct judgment about it, if unassisted by persons with special knowledge". See also R. v. Abbey, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 24, per Dickson J., at p. 42; R. v. Lavallee, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 852, per Wilson J., at p. 896; and McIntosh, supra, per Finlayson J.A., at p. 392.

31 Dr. Beltrami's evidence satisfies this threshold requirement. In R. v. McMillan (1975), 23 C.C.C. (2d) 160, aff'd [1977] 2 S.C.R. 824, Martin J.A. of the Ontario Court of Appeal considered psychiatric evidence of disposition admissible "where the particular disposition or tendency in issue is characteristic of an abnormal group, the characteristics of which fall within the expertise of the psychiatrist" (p. 169 (emphasis added)). See also R. v. Lupien, [1970] S.C.R. 263; McMillan, supra; and R. v. Robertson (1975), 21 C.C.C. (2d) 385 (Ont. C.A.). This line of cases was approved in Mohan with the notation that the operative concept is "distinctive" rather than "abnormal", at p. 36:

> In my opinion, the term "distinctive" more aptly defines the behavioural characteristics which are a precondition to the admission of this kind of evidence.

32 The exception is based on the notion that "psychical as well as physical characteristics may be relevant to identify the perpetrator of the crime" (McMillan, per Martin J.A., at p. 173), and "involves the psychiatrist in expressing his conclusion that the accused does not have the capacity to commit the crime with which he is charged" (Lupien, supra, per Ritchie J., at p. 278 (emphasis added)). This is clearly a proper subject matter for vais les aborder dans un ordre qui diffère quelque peu de celui suivi dans l'arrêt Mohan.

1. Objet de l'analyse

Dans l'arrêt Mohan, à la p. 23, le juge Sopinka a approuvé le passage de l'arrêt Kelliher (Village of) c. Smith, [1931] R.C.S. 672, à la p. 684, selon lequel [TRADUCTION] «[l]'objet de l'analyse est tel qu'il est peu probable que des personnes ordinaires puissent former un jugement juste à cet égard sans l'assistance de personnes possédant des connaissances spéciales». Voir également R. c. Abbey, [1982] 2 R.C.S. 24, le juge Dickson, à la p. 42; R. c. Lavallee, [1990] 1 R.C.S. 852, le juge Wilson, à la p. 896; McIntosh, précité, le juge Finlayson, à la p. 392.

La preuve du D[r] Beltrami respecte cette exigence préliminaire. Dans R. c. McMillan (1975), 23 C.C.C. (2d) 160, conf. par [1977] 2 R.C.S. 824, le juge Martin de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a considéré qu'une preuve psychiatrique de prédisposition est admissible [TRADUCTION] «lorsque la prédisposition ou la propension en question est propre à un groupe anormal, dont les caractéristiques relèvent de l'expertise du psychiatre» (p. 169 (je souligne)). Voir également R. c. Lupien, [1970] R.C.S. 263, McMillan, précité, et R. c. Robertson (1975), 21 C.C.C. (2d) 385 (C.A. Ont.). La Cour, dans l'arrêt Mohan, a approuvé ce courant jurisprudentiel en notant, à la p. 36, que le concept-clé est le terme «distinctif» plutôt que le terme «anormal»:

> À mon avis, le terme «distinctif» définit mieux les caractéristiques de comportement qui sont une condition préalable à l'admission de cette forme de preuve.

Cette exception s'appuie sur l'idée que [TRADUCTION] «des caractéristiques tant psychiques que physiques peuvent être pertinentes pour identifier l'auteur du crime» (McMillan, le juge Martin, à la p. 173), et «amène le psychiatre à exprimer l'avis que l'inculpé ne possède pas la capacité de commettre le crime dont il est accusé» (Lupien, précité, le juge Ritchie, à la p. 278 (je souligne)). Il s'agit clairement d'un sujet qui se prête à une preuve expert evidence. Whether or not the evidence tendered in this particular case is admissible remains to be established.

2. Novel Scientific Theory or Technique

Mohan kept the door open to novel science, rejecting the "general acceptance" test formulated in the United States in Frye v. United States, 293 F. 1013 (D.C. Cir. 1923), and moving in parallel with its replacement, the "reliable foundation" test more recently laid down by the U.S. Supreme Court in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993). While Daubert must be read in light of the specific text of the Federal Rules of Evidence, which differs from our own procedures, the U.S. Supreme Court did list a number of factors that could be helpful in evaluating the soundness of novel science (at pp. 593-94):

(1) whether the theory or technique can be and has been tested:

Scientific methodology today is based on generating hypotheses and testing them to see if they can be falsified; indeed, this methodology is what distinguishes science from other fields of human inquiry.

(2) whether the theory or technique has been subjected to peer review and publication:

[S]ubmission to the scrutiny of the scientific community is a component of "good science," in part because it increases the likelihood that substantive flaws in methodology will be detected.

(3) the known or potential rate of error or the existence of standards; and,

(4) whether the theory or technique used has been generally accepted:

A "reliability assessment does not require, although it does permit, explicit identification of a relevant scien-d'expert. Il reste à déterminer si la preuve soumise dans la présente affaire est admissible.

2. Nouvelle théorie ou technique scientifique

33

L'arrêt Mohan a laissé la porte ouverte aux nouvelles théories ou techniques scientifiques, rejeté le critère de [TRADUCTION] «l'acceptation générale» formulé aux États-Unis dans Frye c. United States, 293 F. 1013 (D.C. Cir. 1923), et s'est engagé dans la même direction que le critère qui l'a remplacé, à savoir celui du [TRADUCTION] «fondement fiable» qui a été établi plus récemment par la Cour suprême des États-Unis dans l'arrêt Daubert c. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993). Bien que l'arrêt Daubert doive s'interpréter en fonction du texte particulier des Federal Rules of Evidence, qui diffère de celui de nos propres règles de procédure, la Cour suprême des États-Unis a énuméré un certain nombre de facteurs susceptibles d'être utiles pour évaluer la solidité d'une nouvelle théorie ou technique scientifique (aux pp. 593 et 594):

(1) la théorie ou la technique peut-elle être vérifiée et l'a-t-elle été?

(2) la théorie ou la technique a-t-elle fait l'objet d'un contrôle par des pairs et d'une publication?

(3) le taux connu ou potentiel d'erreur ou l'existence de normes, et

(4) la théorie ou la technique utilisée est-elle généralement acceptée?

tific community and an express determination of a particular degree of acceptance within that community."

Widespread acceptance can be an important factor in ruling particular evidence admissible, and "a known technique which has been able to attract only minimal support within the community," . . . may properly be viewed with skepticism.

34 Thus, in the United States, as here, "general acceptance" is only one of several factors to be considered. A penile plethysmograph may not yet be generally accepted as a forensic tool, but it may become so. A case-by-case evaluation of novel science is necessary in light of the changing nature of our scientific knowledge: it was once accepted by the highest authorities of the western world that the earth was flat.

35 In Mohan, Sopinka J. emphasized that "novel science" is subject to "special scrutiny", at p. 25:

In summary, therefore, it appears from the foregoing that expert evidence which advances a novel scientific theory or technique is subjected to special scrutiny to determine whether it meets a basic threshold of reliability and whether it is essential in the sense that the trier of fact will be unable to come to a satisfactory conclusion without the assistance of the expert.

The penile plethysmograph, as noted by Fish J.A., is generally recognized by the scientific community and is used by psychiatric facilities such as the Institut Philippe Pinel de Montréal to monitor the result of treatment for sexual pathologies. The plethysmograph enables the medical staff to assess the progress of therapy of known and admitted sexual deviants. This is inapplicable to the respondent. He denies he is part of such a group. He is not undergoing therapy. Dr. Beltrami is a pioneer in Canada in trying to use this therapeutic tool as a forensic tool where the problems are firstly to determine whether the offence could only be committed by a perpetrator who possesses distinctive and identifiable psychological traits, secondly to determine communauté scientifique pertinente ni la détermination d'un degré particulier d'acceptation au sein de cette communauté.»

L'acceptation générale peut être un facteur important pour décider qu'un élément de preuve particulier est admissible, et «une technique connue qui n'a obtenu qu'un appui minimal au sein de la communauté,» [. . .] peut à juste titre être envisagée avec scepticisme.

En conséquence, aux États-Unis comme ici, l'«acceptation générale» n'est qu'un des divers facteurs dont il faut tenir compte. La pléthysmographie pénienne n'est peut-être pas encore généralement acceptée en tant qu'outil médicolégal, mais elle peut le devenir. Une évaluation dans chaque cas des nouvelles théories ou techniques scientifiques est nécessaire compte tenu de la nature changeante de notre connaissance scientifique: les plus hautes autorités du monde occidental ont déjà accepté que la terre était plate.

À la page 25 de l'arrêt Mohan, le juge Sopinka a souligné qu'une «nouvelle théorie ou technique scientifique» doit être «soigneusement examinée»:

En résumé, il ressort donc de ce qui précède que la preuve d'expert qui avance une nouvelle théorie ou technique scientifique est soigneusement examinée pour déterminer si elle satisfait à la norme de fiabilité et si elle est essentielle en ce sens que le juge des faits sera incapable de tirer une conclusion satisfaisante sans l'aide de l'expert.

La pléthysmographie pénienne, comme l'a noté le juge Fish, est généralement reconnue par la communauté scientifique et les établissements psychiatriques tels que l'Institut Philippe Pinel de Montréal s'en servent pour contrôler les résultats du traitement de troubles sexuels. La pléthysmographie permet au personnel médical d'évaluer les progrès des thérapies suivies par les déviants sexuels connus et avérés. Cela ne s'applique pas à l'intimé. Il nie faire partie d'un tel groupe. Il ne suit aucune thérapie. Au Canada, le D^r^ Beltrami fait œuvre de pionnier en essayant d'utiliser cet outil thérapeutique en tant qu'outil médicolégal lorsqu'on a du mal à déterminer, premièrement, si l'infraction ne peut avoir été commise que par une whether a "standard profile" of those traits has been developed, and thirdly to match the accused against the profile. Dr. Beltrami's evidence is therefore subject to "special scrutiny". While the techniques he employed are not novel, he is using them for a novel purpose. A level of reliability that is quite useful in therapy because it yields some information about a course of treatment is not necessarily sufficiently reliable to be used in a court of law to identify or exclude the accused as a potential perpetrator of an offence. In fact, penile plethysmography has received a mixed reception in Quebec courts: Protection de la jeunesse — 539, [1992] R.J.Q. 1144; R. c. Blondin, [1996] Q.J. No. 3605 (QL) (S.C.); L. Morin and C. Boisclair in "La preuve d'abus sexuel: allégations, déclarations et l'évaluation d'expert" (1992), 23 R.D.U.S. 27. Efforts to use penile plethysmography in the United States as proof of disposition have largely been rejected: People v. John W., 185 Cal.App.3d 801 (1986); Gentry v. State, 443 S.E.2d 667 (Ga. Ct. App. 1994); United States v. Powers, 59 F.3d 1460 (4th Cir. 1995); State v. Spencer, 459 S.E.2d 812 (N.C. App. 1995); J. E. B. Myers et al., "Expert Testimony in Child Sexual Abuse Litigation" (1989), 68 Neb. L. Rev. 1, at pp. 134-35; J. G. Barker and R. J. Howell, "The Plethysmograph: A Review of Recent Literature" (1992), 20 Bull. Am. Acad. of Psychiatry & L. 13.

Dr. Beltrami also purported to gain assistance from the personality inventory tests (MMPI2) about the propensity of the respondent for sexual deviance, but those tests are too broad and general for that purpose, although the results may well have provided useful background information to the more specific plethysmograph test. Again, it was open to him to establish the reliability of these tests for the purposes of excluding the respondent as perpetrator of the offences, but Mohan teaches that the attempt is to be regarded with "special scrutiny".

3. Approaching the Ultimate Issue

Dr. Beltrami's evidence, if accepted, was potentially very powerful. Once it is accepted that the personne qui possède des traits psychologiques distinctifs et identifiables, deuxièmement, si un «profil type» de ces traits a été établi et, troisièmement, si l'accusé correspond à ce profil. La preuve du Dr Beltrami est donc «soigneusement examinée». Bien que les techniques utilisées ne soient pas nouvelles, il s'en sert à des fins nouvelles. Un niveau de fiabilité très utile en thérapie pour obtenir des renseignements quant à une série de traitements n'est pas nécessairement suffisant, devant une cour de justice, pour identifier ou exclure l'accusé en tant qu'auteur potentiel d'une infraction. En fait, la pléthysmographie pénienne a reçu un accueil mitigé au sein des tribunaux québécois: Protection de la jeunesse — 539, [1992] R.J.Q. 1144; R. c. Blondin, [1996] A.Q. nº 3605 (QL) (C.S.); L. Morin et C. Boisclair dans «La preuve d'abus sexuel: allégations, déclarations et l'évaluation d'expert» (1992), 23 R.D.U.S. 27. Aux États-Unis, les tentatives d'utiliser la pléthysmographie pénienne pour établir la prédisposition ont été vaines dans la plupart des cas: People c. John W., 185 Cal.App.3d 801 (1986); Gentry c. State, 443 S.E.2d 667 (Ga. Ct. App. 1994); United States c. Powers, 59 F.3d 1460 (4th Cir. 1995); State c. Spencer, 459 S.E.2d 812 (N.C. App. 1995); J. E. B. Myers et autres, «Expert Testimony in Child Sexual Abuse Litigation» (1989), 68 Neb. L. Rev. 1, aux pp. 134 et 135; J. G. Barker et R. J. Howell, «The Plethysmograph: A Review of Recent Literature» (1992), 20 Bull. Am. Acad. of Psychiatry & L. 13.

3. Le rapprochement de la question fondamentale

37 La preuve du Dr Beltrami, si elle était acceptée, pouvait être très puissante. Dès qu'on accepte que offence was probably committed by a member of a "distinctive group" from which the accused has been excluded, it is a short step to the conclusion on the ultimate issue of guilt or innocence. Dr. Beltrami's underlying hypothesis was that if the respondent did not "score" on the plethysmograph, he must lack the disposition to commit such acts. The inference is that if he lacks the disposition then he did not do it. The closeness of his opinion to the ultimate issue is another reason for special scrutiny, as mentioned by Sopinka J. in Mohan, at p. 25:

> The closer the evidence approaches an opinion on an ultimate issue, the stricter the application of this principle.

See also R. v. Pascoe (1997), 5 C.R. (5th) 341 (Ont. C.A.), per Rosenberg J.A., at p. 357.

4. The Absence of Any Exclusionary Rule

38 In McMillan, supra, and again in Mohan, supra, the Court carved out an exception to the general rule that the character of the accused, in the sense of disposition to commit or not to commit the offence, can only be evidenced by general reputation in the community. The "distinctive group" exception has already been mentioned. As explained by Professor A. W. Mewett in "Character as a Fact in Issue in Criminal Cases" (1984-85), 27 Crim. L.Q. 29, at pp. 35-36, discussed in Mohan at p. 34 et seq., it arises in its relevant aspect where "it is shown that the crime is such that it could only, or in all probability would only, be committed by a person having identifiable peculiarities that the accused does not possess" (emphasis added). In Garfinkle, supra, pedophiles were considered such a "distinctive" group. It may be an issue, however, whether a particular offence "in all probability would only" have been committed by a pedophile, as opposed to a non-pedophile whose untypical behaviour was modified by impulsiveness, stress, alcohol or drugs (R. v. B.L., [1988] O.J. No. 2522 (QL) (Gen. Div.); R. v. G. (J.R.) (1998), 17 C.R. (5th) 399 (Ont. Ct. (Prov. Div.)).

l'infraction a probablement été commise par un membre d'un «groupe distinctif» dont l'accusé est exclu, on est très près de la conclusion sur la question fondamentale de la culpabilité ou de l'innocence. Selon l'hypothèse sous-jacente du Dr Beltrami, si l'intimé n'a pas réagi à la pléthysmographie, il ne doit être pas prédisposé à commettre de tels actes. On en déduit que, s'il n'est pas prédisposé à commettre un acte, il ne l'a pas commis. Le fait que son opinion se rapproche de la question fondamentale justifie d'autant plus un examen minutieux, comme l'a mentionné le juge Sopinka dans l'arrêt Mohan, à la p. 25:

> Plus la preuve se rapproche de l'opinion sur une question fondamentale, plus l'application de ce principe est stricte.

Voir également R. c. Pascoe (1997), 5 C.R. (5th) 341 (C.A. Ont.), le juge Rosenberg, à la p. 357.

4. L'absence de toute règle d'exclusion

Dans l'arrêt McMillan, précité, et encore une fois dans l'arrêt Mohan, précité, la Cour a établi une exception à la règle générale selon laquelle le caractère de l'accusé, dans le sens de la prédisposition à commettre ou à ne pas commettre l'infraction, ne peut être démontré que par sa réputation générale dans la collectivité. L'exception du «groupe distinctif» a déjà été mentionnée. Comme l'a expliqué le professeur A. W. Mewett, dans l'article intitulé «Character as a Fact in Issue in Criminal Cases» (1984-85), 27 Crim. L.Q. 29, aux pp. 35 et 36, qui a été analysé dans l'arrêt Mohan, aux pp. 34 et suiv., elle s'applique lorsque [TRADUCTION] «il est démontré que le crime est tel qu'il ne pourrait être ou, selon toutes les probabilités, ne serait commis que par une personne ayant des caractéristiques identifiables que l'accusé ne possède pas» (je souligne). Dans l'arrêt Garfinkle, précité, on a considéré que les pédophiles constituaient un tel groupe «distinctif». On peut toutefois se demander si une infraction particulière ne serait commise «selon toutes les probabilités [. . .] que» par un pédophile, par opposition à un non-pédophile dont le comportement inhabituel a été modifié par l'impulsivité, le stress, l'alcool ou une drogue (R. c. B.L., [1988] O.J. No. 2522 (QL) (Div. gén.); R. c. G. (J.R.) (1998), 17 C.R. (5th)

Thus, in Mohan, supra, Sopinka J. pointed out at p. 38 that:

> Notwithstanding the opinion of Dr. Hill, the trial judge was also not satisfied that the characteristics associated with the fourth complaint identified the perpetrator as a member of a distinctive group. He was not prepared to accept that the characteristics of that complaint were such that only a psychopath could have committed the act. There was nothing to indicate any general acceptance of this theory. [Emphasis added.]

Similarly, in McMillan, supra, Spence J., at p. 827, approved Martin J.A.'s statement when the case was considered by the Ontario Court of Appeal that the evidentiary exception was limited to cases where "the offence is of a kind that is committed only by members of an abnormal group" (p. 173 (emphasis added)).

Subject to this precondition being established on a balance of probabilities, the personality profile of the perpetrator group must be sufficiently complete to identify distinctive psychological elements that were in all probability present and operating in the perpetrator at the time of the offence. Lack of distinctiveness robs the exception of its raison d'être. Thus R. v. Taillefer (1995), 100 C.C.C. (3d) 1 (Que. C.A.), Proulx J.A., upholding a trial judge's ruling excluding psychiatric testimony designed to establish that the perpetrator was marked by distinctive characteristics that neither accused possessed, stated at p. 34:

> [TRANSLATION] . . . the trial judge, came to the proper conclusion, in a well-reasoned decision, that the crime charged did not involve behavioural characteristics which were sufficiently distinctive to facilitate the identification of the author of the crime. [Emphasis added.]

Similarly, in R. v. B. (S.C.) (1997), 119 C.C.C. (3d) 530 (Ont. C.A.), Doherty and Rosenberg JJ.A., applying Mohan, supra, stated at p. 537 that:

399 (C. Ont. (Div. prov.)). Ainsi, dans l'arrêt Mohan, précité, à la p. 38, le juge Sopinka a souligné que

40 Dans la mesure où cette condition préalable est établie selon la prépondérance des probabilités, le profil de personnalité du groupe auquel appartient l'auteur de l'infraction doit être suffisamment complet pour pouvoir relever des éléments psychologiques distinctifs qui, selon toute probabilité, étaient présents et en action chez ce dernier au moment de la perpétration de l'infraction. L'absence de caractère distinctif dépouille l'exception de sa raison d'être. Ainsi, dans l'arrêt R. c. Taillefer (1995), 40 C.R. (4th) 287 (C.A. Qué.), le juge Proulx, confirmant la décision du juge du procès d'exclure un témoignage psychiatrique destiné à établir que l'auteur du crime en cause possédait des caractéristiques distinctives qu'aucun des accusés ne possédait, a affirmé à la p. 325:

> . . . le premier juge a conclu à bon droit, dans une décision bien motivée, que le crime reproché ne comporte pas de caractéristiques de comportement suffisamment distinctives pour faciliter l'identification de l'auteur du crime. [Je souligne.]

De même, dans l'arrêt R. c. B. (S.C.) (1997), 119 C.C.C. (3d) 530 (C.A. Ont.), les juges Doherty et Rosenberg, appliquant l'arrêt Mohan, précité, ont affirmé ceci, à la p. 537:

was committed by a person who is part of a group possessing distinct and identifiable behavioural characteristics. In those cases, the defence may lead evidence to show that the accused's mental makeup or behavioural characteristics excluded him or her from that group.

41 The question is whether in addition to identifying and describing the distinct and identifiable behavioural characteristics, the expert must be able to point to a more elaborate "standard profile" filling in the rest of the personality portrait. R. v. K.B. (1999), 176 N.S.R. (2d) 283 (C.A.), per Bateman J.A., at para. 10, is said to be support for that additional requirement. It is true, certainly, that in Mohan, Sopinka J. made reference to a standard profile in one of his formulations of the issue, at p. 37:

> Has the scientific community developed a standard profile for the offender who commits this type of crime?

The question is what is meant by a "standard profile". Given that the purpose of the evidence is to define with reasonable precision the psychological characteristics of the class of people to which the perpetrator belongs, and on that basis argue that the accused is either included or excluded, the important thing is to identify what exactly differentiates or distinguishes the perpetrator class from the rest of the population. The "standard profile" relates directly to those distinguishing features. This is clear from Sopinka J.'s preceding sentence:

> The trial judge should consider the opinion of the expert and whether the expert is merely expressing a personal opinion or whether the behavioural profile which the expert is putting forward is in common use as a reliable indicator of membership in a distinctive group.

42 The level of detail required in the "standard profile" may vary with the conclusiveness of individual elements. For example, if commission of an offence most likely requires so "distinctive" a psychological trait as necrophilia, as in R. v. Malbœuf, [1997] O.J. No. 1398 (QL) (C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [1998] 3 S.C.R. vii, it may be sufficient for exclusion to show that an accused has no such tendency without requiring the rest of the perpetra-lorsque le crime reproché a été commis par une personne qui appartient à un groupe qui possède des caractéristiques de comportement distinctives et identifiables. Dans ces cas, la défense peut produire une preuve pour montrer que l'état d'esprit et les caractéristiques de comportement de l'accusé l'excluaient de ce groupe.

La question est de savoir si en plus de relever et de décrire les caractéristiques de comportement distinctives et identifiables, l'expert doit être capable d'indiquer un «profil type» plus détaillé qui complète le reste du portrait de la personnalité. On dit que cette exigence additionnelle trouve appui dans l'arrêt R. c. K.B. (1999), 176 N.S.R. (2d) 283 (C.A.), le juge Bateman, au par. 10. Il est certes vrai qu'à la p. 37 de l'arrêt Mohan le juge Sopinka a fait référence à un profil type dans l'une de ses formulations de la question litigieuse.

> . . . la profession scientifique a-t-elle élaboré un profil type du délinquant qui commet ce genre de crime?

Il s'agit de déterminer ce qu'on entend par «profil type». Comme la preuve vise à définir avec une précision raisonnable les caractéristiques psychologiques de la catégorie de personnes à laquelle appartient l'auteur du crime reproché et, de là, à démontrer que l'accusé fait ou ne fait pas partie de cette catégorie, il importe de déterminer ce qui, au juste, différencie ou distingue du reste de la population les membres de la catégorie en cause. Le «profil type» concerne directement ces caractéristiques distinctives. Cela ressort clairement de la phrase précédente du juge Sopinka:

Le niveau de précision que requiert le «profil type» peut varier selon le caractère concluant de certains éléments pris individuellement. Par exemple, si la perpétration d'une infraction exige, selon toute vraisemblance, un trait psychologique aussi «distinctif» que la nécrophilie, comme dans l'affaire R. c. Malbœuf, [1997] O.J. No. 1398 (QL) (C.A.), autorisation de pourvoi refusée, [1998] 3 R.C.S. vii, il peut être suffisant pour écarter tor's psychological portrait to be completed. In Malbœuf itself, the "necrophilia-lust type of murder" was considered sufficiently distinctive that the Crown was allowed to lead expert evidence that the accused "demonstrated distinctive characteristics that would place him in the category of persons who would commit this type of crime" (para. 5). A high level of distinctiveness, of course, is in addition to the other limitations on the Crown's ability to lead such expert evidence, including the requirements that it be relevant to an issue other than "mere propensity", and that its probative value outweighs its prejudicial effect: Pascoe, supra, at p. 355.

l'accusé d'établir qu'il n'a pas une telle tendance, sans qu'il soit nécessaire de compléter le reste du portrait psychologique de l'auteur du crime reproché. Dans l'arrêt Malbœuf lui-même, le [TRADUCTION] «meurtre motivé par la nécrophilie» a été considéré comme étant suffisamment distinctif pour permettre au ministère public de produire une preuve d'expert que l'accusé «manifestait des caractéristiques distinctives qui le faisaient entrer dans la catégorie des personnes qui commettraient ce genre de crime» (par. 5). Il va sans dire qu'un caractère hautement distinctif s'ajoute aux autres limites applicables à la capacité du ministère public de produire une telle preuve d'expert, notamment les exigences suivantes: qu'elle ait un rapport avec une autre question litigieuse que la [TRADUCTION] «simple propension», et que sa valeur probante l'emporte sur son effet préjudiciable: Pascoe, précité, à la p. 355.

More common personality disorders are perhaps less distinctive than necrophilia. They are less likely to serve as "badges" to distinguish the perpetrator class from the rest of the population. Thus in R. v. Perlett, [1999] O.J. No. 1695 (QL) (S.C.J.), the trial judge found that the personality profiles of the perpetrators offered by the expert were simply too broad to be of material assistance in determining guilt or innocence: "This collection of ailments appears too general and vague to meet the test in Mohan" (per Platana J., at para. 36).

43 Les troubles de la personnalité plus courants sont peut-être moins distinctifs que la nécrophilie. Ils sont moins susceptibles de tenir lieu d'élément qui distingue du reste de la population la catégorie à laquelle appartient l'auteur du crime reproché. Ainsi, dans la décision R. c. Perlett, [1999] O.J. No. 1695 (QL) (C.S.J.), le juge du procès a conclu que les profils de personnalité des auteurs du crime reproché, soumis par l'expert, étaient tout simplement trop larges pour aider sérieusement à décider de la culpabilité ou de l'innocence: [TRADUCTION] «Le présent ensemble de maux paraît trop vague et général pour satisfaire au critère de l'arrêt Mohan» (le juge Platana, au par. 36).

Between these two extremes, the range and distinctiveness of personality traits attributed to perpetrators of different offences will vary greatly. The requirement of the "standard profile" is to ensure that the profile of distinctive features is not put together on an ad hoc basis for the purpose of a particular case. Beyond that, the issue is whether the "profile" is sufficient for the purpose to be served, whether the expert can identify and describe with workable precision what exactly distinguishes the distinctive or deviant perpetrator from other people. If the demarcation is clear and compelling, the fact the personality portrait cannot be filled in with elements that do not serve to distinguish the perpetrator is not fatal to acceptance of the evidence. While the trial judge was somewhat cryptic in his reasons on this point, it seems to me his decision is consistent with this analysis.

45 Fish J.A. pointed out in the court below that Sopinka J., in Mohan, supra, had cited Garfinkle, supra, where the Quebec Court of Appeal had allowed expert psychiatric evidence that pedophilia is "abnormal" and "that Garfinkle does not have such a disposition". While the "distinctive offence" exception recognized in Garfinkle was affirmed in Mohan, Garfinkle itself was decided without the benefit of the elaboration of the "gatekeeper" function developed in Mohan. In Mohan itself, at p. 38, the exclusory evidence relating to pedophilia was ruled inadmissible because > there was no material in the record to support a finding that the profile of a pedophile or psychopath has been standardized to the extent that it could be said that it matched the supposed profile of the offender depicted in the charges.

Each case turns on its facts. The conclusion of the Garfinkle trial judge, affirmed by the Quebec Court of Appeal, that in the circumstances there presented the evidence of Dr. Beltrami was probative and its benefit outweighed the cost, did not bind the trial judge on the facts of this case, who reached a contrary conclusion on the evidence presented in the voir dire.

5. A Properly Qualified Expert

46 Dr. Édouard Beltrami was accepted as qualified in the fields of psychiatry, sexology and physiology. It was within his expertise to give opinion evidence about the various tests administered under his supervision and his interpretation of the results.

6. Relevance of the Proposed Testimony

47 Evidence is relevant "where it has some tendency as a matter of logic and human experience personnalité ne puisse être complété au moyen d'éléments qui ne servent pas à distinguer l'auteur des autres personnes n'est pas fatal pour ce qui est d'accepter la preuve. Bien que le juge du procès ait été quelque peu énigmatique dans ses motifs sur ce point, il me semble que sa décision est conforme à la présente analyse.

Le juge Fish de la Cour d'appel a souligné que, dans l'arrêt Mohan, précité, le juge Sopinka avait cité l'arrêt Garfinkle, précité, dans lequel la Cour d'appel du Québec avait admis une preuve d'expert en psychiatrie que la pédophilie est [TRADUCTION] «anormale» et «que Garfinkle n'a pas une telle prédisposition». Bien que l'exception de l'«infraction distinctive» reconnue dans l'arrêt Garfinkle ait été confirmée dans Mohan, l'arrêt Garfinkle a été rendu en l'absence de la fonction de «gardien» établie dans l'arrêt Mohan. Dans l'arrêt Mohan lui-même, à la p. 38, la preuve d'exclusion relative à la pédophilie a été jugée inadmissible car > aucun document dans le dossier ne permettait de conclure que le profil du pédophile ou du psychopathe a été normalisé au point où on pourrait soutenir qu'il correspond au profil présumé du délinquant décrit dans les accusations.

Chaque cas est un cas d'espèce. La conclusion du juge du procès dans Garfinkle, confirmée par la Cour d'appel du Québec, que, dans les circonstances de cette affaire, la preuve du D^r^ Beltrami était probante et ses bénéfices l'emportaient sur son coût ne liait le juge du procès en l'espèce, qui a tiré une conclusion contraire fondée sur la preuve présentée lors du voir-dire.

5. Un expert compétent

On a reconnu la compétence du D^r^ Édouard Beltrami dans les domaines de la psychiatrie, de la sexologie et de la physiologie. Il était compétent pour offrir un témoignage d'opinion concernant les divers tests administrés sous sa surveillance et son interprétation des résultats.

6. Pertinence du témoignage proposé

Une preuve est pertinente [TRADUCTION] «lorsque, selon la logique et l'expérience humaine, elle to make the proposition for which it is advanced more likely than that proposition would appear to be in the absence of that evidence" (D. M. Paciocco and L. Stuesser, The Law of Evidence (1996), at p. 19). Because the concept of relevance provides a low threshold ("some tendency"), Mohan built into the relevance requirement a cost-benefit analysis to determine "whether its value is worth what it costs" (p. 21) in terms of its impact on the trial process. Thus the criteria for reception are relevance, reliability and necessity measured against the counterweights of consumption of time, prejudice and confusion: R. J. Delisle, "The Admissibility of Expert Evidence: A New Caution Based on General Principles" (1994), 29 C.R. (4th) 267. Whether considered as an aspect of relevance or a general exclusionary rule, "[t]he reliability versus effect factor has special significance in assessing the admissibility of expert evidence" (Mohan, at p. 21).

It is on this requirement that Dr. Beltrami's evidence is most vulnerable.

(a) Existence of a Distinctive Group

Dr. Beltrami's definition of the "distinctive" group of individuals with a propensity to commit these "distinctive crimes" is vague. As the trial judge and Robert J.A. noted, there is no standard profile. The reliability of the scientific foundations of the theory that certain acts will almost always be done by people having certain distinctive characteristics requires evidence; it cannot simply be assumed: K.B., supra, at para. 12; R. v. S. (J.T.) (1996), 47 C.R. (4th) 240 (Alta. C.A.), at p. 246; R. v. Dowd (1997), 120 C.C.C. (3d) 360 (N.B.C.A.), at p. 366. Dr. Beltrami said that: [TRANSLATION] "there is no point in making me say it a thousand times, there is no standard profile, but nonetheless I compared certain characteristics that are found frequently, not absolutely . . ." (emphasis added). Dr. Beltrami describes these characteristics in the following way:

tend jusqu'à un certain point à rendre la proposition qu'elle appuie plus vraisemblable qu'elle ne le paraîtrait sans elle» (D. M. Paciocco et L. Stuesser, The Law of Evidence (1996), à la p. 19). Comme la notion de pertinence constitue un seuil peu élevé («tend jusqu'à un certain point»), l'arrêt Mohan a incorporé dans l'exigence de pertinence une analyse du coût et des bénéfices afin de déterminer «si la valeur en vaut le coût» (p. 21) en ce qui concerne son incidence sur le déroulement du procès. Les critères d'admissibilité applicables sont donc la pertinence, la fiabilité et la nécessité par rapport au délai, au préjudice, à la confusion qui peuvent résulter: R. J. Delisle, «The Admissibility of Expert Evidence: A New Caution Based on General Principles» (1994), 29 C.R. (4th) 267. Qu'il soit considéré comme un aspect de la pertinence ou comme une règle d'exclusion générale, «[l]e facteur fiabilité-effet revêt une importance particulière dans l'appréciation de l'admissibilité de la preuve d'expert» (Mohan, à la p. 21).

(a) L'existence d'un groupe distinctif

49 La définition que le Dr Beltrami a donnée du groupe «distinctif» de personnes qui ont une propension à commettre ces «crimes distinctifs» est vague. Comme l'ont fait remarquer le juge du procès et le juge Robert, il n'y a pas de profil type. La fiabilité des fondements scientifiques de la théorie selon laquelle certains actes sont presque toujours accomplis par des personnes qui possèdent certaines caractéristiques distinctives doit être prouvée; elle ne peut pas être simplement présumée: K.B., précité, au par. 12; R. c. S. (J.T.) (1996), 47 C.R. (4th) 240 (C.A. Alb.), à la p. 246; R. c. Dowd (1997), 120 C.C.C. (3d) 360 (C.A.N.-B.), à la p. 366. Le Dr Beltrami a affirmé que «ça sert à rien de me le faire dire mille fois, y'en a pas de profil type, mais j'ai quand même comparé certaines caractéristiques qui se trouvent fréquemment, pas d'une manière absolue» (je souligne). Le Dr Beltrami décrit ces caractéristiques de la façon suivante:

[TRANSLATION] Well, as I just mentioned sexual abuse may . . . be committed by people who have organic disorders, people who are psychotic, mentally deficient people, alcoholics, drug addicts, so plainly different people may have committed sexual abuse, but normally, when young children have been abused with a clear and unmistakable [sic] such as penetration, there is — there is no one typical pathology, there is no pathology that is always the same and can be categorized, but normally there are a certain number of things that emerge, and the things that most often emerge are what was mentioned earlier, impulsiveness and also having inadequate social controls, which often have been passed on. So yes, it is true that there is no — it isn't a particular psychological type that commits these acts, but when someone has committed that act, there is a disorder somewhere and I considered all the possible disorders. [Emphasis added.]

Bien, comme je l'ai dit tout à l'heure, l'abus sexuel peut [. . .] être commis par des gens qui ont des troubles organiques, des gens qui sont psychotiques, des débiles mentaux, des alcooliques, des toxicomanes, donc c'est évident que des gens différents peuvent avoir commis des abus sexuels, mais habituellement, quand il y a des abus sur des jeunes enfants avec un clair et marqué (sic) comme la pénétration, il y a, — il n'y a pas une pathologie type, il n'y a pas une pathologie qui est toujours la même et qui est catégorisable, mais habituellement y'a un certain nombre de choses qui ressortent et celles qui ressortent le plus souvent c'est ce qui a été cité plus tôt, l'impulsivité et aussi d'avoir des normes, qui souvent ont été héritées ailleurs, sociales et inadéquates. Alors, oui, c'est vrai qu'il n'y a pas, — ce n'est pas un type psychologique particulier qui commet ça, mais quand quelqu'un a commis cet acte-là il y a un dérangement quelque part et je les ai passés en revue les dérangements possibles. [Je souligne.]

While the reference in Mohan to a "standard profile" should not be taken to require an exhaustive inventory of personality traits, the profile must confine the class to useful proportions. A spectrum of personality "disorders" that stretches from alcoholics to sexual psychopaths is too broad to be useful. If a man with more or less ordinary sexual predilections is capable while under the influence of alcohol or drugs to have committed these offences, the class of potential perpetrators is insufficiently "distinctive" in the Mohan sense for the expert evidence to be useful. Dr. Beltrami considered biological factors related to sexual interests to be the most important indicator but did not rule out the possibility that the offence was prompted by behavioural rather than biological factors.

Même si la mention d'un «profil type» dans l'arrêt Mohan ne devrait pas être interprétée comme exigeant un inventaire exhaustif des traits de personnalité, le profil doit ramener la catégorie à des proportions utiles. Un spectre des «troubles» de la personnalité qui s'étend des alcooliques aux psychopathes sexuels est trop large pour être utile. Si une personne qui a des préférences sexuelles plus ou moins ordinaires est susceptible d'avoir commis ces infractions alors qu'elle était sous l'influence de l'alcool ou d'une drogue, la catégorie d'auteurs potentiels des infractions n'est pas suffisamment «distinctive», au sens de l'arrêt Mohan, pour que la preuve d'expert soit utile. Le Dr Beltrami a estimé que les facteurs biologiques relatifs aux intérêts sexuels constituaient l'indice le plus important, mais il n'a pas écarté la possibilité que l'infraction soit imputable à des facteurs comportementaux plutôt qu'à des facteurs biologiques.

(b) Specificity of Tests

(b) La spécificité des tests

50 The defence was obliged to satisfy the court that the underlying principles and methodology of the tests administered to the respondent were reliable and, importantly, applicable. The MMPI2 and related tests were used to probe for behavioural problems that might trigger conduct that would be out of sexual character, but these tests were not designed to complement the plethysmograph test, and in any event drugs and alcohol-related

La défense devait convaincre la cour que les principes et la méthode qui sous-tendent les tests administrés à l'intimé étaient fiables et, qui plus est, applicables. Le MMPI2 et des tests connexes ont été utilisés pour tenter de déceler chez l'intimé des problèmes de comportement susceptibles de déclencher une conduite qui ne lui ressemble pas sur le plan sexuel, mais ces tests n'étaient pas conçus pour compléter le test de la pléthysmographie, offences are hardly distinctive in the Mohan sense. Dr. Beltrami readily acknowledged that the MMPI2 was not designed for the detection of sexual disorders and it does not contain any specific probe for unusual sexual preferences. Nor were specific scenarios prepared for the plethysmograph test, as hereinafter discussed. There was in fact no evidence from the people who conducted the interviews or administered the plethysmograph test. No test protocols were introduced, and there was no confirmation that whatever standard procedures exist had been followed. An expert such as Dr. Beltrami is certainly entitled to rely on data generated by tests carried out under his supervision, but he more or less disavowed any supervisory function and could not answer specific questions about how the tests on the respondent were conducted.

et, en tout état de cause, les infractions liées à la drogue et à l'alcool ne sont guère distinctives au sens de l'arrêt Mohan. Le Dr Beltrami a reconnu volontiers que le MMPI2 n'était pas conçu pour découvrir des troubles d'ordre sexuel et qu'il ne comportait rien de particulier pour détecter des préférences sexuelles inhabituelles. Aucun scénario particulier n'a été préparé pour le test de la pléthysmographie, comme nous le verrons plus loin. En fait, aucune preuve n'a été soumise par les gens qui ont effectué les entrevues ou administré le test de la pléthysmographie. Aucun protocole de test n'a été produit et rien n'a confirmé que toute procédure normale existante a été suivie. Un expert comme le Dr Beltrami a certainement le droit de se fonder sur des données obtenues grâce à des tests effectués sous sa surveillance, mais il a plus ou moins nié avoir exercé une fonction de surveillance et n'a pas pu répondre à des questions précises sur la façon dont les tests ont été administrés à l'intimé.

(c) Error Rate in Plethysmograph Results

(c) Le taux d'erreur des résultats de la pléthysmographie

In his report presented at the voir dire, Dr. Beltrami indicated that the "sensitivity" of the plethysmograph would detect a sexual deviant 47.5 per cent of the time. Where a detection was in fact made, the result was considered highly reliable (97.4 per cent). The respondent tested negative, i.e., was excluded, but the success rate of 47.5 per cent means that even in a test population consisting entirely of sexual deviants, the test would deliver a false negative more than half of the time. Dr. Beltrami observed during the voir dire, for example, that [TRANSLATION] "So, I acknowledge that in the usual literature, with people who come from all backgrounds, putting all the studies together, that there are about fifty percent (50%) of individuals who do not score." Such a result would render the test so prone to error as not to be useful for purposes of identification or exclusion.

51 Dans le rapport qu'il a soumis lors du voir-dire, le Dr Beltrami a indiqué que la «sensibilité» du pléthysmographe permet de découvrir un déviant sexuel dans 47,5 pour 100 des cas. Quand un déviant sexuel est découvert, le résultat est considéré très fiable (97,4 pour 100). Le test subi par l'intimé s'est révélé négatif, en ce sens que l'intimé a été écarté, mais le taux de réussite de 47,5 pour 100 signifie que, même dans une population expérimentale composée entièrement de déviants sexuels, le test donnerait un faux résultat négatif dans plus de la moitié des cas. Au cours du voir-dire, le Dr Beltrami a fait remarquer ceci, par exemple: «Donc, je reconnais que dans la littérature habituelle, avec des gens venant de tous les milieux, en mettant ensemble toutes les études que, y'a presque cinquante pour cent (50%) d'individus qui parfois ne scorent pas.» Un tel résultat rendrait le test tellement sujet à erreur qu'il ne serait pas utile pour identifier ou pour exclure.

When Dr. Beltrami was cross-examined on the 47.5 per cent success rate, he responded that [TRANSLATION] "nonetheless there are also articles that clearly indicate that the younger the age to which the deviation relates and the more unusual it is, the more specific and precisely sensitive the test will be". He said that some unidentified studies done "in Montreal" suggested that the detection rate in more "unusual preferences" could be up to 87 per cent. Thus the sensitivity of the test would vary between 47.5 per cent and 87 per cent but Dr. Beltrami did not give a more precise figure within this range, except to say that in the case of a perpetrator who derived pleasure from anal penetration of a prepubescent child the detection rate would likely be at the higher end of the scale. He said:

[TRANSLATION] So then, when you are talking, if you want my professional opinion on anal penetration, it is a serious act that, despite what may be said about it, is not really naively so tolerated by children and it is an act that still requires some degree of pressure, whether it be psychological, whether it be physical force or something else, it leaves marks, it leaves marks and the well-known 40% may rise to 80% because this is really something outside of the norm.

53 Dr. Beltrami did not explain how, if the basis of the plethysmograph test was the stimulation of remembrance of past pleasures, the results would vary according to the degree of deviance from some norm, and the issue was not addressed in his written report.

54 Dr. Beltrami agreed that a false negative (i.e., instances where the plethysmograph failed to identify an actual deviant) can, among other things, be caused by the fact that the visual and auditive scenarios presented to the subject lacked certain specific elements of stimulation, for example humiliation of the victim. He said that tailor-made scenarios are sometimes built to fit exactly the alleged acts but that was not done in this case. The standardized scenarios used by Dr. Beltrami were not presented to the Court and no attempt was made to demonstrate that they in fact replicated the type of stimulation the putative offender would have had while committing the alleged act.

qui signalent bien que plus la déviation est vers un âge bas et qu'elle est inusitée, plus le test va être spécifique et sensible plus exactement». Il a précisé, sans plus, que des études effectuées «à Montréal» indiquaient que le taux de détection des «préférences» plus «inhabituelles» pouvait aller jusqu'à 87 pour 100. Ainsi, la sensibilité du test varierait entre 47,5 pour 100 et 87 pour 100, mais le Dr Beltrami n'a pas donné de chiffre plus précis à cet égard, sauf qu'il a affirmé que, lorsqu'une personne a tiré plaisir de la pénétration anale d'un enfant qui n'a pas atteint la puberté, le taux de détection est vraisemblablement plus élevé. Il a dit:

Alors, donc, quand on parle, si vous me demandez mon opinion professionnelle pour une pénétration anale, c'est un acte grave qui, quoiqu'on en dise, est pas si toléré que ça par des enfants naïvement et c'est un acte qui demande quand même une certaine pression, que ce soit psychologique, que ce soit de force physique ou autre et ça laisse des traces, ça laisse des traces et le fameux quarante pour cent (40%) peut remonter à quatre-vingts pour cent (80%) parce que là, on sort vraiment de la norme habituelle.

Le Dr Beltrami n'a pas expliqué comment, en supposant que le test de la pléthysmographie reposait sur la stimulation du souvenir de plaisirs passés, les résultats varieraient selon le degré de déviance par rapport à une norme donnée, et il n'a pas non plus abordé cette question dans son rapport écrit.

Le Dr Beltrami a convenu qu'un faux résultat négatif (c'est-à-dire lorsque la pléthysmographie n'a pas permis de découvrir un déviant réel) peut notamment être attribuable au fait que les scénarios visuels et auditifs présentés au sujet ne comportaient pas certains éléments de stimulation particuliers, tels que l'humiliation de la victime. Il a dit que des scénarios sont parfois conçus spécialement pour correspondre exactement aux faits allégués, mais que cela n'avait pas été fait en l'espèce. Les scénarios normalisés dont s'est servi le Dr Beltrami n'ont pas été soumis à la Cour, et l'on n'a pas tenté de démontrer qu'ils reproduisaient en fait le type de stimulation qu'aurait eu le présumé délinquant en accomplissant l'acte reproché.

In my view, the trial judge had good reason to be sceptical about the value of this testimony. Even giving a loose interpretation to the need for a "standard profile", and passing over the doubts that only a pedophile would be capable of the offence, the evidence of the test error rate in the "match" of the respondent with or his "exclusion" from the "distinctive class" was problematic. The possibility that such evidence — "cloaked under the mystique of science" (Béland, supra, at p. 434) — would distort the fact-finding process, was very real. Moreover, defence evidence of this type can be expected to call forth expert evidence from the Crown in response, with the consequent danger that the trial could be derailed into a controversy on disposition or propensity, with the trial becoming "nothing more than a contest of experts with the trier of fact acting as referee in deciding which expert to accept" (Mohan, at p. 24). The trial judge did not regard the testimony as reliable for the purpose of excluding the respondent as a potential perpetrator of the crime, and consideration of the cost-benefit analysis seems to support the conclusion that the testimony offered as many problems as it did solutions.

55 À mon avis, le juge du procès avait de bonnes raisons de douter de la valeur de ce témoignage. Même en donnant une interprétation large à la nécessité d'un «profil type» et en faisant abstraction des doutes que seul un pédophile serait capable de commettre l'infraction, la preuve du taux d'erreur du test en ce qui a trait à la «concordance» de l'intimé avec la «catégorie distinctive» ou à son «exclusion» de cette catégorie était problématique. La possibilité qu'une telle preuve — «empreinte de la mystique de la science» (Béland, précité, à la p. 434) — fausse le processus de recherche des faits était très réelle. En outre, lorsque la défense soumet une preuve de ce genre, on peut s'attendre à ce que le ministère public réponde au moyen d'une preuve d'expert, d'où le risque que le procès dégénère en controverse sur la prédisposition ou la propension et se transforme en un «simple concours d'experts, dont le juge des faits se ferait l'arbitre en décidant quel expert accepter» (Mohan, à la p. 24). Le juge du procès n'a pas considéré que le témoignage en cause était assez fiable pour exclure l'intimé en tant qu'auteur potentiel du crime, et la prise en considération de l'analyse du coût et des bénéfices semble appuyer la conclusion que ce témoignage a apporté autant de problèmes que de solutions.

7. Necessity in Assisting the Trier of Fact

7. La nécessité d'aider le juge des faits

In Mohan, Sopinka J. held that the expert evidence in question had to be more than merely helpful. He required that the expert opinion be necessary "in the sense that it provide information, 'which is likely to be outside the experience and knowledge of a judge or jury', . . . the evidence must be necessary to enable the trier of fact to appreciate the matters in issue due to their technical nature" (p. 23). In Béland, supra, McIntyre J., speaking about the inadmissibility of a polygraph test, cited, at p. 415, Davie v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, [1953] S.C. 34, at p. 40, on the role of expert witnesses where Lord Cooper said:

56 Dans l'arrêt Mohan, le juge Sopinka a conclu que la preuve d'expert en question devait être plus que simplement utile. Il a exigé que l'opinion d'expert soit nécessaire: «au sens qu'elle fournit des renseignements "qui, selon toute vraisemblance, dépassent l'expérience et la connaissance d'un juge ou d'un jury" [. . .] la preuve doit être nécessaire pour permettre au juge des faits d'apprécier les questions en litige étant donné leur nature technique» (p. 23). Dans l'arrêt Béland, précité, à la p. 415, le juge McIntyre a, au sujet de l'inadmissibilité de la preuve obtenue au moyen d'un test polygraphique, cité la décision Davie c. Magistrates of Edinburgh, [1953] S.C. 34, portant sur le rôle des témoins experts et dans laquelle lord Cooper a dit (à la p. 40):

Their duty is to furnish the Judge or jury with the necessary scientific criteria for testing the accuracy of their conclusions, so as to enable the Judge or jury to form their own independent judgment by the application of these criteria to the facts proved in evidence. [Emphasis added.]

The purpose of expert evidence is thus to assist the trier of fact by providing special knowledge that the ordinary person would not know. Its purpose is not to substitute the expert for the trier of fact. What is asked of the trier of fact is an act of informed judgment, not an act of faith.

57 Dr. Beltrami clearly did not consider it his function to enable the trier of fact to appreciate the basis of the suggested inferences from his data in favour of the respondent. He offered a packaged opinion but was not prepared to share with the trial judge the data which he relied upon. At one point, asked by the Crown about his failure to produce the chart with the penile plethysmograph results, Dr. Beltrami said:

[TRANSLATION] Listen, Your Honour, we have to understand that if we start — normally we do not submit the psychological tests in detail or the curves because at that point if we start calculating everything in centimetres or millimetres, we will be here all morning. Let's just say that this curve, properly analysed, demonstrates the following results, that there are no, according to how those curves are normally evaluated, there are no signs of deviant behaviour in him.

Elsewhere, Dr. Beltrami gave his reason for non-production of the data on which he based his opinion as follows:

[TRANSLATION] Okay. But it is not normally produced because otherwise, it would be too complicated to produce all the details, there would be battles over the little details.

58 The devil, of course, is often in the "little details" and following the cross-examination, Crown counsel had this exchange with the judge l'exactitude de leurs conclusions, afin de permettre au juge ou au jury de former sa propre opinion par l'application de ces critères aux faits établis par la preuve. [Je souligne.]

La preuve d'expert vise donc à aider le juge des faits en lui fournissant des connaissances particulières qu'une personne ordinaire n'aurait pas. Elle n'a pas pour objet de substituer l'expert au juge des faits. C'est un acte de jugement éclairé, et non un acte de confiance, qui est requis du juge des faits.

Il est clair que le Dr Beltrami a estimé qu'il ne lui appartenait pas de faire en sorte que le juge des faits soit en mesure d'évaluer le fondement des déductions qu'il proposait de faire en faveur de l'intimé à partir de ses données. Il a offert une opinion toute faite, sans toutefois être disposé à communiquer au juge du procès les données sur lesquelles il s'était appuyé. À un moment donné, quand le ministère public l'a interrogé sur son omission de produire la courbe des résultats de la pléthysmographie pénienne, le Dr Beltrami a affirmé:

Écoutez, Votre Seigneurie, il faut comprendre que si on commence, — habituellement ni on remet les tests psychologiques en détail ni les courbes parce qu'à ce moment-là si on commence à calculer tout en centimètres ou en millimètre, on va passer la matinée ici. Disons que cette courbe analysée d'une manière pertinente montre les résultats suivants qu'il n'y a pas, d'après l'habitude d'évaluer ces courbes-là, il n'y a pas de traces du comportement déviant chez lui.

Ailleurs, le Dr Beltrami a expliqué pourquoi il n'avait pas produit les données sur lesquelles il avait fondé son opinion:

O.K. Mais c'est pas produit d'habitude parce que sinon ce serait trop complexe de produire tous les détails, y'aurait des batailles sur des petits détails.

Bien entendu, c'est souvent dans les «petits détails» qu'on trouve à redire et, à la suite du contre-interrogatoire, l'avocate du ministère public concerning the non-production of the key documents:

Before any weight at all can be given to an expert's opinion, the facts upon which the opinion is based must be found to exist. Even if Dr. Beltrami had offered an explanation of his data, and explained to the trial judge the "expert" basis on which he felt the trial judge could draw appropriate inferences, there remained the question whether Dr. Beltrami's contribution to the judge's ability to form his "own independent conclusion" on the issue of the respondent's exclusion was worth the cost in potential distortion of the judge's independent consideration of the evidence of opportunity, the out-of-court statements of the children, the respondent's parental relationship with them, and the respondent's ongoing heterosexual relationships with several mature women. It seems to me the trial judge was simply being offered a conclusory opinion that on cross-examination turned out to be short on demonstrated scientific support. In terms of the questions posed in Daubert, supra, Dr. Beltrami did address "the

Pour pouvoir accorder une valeur probante à l'opinion d'un expert, il faut conclure à l'existence des faits sur lesquels elle repose. Même si le Dr Beltrami avait offert une explication de ses données et expliqué au juge du procès les raisons d'«expert» pour lesquelles il estimait que le juge du procès pourrait faire les déductions appropriées, il restait à déterminer si la contribution du Dr Beltrami à la capacité du juge de tirer sa «propre conclusion indépendante» sur la question de l'exclusion de l'intimé valait le coût de la possibilité que soit faussé l'examen indépendant, par le juge, de la preuve d'opportunité, des déclarations extrajudiciaires des enfants, du lien parental de l'intimé avec les enfants et des relations hétérosexuelles que l'intimé avait avec plusieurs femmes d'âge mur. Il me semble qu'on a seulement soumis au juge du procès une opinion théorique qui, au cours du contre-interrogatoire, s'est révélée dépourvue d'appui scientifique établi. Pour ce qui est des questions posées dans Daubert, précité, le known or potential rate of error" but was not asked to address the history or acceptance of the techniques for diagnostic as opposed to therapeutic purposes, and the level of acceptance for that purpose amongst his scientific peers.

60 Dr. Beltrami's evidence said in effect that the respondent's denial ought to be believed because he is not the sort of person who would do such a thing. This was close to oath-helping in circumstances not within the expert witness exception: R. v. Marquard, [1993] 4 S.C.R. 223, per McLachlin J., at p. 248. As the trial judge excluded Dr. Beltrami's evidence because of the lack of a "standard profile", he did not go on to deal in his reasons with the necessity requirement, but it certainly would have been open to him to exclude Dr. Beltrami's opinion on the basis of a "cost-benefit" analysis of the necessity requirement as well.

La preuve du Dr Beltrami indiquait en fait qu'il fallait ajouter foi à la dénégation de l'intimé parce qu'il n'était pas le genre de personne susceptible d'agir ainsi. Cela ressemblait à un témoignage justificatif dans des circonstances non visées par l'exception du témoin expert: R. c. Marquard, [1993] 4 R.C.S. 223, le juge McLachlin, à la p. 248. Étant donné que le juge du procès a exclu la preuve du Dr Beltrami en raison de l'absence de «profil type», il n'a pas traité de l'exigence de nécessité dans ses motifs, mais il lui aurait été certainement loisible d'écarter l'opinion du Dr Beltrami en fonction également d'une analyse du coût et des bénéfices de l'exigence de nécessité.

8. The Discretion of the Trial Judge

8. Le pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge du procès

61 The Mohan analysis necessarily reposes a good deal of confidence in the trial judge's ability to discharge the gatekeeper function (Malbœuf, supra). The trial judge addressed himself to the proper legal requirements established in Mohan. While he perhaps lingered on the need for a "standard profile", his reasons taken as a whole suggest that he was simply not persuaded, on the basis of the evidence which the defence chose to put forward, that the Mohan requirements had been met. The trial judge's discharge of his gatekeeper function in the evaluation of the demands of a full and fair trial record, while avoiding distortions of the fact-finding exercise through the introduction of inappropriate expert testimony, deserves a high degree of respect. In this case, there was much in the evidence to support the trial judge's decision to exclude Dr. Beltrami's testimony and in my respectful view the majority of the Quebec Court of Appeal erred in interfering with the exercise of his discretion to do so.

L'analyse de l'arrêt Mohan place nécessairement une grande confiance dans la capacité du juge du procès de s'acquitter de son rôle de gardien (arrêt Malbœuf, précité). Le juge du procès a abordé les exigences juridiques appropriées qui ont été établies dans l'arrêt Mohan. Même s'il peut s'être attardé à la nécessité d'un «profil type», ses motifs indiquent, dans l'ensemble, que la preuve que la défense a choisi de présenter ne l'a simplement pas convaincu que les exigences de l'arrêt Mohan avaient été respectées. Le fait que le juge du procès a évité que la recherche des faits soit faussée par la présentation d'un témoignage d'expert inapproprié, en exerçant sa fonction de gardien dans l'évaluation des exigences de procès juste et équitable, mérite beaucoup de respect. En l'espèce, une grande partie de la preuve étayait la décision du juge du procès d'exclure le témoignage du Dr Beltrami, et je suis d'avis que les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel du Québec ont commis une erreur en intervenant dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire à cet égard.

T. DUCHARME J.

RULING ON PROPOSED EXPERT EVIDENCE

1] Mr. Thomas is charged with sexual assault causing bodily harm and unlawful confinement. It is alleged that on December 5, 2003 that he dragged the complainant, a 15-year old girl whom he did not know, to his apartment where he forced her to have vaginal intercourse with him. The Crown is calling Ms. Michele McIntosh the sexual assault nurse examiner who examined the complainant on December 8, 2003. The parties are agreed that Ms. McIntosh can testify as to the observations she made during this examination. However, the Crown also seeks to qualify Ms. Michele McIntosh as an expert qualified to give opinion evidence as to whether certain of the injuries she observed on the complainant are more consistent with non-consensual sexual activity than with consensual sexual activity. Yesterday, I indicated that, after careful consideration, I had concluded that Ms. McIntosh was not properly qualified to give the opinion evidence that the Crown seeks to adduce. The following are my reasons for that decision.

(A) The Test for Expert Evidence

[2] Expert evidence is a type of opinion evidence. Opinion evidence is generally inadmissible. To be admissible, expert evidence must meet the following criteria set out by Sopinka J. in R. v. Mohan (1994), 11 D.L.R. (4th) 419 at 427 (S.C.C.):

(1) the evidence must be relevant;

(2) the evidence must be necessary to assist the trier of fact;

(3) there must be no exclusionary rule otherwise prohibiting the receipt of the evidence; and

(4) the evidence is given by a properly qualified expert.

[3] There is no question that the path of least resistance in motions such as these oftentimes seems to be to admit the evidence and then compensate for any of its weaknesses by attaching less weight to the opinion. But such an approach is an abdication of the proper function of a trial judge and was explicitly rejected by Binnie J. in R. v. J.-L.J., [2000] 2 S.C.R. 600 (S.C.C) at p. 613:

> the Court has emphasized that the trial judge should take seriously the role of "gatekeeper". The admissibility of the expert evidence should be scrutinized at the time it is proffered, and not allowed too easy an entry on the basis that all of the frailties could go at the end of the day to weight rather than admissibility.

Of course, this gatekeeper function directly collides with the general requirement that the parties to an action must be afforded the opportunity to lead the most complete evidentiary record consistent with the rules of evidence. This fundamental tension can only be resolved by the careful and consistent application of the rules of evidence.

[4] Mr. Smith for the defence concedes that the first three criteria in Mohan are satisfied in this case. I accept this concession although I note that the proposed evidence, i.e. whether the complainant's injuries are more consistent with non-consensual or consensual sex comes perilously close to an opinion on the ultimate issue before the court. Therefore, in concluding that this evidence is necessary, I have kept in mind that in such cases the requirement of necessity should be strictly enforced: R. v. Mohan, supra, at 430; R. v. J.-L.J., supra, at 623; R. v. Pascoe (1997), 32 O.R. (3d) 37 (Ont. C.A) at p 55.

[5] Therefore the admissibility of this evidence turns on the question of whether or not Ms. McIntosh is properly qualified to give the opinion evidence that the Crown seeks to lead.

(B) Is Ms. McIntosh A Properly Qualified Expert?

[6] As Sopinka J., stated in Mohan, supra, at p. 431:

> the evidence must be given by a witness who is shown to have acquired special or peculiar knowledge through study or experience in respect of the matters on which he or she undertakes to testify.

As Charron J.A. observed in R. v. A.K. and N.K., supra, this criterion is usually not difficult to apply but it is important that it not be overlooked keeping in mind that:

> Opinion evidence can only be of assistance to the extent that the witness has acquired special knowledge over the subject matter that the average trier of fact does not already have. If the witness's "special" or "peculiar" knowledge on a subject matter is minimal, he or she should not be qualified as an expert with respect to that subject.

[7] How the witness acquired that "special" or "peculiar" knowledge is not the central issue at this point. Rather the issue is whether the witness does, in fact, have the "special" or "peculiar" knowledge.[1] Thus one can acquire the necessary knowledge through formal education, private study, work experience or other personal involvement with the subject matter. In some cases, the expertise will require formal study as is the case with the evidence of medical experts. Others areas of expertise can be developed

[1] Where that knowledge involves a novel scientific theory or technique it must also be subjected to special scrutiny to determine whether it meets a basic threshold of reliability: Mohan, supra, at p. 415. Where it does not, it will not be admitted as it will be of no assistance to the trier of fact. This consideration does not apply to the purported expertise of Ms. McIntosh as the courts have ruled that this is an appropriate area for the reception of expert evidence: R v. Quashie, (2005) 198 C.C.C. (3d) 337 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Liu (2004), 190 C.C.C. (3d) 233 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Colas (2001), 161 C.C.C. (3d) 335 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Steinbach (1998), 129 C.C.C. (3d) 208 (B.C. C.A.)

in less formal ways. Thus, in Rice v. Sockett (1912), 27 O.L.R. 410 (Ont. C.A.), Falconbridge C.J. stated at p. 413:

> The derivation of the term 'expert' implies that he is one who by experience has acquired special or peculiar knowledge of the subject of which he undertakes to testify, and it does not matter whether such knowledge has been acquired by study of scientific works or by practical observation. Hence, one who is an old hunter, and has thus had much experience in the use of firearms, may be well qualified to testify as to the appearance which a gun recently fired would present as a highly-educated and skilled gunsmith.

[8] When assessing the qualifications of a proposed expert, trial judges regularly consider factors such as the proposed witness' professional qualifications, her actual experience, her participation or membership in professional associations, the nature and extent of her publications, her involvement in teaching, her involvement in courses or conferences in the field and her efforts to keep current with the literature in the field and whether or not the witness has previously been qualified to testify as an expert in the area.

(1) Ms. McIntosh's Educational Background

[9] Ms. McIntosh has a B.A. in English Literature, a B.Sc. in Nursing, an M.Sc. in Perinatal Nursing Science and she is currently a candidate for a PhD. in nursing. None of the course work involved in either her M.Sc. or Ph.D. involved courses that related to sexual assault although the former did involve courses in anatomy, physiology and the female reproductive system. She took what she described as a "fairly short" certification program to be a sexual assault examiner. This consisted of two weeks of full time study followed by an apprenticeship period of approximately one month where she had to demonstrate that she could conduct a pelvic examination. She was not required to write an examination to be certified – all she had to do was complete the course.

[10] The certification course was not described in any particular detail by Ms. McIntosh except indirectly when she discussed the meaning of the "pathophysiology of assault":

> We're shown extensive videos and slides of injuries so that when we see them, we can uhm identify them, use appropriate terminology, have some research basis in understanding what would have caused them, uhm, what injuries are correlated with what kinds of -- you know we look at a lot of research looking at consensual sex injuries and non-consensual sex injuries. Uhm, so pathophysiology looks at the medical aspect of -- of genitalia within the context of sexual assault.

Beyond this, there was no evidence before me of the specifics of this course – nor what, if any, part of the course dealt with how one might distinguish between injuries from non-consensual sex from injuries caused by consensual sex.

(2) Ms. McIntosh's Professional Experience

[11] Ms. McIntosh has worked as a sexual assault nurse examiner since 1999 at various hospitals. I accept that Ms. McIntosh has done many pelvic examinations both on women generally and on women who have reported that they have been the victims of a sexual assault. However, unlike Dr. Parker, the expert who testified in Quashie and Liu, Ms. McIntosh did not give any more precise numbers with respect to the number of examinations she has performed on women who have reported that they have been sexually assaulted nor did she indicate any experience in examining women who have suffered pain following consensual sex. More seriously, Ms. McIntosh gave no evidence that she has assessed the results of these examinations in any systematic way or that she was able to relate the results of her own examinations with the literature in the area. Thus, even assuming that all the reports of sexual assault were truthful, it is unclear how her experience in this regards qualifies her to offer the opinion the Crown seeks to elicit.

[12] In her examination in chief, Ms. McIntosh outlined the duties of a sexual assault nurse examiner as including the following: (1) taking a history of the complainant; (2) examining the complainant and documenting the results of that; (3) collecting forensic evidence for a sexual assault evidence kit; (4) collaborating with other medical personnel; (5) contacting the police at the complainant's request; and (6) providing the complainant with other referrals. What is striking here is that Ms. McIntosh did not suggest that the duties of a sexual assault nurse examiner include distinguishing injuries caused by non-consensual sex from those caused by consensual sex. Yet all her relevant work experience and training relate solely to the role of a sexual assault nurse practitioner. Thus, none of Ms. McIntosh's experiences in these specified areas qualify her to give the opinion evidence that the Crown seeks to lead – something that lies outside the purview of a sexual assault nurse examiner.

(3) Ms. McIntosh's Research, Teaching or Other Academic Experience

[13] Ms. McIntosh has not done any research or academic writing in the area of distinguishing injuries from non-consensual sex from those caused by consensual sex. In her testimony she made no mention of membership in any relevant associations or organizations. While she has taught at the sexual assault nurse examiner certification course, her teaching seemed to focus on how to perform pelvic examinations.[2] In her examination in chief she testified solely about "pelvic exam training that I did for all the emerging sexual assault nurses." In cross-examination, she added that she had been asked:

> to spend a day providing, uhm, theoretical content for that, so I talked about again anatomy, physiology, that's why I read the research I could find and we showed slides of injuries.

Ms. McIntosh did not testify that she taught how to distinguish between consensual and non-consensual sexual injuries. This is not surprising given that the making of such distinctions is not part of the duties of a sexual assault nurse examiner, supra, paragraph 12. Thus, while Ms. McIntosh has taught sexual assault nurse practitioners, this teaching does not qualify her to give the opinion evidence that the Crown seeks to elicit from her.

[2] In her examination in chief she testified solely about "pelvic exam training that I did for all the emerging sexual assault nurses." In examination in chief she added that she had been asked

(4) Ms. McIntosh's Previous Experience As An Expert Witness

[14] Ms. McIntosh has testified 8 to 10 times in both this Court and the Ontario Court of Justice. She was unable to provide any specifics about the cases in which she has testified. It appears that she has never been qualified to give opinion evidence of any type, although she might nonetheless have volunteered opinion evidence - her evidence on this point was somewhat confusing as the following excerpts demonstrate:

> Examination in Chief
> THE WITNESS: Uhm, it's -- it's typical for me to talk about injuries and refer to the research that correlates certain kinds of injuries that are consistent with assault or not.
>
> MR. KENNY: Sorry if you could just repeat that for me because I didn't get it all.
>
> THE WITNESS: Uhm it's typical when I'm giving testimony that I'm asked about injuries.
>
> Q. Yes.
>
> A. And in giving the testimony there are certain injuries that research highly correlates with assault, and uhm so I've referred to that research.
>
> Cross-Examination
>
> Q. The last question His Honour asked you is have you ever -- not necessarily verbatim, but have you ever been qualified in a court of law to give expert opinion evidence as to the consistency of general injuries with sexual assault and I don't think with respect to you, you really answered that question?
> A. I've never been -- I've never been certified as an expert witness in court, but the testimony that I give, uhm, has usually involved some statement from the research that I know and teach about injuries and their congruency with assault or consensual sex.

In her examination in chief, Ms. McIntosh explained that she has testified "regarding the documentation that was mine in sexual assault auh, evidence kits." Under cross-examination, she conceded that the majority of the questions posed to her related to issues of continuity of exhibits in the sexual assault kit and the like.

[15] From the foregoing, it is obvious that, unlike Dr. Parker the expert in Quashie and Liu, Ms. McIntosh has never been qualified to give opinion evidence of the type the Crown now seeks to elicit.

(5) Ms. McIntosh's Knowledge of the Literature

[16] In Liu the Court of Appeal had evidence before it that there was a "rather limited body of published studies involving injuries resulting from sexual assault."[3] I have no such evidence before me – beyond Ms. McIntosh's generalized assertion that there is a literature. As is obvious from the passages quoted in paragraph 14, supra; Ms. McIntosh suggested that there was research with respect to the congruency or correlation between various types of injuries and assault or consensual sexual activity. However she was unable to discuss this literature in any substantive way as is evidenced by the following passages of her cross-examination:

> Q. Okay. Let me ask you this. You referred to some research in the area. Would you agree with me that there is very limited academic research as to genital injuries as a result of unconsensual (sic) sex?
>
> A. Uhm, well, I guess I mean I think there is --I've certainly read research that speaks to that issue. Uhm, I'm not sure how to compare it with you know other research.
>
> Q. Okay. What's the last article or academic literature that you've read in regards to this area of expertise?
>
> A. Uhm, are you wanting me to cite authors and journals?
>
> Q. Yes.
>
> A. I can't do that right now.
>
> Q. When is the last time that you read any academic literature in regards to the opinion that my friend wants you to give?
>
> A. Uhm, that would have been in, auh, August of -- of this past year when I was preparing to teach the pelvic exam course for newly graduating sexual assault nurse examiners.
>
> . . .
>
> Q. Do you agree with if I suggested to you that there is no science that can deal with whether injuries are a product of consensual sex or not?

[3] Liu, supra at p. 242.

A. I'm sorry. What was the first part of your question?

Q. There is no science that can deal with whether the injuries are the product of a consensual sex or not?

A. Uhm, well I don't know if you can ever – I don't know that I could agree with that. Uhm, I mean I think with science generally it's always you know evolving truth and I think that there is uhm enough research and -- and there is emerging research as well that's looking at are there injuries in consensual sex and what do those look like and where are those located? So I think we know a lot of those injuries that women sustain from having a baby for example we know the kind of sexual responses women have and how that affects their genital area after consensual sex. There's a significant amount of research especially in the paediatric literature as well as sexual assault literature that -- that does provide charts that auh, and rationales for why certain kinds of injuries are more prevalent than others and what those are attributable to.

Q. And I think you fairly indicated to us earlier you couldn't point out to any of this research right now?

A. Well, I can -- there's journals called child abuse, there's journals called sexual assault, there's textbooks called sexual assault that have pictures and theoretical explanations. I just saw a text recently at the University of Alberta has just been produced that's going to be used specifically for forensic nurse examiners so I think there's a significant amount of -- of research that addresses these questions.
[Emphasis added]

[17] I am astonished that a proposed expert witness is unable to discuss the literature relevant to her supposed field of expertise with any greater precision. Incredibly, Ms. McIntosh was unable to cite specifically a single relevant study, author or article. While she did make reference to certain journals relevant to sexual assault generally and an unnamed text from the University of Alberta – she was unable to refer to any articles dealing with the particular topic of distinguishing injuries caused by consensual sex from injuries caused by non-consensual sex. Thus, I am not satisfied that Ms. McIntosh was "acquainted with the rather limited body of published studies involving injuries resulting from sexual assault" like Dr. Parker was in Liu. While Ms. McIntosh purported to be familiar with the relevant literature, I find that she is incapable of discussing it in any meaningful way. This reflects very badly on her putative expertise. It is particularly serious where, as is the case here, her knowledge of the relevant research is the only credible basis that she offered for her ability to give the opinion evidence the Crown seeks to lead from her.

(C) Conclusion

[18] As the foregoing analysis makes clear, there is no question that Ms. McIntosh is not remotely as qualified to testify as Dr. Parker the expert who testified in Quashie and Liu.[4] However, I have contrasted the qualifications of Ms. McIntosh with those of Dr. Parker solely to highlight the deficiencies in Ms. McIntosh's qualifications. I do not mean to suggest that, because there are other persons more qualified to give this evidence, Ms. McIntosh should not be qualified as an expert. I am well aware that the fact that another person may have been more qualified to testify on a particular topic goes only to weight, rather than admissibility: McLean (Litigation Guardian of) v. Seisel (2004) 182 O.A.C. 122 (C.A.) at p. 140; Regina v. Wade, (1994) 18 O.R (3d) 33 (C.A.) at p. 42, rev'd on other grounds (1995) 23 O.R. (3d) 415 (S.C.C.).

[19] For all these reasons, I have concluded that Ms. McIntosh is not qualified to testify as to whether the injuries suffered by the complainant are more consistent with non-consensual as opposed to consensual sex. In making this determination, I am well aware of the observation of Gillese J.A. in McLean (Litigation Guardian of) v. Seisel, supra, at p. 139 that the facts in R. v. Marquard, supra, "reveal that the threshold for admissibility is not high." But in Marquard, unlike in this case, the problem was not that the proposed experts lacked the "special" knowledge. The challenged witnesses were trained, experienced physicians and, as McLachlin J. noted at p. 78, "There is little doubt that they all possessed some special knowledge relating to the matters on which they testified." Rather, the problem in Marquard was that the witnesses were qualified more narrowly than either their actual areas of expertise or the scope of their testimony. Therefore, in my view, Marquard does not justify a departure from the clear direction of Binnie J. in R. v. J.-L.J., quoted in paragraph 3, supra.

[4] At the time of her testimony in Liu, Dr. Parker had been licensed by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario for 17 years. As part of her medical studies, she had studied paediatrics, obstetrics and gynaecology. Dr. Parker was certified in family medicine and emergency medicine. In her family practice approximately 90 percent of Dr. Parker's patients were women, and approximately 40 percent of the work she performed has a gynaecological focus. She had examined the genitalia of thousands of women, having practised in her field for 17 years. She had been the physician liaison to the Sexual Assault Treatment Centre of the Riverdale Hospital. She attended a one day seminar at Women's College Hospital Sexual Assault Centre at the time of setting up the Riverside Hospital Sexual Assault Treatment Centre in 1994.At Ottawa General Hospital, Dr. Parker taught all aspects of emergency medicine with a special emphasis on the sexual assault program. Since 1994, in her capacity as consultant physician to the Sexual Assault Treatment Program, she had conducted a number of seminars on the sexual assault examination process. She had taught continuing medical education sessions for physicians in the Ottawa Valley with respect to the subject of sexual assault treatment procedure. In April, 1999 Dr. Parker attended a conference entitled, "Controversies in Sexual Assault Care", sponsored by the Ontario Network of Sexual Assault Treatment Centres. The trial judge found that Dr. Parker had done more sexual assault examinations than any other physician in Ottawa. Dr. Parker herself had examined approximately 45 women over the past 15 years who have allegedly suffered from non-consensual sex. She had also examined hundreds of women complaining of pain following consensual sex, such as abdominal pain after intercourse, or cramping while pregnant, or from a variety of other complaints. The trial judge also found that Dr. Parker was acquainted with the "rather limited body of published studies involving injuries resulting from sexual assault." Importantly, Dr. Parker was able to testify that the results of these studies mirrored her own experience.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Justice G.S. Dunlop

1. Overview

[1] On April 12, 2022 the Honourable Tyler Shandro, QC, Minister of Justice and Solicitor General for Alberta, Deputy House Leader and Member of the Executive Council, signed a certificate pursuant to s. 34 of the Alberta Evidence Act, RSA 2000, c A-18, certifying that a PowerPoint presentation and minutes of a February 8, 2022 meeting of Cabinet must be kept confidential and not disclosed.

[2] Minister Shandro's certificate was attached and referred to in a Certified Record of Proceedings of Dr. Deena Hinshaw, Alberta's Chief Medical Officer of Health. According to Dr. Hinshaw's Amended Certified Record of Proceedings, filed June 1, 2022, the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes are documents in her possession relevant to her decision in CMOH Order 08-2022, which the Applicants allege was deficient in several respects.

[3] The Applicants applied for disclosure of the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes. Both the Applicants and the Respondent, Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Alberta (the "Crown") submitted written briefs and I heard the application on June 27, 2022. I concluded, based on the evidence before me then, that public interest immunity did not apply to the two documents. However, following the procedure set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in British Columbia (Attorney General) v Provincial Court Judges' Association of British Columbia 2020 SCC 20 at para 103, I directed that the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes be provided to me, to ensure that nothing would be disclosed which should remain confidential in the public interest.

[4] I received the PowerPoint presentation and Cabinet minutes on June 29, 2022. For the reasons set out below, I conclude that nothing in them is immune from production based on the public interest. I direct Dr. Hinshaw to file a further amended Certified Record of Proceeding attaching both documents, without redactions. Based on emails from counsel about a possible application for a stay of my order pending appeal, the deadline for Dr. Hinshaw to do so is one week after the release of these reasons.

2. Public Interest Immunity

[5] In my reasons for decision given orally on June 27, 2022 I reviewed the six factors relevant to public interest immunity which are identified by the Supreme Court of Canada in Carey v Ontario [1986] 2 SCR 637 and listed in Provincial Court Judges' at para 101. My subsequent review of the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes provides me with additional evidence, primarily on the third Carey factor, the contents of the documents.

[6] The Crown has the burden of proving that public interest immunity applies and it should put in a detailed affidavit to support its claim: Provincial Court Judges' at para 102. In this case the Crown did not file an affidavit. The only evidence I have relevant to public interest immunity is Minister Shandro's certificate and the documents themselves. Minister Shandro has an obligation to "be as helpful as possible in identifying the interest sought to be protected": Carey at para 40.

> Furthermore, Cabinet prepared an Official Record of Decision ("ORD") consisting of meeting minutes arising from the February 8, 2022 meeting. The ORD arises from confidential discussions and deliberations which occurred within Cabinet, including Dr. Hinshaw.
>
>
> If Cabinet members' statements were subject to disclosure, this could impede the free flow of discussion and injure the process of democratic governance.

> Disclosure of the Power-Point and the ORD would be both (a) not in the public interest, and (b) prejudicial to those not involved in this litigation, as the precedential impact of being compelled to disclose confidential Cabinet discussions, or materials prepared for Cabinet's consideration, could impede the free flow of future Cabinet discussions, or the preparation of materials for Cabinet consideration, thereby negatively impacting the democratic governance of the Province of Alberta.
> (underlining added)

[8] The implication of those statements in Minister Shandro's certificate is that the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes contain Cabinet members' statements or Cabinet discussions or deliberations. They do not. The minutes set out decisions only, and no statements by or discussions or deliberations among Cabinet members. The PowerPoint presentation contains information about COVID in Alberta and elsewhere in the world, with an emphasis on what other provinces were doing and experiencing and presents options for easing public health measures in Alberta. The PowerPoint presentation contains no statements, discussions or deliberations by individual Cabinet members or Cabinet as a whole.

[9] Although the PowerPoint presentation includes options for easing public health measures, and the Cabinet Minutes set out decisions about that, neither document contains an explicit recommendation about anything, with one exception. Page 38 of the PowerPoint presentation includes a recommendation regarding the Alberta Covid Records verifier apps. According to Minister Shandro's certificate, the PowerPoint presentation was prepared by Dr. Hinshaw, so this may be her recommendation. The document is not clear whose recommendation this is.

[10] As to the materials prepared for Cabinet's consideration, there is no evidence before me to support the conclusion that documents provided by the Chief Medical Officer of Health to Cabinet must be kept secret to ensure she will freely and honestly provide information and recommendations in the future. On the contrary, given her statutory powers and duties under the Public Health Act, RSA 2000, c. P-37 and her professional obligations as a physician, I would expect her to be candid and complete, regardless of any potential future public disclosure.

[11] During oral argument on June 27, 2022, I asked counsel for the Crown what public interest would be served by keeping Cabinet decisions secret. Counsel for the Crown submitted that policy decisions of Cabinet may change and for that reason they should be kept secret. He cited no authority in support of that proposition. Counsel for Crown conceded that the argument for public interest immunity is stronger for Cabinet deliberations than for Cabinet decisions. Minister Shandro in the last paragraph of his certificate refers to the prejudicial impact of disclosing Cabinet discussions or materials prepared for Cabinet; he says nothing about any prejudice from disclosing cabinet decisions.

[12] Furthermore, in this case the relationship between Cabinet decisions and Chief Medical Officer of Health decisions is a central issue. The Applicants allege improper delegation by the Chief Medical Officer of Health to the Cabinet whereas the Crown argues that Cabinet makes policy decisions and the Chief Medical Officer of Health implements those policy decisions through her orders. This engages the fifth Carey factor: the importance of producing the documents in the interests of the administration of justice. Consequently, even if there is a public interest in keeping Cabinet decisions secret in general, in this case the interests of justice tip the balance in favour of disclosure.

[13] The focus of public interest immunity with respect to Cabinet proceedings is Cabinet deliberations: Provincial Court Judges' at para 95 – 97. The documents before me do not reveal Cabinet deliberations. They contain information and options provided by the Chief Medical Officer of Health to Cabinet, one recommendation, and Cabinet decisions. The Crown has not established a public interest requiring that those things be kept secret.

3. Redactions and Stay Pending Appeal

[14] Natural justice and the open courts principle require that litigation be conducted on notice, on the record, and in public. There are limited exceptions for emergencies and to protect children and other vulnerable people. None of the exceptions applies here. In this case, on no or very short notice to the Applicants, the Crown sought redactions of the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes, and a stay of my order should I order disclosure of anything.

[15] During oral argument on June 27, 2022, counsel for the Crown proposed that if I were to order disclosure of the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes, they should first be redacted to remove references to anything other than masking in schools. This was not addressed in the Crown's written brief. As far as I know, no notice of this proposal was provided to the Applicants' counsel.

[16] On June 29, 2022, counsel for the Crown delivered a letter to me, which does not appear to have been copied to the Applicants' counsel, and an e-mail to my assistant, which was copied to the Applicants' counsel. The letter and the e-mail were not filed so they would not ordinarily form part of the record accessible to the public. The specific communications to me, including the Applicants' counsel's reply are set out below.

Justice Dunlop,

Further to our appearance before you on June 27, 2022, the documents protected by public interest immunity have been delivered to your office this afternoon for review.

We have been advised that if you decide that all or part of the protected documents should be disclosed, our clients may apply for a stay of that decision pending an appeal. Accordingly, we wish to confirm that the documents will not be immediately released in whole or in part until sufficient time is provided for our clients to provide instructions on whether an Application and Appeal will be pursued. Given that these instructions will need to come from senior members of Executive Council, we would request that we be given five (5) business days to either file an Application and Appeal or disclose the records. Further, if an Application and Appeal is filed, we would request that the Court order the documents not be released until the stay Application is heard.

Thank you for your attention to this matter,

Steven

Dear Justice Dunlop:

We write further to Mr. Dollansky's email this afternoon, which we received by way of advance copy very shortly before 3 pm today. Our friends have received a similarly short notice copy of this correspondence.

The Crown (to adopt the Court's language) has had considerable notice of the possibility of disclosure of the records over which it claimed cabinet confidence. A five business day delay from notice of decision is excessive in the circumstances. Presumably instructions have already been or ought to have been sought respecting the potential of a stay / appeal if disclosure is directed. The Respondent is asking by way of email for this Court to grant an interim stay pending it even having instructions to file for a stay and bring an appeal. The Applicants object. If a stay is to be sought, a Civil Notice of Appeal and stay application ought to be filed and served as expeditiously as possible and certainly in less than five business days, which could amount to more than a week given the coming holiday weekend, assuming days begin to count on the day after a direction is made. We suggest two business days to file and serve is ample and otherwise are in the Court's hands to ensure a fair process and avoidance of collateral attacks.

Sincerely,

Sharon Roberts

[17] E-mails to a judge's assistant are appropriate for scheduling and other non-contentious matters. They are not an appropriate way to apply for substantive relief, because they are not on the record and they lack the structure of a filed application which ensures counsel for the opposite party has time to obtain instructions and respond. The Crown could have raised the issue of a stay of proceedings in its written brief submitted June 17, 2022 or during the hearing on June 27, 2022. Doing so by email on June 29, 2022 was irregular and unfair to the Applicants.

[18] I am not prepared to permit the Crown to redact everything from the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes except references to school masking for five reasons:

a) First, the Applicants had either no or inadequate notice of the Crown's application and the specific redactions they seek.

b) Second, the entire decision, CMOH 08-2022 is under review, and it covers more than masking in schools.

c) Third, Dr. Hinshaw certified that the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet Minutes are relevant to her decision, without limiting that to certain portions of those documents.

d) Fourth, counsel for the Crown conceded during oral argument on June 27, 2022 that the documents are relevant.

e) Fifth, the relationship between Cabinet decisions and Chief Medical Officer of Health orders is a central issue in this case, with the Applicants alleging improper delegation by the Chief Medical Officer of Health to the Cabinet, and the Crown arguing that the Cabinet makes policy decisions and Chief Medical Officer of Health implements those policy decisions through her orders. The broader context, beyond just masking in schools, is relevant to that issue.

[19] Given the Applicants' agreement that two business days is sufficient for the Crown to file and serve an application for a stay, I set the deadline for Dr. Hinshaw to file a further amended Certificate of Record attaching the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes at one week from the date of this decision, subject to any stay granted by me or the Court of Appeal. I am prepared to hear a stay application at any time on any weekday in the next seven days, except the morning of Friday, July 8, 2022, subject to counsel's agreement on a date and the availability of a WebEx courtroom. Also, if the Crown requires it, I grant leave to the Crown to apply directly to the Court of Appeal for a stay, without first seeking one from me, should the Crown wish to do so.

4. Disposition

[20] The Applicants' application for disclosure of the PowerPoint presentation and the Cabinet minutes is granted. Dr. Hinshaw shall file a further amended Certificate of Record attaching those documents within one week of this decision.

Heard on the 27th day of June, 2022.
Dated at the City of Edmonton, Alberta this 4th day of July, 2022.

Accused (Applicant)

Voir Dire* Reasons for Judgment
of the Honourable Mr. Justice K.D. Yamauchi

I. Introduction

[1] On May 31, 2010, the Crown charged Michael Erin Briscoe [the "Applicant"] by direct indictment with the following four offences under the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46 ["Criminal Code"]:

1. first degree murder of Ellie-May Meyer ["Meyer"], pursuant to Criminal Code s. 235(1);

2. first degree murder of Nina Louise Courtepatte ["Courtepatte"], pursuant to Criminal Code s. 235(1);

3. aggravated sexual assault of Courtepatte, pursuant to Criminal Code s. 273(2)(b); and

4. kidnapping of Courtepatte, pursuant to Criminal Code, s. 279.

[2] The Applicant's trial on these charges is scheduled to begin in February of 2012.

[3] By way of a pre-trial application, the Applicant seeks an order excluding certain statements he made to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police ["RCMP"] when they interviewed him on April 11, 2005, and on April 12, 2005. The Crown will seek to introduce the Applicant's statements into its evidence during the Applicant's trial. At the time he provided these statements to the RCMP officers, the RCMP had arrested the Applicant as part of its investigation into Courtepatte's murder. The statements occurred while the Applicant was detained at the RCMP detachment in Stony Plain, Alberta.

II. Background

[4] Although the background of this matter has little effect on the outcome of this pre-trial motion and the trial over which this Court will be presiding, the Applicant has asked this Court to consider certain matters that arose at a previous trial of the Applicant. As a result, this Court intends to provide a skeletal background of these earlier proceedings in which the Applicant was involved.

[5] The Applicant was prosecuted on four charges, including a count of first degree murder, arising from Courtepatte's death. The Crown had not yet charged the Applicant in relation to Meyer's death. In R. v. Briscoe, 2007 ABQB 196, 413 A.R. 53, Justice Burrows acquitted the Applicant. Subsequently, the Crown successfully appealed that acquittal. In R. v. Briscoe, 2008 ABCA 327, 437 A.R. 301, the Alberta Court of Appeal directed that the Applicant's acquittals be set aside and ordered that the Applicant be retried on all counts. The Supreme Court of Canada affirmed the Alberta Court of Appeal's decision in R. v. Briscoe, 2010 SCC 13, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 411. The application before this Court is part of the Applicant's retrial as ordered by the Supreme Court of Canada.

III. Preliminary Issue - Judicial Comity

[6] Justice Burrows, by way of a pre-trial motion in the initial trial of this matter, considered the same issues that are before this Court, viz., whether to exclude certain statements that the Applicant made to the RCMP on April 11, 2005, and April 12, 2005. In R. v. Briscoe, 2007 ABQB 48, 413 A.R. 29 [the "Burrows Voir Dire Decision"], Justice Burrows dismissed the Applicant's arguments concerning the common law "voluntariness" issues surrounding his statements. As well, with one exception, Justice Burrows dismissed the Applicant's arguments concerning the RCMP's alleged breach of his rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part 1, Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11 [the "Charter"]. The statement that Justice Burrows excluded from the trial evidence was part of Cst. Patrick Waldorf's interview of the Applicant that Cst. Waldorf conducted on April 12, 2005, from approximately 10:24 to 11:10 hours. Cst. Waldorf is now a staff sergeant, but this Court will take the liberty of referring to him in his capacity at the time of the events in question.

[7] While the Crown appealed Justice Burrows's 2007 trial acquittal, it did not allege that the Burrows Voir Dire Decision was incorrect for its exclusion of one of the Applicant's statements. As a consequence there has not been any appellate review or comment on the Burrows Voir Dire Decision.

[8] The Applicant argues that this Court should give the Burrows Voir Dire Decision significant weight in the present proceedings, based on "judicial comity." He argues that this Court could diverge from the Burrows Voir Dire Decision if this Court is satisfied that:

> (a) it has received evidence that is markedly different from the evidence that the parties presented to Justice Burrows, such that he would likely not have made the same decision had he received the same evidence; or
> (b) the law has changed in some significant way between the Burrows Voir Dire Decision and the present time, such that the Burrows Voir Dire Decision and its reasons are no longer correct.

The first aspect should not be an issue unless, during the voir dire before this Court, it hears evidence different from that which Justice Burrows received, provided the evidence is relevant and material to the issue before it.

[9] The Crown agrees with the Applicant that this Court should give the Burrows Voir Dire Decision significant weight in the present proceedings. It argues, however, that the law supporting the Burrows Voir Dire Decision has undergone significant changes.

[10] The Applicant provides this Court with Justice Thomas's decision in R. v. Perreault, 2010 ABQB 714 at paras. 127-37, 497 A.R. 168 in support of his argument that, based on judicial comity, this Court should give the Burrows Voir Dire Decision significant weight. In fact, Justice Thomas did not rule on the issue of whether he should grant comity to a judge of the same court. Rather, he specifically chose not to address the issue (at para. 138). He did comment on judicial comity and provided the "often cited rule" from Hansard Spruce Mills Ltd. (Re), [1954] 4 D.L.R. 590 at 592, 34 C.B.R. 202 (B.C.S.C.) where the court said:

> ... I will only go against a judgment of another judge of this Court if:
> (a) Subsequent decisions have affected the validity of the impugned judgment;
>
> (b) It is demonstrated that some binding authority in case law or some relevant statute was not considered;
>
> (c) The judgment was unconsidered, a nisi prius judgment given in circumstances familiar to all trial judges, where the exigencies of > the trial require an immediate decision without opportunity to fully consult authority.

As one can see from the "often cited rule," the court did not say that the law had to have changed in some "significant way." It simply said that "[s]ubsequent decisions have affected the validity of the impugned judgment." This is a lower standard.

[11] Justice Thomas said that judicial comity is "essentially a rule of practice developed in a court between judges who are peers" (at para. 135) and that it is a "collegial approach to how the decisions of its judges should be approached by their peers" (at para. 137).

[13] In R. v. Sipes, 2009 BCSC 285 the court described judicial comity as follows:

> [10] The approach advocated in Re Hansard Spruce Mills is not a rule of law; rather, it is a wise and prudent prescription for the exercise of judicial discretion. It will almost always be in the interests of justice for a judge to follow the decision of another judge of the same court on a question of law. Consistency, certainty, and judicial comity are all sound reasons why this is so. It is for the Court of Appeal to decide whether a judge of this Court has erred, not another judge of the Court.
> [11] In my view, both the rule in Re Hansard Spruce Mills and the exceptions to it are based on common sense and a consideration of the interests of justice. At all times, the application of the rule should advance the interests of justice, not undermine them. It is for this reason that I am also of the view that the determination as to whether to follow a decision of another judge of the same court should not begin and end with a rote application of Re Hansard Spruce Mills; instead, that determination should also be informed by all relevant factors that bear upon whether it is in the best interests of justice in the context of the particular case at hand to do so. ...

[14] This Court agrees with the approach, as stated in Sipes. It must have a principled reason for abiding by, or departing from, a judge of the same court. It must not do so blindly. Thus, whether this Court chooses to exercise judicial comity when it considers the Burrows Voir Dire Decision, it still must look at all relevant factors, including changes to the law caused by subsequent decisions or legislation, to determine whether it will deviate from that decision, or arrive at the same conclusion.

[15] As well, it is a well-established principle of law that a court applies the law, in a criminal as well as a civil context, based on the most recent binding court authority. For example, in Fullowka v. Pinkerton's of Canada Ltd., 2010 SCC 5 at paras. 93-94, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 132, the court applied the causation scheme that was indicated by a binding decision issued subsequent to the original trial. See also R. v. Ilesic, 2000 ABCA 254 at paras. 9-11; British Columbia v. Henfrey Samson Belair Ltd., [1989] 2 S.C.R. 24; Crane v. Brentridge Ford Sales Ltd., 2008 ABCA 216 at para. 11; R. v. Tkachuk, 2001 ABCA 66. In that sense, Justice Burrows's conclusion in the Burrows Voir Dire Decision was not necessarily incorrect given the state of the law at the time he issued that decision. However, subsequent developments in the law may require this Court to arrive at a different conclusion.

IV. Evidence

[16] A number of RCMP officers provided this Court with testimony concerning the issues before this Court.

A. Constable Brophy

[17] Cst. Kelly Brophy was the officer who arrested the Applicant on April 11, 2005. He arrested the Applicant at the motel room in which the Applicant was living at the time. The arrest took place at 11:37 hours. When Cst. Brophy arrested the Applicant, the Applicant appeared to Cst. Brophy to be surprised, but not agitated. The Applicant was not belligerent and cooperated fully with Cst. Brophy's commands. Cst. Brophy advised the Applicant that he was arresting the Applicant for murder, but he did not say the name of the victim.

[18] Cst. Brophy handcuffed the Applicant and checked the Applicant for any weapons. He then allowed the Applicant to dress. Cst. Brophy then escorted the Applicant to the unmarked police cruiser Cst. Brophy was driving. Once they were in the police cruiser, Cst. Brophy outlined for the Applicant the Applicant's Charter rights from a card that Cst. Brophy carried. Cst. Brophy read into the record the text on that card, which included a detained person's right to counsel and the right to remain silent. When Cst. Brophy asked the Applicant whether he understood his rights, the Applicant responded in the affirmative. The Applicant specifically stated that he wanted to contact a lawyer. During this time, Cst. Waldorf joined the Applicant and Cst. Brophy in the police cruiser. Cst. Brophy also testified that after he read what was on the card, he would repeat the detained person's Charter rights and caution in plain language. This was his normal practice, especially if he was concerned that the detained person had not understood what was happening. He testified that, in this case, the Applicant understood both the explanation from the card, as well as his plain language explanation.

[19] Cst. Brophy, Cst. Waldorf and the Applicant left the motel at 11:50 hours and headed to the Stony Plain RCMP detachment. Neither Cst. Brophy nor Cst. Waldorf had any discussion with the Applicant while they were in the police cruiser. At 12:10 hours, Cst. Brophy completed the booking procedure and placed the Applicant in a cell at 12:22 hours to wait for a telephone room to become available, so the Applicant could contact counsel.

[20] A telephone room became available at 12:49 hours. Cst. Brophy took the Applicant to the telephone room and reminded the Applicant that he was under arrest for murder. Cst. Brophy asked the Applicant with whom he wished to speak and the Applicant responded that he wanted to call Mr. Bruce Lennon. Cst. Brophy called operator assistance to obtain Mr. Lennon's telephone number, then dialed it for the Applicant. Cst. Brophy testified that he dialed Mr. Lennon's telephone number, as he wanted to make sure that the Applicant was going to speak with a lawyer. Mr. Lennon's office was closed.

[21] As there was no answer, Cst. Brophy then asked the Applicant whether he wanted to speak with another lawyer. The Applicant chose to speak with Mr. Michele Fontaine, whom the Applicant selected from the Legal Aid list. Again, Cst. Brophy dialed the telephone number and reached Mr. Fontaine's secretary, who gave Cst. Brophy Mr. Fontaine's cellular telephone number. Cst. Brophy dialed that number and reached Mr. Fontaine, who identified himself. Cst. Brophy gave the telephone to the Applicant and then, to give the Applicant privacy, Cst. Brophy left the Applicant alone in the telephone room. Cst. Brophy shut the telephone room door. All this occurred at 12:57 hours.

[22] The telephone room had a steel door, with a glass window and a slider on the window. It was a small room, which had telephone books and the Legal Aid number pasted on the wall. Cst. Brophy moved down the hall to a guard desk and completed his notes as to what had transpired during that morning. He was about 20 feet from telephone room. As was his practice, he asked the Applicant to knock on the telephone room door when the Applicant had completed his call. After about three minutes, the Applicant said he was done. When Cst. Brophy asked the Applicant whether he was satisfied with the advice he had received from Mr. Fontaine, the Applicant responded in the affirmative. He told Cst. Brophy that Mr. Fontaine had told him to say nothing. The Applicant did not say that he wanted to speak with other counsel, nor did the Applicant again say he wanted to speak with Mr. Lennon.

[23] Cst. Brophy then returned the Applicant to the cells and locked the Applicant in a cell at 13:01 hours. Cst. Brophy went back to his desk to prepare for a number of interviews, including the interview he was going to conduct on the Applicant that afternoon. During the period from 13:01 hours to 14:57 hours, Cst. Brophy had no contact with the Applicant. The Applicant remained in his cell.

[24] At 14:57 hours, Cst. Brophy removed the Applicant from his cell for an interview. Cst. Brophy took the Applicant to a secure interview room that was monitored by audio and video. He had no other discussion with the Applicant before taking him to the interview room. Cst. Waldorf monitored the interview. The videotape of Cst. Brophy's interview with the Applicant that this Court observed commenced at 14:57 hours. The interview continued until 18:56 hours.

[25] Cst. Brophy took two breaks, which allowed the Applicant to use the washroom facilities. These breaks also gave Cst. Brophy time to meet with his colleagues to ensure that he was obtaining the information necessary to continue with the investigation. During each break, Cst. Brophy returned the Applicant to his cell. They did not communicate with each other while outside the interview room.

[26] Although Cst. Brophy thought that he had completed the interview for the day, the Applicant asked to see Cst. Brophy again at 19:45 hours. Cst. Brophy did not obtain any further information from the Applicant between 18:56 and 19:45 hours. The Applicant wanted to discuss his safety with Cst. Brophy. After this brief discussion, at 19:52 hours, Cst. Brophy took the Applicant back to the telephone room, as the Applicant asked if he could try to reach Mr. Lennon. Again, they were not able to reach Mr. Lennon, so Cst. Brophy took the Applicant back to his cell. The Applicant used the same telephone number they had used previously to try to contact Mr. Lennon. Cst. Brophy received no information from the Applicant as to whether the Applicant left a message for Mr. Lennon.

[27] At no time did Cst. Brophy and the Applicant discuss whether Mr. Lennon was the Applicant's lawyer. The Applicant did not indicate that was the case. Cst. Brophy was under the impression that Mr. Lennon's name was the only lawyer's name the Applicant knew. The Applicant did not ask to speak with other counsel.

[28] Cst. Brophy arrived at the RCMP detachment on the morning of April 12, 2005, and began preparing for his daily tasks, which did not include speaking with the Applicant. At 8:57 hours, the Applicant asked to speak with Cst. Brophy. Cst. Brophy took the Applicant into the interview room, which was audio and videotaped. The videotape that this Court viewed did not start immediately at the beginning of the interview. Cst. Brophy could not explain why the beginning of the videotape recording was missing. He testified during cross-examination that the missing portion would have been about one-minute long and during that time he would have been talking "about 99% of that time." Cst. Brophy conceded that he might have insulted the Applicant during that unrecorded period but, he testified that he did not threaten the Applicant, make any promises, or provide any inducements to the Applicant in exchange for evidence. Cst. Brophy was adamant in this regard.

[29] Viewing the videotape of this interview, it is clear that Cst. Brophy adopted a more aggressive tack, and he confirmed this in his testimony before this Court. This tack was evident on the videotape, but Cst. Brophy's approach was simply to raise his voice, which he did for virtually the whole interview. He did not yell at the Applicant, pace around the room, or bang on the table. He just spoke with a louder voice and said, for example:

> Cst. Brophy: ... So you wanna talk to me right now. Let's go. Let's have it. Let's have what you never told me last night. The stuff that you left out, get started. Let's have it.

> Cst. Brophy: ... Now smarten up and start tellin' me exactly what happened, and stop beating around the bush.
> Cst. Brophy: Look, I'm not here to, to make conversation. I don't have time for this. I got a lot more stuff to be doing than sitting here, listening to you talkin' in circles. Now if you got somethin' to say, spit it out.
> Transcript of the Applicant's Statements, April 12, 2005, p. 2, ll. 9-10; p. 2, ll. 18-19, p. 8, ll. 191-93.

Cst. Brophy felt that the information that the Applicant was providing to him lacked detail, and that the Applicant was being evasive. Cst. Brophy testified he felt that the best way to get this information from the Applicant was to adopt this aggressive approach.

[30] This interview ended 24 minutes later at 9:21 hours. Cst. Brophy returned the Applicant to his cell. As the interview ended, the following exchange took place between Cst. Brophy and the Applicant:

> Applicant: . . . I want to make a phone call to my lawyer, I never got a chance to do that.
> Cst. Brophy: Yeah, this morning you can call your lawyer again. You called your lawyer yesterday.
>
> Applicant: I didn't have, my lawyer's not that person. . . .
> Transcript of the Applicant's Statements, April 12, 2005, p. 13, ll. 369-72, p. 14, l.1

[31] Cst. Brophy spoke briefly with Cst. Waldorf, who was the next RCMP officer to interview the Applicant. They decided that Cst. Waldorf would attempt to build a rapport with the Applicant. Cst. Brophy took the Applicant back to the interview room at 10:24 hours to meet with Cst. Waldorf.

[32] Cst. Brophy again had contact with the Applicant at 11:27 hours, when the Applicant said that he wanted to call a lawyer to deal with his judicial interim release application. The Applicant specifically wanted to call Mr. Lennon. Cst. Brophy assisted the Applicant in dialing Mr. Lennon's telephone number. Mr. Lennon was in court, so Cst. Brophy left a message, asking Mr. Lennon to return the call on Cst. Brophy's cellular telephone. Mr. Lennon called Cst. Brophy at 14:10 hours. Cst. Brophy retrieved the Applicant from his cell, placed him in the telephone room and left the Applicant alone with Mr. Lennon to complete his call.

B. Constable Waldorf

[33] Cst. Waldorf was Cst. Brophy's partner at the time Cst. Brophy arrested the Applicant. By the time Cst. Waldorf had returned to the police cruiser immediately following the Applicant's arrest, Cst. Brophy was in the driver's seat, and the Applicant was in the rear of police cruiser. Cst. Waldorf heard Cst. Brophy reading to the Applicant the "Charter and caution." The Applicant responded in the affirmative concerning his understanding the reason for his arrest, his Charter rights and the caution. While they were driving to the Stony Plain RCMP detachment, Cst. Waldorf heard the Applicant making various utterances concerning his work and his back ailment. These were not in response to any questions posed by either Cst. Brophy or Cst. Waldorf. In fact, Cst. Waldorf testified that it is his practice to "not engage the suspect" during this period, as nothing is recorded, and he must allow the detainee to first call a lawyer, if the detainee has so requested.

[34] Once they arrived at the Stony Plain RCMP detachment, Cst. Brophy exited the vehicle. While the Applicant and Cst. Waldorf were in the vehicle, the Applicant continued his utterances, but none were in response to any questions or comments that Cst. Waldorf made to the Applicant. Once the Applicant was removed from the police cruiser, Cst. Waldorf conducted a pat-down search of the Applicant. Cst. Waldorf also provided testimony concerning the booking procedure and the implementation phase of the Applicant's right to counsel, which does not differ from that which Cst. Brophy provided.

[35] Cst. Waldorf monitored Cst. Brophy's April 11, 2005 interview of the Applicant. The only portions that Cst. Waldorf did not monitor were those when he took breaks to use the washroom facilities.

[36] Cst. Waldorf interviewed the Applicant on the morning of April 12, 2005, following his interview of another accused, Stephanie Bird. The interview started at 10:24 hours. Immediately before that, Cst Waldorf had heard that the rapport between Cst. Brophy and the Applicant had broken down and that the Applicant wanted to speak with a different officer. He had no discussion with the Applicant before the interview began. Cst. Waldorf's interview with the Applicant began as follows:

> Cst. Waldorf: You remember me from yesterday, right? I'm Pat.
> Applicant: I'm scared shitless, man.
>
> Cst. Waldorf: You are?
>
> Applicant: Yes.
> Cst. Waldorf: I understand. I understand totally what you're saying. I also understand you were talkin' to another guy, and you don't wanna talk to him anymore.

Applicant: He doesn't, he's not. I don't know what.

Cst. Waldorf: What's the, what's the problem there? What's?

Applicant: He's, he's being so fuckin', and I can't think straight.

Cst. Waldorf: Okay.

Applicant: And he said he was gonna keep me and my friend safe right, if I, if I helped out or whatever, and.

Cst. Waldorf: Okay. Well, I don't know anything about that. But listen now, and I know, I understand you're talkin' about you wanna call a lawyer, okay? My understanding from being around here yesterday, you, you spoke to somebody already, right?

Applicant: Right.

Cst. Waldorf: Okay.

Applicant: Thirty seconds, but that wasn't my lawyer.

Cst. Waldorf: Okay. It was a lawyer, I understand though eh, it was a lawyer, right?

Applicant: Yeah.

Cst. Waldorf: Good enough. Okay. Listen. I just wanna cover off a few things here with you, okay?

Applicant: Okay.

Transcript of the Applicant's Statements, April 12, 2005, p. 14, ll. 388-99, p. 15, ll. 400-411

[37] The friend who the Applicant referenced is a co-accused Stephanie Bird.

[38] The Applicant did not ask for, and was not given an opportunity to contact counsel at any time during Cst. Waldorf's interview of him.

C. Constable McCoshen

[39] Cst. Leonard McCoshen, as he then was (he is now a corporal, but this Court will take the liberty of referring to him in his capacity at the time of the events before this Court), was an undercover police officer at the time the Applicant was arrested. He was placed in the cell with the Applicant as a "cell plant." He was contacted to attend at the Stony Plain RCMP detachment and, soon after he arrived, he was placed in the Applicant's cell. He testified that there was no time to obtain a judicial authorization to record his conversations with the Applicant.

[40] Cst. McCoshen testified that his training did not allow him to elicit information from a detained person on the topic under investigation. Cst. McCoshen used the term "passive investigation," in which he would listen to the detainee's words and statements. Cst. Robert Teufel confirmed this methodology. Cst. Teufel's confirmation is contained on page 157, lines 35-40, of a transcript of Cst. Teufel's evidence that he presented to Justice Burrows during the Applicant's first trial. The transcript of Cst. Teufel's evidence is attached to an agreed statement of facts that the parties provided to this Court dated December 4, 2011.

[42] Cst. McCoshen provided this Court with a summary of the conversations he had with the Applicant, most of which is not relevant to this application. He did, however, testify that the Applicant denied that he murdered Courtepatte, and that throughout the ordeal, he was concerned with his safety and that of his girlfriend, Ms. Bird.

[43] For the purposes of this application, the Applicant told Cst. McCoshen at 9:34 hours on April 12, 2005, that he wanted to call his lawyer, as he was concerned that a lawyer would not be present at his first appearance and he would not be able to get bail. It was Cst. McCoshen's belief, at that time, that the Applicant had spoken to a lawyer and had understood his constitutional rights, but the Applicant was concerned which lawyer would be attending his bail hearing.

[44] The Applicant also told Cst. McCoshen that if the Crown offered him a short sentence, he would take it. Later, the Applicant retracted that statement and said that he would wait and fight it out in court.

D. The Applicant

[45] The Applicant did not testify at the voir dire. That means this Court has no evidence that he subjectively felt threatened during any of his interviews.

V. Issues

[46] The Applicant raises three issues:

A. whether the Applicant's statements following the "missing" portion of the videotape were voluntary;

B. whether the fact that there was no recording and, thus, no transcript of Cst. McCoshen's conversations with the Applicant, results in unfairness to the Applicant; and

C. whether Cst. Brophy or Cst. Waldorf, or both of them, breached the Applicant's Charter s. 10(b) rights by not allowing him to contact his counsel of choice immediately following Cst. Brophy's interview with him on April 12, 2005, and preceding his interview with Cst. Waldorf.

VI. Analysis

A. The "Missing" Portion of the Videotape

[47] On the morning of April 12, 2005, Cst. Brophy had no intention of interviewing the Applicant. The Applicant, however, asked to see Cst. Brophy, so Cst. Brophy agreed to meet with the Applicant. This meeting was audio and video recorded. Cst. Brophy testified that he chose to take a more aggressive approach with the Applicant.

[48] There is no doubt that the Crown must show that the Applicant made his statements voluntarily: R. v. Oickle, 2000 SCC 38 at para. 30, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 3. He must not have made his statements as a result of the RCMP threatening him, or providing him with inappropriate promises or inducements: Oickle, at paras. 48-57.

[49] Furthermore, it is clear that this Court's inquiry as to whether the Applicant provided his statements to Cst. Brophy is contextual and this Court must consider all of the relevant circumstances that touch on the issue of whether the Applicant provided his statements to Cst. Brophy voluntarily: Oickle at para. 47; R. v. Moore-McFarlane (2001), 47 C.R. (5th) 203 at para. 64, 56 O.R. (3d) 737 (Ont. C.A.). If the RCMP provides this Court with an unreliable record, such as where it fails to videotape an interview, when such facilities are available, the non-recorded interrogation may be "suspect": Moore-McFarlane at para. 65; R. v. Ahmed (2002), 166 O.A.C. 254, 170 C.C.C. (3d) 27 (Ont. C.A.). In such a case, this Court must determine whether Cst. Brophy's testimony is a sufficient substitute for the videotaped recording, such that it will satisfy the Crown's onus: Moore-McFarlane at para. 65.

[50] This Court finds that the Applicant made none of his statements to Cst. Brophy as a result of any threats, promises or inducements. To this extent, this Court agrees with the Burrows Voir Dire Decision. There are a number of things to note concerning the "missing" portion of the videotape:

1. It was the Applicant who asked to see Cst. Brophy. Cst. Brophy had no intention of visiting with the Applicant that day (except, perhaps, to deal with the Applicant's judicial interim release, although that is not clear).

2. When the videotape started, after the "missing" portion, there is nothing which indicates that the Applicant was intimidated (which might indicate that Cst. Brophy threatened him), or enthusiastic about responding to Cst. Brophy's inquiries (which might indicate that Cst. Brophy provided the Applicant with an inducement or other promise). In fact, the Applicant's affect changed little from the day before. He provided little in the way of information that clarified or bolstered the information he provided to Cst. Brophy on April 11, 2005, despite Cst. Brophy's "more aggressive" approach.

[51] This Court has no doubt that the statements the Applicant made to Cst. Brophy on the morning of April 12, 2005, were voluntary. Cst. Brophy was a forthright and credible witness. For example, he readily admitted that he might have insulted the Applicant during the "missing" portion of the videotape. Thus, this Court accepts Cst. Brophy's testimony in its entirety that he did not threaten the Applicant, or make to the Applicant any promises, or provide the Applicant with any inducements. As well, it accepts Cst. Brophy's testimony that the "missing" portion of the videotape involved a very short period, in which he did most of the talking. As a result, this Court agrees with the conclusions that Justice Burrows reached in the Burrows Voir Dire Decision.

B. The "Cell Plant" Conversations

[52] When this Court inquired of the Crown on its intended use for Cst. McCoshen's testimony, the Crown responded that it would not directly use that testimony in the trial proper. Rather, Cst. McCoshen's testimony was advanced only for cross-examination purposes. Thus, it is premature for this Court to rule on the admissibility of the "cell plant" conversations.

[53] However, for the purposes of assisting counsel on how this Court might approach the issue of whether it would permit the Crown to use Cst. McCoshen's testimony, this Court sees no unfairness in permitting the Crown to enter this testimony into the trial proper. The extent to which this testimony is of use to this Court will be a question of the weight it places on Cst. McCoshen's testimony:

- Is the testimony reliable?
- Does the testimony have any probative value to this Court's determination of an issue it will face in the trial proper?
- To what extent is Cst. McCoshen's testimony prejudicial to the Applicant, as against its probative value?

[54] Like many of the issues that this Court faces in this pre-trial application, this Court must respond to these questions by taking a contextual approach. As stated in the head note of R. v. Harrer, 1995 CarswellBC 651 (S.C.C.), which accurately summarizes the majority's decision:

> If the admission of crucial evidence, such as the out-of-court self-incriminatory statement, would violate the principles of fundamental justice, the trial would not be fair. The concepts of "fairness" and "principles of fundamental justice" vary with the context in which they are invoked. There is a delicate balance in accommodating the interests of the individual and those of the state in providing a fair and workable system of justice.

[55] In the result, this Court would admit Cst. McCoshen's testimony, but will determine the weight it places on that testimony if it is required so to do.

C. The Applicant's Charter s. 10(b) Rights

1. Introduction

[56] Charter s. 10(b) provides:

> 10. Everyone has the right on arrest or detention
>
> ...
> (b) to retain and instruct counsel without delay and to be informed of that right; and

2. The Initial Consultation with Counsel

[57] When Cst. Brophy arrested the Applicant, he advised the Applicant of his right to counsel. This Court finds that the Applicant stated that he wanted to contact counsel immediately on being advised of this right. Neither Cst. Brophy nor any of the other members of the RCMP had any discussions with the Applicant from the time of his arrest until the Applicant arrived at the Stony Plain RCMP detachment. During this time, the Applicant made unprompted utterances. Immediately on their arrival, and after the Applicant was processed, Cst. Brophy took the Applicant to the telephone room. Although the Applicant, with Cst. Brophy's assistance, was unable to contact Mr. Lennon, the Applicant spoke to Mr. Fontaine. He did so in private.

> This court has said on numerous previous occasions that s. 10(b) of the Charter imposes the following duties on state authorities who arrest or detain a person:
> (1) to inform the detainee of his or her right to retain and instruct counsel without delay and of the existence and availability of legal aid and duty counsel;

> (2) if a detainee has indicated a desire to exercise this right, to provide the detainee with a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right (except in urgent and dangerous circumstances); and
> (3) to refrain from eliciting evidence from the detainee until he or she has had that reasonable opportunity (again, except in cases of urgency or danger).

[59] Justice Berger in R. v. Luong, 2000 ABCA 301, 271 A.R. 368 at para. 12, provides a consolidated restatement of the nature and obligations that result from Charter s. 10(b):

> 1. The onus is upon the person asserting a violation of his or her Charter right to establish that the right as guaranteed by the Charter has been infringed or denied.
> 2. Section 10(b) imposes both informational and implementational duties on state authorities who arrest or detain a person.
> 3. The informational duty is to inform the detainee of his or her right to retain and instruct counsel without delay and of the existence and availability of Legal Aid and duty counsel.
> 4. The implementational duties are two-fold and arise upon the detainee indicating a desire to exercise his or her right to counsel.
> 5. The first implementational duty is "to provide the detainee with a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right (except in urgent and dangerous circumstances)". R. v. Bartle (1994), 92 C.C.C. (3d) 289 (S.C.C.) at 301.
>
> 6. The second implementational duty is "to refrain from eliciting evidence from the detainee until he or she has had that reasonable opportunity (again, except in cases of urgency or danger)". R. v. Bartle, supra, at 301.
> 7. A trial judge must first determine whether or not, in all of the circumstances, the police provided the detainee with a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right to counsel; the Crown has the burden of establishing that the detainee who invoked the right to counsel was provided with a reasonable opportunity to exercise the right.

8. If the trial judge concludes that the first implementation duty was breached, an infringement is made out.

9. If the trial judge is persuaded that the first implementation duty has been satisfied, only then will the trial judge consider whether the detainee, who has invoked the right to counsel, has been reasonably diligent in exercising it; the detainee has the burden of establishing that he was reasonably diligent in the exercise of his rights. R. v. Smith, (1989), 50 C.C.C. (3d) 308 (S.C.C.) at 315-16 and 323.

10. If the detainee, who has invoked the right to counsel, is found not to have been reasonably diligent in exercising it, the implementation duties either do not arise in the first place or will be suspended. R. v. Tremblay (1987), 37 C.C.C. (3d) 565 (S.C.C.) at 568; R. v. Ross (1989), 46 C.C.C. (3d) 129 (S.C.C.) at 135; R. v. Black (1989), 50 C.C.C. (3d) 1 (S.C.C.) at 13; R. v. Smith, supra, at 314; R. v. Bartle, supra, at 301 and R. v. Prosper (1994), 92 C.C.C. (3d) 353 (S.C.C.) at 375-381 and 400-401. In such circumstances, no infringement is made out.

11. Once a detainee asserts his or her right to counsel and is duly diligent in exercising it, (having been afforded a reasonable opportunity to exercise it), if the detainee indicates that he or she has changed his or her mind and no longer wants legal advice, the Crown is required to prove a valid waiver of the right to counsel. In such a case, state authorities have an additional informational obligation to "tell the detainee of his or her right to a reasonable opportunity to contact a lawyer and of the obligation on the part of the police during this time not to take any statements or require the detainee to participate in any potentially incriminating process until he or she has had that reasonable opportunity" (sometimes referred to as a "Prosper warning"). R. v. Prosper, supra, at 378-79. Absent such a warning, an infringement is made out.

[60] This Court finds that Cst. Brophy complied with the Bartle exhortation. Cst. Brophy did not breach the Applicant's Charter rights in this regard. In fact, Cst. Brophy went further. Following the second part of the first interview with the Applicant, at 19:52 hours on April 11, 2005, the Applicant asked if he could try and reach Mr. Lennon. Cst. Brophy complied immediately with the Applicant's request.

[61] The Applicant conceded during argument that he has no issue with the steps that Cst. Brophy took on April 11, 2005. In other words, he does not allege that the RCMP breached his Charter s. 10(b) rights or the voluntariness of any of his statements that he provided to Cst. Brophy on that day.

3. Alleged Breach of the Applicant's Charter s. 10(b) Rights

[62] The parties spent the majority of their time arguing the issue of whether Cst. Brophy and, later, Cst. Waldorf, breached the Applicant's Charter s. 10(b) rights.

[63] In the Burrows Voir Dire Decision, Justice Burrows provided the exchange between Cst. Waldorf and the Applicant, set forth above. He then concluded:

> 44 ... [I]t is clear in the excerpt just set out that Mr. Briscoe wanted an opportunity to speak to a lawyer. For the first time he indicated dissatisfaction with the contact he had had with a lawyer the previous day. Constable Waldorf said his conversation with a lawyer the previous day was "good enough". Though he did not expressly state that Mr. Briscoe would not be allowed to contact a lawyer, he went on to question him and in fact, did not honour Mr. Briscoe's clear request.
> 45 In my view this was a violation of Mr. Briscoe's right to counsel.

[64] It is at this point that this Court must consider whether Hansard Spruce Mills applies such that it "will only go against a judgment of another judge of this Court" on the basis that "subsequent decisions have affected the validity of [the Burrows Voir Dire Decision]." After Justice Burrows provided us with the Burrows Voir Dire Decision, the Supreme Court of Canada delivered its decisions in R. v. Sinclair, 2010 SCC 35, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 310, R. v. McCrimmon, 2010 SCC 36, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 402, and R. v. Willier, 2010 SCC 37, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 429 [collectively, the "Counsel Trilogy"], which all dealt with the implementation requirements of Charter s. 10(b). The Applicant argues that none of the Counsel Trilogy applies to the case before this Court, and he distinguishes each of them, based on their facts. Thus, this Court must present a very brief overview of each of the Counsel Trilogy.

a. R. v. Sinclair, 2010 SCC 35, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 310

[65] In Sinclair, the police arrested the accused for the second degree murder of another individual. On his arrest, the police advised the accused that they were arresting him for the killing, that he had the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay, that he could call any lawyer he wanted, and that a Legal Aid lawyer would be available free of charge (para. 5). When the police asked the accused whether he wanted to call a lawyer, he responded, "Not right this second." (para. 5). The police then took the accused to the police detachment, with assurances that he would have another opportunity to contact counsel once they got there.

whom he had retained to defend him on an unrelated charge (para. 6). The police placed the call and the accused spoke with that lawyer by telephone in a private room for about three minutes. The police officer asked the accused whether he was satisfied with the call, to which the accused replied, “Yeah, he's taking my case.” (para. 6). About three hours later, the police officer called that lawyer to find out if he was coming to the police station to meet with the accused. The lawyer said he would not be attending at the station because he did not yet have a Legal Aid retainer, but he asked to speak with the accused again by telephone (para. 7). That resulted in another three-minute phone call with the accused in a private room. Afterwards, the accused again told police officer that he was satisfied with the call (para. 7).

[67] A different police officer interviewed the accused later that day for about five hours. Before that interview began, that officer confirmed with the accused that he had been advised of, and had exercised, his right to counsel. The officer also warned the accused that he did not have to say anything and informed him that the interview was being recorded and could be used in court (para. 8). As the interview began, the accused said that he had nothing to say until his lawyer was present (para. 8). The officer confirmed that the accused indeed had the right not to speak. The officer also said that, as he understood Canadian law, the accused had the right to consult his lawyer but did not have the right to have the lawyer present during questioning (para. 8). The officer continued to interview the accused by attempting to build trust with the accused while eliciting some preliminary information.

[68] Later, the accused again expressed discomfort with the officer interviewing him in the absence of his lawyer. The officer repeated that the accused had the right to choose whether to talk or not to talk. The officer also expressed the view that the police had already satisfied the accused’s right to counsel by the earlier telephone calls. This explanation seemed to satisfy the accused (para. 9).

[70] Eventually, the accused made incriminating statements (para. 11). After that, the officer returned the accused to his cell, where he made further incriminating statements to a “cell plant” (para. 12).

[71] The ratio decidendi of Sinclair is best summarized by an introductory paragraph that explains the judgment’s subject and rationale:

> 2 We conclude that s. 10(b) does not mandate the presence of defence counsel throughout a custodial interrogation. We further conclude that in most cases, an initial warning, coupled with a reasonable opportunity to consult > counsel when the detainee invokes the right, satisfies s. 10(b). However, the police must give the detainee an additional opportunity to receive advice from counsel where developments in the course of the investigation make this necessary to serve the purpose underlying s. 10(b) of providing the detainee with legal advice relevant to his right to choose whether to cooperate with the police investigation or not. To date, this principle has led to the recognition of the right to a second consultation with a lawyer where changed circumstances result from: new procedures involving the detainee; a change in the jeopardy facing the detainee; or reason to believe that the first information provided was deficient. The categories are not closed.

[72] The Applicant argues that the most important factual difference between Sinclair and the case before this Court is that the accused in Sinclair was able to consult with his counsel of choice before the police interviewed him. In the case before this Court, the Applicant was not able to reach Mr. Lennon, his apparent counsel of choice. Furthermore, the Applicant argues, the Supreme Court of Canada did not indicate how courts should respond to situations where the police hold out to a detainee the prospect of future consultations with counsel and then, when the detainee asks for such access, the police do not allow the detainee to contact counsel.

[74] The police then took the accused to the police detachment where he provided the police with the name of a lawyer with whom he wished to speak. A police officer called that lawyer's office, but was unable to reach him and left a message on the answering machine. The officer did not attempt to find the lawyer's home telephone number, nor did the accused ask the officer to do so (para. 7). The accused said to the officer, "I don't know if I'll hear back from him. Like I said, I only used him once. He's the only guy I know. I've never really dealt with a lawyer before." The officer then asked the accused if he would like to call a Legal Aid lawyer, to which he replied, "Well, yes, definitely, but I prefer Mr. Cheevers." The accused then spoke privately with duty counsel for approximately five minutes. At the end of his conversation, the accused confirmed that he was satisfied with the consultation and that he understood the advice that duty counsel provided to him (para. 7).

[75] A different officer then took the accused into an interview room and spoke with him for about three hours and twenty minutes. At the outset, the accused confirmed having spoken with a Legal Aid lawyer, and said the Legal Aid lawyer advised him that he did not have to say anything to the police (para. 8). The officer affirmed the accused's right to silence, cautioned him that anything he said could be used against him, and commenced with the investigative interview (para. 8).

[76] When the officer turned to the incidents under investigation, the accused stated that he did not want to discuss the topic until he had spoken with his lawyer, but, at the same time, indicated that he did not mind speaking with the officer. The officer told the accused that he had the choice to talk or not to talk, but that he could not have his lawyer in the interview room with him. The officer revealed possible incriminating evidence that the investigation had discovered. The accused repeated his request to speak to his own lawyer (para. 9). The officer declined this request, stating his understanding that the accused had already exercised his right to counsel by speaking to duty counsel and had expressed satisfaction with the advice he had received. The accused asked to be taken back to his cell, indicating that he was not going to answer any more questions (para. 9). The officer continued in his attempts to persuade the accused to discuss the incidents under investigation. The officer interspersed his remarks with references to what the police knew about the incident and referring to witness statements. The accused insisted that he would not speak without his lawyer, stating "my voice will be heard in the end, with my lawyer." (para. 10). The officer affirmed that the accused had a right to exercise his right to silence and that he did not have "to keep repeating it ... to get that." (para. 10). Eventually, the accused made a number of statements implicating himself in the offences (para. 11).

[77] The Supreme Court of Canada's ratio decidendi in McCrimmon is explained in these introductory paragraphs:

> 3 ... [W]e reject Mr. McCrimmon's submission that s. 10(b) requires the presence, upon request, of defence counsel during a custodial interrogation. We also agree with the courts below that no s. 10(b) violation ensued from the failure to provide him with an opportunity to consult with the particular lawyer of his choice prior to the interrogation or from the denial of his requests for further consultation during the course of the interrogation. As explained in Sinclair, the police may provide the detainee with any number of opportunities to consult with counsel. However, they are constitutionally required to do so only where developments in the course of the interrogation make this necessary to serve the purpose underlying s. 10(b) of providing the detainee with legal advice relevant to his right to choose whether to cooperate with the police investigation or not. Where no such change occurs, the better approach is to continue to deal with claims of subjective incapacity or intimidation under the confessions rule.
> 4 In this case, there was no change in circumstances triggering a right to renewed consultation with counsel. Further, the trial judge properly considered any impact on Mr. McCrimmon arising from the police's refusals to facilitate further contacts with counsel in assessing the voluntariness of the statements. We see no reason to interfere with the trial judge's conclusion that the statements were voluntary or his dismissal of the Charter application.

[Emphasis added.]

[78] The Applicant concedes that there are similarities between the facts in McCrimmon and the facts before this Court. He argues, however, that in McCrimmon, it does not appear that the police ever told the accused that, on his request, he would be allowed further access to legal counsel. In the case before this Court, Cst. Waldorf knew that the Applicant had yet to speak with his apparent counsel of choice. Yet, Cst. Waldorf refused to allow the Applicant any further access to counsel before proceeding with the interview.

c. R. v. Willier*, 2010 SCC 37, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 429*

[79] In Willier, the police arrested the accused for the murder of an individual. The police took the accused to a hospital, because the accused told the police that he had taken a number of pills (para. 8). While in the emergency ward, the police informed the accused of the reason for his arrest, and of his right to retain and instruct a lawyer without delay (para. 9). They told the accused that he could call any lawyer he wanted, informed him of the availability of free duty counsel, and provided him with a telephone book and the toll-free number for Legal Aid (para. 9).

[80] After the accused was released from the hospital at approximately midnight, the police took him to the police detachment. When they again informed him of his right to counsel, he asked to speak to a free lawyer. The accused had a three-minute conversation with duty counsel, following which he was returned to his cell for the night (para. 10).

[81] The next morning, a Sunday, another officer confirmed with the accused that he had spoken with a lawyer the night before and offered him another opportunity to contact counsel. The accused indicated that he wanted to speak with a specific lawyer (para. 11). The officer dialed that lawyer's telephone number, passed the telephone to the accused, and left the accused in the room so he could leave a message on the lawyer's answering machine. After the accused hung up the telephone, the officer asked him if he wanted to contact another lawyer. He declined the offer, indicating that his preference was to wait (para. 9). After the officer informed him that the lawyer the accused attempted to call would not likely be available until the next day, and of the immediate availability of Legal Aid, the accused opted to speak with duty counsel a second time. After a brief one-minute conversation with a Legal Aid lawyer, the police returned the accused to his cell (paras. 10-11).

[82] About 50 minutes later, a different officer initiated an investigative interview with the accused. After confirming the accused's prior consultations with Legal Aid, the officer again informed the accused of his right to retain and instruct counsel and offered him another opportunity to contact a lawyer before continuing with the interview (para. 12). The accused indicated that he was satisfied with the advice he had received from Legal Aid. The officer repeated the caution that the accused had the right to remain silent (para. 12). The officer indicated that he would proceed with the interview, but that the accused would be free at any time during the interview to stop and call a lawyer. Thereafter, the accused did not stop the interview. During the ensuing exchange, the accused made incriminatory statements (para. 12).

>
>
> 35 Should detainees opt to exercise the right to counsel by speaking with a specific lawyer, s. 10(b) entitles them to a reasonable opportunity to contact their chosen counsel prior to police questioning. If the chosen lawyer is not immediately available, detainees have the right to refuse to speak with other counsel and wait a reasonable amount of time for their lawyer of choice to respond. What amounts to a reasonable period of time depends on the circumstances as a whole, and may include factors such as the seriousness of the charge and the urgency of the investigation. If the chosen lawyer cannot be available within a reasonable period of time, detainees are expected to exercise their right to counsel by calling another lawyer or the police duty to hold off will be suspended ...

[84] The Applicant argues that Willier is distinguishable from the case before this Court, because the police in Willier honoured the accused's request and granted him further access to a telephone the next morning. At the beginning of the interview, the officer again told the accused of his right to consult with counsel and that if the accused wished to talk with a lawyer again he had only to make that request and the interview would be stopped to accommodate his wishes. The accused did not again ask to be allowed to speak with counsel.

[85] In the case before this Court, the Applicant argues that he did not waive or relinquish his right to consult with his apparent counsel of choice. When he requested a chance to renew his efforts to reach that lawyer, the police refused, despite their promises earlier of letting him have access to counsel as he might from time to time request.

4. Application and Relevance of the Counsel Trilogy

[86] The Crown argues that the Counsel Trilogy and, in particular, some of the obiter dicta that the Supreme Court of Canada expresses in those cases apply to the case before this Court. In other words, the Counsel Trilogy provides general principles that set out the scope and nature of a detainee's right to counsel. Those general principles are relevant to the present case.

[87] Factually, the Crown argues that the Applicant did indeed have the right to contact Mr. Lennon and, when he was unable to contact Mr. Lennon the first time, he chose to contact Mr. Fontaine. In other words, the lawyer whom the Applicant successfully contacted, Mr. Fontaine, became the Applicant's chosen counsel. The Applicant never expressed to the RCMP that Mr. Lennon was his specific counsel of choice. The Applicant did not await a return call from Mr. Lennon, nor did he even leave a message for Mr. Lennon to contact the Applicant at the detachment.

[88] As well, the Crown argues that it was the Applicant who chose to speak with Cst. Brophy on April 12, 2005. Cst. Brophy had no intention of interviewing the Applicant that day, and when the Applicant started his meeting with Cst. Waldorf, it was Cst. Waldorf who raised the matter of the Applicant wanting to speak with counsel. The Applicant did not raise the issue with Cst. Waldorf. The next time the Applicant asked to speak with Mr. Lennon was late in the morning on April 12, 2005. At that time, Cst. Brophy testified, the Applicant wanted to speak with Mr. Lennon to discuss issues concerning his judicial interim release.

[89] The critical issue with which this Court must deal, at this point, is the impact of the rulings and commentary that the Supreme Court of Canada provides in the Counsel Trilogy. This Court acknowledges that the fact scenarios in each of the cases in the Counsel Trilogy are not the same as the circumstances of the Applicant's consultation with counsel and interview process. Accordingly, the rationes decidendi reflected in those cases do not necessarily apply to the case before this Court, so the commentary could be considered as the Supreme Court of Canada's obiter dicta on the larger issue of right to counsel and the appropriate interpretation of Charter s. 10(b) and the obligations that provision places on law enforcement personnel.

[90] The Supreme Court of Canada addressed the debate of the binding nature of its obiter dicta in R. v. Henry, 2005 SCC 76, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 609:

> 57 The issue in each case, ... is what did the case decide? Beyond the ratio decidendi which, ... is generally rooted in the facts, the legal point decided by this Court may be as narrow as the jury instruction at issue in Sellars or as broad as the Oakes test. All obiter do not have, and are not intended to have, the same weight. The weight decreases as one moves from the dispositive ratio decidendi to a wider circle of analysis which is obviously intended for guidance and which should be accepted as authoritative. Beyond that, there will be commentary, examples or exposition that are intended to be helpful and may be found to be persuasive, but are certainly not "binding" in the sense the Sellars principle in its most exaggerated form would have it. The objective of the exercise is to promote certainty in the law, not to stifle its growth and creativity. The notion that each phrase in a judgment of this Court should be treated as if enacted in a statute is not supported by the cases and is inconsistent with the basic fundamental principle that the common law develops by experience.

The Applicant paraphrased this analysis by using an analogy of concentric circles; the farther the obiter dicta moves from the centre of the circle (the ratio decidendi), the less weight a court should place on that obiter dicta.

[91] The Supreme Court of Canada chose to deliver the Counsel Trilogy on the same date, and referred, in each case, to the other cases in the Counsel Trilogy. Why? The answer to this question is reflected in the introductory wording in McCrimmon, where the court said:

> 1 This appeal and its companion cases, R. v. Sinclair, 2010 SCC 35 (S.C.C.), and R. v. Willier, 2010 SCC 37 (S.C.C.), elaborate upon the nature and limits of the right to counsel provided under s. 10(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. [Emphasis added].

[92] Thus, the Supreme Court of Canada was dealing with the broader issue of the nature and limits of a detainee's Charter s. 10(b) rights. Although each of the cases in the Counsel Trilogy dealt with different aspects of this right, this Court finds that some of the obiter dicta is "intended for guidance and ... should be accepted as authoritative." That does not mean that every sentence and example that the Supreme Court of Canada provides in the Counsel Trilogy will carry the same weight. However, for this Court to attempt to parse out each such aspect serves no useful purpose, if the obiter dictum falls within the broad scope of the court's elaboration of a detainee's right to counsel.

[93] On April 12, 2005, once Cst. Brophy took the Applicant to the RCMP detachment, the Applicant said he wanted to call Mr. Lennon. Cst. Brophy specifically said:

> He indicated he wanted to call Lennon and Barlow lawyers and I believe mentioned that he had used Mr. Bruce Lennon at some point in the past and wanted to try and get in touch with him.
> Transcript of Voir Dire Proceedings, December 5, 2011, p. 13, ll. 8-10

[94] This Court finds that Mr. Lennon was the Applicant's counsel of choice. Although the Crown argues that the Applicant never said specifically that Mr. Lennon was his counsel of choice, one would be hard-pressed to say that Mr. Lennon was not. He was the Applicant's first choice, and the person whom the Applicant repeatedly attempted to contact.

[95] However, Cst. Brophy did not hesitate to allow the Applicant to contact Mr. Lennon, and, in fact, helped the Applicant facilitate this contact. Mr. Lennon was not available, and rather than wait for Mr. Lennon to become available, the Applicant immediately took up the offer to contact other counsel. Cst. Brophy did not recommend or select Mr. Fontaine for the Applicant. The Applicant chose Mr. Fontaine on his own. He was satisfied with the advice Mr. Fontaine provided to him. This is not unlike the situation in McCrimmon where the court said:

> 19 In this case, we agree with the courts below in rejecting Mr. McCrimmon's contention that he was denied the right to counsel of choice in a manner that contravened his rights under s. 10(b). While Mr. McCrimmon expressed a preference for speaking with Mr. Cheevers, the police rightly inquired whether he wanted to contact Legal Aid instead when Mr. Cheevers was not immediately available. Mr. McCrimmon agreed, exercised his right to counsel before the interview began, and expressed satisfaction with the consultation. He also indicated an awareness of his rights at the commencement of the interview. In these circumstances, there was no further obligation on the police to hold off the interrogation until such time as Mr. Cheevers became available. [Emphasis added.]

See also Willier at para. 35 supra, which deals with this issue directly, and Willier para. 39, which says that if an accused exercises their right to counsel by opting to speak with Legal Aid rather than their counsel of choice, the police need not provide the accused with a "Prosper warning."

[96] One of the most important statements that flows from the Counsel Trilogy appears in Sinclair at para. 64, where the court said, "the right to counsel is essentially a one-time matter with few recognized exceptions." That is the starting point for any analysis of this issue. Sinclair also provides us with examples of those "few recognized exceptions" and said:

> For the purpose of providing guidance to investigating police officers, it is helpful to indicate situations in which it appears clear that a second consultation with counsel is so required (at para. 49).

[97] The examples that the Supreme Court of Canada provides are:

a. a new and non-routine procedure which involves the detainee (para. 50);

b. a change in jeopardy (para. 51); and

c. a reason to question the detainee's understanding of their Charter s. 10(b) right (para. 52).

a. Non-Routine Procedures

[98] The new and non-routine procedures involving the detainee are those that go beyond questioning. In Sinclair, the court referred to questioning as a routine procedure. It then provided examples of "non-routine procedures," such as "participation in a lineup or submitting to a polygraph" (at para. 50).

[99] Subsequent to the Counsel Trilogy, the Alberta Court of Appeal has indicated that a police recording of an interview is not a "non-routine procedure": R. v. Wu, 2010 ABCA 337 at paras. 69-71, 44 Alta. L.R. (5th) 333.

[100] The Applicant argues that two "non-routine procedure events" occurred during the Applicant's interviews with Cst. Brophy:

1. when Cst. Brophy started discussing the nature of DNA and then asked the Applicant whether he would consent to provide a DNA sample [Transcript of the Applicant's Statements, April 11, 2005 Tape 1, pp. 23-25. Transcript of the Applicant's Statements, April 11, 2005 Tape 3, p. 11]; and

2. when the Applicant suggested to Cst. Brophy that Cst. Brophy conduct a polygraph test, and when Cst. Brophy asked the Applicant whether he would consent to a polygraph test, [Transcript of the Applicant's Statements, April 11, 2005 Tape 3, p. 11].

[101] This Court finds an officer's obligation to provide a detainee with a new opportunity to consult counsel arises before a detainee's active participation in the non-routine procedure, and not during a discussion of the procedure or after a commitment to participate. In Sinclair at para. 50 the Supreme Court of Canada specifically described the trigger for a renewed Charter s. 10(b) right as, "participation in" or "submitting to" a procedure. It did not use the phrases "agreeing to" or "consenting to."

[102] Furthermore, the Supreme Court of Canada did not identify a detainee's providing a DNA sample as one of its examples of a non-routine procedure. This Court need not decide whether this is a non-routine procedure, as the Applicant, in any event, did not provide a DNA sample. On the evidence that the parties presented to this Court, Cst. Brophy did not place the Applicant in a position of having to participate in any non-routine procedure, as the RCMP restricted their investigation during this period to questioning the Applicant.

b. A Change in Jeopardy

[103] The Supreme Court of Canada in Sinclair states that the police are required to allow a detainee a further consultation with counsel when the detainee faces a change in jeopardy:

> 51 The detainee is advised upon detention of the reasons for the detention: s. 10(a). The s. 10(b) advice and opportunity to consult counsel follows this. The advice given will be tailored to the situation as the detainee and his lawyer then understand it. If the investigation takes a new and more serious turn as events unfold, that advice may no longer be adequate to the actual situation, or jeopardy, the detainee faces. In order to fulfill the purpose of s. 10(b), the detainee must be given a further opportunity to consult with counsel and obtain advice on the new situation. [Emphasis added.]

[104] The Applicant argues that, although Cst. Brophy told the Applicant on April 11, 2005, that he was being arrested for murder, the Applicant was not actually charged with murder until April 12, 2005. As well, Cst. Brophy and the Applicant had the following exchange on April 11, 2005:

> Applicant: And [sigh], I just think I made a mistake. What is gonna, like, I'm still obviously charged with this major charge.
> Cst. Brophy: You are not charged with anything yet. You're arrested for Homicide. Ok, big difference.
>
> Applicant: Oh, ok [unintel.].
>
> Cst. Brophy: If you were charged you'd be in front of a JP. Ok.
>
> Applicant: Ok.
>
> Cst. Brophy: This is still under investigation. You're under arrest for this right now. Ok, you understand the difference?
>
> Applicant: Yeah.
> [Transcript of the Applicant's Statements, April 11, 2005 Tape 3, p. 18]

Thus, the Applicant argues that his jeopardy changed when the RCMP charged him with the murder.

[105] What is a change in jeopardy? In R. v. V. (S.E.), 2009 ABCA 108, 448 A.R. 351 the Alberta Court of Appeal said:

> 27 ... A change in jeopardy requiring a re-caution involves a fundamental and discrete change in the purpose of the investigation, such as a different and unrelated offence or a significantly more serious offence than that contemplated at the time of the prior warning, or an additional offence ... It is not a change in jeopardy under s. 10(b) for a detainee to gradually learn more about the evidence against him during the police interview ... [Citations excluded, emphasis added].

[106] More recently, the Alberta Court of Appeal said in R. v. Nelson, 2010 ABCA 349, 490 A.R. 271:

> 27 ... The arrest for the murders left the appellant with full knowledge of the crimes the police suspected he had committed and that he would be questioned with respect to those crimes. In R. v. Sinclair, 2010 SCC 35 (S.C.C.) at para 32, the Supreme Court noted that, in the context of a custodial detention, the purpose > of s.10(b) of the Charter is to support the detainee's right to choose whether to cooperate with the police investigation or not, by giving him access to legal advice on the "situation" he is facing. In this case there is no doubt that the appellant knew the situation he was facing and was able to get advice regarding that situation before he was questioned by police. [Emphasis added.]

These passages clearly indicate that the 'new jeopardy' Charter s. 10(b) right exists, such that a detainee can obtain advice concerning a previously undisclosed offense, or an offense that is more serious than the one which the detainee was initially suspected of committing.

> 28 Section 10(a) of the Charter provides the right to be informed promptly of the reasons for one's arrest or detention. The purpose of this provision is to ensure that a person "understand generally the jeopardy" in which he or she finds himself or herself ... There are two reasons why the Charter lays down this requirement: first, because it would be a gross interference with individual liberty for persons to have to submit to arrest without knowing the reasons for that arrest, and second, because it would be difficult to exercise the right to counsel protected by s. 10(b) in a meaningful way if one were not aware of the extent of one's jeopardy ... [Citations excluded, emphasis added].

[108] In the case before this Court, Cst. Brophy advised the Applicant of the reason for his arrest, which was murder. On April 12, 2005, the RCMP charged the Applicant with murder. There was no fundamental and discrete change in the purpose of the RCMP's investigation, such as a different and unrelated offence or a significantly more serious offence or an additional offence than that contemplated at the time the Applicant contacted Mr. Fontaine. The Applicant had full knowledge of the crime the RCMP suspected he had committed. As well, the Applicant knew that the RCMP would be questioning him with respect to that crime. He knew the "situation" he was facing and was able to get advice from Mr. Fontaine regarding that "situation" before Cst. Brophy and Cst. Waldorf questioned him. He understood the jeopardy he was facing.

[109] The Applicant argues that this Court should apply the "change in jeopardy test" that the Supreme Court of Canada applied in R. v. Paternak, [1996] 3 S.C.R. 607 at para. 1, 203 N.R. 250, where, in a two-paragraph judgment, the court held that the police violated that accused's Charter s. 10(b) rights when, "the police officer concluded that the appellant had committed the offence and advised the appellant accordingly."

[110] Although this broad statement might apply to the case before this Court, the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Chalmers, 2009 ONCA 268, 247 O.A.C. 250, clarified the situation with which the Supreme Court of Canada was dealing, when it said:

> 42 ... It is not apparent from the brief endorsement of Sopinka J. in Paternak, what facts the Supreme Court relied on in allowing the appeal; however, the appellant's factum in the Supreme Court in that case appears to indicate that Mr. Paternak was initially interviewed as a witness and that he was never told he was a suspect prior to the point of his detention. [Emphasis added.]

That factual matrix makes Paternak distinguishable from the case before this Court. The RCMP were not interviewing the Applicant as a witness. They were interviewing the Applicant as a suspect, and he knew that was the case.

c. The Applicant's Understanding His Charter s. 10(b) Rights

[111] The Applicant did not argue that he did not understand that he had a right to contact counsel pursuant to Charter s. 10(b). Had he argued this, this Court would have found that he was well aware of this right after his arrest and throughout his interviews with the RCMP officers.

5. Application of the General Counsel Trilogy Principles

[112] As mentioned earlier, the Applicant argues that the Counsel Trilogy does not apply to a situation where:

a) the police hold out to a detainee the prospect of future consultations with counsel, and

b) the police then do not allow the detainee to contact counsel when the detainee asks for that access.

[113] This is not an exception identified by the Supreme Court of Canada that would entitle the detainee to a second consultation with counsel. In fact, the court was alive to this issue when it said in Sinclair:

> 49 The police, of course, are at liberty to facilitate any number of further consultations with counsel. In some circumstances, the interrogator may even consider it a useful technique to reassure the detainee that further access to counsel will be available if needed. For example, in the companion case of R. v. Willier, 2010 SCC 37 (S.C.C.), a skilled interrogator commenced the interview by making it clear to the detainee that he would be free at any time during the interview to stop and call a lawyer. The question here is when a further consultation is required under s. 10(b) of the Charter. [Emphasis added.]

The obvious implication of this passage is that any consultation with counsel after an initial consultation is optional, other than in the three circumstances the court identified in Sinclair at paras. 50-52.

[114] Furthermore, one can imagine situations where the police should not be forced to provide a detainee with an opportunity to contact counsel, even in the face of such a "reassurance." If, for example, the interviewer was at a crucial part of the interview, they could deny the detainee this right, as it could stop the flow of the interview. As well, if the detainee is simply seeking to delay the interview, the police need not provide the detainee a further right to contact counsel, absent the exceptions discussed above. As the court in Sinclair said:

> 58 ... The purpose of the right to counsel is not to permit suspects, particularly sophisticated and assertive ones, to delay "needlessly and with impunity an investigation and even, in certain cases, to allow for an essential piece of evidence to be lost, destroyed or [, for whatever reasons, made] impossible to obtain" ... [Citation excluded].

[115] This Court finds, in any event, that in the case before it, the "holding out" made no difference. The Applicant was the one who asked to speak with Cst. Brophy and he did not refuse to speak with Cst. Waldorf. Cst. Waldorf then told this Court how he ended up interviewing the Applicant. He said:

> And so during -- between 10:02 and 10:24, I did receive information that Mr. Briscoe was wanting to speak to a different investigator and to tell you where that information came from, I'm sorry, I don't recall.

[116] This is consistent with an exchange that took place between Cst. Waldorf and the Applicant soon after Cst. Waldorf began the interview, which bears repeating:

> Cst. Waldorf: You remember me from yesterday, right? I'm Pat.
>
> Applicant: I'm scared shitless, man.
> Cst. Waldorf: I understand. I understand totally what you're saying. I also understand you were talkin' to another guy, and you don't wanna talk to him anymore.
>
> Applicant: He doesn't, he's not. I don't know what.
>
> Cst. Waldorf: What's the, what's the problem there? What's?
>
> Applicant: He's he's being so fuckin', and I can't think straight.
> Cst. Waldorf: Okay.

Applicant: And he said he was gonna keep me and my friend safe right, if I, if I helped out or whatever, and.

[Transcript of the Applicant's Statements, April 12, 2005, p. 14].

[117] This Court finds that it was, indeed, the Applicant who wanted to speak, first, with Cst. Brophy, and, later, with Cst. Waldorf. It is not clear why the Applicant wanted to speak with these officers, although the last entry in the foregoing exchange might provide us with a hint. Throughout his interviews with Cst. Brophy and Cst. Waldorf, the Applicant expressed concern for his safety if he revealed any information to the RCMP. He was concerned that he might be viewed as a "rat," which is, apparently, someone who provides information to the police. However, it would be conjecture on this Court's part to find that this was the reason why the Applicant wanted to speak with the RCMP officers on April 12, 2005.

[118] Nonetheless, as matters progressed with Cst. Waldorf, the Applicant did not at any time ask to speak with his chosen counsel or any counsel, for that matter. He freely, with Cst. Waldorf's encouragement, provided information to Cst. Waldorf.

[119] Accordingly, this Court finds that even if, somehow, the Counsel Trilogy did not address the issue before this Court, this Court finds that the holding out did not result in the RCMP breaching the Applicant's Charter s. 10(b) rights.

6. Conclusion on the Charter s. 10(b) Issue

[120] Based on the foregoing, this Court finds that the RCMP did not breach the Applicant's Charter s. 10(b) rights with respect to anything the Applicant said to Cst. Brophy or Cst. Waldorf. Accordingly, everything he said to those two officers is admissible in his trial. To the extent that this Court has not agreed with the Burrows Voir Dire Decision, it does so on the basis that the Counsel Trilogy has changed the law in this regard. This Court's review of the facts as identified by Justice Burrows shows no significant difference from its own observations and conclusions.

[121] As for the "cell plant" statements that the Applicant made to Cst. McCoshen, this Court holds that they are not inadmissible. However, this Court will more thoroughly canvass this issue if the Crown seeks to use them during the Applicant's trial.

[122] This Court has found that the RCMP did not breach the Applicant's rights under Charter s. 10(b). If it is wrong in its analysis, it will briefly examine the issue of whether the admission of the Applicant's statements would bring the administration of justice into disrepute: R. v. Grant, 2009 SCC 32 at para. 45, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 353.

[123] Charter s. 24 provides:

> 24.(1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.
> (2) Where, in proceedings under subsection (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[124] This Court, in R. v. Simpenzwe, 2009 ABQB 579, outlined the way in which it approaches a Charter s. 24(2) analysis. Rather than paraphrasing its approach, it might be worthwhile to transcribe the portions of its judgment relevant to the analysis it will undertake in this case. Those portions are as follows:

> 48 A Charter s. 24(2) analysis starts from the position that there has been a breach of the Charter. This is important, as this fact has already brought the administration of justice into disrepute. The Charter s. 24(2) analysis is seeking to ensure that courts do not allow a situation where there is further damage to the repute of the administration of justice through the admission of the evidence acquired as a result of that breach, Grant at para. 69.
> 49 Grant at para. 71, provides courts with a roadmap to follow when faced with the issue of whether to exclude evidence as a result of a Charter breach, when it said:
>
> > When faced with an application for exclusion under s. 24(2), a court must assess and balance the effect of admitting the evidence on society's confidence in the justice system having regard to: (1) the seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct (admission may send the message the justice system condones serious state misconduct), (2) the impact of the breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused (admission may send the message that individual rights count for little), and (3) society's interest in the adjudication of the case on its merits. The court's role on a s. 24(2) application is to balance the assessments under each of these lines of inquiry to determine whether, considering all the circumstances, admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.
> (1) The seriousness of the Charter-infringing state conduct
> 50 This first stop along the journey of determining whether the effect of admitting the evidence on society's confidence in the justice system is for this

Court to examine the police or state conduct that led to the Charter violation. When we look through society's prism, we will see a spectrum of conduct ranging from deliberate, severe, reckless or wilful to inadvertent or minor. The more deliberate or severe the conduct, the greater the likelihood that society will not tolerate such conduct. As a result, societal needs will direct that courts exclude the evidence that resulted from that conduct.

(2) The impact of the breach on the Charter-protected interests of the accused 51 The second stop along the journey is to examine rights of the accused that the Charter protects and determine the impact of the Charter violation on the accused's rights. Like the first stop along our journey, courts must examine this through society's prism. The more intrusive the breach on the accused's rights, the more likely that society will see an individual's Charter protected rights as meaningless. Society will direct courts to exclude such intrusive evidence.

52 Grant at para. 77 provided us with an example, which is on all fours with the situation with which this Court is dealing, when it said:

> For example, the interests engaged in the case of a statement to the authorities obtained in breach of the Charter include the s. 7 right to silence, or to choose whether or not to speak to authorities ... all stemming from the principle against self-incrimination ... The more serious the incursion on these interests, the greater the risk that admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. [citations excluded]

(3) Society's interest in the adjudication of the case on its merits

53 Grant at para. 79, summarized this stop along the journey of determining whether the effect of admitting the evidence on society's confidence in the justice system as "whether the truth-seeking function of the criminal trial process would be better served by admission of the evidence, or by its exclusion." This analysis requires the court to examine the quality of the evidence against the means by which the evidence was obtained. The latter, in part, is examined during the first two stops along our journey. The former examines the reliability of the evidence. This examination cannot be done in a vacuum. For example, a statement that the police obtain from the accused through threats is unreliable. Society has no interest in having a court adjudicate a case based on such unreliable evidence and, accordingly, society will direct courts to exclude such evidence. On the other hand, society will not tolerate a court excluding evidence that is relevant and reliable.

54 Grant at para. 83, also pointed to the importance of the evidence to the prosecution's case. It said:

> The admission of evidence of questionable reliability is more likely to bring the administration of justice into disrepute where it forms the entirety of the case against the accused. Conversely, the exclusion of highly reliable evidence may impact more negatively on the repute of the administration of justice where the remedy effectively guts the prosecution.

(4) Whether, considering all the circumstances, admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute

55 Once it has made all the stops along its journey, the court must then examine what it has found along those stops, balance them and complete its journey by determining the effect of admitting the evidence will have on society's confidence in the justice system. This is not a scientific exercise. In fact, Grant at para. 86 said, "No overarching rule governs how the balance is to be struck. Mathematical precision is obviously not possible."

56 In Grant at para. 92, the court said when examining a statement that a person provides to the police, the three stops along that journey will support "the presumptive general, although not automatic, exclusion" of those statements when they are obtained in breach of the Charter. However, Grant at para. 96 provides certain exceptions, when it said:

> This said, particular circumstances may attenuate the impact of a Charter breach on the protected interests of the accused from whom a statement is obtained in breach of the Charter. For instance, if an individual is clearly informed of his or her choice to speak to the police, but compliance with s. 10(b) was technically defective at either the informational or implementational stage, the impact on the liberty and autonomy interests of the accused in making an informed choice may be reduced. Likewise, when a statement is made spontaneously following a Charter breach, or in the exceptional circumstances where it can confidently be said that the statement in question would have been made notwithstanding the Charter breach ..., the impact of the breach on the accused's protected interest in informed choice may be less. [citations excluded]

It then goes on to say at para. 97:

> Just as involuntary confessions are suspect on grounds of reliability, so may, on occasion, be statements taken in contravention of the Charter. Detained by the police and without a lawyer, a suspect may make > statements that are based more on a misconceived idea of how to get out of his or her predicament than on the truth. This danger, where present, undercuts the argument that the illegally obtained statement is necessary for a trial of the merits.

[125] Csts. Brophy and Waldorf were under the impression that they had complied with Charter s. 10(b) when they allowed the Applicant to try to contact Mr. Lennon on the morning of April 11, 2005, and thereafter, when the Applicant contacted Mr. Fontaine and advised the officer that he was satisfied with the advice he received. Later in the day on April 11, 2005, Cst. Brophy allowed the Applicant to try to contact Mr. Lennon again. Although the Sinclair exceptions to the "one-call rule" were not triggered (and, in fact, the Supreme Court of Canada had not yet decided Sinclair at the relevant time), the RCMP officers had no reason to believe that the Applicant was not aware of his Charter s. 10(b) rights, the Applicant's jeopardy had not changed in their minds and they were not undertaking any non-routine procedures.

[126] Even though Cst. Brophy held out to the Applicant that he could contact a lawyer at any time, at worst, the officers' not permitting the Applicant to contact his counsel on April 12, 2005, was not deliberate, severe, reckless or wilful. In fact, neither Cst. Brophy nor Cst. Waldorf (nor this Court, for that matter) knew why the Applicant had summoned them on the morning of April 12, 2005. If the Applicant's reason for summoning them was to ask them if he could contact counsel, the Applicant did not articulate this at the time he started speaking with Cst. Waldorf. When Cst. Waldorf (not the Applicant) raised the matter, he might have inquired why the Applicant wanted to contact counsel. This failure on Cst. Waldorf's part might be, at its worst given the circumstances, negligent. It certainly does not fall into the realm of deliberate, severe, reckless or wilful.

[127] What impact does the Charter breach have on the Applicant? We might have gleaned a better sense of this had the Applicant advised Cst. Brophy or Cst. Waldorf of the reason why he had summoned them. From an objective perspective, a detainee's right to counsel is an important Charter right. However, a breach of that right does not result in an automatic exclusion of any statements a detainee makes to persons of authority. This is why courts undertake a Charter s. 24(2) analysis. The quotation from Grant that this Court provided in Simpenzwe at para. 52 above, shows that there is a subjective aspect to the analysis. What is the impact on the detainee who stands before the court? In the case with which this Court is dealing, this Court finds that the impact of the breach (if there is one) on the Applicant's Charter s. 10(b) rights is minimal, because:

(a) the Applicant chose to speak with Csts. Brophy and Waldorf;

(b) the Applicant was not coerced into speaking with them;

(c) with respect to his discussion with Cst. Waldorf, the Applicant did not immediately demand that Cst. Waldorf permit him to speak with counsel;

(d) the Applicant voluntarily responded to the questions that Cst. Waldorf and Cst. Brophy posed without interrupting to ask that he be permitted to speak with counsel;

(e) the Applicant was aware of his right to speak with counsel and, in fact, exercised that right at the outset and subsequently asked for, and was provided with, an opportunity to contact Mr. Lennon on the evening of April 12, 2005; and

(f) the Applicant knew he did not have to speak to the police and Mr. Fontaine told him not to. He repeated this instruction to the officers during the interviews and the officers did not challenge that advice.

[128] The Applicant, to use the words from Grant, chose to speak to Cst. Brophy and Waldorf and thereby waived his right to remain silent. This Court finds that neither Cst. Brophy nor Cst. Waldorf extracted any information from the Applicant through promises, threats or inducements. Thus, the impact of the breach (if there is one) on the Applicant's rights under Charter s. 10(b) is negligible.

[129] Does society have an interest in having this case adjudicated on its merits? This Court would have no hesitation in finding that the statements, or any one or more of them, are inadmissible if, for example, it found that:

1. the RCMP officers obtained the Applicant's statements in bad faith or through nefarious means,

2. the Applicant was pleading for the police to leave him alone, or

3. the RCMP officers refused to provide Applicant with medical treatment.

Instead, throughout the interviews with Csts. Brophy and Waldorf, the Applicant appeared comfortable and, although he was concerned about his security if he was found to be a "rat," he otherwise had no concern speaking to the officers. Prima facie his statements are reliable. However, the weight the trier of fact will place on this evidence has yet to be determined, and cannot be determined, until the trial is underway. A statement is not like, for example, drugs, which are, by their nature, reliable. The reliability of a statement cannot be fully examined until placed within the context of the trial.

[130] Allowing the statements to be entered as evidence in the trial will not bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

[131] There is nothing that this Court has found in its stops along its Charter s. 24(2) journey that would call for its finding that the Applicant's statements are inadmissible. The only "bump in the road" might be the fact that the trier of fact cannot assess fully the reliability of the Applicant's statements, until those statements are examined as part of the total matrix of evidence it receives during the trial. However, the trier of fact must be given that opportunity, as to do otherwise could bring the administration of justice into disrepute. As this Court stated in Simpenzwe, "the weight that the trier of fact will place on this evidence is up to the trier of fact, not the judge hearing the voir dire" (at para. 65).

VII. Conclusion

[132] For the foregoing reasons, this Court will not exclude any of the statements that the Applicant made to Csts. Brophy and Waldorf. All with be admissible in the Applicant's trial.

Section 241(b) of the Criminal Code says that everyone who aids or abets a person in committing suicide commits an indictable offence, and s. 14 says that no person may consent to death being inflicted on them. Together, these provisions prohibit the provision of assistance in dying in Canada. After T was diagnosed with a fatal neurodegenerative disease in 2009, she challenged the constitutionality of the Criminal Code provisions prohibiting assistance in dying. She was joined in her claim by C and J, who had assisted C's mother in achieving her goal of dying with dignity by taking her to Switzerland to use the services of an assisted suicide clinic; a physician who would be willing to participate in physician-assisted dying if it were no longer prohibited; and the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association. The Attorney General of British Columbia participated in the constitutional litigation as of right.

The trial judge found that the prohibition against physician-assisted dying violates the s. 7 rights of competent adults who are suffering intolerably as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition and concluded that this infringement is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. She declared the prohibition unconstitutional, granted a one-year suspension of invalidity and provided T with a constitutional exemption. She awarded special costs in favour of the plaintiffs on the ground that this was justified by the public interest in resolving the legal issues raised by the case, and awarded 10 percent of the costs against the Attorney General of British Columbia in light of the full and active role it assumed in the proceedings.

Aux termes de l'al. 241*b*) du Code criminel, quiconque aide ou encourage quelqu'un à se donner la mort commet un acte criminel, et selon l'art. 14, nul ne peut consentir à ce que la mort lui soit infligée. Ensemble, ces dispositions prohibent au Canada la prestation de l'aide à mourir. Après avoir appris en 2009 qu'elle souffrait d'une maladie neurodégénérative fatale, T a contesté la constitutionnalité des dispositions du Code criminel qui prohibent l'aide à mourir. Se sont joints à sa demande C et J, qui avaient aidé la mère de C à réaliser son souhait de mourir dans la dignité en l'emmenant en Suisse pour qu'elle puisse recourir aux services d'une clinique d'aide au suicide; se sont aussi joints un médecin disposé à participer à un processus d'aide médicale à la mort si la prohibition était levée, et l'Association des libertés civiles de la Colombie-Britannique. La procureure générale de la Colombie-Britannique a participé de plein droit au litige constitutionnel.

La juge de première instance a conclu que la prohibition de l'aide médicale à mourir viole les droits que l'art. 7 garantit aux adultes capables voués à d'intolérables souffrances causées par des problèmes de santé graves et irrémédiables et a aussi conclu que cette violation n'est pas justifiée au regard de l'article premier de la Charte. Elle a déclaré la prohibition inconstitutionnelle, a suspendu pour un an la prise d'effet de la déclaration d'invalidité et a accordé à T une exemption constitutionnelle. Elle a adjugé des dépens spéciaux aux demandeurs parce qu'une telle mesure était justifiée par l'intérêt du public à ce que soient tranchées les questions de droit en litige, et elle a condamné la procureure générale de la Colombie-Britannique à payer 10 pour 100 des dépens du fait qu'elle avait participé pleinement et activement à l'instance.

The majority of the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal on the ground that the trial judge was bound to follow this Court's decision in Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519, where a majority of the Court upheld the blanket prohibition on assisted suicide. The dissenting judge found no errors in the trial judge's assessment of stare decisis, her application of s. 7 or the corresponding analysis under s. 1. However, he concluded that the trial judge was bound by the conclusion in Rodriguez that any s. 15 infringement was saved by s. 1.

Held: The appeal should be allowed. Section 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code unjustifiably infringe s. 7 of the Charter and are of no force or effect to the extent that they prohibit physician-assisted death for a competent adult person who (1) clearly consents to the termination of life and (2) has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition. The declaration of invalidity is suspended for 12 months. Special costs on a full indemnity basis are awarded against Canada throughout. The Attorney General of British Columbia will bear responsibility for 10 percent of the costs at trial on a full indemnity basis and will pay the costs associated with its presence at the appellate levels on a party-and-party basis.

The trial judge was entitled to revisit this Court's decision in Rodriguez. Trial courts may reconsider settled rulings of higher courts in two situations: (1) where a new legal issue is raised; and (2) where there is a change in the circumstances or evidence that fundamentally shifts the parameters of the debate. Here, both conditions were met. The argument before the trial judge involved a different legal conception of s. 7 than that prevailing when Rodriguez was decided. In particular, the law relating to the principles of overbreadth and gross disproportionality had materially advanced since Rodriguez. The matrix of legislative and social facts in this case also differed from the evidence before the Court in Rodriguez.

Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont accueilli l'appel pour le motif que la juge de première instance était tenue de suivre la décision de notre Cour dans Rodriguez c. Colombie-Britannique (Procureur général), [1993] 3 R.C.S. 519, dans laquelle les juges majoritaires de la Cour ont confirmé l'interdiction générale de l'aide au suicide. Le juge dissident n'a relevé aucune erreur dans l'examen, par la juge de première instance, du principe du stare decisis, dans l'application qu'elle a faite de l'art. 7, ni dans l'analyse correspondante fondée sur l'article premier. Il a toutefois conclu qu'elle était liée par la conclusion de l'arrêt Rodriguez selon laquelle toute violation de l'art. 15 était sauvegardée par l'article premier.

Arrêt : Le pourvoi est accueilli. L'alinéa 241*b*) et l'art. 14 du Code criminel portent atteinte de manière injustifiée à l'art. 7 de la Charte et sont inopérants dans la mesure où ils prohibent l'aide d'un médecin pour mourir à une personne adulte capable qui (1) consent clairement à mettre fin à sa vie; et qui (2) est affectée de problèmes de santé graves et irrémédiables (y compris une affection, une maladie ou un handicap) lui causant des souffrances persistantes qui lui sont intolérables au regard de sa condition. La prise d'effet de la déclaration d'invalidité est suspendue pendant 12 mois. Le Canada est condamné à des dépens spéciaux sur la base de l'indemnisation intégrale devant toutes les cours. La procureure générale de la Colombie-Britannique doit assumer la responsabilité de 10 pour 100 des dépens du procès sur la base de l'indemnisation intégrale, et elle est condamnée aux dépens associés à sa participation devant les cours d'appel sur la base partie-partie.

La juge de première instance pouvait réexaminer la décision rendue par notre Cour dans Rodriguez. Les juridictions inférieures peuvent réexaminer les précédents de tribunaux supérieurs dans deux situations : (1) lorsqu'une nouvelle question juridique se pose; et (2) lorsqu'une modification de la situation ou de la preuve change radicalement la donne. En l'espèce, ces deux conditions étaient réunies. L'argument présenté à la juge de première instance reposait sur une conception juridique de l'art. 7 différente de celle qui avait cours lors du prononcé de l'arrêt Rodriguez. Plus particulièrement, le droit relatif aux principes de la portée excessive et du caractère totalement disproportionné avait évolué de façon importante depuis l'arrêt Rodriguez. L'ensemble des faits législatifs et sociaux dans l'affaire qui nous occupe différait également des éléments de preuve soumis à la Cour dans l'affaire Rodriguez.

The prohibition on assisted suicide is, in general, a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and it does not impair the protected core of the provincial jurisdiction over health. Health is an area of concurrent jurisdiction, which suggests that aspects of physician-assisted dying may be the subject of valid legislation by both levels of government, depending on the circumstances and the focus of the legislation. On the basis of the record, the interjurisdictional immunity claim cannot succeed.

Insofar as they prohibit physician-assisted dying for competent adults who seek such assistance as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition that causes enduring and intolerable suffering, ss. 241(b) and 14 of the Criminal Code deprive these adults of their right to life, liberty and security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter. The right to life is engaged where the law or state action imposes death or an increased risk of death on a person, either directly or indirectly. Here, the prohibition deprives some individuals of life, as it has the effect of forcing some individuals to take their own lives prematurely, for fear that they would be incapable of doing so when they reached the point where suffering was intolerable. The rights to liberty and security of the person, which deal with concerns about autonomy and quality of life, are also engaged. An individual's response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition is a matter critical to their dignity and autonomy. The prohibition denies people in this situation the right to make decisions concerning their bodily integrity and medical care and thus trenches on their liberty. And by leaving them to endure intolerable suffering, it impinges on their security of the person.

The prohibition on physician-assisted dying infringes the right to life, liberty and security of the person in a manner that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The object of the prohibition is not, broadly, to preserve life whatever the circumstances, but more specifically to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness. Since a total ban on assisted suicide clearly helps achieve this object, individuals' rights are not deprived arbitrarily. However, the prohibition catches people outside the class of protected persons. It follows that the limitation on their

La prohibition de l'aide au suicide constitue généralement un exercice valide de la compétence en matière de droit criminel conférée au gouvernement fédéral par le par. 91(27) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 et n'empiète pas sur le contenu essentiel protégé de la compétence provinciale en matière de santé. La santé est un domaine de compétence concurrente, ce qui laisse croire que les deux ordres de gouvernement peuvent validement légiférer sur des aspects de l'aide médicale à mourir, en fonction du caractère et de l'objet du texte législatif. Compte tenu du dossier qui a été soumis à la Cour, la prétention fondée sur l'exclusivité des compétences ne peut être retenue.

Dans la mesure où ils prohibent l'aide d'un médecin pour mourir que peuvent demander des adultes capables affectés de problèmes de santé graves et irrémédiables qui leur causent des souffrances persistantes et intolérables, l'al. 241*b*) et l'art. 14 du Code criminel privent ces adultes du droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne que leur garantit l'art. 7 de la Charte. Le droit à la vie entre en jeu lorsqu'une mesure ou une loi prise par l'État a directement ou indirectement pour effet d'imposer la mort à une personne ou de l'exposer à un risque accru de mort. En l'espèce, la prohibition prive certaines personnes de la vie car elle a pour effet de forcer certaines personnes à s'enlever prématurément la vie, par crainte d'être incapables de le faire lorsque leurs souffrances deviendraient insupportables. Les droits à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne, qui traitent des préoccupations au sujet de l'autonomie et de la qualité de la vie, sont également en jeu. La réaction d'une personne à des problèmes de santé graves et irrémédiables est primordiale pour sa dignité et son autonomie. La prohibition prive les personnes se trouvant dans cette situation du droit de prendre des décisions relatives à leur intégrité corporelle et aux soins médicaux et elle empiète ainsi sur leur liberté. Et en leur laissant subir des souffrances intolérables, elle empiète sur la sécurité de leur personne.

La prohibition de l'aide médicale à mourir porte atteinte au droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne d'une manière non conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. La prohibition n'a pas pour objet, envisagé largement, de préserver la vie peu importe les circonstances, mais plus précisément d'empêcher que les personnes vulnérables soient incitées à se suicider dans un moment de faiblesse. Puisque la prohibition absolue de l'aide au suicide favorise clairement la réalisation de cet objet, il n'y a pas privation arbitraire de droits individuels. Cependant, la prohibition s'applique à des rights is in at least some cases not connected to the objective and that the prohibition is thus overbroad. It is unnecessary to decide whether the prohibition also violates the principle against gross disproportionality.

Having concluded that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying violates s. 7, it is unnecessary to consider whether it deprives adults who are physically disabled of their right to equal treatment under s. 15 of the Charter.

Sections 241(b) and 14 of the Criminal Code are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter. While the limit is prescribed by law and the law has a pressing and substantial objective, the prohibition is not proportionate to the objective. An absolute prohibition on physician-assisted dying is rationally connected to the goal of protecting the vulnerable from taking their life in times of weakness, because prohibiting an activity that poses certain risks is a rational method of curtailing the risks. However, as the trial judge found, the evidence does not support the contention that a blanket prohibition is necessary in order to substantially meet the government's objective. The trial judge made no palpable and overriding error in concluding, on the basis of evidence from scientists, medical practitioners, and others who are familiar with end-of-life decision-making in Canada and abroad, that a permissive regime with properly designed and administered safeguards was capable of protecting vulnerable people from abuse and error. It was also open to her to conclude that vulnerability can be assessed on an individual basis, using the procedures that physicians apply in their assessment of informed consent and decisional capacity in the context of medical decision-making more generally. The absolute prohibition is therefore not minimally impairing. Given this conclusion, it is not necessary to weigh the impacts of the law on protected rights against the beneficial effect of the law in terms of the greater public good.

The appropriate remedy is not to grant a free-standing constitutional exemption, but rather to issue a declaration of invalidity and to suspend it for 12 months. Nothing in this declaration would compel physicians to provide assistance in dying. The Charter rights of patients and personnes qui n'entrent pas dans la catégorie des personnes protégées. Il s'ensuit que la restriction de leurs droits n'a, dans certains cas du moins, aucun lien avec l'objectif et que la portée de la prohibition est de ce fait excessive. Il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si la prohibition contrevient aussi au principe selon lequel elle ne doit pas avoir un caractère totalement disproportionné.

Comme nous avons conclu que la prohibition de l'aide médicale à mourir viole l'art. 7, point n'est besoin d'examiner si elle prive les adultes affectés d'un handicap physique de leur droit à un traitement égal garanti par l'art. 15 de la Charte.

L'alinéa 241*b*) et l'art. 14 du Code criminel ne sont pas sauvegardés par application de l'article premier de la Charte. Bien que la limite soit prescrite par une règle de droit et que la loi vise un objectif urgent et réel, la prohibition n'est pas proportionnée à son objectif. Il existe un lien rationnel entre une prohibition absolue de l'aide médicale à mourir et l'objectif qui consiste à empêcher que les personnes vulnérables s'enlèvent la vie dans un moment de faiblesse, parce que prohiber une activité qui pose certains risques constitue un moyen rationnel de réduire les risques. Toutefois, la juge de première instance a conclu que la preuve n'étaye pas la prétention qu'une prohibition générale est nécessaire pour réaliser de façon substantielle les objectifs de l'État. La juge n'a pas commis une erreur manifeste et dominante en concluant, sur la foi des témoignages de scientifiques, de praticiens de la santé et d'autres personnes qui connaissent bien la prise de décisions concernant la fin de vie au Canada et à l'étranger, qu'un régime permissif comportant des garanties adéquatement conçues et appliquées pouvait protéger les personnes vulnérables contre les abus et les erreurs. Elle pouvait également conclure que la vulnérabilité peut être évaluée au cas par cas au moyen des procédures suivies par les médecins lorsqu'ils évaluent le consentement éclairé et la capacité décisionnelle dans le contexte de la prise de décisions d'ordre médical de façon plus générale. La prohibition absolue ne constitue donc pas une atteinte minimale. Compte tenu de cette conclusion, il n'est pas nécessaire de mettre en balance l'incidence de la loi sur les droits protégés et l'effet bénéfique de la loi au plan de l'intérêt supérieur du public.

La réparation appropriée consiste non pas à accorder une exemption constitutionnelle autonome, mais plutôt à prononcer une déclaration d'invalidité et de suspendre la prise d'effet de son application pendant 12 mois. Rien dans cette déclaration ne contraindrait les médecins à physicians will need to be reconciled in any legislative and regulatory response to this judgment.

The appellants are entitled to an award of special costs on a full indemnity basis to cover the entire expense of bringing this case before the courts. A court may depart from the usual rule on costs and award special costs where two criteria are met. First, the case must involve matters of public interest that are truly exceptional. It is not enough that the issues raised have not been previously resolved or that they transcend individual interests of the successful litigant: they must also have a significant and widespread societal impact. Second, in addition to showing that they have no personal, proprietary or pecuniary interest in the litigation that would justify the proceedings on economic grounds, the plaintiffs must show that it would not have been possible to effectively pursue the litigation in question with private funding. Finally, only those costs that are shown to be reasonable and prudent will be covered by the award of special costs. Here, the trial judge did not err in awarding special costs in the truly exceptional circumstances of this case. It was also open to her to award 10 percent of the costs against the Attorney General of British Columbia in light of the full and active role it played in the proceedings. The trial judge was in the best position to determine the role taken by that Attorney General and the extent to which it shared carriage of the case.

dispenser une aide médicale à mourir. La réponse législative ou réglementaire au présent jugement devra concilier les droits garantis par la Charte aux patients et aux médecins.

Les appelants ont droit à des dépens spéciaux sur la base de l'indemnisation intégrale afin de couvrir la totalité des dépenses engagées pour porter cette affaire devant les tribunaux. Un tribunal peut déroger à la règle habituelle en matière de dépens et octroyer des dépens spéciaux lorsque deux critères sont respectés. Premièrement, l'affaire doit porter sur des questions d'intérêt public véritablement exceptionnelles. Il ne suffit pas que les questions soulevées n'aient pas encore été tranchées ou qu'elles dépassent le cadre des intérêts du plaideur qui a gain de cause : elles doivent aussi avoir une incidence importante et généralisée sur la société. Deuxièmement, en plus de démontrer qu'ils n'ont dans le litige aucun intérêt personnel, propriétal ou pécuniaire qui justifierait l'instance pour des raisons d'ordre économique, les demandeurs doivent démontrer qu'il n'aurait pas été possible de poursuivre l'instance en question avec une aide financière privée. Enfin, seuls les frais dont on établit le caractère raisonnable et prudent seront couverts par l'octroi de dépens spéciaux. En l'espèce, la juge de première instance n'a pas commis une erreur en adjugeant des dépens spéciaux dans les circonstances vraiment exceptionnelles de cette affaire. Elle pouvait également condamner la procureure générale de la Colombie-Britannique à payer 10 pour 100 des dépens puisque cette dernière avait participé pleinement et activement à l'instance. La juge était la mieux placée pour apprécier la participation de la procureure générale et la mesure dans laquelle celle-ci a partagé la responsabilité du dossier.

Version française du jugement rendu par

LA COUR —

I. Introduction

[1] Au Canada, le fait d'aider une personne à mettre fin à ses jours constitue un crime. Par conséquent, les personnes gravement et irrémédiablement seek a physician's assistance in dying and may be condemned to a life of severe and intolerable suffering. A person facing this prospect has two options: she can take her own life prematurely, often by violent or dangerous means, or she can suffer until she dies from natural causes. The choice is cruel.

[2] The question on this appeal is whether the criminal prohibition that puts a person to this choice violates her Charter rights to life, liberty and security of the person (s. 7) and to equal treatment by and under the law (s. 15). This is a question that asks us to balance competing values of great importance. On the one hand stands the autonomy and dignity of a competent adult who seeks death as a response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition. On the other stands the sanctity of life and the need to protect the vulnerable.

[3] The trial judge found that the prohibition violates the s. 7 rights of competent adults who are suffering intolerably as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition. She concluded that this infringement is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. We agree. The trial judge's findings were based on an exhaustive review of the extensive record before her. The evidence supports her conclusion that the violation of the right to life, liberty and security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter is severe. It also supports her finding that a properly administered regulatory regime is capable of protecting the vulnerable from abuse or error.

[4] We conclude that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying is void insofar as it deprives a competent adult of such assistance where (1) the person affected clearly consents to the termination of life; and (2) the person has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is malades ne peuvent demander l'aide d'un médecin pour mourir et peuvent être condamnées à une vie de souffrances aiguës et intolérables. Devant une telle perspective, deux solutions s'offrent à elles : soit mettre fin prématurément à leurs jours, souvent par des moyens violents ou dangereux, soit souffrir jusqu'à ce qu'elles meurent de causes naturelles. Le choix est cruel.

intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition. We therefore allow the appeal.

II. Background

[5] In Canada, aiding or abetting a person to commit suicide is a criminal offence: see s. 241(b) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46. This means that a person cannot seek a physician-assisted death. Twenty-one years ago, this Court upheld this blanket prohibition on assisted suicide by a slim majority: Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519. Sopinka J., writing for five justices, held that the prohibition did not violate s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and that if it violated s. 15, this was justified under s. 1, as there was "no halfway measure that could be relied upon with assurance" to protect the vulnerable (p. 614). Four justices disagreed. McLachlin J. (as she then was), with L'Heureux-Dubé J. concurring, concluded that the prohibition violated s. 7 of the Charter and was not justified under s. 1. Lamer C.J. held that the prohibition violated s. 15 of the Charter and was not saved under s. 1. Cory J. agreed that the prohibition violated both ss. 7 and 15 and could not be justified.

[6] Despite the Court's decision in Rodriguez, the debate over physician-assisted dying continued. Between 1991 and 2010, the House of Commons and its committees debated no less than six private member's bills seeking to decriminalize assisted suicide. None was passed. While opponents to legalization emphasized the inadequacy of safeguards and the potential to devalue human life, a vocal minority spoke in favour of reform, highlighting the importance of dignity and autonomy and the limits of palliative care in addressing suffering. The Senate considered the matter as well, issuing a report on assisted suicide and euthanasia in 1995. The (y compris une affection, une maladie ou un handicap) lui causant des souffrances persistantes qui lui sont intolérables au regard de sa condition. En conséquence, la Cour accueille le pourvoi.

II. Contexte

[5] Au Canada, quiconque aide ou encourage une personne à se donner la mort commet un acte criminel : voir l'al. 241*b*) du Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-46. Ainsi, une personne ne peut demander une aide médicale à mourir. Il y a 21 ans, la Cour a confirmé par une faible majorité cette interdiction générale de l'aide au suicide : Rodriguez c. Colombie-Britannique (Procureur général), [1993] 3 R.C.S. 519. S'exprimant au nom de cinq juges, le juge Sopinka a estimé que l'interdiction ne contrevenait pas à l'art. 7 de la Charte, et que, si elle contrevenait à l'art. 15, elle était justifiée au regard de l'article premier, car il n'existait « pas de demi-mesure qui permettrait de garantir, avec toutes les assurances voulues » la protection des personnes vulnérables (p. 614). Quatre juges se sont dits en désaccord. La juge McLachlin (maintenant Juge en chef), avec l'appui de la juge L'Heureux-Dubé, a exprimé l'avis que l'interdiction violait l'art. 7 de la Charte et qu'elle n'était pas justifiée au regard de l'article premier. Le juge en chef Lamer a estimé que l'interdiction violait l'art. 15 de la Charte et qu'elle n'était pas sauvegardée par l'article premier. Le juge Cory a estimé que cette interdiction contrevenait à la fois à l'art. 7 et à l'art. 15, et qu'elle ne pouvait être justifiée.

[6] Malgré l'arrêt Rodriguez de notre Cour, le débat entourant l'aide médicale à mourir s'est poursuivi. De 1991 à 2010, la Chambre des communes et ses comités ont débattu pas moins de six projets de loi d'initiative parlementaire visant à décriminaliser l'aide au suicide. Aucun n'a été adopté. Bien que les opposants à la légalisation aient souligné le caractère inadéquat des garanties et la possibilité de dévalorisation de la vie humaine, une minorité s'est exprimée énergiquement en faveur d'une réforme, faisant ressortir l'importance de la dignité et de l'autonomie de la personne ainsi que la réduction limitée des souffrances par les soins palliatifs.

majority expressed concerns about the risk of abuse under a permissive regime and the need for respect for life. A minority supported an exemption to the prohibition in some circumstances.

Le Sénat s'est lui aussi penché sur la question, produisant un rapport sur l'aide au suicide et l'euthanasie en 1995. La majorité de ses membres s'est dite préoccupée par le risque qu'un régime permissif ouvre la porte à des abus et par la nécessité de respecter la vie. Une minorité de ses membres s'est prononcée en faveur d'une exemption de l'application de la prohibition dans certaines circonstances.

[7] More recent reports have come down in favour of reform. In 2011, the Royal Society of Canada published a report on end-of-life decision-making and recommended that the Criminal Code be modified to permit assistance in dying in some circumstances. The Quebec National Assembly's Select Committee on Dying with Dignity issued a report in 2012, recommending amendments to legislation to recognize medical aid in dying as appropriate end-of-life care (now codified in An Act respecting end-of-life care, CQLR, c. S-32.0001 (not yet in force)).

[8] The legislative landscape on the issue of physician-assisted death has changed in the two decades since Rodriguez. In 1993 Sopinka J. noted that no other Western democracy expressly permitted assistance in dying. By 2010, however, eight jurisdictions permitted some form of assisted dying: the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg, Switzerland, Oregon, Washington, Montana, and Colombia. The process of legalization began in 1994, when Oregon, as a result of a citizens' initiative, altered its laws to permit medical aid in dying for a person suffering from a terminal disease. Colombia followed in 1997, after a decision of the constitutional court. The Dutch Parliament established a regulatory regime for assisted dying in 2002; Belgium quickly adopted a similar regime, with Luxembourg joining in 2009. Together, these regimes have produced a body of evidence about the practical and legal workings of physician-assisted death and the efficacy of safeguards for the vulnerable.

[9] Nevertheless, physician-assisted dying remains a criminal offence in most Western countries, and a number of courts have upheld the prohibition on such assistance in the face of constitutional and human rights challenges: see, e.g., Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997); Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997); Pretty v. United Kingdom, No. 2346/02, ECHR 2002-III; and Fleming v. Ireland, [2013] IESC 19. In a recent decision, a majority of the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom accepted that the absolute prohibition on assisted dying breached the claimants' rights, but found the evidence on safeguards insufficient; the court concluded that Parliament should be given an opportunity to debate and amend the legislation based on the court's provisional views (see R. (on the application of Nicklinson v. Ministry of Justice, [2014] UKSC 38, [2014] 3 All E.R. 843).

[9] L'aide médicale à mourir demeure néanmoins une infraction criminelle dans la plupart des pays occidentaux, et plusieurs tribunaux ont confirmé la prohibition de cette aide à l'issue de contestations constitutionnelles ou relatives aux droits de la personne : voir, p. ex., Washington c. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997); Vacco c. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997); Pretty c. Royaume-Uni, nº 2346/02, CEDH 2002-III; Fleming c. Ireland, [2013] IESC 19. Dans un arrêt récent, les juges majoritaires de la Cour suprême du Royaume-Uni ont reconnu que la prohibition absolue de l'aide à mourir portait atteinte aux droits des demandeurs, mais ont jugé insuffisante la preuve concernant les garanties; la cour a conclu qu'il faudrait donner au Parlement l'occasion de débattre de la loi et de la modifier en fonction des avis provisoires de la cour (voir R. (on the application of Nicklinson) c. Ministry of Justice, [2014] UKSC 38, [2014] 3 All E.R. 843).

[10] Dans l'arène publique, le débat reflète celui qui se poursuit au sein de la sphère législative. Certains praticiens de la santé considèrent la modification du droit comme le prolongement naturel du principe de l'autonomie du patient, alors que d'autres craignent que l'on déroge aux principes de déontologie médicale. Certaines personnes handicapées s'opposent à la légalisation de l'aide à mourir et plaident qu'elle dévalorise implicitement leur vie et les rend vulnérables à une aide à mourir non désirée, car les professionnels de la santé présument qu'un patient affecté d'un handicap [TRADUCTION] « penche plus en faveur de la mort que le patient gravement malade qui n'a pas de handicap » (2012 BCSC 886, 287 C.C.C. (3d) 1, par. 811). D'autres personnes handicapées estiment par contre qu'un régime qui accorde aux personnes un droit de regard sur la manière de mourir respecte, plutôt qu'il ne menace, leur autonomie et leur dignité, et que la légalisation de l'aide médicale à mourir les protégera en établissant des garanties plus solides et une meilleure supervision des soins médicaux de fin de vie.

[11] The impetus for this case arose in 2009, when Gloria Taylor was diagnosed with a fatal neurodegenerative disease, amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (or ALS), which causes progressive muscle weakness. ALS patients first lose the ability to use their hands and feet, then the ability to walk, chew, swallow, speak and, eventually, breathe. Like Sue Rodriguez before her, Gloria Taylor did "not want to die slowly, piece by piece" or "wracked with pain," and brought a claim before the British Columbia Supreme Court challenging the constitutionality of the Criminal Code provisions that prohibit assistance in dying, specifically ss. 14, 21, 22, 222, and 241. She was joined in her claim by Lee Carter and Hollis Johnson, who had assisted Ms. Carter's mother, Kathleen ("Kay") Carter, in achieving her goal of dying with dignity by taking her to Switzerland to use the services of DIGNITAS, an assisted-suicide clinic; Dr. William Shoichet, a physician from British Columbia who would be willing to participate in physician-assisted dying if it were no longer prohibited; and the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association, which has a long-standing interest in patients' rights and health policy and has conducted advocacy and education with respect to end-of-life choices, including assisted suicide.

causant un affaiblissement progressif des muscles. Les patients atteints de la SLA perdent tout d'abord la capacité d'utiliser leurs mains et leurs pieds, puis celle de marcher, de mastiquer, d'avaler, de parler et, finalement, de respirer. Tout comme Sue Rodriguez avant elle, Gloria Taylor [TRADUCTION] « ne voulait pas mourir lentement, à petit feu » ou « terrassée par la douleur ». Elle a donc intenté devant la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique une action contestant la constitutionnalité des dispositions du Code criminel qui prohibent l'aide à mourir, soit les art. 14, 21, 22, 222 et 241. Se sont joints à sa demande Lee Carter et Hollis Johnson, qui avaient aidé la mère de M^me^ Carter, Kathleen (« Kay ») Carter, à réaliser son souhait de mourir dans la dignité en l'emmenant en Suisse pour qu'elle puisse recourir aux services de DIGNITAS, une clinique d'aide au suicide; le D^r^ William Shoichet, un médecin de la Colombie-Britannique qui serait disposé à participer à un processus d'aide médicale à mourir si la prohibition était levée; et l'Association des libertés civiles de la Colombie-Britannique, laquelle s'intéresse depuis longtemps aux droits des patients et à la politique en matière de santé et qui a mené des activités de promotion et d'éducation en matière de choix de fin de vie, y compris l'aide au suicide.

[12] By 2010, Ms. Taylor's condition had deteriorated to the point that she required a wheelchair to go more than a short distance and was suffering pain from muscle deterioration. She required home support for assistance with the daily tasks of living, something that she described as an assault on her privacy, dignity, and self-esteem. She continued to pursue an independent life despite her illness, but found that she was steadily losing the ability to participate fully in that life. Ms. Taylor informed her family and friends of a desire to obtain a physician-assisted death. She did not want to "live in a bedridden state, stripped of dignity and independence", she said; nor did she want an "ugly death". This is how she explained her desire to seek a physician-assisted death:

[12] En 2010, l'état de santé de M^me^ Taylor s'était détérioré à un point tel qu'elle devait se déplacer en fauteuil roulant, sauf pour parcourir de courtes distances, et la détérioration de ses muscles lui causait de la douleur. Elle avait besoin d'un soutien à domicile pour accomplir ses tâches quotidiennes, ce qu'elle a décrit comme un affront à sa vie privée, à sa dignité et à son estime de soi. Malgré sa maladie, elle a continué de mener une existence indépendante, mais elle a constaté qu'elle perdait de plus en plus la capacité de vivre ainsi. M^me^ Taylor a informé sa famille et ses amis de son désir d'obtenir une aide médicale à mourir. Elle a dit ne pas vouloir [TRADUCTION] « vivre clouée au lit, dépouillée de sa dignité et de son indépendance », et qu'elle ne voulait pas non plus d'une [TRADUCTION] « mort affreuse ». C'est en ces termes qu'elle a expliqué son vœu de demander une aide médicale à mourir :

I do not want my life to end violently. I do not want my mode of death to be traumatic for my family members. I want the legal right to die peacefully, at the time of my own choosing, in the embrace of my family and friends.

I know that I am dying, but I am far from depressed. I have some down time – that is part and parcel of the experience of knowing that you are terminal. But there is still a lot of good in my life; there are still things, like special times with my granddaughter and family, that bring me extreme joy. I will not waste any of my remaining time being depressed. I intend to get every bit of happiness I can wring from what is left of my life so long as it remains a life of quality; but I do not want to live a life without quality. There will come a point when I will know that enough is enough. I cannot say precisely when that time will be. It is not a question of "when I can't walk" or "when I can't talk." There is no pre-set trigger moment. I just know that, globally, there will be some point in time when I will be able to say – "this is it, this is the point where life is just not worthwhile." When that time comes, I want to be able to call my family together, tell them of my decision, say a dignified good-bye and obtain final closure – for me and for them.

My present quality of life is impaired by the fact that I am unable to say for certain that I will have the right to ask for physician-assisted dying when that "enough is enough" moment arrives. I live in apprehension that my death will be slow, difficult, unpleasant, painful, undignified and inconsistent with the values and principles I have tried to live by. . . .

. . . What I fear is a death that negates, as opposed to concludes, my life. I do not want to die slowly, piece by piece. I do not want to waste away unconscious in a hospital bed. I do not want to die wracked with pain.

[13] Ms. Taylor, however, knew she would be unable to request a physician-assisted death when the time came, because of the Criminal Code prohibition and the fact that she lacked the financial resources to travel to Switzerland, where assisted suicide is legal and available to non-residents. This mourrai soit traumatisante pour les membres de ma famille. Je veux qu'on me reconnaisse le droit de mourir paisiblement, au moment que je choisirai, dans les bras de ma famille et de mes amis.

Je sais que je vais bientôt mourir, mais je suis loin d'être déprimée. Je suis parfois découragée – cela fait partie intégrante de l'expérience de savoir que l'on est en phase terminale. Mais la vie m'apporte encore beaucoup de bonnes choses, comme des moments spéciaux en compagnie de ma petite-fille et de ma famille, ce qui me procure une joie immense. Je ne gaspillerai pas le temps qui me reste à être déprimée. J'entends saisir chaque moment de bonheur que je peux encore arracher au temps qu'il me reste à vivre, dans la mesure où il s'agit d'une vie de qualité; mais je ne veux pas d'une vie sans qualité. Il viendra un moment où je saurai que c'en est assez. Je ne peux pas dire exactement quand ce moment arrivera. Ce n'est pas « quand je ne pourrai plus marcher » ou « quand je ne pourrai plus parler ». Il n'y a aucun moment déclencheur préétabli. Je sais simplement que, globalement, il viendra un moment où je pourrai dire : « ça y est, le moment est arrivé où la vie n'en vaut tout simplement plus la peine. » Quand ce moment arrivera, je veux pouvoir réunir les membres de ma famille, les informer de ma décision, leur faire dignement mes adieux et tourner définitivement la page – tant pour eux que pour moi.

Actuellement, ma qualité de vie est diminuée par le fait que je suis incapable d'affirmer avec certitude que j'aurai le droit de demander de l'aide médicale à mourir quand arrivera le moment où « c'en sera assez ». Je vis dans la hantise d'une mort lente, difficile, désagréable, douloureuse, humiliante et incompatible avec les valeurs et principes selon lesquels j'ai essayé de vivre. . .

. . . Ce que je crains, c'est une mort qui, au lieu d'apporter une conclusion à ma vie, en efface les traces. Je ne veux pas mourir lentement, à petit feu. Je ne veux pas dépérir, inconsciente, dans un lit d'hôpital. Je ne veux pas mourir terrassée par la douleur.

[13] M^me^ Taylor savait cependant qu'il lui serait impossible de demander une aide médicale à mourir au moment venu parce que le Code criminel le prohibait et qu'elle n'avait pas les ressources financières voulues pour se rendre en Suisse, où l'aide au suicide est légale et offerte aux non-résidents.

left her with what she described as the "cruel choice" between killing herself while she was still physically capable of doing so, or giving up the ability to exercise any control over the manner and timing of her death.

[14] Other witnesses also described the "horrible" choice faced by a person suffering from a grievous and irremediable illness. The stories in the affidavits vary in their details: some witnesses described the progression of degenerative illnesses like motor neuron diseases or Huntington's disease, while others described the agony of treatment and the fear of a gruesome death from advanced-stage cancer. Yet running through the evidence of all the witnesses is a constant theme — that they suffer from the knowledge that they lack the ability to bring a peaceful end to their lives at a time and in a manner of their own choosing.

[15] Some describe how they had considered seeking out the traditional modes of suicide but found that choice, too, repugnant:

> I was going to blow my head off. I have a gun and I seriously considered doing it. I decided that I could not do that to my family. It would be horrible to put them through something like that. . . . I want a better choice than that.

A number of the witnesses made clear that they — or their loved ones — had considered or in fact committed suicide earlier than they would have chosen to die if physician-assisted death had been available to them. One woman noted that the conventional methods of suicide, such as carbon monoxide asphyxiation, slitting of the wrists or overdosing on street drugs, would require that she end her life "while I am still able bodied and capable of taking my life, well ahead of when I actually need to leave this life".

Elle se trouvait ainsi devant ce qu'elle a décrit comme le [TRADUCTION] « choix cruel » entre mettre fin elle-même à ses jours alors qu'elle était encore physiquement apte à le faire, ou renoncer à la possibilité d'exercer un droit de regard sur le moment et la manière de mourir.

> [TRADUCTION] J'allais me faire sauter la cervelle. Je possède une arme à feu et j'ai sérieusement pensé à passer à l'acte. J'ai décidé que je ne pouvais pas faire cela à ma famille. Il serait horrible de leur faire vivre une chose pareille. [. . .] Je veux une meilleure solution.

Des témoins ont précisé qu'eux-mêmes — ou des êtres chers — avaient envisagé de se suicider et que, dans certains cas, des personnes s'étaient suicidées plus tôt qu'au moment où elles auraient choisi de mourir si elles avaient eu accès à une aide médicale à mourir. Une femme a souligné que le recours aux méthodes de suicide classiques telles l'asphyxie au monoxyde de carbone, l'ouverture des veines ou une surdose de drogues illicites, l'obligerait à mettre fin à ses jours [TRADUCTION] « alors que je suis encore physiquement apte à m'enlever la vie, bien avant que j'aie effectivement besoin de quitter ce monde ».

death and exposing their loved ones to prosecution for assisting them in ending their lives. Speaking of himself and his wife, one man said: "We both face this reality, that we have only two terrible and imperfect options, with a sense of horror and loathing."

[17] Ms. Carter and Mr. Johnson described Kay Carter's journey to assisted suicide in Switzerland and their role in facilitating that process. Kay was diagnosed in 2008 with spinal stenosis, a condition that results in the progressive compression of the spinal cord. By mid-2009, her physical condition had deteriorated to the point that she required assistance with virtually all of her daily activities. She had extremely limited mobility and suffered from chronic pain. As her illness progressed, Kay informed her family that she did not wish to live out her life as an "ironing board", lying flat in bed. She asked her daughter, Lee Carter, and her daughter's husband, Hollis Johnson, to support and assist her in arranging an assisted suicide in Switzerland, and to travel there with her for that purpose. Although aware that assisting Kay could expose them both to prosecution in Canada, they agreed to assist her. In early 2010, they attended a clinic in Switzerland operated by DIGNITAS, a Swiss "death with dignity" organization. Kay took the prescribed dose of sodium pentobarbital while surrounded by her family, and passed away within 20 minutes.

[18] Ms. Carter and Mr. Johnson found the process of planning and arranging for Kay's trip to Switzerland difficult, in part because their activities had to be kept secret due to the potential for criminal sanctions. While they have not faced prosecution in Canada following Kay's death, Ms. Carter and Mr. Johnson are of the view that Kay ought to have been able to obtain a physician-assisted suicide at home, surrounded by her family and friends, rather than undergoing the stressful and expensive prolongée ou douloureuse et exposer leurs proches à des poursuites pour les avoir aidés à mettre fin à leurs jours. Parlant de lui-même et de son épouse, un homme a dit ce qui suit : [TRADUCTION] « Nous sommes tous deux confrontés à cette réalité, de n'avoir que deux solutions terribles et imparfaites, avec un sentiment d'horreur et de dégoût. »

[17] M^me^ Carter et M. Johnson ont décrit le voyage qu'a fait Kay Carter en Suisse pour mettre à exécution son projet de suicide assisté, ainsi que le rôle qu'ils ont joué pour en faciliter la réalisation. En 2008, on a diagnostiqué chez Kay une sténose du canal rachidien lombaire, une maladie qui entraîne la compression progressive de la moelle épinière. Au milieu de l'année 2009, son état de santé s'était détérioré à un point tel qu'elle avait besoin d'aide pour presque toutes ses activités quotidiennes. Sa mobilité était extrêmement réduite et elle souffrait de douleurs chroniques. Vu la progression de sa maladie, Kay a informé sa famille qu'elle ne voulait pas vivre le reste de sa vie alitée, comme une [TRADUCTION] « planche à repasser ». Elle a sollicité l'aide et le soutien de sa fille, Lee Carter, et du mari de celle-ci, Hollis Johnson, pour organiser un suicide assisté en Suisse, et elle leur a demandé de l'accompagner dans ce pays à cette fin. Bien que conscients qu'ils s'exposaient tous les deux à des poursuites au Canada s'ils venaient en aide à Kay, ils ont néanmoins consenti à le faire. Au début de 2010, ils se sont rendus en Suisse dans une clinique exploitée par DIGNITAS, une organisation suisse militant pour le droit de « mourir dans la dignité ». Entourée de sa famille, Kay a pris la dose de pentobarbital sodique prescrite et elle est décédée moins de 20 minutes plus tard.

[18] M^me^ Carter et M. Johnson ont trouvé difficile le processus de planification et d'organisation du voyage de Kay en Suisse, en partie parce que leurs activités devaient rester secrètes compte tenu du risque de sanctions criminelles. Bien qu'ils n'aient pas fait l'objet de poursuites au Canada à la suite du décès de Kay, M^me^ Carter et M. Johnson sont d'avis que celle-ci aurait dû pouvoir obtenir une aide médicale à mourir dans son pays, entourée de sa famille et de ses amis, au lieu de devoir se soumettre au process of arranging for the procedure overseas. Accordingly, they joined Ms. Taylor in pressing for the legalization of physician-assisted death.

III. Statutory Provisions

[19] The appellants challenge the constitutionality of the following provisions of the Criminal Code:

14. No person is entitled to consent to have death inflicted on him, and such consent does not affect the criminal responsibility of any person by whom death may be inflicted on the person by whom consent is given.

21. (1) Every one is a party to an offence who

(b) does or omits to do anything for the purpose of aiding any person to commit it; or

(2) Where two or more persons form an intention in common to carry out an unlawful purpose and to assist each other therein and any one of them, in carrying out the common purpose, commits an offence, each of them who knew or ought to have known that the commission of the offence would be a probable consequence of carrying out the common purpose is a party to that offence.

22. (1) Where a person counsels another person to be a party to an offence and that other person is afterwards a party to that offence, the person who counselled is a party to that offence, notwithstanding that the offence was committed in a way different from that which was counselled.

(2) Every one who counsels another person to be a party to an offence is a party to every offence that the other commits in consequence of the counselling that the person who counselled knew or ought to have known was likely to be committed in consequence of the counselling.

(3) For the purposes of this Act, "counsel" includes procure, solicit or incite.

222. (1) A person commits homicide when, directly or indirectly, by any means, he causes the death of a human being.

processus stressant et onéreux d'obtention d'une telle aide à l'étranger. En conséquence, ils se sont joints à M^me^ Taylor pour revendiquer la légalisation de l'aide médicale à mourir.

III. Dispositions législatives

[19] Les appelants contestent la constitutionnalité des dispositions suivantes du Code criminel :

14. Nul n'a le droit de consentir à ce que la mort lui soit infligée, et un tel consentement n'atteint pas la responsabilité pénale d'une personne par qui la mort peut être infligée à celui qui a donné ce consentement.

21. (1) Participent à une infraction :

b) quiconque accomplit ou omet d'accomplir quelque chose en vue d'aider quelqu'un à la commettre;

(2) Quand deux ou plusieurs personnes forment ensemble le projet de poursuivre une fin illégale et de s'y entraider et que l'une d'entre elles commet une infraction en réalisant cette fin commune, chacune d'elles qui savait ou devait savoir que la réalisation de l'intention commune aurait pour conséquence probable la perpétration de l'infraction, participe à cette infraction.

22. (1) Lorsqu'une personne conseille à une autre personne de participer à une infraction et que cette dernière y participe subséquemment, la personne qui a conseillé participe à cette infraction, même si l'infraction a été commise d'une manière différente de celle qui avait été conseillée.

(2) Quiconque conseille à une autre personne de participer à une infraction participe à chaque infraction que l'autre commet en conséquence du conseil et qui, d'après ce que savait ou aurait dû savoir celui qui a conseillé, était susceptible d'être commise en conséquence du conseil.

(3) Pour l'application de la présente loi, « conseiller » s'entend d'amener et d'inciter, et « conseil » s'entend de l'encouragement visant à amener ou à inciter.

222. (1) Commet un homicide quiconque, directement ou indirectement, par quelque moyen, cause la mort d'un être humain.

(2) Homicide is culpable or not culpable.

(3) Homicide that is not culpable is not an offence.

(4) Culpable homicide is murder or manslaughter or infanticide.

(5) A person commits culpable homicide when he causes the death of a human being,

(a) by means of an unlawful act;

241. Every one who

(a) counsels a person to commit suicide, or

(b) aids or abets a person to commit suicide, whether suicide ensues or not, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

[20] In our view, two of these provisions are at the core of the constitutional challenge: s. 241(b), which says that everyone who aids or abets a person in committing suicide commits an indictable offence, and s. 14, which says that no person may consent to death being inflicted on them. It is these two provisions that prohibit the provision of assistance in dying. Sections 21, 22, and 222 are only engaged so long as the provision of assistance in dying is itself an "unlawful act" or offence. Section 241(a) does not contribute to the prohibition on assisted suicide.

[21] The Charter states:

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

(2) L'homicide est coupable ou non coupable.

(3) L'homicide non coupable ne constitue pas une infraction.

(4) L'homicide coupable est le meurtre, l'homicide involontaire coupable ou l'infanticide.

(5) Une personne commet un homicide coupable lorsqu'elle cause la mort d'un être humain :

a) soit au moyen d'un acte illégal;

241. Est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement maximal de quatorze ans quiconque, selon le cas :

a) conseille à une personne de se donner la mort;

b) aide ou encourage quelqu'un à se donner la mort, que le suicide s'ensuive ou non.

[20] À notre avis, deux de ces dispositions sont au cœur de la présente contestation constitutionnelle : l'al. 241*b*), aux termes duquel quiconque aide ou encourage quelqu'un à se donner la mort est coupable d'un acte criminel, et l'art. 14, qui précise que nul ne peut consentir à ce que la mort lui soit infligée. Ce sont ces deux dispositions qui prohibent le fait d'aider une personne à mourir. Les articles 21, 22 et 222 s'appliquent uniquement si le fait d'aider quelqu'un à se donner la mort constitue en soi un « acte illégal » ou une infraction. L'alinéa 241*a*) ne contribue en rien à la prohibition du suicide assisté.

1. La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés. Ils ne peuvent être restreints que par une règle de droit, dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

7. Chacun a droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne; il ne peut être porté atteinte à ce droit qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale.

15. (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

15. (1) La loi ne fait acception de personne et s'applique également à tous, et tous ont droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi, indépendamment de toute discrimination, notamment des discriminations fondées sur la race, l'origine nationale ou ethnique, la couleur, la religion, le sexe, l'âge ou les déficiences mentales ou physiques.

IV. Judicial History

A. British Columbia Supreme Court, 2012 BCSC 886, 287 C.C.C. (3d) 1

[22] The action was brought by way of summary trial before Smith J. in the British Columbia Supreme Court. While the majority of the evidence was presented in affidavit form, a number of the expert witnesses were cross-examined, both prior to trial and before the trial judge. The record was voluminous: the trial judge canvassed evidence from Canada and from the permissive jurisdictions on medical ethics and current end-of-life practices, the risks associated with assisted suicide, and the feasibility of safeguards.

[23] The trial judge began by reviewing the current state of the law and practice in Canada regarding end-of-life care. She found that current unregulated end-of-life practices in Canada — such as the administration of palliative sedation and the withholding or withdrawal of lifesaving or life-sustaining medical treatment — can have the effect of hastening death and that there is a strong societal consensus that these practices are ethically acceptable (para. 357). After considering the evidence of physicians and ethicists, she found that the "preponderance of the evidence from ethicists is that there is no ethical distinction between physician-assisted death and other end-of-life practices whose outcome is highly likely to be death" (para. 335). Finally, she found that there are qualified Canadian physicians who would find it ethical to assist a patient in dying if that act were not prohibited by law (para. 319).

IV. Historique judiciaire

[22] L'action intentée par voie de procédure sommaire a été instruite par la juge Smith de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique. Quoique la majeure partie de la preuve ait été présentée sous forme d'affidavit, un certain nombre de témoins experts ont été contre-interrogés, tant avant le procès que devant la juge de première instance. Le dossier était volumineux : la juge de première instance a examiné attentivement les éléments de preuve provenant du Canada et des endroits où l'aide à mourir est autorisée relativement à l'éthique médicale et aux pratiques utilisées actuellement en fin de vie, aux risques associés à l'aide au suicide ainsi qu'à la possibilité d'appliquer des garanties.

[23] La juge de première instance a d'abord passé en revue l'état actuel du droit et la pratique, au Canada, en ce qui concerne les soins en fin de vie. Elle a estimé que les pratiques utilisées actuellement en fin de vie en l'absence de toute réglementation au Canada — notamment l'administration d'une sédation palliative et l'arrêt ou le retrait d'un traitement vital ou de maintien de la vie — peuvent avoir pour effet de précipiter la mort, et qu'il existe un fort consensus dans la société sur le caractère acceptable de telles pratiques sur le plan éthique (par. 357). Après avoir examiné les éléments de preuve émanant de médecins et d'éthiciens, elle a considéré que, selon la [TRADUCTION] « prépondérance de la preuve émanant d'éthiciens, il n'y a aucune distinction sur le plan éthique entre l'aide médicale à mourir et les autres pratiques utilisées en fin de vie dont l'issue est selon toute vraisemblance la mort » (par. 335). Enfin, elle a estimé que des médecins canadiens qualifiés considéreraient éthique d'aider un patient à mourir si un tel acte n'était pas prohibé par la loi (par. 319).

[24] Based on these findings, the trial judge concluded that, while there is no clear societal consensus on physician-assisted dying, there is a strong consensus that it would only be ethical with respect to voluntary adults who are competent, informed, grievously and irremediably ill, and where the assistance is "clearly consistent with the patient's wishes and best interests, and [provided] in order to relieve suffering" (para. 358).

[25] The trial judge then turned to the evidence from the regimes that permit physician-assisted dying. She reviewed the safeguards in place in each jurisdiction and considered the effectiveness of each regulatory regime. In each system, she found general compliance with regulations, although she noted some room for improvement. The evidence from Oregon and the Netherlands showed that a system can be designed to protect the socially vulnerable. Expert evidence established that the "predicted abuse and disproportionate impact on vulnerable populations has not materialized" in Belgium, the Netherlands, and Oregon (para. 684). She concluded that > although none of the systems has achieved perfection, empirical researchers and practitioners who have experience in those systems are of the view that they work well in protecting patients from abuse while allowing competent patients to choose the timing of their deaths. [para. 685]

While stressing the need for caution in drawing conclusions for Canada based on foreign experience, the trial judge found that "weak inference[s]" could be drawn about the effectiveness of safeguards and the potential degree of compliance with any permissive regime (para. 683).

Bien qu'elle ait souligné que la circonspection s'imposait avant de tirer, à l'égard du Canada, des conclusions fondées sur l'expérience acquise à l'étranger, la juge de première instance a estimé que des [TRADUCTION] « inférence[s] sujette[s] à caution » pouvaient être tirées quant à l'efficacité des garanties et au degré possible de respect d'un régime permissif (par. 683).

[26] Based on the evidence from the permissive jurisdictions, the trial judge also rejected the argument that the legalization of physician-assisted dying would impede the development of palliative care in the country, finding that the effects of a permissive regime, while speculative, would "not necessarily be negative" (para. 736). Similarly, she concluded that any changes in the physician-patient relationship following legalization "could prove to be neutral or for the good" (para. 746).

[27] The trial judge then considered the risks of a permissive regime and the feasibility of implementing safeguards to address those risks. After reviewing the evidence tendered by physicians and experts in patient assessment, she concluded that physicians were capable of reliably assessing patient competence, including in the context of life-and-death decisions (para. 798). She found that it was possible to detect coercion, undue influence, and ambivalence as part of this assessment process (paras. 815, 843). She also found that the informed consent standard could be applied in the context of physician-assisted death, so long as care was taken to "ensure a patient is properly informed of her diagnosis and prognosis" and the treatment options described included all reasonable palliative care interventions (para. 831). Ultimately, she concluded that the risks of physician-assisted death "can be identified and very substantially minimized through a carefully-designed system" that imposes strict limits that are scrupulously monitored and enforced (para. 883).

[28] Having reviewed the copious evidence before her, the trial judge concluded that the decision in Rodriguez did not prevent her from reviewing the constitutionality of the impugned provisions, because (1) the majority in Rodriguez did not address the right to life; (2) the principles of overbreadth and gross disproportionality had not been identified at the time of the decision in Rodriguez

[27] La juge de première instance a alors examiné les risques que pose un régime permissif et la faisabilité de la mise en place de garanties pour contrer ces risques. Après un examen des témoignages des médecins et des experts en matière d'évaluation des patients, elle a conclu que les médecins étaient en mesure d'évaluer de manière fiable la capacité d'un patient, notamment à l'égard des décisions touchant la vie et la mort (par. 798). Ce processus d'évaluation permet, selon elle, de déceler l'existence de contraintes, d'influence injustifiée et d'ambivalence (par. 815, 843). Elle a également conclu que la norme régissant le consentement éclairé pouvait s'appliquer dans le contexte de l'aide médicale à mourir, à la condition que l'on ait pris soin de [TRADUCTION] « s'assurer que le patient soit adéquatement informé de son diagnostic et de son pronostic », et d'inclure dans la gamme des traitements décrits toutes les mesures de soins palliatifs raisonnables (par. 831). Enfin, elle a conclu que les risques de l'aide médicale à mourir [TRADUCTION] « peuvent être reconnus et réduits considérablement dans un régime soigneusement conçu » qui impose des limites strictes scrupuleusement surveillées et appliquées (par. 883).

and thus were not addressed in that decision; (3) the majority only "assumed" a violation of s. 15; and (4) the decision in Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 567, represented a "substantive change" to the s. 1 analysis (para. 994). The trial judge concluded that these changes in the law, combined with the changes in the social and factual landscape over the past 20 years, permitted her to reconsider the constitutionality on the prohibition on physician-assisted dying.

totalement disproportionné n'avaient pas encore été établis au moment où cet arrêt a été rendu et n'avaient donc pas été examinés dans celui-ci; (3) les juges majoritaires avaient seulement « supposé » l'existence d'une violation de l'art. 15; et (4) l'arrêt Alberta c. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 CSC 37, [2009] 2 R.C.S. 567, a représenté un [TRADUCTION] « changement substantiel » dans l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier (par. 994). Selon la juge de première instance, ces changements dans l'état du droit, conjugués aux changements observés dans le paysage social et factuel au cours des 20 dernières années, lui permettaient de revoir la constitutionnalité de la prohibition de l'aide médicale à mourir.

[29] The trial judge then turned to the Charter analysis. She first asked whether the prohibition violated the s. 15 equality guarantee. She found that the provisions imposed a disproportionate burden on persons with physical disabilities, as only they are restricted to self-imposed starvation and dehydration in order to take their own lives (para. 1076). This distinction, she found, is discriminatory, and not justified under s. 1. While the objective of the prohibition — the protection of vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness — is pressing and substantial and the means are rationally connected to that purpose, the prohibition is not minimally impairing. A "stringently limited, carefully monitored system of exceptions" would achieve Parliament's objective:

> Permission for physician-assisted death for grievously ill and irremediably suffering people who are competent, fully informed, non-ambivalent, and free from coercion or duress, with stringent and well-enforced safeguards, could achieve that objective in a real and substantial way. [para. 1243]

[29] La juge de première instance a ensuite procédé à l'analyse fondée sur la Charte. Elle s'est d'abord demandé si la prohibition violait la garantie d'égalité de l'art. 15. Elle a conclu que les dispositions imposaient un fardeau disproportionné aux personnes handicapées physiquement, car pour s'enlever la vie, elles seules sont limitées au refus de s'alimenter et de s'hydrater (par. 1076). À son avis, cette distinction est discriminatoire et n'est pas justifiée au regard de l'article premier. Bien que l'objectif de la prohibition — protéger les personnes vulnérables contre toute incitation à se donner la mort dans un moment de faiblesse — soit urgent et réel, et qu'il existe un lien rationnel entre le moyen choisi et cet objectif, la prohibition ne constitue pas une atteinte minimale. Un [TRADUCTION] « régime assorti d'exceptions, rigoureusement circonscrit et surveillé attentivement » permettrait de réaliser l'objectif du législateur :

[30] Turning to s. 7 of the Charter, which protects life, liberty and security of the person, the trial judge found that the prohibition impacted all three interests. The prohibition on seeking physician-assisted dying deprived individuals of liberty, which encompasses "the right to non-interference by the state with fundamentally important and personal medical decision-making" (para. 1302). In addition, it also impinged on Ms. Taylor's security of the person by restricting her control over her bodily integrity. While the trial judge rejected a "qualitative" approach to the right to life, concluding that the right to life is only engaged by a threat of death, she concluded that Ms. Taylor's right to life was engaged insofar as the prohibition might force her to take her life earlier than she otherwise would if she had access to a physician-assisted death.

[31] The trial judge concluded that the deprivation of the claimants' s. 7 rights was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, particularly the principles against overbreadth and gross disproportionality. The prohibition was broader than necessary, as the evidence showed that a system with properly designed and administered safeguards offered a less restrictive means of reaching the government's objective. Moreover, the "very severe" effects of the absolute prohibition in relation to its salutary effects rendered it grossly disproportionate (para. 1378). As with the s. 15 infringement, the trial judge found the s. 7 infringement was not justified under s. 1.

[32] In the result, the trial judge declared the prohibition unconstitutional, granted a one-year suspension of invalidity, and provided Ms. Taylor with a constitutional exemption for use during the one-year period of the suspension. Ms. Taylor passed away prior to the appeal of this matter, without accessing the exemption.

[33] In a separate decision on costs (2012 BCSC 1587, 271 C.R.R. (2d) 224), the trial judge ordered an award of special costs in favour of the plaintiffs. The issues in the case were "complex and que la prohibition avait une incidence sur ces trois intérêts. La prohibition de demander de l'aide médicale à mourir privait les personnes de leur liberté, qui comporte [TRADUCTION] « le droit d'être protégé des ingérences de l'État relativement aux décisions médicales fondamentalement importantes et personnelles » (par. 1302). La prohibition empiétait également sur la sécurité de la personne de M^me^ Taylor en limitant la maîtrise qu'elle exerçait sur son intégrité corporelle. Même si la juge de première instance a rejeté une approche « qualitative » du droit à la vie et a statué que seule une menace de mort faisait intervenir ce droit, elle a estimé que le droit à la vie de M^me^ Taylor était en jeu dans la mesure où la prohibition la forcerait peut-être à s'enlever la vie plus tôt qu'elle ne le ferait si elle pouvait obtenir une aide médicale à mourir.

[32] En conséquence, la juge de première instance a déclaré la prohibition inconstitutionnelle, a suspendu pour un an la prise d'effet de sa déclaration d'invalidité et a accordé à M^me^ Taylor une exemption constitutionnelle qu'elle pourrait utiliser pendant cette période de suspension. M^me^ Taylor est décédée avant l'audition de l'appel de cette décision, sans recourir à l'exemption.

momentous" (para. 87) and the plaintiffs could not have prosecuted the case without assistance from pro bono counsel; an award of special costs would therefore promote the public interest in encouraging experienced counsel to take on Charter litigation on a pro bono basis. The trial judge ordered the Attorney General of British Columbia to pay 10 percent of the costs, noting that she had taken a full and active role in the proceedings. Canada was ordered to pay the remaining 90 percent of the award.

étaient [TRADUCTION] « complexes et de grande importance » (par. 87) et les demandeurs n'auraient pas pu poursuivre l'affaire sans l'aide d'un avocat bénévole; l'octroi de dépens spéciaux aurait donc pour effet de promouvoir l'intérêt du public à encourager les avocats d'expérience à accepter de se charger bénévolement de litiges fondés sur la Charte. La juge a ordonné à la procureure générale de la Colombie-Britannique de payer 10 pour 100 des dépens, soulignant qu'elle avait participé pleinement et activement à l'instance. Le Canada a été condamné à payer le reste, soit 90 pour 100 des dépens.

[34] The majority of the Court of Appeal, per Newbury and Saunders JJ.A., allowed Canada's appeal on the ground that the trial judge was bound to follow this Court's decision in Rodriguez. The majority concluded that neither the change in legislative and social facts nor the new legal issues relied on by the trial judge permitted a departure from Rodriguez.

[35] The majority read Rodriguez as implicitly rejecting the proposition that the prohibition infringes the right to life under s. 7 of the Charter. It concluded that the post-Rodriguez principles of fundamental justice — namely overbreadth and gross disproportionality — did not impose a new legal framework under s. 7. While acknowledging that the reasons in Rodriguez did not follow the analytical methodology that now applies under s. 7, the majority held that this would not have changed the result.

[35] Selon les juges majoritaires, la Cour dans Rodriguez a implicitement rejeté la proposition selon laquelle la prohibition porte atteinte au droit à la vie garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte. Ils ont conclu que les principes de justice fondamentale établis après cet arrêt — la portée excessive et le caractère totalement disproportionné — n'avaient pas pour effet d'imposer un nouveau cadre juridique fondé sur l'art. 7. Tout en reconnaissant que les motifs exposés dans l'arrêt Rodriguez ne suivaient pas la méthode d'analyse maintenant applicable dans le cadre d'un examen fondé sur l'art. 7, les juges majoritaires ont estimé que cela n'aurait rien changé au résultat.

[36] The majority also noted that Rodriguez disposed of the s. 15 equality argument (which only two judges in that case expressly considered) by holding that any rights violation worked by the prohibition was justified as a reasonable limit under s. 1 of the Charter. The decision in Hutterian

Brethren did not represent a change in the law under s. 1. Had it been necessary to consider s. 1 in relation to s. 7, the majority opined, the s. 1 analysis carried out under s. 15 likely would have led to the same conclusion — the "blanket prohibition" under s. 241 of the Criminal Code was justified (para. 323). Accordingly, the majority concluded that "the trial judge was bound to find that the plaintiffs' case had been authoritatively decided by Rodriguez" (para. 324).

de cette prohibition était justifiée en tant que limite raisonnable au sens de l'article premier de la Charte. L'arrêt Hutterian Brethren n'a pas modifié le droit applicable en ce qui a trait à l'article premier. Selon les juges majoritaires, s'il avait été nécessaire d'examiner l'article premier au regard de l'art. 7, l'analyse que requiert l'article premier à l'égard d'une violation de l'art. 15 aurait mené à la même conclusion : la « prohibition générale » prévue à l'art. 241 du Code criminel était justifiée (par. 323). Les juges majoritaires ont donc estimé que [TRADUCTION] « la juge de première instance était tenue de conclure qu'on avait statué péremptoirement sur la cause des demandeurs dans l'arrêt Rodriguez » (par. 324).

[38] The majority denied the appellants their costs, given the outcome, but otherwise would have approved the trial judge's award of special costs. In addition, the majority held that costs should not have been awarded against British Columbia.

[39] Finch C.J.B.C., dissenting, found no errors in the trial judge's assessment of stare decisis, her application of s. 7, or the corresponding analysis under s. 1. However, he concluded that the trial judge was bound by Sopinka J.'s conclusion that any s. 15 infringement was saved by s. 1. While he essentially agreed with her s. 7 analysis, he would have accepted a broader, qualitative scope for the right to life. He agreed with the trial judge that the prohibition was not minimally impairing, and concluded that a "carefully regulated scheme" could meet Parliament's objectives (para. 177); therefore, the breach of s. 7 could not be justified under s. 1.

[39] Le juge en chef Finch, dissident, n'a relevé aucune erreur dans l'examen, par la juge de première instance, du principe du stare decisis, dans l'application qu'elle a faite de l'art. 7, ni dans l'analyse correspondante fondée sur l'article premier. Il a toutefois conclu qu'elle était liée par la conclusion du juge Sopinka selon laquelle toute violation de l'art. 15 était sauvegardée par l'article premier. Bien qu'il ait souscrit pour l'essentiel à l'analyse fondée sur l'art. 7 qu'elle avait faite, il aurait aussi accepté qu'une portée plus large, et qualitative, soit conférée au droit à la vie. Il a convenu avec elle que la prohibition ne constituait pas une atteinte minimale,

He would have upheld the trial judge's order on costs.

V. Issues on Appeal

[40] The main issue in this case is whether the prohibition on physician-assisted dying found in s. 241(b) of the Criminal Code violates the claimants' rights under ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. For the purposes of their claim, the appellants use "physician-assisted death" and "physician-assisted dying" to describe the situation where a physician provides or administers medication that intentionally brings about the patient's death, at the request of the patient. The appellants advance two claims: (1) that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying deprives competent adults, who suffer a grievous and irremediable medical condition that causes the person to endure physical or psychological suffering that is intolerable to that person, of their right to life, liberty and security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter; and (2) that the prohibition deprives adults who are physically disabled of their right to equal treatment under s. 15 of the Charter.

[41] Before turning to the Charter claims, two preliminary issues arise: (1) whether this Court's decision in Rodriguez can be revisited; and (2) whether the prohibition is beyond Parliament's power because physician-assisted dying lies at the core of the provincial jurisdiction over health.

VI. Was the Trial Judge Bound by Rodriguez?

[42] The adjudicative facts in Rodriguez were very similar to the facts before the trial judge. Ms. Rodriguez, like Ms. Taylor, was dying of ALS.

et a conclu qu'un [TRADUCTION] « régime soigneusement réglementé » pourrait satisfaire aux objectifs du législateur (par. 177); la violation de l'art. 7 ne pouvait donc, à son sens, être justifiée au regard de l'article premier. Il aurait confirmé l'ordonnance de première instance relative aux dépens.

V. Questions en litige soulevées dans le présent pourvoi

VI. La juge de première instance était-elle liée par l'arrêt Rodriguez?

[42] Les faits en litige dans Rodriguez étaient très semblables à ceux dont était saisie la juge de première instance. M^me^ Rodriguez, comme M^me^ Taylor,

She, like Ms. Taylor, wanted the right to seek a physician's assistance in dying when her suffering became intolerable. The majority of the Court, per Sopinka J., held that the prohibition deprived Ms. Rodriguez of her security of the person, but found that it did so in a manner that was in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The majority also assumed that the provision violated the claimant's s. 15 rights, but held that the limit was justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

allait mourir de la SLA. Elle revendiquait, elle aussi, le droit de demander une aide médicale à mourir lorsque sa souffrance deviendrait intolérable. Au nom des juges majoritaires de la Cour, le juge Sopinka a statué que la prohibition portait atteinte au droit de M^me^ Rodriguez à la sécurité de sa personne, mais d'une manière compatible avec les principes de justice fondamentale. Les juges majoritaires ont également supposé que la disposition en cause portait atteinte aux droits garantis à la plaignante par l'art. 15, mais ont conclu que cette atteinte était justifiée au regard de l'article premier de la Charte.

[43] Canada and Ontario argue that the trial judge was bound by Rodriguez and not entitled to revisit the constitutionality of the legislation prohibiting assisted suicide. Ontario goes so far as to argue that "vertical stare decisis" is a constitutional principle that requires all lower courts to rigidly follow this Court's Charter precedents unless and until this Court sets them aside.

[44] The doctrine that lower courts must follow the decisions of higher courts is fundamental to our legal system. It provides certainty while permitting the orderly development of the law in incremental steps. However, stare decisis is not a straitjacket that condemns the law to stasis. Trial courts may reconsider settled rulings of higher courts in two situations: (1) where a new legal issue is raised; and (2) where there is a change in the circumstances or evidence that "fundamentally shifts the parameters of the debate" (Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 1101, at para. 42).

[45] Both conditions were met in this case. The trial judge explained her decision to revisit Rodriguez by noting the changes in both the legal framework for s. 7 and the evidence on controlling the risk of abuse associated with assisted suicide.

[46] The argument before the trial judge involved a different legal conception of s. 7 than that prevailing when Rodriguez was decided. In particular, the law relating to the principles of overbreadth and gross disproportionality had materially advanced since Rodriguez. The majority of this Court in Rodriguez acknowledged the argument that the impugned laws were "over-inclusive" when discussing the principles of fundamental justice (see p. 590). However, it did not apply the principle of overbreadth as it is currently understood, but instead asked whether the prohibition was "arbitrary or unfair in that it is unrelated to the state's interest in protecting the vulnerable, and that it lacks a foundation in the legal tradition and societal beliefs which are said to be represented by the prohibition" (p. 595). By contrast, the law on overbreadth, now explicitly recognized as a principle of fundamental justice, asks whether the law interferes with some conduct that has no connection to the law's objectives (Bedford, at para. 101). This different question may lead to a different answer. The majority's consideration of overbreadth under s. 1 suffers from the same defect: see Rodriguez, at p. 614. Finally, the majority in Rodriguez did not consider whether the prohibition was grossly disproportionate.

[47] The matrix of legislative and social facts in this case also differed from the evidence before the Court in Rodriguez. The majority in Rodriguez relied on evidence of (1) the widespread acceptance of a moral or ethical distinction between passive and active euthanasia (pp. 605-7); (2) the lack of any "halfway measure" that could protect the vulnerable (pp. 613-14); and (3) the "substantial consensus" in Western countries that a blanket prohibition is necessary to protect against the slippery slope (pp. 601-6 and 613). The record before the trial judge in this case contained evidence that, if accepted, was capable of undermining each of these conclusions (see Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 136, per Rothstein J.).

[48] While we do not agree with the trial judge that the comments in Hutterian Brethren on the s. 1 proportionality doctrine suffice to justify reconsideration of the s. 15 equality claim, we conclude it was open to the trial judge to reconsider the s. 15 claim as well, given the fundamental change in the facts.

VII. Does the Prohibition Interfere With the "Core" of the Provincial Jurisdiction Over Health?

[49] The appellants accept that the prohibition on assisted suicide is, in general, a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, they say that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity means that the prohibition cannot constitutionally apply to physician-assisted dying, because it lies at the core of the provincial jurisdiction over health care under s. 92(7), (13) and (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and is therefore beyond the legislative competence of the federal Parliament.

[50] The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is premised on the idea that the heads of power in ss. 91 and 92 are "exclusive", and therefore each have a "minimum and unassailable" core of content that is immune from the application of legislation enacted by the other level of government (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at paras. 33-34). To succeed in their argument on this point, the appellants must show that the prohibition, insofar as it extends to physician-assisted dying, impairs the "protected core" of the provincial jurisdiction over health:

et 613). Le dossier soumis à la juge des faits en l'espèce comportait des éléments de preuve susceptibles de miner chacune de ces conclusions s'ils étaient acceptés (voir Ontario (Procureur général) c. Fraser, 2011 CSC 20, [2011] 2 R.C.S. 3, par. 136, le juge Rothstein).

[48] Bien que nous ne soyons pas d'accord avec la juge de première instance pour dire que les observations faites dans Hutterian Brethren au sujet du principe de la proportionnalité garanti à l'article premier suffisent pour justifier un réexamen de la prétention fondée sur le droit à l'égalité prévu à l'art. 15, nous estimons que la juge pouvait également réexaminer la prétention fondée sur l'art. 15, compte tenu des faits radicalement différents.

VII. La prohibition porte-t-elle atteinte au « contenu essentiel » de la compétence provinciale sur la santé?

[51] This Court rejected a similar argument in Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 134. The issue in that case was "whether the delivery of health care services constitutes a protected core of the provincial power over health care in s. 92(7), (13) and (16) . . . and is therefore immune from federal interference" (para. 66). The Court concluded that it did not (per McLachlin C.J.):

> . . . Parliament has power to legislate with respect to federal matters, notably criminal law, that touch on health. For instance, it has historic jurisdiction to prohibit medical treatments that are dangerous, or that it perceives as "socially undesirable" behaviour: R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30; Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616; R. v. Morgentaler, [1993] 3 S.C.R. 463. The federal role in the domain of health makes it impossible to precisely define what falls in or out of the proposed provincial "core". Overlapping federal jurisdiction and the sheer size and diversity of provincial health power render daunting the task of drawing a bright line around a protected provincial core of health where federal legislation may not tread. [para. 68]

[52] The appellants and the Attorney General of Quebec (who intervened on this point) say that it is possible to describe a precise core for the power over health, and thereby to distinguish PHS. The appellants' proposed core is described as a power to deliver necessary medical treatment for which there is no alternative treatment capable of meeting a patient's needs (A.F., at para. 43). Quebec takes a slightly different approach, defining the core as the power to establish the kind of health care offered to patients and supervise the process of consent required for that care (I.F., at para. 7).

compétence provinciale en matière de santé : Nation Tsilhqot'in c. Colombie-Britannique, 2014 CSC 44, [2014] 2 R.C.S. 256, par. 131.

[51] Notre Cour a rejeté un argument similaire dans Canada (Procureur général) c. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 CSC 44, [2011] 3 R.C.S. 134. Il s'agissait dans cette affaire de déterminer « si la prestation de soins de santé fait partie du contenu essentiel protégé du pouvoir conféré aux provinces par les par. 92(7), (13) et (16) [. . .] en matière de santé et si elle est de ce fait à l'abri d'une ingérence fédérale » (par. 66). La Cour a conclu que non (la juge en chef McLachlin) :

> . . . le Parlement a le pouvoir de légiférer dans des matières de compétence fédérale, comme le droit criminel, qui touchent la santé. Ainsi, il a toujours eu le pouvoir d'interdire les traitements médicaux dangereux ou qui, selon lui, constituent une « conduite socialement répréhensible » : R. c. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 R.C.S. 30; Morgentaler c. La Reine, [1976] 1 R.C.S. 616; R. c. Morgentaler, [1993] 3 R.C.S. 463. Compte tenu du rôle dévolu au fédéral dans le domaine de la santé, il est impossible de définir précisément les éléments que comporterait ou non le « contenu essentiel » provincial proposé. La compétence fédérale concurrente, ainsi que l'ampleur même et la diversité de la compétence provinciale en matière de santé rendent pratiquement insurmontable la tâche de délimiter avec précision un contenu essentiel provincial qui serait protégé de toute incursion fédérale. [par. 68]

[52] Les appelants et la procureure générale du Québec (qui est intervenue sur ce point) affirment qu'il est possible de définir avec précision le contenu essentiel de la compétence en matière de santé et, par conséquent, d'établir une distinction d'avec l'arrêt PHS. Le contenu essentiel proposé par les appelants est décrit comme le pouvoir d'administrer le traitement médical nécessaire lorsqu'aucun autre traitement ne peut répondre aux besoins du patient (m.a., par. 43). Le Québec adopte une démarche légèrement différente en définissant le contenu essentiel comme le pouvoir de décider du type de soins de santé à offrir aux patients et de superviser la procédure relative au consentement requis pour ces soins (m.i., par. 7).

[53] We are not persuaded by the submissions that PHS is distinguishable, given the vague terms in which the proposed definitions of the "core" of the provincial health power are couched. In our view, the appellants have not established that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying impairs the core of the provincial jurisdiction. Health is an area of concurrent jurisdiction; both Parliament and the provinces may validly legislate on the topic: RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 32; Schneider v. The Queen, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 112, at p. 142. This suggests that aspects of physician-assisted dying may be the subject of valid legislation by both levels of government, depending on the circumstances and focus of the legislation. We are not satisfied on the record before us that the provincial power over health excludes the power of the federal Parliament to legislate on physician-assisted dying. It follows that the interjurisdictional immunity claim cannot succeed.

VIII. Section 7

[54] Section 7 of the Charter states that "[e]veryone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice."

[55] In order to demonstrate a violation of s. 7, the claimants must first show that the law interferes with, or deprives them of, their life, liberty or security of the person. Once they have established that s. 7 is engaged, they must then show that the deprivation in question is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[56] For the reasons below, we conclude that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying infringes the right to life, liberty and security of Ms. Taylor and of persons in her position, and that it does so in a manner that is overbroad and thus is not in

VIII. L'article 7

[54] Aux termes de l'art. 7 de la Charte, « [c]hacun a droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne; il ne peut être porté atteinte à ce droit qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale. »

[55] Pour faire la preuve d'une violation de l'art. 7, les demandeurs doivent d'abord démontrer que la loi porte atteinte à leur vie, à leur liberté ou à la sécurité de leur personne, ou les en prive. Une fois qu'ils ont établi que l'art. 7 entre en jeu, ils doivent alors démontrer que la privation en cause n'est pas conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

[56] Pour les motifs exposés ci-après, nous concluons que la prohibition de l'aide médicale à mourir porte atteinte au droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de M^me^ Taylor et des personnes se trouvant dans sa situation, et qu'elle le fait d'une manière accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. It therefore violates s. 7.

A. Does the Law Infringe the Right to Life, Liberty and Security of the Person?

(1) Life

[57] The trial judge found that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying had the effect of forcing some individuals to take their own lives prematurely, for fear that they would be incapable of doing so when they reached the point where suffering was intolerable. On that basis, she found that the right to life was engaged.

[58] We see no basis for interfering with the trial judge's conclusion on this point. The evidence of premature death was not challenged before this Court. It is therefore established that the prohibition deprives some individuals of life.

[59] The appellants and a number of the interveners urge us to adopt a broader, qualitative approach to the right to life. Some argue that the right to life is not restricted to the preservation of life, but protects quality of life and therefore a right to die with dignity. Others argue that the right to life protects personal autonomy and fundamental notions of self-determination and dignity, and therefore includes the right to determine whether to take one's own life.

[60] In dissent at the Court of Appeal, Finch C.J.B.C. accepted the argument that the right to life protects more than physical existence (paras. 84-89). In his view, the life interest is "intimately connected to the way a person values his or her lived experience. The point at which the meaning of life is lost, when life's positive attributes are so diminished as to render life valueless, . . . is an intensely personal decision which 'everyone' has the right to make for him or herself" (para. 86). Similarly, in his dissent in Rodriguez, Cory J. accepted that the right to life included a right to die with dignity, on excessive et de ce fait non conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. Cette prohibition viole donc l'art. 7.

A. La loi porte-t-elle atteinte au droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne?

(1) La vie

[57] La juge de première instance a conclu que la prohibition de l'aide médicale à mourir avait pour effet de forcer certaines personnes à s'enlever prématurément la vie, par crainte d'être incapables de le faire lorsque leurs souffrances deviendraient insupportables. Elle a conclu pour cette raison que le droit à la vie entrait en jeu.

[58] Nous ne voyons aucune raison de modifier la conclusion de la juge de première instance sur ce point. La preuve de mort prématurée n'a pas été contestée devant notre Cour. Il est donc établi que la prohibition prive certaines personnes de la vie.

[59] Les appelants et plusieurs intervenants nous pressent d'adopter une conception qualitative et plus large du droit à la vie. Certains prétendent que ce droit ne se limite pas à la préservation de la vie, mais qu'il protège la qualité de la vie et, par conséquent, le droit de mourir dans la dignité. D'autres prétendent que le droit à la vie protège l'autonomie personnelle et les notions fondamentales d'autodétermination et de dignité, et qu'il englobe donc le droit de décider de s'enlever la vie.

[60] Dissident en Cour d'appel, le juge en chef Finch a retenu l'argument selon lequel le droit à la vie ne se limite pas à la protection de l'existence physique (par. 84-89). Selon lui, cet intérêt que l'on porte à la vie est [TRADUCTION] « intimement lié à la manière dont une personne apprécie ce que la vie lui a apporté. Déterminer le stade où la vie perd son sens, où ses avantages sont réduits à un point tel qu'elle ne vaut plus rien, [. . .] constitue une décision éminemment personnelle que "chacun" a le droit de prendre pour soi » (par. 86). De même, dans ses motifs dissidents dans l'arrêt Rodriguez,

[61] The trial judge, on the other hand, rejected the "qualitative" approach to the right to life. She concluded that the right to life is only engaged when there is a threat of death as a result of government action or laws. In her words, the right to life is limited to a "right not to die" (para. 1322 (emphasis in original)).

[62] This Court has most recently invoked the right to life in Chaoulli v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 791, where evidence showed that the lack of timely health care could result in death (paras. 38 and 50, per Deschamps J.; para. 123, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.; and paras. 191 and 200, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.), and in PHS, where the clients of Insite were deprived of potentially lifesaving medical care (para. 91). In each case, the right was only engaged by the threat of death. In short, the case law suggests that the right to life is engaged where the law or state action imposes death or an increased risk of death on a person, either directly or indirectly. Conversely, concerns about autonomy and quality of life have traditionally been treated as liberty and security rights. We see no reason to alter that approach in this case.

[63] This said, we do not agree that the existential formulation of the right to life requires an absolute prohibition on assistance in dying, or that individuals cannot "waive" their right to life. This would create a "duty to live", rather than a "right to life", and would call into question the legality of any consent to the withdrawal or refusal of lifesaving or life-sustaining treatment. The sanctity of life is one of our most fundamental societal values. Section 7 is rooted in a profound respect for the value of human life. But s. 7 also encompasses life, liberty and security of the person during the passage to death. It is for this reason that the sanctity of le juge Cory a reconnu que le droit à la vie comprenait celui de mourir avec dignité, parce que « la mort fait partie intégrante de la vie » (p. 630).

[61] La juge de première instance, par contre, a rejeté la conception « qualitative » du droit à la vie. Elle a estimé que ce droit n'entre en jeu que si une menace de mort résulte d'une mesure ou de lois prises par l'État. Pour reprendre ses propos, le droit à la vie se limite au [TRADUCTION] « droit de ne pas mourir » (par. 1322 (souligné dans l'original)).

[62] Notre Cour a invoqué tout récemment le droit à la vie dans Chaoulli c. Québec (Procureur général), 2005 CSC 35, [2005] 1 R.C.S. 791, où la preuve démontrait que l'absence de soins de santé fournis en temps opportun pouvait entraîner la mort (par. 38 et 50, la juge Deschamps; par. 123, la juge en chef McLachlin et le juge Major; par. 191 et 200, les juges Binnie et LeBel), ainsi que dans PHS, où les clients d'Insite étaient privés de soins médicaux susceptibles de leur sauver la vie (par. 91). Dans les deux cas, le droit n'était mis en jeu que par le danger de mort. En résumé, selon la jurisprudence, le droit à la vie entre en jeu lorsqu'une mesure ou une loi prise par l'État a directement ou indirectement pour effet d'imposer la mort à une personne ou de l'exposer à un risque accru de mort. Par contre, on a traditionnellement considéré que les préoccupations relatives à l'autonomie et à la qualité de vie étaient des droits à la liberté et à la sécurité. Nous ne voyons aucune raison de modifier cette approche en l'espèce.

life "is no longer seen to require that all human life be preserved at all costs" (Rodriguez, at p. 595, per Sopinka J.). And it is for this reason that the law has come to recognize that, in certain circumstances, an individual's choice about the end of her life is entitled to respect. It is to this fundamental choice that we now turn.

(2) Liberty and Security of the Person

[64] Underlying both of these rights is a concern for the protection of individual autonomy and dignity. Liberty protects "the right to make fundamental personal choices free from state interference": Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, at para. 54. Security of the person encompasses "a notion of personal autonomy involving . . . control over one's bodily integrity free from state interference" (Rodriguez, at pp. 587-88, per Sopinka J., referring to R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30) and it is engaged by state interference with an individual's physical or psychological integrity, including any state action that causes physical or serious psychological suffering (New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46, at para. 58; Blencoe, at paras. 55-57; Chaoulli, at para. 43, per Deschamps J.; para. 119, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.; and paras. 191 and 200, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.). While liberty and security of the person are distinct interests, for the purpose of this appeal they may be considered together.

[65] The trial judge concluded that the prohibition on assisted dying limited Ms. Taylor's s. 7 right to liberty and security of the person, by interfering with "fundamentally important and personal medical decision-making" (para. 1302), imposing pain and psychological stress and depriving her of control over her bodily integrity (paras. 1293-94). She found that the prohibition left people like Ms. Taylor to suffer physical or psychological pain sécurité de la personne durant le passage à la mort. C'est pourquoi le caractère sacré de la vie « n'exige pas que toute vie humaine soit préservée à tout prix » (Rodriguez, p. 595, le juge Sopinka). Et pour cette raison, le droit en est venu à reconnaître que, dans certaines circonstances, il faut respecter le choix d'une personne quant à la fin de sa vie. C'est de ce choix fondamental que nous allons maintenant traiter.

(2) La liberté et la sécurité de la personne

[64] Le souci de protéger l'autonomie et la dignité de la personne sous-tend ces deux droits. La liberté protège « le droit de faire des choix personnels fondamentaux sans intervention de l'État » : Blencoe c. Colombie-Britannique (Human Rights Commission), 2000 CSC 44, [2000] 2 R.C.S. 307, par. 54. La sécurité de la personne englobe « une notion d'autonomie personnelle qui comprend [. . .] la maîtrise de l'intégrité de sa personne sans aucune intervention de l'État » (Rodriguez, p. 587-588, le juge Sopinka, citant R. c. Morgentaler, [1998] 1 R.C.S. 30) et elle est mise en jeu par l'atteinte de l'État à l'intégrité physique ou psychologique d'une personne, y compris toute mesure prise par l'État qui cause des souffrances physiques ou de graves souffrances psychologiques (Nouveau-Brunswick (Ministre de la Santé et des Services communautaires) c. G. (J.), [1999] 3 R.C.S. 46, par. 58; Blencoe, par. 55-57; Chaoulli, par. 43, la juge Deschamps; par. 119, la juge en chef McLachlin et le juge Major; par. 191 et 200, les juges Binnie et LeBel). Bien que la liberté et la sécurité de la personne constituent des intérêts distincts, elles peuvent être examinées ensemble pour les besoins du présent pourvoi.

and imposed stress due to the unavailability of physician-assisted dying, impinging on her security of the person. She further noted that seriously and irremediably ill persons were "denied the opportunity to make a choice that may be very important to their sense of dignity and personal integrity" and that is "consistent with their lifelong values and that reflects their life's experience" (para. 1326).

[66] We agree with the trial judge. An individual's response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition is a matter critical to their dignity and autonomy. The law allows people in this situation to request palliative sedation, refuse artificial nutrition and hydration, or request the removal of life-sustaining medical equipment, but denies them the right to request a physician's assistance in dying. This interferes with their ability to make decisions concerning their bodily integrity and medical care and thus trenches on liberty. And, by leaving people like Ms. Taylor to endure intolerable suffering, it impinges on their security of the person.

[67] The law has long protected patient autonomy in medical decision-making. In A.C. v. Manitoba (Director of Child and Family Services), 2009 SCC 30, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 181, a majority of this Court, per Abella J. (the dissent not disagreeing on this point), endorsed the "tenacious relevance in our legal system of the principle that competent individuals are — and should be — free to make decisions about their bodily integrity" (para. 39). This right to "decide one's own fate" entitles adults to direct the course of their own medical care (para. 40): it is this principle that underlies the concept of "informed consent" and is protected by s. 7's guarantee of liberty and security of the person (para. 100; see also R. v. Parker (2000), 49 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.)). As noted in Fleming v. Reid (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 74 que la prohibition laissait des personnes comme M^me^ Taylor subir de la douleur physique et psychologique et leur imposait un stress parce qu'il leur était impossible d'obtenir une aide médicale à mourir, ce qui portait atteinte à la sécurité de leur personne. Elle a également signalé que les personnes atteintes d'une maladie grave et irrémédiable étaient [TRADUCTION] « privées de la possibilité de faire un choix qui peut s'avérer très important pour leur sentiment de dignité et leur intégrité personnelle », un choix « compatible avec les valeurs qu'elles ont eues toute leur vie et qui reflète leur vécu » (par. 1326).

[67] Le droit protège depuis longtemps l'autonomie du patient dans la prise de décisions d'ordre médical. Dans A.C. c. Manitoba (Directeur des services à l'enfant et à la famille), 2009 CSC 30, [2009] 2 R.C.S. 181, notre Cour, dont l'opinion majoritaire a été rédigée par la juge Abella (la dissidence ne porte pas sur ce point), a reconnu la « solide pertinence qui, dans notre système juridique, caractérise le principe selon lequel les personnes mentalement capables peuvent — et doivent pouvoir — prendre en toute liberté des décisions concernant leur intégrité corporelle » (par. 39). Ce droit de « décider de son propre sort » permet aux adultes de dicter le cours de leur propre traitement médical (par. 40) : c'est ce principe qui sous-tend la notion de « consentement éclairé » et qui est protégé par

(C.A.), the right of medical self-determination is not vitiated by the fact that serious risks or consequences, including death, may flow from the patient's decision. It is this same principle that is at work in the cases dealing with the right to refuse consent to medical treatment, or to demand that treatment be withdrawn or discontinued: see, e.g., Ciarlariello v. Schacter, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 119; Malette v. Shulman (1990), 72 O.R. (2d) 417 (C.A.); and Nancy B. v. Hôtel-Dieu de Québec (1992), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 385 (Que. Sup. Ct.).

[68] In Blencoe, a majority of the Court held that the s. 7 liberty interest is engaged "where state compulsions or prohibitions affect important and fundamental life choices" (para. 49). In A.C., where the claimant sought to refuse a potentially lifesaving blood transfusion on religious grounds, Binnie J. noted that we may "instinctively recoil" from the decision to seek death because of our belief in the sanctity of human life (para. 219). But his response is equally relevant here: it is clear that anyone who seeks physician-assisted dying because they are suffering intolerably as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition "does so out of a deeply personal and fundamental belief about how they wish to live, or cease to live" (ibid.). The trial judge, too, described this as a decision that, for some people, is "very important to their sense of dignity and personal integrity, that is consistent with their lifelong values and that reflects their life's experience" (para. 1326). This is a decision that is rooted in their control over their bodily integrity; it represents their deeply personal response to serious pain and suffering. By denying them the opportunity to make that choice, the prohibition impinges on their liberty and security of the person. As noted above, s. 7 recognizes the value of life, but it also honours the role that autonomy and dignity play at the end of that life. We therefore conclude that ss. 241(b) and 14 of the Criminal Code, insofar as they prohibit physician-assisted dying for competent adults who seek such assistance as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition that la garantie de liberté et de sécurité de la personne figurant à l'art. 7 (par. 100; voir aussi R. c. Parker (2000), 49 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.)). Comme on l'a souligné dans Fleming c. Reid (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 74 (C.A.), les risques ou conséquences graves, y compris la mort, que peut entraîner la décision du patient ne permettent aucunement de porter atteinte au libre choix en matière médicale. C'est ce même principe qui s'applique dans les affaires relatives au droit de refuser de consentir à un traitement médical, ou d'en exiger le retrait ou l'interruption : voir, p. ex., Ciarlariello c. Schacter, [1993] 2 R.C.S. 119; Malette c. Shulman (1990), 72 O.R. (2d) 417 (C.A.); Nancy B. c. Hôtel-Dieu de Québec, [1992] R.J.Q. 361 (C.S.).

[68] Dans Blencoe, les juges majoritaires de la Cour ont conclu que l'intérêt relatif à la liberté garantie par l'art. 7 est en cause « lorsque des contraintes ou des interdictions de l'État influent sur les choix importants et fondamentaux qu'une personne peut faire dans sa vie » (par. 49). Dans A.C., où la demanderesse voulait, pour des motifs religieux, refuser une transfusion sanguine susceptible de lui sauver la vie, le juge Binnie a indiqué que nous pouvons avoir « instinctivement un mouvement de recul » devant la décision de demander la mort en raison de notre conception du caractère sacré de la vie (par. 219). Mais sa réponse est également pertinente en l'espèce : il est clair qu'une personne qui demande une aide médicale à mourir parce que des problèmes de santé graves et irrémédiables lui causent des souffrances intolérables « le fait à cause d'une croyance profondément personnelle et fondamentale sur la façon de vivre sa vie, ou de mourir » (ibid.). La juge de première instance a elle aussi affirmé qu'il s'agit, pour certaines personnes, d'une décision qui [TRADUCTION] « revêt une grande importance pour leur sentiment de dignité et d'autonomie, qui est compatible avec les valeurs qu'elles ont eues toute leur vie et qui reflète leur vécu » (par. 1326). Cette décision prend sa source dans la maîtrise qu'elles exercent sur leur intégrité corporelle; la décision représente leur réaction profondément personnelle à une douleur et à des souffrances aiguës. En niant la possibilité pour ces personnes de faire ce choix, la prohibition empiète sur leur liberté et la sécurité de leur personne. Comme nous l'avons causes enduring and intolerable suffering, infringe the rights to liberty and security of the person.

[69] We note, as the trial judge did, that Lee Carter and Hollis Johnson's interest in liberty may be engaged by the threat of criminal sanction for their role in Kay Carter's death in Switzerland. However, this potential deprivation was not the focus of the arguments raised at trial, and neither Ms. Carter nor Mr. Johnson sought a personal remedy before this Court. Accordingly, we have confined ourselves to the rights of those who seek assistance in dying, rather than of those who might provide such assistance.

(3) Summary on Section 7: Life, Liberty and Security of the Person

[70] For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying deprived Ms. Taylor and others suffering from grievous and irremediable medical conditions of the right to life, liberty and security of the person. The remaining question under s. 7 is whether this deprivation was in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

B. The Principles of Fundamental Justice

[71] Section 7 does not promise that the state will never interfere with a person's life, liberty or security of the person — laws do this all the time — but rather that the state will not do so in a way that violates the principles of fundamental justice.

[72] Section 7 does not catalogue the principles of fundamental justice to which it refers. Over the course of 32 years of Charter adjudication, this vu, l'art. 7 reconnaît la valeur de la vie, mais respecte aussi la place qu'occupent l'autonomie et la dignité à la fin de cette vie. Nous concluons donc que, dans la mesure où ils prohibent l'aide médicale à mourir que demandent des adultes capables affectés de problèmes de santé graves et irrémédiables qui leur causent des souffrances persistantes et intolérables, l'al. 241*b*) et l'art. 14 du Code criminel portent atteinte aux droits à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne.

(3) Résumé de l'analyse relative à l'art. 7 : la vie, la liberté et la sécurité de la personne

[70] Pour ces motifs, nous concluons que la prohibition de l'aide médicale à mourir a privé M^me^ Taylor, ainsi que d'autres personnes affectées de problèmes de santé graves et irrémédiables, du droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne. Il reste à décider, pour l'application de l'art. 7, si cette privation était conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

B. Les principes de justice fondamentale

[71] L'article 7 garantit non pas que l'État ne portera jamais atteinte à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne — les lois le font constamment —, mais que l'État ne le fera pas en violation des principes de justice fondamentale.

[72] L'article 7 ne répertorie pas les principes de justice fondamentale auxquels il renvoie. Au cours des 32 ans de décisions relatives à la Charte, notre Court has worked to define the minimum constitutional requirements that a law that trenches on life, liberty or security of the person must meet (Bedford, at para. 94). While the Court has recognized a number of principles of fundamental justice, three have emerged as central in the recent s. 7 jurisprudence: laws that impinge on life, liberty or security of the person must not be arbitrary, overbroad, or have consequences that are grossly disproportionate to their object.

Cour s'est employée à définir les exigences constitutionnelles minimales auxquelles doit satisfaire une loi qui empiète sur la vie, la liberté ou la sécurité de la personne (Bedford, par. 94). Bien que la Cour ait reconnu un certain nombre de principes de justice fondamentale, trois principes centraux se sont dégagés de la jurisprudence récente relative à l'art. 7 : les lois qui portent atteinte à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne ne doivent pas être arbitraires, avoir une portée excessive ou entraîner des conséquences totalement disproportionnées à leur objet.

[73] Each of these potential vices involves comparison with the object of the law that is challenged (Bedford, at para. 123). The first step is therefore to identify the object of the prohibition on assisted dying.

[73] Chacun de ces vices potentiels suppose une comparaison avec l'objet de la loi contestée (Bedford, par. 123). La première étape consiste donc à cerner l'objet visé par la prohibition de l'aide à mourir.

[74] The trial judge, relying on Rodriguez, concluded that the object of the prohibition was to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness (para. 1190). All the parties except Canada accept this formulation of the object.

[74] S'appuyant sur l'arrêt Rodriguez, la juge de première instance a conclu que la prohibition avait pour objet d'empêcher que les personnes vulnérables soient incitées à se suicider dans un moment de faiblesse (par. 1190). Toutes les parties sauf le Canada acceptent cet énoncé de l'objet.

[75] Canada agrees that the prohibition is intended to protect the vulnerable, but argues that the object of the prohibition should also be defined more broadly as simply "the preservation of life" (R.F., at paras 66, 108, and 109). We cannot accept this submission.

[75] Le Canada convient que la prohibition vise à protéger la personne vulnérable, mais prétend que son objet doit aussi être défini plus largement et qu'il consiste simplement en [TRADUCTION] « la préservation de la vie » (m.i., par. 66, 108 et 109). Nous ne pouvons pas accepter cet argument.

[76] First, it is incorrect to say that the majority in Rodriguez adopted "the preservation of life" as the object of the prohibition on assisted dying. Justice Sopinka refers to the preservation of life when discussing the objectives of s. 241(b) (pp. 590, 614). However, he later clarifies this comment, stating that "[s]ection 241(b) has as its purpose the protection of the vulnerable who might be induced in moments of weakness to commit suicide" (p. 595). Sopinka J. then goes on to note that this purpose is "grounded in the state interest in protecting life and reflects the policy of the state that human life should not be depreciated by allowing life to be taken" (ibid.). His remarks about the "preservation of life" in Rodriguez are best understood as a reference to an animating social value rather than as a description of the specific object of the prohibition.

[77] Second, defining the object of the prohibition on physician-assisted dying as the preservation of life has the potential to short-circuit the analysis. In RJR-MacDonald, this Court warned against stating the object of a law "too broadly" in the s. 1 analysis, lest the resulting objective immunize the law from challenge under the Charter (para. 144). The same applies to assessing whether the principles of fundamental justice are breached under s. 7. If the object of the prohibition is stated broadly as "the preservation of life", it becomes difficult to say that the means used to further it are overbroad or grossly disproportionate. The outcome is to this extent foreordained.

[78] Finally, the jurisprudence requires the object of the impugned law to be defined precisely for the purposes of s. 7. In Bedford, Canada argued that the bawdy-house prohibition in s. 210 of the Code should be defined broadly as to "deter prostitution" for the purposes of s. 7 (para. 131). This Court rejected this argument, holding that the object of the prohibition should be confined to measures directly targeted by the law (para. 132). That reasoning applies with equal force in this case. Section 241(b) is not directed at preserving life, or even at preventing suicide — attempted suicide is no longer a crime. Yet Canada asks us to posit that the object of the prohibition is to preserve life, whatever the circumstances. This formulation goes beyond the ambit of the provision itself. The direct target of the measure is the narrow goal of preventing vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness.

remarques au sujet de la « préservation de la vie » dans Rodriguez comme une mention d'une valeur sociale directrice plutôt que comme une description de l'objet précis de la prohibition.

[78] Enfin, la jurisprudence exige que l'objet de la loi contestée soit défini avec précision pour l'application de l'art. 7. Le Canada a soutenu dans Bedford que la prohibition de tenir une maison de débauche, énoncée à l'art. 210 du Code, devrait être définie largement de manière à ce qu'elle vise à « décourager la prostitution » pour l'application de l'art. 7 (par. 131). Notre Cour a rejeté cet argument et a estimé que l'objet de la prohibition devrait se limiter aux mesures directement visées par la loi (par. 132). Ce raisonnement vaut tout autant en l'espèce. L'alinéa 241*b*) ne vise pas à préserver la vie, ni même à prévenir le suicide — la tentative de suicide n'est plus un crime. Le Canada nous demande pourtant d'affirmer que l'objet de la prohibition est de préserver la vie, peu importe les circonstances. Cette formulation va au-delà du champ d'application de la disposition elle-même. Ce que vise directement la mesure, c'est le but restreint d'empêcher que les personnes vulnérables soient incitées à se suicider dans un moment de faiblesse.

In determining whether the deprivation of life, liberty and security of the person is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice under s. 7, courts are not concerned with competing social interests or public benefits conferred by the impugned law. These competing moral claims and broad societal benefits are more appropriately considered at the stage of justification under s. 1 of the Charter (Bedford, at paras. 123 and 125).

[80] In Bedford, the Court noted that requiring s. 7 claimants "to establish the efficacy of the law versus its deleterious consequences on members of society as a whole, would impose the government's s. 1 burden on claimants under s. 7" (para. 127; see also Charkaoui v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 350, at paras. 21-22). A claimant under s. 7 must show that the state has deprived them of their life, liberty or security of the person and that the deprivation is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. They should not be tasked with also showing that these principles are "not overridden by a valid state or communal interest in these circumstances": T. J. Singleton, "The Principles of Fundamental Justice, Societal Interests and Section 1 of the Charter" (1995), 74 Can. Bar Rev. 446, at p. 449. As this Court stated in R. v. Swain, [1991] 1 S.C.R. 933, at p. 977:

> It is not appropriate for the state to thwart the exercise of the accused's right by attempting to bring societal interests into the principles of fundamental justice and to thereby limit an accused's s. 7 rights. Societal interests are to be dealt with under s. 1 of the Charter . . . .

[81] In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 (the "Motor Vehicle Reference"), Lamer J. (as he then was) explained that the principles of fundamental justice are derived from the essential elements of our system of justice, which is itself founded on a belief in the dignity and worth of every human person. To deprive a person of constitutional générale s'impose. Lorsqu'ils déterminent si la privation du droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne est conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale visés à l'art. 7, les tribunaux ne s'intéressent pas à des intérêts sociaux opposés ou aux avantages publics que procure la loi attaquée. Il convient plutôt d'étudier ces prétentions morales opposées et avantages généraux pour la société à l'étape de la justification au regard de l'article premier de la Charte (Bedford, par. 123 et 125).

[80] Dans Bedford, la Cour a fait remarquer qu'obliger la personne qui invoque l'art. 7 « à démontrer l'efficacité de la loi par opposition à ses conséquences néfastes sur l'ensemble de la société revient à lui imposer le même fardeau que celui qui incombe à l'État pour l'application de l'article premier » (par. 127; voir aussi Charkaoui c. Canada (Citoyenneté et Immigration), 2007 CSC 9, [2007] 1 R.C.S. 350, par. 21-22). La personne qui invoque l'art. 7 doit démontrer que l'État a porté atteinte à sa vie, à sa liberté ou à la sécurité de sa personne et que cette atteinte n'est pas conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. Elle ne devrait pas être appelée à établir aussi que ces principes [TRADUCTION] « ne sont pas supplantés par un intérêt légitime de l'État ou un intérêt collectif en pareilles circonstances » : T. J. Singleton, « The Principles of Fundamental Justice, Societal Interests and Section 1 of the Charter » (1995), 74 R. du B. can. 446, p. 449. Comme l'a dit notre Cour dans R. c. Swain, [1991] 1 R.C.S. 933, p. 977 :

> Il n'est pas acceptable que l'État puisse contrecarrer l'exercice du droit de l'accusé en tentant de faire jouer les intérêts de la société dans l'application des principes de justice fondamentale, et restreindre ainsi les droits reconnus à l'accusé par l'art. 7. Les intérêts de la société doivent entrer en ligne de compte dans l'application de l'article premier de la Charte . . .

[81] Dans le Renvoi sur la Motor Vehicle Act (C.-B.), [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486 (« Renvoi relatif à la Motor Vehicle Act »), le juge Lamer (plus tard Juge en chef) a expliqué que les principes de justice fondamentale découlent des éléments essentiels de notre système de justice, qui est lui-même fondé sur la foi dans la dignité et la valeur de chaque rights arbitrarily or in a way that is overbroad or grossly disproportionate diminishes that worth and dignity. If a law operates in this way, it asks the right claimant to "serve as a scapegoat" (Rodriguez, at p. 621, per McLachlin J.). It imposes a deprivation via a process that is "fundamentally unfair" to the rights claimant (Charkaoui, at para. 22).

[82] This is not to say that such a deprivation cannot be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. In some cases the government, for practical reasons, may only be able to meet an important objective by means of a law that has some fundamental flaw. But this does not concern us when considering whether s. 7 of the Charter has been breached.

(1) Arbitrariness

[83] The principle of fundamental justice that forbids arbitrariness targets the situation where there is no rational connection between the object of the law and the limit it imposes on life, liberty or security of the person: Bedford, at para. 111. An arbitrary law is one that is not capable of fulfilling its objectives. It exacts a constitutional price in terms of rights, without furthering the public good that is said to be the object of the law.

[84] The object of the prohibition on physician-assisted dying is to protect the vulnerable from ending their life in times of weakness. A total ban on assisted suicide clearly helps achieve this object. Therefore, individuals' rights are not limited arbitrarily.

(2) Overbreadth

[85] The overbreadth inquiry asks whether a law that takes away rights in a way that generally supports the object of the law, goes too far by denying the rights of some individuals in a way that bears no relation to the object: Bedford, at paras. 101

être humain. Priver une personne de droits constitutionnels arbitrairement ou d'une manière excessive ou totalement disproportionnée diminue cette valeur et cette dignité. Si une loi s'applique ainsi, elle demande à la personne qui revendique un droit d'« être le bouc émissaire » (Rodriguez, p. 621, la juge McLachlin). Elle impose une privation via une procédure « fondamentalement inéquitable » envers cette personne (Charkaoui, par. 22).

(1) Le caractère arbitraire

[84] L'objet visé par la prohibition de l'aide médicale à mourir est d'empêcher que la personne vulnérable mette fin à ses jours dans un moment de faiblesse. Puisque la prohibition absolue de l'aide au suicide favorise clairement la réalisation de cet objet, la restriction de droits individuels n'est pas arbitraire.

(2) La portée excessive

and 112-13. Like the other principles of fundamental justice under s. 7, overbreadth is not concerned with competing social interests or ancillary benefits to the general population. A law that is drawn broadly to target conduct that bears no relation to its purpose "in order to make enforcement more practical" may therefore be overbroad (see Bedford, at para. 113). The question is not whether Parliament has chosen the least restrictive means, but whether the chosen means infringe life, liberty or security of the person in a way that has no connection with the mischief contemplated by the legislature. The focus is not on broad social impacts, but on the impact of the measure on the individuals whose life, liberty or security of the person is trammelled.

objet : Bedford, par. 101 et 112-113. Tout comme les autres principes de justice fondamentale au sens de l'art. 7, la notion de portée excessive ne s'attache pas à des intérêts sociaux divergents ou aux avantages accessoires pour la population en général. Une loi rédigée en termes généraux pour viser un comportement qui n'a aucun lien avec son objet « afin de faciliter son application » peut donc avoir une portée excessive (voir Bedford, par. 113). Il ne s'agit pas de savoir si le législateur a choisi le moyen le moins restrictif, mais de savoir si le moyen choisi porte atteinte à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne d'une manière qui n'a aucun lien avec le mal qu'avait à l'esprit le législateur. On ne met pas l'accent sur des répercussions sociales générales, mais sur l'incidence de la mesure sur les personnes dont la vie, la liberté ou la sécurité est restreinte.

[86] Applying this approach, we conclude that the prohibition on assisted dying is overbroad. The object of the law, as discussed, is to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a moment of weakness. Canada conceded at trial that the law catches people outside this class: "It is recognised that not every person who wishes to commit suicide is vulnerable, and that there may be people with disabilities who have a considered, rational and persistent wish to end their own lives" (trial reasons, at para. 1136). The trial judge accepted that Ms. Taylor was such a person — competent, fully informed, and free from coercion or duress (para. 16). It follows that the limitation on their rights is in at least some cases not connected to the objective of protecting vulnerable persons. The blanket prohibition sweeps conduct into its ambit that is unrelated to the law's objective.

[86] Suivant cette approche, nous concluons que la prohibition de l'aide à mourir a une portée excessive. Comme nous l'avons vu, l'objet de la loi est d'empêcher que les personnes vulnérables soient incitées à se suicider dans un moment de faiblesse. Le Canada a admis au procès que la loi s'applique à des personnes qui n'entrent pas dans cette catégorie : [TRADUCTION] « Il est admis que les personnes qui veulent se suicider ne sont pas toutes vulnérables, et qu'il peut se trouver des gens atteints d'une déficience qui ont le désir réfléchi, rationnel et constant de mettre fin à leur propre vie » (motifs de première instance, par. 1136). La juge de première instance a reconnu que M^me^ Taylor correspondait à cette description — une personne capable, bien renseignée et libre de toute coercition ou contrainte (par. 16). Il s'ensuit que la restriction de leurs droits n'a, dans certains cas du moins, aucun lien avec l'objectif de protéger les personnes vulnérables. La prohibition générale fait entrer dans son champ d'application une conduite qui n'a aucun rapport avec l'objectif de la loi.

[87] Canada argues that it is difficult to conclusively identify the "vulnerable", and that therefore it cannot be said that the prohibition is overbroad. Indeed, Canada asserts, "every person is potentially vulnerable" from a legislative perspective (R.F., at para. 115 (emphasis in original)).

[88] We do not agree. The situation is analogous to that in Bedford, where this Court concluded that the prohibition on living on the avails of prostitution in s. 212(1)(j) of the Criminal Code was overbroad. The law in that case punished everyone who earned a living through a relationship with a prostitute, without distinguishing between those who would assist and protect them and those who would be at least potentially exploitive of them. Canada there as here argued that the line between exploitative and non-exploitative relationships was blurry, and that, as a result, the provision had to be drawn broadly to capture its targets. The Court concluded that that argument is more appropriately addressed under s. 1 (paras. 143-44).

[88] Nous ne sommes pas de cet avis. La situation est analogue à celle de l'affaire Bedford, où notre Cour a conclu que la prohibition de vivre des produits de la prostitution faite à l'al. 212(1)j) du Code criminel était trop large. La disposition en cause dans cette affaire sanctionnait toute personne qui gagnait sa vie aux dépens d'une prostituée, sans faire de distinction entre la personne qui aiderait et protégerait une prostituée et la personne qui, à tout le moins, pourrait l'exploiter. Le Canada a soutenu, dans cette affaire comme en l'espèce, que la ligne de démarcation entre les rapports empreints d'exploitation et ceux exempts d'exploitation était floue, et que la disposition devait donc avoir une large portée afin de réprimer les actes censés l'être. La Cour a conclu qu'il est plus opportun d'examiner cette considération dans l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier (par. 143-144).

(3) Gross Disproportionality

(3) Le caractère totalement disproportionné

[89] This principle is infringed if the impact of the restriction on the individual's life, liberty or security of the person is grossly disproportionate to the object of the measure. As with overbreadth, the focus is not on the impact of the measure on society or the public, which are matters for s. 1, but on its impact on the rights of the claimant. The inquiry into gross disproportionality compares the law's purpose, "taken at face value", with its negative effects on the rights of the claimant, and asks if this impact is completely out of sync with the object of the law (Bedford, at para. 125). The standard is high: the law's object and its impact may be incommensurate without reaching the standard for gross disproportionality (Bedford, at para. 120; Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3, at para. 47).

[90] The trial judge concluded that the prohibition's negative impact on life, liberty and security of the person was "very severe" and therefore grossly disproportionate to its objective (para. 1378). We agree that the impact of the prohibition is severe: it imposes unnecessary suffering on affected individuals, deprives them of the ability to determine what to do with their bodies and how those bodies will be treated, and may cause those affected to take their own lives sooner than they would were they able to obtain a physician's assistance in dying. Against this it is argued that the object of the prohibition — to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness — is also of high importance. We find it unnecessary to decide whether the prohibition also violates the principle against gross disproportionality, in light of our conclusion that it is overbroad.

ce qu'il faut faire de leur corps et du traitement à lui réserver, et peut amener les personnes touchées à s'enlever la vie plus tôt qu'elles ne le feraient si elles étaient à même d'obtenir une aide médicale à mourir. Par contre, on plaide que l'objet de la prohibition — empêcher que les personnes vulnérables soient incitées à se suicider dans un moment de faiblesse — est lui aussi très important. À notre avis, puisque nous avons conclu que la portée de la prohibition était excessive, il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si la prohibition contrevient aussi au principe selon lequel elle ne doit pas avoir un caractère totalement disproportionné.

(4) Parity

[91] The appellants ask the Court to recognize a new principle of fundamental justice, the principle of parity, which would require that offenders committing acts of comparable blameworthiness receive sanctions of like severity. They say the prohibition violates this principle because it punishes the provision of physician assistance in dying with the highest possible criminal sanction (for culpable homicide), while exempting other comparable end-of-life practices from any criminal sanction.

[92] Parity in the sense invoked by the appellants has not been recognized as a principle of fundamental justice in this Court's jurisprudence to date. Given our conclusion that the deprivation of Ms. Taylor's s. 7 rights is not in accordance with the principle against overbreadth, it is unnecessary to consider this argument and we decline to do so.

IX. Does the Prohibition on Assisted Suicide Violate Section 15 of the Charter?

[93] Having concluded that the prohibition violates s. 7, it is unnecessary to consider this question.

X. Section 1

[94] In order to justify the infringement of the appellants' s. 7 rights under s. 1 of the Charter,

(4) La parité

[92] La parité, au sens où l'invoquent les appelants, n'a pas été reconnue comme principe de justice fondamentale dans la jurisprudence de notre Cour jusqu'à présent. Vu notre conclusion que la privation des droits reconnus à M^me^ Taylor par l'art. 7 n'est pas conforme au principe interdisant les lois de portée excessive, il n'est pas nécessaire d'examiner cet argument et nous refusons de le faire.

IX. La prohibition de l'aide au suicide viole-t-elle l'art. 15 de la Charte?

[93] Comme nous avons conclu que la prohibition viole l'art. 7, point n'est besoin d'examiner cette question.

X. L'article premier

[94] Pour justifier, en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte, l'atteinte aux droits que reconnaît

Canada must show that the law has a pressing and substantial object and that the means chosen are proportional to that object. A law is proportionate if (1) the means adopted are rationally connected to that objective; (2) it is minimally impairing of the right in question; and (3) there is proportionality between the deleterious and salutary effects of the law: R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103.

[95] It is difficult to justify a s. 7 violation: see Motor Vehicle Reference, at p. 518; G. (J.), at para. 99. The rights protected by s. 7 are fundamental, and "not easily overridden by competing social interests" (Charkaoui, at para. 66). And it is hard to justify a law that runs afoul of the principles of fundamental justice and is thus inherently flawed (Bedford, at para. 96). However, in some situations the state may be able to show that the public good — a matter not considered under s. 7, which looks only at the impact on the rights claimants — justifies depriving an individual of life, liberty or security of the person under s. 1 of the Charter. More particularly, in cases such as this where the competing societal interests are themselves protected under the Charter, a restriction on s. 7 rights may in the end be found to be proportionate to its objective.

[96] Here, the limit is prescribed by law, and the appellants concede that the law has a pressing and substantial objective. The question is whether the government has demonstrated that the prohibition is proportionate.

[97] At this stage of the analysis, the courts must accord the legislature a measure of deference. Proportionality does not require perfection: Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 467, at para. 78. Section 1 only requires that the limits be "reasonable". This Court has emphasized that there may be a number of possible solutions to a particular social problem, and suggested that a "complex regulatory l'art. 7 aux appelants, le Canada doit démontrer que l'objet de la loi est urgent et réel et que les moyens choisis sont proportionnels à cet objet. Une loi est proportionnée à son objet si (1) les moyens adoptés sont rationnellement liés à cet objet, (2) elle porte atteinte de façon minimale au droit en question, et (3) il y a proportionnalité entre les effets préjudiciables et les effets bénéfiques de la loi : R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103.

[97] À ce stade de l'analyse, les tribunaux doivent faire preuve d'une certaine déférence à l'endroit du législateur. La proportionnalité ne nécessite pas la perfection : Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) c. Whatcott, 2013 CSC 11, [2013] 1 R.C.S. 467, par. 78. L'article premier exige seulement que les limites soient « raisonnables ». Notre Cour a souligné qu'il peut y avoir plusieurs solutions à un problème social particulier et a indiqué qu'une « mesure response" to a social ill will garner a high degree of deference (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 37).

[98] On the one hand, as the trial judge noted, physician-assisted death involves complex issues of social policy and a number of competing societal values. Parliament faces a difficult task in addressing this issue; it must weigh and balance the perspective of those who might be at risk in a permissive regime against that of those who seek assistance in dying. It follows that a high degree of deference is owed to Parliament's decision to impose an absolute prohibition on assisted death. On the other hand, the trial judge also found — and we agree — that the absolute prohibition could not be described as a "complex regulatory response" (para. 1180). The degree of deference owed to Parliament, while high, is accordingly reduced.

(1) Rational Connection

[99] The government must show that the absolute prohibition on physician-assisted dying is rationally connected to the goal of protecting the vulnerable from being induced to take their own lives in times of weakness. The question is whether the means the law adopts are a rational way for the legislature to pursue its objective. If not, rights are limited for no good reason. To establish a rational connection, the government need only show that there is a causal connection between the infringement and the benefit sought "on the basis of reason or logic": RJR-MacDonald, at para. 153.

[100] We agree with Finch C.J.B.C. in the Court of Appeal that, where an activity poses certain risks, prohibition of the activity in question is a rational method of curtailing the risks (para. 175). We therefore conclude that there is a rational connection between the prohibition and its objective.

[101] The appellants argue that the absolute nature of the prohibition is not logically connected to the object of the provision. This is another way réglementaire complexe » visant à remédier à un mal social commande une grande déférence (Hutterian Brethren, par. 37).

[98] D'une part, comme l'a fait remarquer la juge de première instance, l'aide médicale à mourir soulève des questions complexes de politique sociale et un certain nombre de valeurs sociales opposées. La tâche du législateur confronté à cette question est difficile : il doit soupeser et pondérer le point de vue des personnes qu'un régime permissif pourrait mettre en danger et le point de vue de celles qui demandent de l'aide pour mourir. Par conséquent, il faut accorder une grande déférence à la décision du législateur d'imposer une prohibition absolue de l'aide à mourir. La juge a toutefois également conclu — et nous sommes d'accord avec elle — que la prohibition absolue ne pouvait pas être qualifiée de [TRADUCTION] « mesure réglementaire complexe » (par. 1180). Bien que le législateur ait droit à une grande déférence, celle-ci s'en trouve donc réduite.

(1) Le lien rationnel

[100] À l'instar du juge en chef Finch de la Cour d'appel, nous estimons que, lorsqu'une activité pose certains risques, la prohiber constitue un moyen rationnel de réduire les risques (par. 175). Nous concluons donc à l'existence d'un lien rationnel entre la prohibition et son objectif.

[101] Les appelants soutiennent que le caractère absolu de la prohibition n'a pas de lien logique avec l'objet de la disposition. C'est une autre of saying that the prohibition goes too far. In our view, this argument is better dealt with in the inquiry into minimal impairment. It is clearly rational to conclude that a law that bars all persons from accessing assistance in suicide will protect the vulnerable from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness. The means here are logically connected with the objective.

façon de dire que la prohibition va trop loin. À notre avis, il vaut mieux examiner cet argument dans le cadre de l'analyse de l'atteinte minimale. Il est manifestement logique de conclure qu'une loi interdisant à quiconque d'obtenir de l'aide pour se suicider protégera la personne vulnérable contre toute incitation à se suicider dans un moment de faiblesse. En l'espèce, les moyens ont un lien logique avec l'objectif.

(2) Minimal Impairment

(2) L'atteinte minimale

[102] At this stage of the analysis, the question is whether the limit on the right is reasonably tailored to the objective. The inquiry into minimal impairment asks "whether there are less harmful means of achieving the legislative goal" (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 53). The burden is on the government to show the absence of less drastic means of achieving the objective "in a real and substantial manner" (ibid., at para. 55). The analysis at this stage is meant to ensure that the deprivation of Charter rights is confined to what is reasonably necessary to achieve the state's object.

[102] La question qui se pose à ce stade de l'analyse est de savoir si la restriction du droit est raisonnablement adaptée à l'objectif. L'analyse de l'atteinte minimale vise à répondre à la question suivante : « . . . existe-t-il des moyens moins préjudiciables de réaliser l'objectif législatif? » (Hutterian Brethren, par. 53). C'est au gouvernement qu'il incombe de prouver l'absence de moyens moins attentatoires d'atteindre l'objectif « de façon réelle et substantielle » (ibid., par. 55). Ce stade de l'analyse vise à garantir que la privation de droits reconnus par la Charte se limite à ce qui est raisonnablement nécessaire pour atteindre l'objectif de l'État.

[103] The question in this case comes down to whether the absolute prohibition on physician-assisted dying, with its heavy impact on the claimants' s. 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person, is the least drastic means of achieving the legislative objective. It was the task of the trial judge to determine whether a regime less restrictive of life, liberty and security of the person could address the risks associated with physician-assisted dying, or whether Canada was right to say that the risks could not adequately be addressed through the use of safeguards.

[104] This question lies at the heart of this case and was the focus of much of the evidence at trial. In assessing minimal impairment, the trial judge heard evidence from scientists, medical practitioners, and others who were familiar with end-of-life decision-making in Canada and abroad. She also heard extensive evidence from each of the jurisdictions where physician-assisted dying is legal or regulated. In the trial judge's view, an absolute prohibition would have been necessary if the evidence showed that physicians were unable to reliably assess competence, voluntariness, and non-ambivalence in patients; that physicians fail to understand or apply the informed consent requirement for medical treatment; or if the evidence from permissive jurisdictions showed abuse of patients, carelessness, callousness, or a slippery slope, leading to the casual termination of life (paras. 1365-66).

[105] The trial judge, however, expressly rejected these possibilities. After reviewing the evidence, she concluded that a permissive regime with properly designed and administered safeguards was capable of protecting vulnerable people from abuse and error. While there are risks, to be sure, a carefully designed and managed system is capable of adequately addressing them:

> My review of the evidence in this section, and in the preceding section on the experience in permissive jurisdictions, leads me to conclude that the risks inherent in permitting physician-assisted death can be identified and very substantially minimized through a carefully-designed system imposing stringent limits that are scrupulously monitored and enforced. [para. 883]

[106] The trial judge found that it was feasible for properly qualified and experienced physicians to reliably assess patient competence and voluntariness, and that coercion, undue influence, and ambivalence could all be reliably assessed as part of that process (paras. 795-98, 815, 837, and 843). In reaching this conclusion, she particularly relied on the evidence on the application of the informed consent standard in other medical decision-making in Canada, including end-of-life decision-making (para. 1368). She concluded that it would be possible for physicians to apply the informed consent standard to patients who seek assistance in dying, adding the caution that physicians should ensure that patients are properly informed of their diagnosis and prognosis and the range of available options de chacun des endroits où l'aide médicale à mourir est légale ou réglementée. De l'avis de la juge, une prohibition absolue se serait révélée nécessaire si la preuve avait démontré que les médecins ne sont pas en mesure d'évaluer de manière sûre la capacité, la volonté et la non-ambivalence des patients, que les médecins ne comprennent pas la règle du consentement éclairé à un traitement médical ou ne l'appliquent pas, ou si la preuve émanant des endroits où l'aide à mourir est permise faisait état du décès fortuit d'une personne résultant de sévices, d'une insouciance, d'une insensibilité ou d'un dérapage (par. 1365-1366).

[106] La juge de première instance a conclu qu'il était possible pour un médecin qualifié et expérimenté d'évaluer de manière sûre la capacité du patient et le caractère volontaire de sa décision, et que la coercition, l'abus d'influence et l'ambivalence pouvaient tous être évalués de façon sûre dans le cadre de ce processus (par. 795-798, 815, 837 et 843). Pour arriver à cette conclusion, elle s'est surtout appuyée sur la preuve relative à l'application de la norme du consentement éclairé dans la prise d'autres décisions d'ordre médical au Canada, notamment les décisions de fin de vie (par. 1368). Elle a estimé qu'il serait possible pour les médecins d'appliquer la norme du consentement éclairé à l'égard des patients qui demandent de l'aide pour mourir, et elle a ajouté la mise en garde suivante :

for medical care, including palliative care interventions aimed at reducing pain and avoiding the loss of personal dignity (para. 831).

[107] As to the risk to vulnerable populations (such as the elderly and disabled), the trial judge found that there was no evidence from permissive jurisdictions that people with disabilities are at heightened risk of accessing physician-assisted dying (paras. 852 and 1242). She thus rejected the contention that unconscious bias by physicians would undermine the assessment process (para. 1129). The trial judge found there was no evidence of inordinate impact on socially vulnerable populations in the permissive jurisdictions, and that in some cases palliative care actually improved post-legalization (para. 731). She also found that while the evidence suggested that the law had both negative and positive impacts on physicians, it did support the conclusion that physicians were better able to provide overall end-of-life treatment once assisted death was legalized (para. 1271). Finally, she found no compelling evidence that a permissive regime in Canada would result in a "practical slippery slope" (para. 1241).

(a) Canada's Challenge to the Facts

[108] Canada says that the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in concluding that safeguards would minimize the risk associated with assisted dying. Canada argues that the trial judge's conclusion that the level of risk was acceptable flies in the face of her acknowledgment that some of the evidence on safeguards was weak, and that there was evidence of a lack of compliance with safeguards in permissive jurisdictions. Canada also says the trial judge erred by relying on cultural differences between Canada and other countries in finding that problems experienced elsewhere were not likely to occur in Canada.

les médecins devraient s'assurer que les patients sont informés comme il se doit de leur diagnostic et de leur pronostic ainsi que des soins médicaux qu'ils peuvent recevoir, y compris les soins palliatifs visant à calmer la douleur et à leur éviter la perte de leur dignité (par. 831).

[107] Quant au danger que courent les personnes vulnérables (comme les personnes âgées ou handicapées), la juge de première instance a conclu qu'aucune preuve émanant des endroits où l'aide à mourir est autorisée n'indique que les personnes handicapées risquent davantage d'obtenir une aide médicale à mourir (par. 852 et 1242). Elle a donc rejeté la prétention selon laquelle la partialité inconsciente du médecin compromettrait le processus d'évaluation (par. 1129). Selon la juge, aucune preuve ne démontrait l'existence de répercussions considérables sur les groupes vulnérables de la société aux endroits où l'aide à mourir est autorisée et, dans certains cas, il y avait eu amélioration des soins palliatifs après la légalisation de l'aide médicale à mourir (par. 731). Elle a ajouté que, bien que la preuve indiquait que la loi avait des incidences tant négatives que positives sur les médecins, elle appuyait la conclusion que les médecins étaient plus aptes à administrer un traitement global de fin de vie après la légalisation de l'aide à mourir (par. 1271). Enfin, elle a conclu qu'aucune preuve convaincante n'indiquait que l'instauration d'un régime permissif au Canada aboutirait à un [TRADUCTION] « dérapage » (par. 1241).

a) Contestation des faits par le Canada

[108] Le Canada affirme que la juge de première instance a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante en concluant que des garanties minimiseraient le risque lié à l'aide à mourir. Il plaide que la conclusion de la juge, selon laquelle le risque était acceptable, contredit le fait qu'elle ait reconnu la faiblesse de certains éléments de preuve relatifs aux garanties, et que la preuve indiquait que, là où l'aide à mourir est autorisée, l'application des garanties manifestait des lacunes. Toujours selon le Canada, la juge de première instance a eu tort de se fonder sur des différences culturelles entre le Canada et d'autres pays pour conclure que les problèmes rencontrés ailleurs n'étaient pas susceptibles de se manifester ici.

[109] We cannot accede to Canada's submission. In Bedford, this Court affirmed that a trial judge's findings on social and legislative facts are entitled to the same degree of deference as any other factual findings (para. 48). In our view, Canada has not established that the trial judge's conclusion on this point is unsupported, arbitrary, insufficiently precise or otherwise in error. At most, Canada's criticisms amount to "pointing out conflicting evidence", which is not sufficient to establish a palpable and overriding error (Tsilhqot'in Nation, at para. 60). We see no reason to reject the conclusions drawn by the trial judge. They were reasonable and open to her on the record.

[109] Nous ne pouvons retenir cet argument du Canada. Dans Bedford, notre Cour a affirmé que les conclusions d'un juge de première instance relatives à des faits sociaux et législatifs commandent la même déférence que toute autre conclusion de fait (par. 48). À notre avis, le Canada n'a pas établi que la conclusion de la juge de première instance sur ce point ne repose sur rien, qu'elle est arbitraire, insuffisamment précise, ou qu'elle est erronée pour une autre raison. Les critiques du Canada ne servent tout au plus qu'à « souligner le caractère contradictoire de la preuve », ce qui ne suffit pas à établir l'existence d'une erreur manifeste et dominante (Nation Tsilhqot'in, par. 60). Nous ne voyons aucune raison de rejeter les conclusions auxquelles est arrivée la juge. Ces conclusions étaient raisonnables compte tenu du dossier.

(b) The Fresh Evidence

b) Le nouvel élément de preuve

[110] Rothstein J. granted Canada leave to file fresh evidence on developments in Belgium since the time of the trial. This evidence took the form of an affidavit from Professor Etienne Montero, a professor in bioethics and an expert on the practice of euthanasia in Belgium. Canada says that Professor Montero's evidence demonstrates that issues with compliance and with the expansion of the criteria granting access to assisted suicide inevitably arise, even in a system of ostensibly strict limits and safeguards. It argues that this "should give pause to those who feel very strict safeguards will provide adequate protection: paper safeguards are only as strong as the human hands that carry them out" (R.F., at para. 97).

[111] Professor Montero's affidavit reviews a number of recent, controversial, and high-profile cases of assistance in dying in Belgium which would not fall within the parameters suggested in these reasons, such as euthanasia for minors or persons with psychiatric disorders or minor medical conditions. Professor Montero suggests that these cases demonstrate that a slippery slope is at work in Belgium. In his view, "[o]nce euthanasia is allowed,

[112] We are not convinced that Professor Montero's evidence undermines the trial judge's findings of fact. First, the trial judge (rightly, in our view) noted that the permissive regime in Belgium is the product of a very different medico-legal culture. Practices of assisted death were "already prevalent and embedded in the medical culture" prior to legalization (para. 660). The regime simply regulates a common pre-existing practice. In the absence of a comparable history in Canada, the trial judge concluded that it was problematic to draw inferences about the level of physician compliance with legislated safeguards based on the Belgian evidence (para. 680). This distinction is relevant both in assessing the degree of physician compliance and in considering evidence with regards to the potential for a slippery slope.

[113] Second, the cases described by Professor Montero were the result of an oversight body exercising discretion in the interpretation of the safeguards and restrictions in the Belgian legislative regime — a discretion the Belgian Parliament has not moved to restrict. These cases offer little insight into how a Canadian regime might operate.

(c) The Feasibility of Safeguards and the Possibility of a "Slippery Slope"

[114] At trial Canada went into some detail about the risks associated with the legalization of physician-assisted dying. In its view, there are many possible sources of error and many factors that can render a patient "decisionally vulnerable" and thereby give rise to the risk that persons without a rational and considered desire for death will in fact end up dead. It points to cognitive impairment, depression or other mental illness, coercion, undue influence, psychological or emotional manipulation, systemic prejudice (against the elderly or people with disabilities), and the possibility of ambivalence

À son avis, [TRADUCTION] « [u]ne fois l'euthanasie permise, il devient très difficile de s'en tenir à une interprétation stricte des conditions prévues par la loi. »

[112] Nous ne sommes pas convaincus que la preuve présentée par le professeur Montero mine les conclusions de fait de la juge de première instance. En premier lieu, cette dernière a signalé (à juste titre selon nous) que le régime permissif de la Belgique résulte d'une culture médico-légale très différente. L'aide à mourir y était [TRADUCTION] « déjà répandue et intégrée à la culture médicale » avant sa légalisation (par. 660). Le régime ne fait que réglementer une pratique courante qui existait déjà. Puisque le Canada n'a pas connu de phénomène analogue, la juge de première instance a estimé problématique de tirer, sur la foi de la preuve provenant de la Belgique, des conclusions relatives à la mesure dans laquelle les médecins respectent les garanties législatives (par. 680). Cette distinction est pertinente tant pour évaluer le degré de respect des garanties par les médecins que pour apprécier la preuve concernant la possibilité de dérapage.

[113] En deuxième lieu, les cas décrits par le professeur Montero découlaient de l'exercice, par un organisme de surveillance, de son pouvoir discrétionnaire pour interpréter les garanties et restrictions prévues par le régime législatif belge. Le Parlement de la Belgique n'a rien fait pour restreindre ce pouvoir. Ces cas nous éclairent peu sur l'application éventuelle d'un régime canadien.

c) La faisabilité des garanties et la possibilité de « dérapage »

or misdiagnosis as factors that may escape detection or give rise to errors in capacity assessment. Essentially, Canada argues that, given the breadth of this list, there is no reliable way to identify those who are vulnerable and those who are not. As a result, it says, a blanket prohibition is necessary.

[115] The evidence accepted by the trial judge does not support Canada's argument. Based on the evidence regarding assessment processes in comparable end-of-life medical decision-making in Canada, the trial judge concluded that vulnerability can be assessed on an individual basis, using the procedures that physicians apply in their assessment of informed consent and decisional capacity in the context of medical decision-making more generally. Concerns about decisional capacity and vulnerability arise in all end-of-life medical decision-making. Logically speaking, there is no reason to think that the injured, ill, and disabled who have the option to refuse or to request withdrawal of lifesaving or life-sustaining treatment, or who seek palliative sedation, are less vulnerable or less susceptible to biased decision-making than those who might seek more active assistance in dying. The risks that Canada describes are already part and parcel of our medical system.

[116] As the trial judge noted, the individual assessment of vulnerability (whatever its source) is implicitly condoned for life-and-death decision-making in Canada. In some cases, these decisions are governed by advance directives, or made by a substitute decision-maker. Canada does not argue that the risk in those circumstances requires an absolute prohibition (indeed, there is currently no federal regulation of such practices). In A.C., Abella J. adverted to the potential vulnerability of adolescents who are faced with life-and-death decisions about medical treatment (paras. 72-78). Yet, this Court implicitly accepted the viability of an individual assessment of decisional capacity in the context of that case. We accept the trial judge's conclusion that it is possible for physicians, with due care and attention to the seriousness of the decision involved, to adequately assess decisional capacity.

[115] La preuve retenue par la juge de première instance n'étaye pas l'argument du Canada. Se fondant sur la preuve relative aux procédures d'évaluation dans la prise de décisions médicales analogues concernant la fin de vie au Canada, la juge a conclu que la vulnérabilité peut être évaluée au cas par cas au moyen des procédures suivies par les médecins lorsqu'ils évaluent le consentement éclairé et la capacité décisionnelle dans le contexte de la prise de décisions d'ordre médical de façon plus générale. Les préoccupations au sujet de la capacité décisionnelle et de la vulnérabilité se posent dans tous les cas de décisions médicales concernant la fin de vie. D'un point de vue logique, il n'y a aucune raison de croire que les blessés, les malades et les handicapés qui peuvent refuser un traitement vital ou un traitement de maintien de la vie, demander le retrait de l'un ou l'autre traitement, ou encore réclamer une sédation palliative, sont moins vulnérables ou moins susceptibles de prendre une décision faussée que ceux qui pourraient demander une assistance plus active pour mourir. Les risques dont parle le Canada font déjà partie intégrante de notre régime médical.

[117] The trial judge, on the basis of her consideration of various regimes and how they operate, found that it is possible to establish a regime that addresses the risks associated with physician-assisted death. We agree with the trial judge that the risks associated with physician-assisted death can be limited through a carefully designed and monitored system of safeguards.

[118] Canada also argues that the permissive regulatory regime accepted by the trial judge "accepts too much risk", and that its effectiveness is "speculative" (R.F., at para. 154). In effect, Canada argues that a blanket prohibition should be upheld unless the appellants can demonstrate that an alternative approach eliminates all risk. This effectively reverses the onus under s. 1, requiring the claimant whose rights are infringed to prove less invasive ways of achieving the prohibition's object. The burden of establishing minimal impairment is on the government.

[119] The trial judge found that Canada had not discharged this burden. The evidence, she concluded, did not support the contention that a blanket prohibition was necessary in order to substantially meet the government's objectives. We agree. A theoretical or speculative fear cannot justify an absolute prohibition. As Deschamps J. stated in Chaoulli, at para. 68, the claimant "d[oes] not have the burden of disproving every fear or every threat", nor can the government meet its burden simply by asserting an adverse impact on the public. Justification under s. 1 is a process of demonstration, not intuition or prendre des décisions de vie ou de mort quant à un traitement médical (par. 72-78). Notre Cour a pourtant reconnu implicitement la viabilité d'une évaluation individuelle de la capacité décisionnelle dans le contexte de cette affaire. Nous acceptons la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle il est possible pour les médecins de bien évaluer la capacité décisionnelle avec la diligence requise et en portant attention à la gravité de la décision à prendre.

préjudiciable sur le public. La justification en vertu de l'article premier est un processus de démonstration, et non d'intuition ou de déférence automatique envers le risque invoqué par l'État (RJR-MacDonald, par. 128).

[120] Finally, it is argued that without an absolute prohibition on assisted dying, Canada will descend the slippery slope into euthanasia and condoned murder. Anecdotal examples of controversial cases abroad were cited in support of this argument, only to be countered by anecdotal examples of systems that work well. The resolution of the issue before us falls to be resolved not by competing anecdotes, but by the evidence. The trial judge, after an exhaustive review of the evidence, rejected the argument that adoption of a regulatory regime would initiate a descent down a slippery slope into homicide. We should not lightly assume that the regulatory regime will function defectively, nor should we assume that other criminal sanctions against the taking of lives will prove impotent against abuse.

[120] Enfin, on prétend que, si l'aide à mourir n'est pas absolument prohibée, le Canada dérapera vers l'euthanasie et le meurtre cautionné. Des exemples anecdotiques de cas controversés rencontrés à l'étranger ont été cités à l'appui de cet argument, et aussitôt contrés par des exemples anecdotiques de systèmes qui fonctionnent bien. La question dont nous sommes saisis doit être tranchée sur le fondement non pas d'anecdotes contradictoires, mais de la preuve. Après un examen exhaustif de la preuve, la juge de première instance a rejeté l'argument selon lequel l'adoption d'un régime de réglementation nous entraînerait dans un dérapage menant à l'homicide. Nous ne devons pas supposer à la légère qu'un tel régime fonctionnera mal, ni supposer que l'infliction d'autres sanctions pénales à ceux et celles qui enlèvent la vie d'autrui se révélera inefficace contre les abus.

[121] Comme nous ne relevons aucune erreur dans l'analyse qu'a faite la juge de première instance de l'atteinte minimale, nous concluons que la prohibition absolue ne constitue pas une atteinte minimale.

(3) Deleterious Effects and Salutary Benefits

(3) Effets préjudiciables et effets bénéfiques

[122] This stage of the Oakes analysis weighs the impact of the law on protected rights against the beneficial effect of the law in terms of the greater public good. Given our conclusion that the law is not minimally impairing, it is not necessary to go on to this step.

[122] À ce stade de l'analyse prescrite par l'arrêt Oakes, il faut mettre en balance l'incidence de la loi sur les droits protégés et l'effet bénéfique de la loi au plan de l'intérêt supérieur du public. Vu notre conclusion que la loi ne constitue pas une atteinte minimale, il n'est pas nécessaire de passer à cette étape.

[123] We conclude that s. 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter.

[123] Nous concluons que l'al. 241*b*) et l'art. 14 du Code criminel ne sont pas sauvegardés par application de l'article premier de la Charte.

XI. Remedy

A. The Court of Appeal's Proposed Constitutional Exemption

[124] The majority at the Court of Appeal suggested that this Court consider issuing a free-standing constitutional exemption, rather than a declaration of invalidity, should it choose to reconsider Rodriguez. The majority noted that the law does not currently provide an avenue for relief from a "generally sound law" that has an extraordinary effect on a small number of individuals (para. 326). It also expressed concern that it might not be possible for Parliament to create a fully rounded, well-balanced alternative policy within the time frame of any suspension of a declaration of invalidity (para. 334).

[125] In our view, this is not a proper case for a constitutional exemption. We have found that the prohibition infringes the claimants' s. 7 rights. Parliament must be given the opportunity to craft an appropriate remedy. The concerns raised in Ferguson about stand-alone constitutional exemptions are equally applicable here: issuing such an exemption would create uncertainty, undermine the rule of law, and usurp Parliament's role. Complex regulatory regimes are better created by Parliament than by the courts.

B. Declaration of Invalidity

[126] We have concluded that the laws prohibiting a physician's assistance in terminating life (Criminal Code, s. 241(b) and s. 14) infringe Ms. Taylor's s. 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person in a manner that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, and that the infringement is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. To the extent that the impugned laws deny the s. 7 rights of people like Ms. Taylor they are void by operation of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. It is for Parliament and the provincial legislatures to

XI. La réparation

A. L'exemption constitutionnelle proposée par la Cour d'appel

[124] Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont suggéré à notre Cour d'envisager la possibilité d'accorder une exemption constitutionnelle autonome plutôt que de prononcer une déclaration d'invalidité si elle décide de réexaminer l'arrêt Rodriguez. Les juges majoritaires ont souligné qu'à l'heure actuelle, le droit n'offre pas de voie de recours à l'encontre d'une [TRADUCTION] « loi généralement valide » ayant un effet exceptionnel sur un petit nombre de personnes (par. 326). Ils ont également dit craindre qu'il ne soit pas possible pour le législateur d'instaurer une autre politique globale et équilibrée pendant toute suspension de prise d'effet d'une déclaration d'invalidité (par. 334).

[125] À notre avis, il n'est pas opportun en l'espèce d'accorder une exemption constitutionnelle. Nous avons conclu que la prohibition porte atteinte aux droits garantis aux demandeurs par l'art. 7. Il faut donner au législateur l'occasion de concevoir une réparation convenable. Les préoccupations exprimées dans Ferguson au sujet des exemptions constitutionnelles autonomes valent tout autant en l'espèce : pareille exemption serait source d'incertitude, saperait la primauté du droit et constituerait une usurpation de la fonction du législateur, qui est mieux placé que les tribunaux pour créer des régimes de réglementation complexes.

B. Déclaration d'invalidité

[126] Nous sommes arrivés à la conclusion que les dispositions prohibant l'aide médicale à mourir (l'al. 241*b*) et l'art. 14 du Code criminel) portaient atteinte aux droits à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne que l'art. 7 garantit à M^me^ Taylor, et ce d'une manière non conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale, et que cette atteinte n'était pas justifiée au regard de l'article premier de la Charte. Dans la mesure où les dispositions législatives contestées nient les droits que l'art. 7 reconnaît aux personnes comme M^me^ Taylor, elles sont nulles par respond, should they so choose, by enacting legislation consistent with the constitutional parameters set out in these reasons.

[127] The appropriate remedy is therefore a declaration that s. 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code are void insofar as they prohibit physician-assisted death for a competent adult person who (1) clearly consents to the termination of life; and (2) has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition. "Irremediable", it should be added, does not require the patient to undertake treatments that are not acceptable to the individual. The scope of this declaration is intended to respond to the factual circumstances in this case. We make no pronouncement on other situations where physician-assisted dying may be sought.

[129] We would not accede to the appellants' request to create a mechanism for exemptions during the period of suspended validity. In view of the fact that Ms. Taylor has now passed away and that none of the remaining litigants seeks a personal exemption, this is not a proper case for creating such an exemption mechanism.

[130] A number of the interveners asked the Court to account for physicians' freedom of conscience and religion when crafting the remedy in this case. The Catholic Civil Rights League, the Faith and Freedom Alliance, the Protection of Conscience Project, and the Catholic Health Alliance of Canada all expressed concern that physicians who object to medical assistance in dying on moral grounds may be obligated, based on a duty to act in their patients' best interests, to participate in physician-assisted dying. They ask us application de l'art. 52 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982. Il appartient au Parlement et aux législatures provinciales de répondre, si elles choisissent de le faire, en adoptant une loi compatible avec les paramètres constitutionnels énoncés dans les présents motifs.

to confirm that physicians and other health-care workers cannot be compelled to provide medical aid in dying. They would have the Court direct the legislature to provide robust protection for those who decline to support or participate in physician-assisted dying for reasons of conscience or religion.

[131] The Canadian Medical Association reports that its membership is divided on the issue of assisted suicide. The Association's current policy states that it supports the right of all physicians, within the bounds of the law, to follow their conscience in deciding whether or not to provide aid in dying. It seeks to see that policy reflected in any legislative scheme that may be put forward. While acknowledging that the Court cannot itself set out a comprehensive regime, the Association asks us to indicate that any legislative scheme must legally protect both those physicians who choose to provide this new intervention to their patients, along with those who do not.

[132] In our view, nothing in the declaration of invalidity which we propose to issue would compel physicians to provide assistance in dying. The declaration simply renders the criminal prohibition invalid. What follows is in the hands of the physicians' colleges, Parliament, and the provincial legislatures. However, we note — as did Beetz J. in addressing the topic of physician participation in abortion in Morgentaler — that a physician's decision to participate in assisted dying is a matter of conscience and, in some cases, of religious belief (pp. 95-96). In making this observation, we do not wish to pre-empt the legislative and regulatory response to this judgment. Rather, we underline that the Charter rights of patients and physicians will need to be reconciled.

XII. Costs

à mourir. Ils nous demandent de confirmer que les médecins et les autres travailleurs de la santé ne peuvent être contraints de fournir cette aide. Ils souhaitent que la Cour enjoigne au législateur d'offrir une protection solide à ceux et celles qui refusent de faciliter l'aide médicale à mourir ou d'y participer pour des raisons de conscience ou de religion.

XII. Dépens

[134] The trial judge awarded the appellants special costs exceeding $1,000,000, on the ground that this was justified by the public interest in resolving the legal issues raised by the case. (Costs awarded on the usual party-and-party basis would not have exceeded about $150,000.) In doing so, the trial judge relied on Victoria (City) v. Adams, 2009 BCCA 563, 100 B.C.L.R. (4th) 28, at para. 188, which set out four factors for determining whether to award special costs to a successful public interest litigant: (1) the case concerns matters of public importance that transcend the immediate interests of the parties, and which have not been previously resolved; (2) the plaintiffs have no personal, proprietary or pecuniary interest in the litigation that would justify the proceeding on economic grounds; (3) the unsuccessful parties have a superior capacity to bear the cost of the proceedings; and (4) the plaintiffs did not conduct the litigation in an abusive, vexatious or frivolous manner. The trial judge found that all four criteria were met in this case.

[136] The appellants argue that special costs, while exceptional, are appropriate in a case such as this, where the litigation raises a constitutional issue of high public interest, is beyond the plaintiffs' means, and was not conducted in an abusive or vexatious manner. Without such awards, they argue, plaintiffs will not be able to bring vital issues of importance to all Canadians before the courts, to the detriment of justice and other affected Canadians.

[137] Against this, we must weigh the caution that "[c]ourts should not seek on their own to bring an alternative and extensive legal aid system into being": Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Commissioner of Customs and Revenue), 2007 SCC 2, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 38, at para. 44. With this concern in mind, we are of the view that Adams sets the threshold for an award of special costs too low. This Court has previously emphasized that special costs are only available in "exceptional" circumstances: Finney v. Barreau du Québec, 2004 SCC 36, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 17, at para. 48. The test set out in Adams would permit an award of special costs in cases that do not fit that description. Almost all constitutional litigation concerns "matters of public importance". Further, the criterion that asks whether the unsuccessful party has a superior capacity to bear the cost of the proceedings will always favour an award against the government. Without more, special costs awards may become routine in public interest litigation.

[138] Some reference to this Court's jurisprudence on advance costs may be helpful in refining the criteria for special costs on a full indemnity basis. This Court set the test for an award of advance costs in British Columbia (Minister of Forests) v. Okanagan Indian Band, 2003 SCC 71, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 371. LeBel J. identified three criteria necessary to justify that departure from the usual rule of costs:

[138] Un regard sur la jurisprudence de notre Cour relative aux provisions pour frais peut s'avérer utile pour préciser les critères applicables à l'octroi de dépens spéciaux sur la base de l'indemnisation intégrale. Notre Cour a énoncé le test applicable à l'octroi d'une provision pour frais dans Colombie-Britannique (Ministre des Forêts) c. Bande indienne Okanagan, 2003 CSC 71, [2003] 3 R.C.S. 371. Le juge LeBel y a indiqué trois conditions qui doivent être réunies pour justifier cette dérogation à la règle habituelle en matière de dépens :

1. The party seeking interim costs genuinely cannot afford to pay for the litigation, and no other realistic option exists for bringing the issues to trial — in short, the litigation would be unable to proceed if the order were not made.

1. La partie qui demande une provision pour frais n'a véritablement pas les moyens de payer les frais occasionnés par le litige et ne dispose réalistement d'aucune autre source de financement lui permettant de soumettre les questions en cause au tribunal — bref, elle serait incapable d'agir en justice sans l'ordonnance.

2. The claim to be adjudicated is prima facie meritorious; that is, the claim is at least of sufficient

2. La demande vaut prima facie d'être instruite, c'est-à-dire qu'elle paraît au moins suffisamment valable merit that it is contrary to the interests of justice for the opportunity to pursue the case to be forfeited just because the litigant lacks financial means.

3. The issues raised transcend the individual interests of the particular litigant, are of public importance, and have not been resolved in previous cases. [para. 40]

[139] The Court elaborated on this test in Little Sisters, emphasizing that issues of public importance will not in themselves "automatically entitle a litigant to preferential treatment with respect to costs" (para. 35). The standard is a high one: only "rare and exceptional" cases will warrant such treatment (para. 38).

[140] In our view, with appropriate modifications, this test serves as a useful guide to the exercise of a judge's discretion on a motion for special costs in a case involving public interest litigants. First, the case must involve matters of public interest that are truly exceptional. It is not enough that the issues raised have not previously been resolved or that they transcend the individual interests of the successful litigant: they must also have a significant and widespread societal impact. Second, in addition to showing that they have no personal, proprietary or pecuniary interest in the litigation that would justify the proceedings on economic grounds, the plaintiffs must show that it would not have been possible to effectively pursue the litigation in question with private funding. In those rare cases, it will be contrary to the interests of justice to ask the individual litigants (or, more likely, pro bono counsel) to bear the majority of the financial burden associated with pursuing the claim.

[141] Where these criteria are met, a court will have the discretion to depart from the usual rule on costs and award special costs.

[142] Finally, we note that an award of special costs does not give the successful litigant the right et, de ce fait, il serait contraire aux intérêts de la justice que le plaideur renonce à agir en justice parce qu'il n'en a pas les moyens financiers.

3. Les questions soulevées dépassent le cadre des intérêts du plaideur, revêtent une importance pour le public et n'ont pas encore été tranchées. [par. 40]

[139] La Cour a précisé ce test dans Little Sisters en soulignant que les questions d'importance pour le public ne signifient pas en soi que « le plaideur a automatiquement droit à un traitement préférentiel en matière de dépens » (par. 35). La norme est élevée : seules des affaires « rares et exceptionnelles » peuvent justifier pareil traitement (par. 38).

[140] Nous estimons que ce test, modifié comme il se doit, constitue un guide utile pour l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge saisi d'une requête pour dépens spéciaux dans une affaire mettant en cause des parties représentant l'intérêt public. Premièrement, l'affaire doit porter sur des questions d'intérêt public véritablement exceptionnelles. Il ne suffit pas que les questions soulevées n'aient pas encore été tranchées ou qu'elles dépassent le cadre des intérêts du plaideur qui a gain de cause : elles doivent aussi avoir une incidence importante et généralisée sur la société. Deuxièmement, en plus de démontrer qu'ils n'ont dans le litige aucun intérêt personnel, propriétal ou pécuniaire qui justifierait l'instance pour des raisons d'ordre économique, les demandeurs doivent démontrer qu'il n'aurait pas été possible de poursuivre l'instance en question avec une aide financière privée. Dans ces rares cas, il est contraire à l'intérêt de la justice de demander aux plaideurs individuels (ou, ce qui est plus probable, aux avocats bénévoles) de supporter la majeure partie du fardeau financier associé à la poursuite de la demande.

[141] Lorsque ces critères sont respectés, le tribunal a le pouvoir discrétionnaire de déroger à la règle habituelle en matière de dépens et d'octroyer des dépens spéciaux.

[142] Enfin, nous faisons remarquer que l'octroi de dépens spéciaux ne donne pas à la partie qui a to burden the defendant with any and all expenses accrued during the course of the litigation. As costs awards are meant to "encourage the reasonable and efficient conduct of litigation" (Okanagan Indian Band, at para. 41), only those costs that are shown to be reasonable and prudent will be covered by the award.

[143] Having regard to these criteria, we are not persuaded the trial judge erred in awarding special costs to the appellants in the truly exceptional circumstances of this case. We would order the same with respect to the proceedings in this Court and in the Court of Appeal.

[144] The final question is whether the trial judge erred in awarding 10 percent of the costs against the Attorney General of British Columbia. The trial judge acknowledged that it is unusual for courts to award costs against an Attorney General who intervenes in constitutional litigation as of right. However, as the jurisprudence reveals, there is no firm rule against it: see, e.g., B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315; Hegeman v. Carter, 2008 NWTSC 48, 74 C.P.C. (6th) 112; and Polglase v. Polglase (1979), 18 B.C.L.R. 294 (S.C.).

[145] In her reasons on costs, the trial judge explained that counsel for British Columbia led evidence, cross-examined the appellants' witnesses, and made written and oral submissions on most of the issues during the course of the trial. She also noted that British Columbia took an active role in pre-trial proceedings. She held that an Attorney General's responsibility for costs when involved in constitutional litigation as of right varies with the role the Attorney General assumes in the litigation. Where the Attorney General assumes the role of a party, the court may find the Attorney General liable for costs in the same manner as a party (para. 96). She concluded that the Attorney General of British Columbia had taken a full and active role in the proceedings and should therefore be liable for costs gain de cause le droit de faire supporter au défendeur les moindres dépenses engagées au cours de l'instance. Comme l'octroi de dépens est censé « favoriser le déroulement raisonnable et efficace de la poursuite » (Bande indienne Okanagan, par. 41), seuls les frais dont on établit le caractère raisonnable et prudent seront couverts par les dépens spéciaux.

[144] La dernière question est de savoir si la juge de première instance a commis une erreur en condamnant la procureure générale de la Colombie-Britannique à payer 10 pour 100 des dépens. Elle a reconnu le caractère inhabituel d'une condamnation aux dépens prononcée contre un procureur général qui intervient de plein droit à un litige constitutionnel. Mais comme le révèle la jurisprudence, aucune règle établie ne l'interdit : voir, p. ex., B. (R.) c. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 R.C.S. 315; Hegeman c. Carter, 2008 NWTSC 48, 74 C.P.C. (6th) 112; et Polglase c. Polglase (1979), 18 B.C.L.R. 294 (C.S.).

[145] Dans ses motifs relatifs aux dépens, la juge de première instance a expliqué que les avocats de la Colombie-Britannique avaient produit des éléments de preuve, contre-interrogé les témoins des appelants et présenté des arguments écrits et de vive voix sur la plupart des questions au cours du procès. Elle a ajouté que la Colombie-Britannique avait pris une part active aux procédures préliminaires. Toujours selon elle, la responsabilité qu'a un procureur général de payer les dépens lorsqu'il participe de plein droit à un litige constitutionnel varie selon le rôle qu'il joue dans l'instance. S'il joue le rôle de partie, le tribunal peut le tenir responsable des dépens comme s'il était une partie (par. 96). Elle a conclu que la procureure générale de la Colombie-Britannique avait participé pleinement et activement in proportion to the time British Columbia took during the proceedings.

[146] We stress, as did the trial judge, that it will be unusual for a court to award costs against Attorneys General appearing before the court as of right. However, we see no reason to interfere with the trial judge's decision to do so in this case or with her apportionment of responsibility between the Attorney General of British Columbia and the Attorney General of Canada. The trial judge was best positioned to determine the role taken by British Columbia and the extent to which it shared carriage of the case.

XIII. Conclusion

[147] The appeal is allowed. We would issue the following declaration, which is suspended for 12 months:

Section 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code unjustifiably infringe s. 7 of the Charter and are of no force or effect to the extent that they prohibit physician-assisted death for a competent adult person who (1) clearly consents to the termination of life and (2) has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition.

[148] Special costs on a full indemnity basis are awarded against Canada throughout. The Attorney General of British Columbia will bear responsibility for 10 percent of the costs at trial on a full indemnity basis and will pay the costs associated with its presence at the appellate levels on a party-and-party basis.

Appeal allowed with costs.

à l'instance et qu'elle devrait donc être tenue aux dépens en proportion de la période de temps qu'elle a occupée au cours de l'instance.

[146] À l'instar de la juge de première instance, nous soulignons qu'il est inhabituel pour le tribunal de condamner aux dépens le procureur général qui comparaît devant lui de plein droit. Nous ne voyons toutefois aucune raison de modifier la décision de la juge de première instance de le faire en l'espèce, ou la manière dont elle a réparti la responsabilité entre la procureure générale de la Colombie-Britannique et le procureur général du Canada. Elle était la mieux placée pour apprécier la participation de la Colombie-Britannique et la mesure dans laquelle cette dernière a partagé la responsabilité du dossier.

XIII. Conclusion

[147] Le pourvoi est accueilli. Nous sommes d'avis de prononcer le jugement déclaratoire suivant, dont la prise d'effet est suspendue pendant 12 mois :

L'alinéa 241*b*) et l'art. 14 du Code criminel portent atteinte de manière injustifiée à l'art. 7 de la Charte et sont inopérants dans la mesure où ils prohibent l'aide d'un médecin pour mourir à une personne adulte capable qui (1) consent clairement à mettre fin à sa vie; et qui (2) est affectée de problèmes de santé graves et irrémédiables (y compris une affection, une maladie ou un handicap) lui causant des souffrances persistantes qui lui sont intolérables au regard de sa condition.

KING'S BENCH

IN RE OLDFIELD ESTATE (No. 2)

Before WILLIAMS, C.J.K.B.

Trusts—Charitable bequests—Meaning of Charity—Whether trust a perpetuity—Wider meaning of perpetuity as affecting validity of non-charitable trust—Gift to maintain a monument not charitable—Effect of direction to use portion of fund not required to maintain monument for repair of cemetery generally—Cemetery not connected with religious organization—Whether a purpose for benefit of community—Cemetery outside jurisdiction of Court—Trustee named not qualified—Direction to appoint another trustee—Mode of investment set out in will not suitable—Investment section of Trustee Act not excluded—Direction to invest in accordance with Trustee Act.

Wills—Voluntary association, right to receive bequest—Gift conditional on legatee giving undertaking—By whom undertaking may be given to satisfy condition.

Executors and administrators—Right to use estate moneys to disinter body of testator and rebury it in accordance with his desires verbally expressed.

Conflict of laws—Which law governs administration of trusts, Manitoba law or that of England and that of France.

Courts—Stare decisis—Effect of series of decisions of single judges.

The testator Oldfield left two legacies to the following effect: 11. To pay a Church of England organization in London, England, $5000.00 on condition that its secretary for the time being should undertake to the satisfaction of the trustee of the will to give certain care to a grave lot in a cemetery in London. 13. To pay the mayor for the time being of Estaires in France 50,000 francs to be invested and the income used to care for the testator's allottment and a cross thereon in the cemetery at Estaires. Any balance of income not required for that purpose to be used for the upkeep of the cemetery generally. If the said mayor is not a corporation with perpetual succession or if for any reason bequest is not good money is to be paid to any body willing to accept it on the above terms.

The executor applied by originating notice asking the court to decide whether either of the above bequests was valid as being for charitable purposes or otherwise, whether the Church of England organization could give the required undertaking, whether the mayor of Estaires was a corporation with perpetual succession, whether the executor could pay the 50,000 francs to a trust company willing to accept it subject to the terms of the bequest, whether moneys of the estate could be used to disinter the body of the testator and to bury it in the cemetery at Estaires in accordance with a wish verbally expressed by him in his lifetime, and whether the law of Manitoba governed the administration of the said trust.

Held, (1) The questions must be answered by reference to the law of Manitoba: In re Nanton Estate, 56 Man. R. 71, [1948] 2 W.W.R. 113; Freke v. Lord Carberry (1873) L.R. 16 Eq. 461.

(2) The law of Manitoba relating to charitable trusts such as contained in the will is the same as that of England, and the legal and technical meaning of the term "charity" is precisely the same in Manitoba as in England.

(3) The bequest in clause 13 is a gift of a fund the income of which is to be used (in perpetuity) for the maintenance of a monument and comes within the type known as a "tomb" case.

(4) Gifts for providing or repairing a monument or tomb not forming part of the fabric or ornament of a church cannot be supported as charities, though they may be valid as private trusts if not perpetuities.

(5) A gift primarily for the purpose of repairing the cemetery, and only as ancillary or incidental thereto certain graves or monuments, is a good charitable bequest, but one with the primary object of repairing specific graves or monuments though providing that if any balance of income remains it is to be devoted to the repair of the cemetery generally is not a good charitable bequest: In re Pardoe, McLaughlin v. A.G., [1906] 2 Ch. 184, 75 L.J. Ch. 455; In re Manser, A.G. v. Lucas, [1905] 1 Ch. 68, 74 L.J. Ch. 95; In re Eighmie Coulburne v. Wilks, [1935] 1 Ch. 524, 104 L.J. Ch. 254.

(6) On the question whether the trust can be supported on the ground that it is a private trust and is not a perpetuity, it is clear that it is illegal to vest property in trustees in perpetuity to be held on perpetual non-charitable trusts, where no person can take any benefit; although a condition for repair of a tomb while not charitable is not illegal: In re

Vaughan (1886), 33 Ch. D. 187; Re Nottage, [1895] 2 Ch. 649; In re Good, [1905] 2 Ch. 60, 74 L.J. Ch. 512; Kennedy v. Kennedy, [1914] A.C. 215, 83 L.J.P.C. 63. The case of In re Chardon, [1928] 1 Ch. 464, 97 L.J. Ch. 289 is distinguishable on the grounds set out in the article "Some Reflections on Re Chardon" in 53 Law Quarterly Review, pp. 24-60.

(7) The bequest so far as the maintenance of the specific monument and grave is concerned is not a good charitable bequest. It is a perpetuity and so void.

(8) A special rule is set out in Tudor on Charities, 5th ed., p. 62, and 4 Hals. 17 to the effect that where a fund is given in trust to apply the income in keeping a tomb in repair, and as to the remainder of the income for valid charitable purposes, the result of the failure of the trust for the repair of the tomb is that the whole income become applicable for the charitable purpose. Under the above rule, although the trust for the monument is invalid, the trust to maintain the cemetery is a good charitable trust and the whole of the income of the fund becomes applicable for such charitable purpose.

(9) A gift to maintain a cemetery provided by a municipal authority and not connected with any church or religious denomination is a gift for the benefit the inhabitants of a community and is also for a religious purpose and is therefore on either ground a charitable bequest, and it makes no difference that the cemetery is not in Manitoba but in France or England: In re Eighmie, supra; In re Vaughan, supra; In re Manser, supra; In re Robinson, [1931] 2 Ch. 122, 100 L.J. Ch. 321.

(10) The validity of a gift for maintenance of a cemetery does not depend on its being in relief of taxes, but even if it were so, no different principles would have to be applied depending on whether it was in Manitoba or elsewhere: In re Robinson, supra.

(11) As the gift was intended to be to the mayor as a corporation with perpetual succession and as the mayor is not such a corporation, he does not qualify to receive it and the gift does not vest in him. But as a charitable gift is not permitted to fail for the lack of a trustee, the court can remedy the defect.

(12) Since the method of investment directed by the testator may not be possible or desirable, the fund should be invested in trustee securities as authorized by the laws of Manitoba. If necessary the court can settle a scheme for the execution of the trust: In re Fenton Estate, 30 Man. R. 246, [1920] 2 W.W.R. 367.

(13) The gift in clause 11 to the Church of England organization is a valid bequest subject to a condition; it is not a charitable bequest.

(14) A gift to a voluntary unincorporated association may be and is in this case valid: In re Swain (1908), 99 L.T. 604. Carne v. Long (1860), 2 De G.F. & J. 75, 27 L.J. Ch. 589, 45 E.R. 413; Gravenor v. Hallam (1767), Amb. 643, 27 E.R. 417, and Re Laing Estate, [1927] 1 W.W.R. 699 do not apply.

(15) Having in mind the circumstances of this case, the desire of the testator, the fact that he left a large estate and no immediate family, that the wife and only child were buried in the cemetery to which it is proposed to move the body, the funds of the estate may be used to disinter the body and move it to the new place of burial: Widdifield on Executor's Accounts, 4th ed., 116 et seq., and cases cited in the 3rd ed.

(16) Even when it is difficult to decide the real basis of the earlier decisions, it is of the utmost importance, as regards our law, that judges of the first instance should not disregard a series of decisions by other judges of first instance, none of which have been appealed or have been otherwise interfered with: In re Birkett, (1878), 9 Ch.D. 576, 47 L.J. Ch. 846.

ARGUED: 15th December, 1948.

DECIDED: 12th February, 1949.

STATEMENT—Application by the executor by way of originating notice of motion to determine inter alia whether two bequests were valid as being charitable gifts or otherwise. For answers given to the questions, see reasons for judgment. Costs were given payable out of the estate; those of the trustee to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

ARGUMENT—C. V. McArthur, K.C., for the executors. The law applicable to the administration of the trusts relating to the Church of England Temperance Society and to the mayor of Estaires is the law of Manitoba. The testator, though domiciled in England, had been resident in Manitoba for one year prior to his death. His will was executed here and dealt only with his Manitoba estate. See Freke v. Lord Carberry (1873), L.R. 16 Eq. 461; 11 E. & E. Dig. 364; 6 Hals., 2nd ed., 214; Theobald on Wills, 10th ed., p. 1; In re Nanton Estate, 56 Man. R. 79; In re Kloebe, 28 Ch.D. 177. The lex situs governs the distribution of personal property: In re Lorrilard, [1922] 2 Ch. 644. The bequest to the temperance society is valid whether it is charitable or not. If it is charitable there can be no question of its validity. If it is not charitable the only suggested cause of invalidity is that it might infringe the rule against perpetuities. But it does not do so. It vests within a life and 21 years in the society subject to a condition. The law relating to charities goes back to 43 Eliz. ch. 4. Though this statute was repealed by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act (1888) 51 & 52 Vic., ch. 42, such repeal would not affect the operation of the original Act in Manitoba. The four types of object which fall within the meaning of "charitable" are set out in Commrs. etc. of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A.C. 531. The following cases deal with the application of the statute of Elizabeth and other English statutes to bequests for the maintenance of graves or tombs: In re Vaughan, 33 Ch.D. 187; In re Manser, [1905] 1 Ch. 68; Roche v. McDermott, [1901] 1 Ir. R. 394; Re Pardoe, [1906] 2 Ch. 184; and cases cited in Tyssen on Charitable Bequests, p. 93. A charitable trust may last forever. But a bequest for a charitable purpose must nevertheless vest indefeasibly within the period fixed by the rule against perpetuities. In re Halliday Est., 43 Man. R. 81, and In re Chardon, [1928] Ch. 464, involve bequests to maintain graves. In the first the bequest was held invalid because the fund did not vest in anyone. In the second it was held that gift did not infringe the rule against perpetuities or the rule against inalienability and was valid. It is difficult to distinguish the two cases on their facts. The gift to the mayor of Estaires could be charitable if the authorities are closely followed. The cemetery is supported by a municipal authority, and donations would be in relief of rates. Would also relieve the necessity of further donations from England. The amount of the gift indicates that it was not the intention merely to maintain the graves of the testator's wife and son, but rather to keep up the cemetery generally. If the bequest is non-charitable the main question will be where it vests. It could be said to vest in a trust company to which it might be handed over by the trustee of the estate subject to the trust company obtaining a satisfactory conveyance from the town of Estaires. As to the meaning of "to vest," see Re Randall, 38 Ch. 213. It is possible for property to vest in a trustee, although it does not mean that the trustee would have absolute ownership. See s. 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, R.S.C. 1927, ch. 11. On the question of disinterment and reburial, a very liberal allowance may be allowed to permit compliance with the last wishes of the deceased: In re Allan v. Allan, 3 Dem. (N.Y.); Widdifield on Executor's Accounts, 2nd ed., p. 116; In re Parry Estate, 41 Atl. R. 384.

P. G. DuVal, K.C., for Church of England Temperance Society and the mayor of Estaires. In respect of question 1, par. 11 of the will is valid. It is a gift to a charitable fund. It is subject to a condition that it keeps a grave plot in repair. The undertaking is in a form satisfactory to the trustees of the will at the time: In re Tyler, [1891] 3 Ch. 252 at 258. In respect of question 2, if the bequest is good the Church of England Temperance Society has power to give the undertaking. Par. 11 says the undertaking must be satisfactory to the trustees of the will and it is satisfactory and the gift is absolute: Theobald on Wills, 10th ed., 92, citing Lloyd v. Lloyd, 61 E.R. 342. In respect of question 3, the gift to the mayor of Estaires is valid. The evidence establishes that the trust has been accepted by the mayor and the cemetery is for the public's use and benefit and the maintenance is a charge on municipal income and the tax-payers: Income Tax Commrs. v. Pemsel, [1891] A.C. 531 at 583; In re Manser, [1905] 1 Ch. 68 at 74 and 75; In re Pardoe, [1906] 2 Ch. 184. There is a difference between a cemetery and a church yard. "Cemetery differs from a church yard by its locality and incidents, etc.": Luke v. Kerr (1891) 27 C.L.J. 181 (Ont.). If this gift cannot be supported as a charitable gift under the heading of advance of religion, then it can be established as a charitable gift for other purposes beneficial to the community: House v. Chapman (1799), 4 Ves. 542; A. G. v. Corp. of Shrewsbury (1843), 6 Beav. 220, 12 L.J.Ch. 40, 41 E.R. 602; Sir Howell Jones Williams Estate v. Inland Rev., [1947] 1 All E.R. 513. This last case may be distinguished. It was a case dealing with questions of taxation within the meaning of The Revenue Act, but does not deal with the case where a gift vests absolutely. There is nothing in the principles there stated to preclude a gift to a communal cemetery. See Tudor on Real Proeprty, Wills and Deeds, 3rd ed., 535; Tudor on Charities, 5th ed., 47, where it is stated, "A cemetery is plainly analagous to the objects mentioned in the preamble to the Statute of Elizabeth." See A. G. v. Blizard, 21 Beav. 233, and In re St. Pancreas Burial Ground (1866), L.R. 3 Eq. 175. A gift is charitable if it is in relief of rates: A. G. v. Blizard, supra; Doe v. Howells, 2 B. & Ald. 744. In the case of a trust for the relief of rates it is not necessary that the community to be benefited be an English or British community: New v. Bonaker, L.R. 4 Eq. 655. Even if the gift is not a charitable one it is good if it vests at once: Chardon & Johnston v. Davies (1928), 97 L.J.Ch. 289 and 290. The authorities are reviewed in 44 Law Quarterly Rev. 419 and 53 Law Quarterly Rev. 24 and 35-52. A gift to a cemetery which was maintained by the borough and not identified with the church was held valid: In re Eighmie, [1935] 1 Ch. 524, 104 L.J.Ch. 254 at 255. A trust for the benefit of a parish would be good: Houston v. Burns, [1918] A.C. 337. In respect of question 4, the mayor of Estaires is not a corporation under the law of France with perpetual succession, but it is submitted the mayor and council are. In respect of question 5, the trustees are empowered to pay over to a trust company or institution. This would be an absolute gift on a condition which vests at once and would not offend the rule against perpetuities: In re Tyler, supra; Theobald on Wills, 10th ed., 92, citing Lloyd v. Lloyd, supra.

Ontario cases are not applicable because of the provisions of the Ontario statutes: Re Harding 4 O.W.R. 316, 318. English courts always looked to the preamble of the Statute of Eliz. as containing the enumeration of all things charitable and Manitoba courts should follow them. See Williams Trustees v. Inland Revenue Commrs., [1947] A.C. 449, [1947] 1 All E. R. 513; In re Strakosch, [1948] 1 Ch. 37. A church is referred to in the Statute of Eliz. as a proper object of charity. The gift cannot be brought under the heading of relief of poor from rates as referred to in the Statutes of Eliz. He referred to the following poor rate cases: Doe d. Preece v. Howells, 109 E.R. 1320, 2 B. & Ad. 745; A.G. v. Blizard (1855), 21 Beav. 233, 25 L.J. Ch. 171; A.G. v. Berwick-on-Tweed (1829), Tamlyn 239, 48 E.R. 95. It is difficult to argue against the validity of the gift to the society: See In re Chardon, [1928] 1 Ch. 464 and In re Dalziel, supra. In re Halliday Est., 43 Man. R. 81, cannot be supported. WILLIAMS, C.J.K.B.—Recently the court was asked to answer a large number of questions arising in the administration of this estate. Among the questions were two which involved a consideration of certain bequests in a will drawn by the testator himself (a layman) and relating only to his Canadian estate, some of which were clearly charitable but others of which might not be. At that time, while dealing with the other questions asked (55 Man. R. 435, [1947] 2 W.W.R. 529), for reasons then given I did not answer the two questions.

Since then all the legatees, other than those which are or may be "charitable," have been paid, and there remains in the hands of the executor $116,136.81, which is available, after paying costs, executor's remuneration, etc., to pay the charitable bequests. If these are all "charitable," the amount required to pay them in full would be $190,000.00, so there would in any event be an abatement. It is alleged, however, that two of the bequests, of amounts totalling $55,000.00, are invalid in that they are not charitable and create perpetuities. If this contention is correct the other charitable bequests will abate much less than they otherwise would.

The relevant provisions of the will are set out in the following questions which the court is now asked to answer:

(1) Is the bequest in the last will and testament of the said Leonidas Alcibiades Oldfield reading as follows:

"11. To pay to the London council for the time being of the Church of England Temperance Society (England) five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) on the condition that the said council or the secretary for the time being for the said society undertake or undertakes, to the satisfaction of the trustee or trustees for the time being of my will but not so as to incur any personal liability on members of the said council or said secretary, to keep the grass on grave No. 172650 C/B in the Brompton Cemetery, London, England, from time to time cut, and the memorial thereon clean and erect."

valid in whole or in part as a bequest for charitable purposes or otherwise?

(2) If the said bequest is valid in whole or in part, has the London council for the time being of the Church of England Temperance Society (England), or the secretary thereof, power to give the undertaking contained in paragraph 11 of the last will and testament of Leonidas Alcibiades Oldfield?

(3) Is the bequest contained in the last will and testament of the said Leonidas Alcibiades Oldfield reading as follows:

"13. To pay to the mayor for the time being of the town of Estaires, North France, the sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) to be invested by him in French 5 per cent rents, and in such name or names as he may think fit, the interest from which is to be used for the purpose of keeping the marble cross on the testator's allotment clean and erect and the grass on the said allotment cut and kept in good order and any balance from time to time of such interest which may not be required for the purpose aforesaid is to be applied in or toward the upkeep of said cemetery generally. If the said mayor is not properly constituted under the laws of France a corporation with perpetual succession and for such or any other reason the said bequest is not a good charitable bequest I direct my trustees to pay the said sum to any responsible corporation, body or institution which is willing to accept the said bequest subject to the terms hereof as to the application of the income therefrom."

valid in whole or in part as a bequest for charitable purposes or otherwise?

(4) Is the mayor of the town of Estaires in France properly constituted under the laws of France a corporation with perpetual succession?

(5) If the answer to question No. 3 is No, is the trustee empowered to pay over the said bequest to a responsible trust company, upon receiving an undertaking from the said trust company that it is willing to accept the said bequest subject to the terms of the last will and testament of Leonidas Alcibiades Oldfield as to the application of the income therefrom?

(6) Has the executor appointed under the last will and testament of Alfred Clarence Weldon, deceased, who was in his lifetime the surviving executor appointed under the last will and testament of Leonidas Alcibiades Oldfield, the right to expend moneys of the estate to disinter the body of Leonidas Alcibiades Oldfield from a grave in the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, and convey the body to France and inter it in the cemetery at or near the town of Estaire in a plot close to where his wife and son are interred?

(7) Does the law of the province of Manitoba govern the administration of the trusts relating to the London Council for the time being of the Church of England Temperance Society (England) and the mayor of Estaire in north France contained in the last will and testament of Leonidas Alcibiades Oldfield?

The testator's son, an English barrister, was killed in action, with the R.F.C., during the war of 1914-1918, and was buried in what is called the English cemetery in the town of Estaires, in France. The English cemetery, which is maintained by the British authorities, is separated from the communal or municipal cemetery of the town only by a path. When the testator's wife died she was buried in a plot in the communal cemetery opposite the grave of her son. Over her grave there is a marble cross. The communal cemetery contains, in addition to the graves of the citizens of the town, graves of English, French, and German soldiers killed in the war of 1939-1945. Of these the English graves are maintained by the British authorities, and the French and German graves by, and at the expense of, the commune (municipality of Estaires).

The Canadian will is silent on the matter but the testator, in his lifetime, had, and expressed, a desire to be buried by his wife in the communal cemetery which was as near to their son as they could be buried. When he died, 7 June 1929, he was buried in St. John's Cemetery, Winnipeg, where his body still lies.

The testator also owned a grave plot in Brompton cemetery in London, England, in which no bodies are buried, but upon which a family memorial has been erected.

The testator was domiciled in England (see 55 Man. R. at p. 437) but the will in question related only to his Canadian estate, which was all in Manitoba and has been administered here. Under these circumstances counsel all agree that the questions must be answered by reference to the law of Manitoba: see Falconbridge, Conflict of Laws, p. 560; In re Nanton Estate (1948) 56 Man.R. 71 at 79, [1948] 2 W.W.R. 113, and the cases there referred to; and Freke v. Lord Carberry (1873), L.R. 16 Eq. 461. This answers question No. 7.

I propose to deal with question No. 3 first as it presents the greatest difficulty. Is the bequest contained in clause 13 of the will a good charitable bequest, in whole or part, under the law of Manitoba?

The law of Manitoba relating to charitable bequests such as this seems to be the same as that of England:

> To decide whether a purpose is charitable or not in law, it is the practice of the courts to refer to the preamble to the Statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz., c. 4) which contains a comprehensive and varied list of charities. (4 Hals., p. 107.)

The Statute of Elizabeth, 1601, ch. 4, which was repealed by The Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act (1888), 51 & 52 Vict. c. 42, was passed to cure certain abuses in the administration of charitable trusts. It is common ground that the Statute of Elizabeth was never in force in Manitoba. But it is, I think, clear that the preamble of the Act may be looked at in this court in considering whether a bequest is charitable or not.

In Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A.C. 531 (580); 61 L.J.Ch. 265 (289), Lord Macnaghten said:

> That according to the law of England a technical meaning is attached to the word "charity," and to the word "charitable" in such expressions as "charitable uses," "charitable trusts," or "charitable purposes," cannot, I think, be denied. The Court of Chancery has always regarded with peculiar favour those trusts of a public nature which, according to the doctrine of the court derived from the piety of early times, are considered to be charitable. Charitable uses or trusts form a distinct head of equity. Their distinctive position is made the more conspicuous by the circumstance that owing to their nature they are not obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities, while a gift in perpetuity not being a charity is void. Whatever may have been the foundation of the jurisdiction of the court over this class of trusts, and whatever may have been the origin of the title by which these trusts are still known, no one I think who takes the trouble to investigate the question can doubt that the title was recognized and the jurisdiction established before the Act of 43 Eliz. and quite independently of that Act. The object of that statute was merely to provide new machinery for the reformation of abuses in regard to charities. But by a singular construction it was held to authorize certain gifts to charity which otherwise would have been void. And it contained in the preamble a list of charities so varied and comprehensive that it became the practice of the court to refer to it as a sort of > index or chart. At the same time it has never been forgotten that the "objects there enumerated," as Lord Chancellor Cranworth observes (in The University of London v. Yarrow (1857)) 1 De Gex & J. 72, 79; 26 L.J.Ch. 430) "are not to be taken as the only objects of charity, but are given as instances. . . ."

> In Ireland, though neither the Statute of Elizabeth nor the so-called Statute of Mortmain extended to that country, the legal and technical meaning of the term "charity" is precisely the same as it is in England.

I am of opinion, then, that the legal and technical meaning of the term "charity" is precisely the same in Manitoba as it is in England.

The preamble to the Act 43 Eliz. which was considered in detail during the argument on this motion, refers to the following charitable objects:

> . . . some for relief of aged, impotent and poor people, some for maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners, schools of learning, free-schools, and scholars in universities, some for repair of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, churches, seabanks and highways, some for education and preferment of orphans, some for or towards relief, stock, or maintenance for houses of correction, some for marriages of poor maids, some for supportation, aid and help to young tradesmen, handicraftsmen, and persons decayed, and other for relief or redemption of prisoners or captives, and for aid or ease of any poor inhabitants concerning payments of fifteens, setting out of soldiers, and other taxes;

In the Pemsel case Lord Macnaghten classified charities in their legal sense into four principal divisions: (1) trusts for the relief of poverty, (2) trusts for the advancement of education, (3) trusts for the advancement of religion, (4) trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community not falling under any of the preceding heads.

This classification, as explained by later decisions, is still authoritative. In Trustees of Sir Howell Jones Williams Trusts v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, [1947] A.C. 449, at 454; [1947] 1 All E.R. 513, at 518, [1948] L.J.R. 644, Lord Simonds said:

> My Lords, there are, I think, two propositions which must ever be borne in mind in any case in which the question is whether a trust is charitable. The first is that it is still the general law that a trust is not charitable and entitled to the privileges which charity confers unless it is within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to 43 Eliz., c. 4, which is expressly preserved by s. 13(2) of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888. The second is that the classification of charity in its legal sense into four principal divisions by Lord Macnaghten in Pemsel's case (supra) must always be read subject to the qualification appearing in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in Re Macduff, [1896] 2 Ch. 466, 65 L.J.Ch. 700:

"Now Sir Samuel Romilly did not mean, and I am certain that Lord Macnaghten did not mean to say, that every object of public general utility must necessarily be a chairty. Some may be and some may not be."

This observation has been expanded by Viscount Cave, L.C., in this House, in A.-G. v. National Provincial Bank, [1924] A.C. 269 at 265, 93 L.J.Ch. 231, in these words:

"Lord Macnaghten did not mean that all trusts beneficial to the community are charitable, but that there were certain beneficial trusts which fall within that category; and accordingly to argue that because a trust is for a purpose beneficial to the community it is therefore a charitable trust is to turn round his sentence and to give it a different meaning. So here it is not enough to say that the trust in question is for public purposes beneficial to the community or is for the public welfare; you must also show it to be a charitable trust."

Stated in that way the general principles seem clear enough, but a study of the numerous decisions shows how difficult it is in many instances to apply them. Some of the later authorities show a marked tendency to broaden the interpretation of the term "charitable" and it is not possible satisfactorily to reconcile all of the judgments.

In the case of Williams Trusts, supra, Lord Simonds said ([1947] 1 All E.R. at 519):

My Lords, the cases in which the question of charity has come before the courts are legion, and no one who is versed in them will pretend that all the decisions, even of the highest authority, are easy to reconcile. . . .

With this statement I heartily concur.

The bequest in clause 13 is a gift of a fund the income of which is to be used (in perpetuity) for the maintenance of a monument (a marble cross) now erected over a grave in which the testator's wife is buried and in which the testator desired to be buried, and the care of the grave plot. Any balance of the income is to be applied towards the upkeep of the communal cemetery. This is what is usually referred to as a "tomb" case.

The English cases collected in 4 Hals., pp. 121 and 129, show that a bequest to provide or repair a monument in a church, even though it to be to an individual or his family, is a good charitable bequest. But they also show that gifts for providing or repairing a monument or tomb not forming part of the fabric or ornament of a church, whether as a memorial or burying place of the donor alone, or of himself and his family, cannot be supported as charities though they may be valid as private trusts, if not perpetuities.

In considering the cases it must be remembered that > only those purposes are charitable in the eye of the law which are of a public nature, whose object, that is to say, is to benefit the community or some part of it, not merely particular private individuals, or a fluctuating class of private individuals, pointed out by the donor: 4 Hals., p. 110.

> The line of distinction between purposes of a public and of a private nature is fine and practically incapable of definition: 4 Hals., p. 110.

This statement is illustrated by the decision in In Re Pardoe, McLaughlin v. A.-G., [1906] 2 Ch. 184; 75 L.J. Ch. 455, where a gift for providing head-stones to the graves of pensioners of certain named almhouses who should be buried in the churchyard of a named church was held a good charitable bequest.

While the "index or chart" in the preamble to the Act, 43 Eliz., uses the words "for repair . . . of churches," it makes no reference to "parsonages" or "churchyards." But as early as 1785 it was held that the repair of a parsonage was a charitable object: A.-G. v. Bishop of Chester (1785), 1 Bro. C.C. 444, 28 E.R. 1229, and see per North, J., in In re Vaughan, Vaughan v. Thomas (1886), 33 Ch. D. 187, at 191.

In this latter case it was held that a gift for keeping a churchyard in repair was a good charitable bequest. It was later argued that the decision in In re Vaughan could only be supported on the ground that such a gift, up to £500, was permitted for the first time by The Church Building Act of 1803, 43 Geo. III, c. 108, s. 1, and that, because the Act applied only to churchyards of the Established Church, a gift for the repair or maintenance of any other churchyard would not be a good charitable bequest.

But in In Re Manser, A.-G. v. Lucas, [1905] 1 Ch. 68, 74 L.J. Ch. 95, Warrington, J., as he then was, held that North, J., had based his judgment not only on the Act of 1803, but on the broader ground that the repair of a churchyard was a charitable object, and that a bequest for keeping in order burial grounds, the use of which was restricted to members of the Society of Friends, was a good charitable bequest.

In the Manser case the bequest reads:

> . . . for the sole purpose of keeping in good order the existing burial grounds under the care of the meeting, and in particular the grave of my late wife.

Warrington, J., said of the concluding words:

I regard those words as nothing more than a special obligation ancillary to the repair of the burial ground, and not as a separate trust at all.

Then, in In re Eighmie Coulburne v. Wilks, [1935] 1 Ch. 524, 104 L.J. Ch. 254, Eve, J., had to consider a bequest of £10,000 to the rector and churchwardens or other the governing body of Chiswick Church for the purpose of keeping the burial ground and monument therein to the testatrix's late husband and herself in good and sufficient repair and for the maintenance of the said church and the decorations thereof and of the said churchyard. After argument, in which the Manser and Vaughan cases were cited, Eve, J., said:

The burial grounds in the immediate vicinity of Chiswick Church are two in number, the one the churchyard, which was closed for burials about thirty years ago, and the other the cemetery, consecrated and opened many years ago as a public burial ground wherein the bodies of the husband of the testatrix and the testatrix herself were buried in 1923 and 1925 respectively. The testatrix in terms includes both in her will, identifying the one as the burial ground wherein is the monument to her husband and the other by its proper name, the churchyard. Is this a good charitable gift? I think it is. The money is given for the purpose of keeping the burial ground and the church and churchyard in good and sufficient repair, and this incidentally involves the maintenance of the monuments and other decorations of the church, the burial ground and the churchyard. I think the fund falls to be divided equally between the vicar and churchwardens as the controllers of the church and the churchyard, and the Brentford and Chiswick Borough council, in which are vested the management and ownership of the cemetery.

From these authorities it appears that if the bequest here in question had been for the purpose of repairing the cemetery and, as ancillary or incidental thereto, the grave and monument of the testator and his wife, it would have been a good charitable bequest. But as the bequest was to repair the grave and monument and only expend any balance of the income from time to time remaining on the upkeep of the cemetery, the bequest in so far as it relates to the repair of the grave and monument is not a good charitable bequest.

Postponing for the moment the question whether the bequest of any balance of income for the upkeep of the cemetery in question makes the bequest a valid charitable bequest, and if so, to what extent, I now have to ask whether the bequest can be supported on the other ground already indicated, namely, that it is a private trust and is not a perpetuity (see 4 Hals., p. 129, supra).

We usually think of the word "perpetuity," as it is used in the law relating to interests arising in futuro and not in praesenti, that is in the law dealing with (1) the rule against perpetuities, (2) the rule against double possibilities, and (3) the statutory restrictions on accumulation. When, however, we have to consider > interests held on perpetual non-charitable trust, where no person or persons can take any benefit, for example, trusts to keep in repair a tomb not part of the fabric of a church (25 Hals., p. 82) we find the word "perpetuity" used in a wider sense.

A long line of cases finally established the rule that it is illegal to vest property in trustees in perpetuity to be held on perpetual non-charitable trusts where no person can take any benefit; although a condition for repair of a tomb while not charitable is not illegal.

Out of the many cases reference might be made to Lloyd v. Lloyd (1852), 2 Sim. (N.S.) 255, 21 L.J. Ch. 596, 61 E.R. 338; Thompson v. Shakespear (1860), DeG. F. & J. 399, 45 E.R. 413; Carne v. Long (1860), 2 DeG. F. & J. 75, 27 L.J. Ch. 589, 45 E.R. 550; Rickard v. Robson (1862), 31 Beav. 244, 31 L.J. Ch. 897, 54 E.R. 1132; Fowler v. Fowler (1864), 33 Beav. 616, 33 L.J. Ch. 674, 55 E.R. 507; Re Tyler, [1891] 3 Ch. 252; Re Williams (1877), 5 Ch. D. 735, 47 L.J. Ch. 92; In re Vaughan (1886), supra; Yeap Cheah Neo v. Ong Cheng Neo (1875), L.R. 6 P.C. 381; Re Nottage, [1895] 2 Ch. 649; In re Good, [1905] 2 Ch. 60, 74 L.J. Ch. 512; Kennedy v. Kennedy [1914] A.C. 215, 83 L.J. P.C. 63; and Re Porter, [1925] Ch. 746, 95 L.J. Ch. 46; and see 25 Hals. pp. 80, 83; 4 Hals., pp. 127, 130.

I must now consider an argument by Mr. DuVal that the decision of Romer, J., in Re Chardon, Johnston v. Davies, [1928] 1 Ch. 464, 97 L.J. Ch. 289, compels a reconsideration of the tomb cases, and should be followed.

The headnote reads:

> By his will a testator gave a sum of £200 to his trustees upon trust to invest it and to pay the income thereof to a cemetery company "during such period as they shall continue to maintain and keep" two specified graves "in the said cemetery in good order and condition with flowers and plants thereon as the same have hitherto been kept by me," and he declared that, if the graves should not be kept in such order and condition, his trustees should pay and apply the income in manner therein mentioned.
>
> Held, that the gift did not infringe the rule against perpetuities or the rule against inalienability and was a valid gift.
> In re Gage, [1898] 1 Ch. 498, 67 L.J.Ch. 200, referred to.

Since it was decided, the Chardon case has not, so far as I can find, been considered in the English courts. It was distinguished by a late chief justice of this court (Macdonald, C.J.K.B.) in In re Halliday Estate, 43 Man.R. 81, [1935] 1 W.W.R. 360. In that case the testator directed that the sum of $500.00 be paid to some trust company and the proceeds thereof be used to keep his grave and that of his mother in good condition. Macdonald, C.J.K.B., pointed out that in the Chardon case the fund vested, and said (p. 83):

> The bequest of the $500.00 for the purpose expressed in his will does not vest in anyone. The direction that it be paid into some trust company to be used for the purpose mentioned, in my opinion, infringes the rule against perpetuities and the rule against inalienability.

He held the bequest was void. I respectfully concur in the result at which the learned chief justice arrived, but my reasons for doing so would be somewhat different.

Neither in the Chardon case nor in the Halliday case was the wider rule relating to perpetuities enunciated in the tomb cases considered.

I am of opinion that that rule is now part of our law until it is held otherwise by the highest court, or is altered by the legislature. I also think that the Chardon case is distinguishable on the grounds referred to by Mr. Hart in his learned article, "Some Reflections on Re Chardon" (1937) 53, Law Quarterly Review, pp. 24-60. At p. 52 he said:

> One further point remains to be considered before the correctness of Re Chardon in the light of the tomb cases can be assessed. Keeping a tomb in repair is not itself illegal (Lloyd v. Lloyd, supra; Re Tyler, supra); indeed "it is a very laudable thing to do," (per Lindley, L.J., in Re Tyler, p. 258). Consequently a condition determining a gift on failure to maintain a grave is in itself valid (Lloyd v. Lloyd, supra, Re Tyler, supra). It is the duration of the gift which the rule attacks not the purpose which it is directly or indirectly designed to fulfil. But if the breach of such a condition determining one gift is made the event on which a later gift is to vest, the modern rule against perpetuities will itself come into play and avoid the later gift if its vesting may occur outside the perpetuity period. Thus in order to determine which "perpetuity rule"—that concerned with duration or that concerned with vesting— is to be applied to the facts of Re Chardon, it is first necessary to consider the proper construction of the gift to the cemetery company for so long as they should maintain the graves. If in reality it is a gift to the company on trust to maintain the graves indefinitely, then it would appear to have been void in toto as a "perpetuity." But the gift over seems to militate against this construction, and indeed it appears clear that the testator's intention was carefully to refrain from creating a trust for this purpose and so to avoid the line of decisions discussed above. The case must therefore be considered on the assumption that no express trust to maintain the graves was imposed on the cemetery company, but that the desired result was sought to be achieved in a more indirect manner. On this assumption the correctness of the decision would appear to depend on the application of the modern rule against perpetuities—the rule against remoteness of vesting—to the testator's will.

The authorities, then, as I understand them, compel me to hold that the bequest so far as the maintenance of the cross and grave is concerned is not a good charitable bequest, and it is a perpetuity and so void.

But there is a special rule of law which must now be considered. It is expressed in Tudor on Charities, 5th ed., p. 62, as follows:

A number of cases, in which there have been gifts upon trust to keep up tombs not forming part of the fabric of a church, with the gift of a particular residue to charity, may be regarded as establishing this special rule of law: "Where a fund had been given to trustees upon trust to apply the income in keeping a tomb in repair, and as to the remainder of the income for valid charitable purposes, it has been held that the result of the failure of the trust for the repair of the tomb is that the whole of the income becomes applicable for the charitable purpose.

The learned authors of the article on "Charities" in 4 Hals., at p. 177, express the rule thus:

In cases connected with the repair of private tombs, where a fund is bequeathed to trustees upon trust out of the income to keep a tomb not forming part of a church in repair, and as to the residue, surplus, balance, or remainder, upon trusts for charitable objects, the gift is construed as a bequest of the whole fund charged with a gift that fails, and not as a gift of the residue after a void gift, and accordingly the whole fund, including the amount necessary to satisfy the invalid object, is applicable to the valid charitable object.

The authors add a footnote:

It is not easy to say on what principle this class of cases is to be distinguished from the class, of which Mitford v. Reynolds (1842), 1 Ph. 185, 41 E.R. 602, forms one, in which the charity took only the surplus after the amount necessary for the invalid object had been ascertained, and not the entire fund.

As Sir George Jessel, M.R., said in In re Birkett (1878), 9 Ch. D. 576, 47 L.J.Ch. 846, these cases are a singular illustration of the way in which our law gets altered. The authorities cited in illustration of the statement in Halsbury are all decisions of single judges and in order of date we have: Fowler v. Fowler (1864), supra,

In Fowler v. Fowler, the gift of the surplus, after a trust to repair a tomb, was held void for uncertainty on the ground that the amount required for repairing a tomb could not be ascertained. In Hoare v. Osborne it was held that the portion of the fund attributable to one of three gifts which was void (perpetual repair of a grave or vault not in a church) fell into the residue. In Re Rigley's Trusts the court directed an inquiry to ascertain in what proportions a gift valid as to part and invalid as to the other part (repair of a tomb) should be divided. In In re Vaughan (a tomb case) the same principle was applied. In all the other cases above referred to, it was held that the whole income of the fund went to the charity.

I must confess I am unable to decide to my own satisfaction the real basis of the decisions of the majority of the judges. In In Re Rogerson, supra, Joyce, J., said, (p. 718):

> 'I think that the law on this question is correctly stated on p. 45 of Tudor's Charitable Trusts, in the passage which says that in all cases where "a fund has been given to trustees upon trust to apply the income in keeping a tomb in repair, and as to the remainder of the income for valid charitable purposes . . . it has been held that the result of the failure of the trust for the repair of the tomb is that the whole of the income becomes applicable for the charitable purpose. . . . Now, of course, in all these cases the real question is whether on the true construction of the gift the trust for the application of the income for the repair of the tomb is to be a charge on the whole income, and the residue is to be given to the charitable purpose. By "residue" I mean so much of the income as is not required for the repair of the tomb. In this particular gift the word "residue" is not used; the words are, "do and shall out of the proceeds or annual income of such investment in the first place maintain yearly and keep in good repair and condition annually in all respects the two tombs . . . and in the next place to divide and distribute the remainder of such annual income or dividend unto and equally among the poor, etc." That to my mind is equivalent to making the provision for the tomb a charge on the bequest. I think that there is no practical difference between the gift in this case and the gift in Fisk v. Attorney-General, supra, and I think that this case is governed by the decision in that case, and In re Birkett, supra, and In re Vaughan, supra. If there be any contradiction between the cases, I think that there is a preponderance of authority in favour of the view adopted in Fisk v. Attorney-General and the other cases I have mentioned, and I think that the statement to which I have referred in Tudor's Charitable Trusts is right. Of course, if there were provisions for various objects, and it were possible as a matter of construction to arrive at the conclusion that the testator never intended that there should be any surplus at all, that would be a different matter. Where, however, there is a trust for a tomb, as here, then, as Bacon, V.C., pointed out in Dawson v. Small, supra,—a similar case—"the obligation to keep up the tombstones is merely honorary, but the obligation to give all that is not applied for the purposes first mentioned in favour of these poor people is by no means honorary; it is a trust that must be executed." Testators who make bequests of this nature, if they know the law, really mean the legacy to go to the objects of the charitable bequest with a moral obligation to keep up the tomb. I therefore hold that the whole income of this bequest goes to the vicar and churchwardens of St. George's Doncaster. The fund must be invested in the name of the official trustees of charitable funds, who will from time to time remit the income to the vicar and churchwardens for the purposes of the charitable bequest.

The foregoing judgment is a good example of the difficulties posed by the various decisions; there is, as I read the cases, a real contradiction between A.-G. v. Fisk and In re Birkett on the one hand, and In re Vaughan on the other.

I cannot do better than adopt the language and attitude of that very learned judge, Sir George Jessel, in In re Birkett, supra.

In that case the bequest read:

To the incumbent for the time being of Unsworth the sum of £500, the income to be applied when necessary in keeping in good repair the grave and the railing and tombstone of my late father, and the remainder of such income to be applied by such incumbent for the time being in providing wine and bread for the sick poor of Unsworth.

It was held that the first purpose of the gift being invalid, the whole of the income was applicable to the charity; and that the sum should be paid to the official charity trustee to invest and pay the income to the incumbent of Unsworth for the time being to be applied by him for the sick poor of the parish as in the will directed. Jessel, M.R., said (p. 578 and 580):

Now I have no hesitation in saying that, if there were no authorities, I should feel very little difficulty in deciding quite in a different way from that in which I am about to decide.

He then proceeded to indicate his own views and concluded:

That being my opinion as to the case if it were untrammelled by any authorities, what do I find as regards authority? It is of the utmost importance, as regards our law, that judges of the first instance should not disregard a series of decisions by other judges of first instance, none of which have been appealed or have been otherwise interfered with. In the case of Fisk v. Attorney-General, in 1867, where there was a gift to an incumbent of a sum of stock upon trust out of the dividends to apply such part thereof as should be required to keep in repair a family grave, and to apply the surplus for charity, Vice-Chancellor Wood decided that, although the gift for the grave failed, yet the gift of the corpus was not affected, and the whole of the income was applicable to the charity. It may be difficult on principle to discover how he arrived at that conclusion, but he did arrive at it. The gift here in question is, to my mind, wholly undistinguishable from the gift there. I cannot find any possibility of fairly distinguishing it. That decision of the Vice-Chancellor was followed twice by Vice-Chancellor Bacon—once in the case of Hunter v. Bullock, in which he considered it settled law, and again the case of Dawson v. Small. It was also followed by Vice-Chancellor Malins in the case of In re Williams, so recently as the 2nd of June, 1877. Consequently we have four decisions, the oldest ten years old, all in point, by three judges of co-ordinate jurisdiction. With these authorities before me, and sitting here as a judge of first instance, I shall simply follow them, and decide the case in the same way. The result will therefore be that the whole of the income will be applicable to the charitable purpose. The respondents have very properly suggested that the fund should be paid over to the official charity trustee, and the income only given to the incumbent of Unsworth for the time being, to be applied by him for the charitable purpose named in the will and that is the order I shall make.

It is nearly 71 years since the foregoing was written, and the principles applied have only been departed from once (In re Vaughan), and have been applied as recently as 1901 in In re Rogerson, "the last of the tomb cases," and recognized in In re Dalziel, [1943] Ch. 277, 112 L.J. Ch. 353. Since that time the law seems to be taken as settled and to be as stated in the extract from Tudor on Charitable Trusts quoted above.

In the course of argument before me the decision of Cohen, J. (now L.J.), in In re Dalziel, supra, was pressed upon me as one that should be followed. The headnote reads:

A testatrix gave £20,000 to the governors of a hospital to add to an existing discretionary fund of £2,000, on which the cost of the upkeep of a family mausoleum was a first charge, on condition that they should use the income as far as was necessary to maintain and, when necessary, rebuild the mausoleum, and directed that "if they shall fail to carry out this request I give the said sum of £20,000 to such other of the charities named in this my will as my trustees may select and as shall be willing to accept the legacy subject to the above conditions":

Held, that, the upkeep of the mausoleum not being a charitable object, the gift failed, and that the gift over also failed.

In re Tyler, [1891] 3 Ch. 252, and Chamberlayne v. Brockett (1872), L.R. 8 Ch. 206, followed.

Cohen, J., (p. 281) referred to an analysis of the tomb cases by counsel disputing the validity of the gift and said that counsel > pointed out that they appear all to have been based either on the trifling amount involved as in Fisk v. Attorney-General, supra, or on the view that the testator intended to impose a moral obligation as in In re Rogerson, supra. He pointed out that that class of case was distinguishable from the present case in that (a) the upkeep of a tomb costing over £20,000 with a possible liability to rebuild it, necessarily involved more than a trifling amount, and (b) some of the wills considered in the tomb cases contained no gift over in the event of failure to maintain the tomb.

Cohen, J., added:

> The last distinction seems to me vital. I think that the real foundation of the tomb cases is that the court felt itself able to construe the provision in the various wills as to the upkeep of the tombs as imposing only a moral obligation. Now, a gift over to take effect in the event of failure to maintain the mausoleum in good repair is only consistent with the view that the obligation to maintain the mausoleum was not to be a mere moral obligation.

While I am not prepared to subscribe to a distinction based on the "trifling amount" theory—I doubt if the judgments support a distinction so stated—I do not think that in this case as a "matter of construction" I can "arrive at the conclusion that the testator never intended that there should be any surplus at all," using the language of Joyce, J., in In re Rogerson quoted above.

The whole income at five per cent of $50,000.00—no trifling amount—would surely never be required in each year merely for keeping the marble cross clean and erect, and the grass on the allotment cut and in good order. There is no direction to rebuild the cross, but even if there were there would be a surplus, and there is no power to resort to capital.

In the Dalziel case, Cohen, J., also said (p. 285):

> The obligation as to rebuilding the tomb is not limited to rebuilding out of income, but would require the hospital, if necessary, to have recourse to capital. The void trust, might, therefore, involve not only the whole income, but even the corpus. In my judgment, therefore, the gift fails in toto.

In In re Birkett, Jessel, M.R., asked: "On which side of the line does this particular case fall?" I think the case I am now considering falls on the opposite side of the line to In re Dalziel, which is not applicable to the facts of this case.

Subject to the two matters next to be dealt with, I am of opinion that the bequest contained in clause 13 of the will for the upkeep of the cross and allotment is invalid, but the trust to maintain the cemetery is a good charitable trust and the whole of the income of the fund becomes applicable for such charitable purpose.

The upkeep of the cemetery will involve the upkeep of the cross and grave plot, and I have no doubt the "honorary" or "moral" obligation, it is nothing more, will be borne in mind.

Two further matters must now be dealt with: (1) Is a gift to maintain a cemetery owned or provided by municipal authorities and not connected with any church or religious denomination a valid charitable gift? (2) If it is, does this principle apply if the cemetery is not in Manitoba, but in France?

The only case which throws any light on the first of these matters is In re Eighmie, supra. In that case, Eve, J., divided the gift equally between the vicar and church-wardens as controllers of the church and churchyard and the Brentford and Chiswick Borough council in which were vested the management and ownership of the cemetery. It will be observed that the cemetery had been consecrated as a public burial ground. Eve, J., does not discuss the authorities in his very brief judgment, but on the argument he was referred to the earlier cases of In re Vaughan, supra, and In re Manser, supra.

In the Vaughan case, North, J., said (p. 191):

> Then, in the next place, there is this to be borne in mind, that charity is "a general public use." That is the largest definition of the word, and it seems to me that the repair of a parish churchyard is clearly for the benefit of the inhabitants of the parish. In the first place, it was the duty of parishioners to keep their churchyard in repair. That appears from a passage in Coke's Second Institute; which runs thus: "The parishioners ought to repair the inclosure of the churchyard, because the bodies of the more common sort are buried there, and for the preservation of the burials of those that were or should have been, whiles they lived the temples of the Holy Ghost." After referring to the derivation of the word "cemetery," it goes on: "And also if the churchyard be not decently inclosed, the church, which is domus Dei, cannot decently be kept, and therefore this the parishioners ought to do per consuetudinem notoriam et approbatum, and the conusans thereof is allowed by this Act." Then, again, a case was cited which shows > that if a person whose duty it is to repair the churchyard does not repair it he is subject to indictment.

In the Manzer case, Warrington, J., approved and applied this statement. It is obvious from his judgment that he considered the provision of a burial ground to be for the advancement of religion, and he said (p. 74): "I think one naturally connects the burial of the dead with religion"; and at p. 75:

> I need not go into any general considerations as to the necessity or as to the pious object of providing burial grounds. I decide this question on the ground I have expressed, and I do not think, therefore, it is necessary to consider whether this is a general public trust or not. It comes within the now very wide definition of "charity," and in particular that branch of it which is concerned with the advancement of religion. I think, therefore, the gift is good.

Eve, J., had no difficulty in 1935 in extending the principle to a municipally provided cemetery, and I doubt if his decision would have been different if the cemetery had not been consecrated. In Manitoba municipalities are empowered to, and do, establish and maintain cemeteries not connected with any church. I should not hesitate to hold that a gift to a Manitoba municipal authority to be used for the maintenance and upkeep of such a cemetery was a good charitable bequest, whether it was for the advancement of religion or for a purpose beneficial to the community: Lord Macnaghten's divisions 3 and 4 in the Pemsel case, supra.

The provisions of The Cemetery Act of Ontario (now R.S.O. 1937, c. 351, s. 15) referred to in In re Halliday Estate, supra, specifically permit gifts to the person "owning, controlling or managing a cemetery." These words are wide enough to include any cemetery, even one privately owned and operated. We have no such statute in Manitoba, but the view I take of the authorities is in accord with the principle of this legislation.

There was considerable discussion whether a gift to maintain a cemetery could be justified or could only be justified as being in relief of rates. The preamble to the Act of Elizabeth uses the words "for the aid or ease of any poor inhabitants concerning payments of fifteens, setting out of soldiers, and other taxes." Reference was made to A.-G. v. Blizard (1855), 21 Beav. 233, 25 L.J. Ch. 171; Doe v. Howells (1831), 2 B. & Ad. 745, 109 E.R. 1320; and A.-G. v. Berwick-on-Tweed (1829), Tamlyn 239, 48 E.R. 95.

The significance of this question is twofold. The gift of the "balance" of the income for the upkeep of the cemetery was sought to be maintained on this ground as well, and in answer it was argued that, even if such a gift would be a good charitable gift in Manitoba as in relief of rates, a gift which would be for the relief of rates in a foreign community would not be a good charitable gift by Manitoba law.

Notwithstanding the decisions in A.-G. v. Blizard, supra, which turned on the meaning of a special Act and which is not of much or any assistance in this case, and in the other cases just referred to, the decisions to which I have earlier referred do not, so far as I can see, decide that charitable gifts for the maintenance of a cemetery can, or can only, be justified as being in relief of rates. Nor does the portion of the judgment of North, J., already quoted lead to that conclusion.

Even if the gift had to depend for its validity on being in relief of rates, and in my opinion it does not, I would not think that different principles would be applied depending on whether the cemetery was in Manitoba, or France, or England. All of which brings me to the second of the two matters I am now dealing with: Does the fact that the cemetery is in a foreign country make any difference? In my opinion it does not.

In In re Robinson, Besant v. The German Reich, [1931] 2 Ch. 122, 100 L.J. Ch. 321, Maugham, J. (later L.C.), said (p. 126):

> It is abundantly clear that, whatever the construction which might have been placed upon the Statute of Elizabeth when that statute was passed in the forty-third year of that queen's reign, for at least 200 years the courts have been in the habit of treating the phrase "charitable purposes" as not confined to charitable purposes within this realm. There are numerous authorities to that effect; and apart from cases of charities to be performed in the jurisdictions of Scotland and Ireland, there are several cases where the charity has been wholly foreign.

He referred to New v. Bonaker (1867), L.R. 4 Eq. 655, 36 L.J. Ch. 846, and In re Vagliano, [1905] W.N. 179, 75 L.J. Ch. 119. Other cases were cited in the argument before him and reference may also be made to Parkhurst v. Roy (1880), 27 Gr. 361, 7 A.R. 614; Lewis v. Doerle (1898), 28 O.R. 412, 25 A.R. 206, and Anderson v. Kilborn (1875), 22 Gr. 385.

As I have come to the conclusion that clause 13 is a good charitable bequest for the maintenance of the communal cemetery of Estaires, I must now decide if it vested in the mayor for the time being of that town. Clause 13 presents many difficulties in construction. The part I am now considering reads:

> . . . to pay to the mayor for the time being of the town of Estaires $50,000.00 to be invested by him in French 5 per cent rents and in such name or names as he may think fit. . . . If the mayor is not properly constituted under the laws of France a corporation with perpetual succession and for such or any other reason the said bequest is not a good charitable bequest, I direct my trustees to pay the said sum to any responsible corporation, body or institution which is willing to accept the said bequest subject to the terms hereof as to the application of the income therefrom.

The testator seems to have been of opinion that it was essential to a good charitable bequest that the trustee should be a corporation with perpetual succession, and that, if the mayor for the time being were not such, his gift would not be a good charitable bequest.. This is emphasized by his second choice of a corporation, body or institution which he evidently assumed would have perpetual succession. It also emphasizes his intention to create a perpetuity.

It may be that the thinking of the testator, when he drew this clause in this way, was influenced by the practice so common in England of giving gifts to charitable corporations with the imposition of some moral or honorary obligation to maintain or repair a tomb or monument.

The evidence before me establishes that the mayor of Estaires is not constituted under the laws of France a corporation with perpetual succession.

There is no reason why an individual may not be a trustee for charitable purposes. If the charitable trust is a perpetuity, it might be inconvenient to appoint an individual but the law will always provide a trustee. The testator may also have had this inconvenience in mind when he desired a trustee with perpetual succession.

Is the payment directed by clause 13 to be made to the mayor, who is mayor at the time when the money is to be paid over, to be held by him and such successors as he may from time to time appoint, or was it the testator's intention that the money should pass from mayor to mayor as a corporation with perpetual succession? Notwithstanding the power to the mayor for the time being to invest the corpus in such name or names as he may think fit, I feel certain that the gift was intended to be to the mayor for the time being as a corporation with perpetual succession and that was the real meaning of the peculiar wording the testator used. In my opinion the mayor does not qualify and the gift could not, nor did it, vest in him.

But a charitable gift will not be permitted to fail because the donor does not appoint a trustee, or because the trustee is not able to act or qualify. The court can always act to remedy the defect.

The testator has attempted to provide for this. The wording of the clause is in this respect very vague and difficult to construe. He clearly wanted a corporation, body or institution to act as trustee, but he said that if the bequest is not a good charitable bequest because the mayor was not a corporation with perpetual succession, or for any other reason, the trustee was to pay the sum to any responsible corporation, body or institution which is willing to accept the said bequest subject to the terms hereof as to the application of the income.

If the bequest were invalid no further consideration would be required. As it is valid, in my opinion the trustee should select some responsible corporation which is willing to accept the bequest "subject to the terms" of clause 13 as I have found them to be as to the application of the income.

Those terms I have held are to apply the income towards the upkeep of the communal "cemetery generally." The upkeep of the cemetery will naturally involve the upkeep of the testator's grave allotment and monument and I have already said I have no doubt that the recipient of the fund will fully recognize the moral or honorary obligation in that respect. I suggest that the trustee select some Canadian or English trust company, preferably, though not necessarily, one authorized to do business in France, under the provisions of clause 13 to whom the legacy can be paid. The trustee should take from the trust company an undertaking to accept the bequest on the conditions I have held applicable, namely, to apply the income of the whole fund in or towards the upkeep of the municipal or communal cemetery of Estaires, generally. The trustee should be entitled to be paid its proper charges out of the said income and those charges should be agreed and included in the undertaking.

The testator has directed how the fund should be invested. Such investment may not be possible or desirable, now, or in the future. In my opinion the fund should be invested in trustee securities as authorized by the laws of Manitoba. Under the circumstances of this case, this court can, if it is necessary or desirable, settle the necessary scheme for the execution of the trust: In re Fenton Estate, 30 Man. R. 246, [1920] 2 W.W.R. 367.

While there are references in some of the English cases to the so-called Statutes of Mortmain, and while we have no such statute in Manitoba, Re Fenton, supra, those statutes do not affect the principles I have been discussing.

Questions 3, 4 and 5 are, therefore, answered according to the foregoing.

I now turn to questions 1 and 2. This is a much simpler problem. Clause 11 of the will gives to "the London Council for the time being of the Church of England Temperance Society (England)" a legacy of $5,000.00 on a condition. That condition is clearly stated; it is not illegal or uncertain, and the gift is a good and valid one if the condition is performed: Re Tyler, [1891] 3 Ch. 252, and if the beneficiary is capable of taking the gift.

The condition can be performed by giving an undertaking satisfactory to the trustee who would be justified in taking the undertaking in the words set out in the will, even though it cannot be enforced: Roche v. McDermott, [1901] 1 Ch. 394.

The real question is whether the beneficiary purported to be named is entitled to be a beneficiary. The evidence before me is that there is in existence in London a body which, so far as I can see, is a voluntary unincorporated association, known as the Council of the Church of England Temperance Society. There is also an incorporated body "The Church of England Temperance Society (Incorporated)" incorporated under the English Companies Acts 1862 to 1900, on 1 February 1907. By the articles of association of the incorporated body the persons eligible for membership are (1) members of the council of the Church of England Temperance Society who declare they desire to be members of the incorporated body and who may only be members of such body while they remain members of the council, and (2) all such other persons as shall be nominated by the executive of the incorporated body and consent to become members.

The gift is to the council and not to the incorporated body. May such voluntary unincorporated body be a beneficiary?

There is here no question of a trust charitable or otherwise, or a perpetuity. It is merely a legacy of $5,000.00, and no restriction on how the money may be used. A voluntary unincorporated association is not an entity known to the law and there are cases which appear to show that such an association cannot be a donee. I refer, for example, to Carne v. Long (1860), 2 De G.F. & J. 75, 27 L.J. Ch. 589, 45 E.R. 413; Gravenor v. Hallam (1767), Amb. 643, 27 E.R. 417; Re Amos, [1891] 3 Ch. 159, and Re Laing Estate, 38 B.C.R. 449, [1927] 1 W.W.R. 699.

I do not think these decisions apply here and in my opinion the principle applicable is stated by Joyce, J., in Re Swain (1908), 99 L.T. 604, when he said (p. 606) that the cases showed that:

> . . . a gift to a voluntary association of a legacy which is to go into its coffers and may be spent with its other funds as income is valid . . . It is not necessary . . . to the validity of such a gift that it must be in accordance with the rules of the society, or be possible under the rules to distribute the money as or by way of bonus to the individual members.

The whole question is discussed in Mr. Hart's article on Re Chardon, already referred to, which I have found most helpful.

I answer question 1 as follows: The bequest in clause 11 of the will is a valid bequest subject to a condition; it is not a charitable bequest.

Question No. 2 does not, in my opinion, depend on the constitution of the London Council; all of the members of the council may, as individuals, give the undertaking and the secretary may do so in his individual capacity. In no case does anyone incur any personal liability and Roche v. McDermott, supra, decides that the undertaking is, in any event, unenforceable at law. It is merely a "moral" or "honorary" obligation.

This leaves only question No. 6 to be answered. As I mentioned the testator died 7 June 1929, and was buried in Winnipeg. I am not informed why this was done, but I assume it was because the estate was not in funds to pay the cost of removing the body to France and interring it at Estaires. The cost of dis-interring the body, removing it to France and re-interring it there, will be about $1,000.00, and this money must be paid out of the amount available to pay the charitable bequests and the bequest to the London Council.

Questions such as this usually arise on passing accounts in the Surrogate Court, but there is power in this court to deal with the matter (see The Trustee Act, R.S.M. 1940, c. 221, s. 73, and I can see no reason why I should not answer this question.

There is no British or Canadian authority directly in point. Generally an executor will be allowed in his account reasonable funeral expenses having regard to the station in life of the testator and the estate he left: Williams on Executors (1930), 12th ed., pp. 116 sq.; Widdifield on Executors Accounts (1944), 4th ed., pp 116 sq. The testator has received decent burial and the expenses have been allowed in the executor's accounts.

> Compliance with the last wishes of the deceased as to the style and character of the funeral, if not extravagant or unreasonable, and if no injustice is done to creditors, violates no principle of law: Widdifield, op. cit., p. 120.

The question of the allowance of the expense of removing a body from one place of interment to another has been discussed in a number of American cases most of which are set out in the third (1933) edition of Judge Widdifield's work on executors' accounts but are omitted from the fourth edition. And there is an annotation in 40 A.L.R. Annotated at p. 1459.

In Pettigrew v. Pettigrew, 207 Pa. St. 313, 64 L.R.A. 179, 23 C.J. 1171, it was held that the duties of an executor terminate with the first interment, and if any question arises as to the necessity or advisability of a re-interment involving a removement to another locality, that is a matter for the next of kin.

It has been held that where the burial place had become undesirable, an administrator should be allowed credit for the reasonable expense of dis-interring the body of the deceased and re-burying in another place: Allen v. Allen, 3 Dem. (N.Y.) (so cited in Widdifield), but not where the place of burial was suitable and had been selected by the deceased: Watkins v. Romine, 106 Ind. 378, 7. N.E. 193.

A reasonable amount for services and expenses incurred in transporting the body of the deceased from a foreign country, where he died, is properly payable out of the estate: Re Parry's Estate, 41 Atl. R. 384, 24 C.J. 92. And see Sullivan v. Harner, 41 N.J.Eq. 299.

The full texts of these cases are, unfortunately, not available to us; they are not, with the exception of the annotation in 40 A.L.R. Annotated, in the Great Library. They were available to Judge Widdifield and I have no doubt were accurately stated.

Having in mind the circumstances of this case, the natural desire of the testator, the fact that he left a large estate and who were the objects of his bounty, I am of opinion that the general principle to be extracted from the authorities enables me to answer this question in the affirmative with the qualification that the amount expended must be reasonable. The trustee will probably be able to sell the plot in St. John's Cemetery which will be vacated and so reduce somewhat the cost to be incurred. I am sure that the charities will have no criticism to make of such an expenditure.

At the time of his death the testator, domiciled in England, was temporarily resident in Manitoba. His wife and only child were dead; he was the last of his immediate family. No one can doubt that if the trustee had taken the body to France for burial beside his wife and son, the reasonable expenses of doing so would have been allowed without question on any passing of accounts.

This leaves only the question of costs. It was the duty of the various charities and parties to take the stand they did and to submit all these matters to the court. The state of the authorities and the new points raised make this a matter of great difficulty. The matters raised were exceptionally well argued by all counsel; and all parties should have their costs out of the estate, the costs of the trustee to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

* Un jugement a été rendu le 17 janvier 2014, modifiant le par. 164 des deux versions des motifs. Les modifications ont été incorporées dans les présents motifs.

Courts — Decisions — Stare decisis — Standard of review — Prostitutes challenging constitutionality of prohibitions on bawdy-houses, living on avails of prostitution and communicating in public for purposes of prostitution under Criminal Code — Under what circumstances application judge could revisit conclusions of Supreme Court of Canada in Prostitution Reference which upheld bawdy-house and communicating prohibitions — Degree of deference owed to application judge's findings on social and legislative facts.

B, L and S, current or former prostitutes, brought an application seeking declarations that three provisions of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, which criminalize various activities related to prostitution, infringe their rights under s. 7 of the Charter: s. 210 makes it an offence to keep or be in a bawdy-house; s. 212(1)(j) prohibits living on the avails of prostitution; and, s. 213(1)(c) prohibits communicating in public for the purposes of prostitution. They argued that these restrictions on prostitution put the safety and lives of prostitutes at risk, by preventing them from implementing certain safety measures — such as hiring security guards or "screening" potential clients — that could protect them from violence. B, L and S also alleged that s. 213(1)(c) infringes the freedom of expression guarantee under s. 2(b) of the Charter, and that none of the provisions are saved under s. 1.

The Ontario Superior Court of Justice granted the application, declaring, without suspension, that each of the impugned Criminal Code provisions violated the Charter and could not be saved by s. 1. The Ontario Court of Appeal agreed s. 210 was unconstitutional and struck the word "prostitution" from the definition of "common bawdy-house" as it applies to s. 210, however it suspended the declaration of invalidity for 12 months. The court declared that s. 212(1)(j) was an unjustifiable violation of s. 7, ordering the reading in of words to clarify that the prohibition on living on the avails of prostitution applies only to those who do so "in circumstances of exploitation". It further held the communicating prohibition under s. 213(1)(c) did not violate either s. 2(b) or s. 7. The Attorneys General appeal from the declaration that ss. 210 and 212(1)(j) of the Code are unconstitutional. B, L and S cross-appeal on the constitutionality of s. 213(1)(c) and in respect of the s. 210 remedy.

Tribunaux — Décisions — Stare decisis — Norme de contrôle — Contestation par des prostituées des dispositions du Code criminel qui interdisent les maisons de débauche, le proxénétisme et la communication en public à des fins de prostitution — À quelles conditions un juge de première instance peut-il réexaminer les conclusions de la Cour suprême du Canada dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution selon lesquelles les interdictions visant les maisons de débauche et la communication sont valides? — Degré de déférence que commandent les conclusions du juge de première instance sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs.

B, L et S — trois prostituées ou ex-prostituées — ont sollicité un jugement déclarant que trois dispositions du Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-46, qui criminalisent diverses activités liées à la prostitution, portent atteinte au droit que leur garantit l'art. 7 de la Charte : l'art. 210 crée l'acte criminel de tenir une maison de débauche ou de s'y trouver; l'al. 212(1)j) interdit de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui; l'al. 213(1)c) interdit la communication en public à des fins de prostitution. Elles font valoir que ces restrictions apportées à la prostitution compromettent la sécurité et la vie des prostituées en ce qu'elles les empêchent de prendre certaines mesures de protection contre les actes de violence, telles l'embauche d'un garde ou l'évaluation préalable du client. Elles ajoutent que l'al. 213(1)c) porte atteinte à la liberté d'expression garantie à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte et qu'aucune des dispositions n'est sauvegardée par l'article premier.

La Cour supérieure de justice de l'Ontario a fait droit à la demande et déclaré, sans effet suspensif, que chacune des dispositions contestées du Code criminel porte atteinte à un droit ou à une liberté garantis par la Charte et ne peut être sauvegardée par application de l'article premier. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a convenu de l'inconstitutionnalité de l'art. 210 et radié le mot « prostitution » de la définition de « maison de débauche » applicable à cette disposition, mais elle a suspendu l'effet de la déclaration d'invalidité pendant 12 mois. Elle a statué que l'al. 212(1)j) constitue une atteinte injustifiable au droit garanti à l'art. 7 et ordonné d'interpréter la disposition de manière que l'interdiction vise seulement les personnes qui vivent de la prostitution d'autrui « dans des situations d'exploitation », comme si ces mots y étaient employés. Elle a par ailleurs estimé que l'interdiction de communiquer prévue à l'al. 213(1)c) n'est attentatoire ni à la liberté garantie par l'al. 2*b*), ni au droit que consacre l'art. 7. Les procureurs généraux se pourvoient contre la déclaration d'inconstitutionnalité de l'art. 210 et de l'al. 212(1)j) du Code. B, L et S se pourvoient de manière incidente relativement à la constitutionnalité de l'al. 213(1)c) et à la mesure prise pour remédier à l'inconstitutionnalité de l'art. 210.

Held: The appeals should be dismissed and the cross-appeal allowed. Section 210, as it relates to prostitution, and ss. 212(1)(j) and 213(1)(c) of the Criminal Code are declared to be inconsistent with the Charter. The word "prostitution" is struck from the definition of "common bawdy-house" in s. 197(1) of the Criminal Code as it applies to s. 210 only. The declaration of invalidity should be suspended for one year.

The three impugned provisions, primarily concerned with preventing public nuisance as well as the exploitation of prostitutes, do not pass Charter muster: they infringe the s. 7 rights of prostitutes by depriving them of security of the person in a manner that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. It is not necessary to determine whether this Court should depart from or revisit its conclusion in the Prostitution Reference that s. 213(1)(c) does not violate s. 2(b) since it is possible to resolve this case entirely on s. 7 grounds.

The common law principle of stare decisis is subordinate to the Constitution and cannot require a court to uphold a law which is unconstitutional. However, a lower court is not entitled to ignore binding precedent, and the threshold for revisiting a matter is not an easy one to reach. The threshold is met when a new legal issue is raised, or if there is a significant change in the circumstances or evidence. In this case, the application judge was entitled to rule on the new legal issues of whether the laws in question violated the security of the person interests under s. 7, as the majority decision of this Court in the Prostitution Reference was based on the s. 7 physical liberty interest alone. Furthermore, the principles of fundamental justice considered in the Prostitution Reference dealt with vagueness and the permissibility of indirect criminalization. The principles raised in this case — arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — have, to a large extent, developed only in the last 20 years. The application judge was not, however, entitled to decide the question of whether the communication provision is a justified limit on freedom of expression. That issue was decided in the Prostitution Reference and was binding on her.

The application judge's findings on social and legislative facts are entitled to deference. The standard of review for findings of fact — whether adjudicative, Arrêt : Les pourvois sont rejetés, et le pourvoi incident est accueilli. L'article 210, en ce qui concerne la prostitution, et les al. 212(1)j) et 213(1)c) du Code criminel sont déclarés incompatibles avec la Charte. Le mot « prostitution » est supprimé de la définition de « maison de débauche » figurant au par. 197(1) du Code criminel pour les besoins de l'art. 210 uniquement. L'effet de la déclaration d'invalidité est suspendu pendant un an.

Les trois dispositions contestées, qui visent principalement à empêcher les nuisances publiques et l'exploitation des prostituées, ne résistent pas au contrôle constitutionnel. Elles portent atteinte au droit à la sécurité de la personne que l'art. 7 garantit aux prostituées, et ce, d'une manière non conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. Point n'est besoin de déterminer si notre Cour devrait rompre avec la conclusion qu'elle a tirée dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, à savoir que l'al. 213(1)c) ne porte pas atteinte à la liberté garantie à l'al. 2*b*), ou la réexaminer, puisqu'il est possible de trancher en l'espèce sur le fondement du seul art. 7.

La règle du stare decisis issue de la common law est subordonnée à la Constitution et ne saurait avoir pour effet d'obliger un tribunal à valider une loi inconstitutionnelle. Une juridiction inférieure ne peut toutefois pas faire abstraction d'un précédent qui fait autorité, et la barre est haute lorsqu'il s'agit d'en justifier le réexamen. Les conditions sont réunies lorsqu'une nouvelle question de droit se pose ou qu'il y a modification importante de la situation ou de la preuve. En l'espèce, la juge de première instance pouvait trancher la question nouvelle de savoir si les dispositions en cause portent atteinte ou non au droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti à l'art. 7 car, dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, les juges majoritaires de la Cour statuent uniquement en fonction du droit à la liberté physique de la personne garanti par l'art. 7. Qui plus est, dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, les principes de justice fondamentale sont examinés sous l'angle de l'imprécision de la criminalisation indirecte et de l'acceptabilité de celle-ci. En l'espèce, ce sont le caractère arbitraire, la portée trop grande et le caractère totalement disproportionné qui sont allégués, des notions qui ont en grande partie vu le jour au cours des 20 dernières années. La juge de première instance n'était cependant pas admise à trancher la question de savoir si la disposition sur la communication constitue une limitation justifiée de la liberté d'expression. Notre Cour s'était prononcée sur ce point dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, et la juge était liée par cette décision.

Les conclusions tirées en première instance sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs commandent la déférence. La norme de contrôle applicable aux conclusions de fait — social, or legislative — remains palpable and overriding error.

The impugned laws negatively impact security of the person rights of prostitutes and thus engage s. 7. The proper standard of causation is a flexible "sufficient causal connection" standard, as correctly adopted by the application judge. The prohibitions all heighten the risks the applicants face in prostitution — itself a legal activity. They do not merely impose conditions on how prostitutes operate. They go a critical step further, by imposing dangerous conditions on prostitution; they prevent people engaged in a risky — but legal — activity from taking steps to protect themselves from the risks. That causal connection is not negated by the actions of third-party johns and pimps, or prostitutes' so-called choice to engage in prostitution. While some prostitutes may fit the description of persons who freely choose (or at one time chose) to engage in the risky economic activity of prostitution, many prostitutes have no meaningful choice but to do so. Moreover, it makes no difference that the conduct of pimps and johns is the immediate source of the harms suffered by prostitutes. The violence of a john does not diminish the role of the state in making a prostitute more vulnerable to that violence.

The applicants have also established that the deprivation of their security of the person is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice: principles that attempt to capture basic values underpinning our constitutional order. This case concerns the basic values against arbitrariness (where there is no connection between the effect and the object of the law), overbreadth (where the law goes too far and interferes with some conduct that bears no connection to its objective), and gross disproportionality (where the effect of the law is grossly disproportionate to the state's objective). These are three distinct principles, but overbreadth is related to arbitrariness, in that the question for both is whether there is no connection between the law's effect and its objective. All three principles compare the rights infringement caused by the law with the objective of the law, not with the law's effectiveness; they do not look to how well the law achieves its object, or to how much of the population the law benefits or is negatively impacted. The analysis is qualitative, not quantitative. The question under s. 7 is whether anyone's life, liberty or security of the person has been denied by a law that is inherently qu'elles portent sur les faits en litige, des faits sociaux ou des faits législatifs — demeure celle de l'erreur manifeste et dominante.

Les dispositions contestées ont un effet préjudiciable sur la sécurité des prostituées et mettent donc en jeu le droit garanti à l'art. 7. La norme qui convient est celle du « lien de causalité suffisant », appliquée avec souplesse, celle retenue à juste titre par la juge de première instance. Les interdictions augmentent tous les risques auxquels s'exposent les demanderesses lorsqu'elles se livrent à la prostitution, une activité qui est en soi légale. Elles ne font pas qu'encadrer la pratique de la prostitution. Elles franchissent un pas supplémentaire déterminant par l'imposition de conditions dangereuses à la pratique de la prostitution : elles empêchent des personnes qui se livrent à une activité risquée, mais légale, de prendre des mesures pour assurer leur propre protection. Le lien de causalité n'est pas rendu inexistant par les actes de tiers (clients et proxénètes) ou le prétendu choix des intéressées de se prostituer. Bien que certaines prostituées puissent correspondre au profil de celle qui choisit librement de se livrer à l'activité économique risquée qu'est la prostitution (ou qui a un jour fait ce choix), de nombreuses prostituées n'ont pas vraiment d'autre solution que la prostitution. De plus, le fait que le comportement des proxénètes et des clients soit la source immédiate des préjudices subis par les prostituées ne change rien. La violence d'un client ne diminue en rien la responsabilité de l'État qui rend une prostituée plus vulnérable à cette violence.

Les demanderesses ont également établi que l'atteinte à leur droit à la sécurité n'est pas conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale, lesquels sont censés intégrer les valeurs fondamentales qui sous-tendent notre ordre constitutionnel. Dans la présente affaire, les valeurs fondamentales qui nous intéressent s'opposent à l'arbitraire (absence de lien entre l'effet de la loi et son objet), à la portée excessive (la disposition va trop loin et empiète sur quelque comportement sans lien avec son objectif) et à la disproportion totale (l'effet de la disposition est totalement disproportionné à l'objectif de l'État). Il s'agit de trois notions distinctes, mais la portée excessive est liée au caractère arbitraire en ce que l'absence de lien entre l'effet de la disposition et son objectif est commune aux deux. Les trois notions supposent de comparer l'atteinte aux droits qui découle de la loi avec l'objectif de la loi, et non avec son efficacité; elles ne s'intéressent pas à la réalisation de l'objectif législatif ou au pourcentage de la population qui bénéficie de l'application de la loi ou qui en pâtit. L'analyse se veut qualitative, et non quantitative. La question que commande l'art. 7 est celle de savoir si une disposition législative intrinsèquement bad; a grossly disproportionate, overbroad, or arbitrary effect on one person is sufficient to establish a breach of s. 7.

Applying these principles to the impugned provisions, the negative impact of the bawdy-house prohibition (s. 210) on the applicants' security of the person is grossly disproportionate to its objective of preventing public nuisance. The harms to prostitutes identified by the courts below, such as being prevented from working in safer fixed indoor locations and from resorting to safe houses, are grossly disproportionate to the deterrence of community disruption. Parliament has the power to regulate against nuisances, but not at the cost of the health, safety and lives of prostitutes. Second, the purpose of the living on the avails of prostitution prohibition in s. 212(1)(j) is to target pimps and the parasitic, exploitative conduct in which they engage. The law, however, punishes everyone who lives on the avails of prostitution without distinguishing between those who exploit prostitutes and those who could increase the safety and security of prostitutes, for example, legitimate drivers, managers, or bodyguards. It also includes anyone involved in business with a prostitute, such as accountants or receptionists. In these ways, the law includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose of preventing the exploitation of prostitutes. The living on the avails provision is consequently overbroad. Third, the purpose of the communicating prohibition in s. 213(1)(c) is not to eliminate street prostitution for its own sake, but to take prostitution off the streets and out of public view in order to prevent the nuisances that street prostitution can cause. The provision's negative impact on the safety and lives of street prostitutes, who are prevented by the communicating prohibition from screening potential clients for intoxication and propensity to violence, is a grossly disproportionate response to the possibility of nuisance caused by street prostitution.

While the Attorneys General have not seriously argued that the laws, if found to infringe s. 7, can be justified under s. 1, some of their arguments under s. 7 are properly addressed at this stage of the analysis. In particular, they attempt to justify the living on the avails provision on the basis that it must be drafted broadly in order to capture all exploitative relationships. However, the law not only catches drivers and bodyguards, who may actually be pimps, but it also catches clearly non-exploitative relationships, such as receptionists or accountants who work mauvaise prive qui que ce soit du droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de sa personne; un effet totalement disproportionné, excessif ou arbitraire sur une seule personne suffit pour établir l'atteinte au droit garanti à l'art. 7.

Si l'on applique ces notions aux dispositions contestées, l'effet préjudiciable de l'interdiction des maisons de débauche (art. 210) sur le droit à la sécurité des demanderesses est totalement disproportionné à l'objectif de prévenir les nuisances publiques. Les préjudices subis par les prostituées selon les juridictions inférieures (p. ex. le fait de ne pouvoir travailler dans un lieu fixe, sûr et situé à l'intérieur, ni avoir recours à un refuge sûr) sont totalement disproportionnés à l'objectif de réprimer le désordre public. Le législateur a le pouvoir de réprimer les nuisances, mais pas au prix de la santé, de la sécurité et de la vie des prostituées. L'interdiction faite à l'al. 212(1)j) de vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui vise à réprimer le proxénétisme, ainsi que le parasitisme et l'exploitation qui y sont associés. Or, la disposition vise toute personne qui vit des produits de la prostitution d'autrui sans établir de distinction entre celui qui exploite une prostituée et celui qui peut accroître la sécurité d'une prostituée (tel le chauffeur, le gérant ou le garde du corps véritable). La disposition vise également toute personne qui fait affaire avec une prostituée, y compris un comptable ou un réceptionniste. Certains actes sans aucun rapport avec l'objectif de prévenir l'exploitation des prostituées tombent ainsi sous le coup de la loi. La disposition sur le proxénétisme a donc une portée excessive. L'alinéa 213(1)c), qui interdit la communication, vise non pas à éliminer la prostitution dans la rue comme telle, mais bien à sortir la prostitution de la rue et à la soustraire au regard du public afin d'empêcher les nuisances susceptibles d'en découler. Son effet préjudiciable sur le droit à la sécurité et à la vie des prostituées de la rue, du fait que ces dernières sont empêchées de communiquer avec leurs clients éventuels afin de déterminer s'ils sont intoxiqués ou enclins à la violence, est totalement disproportionné au risque de nuisance causée par la prostitution de la rue.

Même si les procureurs généraux ne prétendent pas sérieusement que, si elles sont jugées contraires à l'art. 7, les dispositions en cause peuvent être justifiées en vertu de l'article premier, certaines des thèses qu'ils défendent en fonction de l'art. 7 sont reprises à juste titre à cette étape de l'analyse. En particulier, ils tentent de justifier la disposition sur le proxénétisme par la nécessité d'un libellé général afin que tombent sous le coup de son application toutes les relations empreintes d'exploitation. Or, la disposition vise non seulement with prostitutes. The law is therefore not minimally impairing. Nor, at the final stage of the s. 1 inquiry, is the law's effect of preventing prostitutes from taking measures that would increase their safety, and possibly save their lives, outweighed by the law's positive effect of protecting prostitutes from exploitative relationships. The impugned laws are not saved by s. 1.

Concluding that each of the challenged provisions violates the Charter does not mean that Parliament is precluded from imposing limits on where and how prostitution may be conducted, as long as it does so in a way that does not infringe the constitutional rights of prostitutes. The regulation of prostitution is a complex and delicate matter. It will be for Parliament, should it choose to do so, to devise a new approach, reflecting different elements of the existing regime. Considering all the interests at stake, the declaration of invalidity should be suspended for one year.

le chauffeur ou le garde du corps, qui peut en réalité être un proxénète, mais aussi la personne qui entretient avec la prostituée des rapports manifestement dénués d'exploitation (p. ex. un réceptionniste ou un comptable). La disposition n'équivaut donc pas à une atteinte minimale. Pour les besoins du dernier volet de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier, son effet bénéfique — protéger les prostituées contre l'exploitation — ne l'emporte pas non plus sur son effet qui empêche les prostituées de prendre des mesures pour accroître leur sécurité et, peut-être, leur sauver la vie. Les dispositions contestées ne sont pas sauvegardées par application de l'article premier.

La conclusion que les dispositions contestées portent atteinte à des droits garantis par la Charte ne dépouille pas le législateur du pouvoir de décider des lieux et des modalités de la prostitution, à condition qu'il exerce ce pouvoir sans porter atteinte aux droits constitutionnels des prostituées. L'encadrement de la prostitution est un sujet complexe et délicat. Il appartiendra au législateur, s'il le juge opportun, de concevoir une nouvelle approche qui intègre les différents éléments du régime actuel. Au vu de l'ensemble des intérêts en jeu, il convient de suspendre l'effet de la déclaration d'invalidité pendant un an.

[1] THE CHIEF JUSTICE — It is not a crime in Canada to sell sex for money. However, it is a crime to keep a bawdy-house, to live on the avails of prostitution or to communicate in public with respect to a proposed act of prostitution. It is argued that these restrictions on prostitution put the safety and lives of prostitutes at risk, and are therefore unconstitutional.

[2] These appeals and the cross-appeal are not about whether prostitution should be legal or not. They are about whether the laws Parliament has enacted on how prostitution may be carried out pass constitutional muster. I conclude that they do not. I would therefore make a suspended declaration of invalidity, returning the question of how to deal with prostitution to Parliament.

I. The Case

[3] Three applicants, all current or former prostitutes, brought an application seeking declarations that three provisions of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, are unconstitutional.

[4] The three impugned provisions criminalize various activities related to prostitution. They are primarily concerned with preventing public nuisance, as well as the exploitation of prostitutes. Section 210 makes it an offence to be an inmate of a bawdy-house, to be found in a bawdy-house without lawful excuse, or to be an owner, landlord, lessor, tenant, or occupier of a place who knowingly permits it to be used as a bawdy-house. Section 212(1)(j) makes it an offence to live on the avails of another's prostitution. Section 213(1)(c) makes it an offence to either stop or attempt to stop, or communicate or attempt to communicate with, someone in a public place for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or hiring a prostitute.

[1] LA JUGE EN CHEF — Au Canada, offrir ses services sexuels contre de l'argent n'est pas un crime. Par contre, tenir une maison de débauche, vivre des produits de la prostitution d'autrui ou communiquer avec quelqu'un en public en vue d'un acte de prostitution constituent des actes criminels. On fait valoir que ces restrictions apportées à la prostitution compromettent la sécurité et la vie des prostituées et qu'elles sont de ce fait inconstitutionnelles.

[2] Les pourvois et le pourvoi incident ne visent pas à déterminer si la prostitution doit être légale ou non, mais bien si les dispositions adoptées par le législateur fédéral pour encadrer sa pratique résistent au contrôle constitutionnel. Je conclus qu'elles n'y résistent pas. Je suis donc d'avis de les invalider avec effet suspensif et de renvoyer la question au législateur afin qu'il redéfinisse les modalités de cet encadrement.

I. Le dossier

[4] Les trois dispositions contestées criminalisent diverses activités liées à la prostitution. Elles visent principalement à empêcher les nuisances publiques et l'exploitation des prostituées. Suivant l'art. 210, est coupable d'une infraction quiconque, selon le cas, habite une maison de débauche, est trouvé, sans excuse légitime, dans une maison de débauche ou, en qualité de propriétaire, locateur, occupant ou locataire d'un local, en permet sciemment l'utilisation comme maison de débauche. L'alinéa 212(1)j) dispose qu'est coupable d'un acte criminel quiconque vit des produits de la prostitution d'autrui. L'alinéa 213(1)c) crée l'infraction d'arrêter ou de tenter d'arrêter une personne ou de communiquer ou de tenter de communiquer avec elle dans un endroit public dans le but de se livrer à la prostitution ou de retenir les services sexuels d'une personne qui s'y livre.

[5] However, prostitution itself is not illegal. It is not against the law to exchange sex for money. Under the existing regime, Parliament has confined lawful prostitution to two categories: street prostitution and "out-calls" — where the prostitute goes out and meets the client at a designated location, such as the client's home. This reflects a policy choice on Parliament's part. Parliament is not precluded from imposing limits on where and how prostitution may be conducted, as long as it does so in a way that does not infringe the constitutional rights of prostitutes.

[6] The applicants allege that all three provisions infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by preventing prostitutes from implementing certain safety measures — such as hiring security guards or "screening" potential clients — that could protect them from violent clients. The applicants also allege that s. 213(1)(c) infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter, and that none of the provisions are saved under s. 1.

[7] The backgrounds of the three applicants as revealed in their evidence were reviewed in the application judge's decision (2010 ONSC 4264, 102 O.R. (3d) 321).

[8] Terri Jean Bedford was born in Collingwood, Ontario, in 1959, and as of 2010 had 14 years of experience working as a prostitute in various Canadian cities. She worked as a street prostitute, a massage parlour attendant, an escort, an owner and manager of an escort agency, and a dominatrix. Ms. Bedford had a difficult childhood and adolescence during which she was subjected to various types of abuse. She also encountered brutal violence throughout her career — largely, she stated, while working on the street. In her experience, indoor prostitution is safer than prostitution on the street, although she conceded that safety of an indoor location can vary. Ms. Bedford has been convicted of both keeping and being an inmate of a common bawdy-house, for which she has paid a number of fines and served 15 months in jail.

[5] Or, la prostitution n'est pas elle-même illégale. Échanger des services sexuels contre de l'argent n'est pas contraire à la loi. Le régime actuel ne permet que deux types de prostitution : celle qui se pratique dans la rue et celle qui est « itinérante », où la prostituée se déplace pour aller à la rencontre de son client dans un endroit convenu, chez lui par exemple. Cette limitation témoigne d'un choix de politique générale du législateur. Il est loisible à ce dernier de limiter les modalités et les lieux d'exercice de la prostitution à condition qu'il le fasse sans porter atteinte aux droits constitutionnels des prostituées.

[7] Dans sa décision, la juge de première instance relate l'histoire personnelle de chacune des trois demanderesses à partir de leurs témoignages (2010 ONSC 4264, 102 O.R. (3d) 321).

[8] Terri Jean Bedford est née en 1959 à Collingwood, en Ontario. En 2010, elle se prostituait depuis 14 ans et avait travaillé dans différentes villes canadiennes. Elle a été tour à tour prostituée dans la rue, employée de salon de massage, escorte, propriétaire et directrice d'une agence d'escortes, puis dominatrice. Elle a connu une enfance et une adolescence difficiles pendant lesquelles elle a subi divers types de violence. Elle a également été victime d'actes de violence pendant ses années de prostitution, surtout, a-t-elle expliqué, lorsqu'elle travaillait dans la rue. Elle en conclut que la prostitution pratiquée à l'intérieur est moins risquée que la prostitution dans la rue, même si elle reconnaît que la sécurité à l'intérieur peut varier d'un lieu à l'autre. M^me^ Bedford a été déclarée coupable d'avoir tenu et habité une maison de débauche, deux infractions qui lui ont valu des amendes et une peine d'emprisonnement de 15 mois.

[9] When she ran an escort service in the 1980s, Ms. Bedford instituted various safety measures, including: ensuring someone else was on location during in-calls, except during appointments with well-known clients; ensuring that women were taken to and from out-call appointments by a boyfriend, husband, or professional driver; if an appointment was at a hotel, calling the hotel to verify the client's name and hotel room number; if an appointment was at a client's home, calling the client's phone to ensure it was the correct number; turning down appointments from clients who sounded intoxicated; and verifying that credit card numbers matched the names of clients. She claimed she was not aware of any incidents of violence by the clientele towards her employees during that time. At some point in the 1990s, Ms. Bedford ran the Bondage Bungalow, where she offered dominatrix services. She also instituted various safety measures at this establishment, and claimed she only experienced one incident of "real violence" (application decision, at para. 30).

[9] Lorsqu'elle dirigeait un service d'escortes dans les années 1980, M^me^ Bedford prenait diverses mesures de sécurité, dont les suivantes. Assurer la présence sur place d'une autre personne lors de la visite d'un nouveau client; faire en sorte que la prostituée soit amenée au lieu de rendez-vous, puis en soit ramenée par son petit ami, son mari ou un chauffeur; appeler l'hôtel où le rendez-vous est donné pour vérifier le nom du client et le numéro de sa chambre; composer le numéro de téléphone du client pour s'assurer que c'était le bon lorsque la rencontre avait lieu chez le client; refuser tout rendez-vous à un client qui semblait intoxiqué; s'assurer que le numéro de carte de crédit correspondait au nom du client. Pour autant qu'elle sache, aucune de ses employées n'a été victime d'actes de violence de la part de clients pendant cette période. À un certain moment au cours des années 1990, M^me^ Bedford a ouvert le « Bondage Bungalow » où elle a offert des services de dominatrice. Elle y a également pris des mesures de sécurité et n'a connu qu'un seul incident de [TRADUCTION] « violence véritable » (décision de première instance, par. 30).

[10] Ms. Bedford is not currently working in prostitution but asserted that she would like to return to working as a dominatrix in a secure, indoor location; however, she is concerned that in doing so, she would be exposed to criminal liability. Furthermore, she does not want the people assisting her to be subject to criminal liability due to the living on the avails of prostitution provision.

[10] Pour l'heure, M^me^ Bedford ne se livre pas à la prostitution. Elle aimerait reprendre ses activités de dominatrice dans un lieu sûr, à l'intérieur, mais elle craint d'engager alors sa responsabilité criminelle. Elle ajoute ne pas vouloir non plus que ses collaborateurs s'exposent à des accusations de proxénétisme.

[11] Amy Lebovitch was born in Montréal in 1979. She comes from a stable background and attended both CEGEP and university. She currently works as a prostitute and has done so since approximately 1997 in various cities in Canada. She worked first as a street prostitute, then as an escort, and later in a fetish house. Ms. Lebovitch considers herself lucky that she was never subjected to violence during her years working on the streets. She moved off the streets to work at the escort agency after seeing other women's injuries and hearing stories of the violence suffered by other street prostitutes. Ms. Lebovitch maintains that she felt safer in an indoor location; she attributed remaining safety issues mainly to poor management. Ms. Lebovitch experienced one notable instance of violence, which she did not report to the police out of fear of police scrutiny and the possibility of criminal charges.

[12] Presently, Ms. Lebovitch primarily works independently out of her home, where she takes various safety precautions, including: making sure client telephone calls are from unblocked numbers; not taking calls from clients who sound drunk, high, or in another manner undesirable; asking for expectations upfront; taking clients' full names and verifying them using directory assistance; getting referrals from regular clients; and calling a third party — her "safe call" — when the client arrives and before he leaves. Ms. Lebovitch fears being charged and convicted under the bawdy-house provisions and the consequent possibility of forfeiture of her home. She says that the fear of criminal charges has caused her to work on the street on occasion. She is also concerned that her partner will be charged with living on the avails of prostitution. She has never been charged with a criminal offence of any kind. Ms. Lebovitch volunteers as the spokesperson for Sex Professionals of Canada ("SPOC"), and she also records information from women calling to report "bad dates" — incidents that ended in violence or theft. Ms. Lebovitch stated that she enjoys her job and does not plan to leave it in the foreseeable future.

[13] Valerie Scott was born in Moncton, New Brunswick, in 1958. She is currently the executive director of SPOC, and she no longer works as a prostitute. In the past, she worked indoors, from her home or in hotel rooms; she also worked as a prostitute on the street, in massage parlours, and she ran a small escort business. She has never been charged with a criminal offence of any kind. When Ms. Scott worked from home, she would screen new clients by meeting them in public locations. She never experienced significant harm working from home. Around 1984, as awareness about HIV/AIDS increased, Ms. Scott was compelled to work as a street prostitute, since indoor clients felt entitled not to wear condoms. On the street, she was subjected to threats of violence, as well as verbal and physical abuse. Ms. Scott described some precautions street essentiellement attribuables à une mauvaise gestion. Elle n'a connu qu'un seul cas de violence digne de mention, qu'elle n'a toutefois pas dénoncé de crainte d'attirer l'attention de la police sur ses activités et d'être accusée au criminel.

[12] À l'heure actuelle, M^me^ Lebovitch se prostitue essentiellement chez elle, de manière autonome. Elle prend diverses précautions, dont s'assurer que le numéro de téléphone du client n'est pas masqué, refuser un client qui semble ivre, intoxiqué ou par ailleurs rebutant, s'enquérir au départ des attentes du client, lui demander son nom au complet et vérifier son identité à l'assistance annuaire, obtenir des références d'un client fiable et appeler un tiers — son « ange gardien » — à l'arrivée du client et peu avant qu'il ne parte. M^me^ Lebovitch craint d'être accusée et déclarée coupable de tenir une maison de débauche et que sa demeure soit confisquée en conséquence. Elle affirme que la peur d'être accusée au criminel l'a parfois amenée à travailler dans la rue. Elle craint également que son conjoint ne soit accusé de proxénétisme. Elle n'a jamais fait l'objet d'accusations au pénal. Elle est porte-parole bénévole de l'organisme Sex Professionals of Canada (« SPOC ») et consigne par ailleurs les incidents que lui signalent des prostituées victimes de violence ou de vol de la part de clients. M^me^ Lebovitch dit aimer son travail et n'entend pas en changer dans un avenir prévisible.

[13] Née en 1958 à Moncton, au Nouveau-Brunswick, Valerie Scott est actuellement directrice administrative de SPOC. Elle ne travaille plus comme prostituée, mais elle l'a fait, à l'intérieur, chez elle ou dans des chambres d'hôtel, dans la rue et dans des salons de massage. Elle a aussi dirigé une petite agence d'escortes. Elle n'a jamais été accusée de la moindre infraction criminelle. Lorsqu'elle travaillait chez elle, elle soumettait tout nouveau client à une évaluation préalable lors d'une rencontre dans un lieu public. Elle n'a alors jamais eu d'ennuis graves. Vers 1984, les craintes accrues suscitées par le VIH/SIDA l'ont amenée à travailler dans la rue car les clients qu'elle recevait chez elle se croyaient dispensés du port du condom. Dans la rue, elle a été l'objet de menaces de violence ainsi que d'agressions verbales et physiques. Elle fait prostitutes took prior to the enactment of the communicating law, including working in pairs or threes and having another prostitute visibly write down the client's licence plate number, so he would know he was traceable if something was to go wrong.

[14] Ms. Scott worked as an activist and, among other things, advocated against Bill C-49 (which included the current communicating provision). Ms. Scott stated that following the enactment of the communicating law, the Canadian Organization for the Rights of Prostitutes ("CORP") began receiving calls from women working in prostitution about the increased enforcement of the laws and the prevalence of bad dates. In response, Ms. Scott was involved in setting up a drop-in and phone centre for prostitutes in Toronto; within the first year, Ms. Scott spoke to approximately 250 prostitutes whose main concerns were client violence and legal matters arising from arrest. In 2000, Ms. Scott formed SPOC to revitalize and continue the work previously done by CORP. As the executive director of this organization, she testified before a Parliamentary Subcommittee on Solicitation Laws in 2005. Over the years, Ms. Scott estimates that she has spoken with approximately 1,500 women working in prostitution. If this challenge is successful, Ms. Scott would like to operate an indoor prostitution business. While she recognizes that clients may be dangerous in both outdoor and indoor locations, she would institute safety precautions such as checking identification of clients, making sure other people are close by during appointments to intervene if needed, and hiring a bodyguard.

[15] The three applicants applied pursuant to rule 14.05(3)(g.1) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, for an order that the provisions restricting prostitution are unconstitutional. The evidentiary record consists of over 25,000 pages of evidence in 88 volumes. The affidavit evidence was accompanied by a large volume of studies, reports, newspaper articles, legislation, Hansard and many état de certaines précautions que les prostituées de la rue prenaient avant l'adoption des dispositions interdisant la communication, dont le travail à deux ou à trois ou la prise ostensible du numéro de plaque du client par une autre prostituée afin que ce dernier sache qu'on pouvait le retracer si les choses tournaient mal.

[14] M^me^ Scott a été militante. Elle a notamment fait campagne contre le projet de loi C-49 (dont est issue la disposition actuelle interdisant la communication). Elle dit qu'après l'interdiction de la communication, la Canadian Organization for the Rights of Prostitutes (« CORP ») a commencé à recevoir des appels de prostituées qui constataient une répression policière accrue et un plus grand nombre d'incidents avec des clients. C'est pourquoi elle a participé à la mise sur pied à Toronto d'un centre d'aide aux prostituées dont les services étaient offerts sur place et au téléphone. Dès la première année, M^me^ Scott s'est entretenue avec environ 250 prostituées dont les principaux sujets de préoccupation étaient la violence des clients et les conséquences juridiques d'une arrestation. En 2000, elle a créé SPOC afin de donner une nouvelle impulsion au travail entrepris par la CORP. C'est à titre de directrice administrative de cet organisme qu'elle a témoigné en 2005 devant le Sous-comité parlementaire de l'examen des lois sur le racolage. Au fil des ans, elle se serait entretenue avec environ 1 500 femmes qui se livrent à la prostitution. Si les appelantes ont gain de cause, M^me^ Scott aimerait se mettre à son compte et offrir des services de prostitution à l'intérieur. Elle reconnaît qu'un client peut se révéler dangereux tant à l'intérieur qu'à l'extérieur, mais elle prendrait des précautions, comme la vérification de l'identité du client, la présence d'une autre personne à proximité qui puisse intervenir au besoin lors d'un rendez-vous et l'embauche d'un garde du corps.

[15] Les trois demanderesses ont demandé, sur le fondement de l'al. 14.05(3)g.1) des Règles de procédure civile, R.R.O. 1990, Règl. 194, que les dispositions qui limitent la prostitution soient déclarées inconstitutionnelles. Le dossier de preuve compte plus de 25 000 pages et 88 volumes. La preuve par affidavit s'accompagne d'une foule d'études, de rapports, d'articles de journaux, d'extraits de textes other documents. Some of the affiants were cross-examined.

III. Prior Decisions

A. Ontario Superior Court of Justice (Himel J.)

[17] The application judge, Himel J., concluded that the applicants had private interest standing to challenge the provisions. She held that the decision of this Court upholding the bawdy-house and communicating law in the Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1123 ("Prostitution Reference"), did not prevent her from reviewing their constitutionality because: (1) s. 7 jurisprudence has evolved considerably since 1990; in particular, the doctrines of arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality had not yet been fully articulated and therefore were not argued or considered in the Prostitution Reference; (2) the evidentiary record before her was much richer, based on research not available in 1990; (3) the social, political and economic assumptions underlying the Prostitution Reference may no longer be valid; and (4) the type of expression at issue differed from that considered in the Prostitution Reference.

[18] In considering the legislative scheme as it exists and the evidence before her, Himel J. found that each of the impugned laws deprived the applicants and others like them of their liberty (by reason of potential imprisonment) and their security of the person (because they increased the risk of injury). The increased risk of violence created by the laws constituted a "sufficient" cause, engaging the security of the person protected by s. 7. She stated:

With respect to s. 210, the evidence suggests that working in-call is the safest way to sell sex; yet, prostitutes

III. Décisions des juridictions inférieures

A. Cour supérieure de justice de l'Ontario (la juge Himel)

[17] En première instance, la juge Himel conclut que les demanderesses ont qualité pour agir dans l'intérêt privé et contester les dispositions. Elle estime que le Renvoi relatif à l'art. 193 et à l'al. 195.1(1)c) du Code criminel (Man.), [1990] 1 R.C.S. 1123 (« Renvoi sur la prostitution »), dans lequel notre Cour confirme la validité des dispositions sur les maisons de débauche et la communication à des fins de prostitution, ne l'empêche pas d'examiner leur constitutionnalité, car (1) la jurisprudence relative à l'art. 7 a beaucoup évolué depuis 1990 et, plus particulièrement, les notions de caractère arbitraire, de portée excessive et de disproportion totale n'étaient pas encore bien arrêtées, de sorte qu'elles n'avaient pas été invoquées ou examinées dans cette affaire, (2) le dossier de preuve est beaucoup plus étoffé et repose sur les résultats de recherches qui n'étaient pas disponibles en 1990, (3) les données sociales, politiques et économiques qui sous-tendent le Renvoi sur la prostitution ne sont peut-être plus valables et (4) l'expression considérée en l'espèce diffère de celle examinée dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution.

[18] Après examen du régime législatif existant et de la preuve offerte, la juge Himel conclut que les dispositions contestées portent toutes trois atteinte au droit à la liberté (en raison du risque d'emprisonnement) et à la sécurité (en raison du risque accru de préjudice) des demanderesses et d'autres personnes dans la même situation. Le risque accru de violence créé par les dispositions « suffit » pour mettre en jeu le droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti à l'art. 7. Elle déclare :

[TRADUCTION] À l'égard de l'art. 210, les preuves indiquent que travailler à l'intérieur est la façon la plus who attempt to increase their level of safety by working in-call face criminal sanction. With respect to s. 212(1)(j), prostitution, including legal out-call work, may be made less dangerous if a prostitute is allowed to hire an assistant or a bodyguard; yet, such business relationships are illegal due to the living on the avails of prostitution provision. Finally, s. 213(1)(c) prohibits street prostitutes, who are largely the most vulnerable prostitutes and face an alarming amount of violence, from screening clients at an early, and crucial stage of a potential transaction, thereby putting them at an increased risk of violence.

In conclusion, these three provisions prevent prostitutes from taking precautions, some extremely rudimentary, that can decrease the risk of violence towards them. Prostitutes are faced with deciding between their liberty and their security of the person. Thus, while it is ultimately the client who inflicts violence upon a prostitute, in my view the law plays a sufficient contributory role in preventing a prostitute from taking steps that could reduce the risk of such violence. [paras. 361-62]

[19] Himel J. concluded that the deprivation of security thus established was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, notably the requirements that laws not infringe security of the person in a way that is arbitrary, overbroad or grossly disproportionate.

[20] Himel J. found the bawdy-house provision (s. 210) overbroad because it extended to virtually any place and allowed for convictions that were unrelated to the objective of preventing community nuisance. And the harms it inflicted were grossly disproportionate to the few nuisance complaints received. The effect of preventing prostitutes from working in-call at a regular indoor location was to force them to choose between their liberty interest (obeying the law) and their personal security.

[21] Himel J. found the prohibition against living on the avails of prostitution (s. 212(1)(j)) arbitrary, overbroad and grossly disproportionate. While targeting exploitation by pimps, the provision sécuritaire de vendre des services à caractère sexuel. Pourtant, les prostituées qui tentent d'accroître leur niveau de sécurité en travaillant à l'intérieur sont passibles d'une sanction pénale. Relativement à l'al. 212(1)j), la prostitution, y compris le travail légal « itinérant », pourrait être plus sécuritaire si la prostituée avait le droit d'embaucher un adjoint ou un garde du corps. Pourtant, de telles relations de travail sont illégales en raison de la disposition interdisant de vivre des produits de la prostitution. En dernier lieu, l'al. 213(1)c) interdit aux prostituées de la rue, qui sont de loin les plus vulnérables et font l'objet d'un nombre alarmant d'actes de violence, de présélectionner les clients à l'étape initiale, et cruciale, de la transaction possible, les exposant ainsi à un risque accru de violence.

En conclusion, ces trois dispositions empêchent les prostituées de prendre des précautions, certaines extrêmement rudimentaires, qui pourraient réduire le risque de violence à leur endroit. Les prostituées sont obligées de choisir entre la liberté et la sécurité de leur personne. Ainsi, bien que ce soit le client qui, en fin de compte, fasse subir la violence à la prostituée, je suis d'avis que la loi contribue suffisamment à empêcher qu'une prostituée prenne des mesures qui pourraient réduire le risque d'une telle violence. [par. 361-362]

[20] À son avis, la disposition sur les maisons de débauche (l'art. 210) a une portée trop grande en ce qu'elle vise pratiquement tout lieu et réprime des actes qui n'ont rien à voir avec l'objectif d'empêcher les nuisances publiques. De plus, le préjudice infligé est totalement disproportionné compte tenu du nombre peu élevé de plaintes pour nuisance. Empêcher les prostituées de se livrer à la prostitution dans un lieu établi, situé à l'intérieur, les contraint à renoncer à leur liberté (par l'observation de la loi) ou à leur sécurité personnelle.

[21] La juge Himel estime que l'interdiction du proxénétisme (l'al. 212(1)j)) est arbitraire et totalement disproportionnée, et que sa portée est trop grande. Même si elle est censée réprimer encompasses virtually anyone who provides services to prostitutes. Prostitutes are forced to work alone, increasing the risk of harm, or work with people prepared to break the law. It increases reliance on pimps, and is therefore arbitrary. It catches non-exploitative relationships, and is therefore overbroad. And it creates the risk of severe violence from pimps and exploiters, making it grossly disproportionate.

[22] Finally, Himel J. found the prohibition on communicating for the purposes of prostitution (s. 213(1)(c)) violates the principle against gross disproportionality. By preventing prostitutes from screening clients — an essential tool for enhancing their safety — it endangers them out of all proportion to the small social benefit it provides. It also infringes the freedom of expression guarantee under s. 2(b) of the Charter.

[23] Himel J. found that the infringement of the s. 7 and s. 2(b) rights imposed by the laws could not be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

[24] In the result, Himel J. declared the communicating and living on the avails offences unconstitutional, without suspension, and rectified the bawdy-house prohibition by striking the word "prostitution" from the definition of "common bawdy-house" in s. 197(1) as it applies to s. 210.

B. Ontario Court of Appeal (Doherty, Rosenberg, Feldman, MacPherson and Cronk JJ.A.)

[25] The majority of the Court of Appeal, per Doherty, Rosenberg and Feldman J.J.A. (with whom the minority per MacPherson J.A. concurred on these issues), agreed with the application judge that the bawdy-house and living on the avails provisions were unconstitutional on the basis that they l'exploitation par le proxénète, la disposition vise pratiquement toute personne qui offre des services à une prostituée. Celle-ci est obligée soit de travailler seule, ce qui augmente le risque auquel elle s'expose, soit de travailler avec des gens qui sont disposés à contrevenir à la loi. L'interdiction accroît la dépendance des prostituées envers les souteneurs, ce qui la rend arbitraire. Elle s'applique à des rapports exempts d'exploitation, de sorte que sa portée est trop grande. Enfin, elle crée un risque de violence grave de la part des proxénètes et des exploiteurs, d'où son caractère totalement disproportionné.

B. Cour d'appel de l'Ontario (les juges Doherty, Rosenberg, Feldman, MacPherson et Cronk)

[25] Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel (les juges Doherty, Rosenberg et Feldman, avec l'accord des juges minoritaires sur ces points exprimé par le juge MacPherson) conviennent avec la juge de première instance que les dispositions sur les maisons de débauche et le proxénétisme sont engaged the security of the person in a way that was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice (2012 ONCA 186, 109 O.R. (3d) 1). In particular, the majority found as follows.

[26] The prohibition on bawdy-houses was overbroad and had an impact on security that was grossly disproportionate to any benefit conferred. The court agreed that the word "prostitution" should be struck from the definition of "common bawdy-house". However, it suspended the declaration of invalidity for 12 months.

[27] The prohibition on living on the avails was not arbitrary, as the application judge found, but was overbroad and grossly disproportionate in its effects. However, instead of striking the provision out, the court narrowed the provision by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" (para. 267).

[28] The majority of the Court of Appeal found the prohibition on communicating in public for the purpose of prostitution was constitutional. While it engaged security of the person, it did so in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The provision aims to combat nuisance-related problems caused by street solicitation. It is not arbitrary; it has been effective in protecting residential neighbourhoods from the targeted harms. Nor is it overbroad or grossly disproportionate. In finding the provision grossly disproportionate, the application judge erred by understating the objective in a way that did not reflect the evidence, and by overemphasizing the impact of the provision on prostitutes' security of the person. The evidence did not establish that inability to communicate with customers contributed to the harm experienced by prostitutes to a degree that made the impact grossly disproportionate to the benefits. The majority also found that it was bound by the Prostitution Reference: thus, this provision violated s. 2(b) of the Charter, but was justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

inconstitutionnelles parce qu'elles portent atteinte à la sécurité de la personne d'une manière non conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale (2012 ONCA 186, 109 O.R. (3d) 1). Ils concluent notamment ce qui suit.

[26] Selon eux, l'interdiction des maisons de débauche a une portée trop grande et un effet sur le droit à la sécurité qui est totalement disproportionné à l'avantage obtenu. Ils conviennent de supprimer le mot « prostitution » dans la définition de « maison de débauche », mais suspendent l'effet de l'invalidation pendant 12 mois.

[27] Ils opinent que l'interdiction du proxénétisme n'est pas arbitraire, contrairement à ce qu'affirme la juge de première instance, mais que sa portée est trop grande et qu'elle est totalement disproportionnée par ses effets. Toutefois, au lieu d'invalider la disposition, ils en restreignent la portée en l'interprétant largement comme si les mots [TRADUCTION] « dans des situations d'exploitation » y étaient employés (par. 267).

[28] Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel concluent que l'interdiction de communiquer en public à des fins de prostitution est constitutionnelle. Même si elle porte atteinte à la sécurité de la personne, elle est conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. La disposition vise à empêcher les nuisances causées par le racolage, et elle n'est pas arbitraire. Elle a permis d'assurer la quiétude des quartiers résidentiels. Sa portée n'est pas trop grande et elle n'est pas totalement disproportionnée. Pour arriver à la conclusion que la disposition est totalement disproportionnée, la juge de première instance a eu tort de sous-estimer l'objectif sans égard à la preuve et d'accorder trop d'importance aux répercussions sur le droit à la sécurité des prostituées. La preuve ne démontrait pas que l'impossibilité de communiquer avec des clients contribuait aux ennuis des prostituées au point d'avoir un effet totalement disproportionné à l'avantage obtenu. Les juges majoritaires s'estiment également liés par le Renvoi sur la prostitution et ils concluent que la disposition porte atteinte à la liberté garantie à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte, mais que cette atteinte est justifiée au regard de l'article premier de la Charte.

[29] The minority, per MacPherson J.A. (dissenting only on this one issue), would have struck down the communicating prohibition under ss. 7 and 1 of the Charter as grossly disproportionate to the legislative objective of combatting social nuisance. The minority found that: (1) its effects were equally or more serious than the other provision; (2) the application judge correctly stated the objective of the provision; (3) the record supported the conclusion that screening is an essential tool for safety; (4) beyond screening, the provision adversely impacts safety by forcing prostitutes to work in isolated and dangerous areas; (5) the provision impacts the most vulnerable class of prostitutes, street workers, raising s. 15 equality concerns; (6) the recent decision of this Court in Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 134, supports the conclusion that the provision violates s. 7; and (7) the compounding effect of legislation that drives prostitutes onto the streets and then denies them the ability to evaluate prospective clients supports unconstitutionality. This conclusion made it unnecessary for the minority to consider s. 2(b) of the Charter.

[29] Sous la plume du juge MacPherson, les juges minoritaires (dissidents sur ce seul point) auraient invalidé l'interdiction de communiquer à des fins de prostitution sur le fondement de l'art. 7 et de l'article premier de la Charte au motif qu'elle est totalement disproportionnée à l'objectif législatif de réprimer la nuisance sociale. Selon eux, (1) ses répercussions sont aussi graves, sinon plus, que celles des autres dispositions, (2) la juge de première instance a correctement énoncé l'objectif de la disposition, (3) le dossier permettait de conclure que l'évaluation du client est essentielle à la sécurité des prostituées, (4) la disposition empêche non seulement cette évaluation, mais nuit à la sécurité des prostituées en les obligeant à travailler dans des endroits isolés et dangereux, (5) la disposition a des répercussions sur les prostituées les plus vulnérables, celles de la rue, ce qui compromet le droit à l'égalité garanti à l'art. 15, (6) notre récent arrêt Canada (Procureur général) c. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 CSC 44, [2011] 3 R.C.S. 134 appuie la conclusion d'atteinte au droit garanti à l'art. 7 et (7) l'effet combiné de mesures législatives ayant pour effet d'obliger les prostituées à exercer leurs activités dans la rue tout en les empêchant de jauger leurs clients éventuels va également dans le sens de l'inconstitutionnalité. Cette conclusion des juges minoritaires les dispense d'examiner l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte.

[30] In the course of arriving at its conclusions, the majority of the Court of Appeal made a number of ancillary observations of importance.

[30] Pour en arriver à leurs conclusions, les juges majoritaires formulent accessoirement un certain nombre d'observations importantes.

[31] In considering the doctrine of stare decisis and whether the application judge was bound by the Prostitution Reference, the court adopted a narrow view of when a trial judge can reconsider previous decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada on the basis of changes in the social, economic or political landscapes: the trial judge cannot change the law, but is limited to making findings of fact and credibility to create the necessary evidentiary record which the Supreme Court of Canada can then consider. Reasons that justify a court departing from its own prior decisions cannot justify a lower court revisiting binding authority. This applies to determining what constitutes a reasonable limit on a right under s. 1 of the Charter (paras. 75-76).

[32] On the standard of causation required to engage s. 7, the Court of Appeal held that the traditional causation analysis is inappropriate where it is legislation, and not the actions of a government official, that is said to have interfered with a s. 7 interest. Rather, the judge should conduct a practical, pragmatic analysis to determine what the legislation prohibits or requires, its impact on the persons affected, and whether this amounts to an interference with protected rights (paras. 107-9).

[33] On the issue of deference to findings of fact of the application judge, the Court of Appeal held that findings on social and legislative facts are not entitled to appellate deference, while findings on the credibility of affiants and the objectivity of expert witnesses attract deference (paras. 128-31).

[34] Regarding the purpose of the laws, the court rejected the Attorney General of Ontario's submission that there was an overarching legislative objective to eradicate, or at least discourage, prostitution. Rather, the purpose of each of the laws must be independently ascertained with reference to its unique historical context (paras. 165-70).

[35] On the principles of fundamental justice, the Court of Appeal held that arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality each use a different filter to examine the connection between the law and the legislative objective. Arbitrariness is the absence of any link between the objective of the law and its negative impact on security of the person. Overbreadth addresses the situation where the law imposes limits on security of the person that go beyond what is required to achieve its objective. Gross disproportionality describes the case where the effects of the impugned law are so extreme that they cannot be justified by its object (paras. 143-49).

juridiction inférieure de remettre en question un arrêt qui la lie. Ce principe vaut lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer ce qui constitue une limite raisonnable à l'exercice d'un droit au sens de l'article premier de la Charte (par. 75-76).

[32] S'agissant de la causalité requise pour emporter l'application de l'art. 7, la Cour d'appel explique que l'analyse traditionnelle ne convient pas lorsque ce sont les dispositions d'une loi, et non les actes d'un fonctionnaire, qui auraient porté atteinte à un droit garanti par l'art. 7. Il faut plutôt recourir à une analyse factuelle et pragmatique pour déterminer ce que les dispositions interdisent ou prescrivent, quelles sont leurs répercussions sur les intéressés et s'il en résulte une atteinte à un droit garanti (par. 107-109).

[33] En ce qui concerne la déférence qui s'impose à l'égard des conclusions de fait tirées en première instance, la Cour d'appel opine que les conclusions sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs ne commandent pas la déférence de la juridiction d'appel, tandis que celles sur la crédibilité des déposants et l'objectivité des témoins experts la commandent (par. 128-131).

[35] Quant aux principes de justice fondamentale, la Cour d'appel statue que le caractère arbitraire, la portée trop grande et le caractère totalement disproportionné appellent des examens sous des angles différents du lien entre la disposition contestée et l'objectif législatif. Le caractère arbitraire s'entend de l'absence de rapport entre l'objectif de la loi et ses effets préjudiciables sur la sécurité de la personne. Une disposition a une portée trop grande lorsqu'elle limite le droit à la sécurité de la personne plus qu'il n'est nécessaire pour atteindre son objectif. Une disposition est par ailleurs totalement disproportionnée lorsque ses répercussions sont si extrêmes qu'elles ne peuvent être justifiées par son objet (par. 143-149).

IV. Discussion

[36] The appellant Attorneys General appeal from the Court of Appeal's declaration that ss. 210 and 212(1)(j) of the Code are unconstitutional. The respondents cross-appeal on the issue of the constitutionality of s. 213(1)(c), and in respect of the Court of Appeal's remedy to resolve the unconstitutionality of s. 210.

[37] Before turning to the Charter arguments before us, I will first discuss two preliminary issues: (1) whether the 1990 decision in the Prostitution Reference, upholding the bawdy-house and communication prohibitions, is binding on trial judges and this Court; and (2) the degree of deference to be accorded to the application judge's findings on social and legislative facts.

A. Preliminary Issues

(1) Revisiting the Prostitution Reference

[38] Certainty in the law requires that courts follow and apply authoritative precedents. Indeed, this is the foundational principle upon which the common law relies.

[39] The issue of when, if ever, such precedents may be departed from takes two forms. The first "vertical" question is when, if ever, a lower court may depart from a precedent established by a higher court. The second "horizontal" question is when a court such as the Supreme Court of Canada may depart from its own precedents.

[40] In this case, the precedent in question is the Supreme Court of Canada's 1990 advisory opinion in the Prostitution Reference, which upheld the constitutionality of the prohibitions on

IV. Analyse

[36] Les procureurs généraux appelants se pourvoient contre le jugement de la Cour d'appel qui déclare inconstitutionnels l'art. 210 et l'al. 212(1)j) du Code. Les intimées se pourvoient de manière incidente relativement à la constitutionnalité de l'al. 213(1)c) et à la mesure prise par la Cour d'appel pour remédier à l'inconstitutionnalité de l'art. 210.

[37] Avant de passer aux moyens fondés sur la Charte, j'examine d'abord deux questions préliminaires. Premièrement, les juges de première instance et notre Cour sont-ils liés par le Renvoi sur la prostitution de 1990, qui confirme la validité des dispositions interdisant les maisons de débauche et la communication à des fins de prostitution? Deuxièmement, quel degré de déférence commandent les conclusions tirées en première instance sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs?

A. Questions préliminaires

(1) Réexamen du Renvoi sur la prostitution

[38] La notion de certitude du droit exige que les tribunaux suivent et appliquent les précédents qui font autorité. C'est d'ailleurs l'assise fondamentale de la common law.

[39] La question de savoir à quelles conditions il est possible de s'écarter d'un précédent, le cas échéant, se présente de deux manières. Elle se pose premièrement du point de vue « hiérarchique ». À quelles conditions une juridiction inférieure peut-elle, le cas échéant, s'écarter du précédent établi par une juridiction supérieure? Elle se pose deuxièmement du point de vue « collégial ». À quelles conditions une juridiction comme notre Cour peut-elle, le cas échéant, s'écarter de ses propres précédents?

[40] Dans la présente affaire, le précédent correspond à l'avis consultatif de la Cour dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution de 1990, qui confirme la constitutionnalité des interdictions faites par deux des bawdy-houses and communicating — two of the three provisions challenged in this case. The questions in that case were whether the laws infringed s. 7 or s. 2(b) of the Charter, and, if so, whether the limit was justified under s. 1. The Court concluded that neither of the impugned laws were inconsistent with s. 7, and that although the communicating law infringed s. 2(b), it was a justifiable limit under s. 1 of the Charter. While reference opinions may not be legally binding, in practice they have been followed (G. Rubin, "The Nature, Use and Effect of Reference Cases in Canadian Constitutional Law" (1960), 6 McGill L.J. 168, at p. 175).

[41] The application judge in this case held that she could revisit those conclusions because: the legal issues under s. 7 were different, in light of the evolution of the law in that area; the evidentiary record was richer and provided research not available in 1990; the social, political and economic assumptions underlying the Prostitution Reference no longer applied; and the type of expression at issue in that case (commercial expression) differed from the expression at issue in this case (expression promoting safety). The Court of Appeal disagreed with respect to the s. 2(b) issue, holding that a trial judge asked to depart from a precedent on the basis of new evidence, or new social, political or economic assumptions, may make findings of fact for consideration by the higher courts, but cannot apply them to arrive at a different conclusion from the previous precedent (para. 76).

[42] In my view, a trial judge can consider and decide arguments based on Charter provisions that were not raised in the earlier case; this constitutes a new legal issue. Similarly, the matter may be revisited if new legal issues are raised as a consequence of significant developments in the law, or if there is a change in the circumstances or evidence trois dispositions contestées en l'espèce de tenir une maison de débauche et communiquer à des fins de prostitution. Dans ce renvoi, la Cour devait décider si les dispositions portaient atteinte au droit ou à la liberté garantis à l'art. 7 ou à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte et, dans l'affirmative, si cette limite était justifiée par application de l'article premier. Elle conclut que ni l'une ni l'autre des dispositions ne sont incompatibles avec l'art. 7 et que, même si l'interdiction de communiquer à des fins de prostitution porte atteinte à une liberté garantie à l'al. 2*b*), il s'agit d'une limite justifiable suivant l'article premier de la Charte. Bien que les avis consultatifs puissent ne pas être juridiquement contraignants, dans les faits, il sont suivis (G. Rubin, « The Nature, Use and Effect of Reference Cases in Canadian Constitutional Law » (1960), 6 R.D. McGill 168, p. 175).

[41] La juge de première instance dit pouvoir réexaminer les conclusions tirées dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution parce que les questions de droit soulevées relativement à l'art. 7 sont différentes étant donné l'évolution du droit dans le domaine, que le dossier de preuve est plus étoffé et fait état de résultats de recherches qui n'étaient pas disponibles en 1990, que les données sociales, politiques et économiques sous-jacentes ne sont plus valables et que l'expression alors en cause (commerciale) diffère de celle considérée dans la présente affaire (celle qui contribue à la sécurité). La Cour d'appel exprime son désaccord au sujet de l'al. 2*b*) et explique que le tribunal de première instance invité à rompre avec un précédent en raison de nouveaux éléments de preuve ou de nouvelles données sociales, politiques ou économiques peut tirer des conclusions de fait susceptibles d'être examinées ensuite par une juridiction supérieure, mais ne peut les appliquer pour arriver à une solution différente de celle retenue dans le précédent (par. 76).

[42] À mon avis, le juge du procès peut se pencher puis se prononcer sur une prétention d'ordre constitutionnel qui n'a pas été invoquée dans l'affaire antérieure; il s'agit alors d'une nouvelle question de droit. De même, le sujet peut être réexaminé lorsque de nouvelles questions de droit sont soulevées par suite d'une évolution importante du droit ou qu'une that fundamentally shifts the parameters of the debate.

[43] The intervener, the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights, argues that the common law principle of stare decisis is subordinate to the Constitution and cannot require a court to uphold a law which is unconstitutional. It submits that lower courts should not be limited to acting as "mere scribe[s]", creating a record and findings without conducting a legal analysis (I.F., at para. 25).

[44] I agree. As the David Asper Centre also noted, however, a lower court is not entitled to ignore binding precedent, and the threshold for revisiting a matter is not an easy one to reach. In my view, as discussed above, this threshold is met when a new legal issue is raised, or if there is a significant change in the circumstances or evidence. This balances the need for finality and stability with the recognition that when an appropriate case arises for revisiting precedent, a lower court must be able to perform its full role.

[45] It follows that the application judge in this case was entitled to rule on whether the laws in question violated the security of the person interests under s. 7 of the Charter. In the Prostitution Reference, the majority decision was based on the s. 7 physical liberty interest alone. Only Lamer J., writing for himself, touched on security of the person — and then, only in the context of economic interests. Contrary to the submission of the Attorney General of Canada, whether the s. 7 interest at issue is economic liberty or security of the person is not "a distinction without a difference" (A.F., at para. 94). The rights protected by s. 7 are "independent interests, each of which must be given independent significance by the Court" (R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30, at p. 52). Furthermore, the principles of fundamental justice considered in the Prostitution Reference dealt with vagueness and the permissibility of indirect criminalization. The principles raised in this case — arbitrariness, modification de la situation ou de la preuve change radicalement la donne.

[43] L'intervenant David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights fait valoir que la règle du stare decisis propre à la common law est subordonnée à la Constitution et ne saurait avoir pour effet d'obliger un tribunal à valider une loi inconstitutionnelle. À son avis, une juridiction inférieure ne doit pas s'en tenir au rôle de [TRADUCTION] « simple exécutant » qui constitue un dossier et tire des conclusions sans se livrer à l'analyse du droit (m.i., par. 25).

[44] Je partage cet avis. Mais comme le signale aussi l'intervenant, la juridiction inférieure ne peut faire abstraction d'un précédent qui fait autorité, et la barre est haute lorsqu'il s'agit de justifier le réexamen d'un précédent. Rappelons que, selon moi, le réexamen est justifié lorsqu'une nouvelle question de droit se pose ou qu'il y a modification importante de la situation ou de la preuve. Cette approche met en balance les impératifs que sont le caractère définitif et la stabilité avec la reconnaissance du fait qu'une juridiction inférieure doit pouvoir exercer pleinement sa fonction lorsqu'elle est aux prises avec une situation où il convient de revoir un précédent.

[45] Il s'ensuit que, en l'espèce, la juge pouvait trancher la question de savoir si les dispositions en cause respectaient ou non le droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti à l'art. 7 de la Charte. Dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, les juges majoritaires statuent uniquement en fonction du droit à la liberté physique de la personne garanti à l'art. 7. Seul le juge Lamer, qui s'exprime en son nom personnel, aborde la question de la sécurité de la personne, et ce, dans le seul contexte des droits économiques. Contrairement à ce que prétend le procureur général du Canada, le fait que le droit en cause garanti par l'art. 7 soit celui à la liberté économique ou à la sécurité de la personne *n'*est pas [TRADUCTION] « une distinction sans importance » (m.a., par. 94). Les droits garantis à l'art. 7 sont des « intérêts indépendants auxquels la Cour doit respectivement donner un sens indépendant » (R. c. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 R.C.S. 30, p. 52). Qui plus est, dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, la Cour a examiné les overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — have, to a large extent, developed only in the last 20 years.

[46] These considerations do not apply to the question of whether the communication provision is a justified limit on freedom of expression. That issue was decided in the Prostitution Reference. Re-characterizing the type of expression alleged to be infringed did not convert this argument into a new legal issue, nor did the more current evidentiary record or the shift in attitudes and perspectives amount to a change in the circumstances or evidence that fundamentally shifted the parameters of the debate.

[47] This brings me to the question of whether this Court should depart from its previous decision on the s. 2(b) aspect of this case. At heart, this is a balancing exercise, in which the Court must weigh correctness against certainty (Canada v. Craig, 2012 SCC 43, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 489, at para. 27). In this case, however, it is not necessary to determine whether this Court can depart from its s. 2(b) conclusion in the Prostitution Reference, since it is possible to resolve the case entirely on s. 7 grounds.

(2) Deference to the Application Judge's Findings on Social and Legislative Facts

[48] The Court of Appeal held that the application judge's findings on social and legislative facts — that is, facts about society at large, established by complex social science evidence — were not entitled to deference. With respect, I cannot agree. As this Court stated in Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235, appellate courts should not interfere with a trial judge's findings of fact, absent a palpable and overriding error.

principes de justice fondamentale sous l'angle de l'imprécision de la criminalisation indirecte et de son acceptabilité. En l'espèce, ce sont le caractère arbitraire, la portée trop grande et le caractère totalement disproportionné qui sont allégués, des notions qui ont en grande partie vu le jour au cours des 20 dernières années.

[46] Ces considérations sont étrangères à la question — tranchée dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution — de savoir si la disposition qui interdit la communication constitue une limitation justifiée de la liberté d'expression. Qualifier différemment l'expression à laquelle il aurait été porté atteinte en l'espèce ne fait pas naître une nouvelle question de droit, et ni une preuve actualisée, ni l'évolution des mentalités et des points de vue n'équivalent à une modification de la situation ou de la preuve qui change radicalement la donne.

[47] Passons à la question de savoir si, en l'espèce, notre Cour doit rompre ou non avec une décision antérieure concernant l'application de l'al. 2*b*). Il nous faut essentiellement mettre en balance deux éléments : la justesse et la certitude (Canada c. Craig, 2012 CSC 43, [2012] 2 R.C.S. 489, par. 27). Dans le présent dossier, toutefois, il n'est pas nécessaire de déterminer si notre Cour peut rompre avec la conclusion qu'elle a tirée sur l'application de l'al. 2*b*) dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution puisqu'il est possible de trancher sur le fondement du seul art. 7.

(2) Déférence envers les conclusions tirées en première instance sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs

[48] La Cour d'appel se dit d'avis que les conclusions de la juge sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs — qui intéressent la société en général et qui sont établis au moyen d'une preuve complexe relevant des sciences sociales — ne commandent pas la déférence. Je ne puis malheureusement souscrire à son opinion. Comme le dit notre Cour dans Housen c. Nikolaisen, 2002 CSC 33, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 235, une cour d'appel doit se garder de modifier les conclusions de fait tirées en première instance, sauf erreur manifeste et dominante.

[49] When social and legislative evidence is put before a judge of first instance, the judge's duty is to evaluate and weigh that evidence in order to arrive at the conclusions of fact necessary to decide the case. The trial judge is charged with the responsibility of establishing the record on which subsequent appeals are founded. Absent reviewable error in the trial judge's appreciation of the evidence, a court of appeal should not interfere with the trial judge's conclusions on social and legislative facts. This division of labour is basic to our court system. The first instance judge determines the facts; appeal courts review the decision for correctness in law or palpable and overriding error in fact. This applies to social and legislative facts as much as to findings of fact as to what happened in a particular case.

[50] There are two important practical reasons not to depart from the usual standard of review simply because social or legislative facts are at issue.

[51] First, to do so would require the appeal court to duplicate the sometimes time-consuming and tedious work of the first instance judge in reviewing all the material and reconciling differences between the experts, studies and research results. A new set of judges would need to take the hours if not weeks required to intimately appreciate and analyze the evidence. And counsel for the parties would be required to take the appellate judges through all the evidence once again so they could draw their own conclusions. All this would increase the costs and delay in the litigation process. In a review for error — which is what an appeal is — it makes more sense to have counsel point out alleged errors in the trial judge's conclusions on the evidence and confine the court of appeal to determining whether those errors vitiate the trial judge's conclusions.

[52] Second, social and legislative facts may be intertwined with adjudicative facts — that is, the facts of the case at hand — and with issues of credibility of experts. To posit a different standard of review for adjudicative facts and the credibility of

[50] Deux raisons importantes d'ordre pratique militent contre la mise au rancart de la norme de contrôle habituelle seulement parce que des faits sociaux ou législatifs sont en cause.

[51] En premier lieu, la juridiction d'appel devrait alors reprendre le travail parfois long et fastidieux qui consiste à examiner tous les éléments et à concilier les divergences entre les experts, les études et les résultats de recherches. Une nouvelle formation de juges devrait passer des heures, voire des semaines, à prendre connaissance de la preuve et à l'analyser. Et les avocats des parties devraient examiner la preuve avec ces juges une fois de plus afin que ces derniers puissent tirer leurs propres conclusions. Il en résulterait une augmentation du coût et de la durée de la procédure judiciaire. Lorsqu'il s'agit de rechercher une erreur éventuelle — ce qui est le propre d'un appel —, il est plus sensé de demander aux avocats de signaler toute erreur qui entacherait les conclusions tirées de la preuve en première instance, de sorte que la juridiction d'appel n'ait qu'à décider si l'erreur vicie les conclusions.

[52] En second lieu, les faits sociaux ou législatifs peuvent s'entremêler avec les faits en litige — les faits de l'espèce — et avec les questions liées à la crédibilité des experts. Appliquer une norme de contrôle aux faits en litige ainsi qu'à la crédibilité affiants and expert witnesses on the one hand, and social and legislative facts on the other (as proposed by the Court of Appeal), is to ask the impossible of courts of appeal. Untangling the different sources of those conclusions and applying different standards of review to them would immensely complicate the appellate task.

[53] As the Attorney General of Canada points out, this Court's decision in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, suggested that legislative fact findings are owed less deference. However, the use of social science evidence in Charter litigation has evolved significantly since RJR-MacDonald was decided. In the intervening years, this Court has expressed a preference for social science evidence to be presented through an expert witness (R. v. Malmo-Levine, 2003 SCC 74, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 571, at paras 26-28; R. v. Spence, 2005 SCC 71, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 458, at para. 68). The assessment of expert evidence relies heavily on the trial judge (R. v. Abbey, 2009 ONCA 624, 97 O.R. (3d) 330, at paras. 62-96). This is particularly so in the wake of the Ontario report by Justice Goudge, which emphasized the role of the trial judge in preventing miscarriages of justice flowing from flawed expert evidence (Inquiry into Pediatric Forensic Pathology in Ontario: Report, vol. 3, Policy and Recommendations (2008)). The distinction between adjudicative and legislative facts can no longer justify gradations of deference.

[54] This case illustrates the problem. The application judge arrived at her conclusions on the impact of the impugned laws on s. 7 security interests on the basis of the personal evidence of the applicants, the evidence of affiants and experts, and documentary evidence in the form of studies, reports of expert panels and Parliamentary records. The Court of Appeal conceded that it must accord deference to her findings of adjudicative facts and the credibility of affiants and experts, but said it owes no deference to findings on social and legislative facts. The task des déposants et des témoins experts et en appliquer une autre aux faits sociaux ou législatifs (comme le propose la Cour d'appel) revient à demander l'impossible aux juridictions d'appel. Démêler les différentes sources de ces conclusions et les soumettre à des normes de contrôle différentes compliqueraient immensément la tâche de la juridiction d'appel.

[53] Le procureur général du Canada souligne que, dans l'arrêt RJR-MacDonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 R.C.S. 199, notre Cour affirme que les conclusions relatives aux faits législatifs commandent un degré de déférence moins élevé. Or, le recours à des éléments de preuve relevant des sciences sociales dans les affaires portant sur l'application de la Charte a beaucoup évolué depuis cet arrêt. Dans les années qui ont suivi, notre Cour a dit préférer que de tels éléments de preuve soient présentés par des témoins experts (R. c. Malmo-Levine, 2003 CSC 74, [2003] 3 R.C.S. 571, par. 26-28; R. c. Spence, 2005 CSC 71, [2005] 3 R.C.S. 458, par. 68). L'appréciation du témoignage d'un expert relève au premier chef du juge du procès (R. c. Abbey, 2009 ONCA 624, 97 O.R. (3d) 330, par. 62-96), surtout depuis le rapport établi en Ontario par le juge Goudge qui met en évidence le rôle du juge du procès dans la prévention des erreurs judiciaires imputables aux témoignages d'experts déficients (Commission d'enquête sur la médecine légale pédiatrique en Ontario : Rapport, vol. 3, Politique et recommandations (2008)). La distinction entre les faits en litige et les faits législatifs ne peut plus justifier des degrés différents de déférence.

[54] La présente affaire constitue un bon exemple. La juge de première instance tire ses propres conclusions concernant l'effet des dispositions contestées sur le droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti à l'art. 7 à partir du témoignage des demanderesses, des déposants et des experts, ainsi que de la preuve documentaire constituée d'études, de rapports de comités d'experts et de documents parlementaires. La Cour d'appel concède qu'elle doit déférer aux conclusions de la juge sur les faits en litige ainsi que sur la crédibilité des déposants of applying different standards of review when the evidence is intertwined would be daunting.

[55] It is suggested that no deference is required on social and legislative facts because appellate courts are in as good a position to evaluate such evidence as trial judges. If this were so, adjudicative facts presented only in affidavit form would similarly be owed less deference. Yet this Court has been clear that, absent express statutory instruction, there is no middling standard of review for findings of fact (H.L. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 401). Furthermore, this view does not meet the concerns of duplication of effort and the intertwining of such evidence with other kinds of evidence. Nor does it address the point that the appellate task is not to review evidence globally, but rather to review the conclusions the first instance judge has drawn from the evidence.

[56] For these reasons, I am of the view that a no-deference standard of appellate review for social and legislative facts should be rejected. The standard of review for findings of fact — whether adjudicative, social, or legislative — remains palpable and overriding error.

B. Section 7 Analysis

[57] In the discussion that follows, I first consider whether the applicants have established that the impugned laws impose limits on security of the person, thus engaging s. 7. I then examine the argument of the appellant Attorneys General that the laws do not cause the alleged harms. I go on to consider whether any limits on security of the person are in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

et des experts, mais elle refuse de faire preuve de déférence à l'endroit de ses conclusions sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs. Appliquer des normes de contrôle différentes à des éléments de preuve entremêlés représenterait une tâche colossale.

[55] On laisse entendre qu'il n'y a pas lieu de déférer aux conclusions sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs, car une juridiction d'appel est aussi bien placée qu'un juge de première instance pour les apprécier. Si tel était le cas, un fait en litige établi uniquement au moyen d'un affidavit aurait donc droit à un degré de déférence moindre. Or, notre Cour précise qu'à défaut d'un libellé exprès en ce sens, aucune norme de contrôle intermédiaire ne s'applique aux conclusions de fait (H.L. c. Canada (Procureur général), 2005 CSC 25, [2005] 1 R.C.S. 401). De plus, ce n'est pas de nature à apaiser la crainte d'un dédoublement de l'examen et d'un entremêlement de tels éléments de preuve avec d'autres. C'est méconnaître également la fonction d'une juridiction d'appel, qui ne consiste pas à examiner la preuve globalement, mais à s'en tenir aux conclusions que le juge de première instance a tirées à partir de la preuve.

B. Analyse fondée sur l'art. 7

[57] Dans l'analyse qui suit, j'examine d'abord si les demanderesses ont démontré que les dispositions en cause restreignent le droit à la sécurité de la personne et mettent ainsi en jeu l'art. 7. Je me penche ensuite sur la thèse des procureurs généraux appelants selon laquelle les dispositions n'ont pas l'effet attentatoire allégué. Je poursuis en me demandant si la limite apportée le cas échéant au droit à la sécurité de la personne est conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

(1) Is Security of the Person Engaged?

[58] Section 7 provides that the state cannot deny a person's right to life, liberty or security of the person, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. At this stage, the question is whether the impugned laws negatively impact or limit the applicants' security of the person, thus bringing them within the ambit of, or engaging, s. 7 of the Charter.[1]

[59] Here, the applicants argue that the prohibitions on bawdy-houses, living on the avails of prostitution, and communicating in public for the purposes of prostitution, heighten the risks they face in prostitution — itself a legal activity. The application judge found that the evidence supported this proposition and the Court of Appeal agreed.

[60] For reasons set out below, I am of the same view. The prohibitions at issue do not merely impose conditions on how prostitutes operate. They go a critical step further, by imposing dangerous conditions on prostitution; they prevent people engaged in a risky — but legal — activity from taking steps to protect themselves from the risks.

1 The focus is on security of the person, not liberty, for three reasons. First, the Prostitution Reference decided that the communicating and bawdy-house provisions engage liberty, and it is binding on this point. The security of the person argument is a novel issue and an important reason why the application judge was able to revisit the Prostitution Reference. Second, it is not clear that any of the applicants' personal liberty interests are engaged by the living on the avails provision; rather, they have pleaded that they fear that it could apply to their employees or their loved ones. Lastly, it seems to me that the real gravamen of the complaint is not that breaking the law engages the applicants' liberty, but rather that compliance with the laws infringes the applicants' security of the person.

(1) Le droit à la sécurité de la personne est-il en jeu?

[59] En l'espèce, les demanderesses soutiennent que l'interdiction des maisons de débauche, du proxénétisme et de la communication en public à des fins de prostitution augmente les risques auxquels elles s'exposent lorsqu'elles se livrent à la prostitution, une activité qui est en soi légale. La juge de première instance conclut que la preuve va dans ce sens, et la Cour d'appel lui donne raison.

[60] Pour les motifs qui suivent, je suis du même avis. Le législateur ne se contente pas d'encadrer la pratique de la prostitution. Il franchit un pas supplémentaire déterminant qui l'amène à imposer des conditions dangereuses à la pratique de la prostitution : les interdictions empêchent des personnes qui se livrent à une activité risquée, mais légale, de prendre des mesures pour assurer leur propre protection contre les risques ainsi courus.

1 L'accent est mis sur la sécurité de la personne, non sur la liberté, pour trois raisons. Premièrement, le Renvoi sur la prostitution établit que les dispositions relatives à la communication et aux maisons de débauche mettent en jeu le droit à la liberté et il fait autorité sur ce point. Le moyen fondé sur le droit à la sécurité de la personne est nouveau et justifie amplement le réexamen du renvoi par la juge de première instance. Deuxièmement, on ne saurait dire avec certitude que le droit à la liberté des demanderesses est mis en jeu par la disposition relative au proxénétisme; les demanderesses disent en fait craindre l'application de la disposition à leurs employés ou à leurs proches. Enfin, il me semble que les demanderesses prétendent essentiellement dans les faits non pas que l'inobservation de la loi porte atteinte à leur droit à la liberté, mais plutôt que son respect porte atteinte à leur droit à la sécurité.

(a) Sections 197 and 210: Keeping a Common Bawdy-House

[61] It is not an offence to sell sex for money. The bawdy-house provisions, however, make it an offence to do so in any "place" that is "kept or occupied" or "resorted to" for the purpose of prostitution (ss. 197 and 210(1) of the Code). The reach of these provisions is broad. "Place" includes any defined space, even if unenclosed and used only temporarily (s. 197(1) of the Code; R. v. Pierce (1982), 37 O.R. (2d) 721 (C.A.)). And by definition, it applies even if resorted to by only one person (s. 197(1); R. v. Worthington (1972), 10 C.C.C. (2d) 311 (Ont. C.A.)).

[62] The practical effect of s. 210 is to confine lawful prostitution to two categories: street prostitution and out-calls (application decision, at para. 385). In-calls, where the john comes to the prostitute's residence, are prohibited. Out-calls, where the prostitute goes out and meets the client at a designated location, such as the client's home, are allowed. Working on the street is also permitted, though the practice of street prostitution is significantly limited by the prohibition on communicating in public (s. 213(1)(c)).

[63] The application judge found, on a balance of probabilities, that the safest form of prostitution is working independently from a fixed location (para. 300). She concluded that indoor work is far less dangerous than street prostitution — a finding that the evidence amply supports. She also concluded that out-call work is not as safe as in-call work, particularly under the current regime where prostitutes are precluded by virtue of the living on the avails provision from hiring a driver or security guard. Since the bawdy-house provision makes the safety-enhancing method of in-call prostitution illegal, the application judge concluded that the bawdy-house prohibition materially increased the risk prostitutes face under the present regime. I agree.

a) Articles 197 et 210 : Tenue d'une maison de débauche [62] Dans les faits, l'art. 210 limite à deux les modalités d'exercice d'une activité légale : la prostitution dans la rue et la prostitution « itinérante » (décision de première instance, par. 385). La prostitution pratiquée chez soi, où la prostituée reçoit ses clients chez elle, est interdite. La prostitution itinérante, où la prostituée rejoint le client dans un lieu convenu, telle la résidence de ce dernier, est permise. Il en est de même de la prostitution dans la rue, bien que celle-ci soit considérablement limitée par l'interdiction de communiquer en public (al. 213(1)c)).

[61] Offrir ses services sexuels contre de l'argent ne constitue pas une infraction. Toutefois, la disposition relative aux maisons de débauche dispose qu'est coupable d'un acte criminel quiconque tient une maison de débauche dans un « local » qui est « tenu ou occupé » ou « employé » à des fins de prostitution (art. 197 et par. 210(1) du Code). Sa portée est grande. On entend par « local » ou « endroit » tout lieu défini, même s'il n'est pas enclos et n'est employé que temporairement (par. 197(1) du Code; R. c. Pierce (1982), 37 O.R. (2d) 721 (C.A.)). De plus, il y a « local » ou « endroit » au sens de cette définition même lorsque le lieu est utilisé par une seule personne (par. 197(1); R. c. Worthington (1972), 10 C.C.C. (2d) 311 (C.A. Ont.)).

[64] First, the prohibition prevents prostitutes from working in a fixed indoor location, which would be safer than working on the streets or meeting clients at different locations, especially given the current prohibition on hiring drivers or security guards. This, in turn, prevents prostitutes from having a regular clientele and from setting up indoor safeguards like receptionists, assistants, bodyguards and audio room monitoring, which would reduce risks (application decision, at para. 421). Second, it interferes with provision of health checks and preventive health measures. Finally — a point developed in argument before us — the bawdy-house prohibition prevents resort to safe houses, to which prostitutes working on the street can take clients. In Vancouver, for example, "Grandma's House" was established to support street workers in the Downtown Eastside, at about the same time as fears were growing that a serial killer was prowling the streets — fears which materialized in the notorious Robert Pickton. Street prostitutes — who the application judge found are largely the most vulnerable class of prostitutes, and who face an alarming amount of violence (para. 361) — were able to bring clients to Grandma's House. However, charges were laid under s. 210, and although the charges were eventually stayed — four years after they were laid — Grandma's House was shut down (supplementary affidavit of Dr. John Lowman, May 6, 2009, J.A.R., vol. 20, at p. 5744). For some prostitutes, particularly those who are destitute, safe houses such as Grandma's House may be critical. For these people, the ability to work in brothels or hire security, even if those activities were lawful, may be illusory.

[64] Premièrement, l'interdiction empêche les prostituées de travailler dans un lieu fixe, situé à l'intérieur, ce qui est plus sûr que de travailler dans la rue ou d'aller à la rencontre des différents clients, d'autant plus que l'interdiction actuelle empêche l'embauche d'un chauffeur ou d'un garde de sécurité. L'interdiction les empêche également de se constituer une clientèle et de prendre des précautions chez elles en embauchant par exemple un réceptionniste, un assistant ou un garde du corps et en installant des dispositifs de surveillance audio, de manière à réduire le risque couru (décision de première instance, par. 421). Deuxièmement, elle empêche les prostituées de faire certaines vérifications sur l'état de santé des clients et de prendre des mesures sanitaires préventives. Enfin, lors de la plaidoirie devant notre Cour, on a fait valoir que l'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche empêche l'existence d'endroits sûrs où les prostituées peuvent emmener les clients recrutés dans la rue. À Vancouver, par exemple, la « Grandma's House » a été créée pour venir en aide aux prostituées du Downtown Eastside à peu près à la même époque où les craintes allaient croissant quant à la possibilité qu'un tueur en série sévisse dans le quartier (des craintes que les actes imputés au tristement célèbre Robert Pickton ont justifiées). Les prostituées de la rue — qui, selon la juge de première instance, sont de loin les plus vulnérables et font l'objet d'un nombre alarmant d'actes de violence (par. 361) — pouvaient se rendre à la Grandma's House en compagnie de leurs clients. Toutefois, le refuge a fait l'objet d'accusations fondées sur l'art. 210, et même s'il y a eu arrêt des procédures quatre ans après, la Grandma's House a finalement fermé ses portes (affidavit complémentaire du D^r^ John Lowman en date du 6 mai 2009, d.c.d., vol. 20, p. 5744). L'existence d'un établissement sûr comme Grandma's House peut être indispensable à certaines prostituées, en particulier celles qui sont démunies. Pour elles, la possibilité de travailler dans un bordel ou d'embaucher un garde de sécurité peut se révéler illusoire même s'il s'agit d'activités légales.

[65] I conclude, therefore, that the bawdy-house provision negatively impacts the security of the person of prostitutes and engages s. 7 of the Charter.

(b) Section 212(1)(j): Living on the Avails of Prostitution

[66] Section 212(1)(j) criminalizes living on the avails of prostitution of another person, wholly or in part. While targeting parasitic relationships (R. v. Downey, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 10), it has a broad reach. As interpreted by the courts, it makes it a crime for anyone to supply a service to a prostitute, because she is a prostitute (R. v. Grilo (1991), 2 O.R. (3d) 514 (C.A.); R. v. Barrow (2001), 54 O.R. (3d) 417 (C.A.)). In effect, it prevents a prostitute from hiring bodyguards, drivers and receptionists. The application judge found that by denying prostitutes access to these security-enhancing safeguards, the law prevented them from taking steps to reduce the risks they face and negatively impacted their security of the person (para. 361). As such, she found that the law engages s. 7 of the Charter.

[67] The evidence amply supports the judge's conclusion. Hiring drivers, receptionists, and bodyguards, could increase prostitutes' safety (application decision, at para. 421), but the law prevents them from doing so. Accordingly, I conclude that s. 212(1)(j) negatively impacts security of the person and engages s. 7.

(c) Section 213(1)(c): Communicating in a Public Place

[68] Section 213(1)(c) prohibits communicating or attempting to communicate for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute, in a public place or a place open to public view. The provision extends to conduct short of verbal communication by prohibiting stopping or attempting to stop any person for those purposes (R. v. Head (1987), 59 C.R. (3d) 80 (B.C.C.A.)).

le droit à la sécurité des prostituées et met en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte.

b) Alinéa 212(1)j) : Proxénétisme

[66] L'alinéa 212(1)j) criminalise le proxénétisme, c'est-à-dire le fait de vivre entièrement ou en partie des produits de la prostitution d'une autre personne. Bien qu'il vise le parasitisme (R. c. Downey, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 10), sa portée est grande. Suivant son interprétation par les tribunaux, commet un acte criminel quiconque fournit un service à une prostituée parce qu'elle est une prostituée (R. c. Grilo (1991), 2 O.R. (3d) 514 (C.A.); R. c. Barrow (2001), 54 O.R. (3d) 417 (C.A.)). Dans les faits, il empêche la prostituée d'engager un garde du corps, un chauffeur ou un réceptionniste. La juge de première instance conclut qu'en niant aux prostituées le droit de prendre de telles mesures susceptibles d'accroître leur sécurité, la disposition fait obstacle à la réduction des risques auxquels elles s'exposent et a un effet préjudiciable sur la sécurité de leur personne (par. 361). Elle statue donc que la disposition met en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte.

c) Alinéa 213(1)c) : Communication en public

[68] L'alinéa 213(1)c) interdit de communiquer ou de tenter de communiquer avec une personne en vue de se livrer à la prostitution ou d'obtenir les services sexuels d'une prostituée dans un endroit public ou situé à la vue du public. La disposition vise non seulement la communication verbale, mais aussi le fait d'arrêter ou de tenter d'arrêter une personne à ces fins (R. c. Head (1987), 59 C.R. (3d) 80 (C.A.C.-B.)).

[69] The application judge found that face-to-face communication is an "essential tool" in enhancing street prostitutes' safety (para. 432). Such communication, which the law prohibits, allows prostitutes to screen prospective clients for intoxication or propensity to violence, which can reduce the risks they face (paras. 301 and 421). This conclusion, based on the evidence before her, sufficed to engage security of the person under s. 7.

[70] The application judge also found that the communicating law has had the effect of displacing prostitutes from familiar areas, where they may be supported by friends and regular customers, to more isolated areas, thereby making them more vulnerable (paras. 331 and 502).

[71] On the evidence accepted by the application judge, the law prohibits communication that would allow street prostitutes to increase their safety. By prohibiting communicating in public for the purpose of prostitution, the law prevents prostitutes from screening clients and setting terms for the use of condoms or safe houses. In these ways, it significantly increases the risks they face.

[72] I conclude that the evidence supports the application judge's conclusion that s. 213(1)(c) impacts security of the person and engages s. 7.

(2) A Closer Look at Causation

[73] For the reasons discussed above, the application judge concluded — and I agree — that the impugned laws negatively impact and thus engage security of the person rights of prostitutes. However, the appellant Attorneys General contend that s. 7 is not engaged because there is an insufficient causal connection between the laws and the risks faced by prostitutes. First, they argue that the courts below erroneously measured causation by an attenuated standard. Second, they argue that it is the choice of the applicants to engage in prostitution, rather than

[69] La juge de première instance conclut que la communication entre les intéressés est [TRADUCTION] « essentielle » à l'accroissement de la sécurité des prostituées de la rue (par. 432). Cette communication, que la loi interdit, permet aux prostituées de jauger leurs clients éventuels afin d'écarter ceux qui sont intoxiqués et qui pourraient être enclins à la violence, ce qui serait de nature à réduire les risques auxquels elles s'exposent (par. 301 et 421). Cette conclusion fondée sur la preuve offerte suffit à mettre en jeu le droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti à l'art. 7.

[70] La juge estime en outre que l'interdiction de la communication a eu pour effet de faire migrer les prostituées vers des lieux isolés et peu familiers où elles ne peuvent compter sur l'appui de leurs amis et de leurs clients habituels, ce qui les a rendues plus vulnérables (par. 331 et 502).

[71] Suivant les éléments admis en preuve au procès, la loi interdit une communication qui permettrait aux prostituées de la rue d'accroître leur sécurité. En interdisant la communication en public à des fins de prostitution, la loi empêche les prostituées d'évaluer leurs clients éventuels, ainsi que de convenir de l'utilisation du condom ou d'un lieu sûr. Elle accroît ainsi sensiblement le risque couru.

[72] Je conclus que la preuve appuie la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle l'al. 213(1)c) a une incidence sur la sécurité de la personne et met en jeu l'art. 7.

(2) Examen approfondi du lien de causalité

[73] Pour les motifs examinés précédemment, la juge de première instance conclut — et je conviens avec elle — que les dispositions contestées ont un effet préjudiciable sur le droit à la sécurité des prostituées et mettent donc en jeu ce droit. Les procureurs généraux appelants soutiennent toutefois que l'art. 7 ne s'applique pas faute d'un lien de causalité suffisant entre les dispositions et les risques auxquels s'exposent les prostituées. D'abord, ils avancent que les juridictions inférieures ont eu tort de soumettre le lien de causalité à une norme

the law, that is the causal source of the harms they face. These arguments cannot succeed.

(a) The Nature of the Required Causal Connection

[74] Three possible standards for causation are raised for our consideration: (1) "sufficient causal connection", adopted by the application judge (paras. 287-88); (2) a general "impact" approach, adopted by the Court of Appeal (paras. 108-9); and (3) "active and foreseeable" and "direct" causal connection, urged by the appellant Attorneys General (A.G. of Canada factum, at paras. 64-68; A.G. of Ontario factum, at paras. 12-17).

[75] I conclude that the "sufficient causal connection" standard should prevail. This is a flexible standard, which allows the circumstances of each particular case to be taken into account. Adopted in Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, and applied in a number of subsequent cases (see, e.g., United States v. Burns, 2001 SCC 7, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 283; Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 3), it posits the need for "a sufficient causal connection between the state-caused [effect] and the prejudice suffered by the [claimant]" for s. 7 to be engaged (Blencoe, at para. 60 (emphasis added)).

[76] A sufficient causal connection standard does not require that the impugned government action or law be the only or the dominant cause of the prejudice suffered by the claimant, and is satisfied by a reasonable inference, drawn on a balance of probabilities (Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 44, at para. 21). A sufficient causal connection is sensitive to the context of the particular case and insists on a real, as opposed to a speculative, link. Understood in this way, a sufficient causal connection standard is consistent with the substance of the standard that the Court of Appeal applied in this case. While I atténuée. Ils prétendent ensuite que le préjudice couru par les demanderesses tient à leur choix de se livrer à la prostitution et non à la loi. On ne saurait faire droit à ces prétentions.

a) Nature du lien de causalité requis

[74] Nous sommes appelés à considérer trois normes de causalité possibles : (1) celle fondée sur un « lien de causalité suffisant » retenue par la juge de première instance (par. 287-288), (2) celle, générale, fondée sur l'« effet » adoptée par la Cour d'appel (par. 108-109) et (3) celle fondée sur un lien de causalité « actif, prévisible et direct » préconisée par les procureurs généraux appelants (mémoire du p.g. du Canada, par. 65; mémoire du p.g. de l'Ontario, par. 14-15).

[75] Je suis d'avis que la norme du « lien de causalité suffisant » est celle qui convient. Sa souplesse permet l'adaptation aux circonstances propres à chaque espèce. Adoptée dans l'arrêt Blencoe c. Colombie-Britannique (Human Rights Commission), 2000 CSC 44, [2000] 2 R.C.S. 307, et appliquée dans plusieurs affaires subséquentes (voir, p. ex., États-Unis c. Burns, 2001 CSC 7, [2001] 1 R.C.S. 283; Suresh c. Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration), 2002 CSC 1, [2002] 1 R.C.S. 3), elle postule l'existence d'« un lien de causalité suffisant entre [l'effet] imputable à l'État et le préjudice subi par [le demandeur] » pour que l'art. 7 entre en jeu (Blencoe, par. 60 (je souligne)).

[76] La norme du lien de causalité suffisant n'exige pas que la mesure législative ou autre reprochée à l'État soit l'unique ou la principale cause du préjudice subi par le demandeur, et il y est satisfait par déduction raisonnable, suivant la prépondérance des probabilités (Canada (Premier ministre) c. Khadr, 2010 CSC 3, [2010] 1 R.C.S. 44, par. 21). L'exigence d'un lien de causalité suffisant tient compte du contexte et s'attache à l'existence d'un lien réel, et non hypothétique. Considérée sous cet angle, la norme du lien de causalité suffisant correspond essentiellement à celle qu'applique la Cour d'appel en l'espèce. Bien que je ne convienne do not agree with the Court of Appeal that causation is not the appropriate lens for examining whether legislation — as opposed to the conduct of state actors — engages s. 7 security interests, its "practical and pragmatic" inquiry (para. 108) tracks the process followed in cases such as Blencoe and Khadr.

[77] The Attorney General of Canada argues for a higher standard. The prejudice to the claimant's security interest, he argues, must be active, foreseeable, and a "necessary link" (factum, at paras. 62 and 65). He relies on this Court's statement in Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519 (cited by way of contrast in Blencoe, at para. 69), that "[i]n the absence of government involvement, Mrs. Rodriguez would not have suffered a deprivation of her s. 7 rights." He also relies on the Court's statement in Suresh, at para. 54, that "[a]t least where Canada's participation is a necessary precondition for the deprivation and where the deprivation is an entirely foreseeable consequence of Canada's participation, the government does not avoid the guarantee of fundamental justice". These statements establish that a causal connection is made out when the state action is a foreseeable and necessary cause of the prejudice. They do not, however, establish that this is the only way a causal connection engaging s. 7 of the Charter can be demonstrated.

[78] Finally, from a practical perspective, a sufficient causal connection represents a fair and workable threshold for engaging s. 7 of the Charter. This is the port of entry for s. 7 claims. The claimant bears the burden of establishing this connection. Even if established, it does not end the inquiry, since the claimant must go on to show that the deprivation of her security of the person is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Although mere speculation will not suffice to establish causation, to set the bar too high risks barring meritorious claims. What is required is a sufficient connection, having regard to the context of the case.

pas avec elle que l'exigence d'un lien de causalité ne permet pas de déterminer si la loi — par opposition aux actes de représentants de l'État — met en jeu le droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti à l'art. 7, la démarche [TRADUCTION] « pratique et pragmatique » (par. 108) qui la sous-tend s'inspire de celle suivie, par exemple, dans Blencoe et Khadr.

[77] Le procureur général du Canada préconise une norme plus stricte. Il fait valoir que l'atteinte au droit à la sécurité des demanderesses doit être active et prévisible et qu'un [TRADUCTION] « lien nécessaire » est requis (mémoire, par. 62 et 65). Il cite à l'appui les motifs de notre Cour dans Rodriguez c. Colombie-Britannique (Procureur général), [1993] 3 R.C.S. 519 (cités à des fins de comparaison dans l'arrêt Blencoe, par. 69), suivant lesquels : « N'eût été le rôle de l'État, il n'y aurait eu aucune atteinte aux droits garantis à M^me^ Rodriguez par l'art. 7. » Il invoque par ailleurs l'arrêt Suresh, par. 54 : « À tout le moins, dans les cas où la participation du Canada est un préalable nécessaire à l'atteinte et où cette atteinte est une conséquence parfaitement prévisible de la participation canadienne, le gouvernement ne saurait être libéré de son obligation de respecter les principes de justice fondamentale . . . » Ces énoncés établissent qu'il y a lien de causalité lorsque l'acte de l'État est prévisible et qu'il est la cause nécessaire du préjudice, mais pas qu'il s'agit du seul moyen de démontrer l'existence d'un lien de causalité qui met en jeu l'art. 7 de la Charte.

[78] Enfin, sur le plan pratique, l'existence d'un lien de causalité suffisant constitue un critère juste et fonctionnel pour déterminer si l'art. 7 de la Charte est en jeu. Elle ouvre la voie à l'application du droit garanti à l'art. 7, et il incombe au demandeur de la démontrer. Une fois ce lien établi, l'analyse ne prend pas fin pour autant, car le demandeur doit prouver l'atteinte à la sécurité de sa personne et la non-conformité de cette atteinte aux principes de justice fondamentale. De simples hypothèses ne sauraient établir le lien de causalité, mais placer la barre trop haut risque de faire obstacle à des demandes fondées. Le lien doit être suffisant eu égard au contexte considéré.

(b) Is the Causal Connection Negated by Choice or the Role of Third Parties?

[79] The Attorneys General of Canada and Ontario argue that prostitutes choose to engage in an inherently risky activity. They can avoid both the risk inherent in prostitution and any increased risk that the laws impose simply by choosing not to engage in this activity. They say that choice — and not the law — is the real cause of their injury.

[80] The Attorneys General contend that Parliament is entitled to regulate prostitution as it sees fit. Anyone who chooses to sell sex for money must accept these conditions. If the conditions imposed by the law prejudice their security, it is their choice to engage in the activity, not the law, that is the cause.

[81] What the applicants seek, the Attorneys General assert, is a constitutional right to engage in risky commercial activities. Thus the Attorney General of Ontario describes the s. 7 claim in this case as a "veiled assertion of a positive right to vocational safety" (factum, at para. 25).

[82] The Attorneys General rely on this Court's decision in Malmo-Levine, which upheld the constitutionality of the prohibition of possession of marijuana on the basis that the recreational use of marijuana was a "lifestyle choice" and that lifestyle choices were not constitutionally protected (para. 185).

[83] The Attorneys General buttress this argument by asserting that if this Court accepts that these laws can be viewed as causing prejudice to the applicants' security, then many other laws that leave open the choice to engage in risky activities by only partially or indirectly regulating those activities will be rendered unconstitutional.

b) Le lien de causalité est-il rendu inexistant par le choix de se prostituer ou les actes de tiers?

[79] Le procureur général du Canada et celui de l'Ontario soutiennent que les prostituées font le choix de se livrer à une activité intrinsèquement risquée. Elles peuvent se soustraire à la fois aux risques inhérents à la prostitution et à tout risque supplémentaire causé par la loi en choisissant simplement de ne pas se livrer à cette activité. Selon eux, c'est le choix de la prostitution — et non la loi — qui est la cause véritable du préjudice.

[80] Les procureurs généraux prétendent que le législateur peut réglementer la prostitution selon ce qu'il juge opportun. La personne qui décide d'offrir ses services sexuels contre de l'argent doit accepter les règles établies, et lorsque celles-ci portent atteinte à sa sécurité, elle doit s'en prendre à son choix de se livrer à cette activité, non à la loi.

[83] Pour étayer leur thèse, les procureurs généraux font valoir que si notre Cour reconnaît que les dispositions en cause peuvent porter atteinte à la sécurité des demanderesses, de nombreuses autres dispositions qui permettent de se livrer ou non à une activité risquée en réglementant celle-ci partiellement ou indirectement deviendront du coup inconstitutionnelles.

[84] Finally, in a variant on the argument that the impugned laws are not the cause of the applicants' alleged loss of security, the Attorneys General argue that the source of the harm is third parties — the johns who use and abuse prostitutes and the pimps who exploit them.

[85] For the following reasons, I cannot accept the argument that it is not the law, but rather prostitutes' choice and third parties, that cause the risks complained of in this case.

[86] First, while some prostitutes may fit the description of persons who freely choose (or at one time chose) to engage in the risky economic activity of prostitution, many prostitutes have no meaningful choice but to do so. Ms. Bedford herself stated that she initially prostituted herself "to make enough money to at least feed myself" (cross-examination of Ms. Bedford, J.A.R., vol. 2, at p. 92). As the application judge found, street prostitutes, with some exceptions, are a particularly marginalized population (paras. 458 and 472). Whether because of financial desperation, drug addictions, mental illness, or compulsion from pimps, they often have little choice but to sell their bodies for money. Realistically, while they may retain some minimal power of choice — what the Attorney General of Canada called "constrained choice" (transcript, at p. 22) — these are not people who can be said to be truly "choosing" a risky line of business (see PHS, at paras. 97-101).

[87] Second, even accepting that there are those who freely choose to engage in prostitution, it must be remembered that prostitution — the exchange of sex for money — is not illegal. The causal question is whether the impugned laws make this lawful activity more dangerous. An analogy could be drawn to a law preventing a cyclist from wearing a helmet. That the cyclist chooses to ride her bike does not diminish the causal role of the law in

[85] Pour les motifs qui suivent, je ne puis convenir que ce n'est pas la loi, mais plutôt le choix de se prostituer et les actes de tiers qui sont à l'origine des risques dénoncés en l'espèce.

[86] Premièrement, bien que certaines prostituées puissent correspondre au profil de celle qui choisit librement de se livrer à l'activité économique risquée qu'est la prostitution — ou qui fait ce choix à un moment de sa vie —, de nombreuses prostituées n'ont pas vraiment d'autre solution que la prostitution. M[me] Bedford déclare s'être d'abord prostituée [TRADUCTION] « afin de faire assez d'argent pour au moins [s]e nourrir » (contre-interrogatoire de M[me] Bedford, d.c.d., vol. 2, p. 92). Comme le dit la juge de première instance, les prostituées de la rue forment, à quelques exceptions près, une population particulièrement marginalisée (par. 458 et 472). Que ce soit à cause du désespoir financier, de la toxicomanie, de la maladie mentale ou de la contrainte exercée par un proxénète, elles n'ont souvent guère d'autre choix que de vendre leur corps contre de l'argent. Dans les faits, même si elles peuvent conserver un certain pouvoir minimal de choisir — [TRADUCTION] « un choix limité » selon le procureur général (transcription, p. 22) —, on ne peut dire qu'elles « choisissent » véritablement une activité commerciale risquée (voir PHS, par. 97-101).

[87] Deuxièmement, à supposer même que des personnes choisissent librement de se livrer à la prostitution, il faut se rappeler que cette activité — l'échange de services sexuels contre de l'argent — n'est pas illégale. La question qui se pose sur le plan de la causalité est celle de savoir si les dispositions contestées accroissent le risque couru par la personne qui se prostitue. On peut faire une analogie avec la disposition qui interdirait aux cyclistes le making that activity riskier. The challenged laws relating to prostitution are no different.

[88] Nor is it accurate to say that the claim in this case is a veiled assertion of a positive right to vocational safety. The applicants are not asking the government to put into place measures making prostitution safe. Rather, they are asking this Court to strike down legislative provisions that aggravate the risk of disease, violence and death.

[89] It makes no difference that the conduct of pimps and johns is the immediate source of the harms suffered by prostitutes. The impugned laws deprive people engaged in a risky, but legal, activity of the means to protect themselves against those risks. The violence of a john does not diminish the role of the state in making a prostitute more vulnerable to that violence.

[90] The government's call for deference in addressing the problems associated with prostitution has no role at this stage of the analysis. Calls for deference cannot insulate legislation that creates serious harmful effects from the charge that they negatively impact security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter. The question of deference arises under the principles of fundamental justice, not at the early stage of considering whether a person's life, liberty, or security of the person is infringed.

[91] Finally, recognizing that laws with serious harmful effects may engage security of the person does not mean that a host of other criminal laws will be invalidated. Trivial impingements on security of the person do not engage s. 7 (New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46, at para. 59). As already discussed, the applicant must show that the impugned law is sufficiently connected to the prejudice suffered before s. 7 is engaged. And even if s. 7 is found to be engaged, the applicant must port du casque. Malgré le choix des cyclistes d'utiliser leurs bicyclettes, il demeurerait que c'est la disposition qui rendrait l'activité plus risquée. Il en va de même des dispositions contestées sur la prostitution.

[88] Il n'est pas non plus exact d'affirmer que la demande formulée en l'espèce revient à revendiquer à mots couverts le droit à la sécurité professionnelle. L'objectif des demanderesses n'est pas que l'État adopte des mesures qui fassent de la prostitution une activité sûre, mais plutôt que notre Cour invalide des dispositions qui accroissent le risque de maladie, de violence et de décès.

[89] Le fait que le comportement des proxénètes et des clients soit la source immédiate des préjudices subis par les prostituées n'y change rien. Les dispositions contestées privent des personnes qui se livrent à une activité risquée, mais légale, des moyens nécessaires à leur protection contre le risque couru. La violence d'un client ne diminue en rien la responsabilité de l'État qui rend une prostituée plus vulnérable à cette violence.

[90] Le respect auquel nous exhorte l'État quant aux décisions qu'il prend pour contrer les problèmes liés à la prostitution n'est pas pertinent à ce stade de l'analyse. Il ne saurait faire obstacle à l'allégation qu'une mesure législative a de graves effets préjudiciables et porte atteinte au droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti à l'art. 7 de la Charte. Cette considération vaut lorsqu'il s'agit de savoir s'il y a conformité aux principes de justice fondamentale, et non pour déterminer au préalable s'il y a atteinte au droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne de l'intéressé.

[91] Enfin, reconnaître qu'une disposition gravement préjudiciable peut mettre en jeu le droit à la sécurité de la personne n'emportera pas l'invalidation d'une foule d'autres dispositions criminelles. L'atteinte anodine à ce droit ne met pas en jeu l'art. 7 (Nouveau-Brunswick (Ministre de la Santé et des Services communautaires) c. G. (J.), [1999] 3 R.C.S. 46, par. 59). Rappelons que le demandeur doit démontrer l'existence d'un lien suffisant entre la disposition contestée et le préjudice subi pour que s'applique l'art. 7. Et même si l'on conclut que then show that the deprivation of security is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[92] For all these reasons, I reject the arguments of the Attorneys General that the cause of the harm is not the impugned laws, but rather the actions of third parties and the prostitutes' choice to engage in prostitution. As I concluded above, the laws engage s. 7 of the Charter. That conclusion remains undisturbed.

(3) Principles of Fundamental Justice

(a) The Applicable Norms

[93] I have concluded that the impugned laws deprive prostitutes of security of the person, engaging s. 7. The remaining step in the s. 7 analysis is to determine whether this deprivation is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. If so, s. 7 is not breached.

[94] The principles of fundamental justice set out the minimum requirements that a law that negatively impacts on a person's life, liberty, or security of the person must meet. As Lamer J. put it, "[t]he term 'principles of fundamental justice' is not a right, but a qualifier of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person; its function is to set the parameters of that right" (Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 ("Motor Vehicle Reference"), at p. 512).

[95] The principles of fundamental justice have significantly evolved since the birth of the Charter. Initially, the principles of fundamental justice were thought to refer narrowly to principles of natural justice that define procedural fairness. In the Motor Vehicle Reference, this Court held otherwise:

> . . . it would be wrong to interpret the term "fundamental justice" as being synonymous with natural justice . . . . To do so would strip the protected interests of much, if not most, of their content and leave the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in a sorely emaciated l'art. 7 s'applique, le demandeur doit démontrer que l'atteinte à sa sécurité n'est pas conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

[92] Pour tous ces motifs, je rejette la prétention des procureurs généraux selon laquelle le préjudice allégué n'est pas attribuable aux dispositions contestées, mais bien aux actes de tiers et au choix de se prostituer. J'estime toujours que les dispositions en cause font intervenir l'art. 7 de la Charte.

(3) Principes de justice fondamentale

a) Normes applicables

[93] J'arrive à la conclusion que les dispositions contestées portent atteinte au droit à la sécurité de la personne des prostituées et qu'elles mettent ainsi en jeu l'art. 7. Reste donc à savoir si, au regard de l'art. 7, cette atteinte est conforme ou non aux principes de justice fondamentale. Dans l'affirmative, il n'y a pas d'atteinte au droit garanti à l'art. 7.

> . . . il serait erroné d'interpréter l'expression « justice fondamentale » comme synonyme de justice naturelle [. . .] Ce faire aurait pour conséquence de dépouiller les intérêts protégés de tout leur sens ou presque et de laisser le « droit » à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la state. Such a result would be inconsistent with the broad, affirmative language in which those rights are expressed and equally inconsistent with the approach adopted by this Court toward the interpretation of Charter rights in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 357, per Estey J., and Hunter v. Southam Inc., supra. [pp. 501-2]

[96] The Motor Vehicle Reference recognized that the principles of fundamental justice are about the basic values underpinning our constitutional order. The s. 7 analysis is concerned with capturing inherently bad laws: that is, laws that take away life, liberty, or security of the person in a way that runs afoul of our basic values. The principles of fundamental justice are an attempt to capture those values. Over the years, the jurisprudence has given shape to the content of these basic values. In this case, we are concerned with the basic values against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality.

[97] The concepts of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality evolved organically as courts were faced with novel Charter claims.

[98] Arbitrariness was used to describe the situation where there is no connection between the effect and the object of the law. In Morgentaler, the accused challenged provisions of the Criminal Code that required abortions to be approved by a therapeutic abortion committee of an accredited or approved hospital. The purpose of the law was to protect women's health. The majority found that the requirement that all therapeutic abortions take place in accredited hospitals did not contribute to the objective of protecting women's health and, in fact, caused delays that were detrimental to women's health. Thus, the law violated basic values because the effect of the law actually contravened the objective of the law. Beetz J. called this "manifest unfairness" (Morgentaler, at p. 120), but later cases interpreted this as an "arbitrariness" analysis (see Chaoulli v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 791, at para. 133, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.).

personne dans un état d'atrophie déplorable. Un tel résultat serait incompatible avec le style affirmatif et général dans lequel ces droits sont énoncés et également incompatible avec le point de vue que cette Cour a adopté, en ce qui concerne l'interprétation des droits garantis par la Charte, dans l'arrêt Law Society of Upper Canada c. Skapinker, [1984] 1 R.C.S. 357 (le juge Estey), et dans l'arrêt Hunter c. Southam Inc., précité. [p. 501-502]

[98] On a qualifié d'« arbitraire » la disposition dont l'effet n'avait aucun lien avec son objet. Dans l'affaire Morgentaler, l'accusé contestait les dispositions du Code criminel qui exigeaient qu'un avortement soit approuvé par le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique d'un hôpital agréé. L'objet des dispositions était de protéger la santé des femmes. Or, selon les juges majoritaires de la Cour, l'exigence que tout avortement thérapeutique soit pratiqué dans un hôpital agréé ne contribuait pas à la réalisation de cet objectif et causait en fait des délais nuisibles à la santé des femmes. Par conséquent, les dispositions portaient atteinte aux valeurs fondamentales en ce que leur effet allait en fait à l'encontre de leur objectif. Le juge Beetz a alors parlé d'« iniquité manifeste » (Morgentaler, p. 120), et la Cour y a vu ensuite un « caractère arbitraire » (voir Chaoulli c. Québec (Procureur général), 2005 CSC 35, [2005] 1 R.C.S. 791, par. 133, la juge en chef McLachlin et le juge Major).

[99] In Chaoulli, the applicant challenged a Quebec law that prohibited private health insurance for services that were available in the public sector. The purpose of the provision was to protect the public health care system and prevent the diversion of resources from the public system. The majority found, on the basis of international evidence, that private health insurance and a public health system could co-exist. Three of the four-judge majority found that the prohibition was "arbitrary" because there was no real connection on the facts between the effect and the objective of the law.

[100] Most recently, in PHS, this Court found that the Minister's decision not to extend a safe injection site's exemption from drug possession laws was arbitrary. The purpose of drug possession laws was the protection of health and public safety, and the services provided by the safe injection site actually contributed to these objectives. Thus, the effect of not extending the exemption — that is, prohibiting the safe injection site from operating — was contrary to the objectives of the drug possession laws.

[101] Another way in which laws may violate our basic values is through what the cases have called "overbreadth": the law goes too far and interferes with some conduct that bears no connection to its objective. In R. v. Heywood, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 761, the accused challenged a vagrancy law that prohibited offenders convicted of listed offences from "loitering" in public parks. The majority of the Court found that the law, which aimed to protect children from sexual predators, was overbroad; insofar as the law applied to offenders who did not constitute a danger to children, and insofar as it applied to parks where children were unlikely to be present, it was unrelated to its objective.

[102] In R. v. Demers, 2004 SCC 46, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 489, the challenged provisions of the

[100] Plus récemment, dans PHS, notre Cour a jugé arbitraire le refus du ministre de prolonger l'exemption dont bénéficiait un centre d'injection supervisée relativement à l'application des dispositions sur la possession de drogue. Ces dispositions avaient pour objet la protection de la santé et de la sécurité publiques, et les services fournis par le centre d'injection supervisée contribuaient en fait à l'atteinte de cet objectif. L'effet du refus de prolonger l'exemption — à savoir empêcher le fonctionnement du centre d'injection supervisée — allait à l'encontre des objectifs des dispositions relatives à la possession de drogue.

[102] Dans R. c. Demers, 2004 CSC 46, [2004] 2 R.C.S. 489, les dispositions contestées du Code

Criminal Code prevented an accused who was found unfit to stand trial from receiving an absolute discharge, and subjected the accused to indefinite appearances before a review board. The purpose of the provisions was "to allow for the ongoing treatment or assessment of the accused in order for him or her to become fit for an eventual trial" (para. 41). The Court found that insofar as the law applied to permanently unfit accused, who would never become fit to stand trial, the objective did "not apply" and therefore the law was overbroad (paras. 42-43).

[103] Laws are also in violation of our basic values when the effect of the law is grossly disproportionate to the state's objective. In Malmo-Levine, the accused challenged the prohibition on the possession of marijuana on the basis that its effects were grossly disproportionate to its objective. Although the Court agreed that a law with grossly disproportionate effects would violate our basic norms, the Court found that this was not such a case: ". . . the effects on accused persons of the present law, including the potential of imprisonment, fall within the broad latitude within which the Constitution permits legislative action" (para. 175).

[104] In PHS, this Court found that the Minister's refusal to exempt the safe injection site from drug possession laws was not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice because the effect of denying health services and increasing the risk of death and disease of injection drug users was grossly disproportionate to the objectives of the drug possession laws, namely public health and safety.

[105] The overarching lesson that emerges from the case law is that laws run afoul of our basic values when the means by which the state seeks to attain its objective is fundamentally flawed, in the sense of being arbitrary, overbroad, or having effects that are grossly disproportionate to the legislative goal. To deprive citizens of life, liberty, or security of the person by laws that violate these criminel empêchaient l'accusé jugé inapte à subir son procès de bénéficier d'une libération inconditionnelle et l'obligeaient à comparaître périodiquement devant une commission d'examen pendant une période indéfinie. Les dispositions avaient pour objet « de fournir à l'accusé un traitement ou une évaluation continus afin de le rendre éventuellement apte à subir son procès » (par. 41). Selon la Cour, dans la mesure où les dispositions s'appliquaient malgré l'inaptitude permanente de l'accusé — qui ne deviendrait jamais apte à subir son procès —, leur objectif « ne s'appliqu[ait] pas » et leur portée était donc excessive (par. 42-43).

[103] La disposition dont l'effet est totalement disproportionné à l'objectif de l'État viole aussi nos valeurs fondamentales. Dans Malmo-Levine, l'accusé contestait l'interdiction de posséder de la marihuana au motif que ses effets étaient totalement disproportionnés à son objectif. La Cour reconnaît qu'une disposition aux effets totalement disproportionnés viole nos normes fondamentales, mais elle conclut que tel n'est pas le cas en l'espèce : « . . . les effets sur les accusés des dispositions actuelles, y compris la possibilité d'emprisonnement, n'excèdent pas la vaste latitude que la Constitution accorde au Parlement » (par. 175).

[105] L'enseignement primordial de la jurisprudence veut qu'une disposition aille à l'encontre de nos valeurs fondamentales lorsque les moyens mis en œuvre par l'État pour atteindre son objectif comportent une faille fondamentale en ce qu'ils sont arbitraires ou ont une portée trop générale, ou encore, ont des effets totalement disproportionnés à l'objectif législatif. Il n'est pas conforme norms is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[106] As these principles have developed in the jurisprudence, they have not always been applied consistently. The Court of Appeal below pointed to the confusion that has been caused by the "commingling" of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality (paras. 143-51). This Court itself recently noted the conflation of the principles of overbreadth and gross disproportionality (R. v. Khawaja, 2012 SCC 69, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 555, at paras. 38-40; see also R. v. S.S.C., 2008 BCCA 262, 257 B.C.A.C. 57, at para. 72). In short, courts have explored different ways in which laws run afoul of our basic values, using the same words — arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — in slightly different ways.

[107] Although there is significant overlap between these three principles, and one law may properly be characterized by more than one of them, arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality remain three distinct principles that stem from what Hamish Stewart calls "failures of instrumental rationality" — the situation where the law is "inadequately connected to its objective or in some sense goes too far in seeking to attain it" (Fundamental Justice: Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2012), at p. 151). As Peter Hogg has explained:

> The doctrines of overbreadth, disproportionality and arbitrariness are all at bottom intended to address what Hamish Stewart calls "failures of instrumental rationality", by which he means that the Court accepts the legislative objective, but scrutinizes the policy instrument enacted as the means to achieve the objective. If the policy instrument is not a rational means to achieve the objective, then the law is dysfunctional in terms of its own objective.

aux principes de justice fondamentale de priver un citoyen du droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de sa personne au moyen d'une disposition ainsi irrégulière.

[106] Au fil de l'évolution jurisprudentielle, ces principes n'ont pas toujours été appliqués uniformément. En l'espèce, la Cour d'appel signale la confusion créée par l'[TRADUCTION] « amalgame » du caractère arbitraire, de la portée excessive et de la disproportion totale (par. 143-151). Notre Cour relevait elle-même récemment que l'on confond portée excessive et disproportion totale (R. c. Khawaja, 2012 CSC 69, [2012] 3 R.C.S. 555, par. 38-40; voir également R. c. S.S.C., 2008 BCCA 262, 257 B.C.A.C. 57, par. 72). Ainsi, les tribunaux ont employé les mêmes mots — caractère arbitraire, portée excessive et disproportion totale — avec quelques variantes pour explorer les différentes manières dont une disposition législative peut aller à l'encontre de nos valeurs fondamentales.

[107] Bien qu'il y ait un chevauchement important entre le caractère arbitraire, la portée excessive et la disproportion totale, et que plus d'une de ces trois notions puissent bel et bien s'appliquer à une disposition, il demeure que les trois correspondent à des principes distincts qui découlent de ce que Hamish Stewart appelle un [TRADUCTION] « manque de logique fonctionnelle », à savoir que la disposition « n'est pas suffisamment liée à son objectif ou, dans un certain sens, qu'elle va trop loin pour l'atteindre » (Fundamental Justice : Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2012), p. 151). Peter Hogg explique :

> [TRADUCTION] Les principes liés à la portée excessive, à la disproportion et au caractère arbitraire visent tous au fond à pallier ce que Hamish Stewart appelle un « manque de logique fonctionnelle », en ce sens que le tribunal reconnaît l'objectif législatif, mais examine le moyen choisi pour l'atteindre. Si ce moyen ne permet pas logiquement d'atteindre l'objectif, la disposition est dysfonctionnelle eu égard à son propre objectif.

[108] The case law on arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality is directed against two different evils. The first evil is the absence of a connection between the infringement of rights and what the law seeks to achieve — the situation where the law's deprivation of an individual's life, liberty, or security of the person is not connected to the purpose of the law. The first evil is addressed by the norms against arbitrariness and overbreadth, which target the absence of connection between the law's purpose and the s. 7 deprivation.

[109] The second evil lies in depriving a person of life, liberty or security of the person in a manner that is grossly disproportionate to the law's objective. The law's impact on the s. 7 interest is connected to the purpose, but the impact is so severe that it violates our fundamental norms.

[110] Against this background, it may be useful to elaborate on arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality.

[111] Arbitrariness asks whether there is a direct connection between the purpose of the law and the impugned effect on the individual, in the sense that the effect on the individual bears some relation to the law's purpose. There must be a rational connection between the object of the measure that causes the s. 7 deprivation, and the limits it imposes on life, liberty, or security of the person (Stewart, at p. 136). A law that imposes limits on these interests in a way that bears no connection to its objective arbitrarily impinges on those interests. Thus, in Chaoulli, the law was arbitrary because the prohibition of private health insurance was held to be unrelated to the objective of protecting the public health system.

[112] Overbreadth deals with a law that is so broad in scope that it includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose. In this sense, the law is arbitrary in part. At its core, overbreadth addresses the situation where there is no rational connection between the purposes of the law and some, but not all, of its impacts. For instance, the law at issue in Demers required unfit accused to

[110] Dans ce contexte, il peut être utile de développer les notions de caractère arbitraire, de portée excessive et de disproportion totale.

[111] Déterminer qu'une disposition est arbitraire ou non exige qu'on se demande s'il existe un lien direct entre son objet et l'effet allégué sur l'intéressé, s'il y a un certain rapport entre les deux. Il doit exister un lien rationnel entre l'objet de la mesure qui cause l'atteinte au droit garanti à l'art. 7 et la limite apportée au droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne (Stewart, p. 136). La disposition qui limite ce droit selon des modalités qui n'ont aucun lien avec son objet empiète arbitrairement sur ce droit. Ainsi, dans Chaoulli, la Cour juge les dispositions arbitraires parce qu'interdire l'assurance maladie privée n'a aucun rapport avec l'objectif de protéger le système de santé public.

[112] Il y a portée excessive lorsqu'une disposition s'applique si largement qu'elle vise certains actes qui n'ont aucun lien avec son objet. La disposition est alors en partie arbitraire. Essentiellement, la situation en cause est celle où il n'existe aucun lien rationnel entre les objets de la disposition et certains de ses effets, mais pas tous. Par exemple, dans Demers, le texte législatif en cause exigeait attend repeated review board hearings. The law was only disconnected from its purpose insofar as it applied to permanently unfit accused; for temporarily unfit accused, the effects were related to the purpose.

[113] Overbreadth allows courts to recognize that the law is rational in some cases, but that it overreaches in its effect in others. Despite this recognition of the scope of the law as a whole, the focus remains on the individual and whether the effect on the individual is rationally connected to the law's purpose. For example, where a law is drawn broadly and targets some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose in order to make enforcement more practical, there is still no connection between the purpose of the law and its effect on the specific individual. Enforcement practicality may be a justification for an overbroad law, to be analyzed under s. 1 of the Charter.

[114] It has been suggested that overbreadth is not truly a distinct principle of fundamental justice. The case law has sometimes said that overbreadth straddles both arbitrariness and gross disproportionality. Thus, in Heywood, Cory J. stated: "The effect of overbreadth is that in some applications the law is arbitrary or disproportionate" (p. 793).

[115] And in R. v. Clay, 2003 SCC 75, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 735, the companion case to Malmo-Levine, Gonthier and Binnie JJ. explained:

> Overbreadth in that respect addresses the potential infringement of fundamental justice where the adverse effect of a legislative measure on the individuals subject to its strictures is grossly disproportionate to the state interest the legislation seeks to protect. Overbreadth in this aspect is, as Cory J. pointed out [in Heywood], related to arbitrariness. [Emphasis deleted; para. 38.]

[116] In part this debate is semantic. The law has not developed by strict labels, but on a case-by-case que l'accusé inapte comparaisse périodiquement devant la commission d'examen. Il n'était dissocié de son objet que dans la mesure où il s'appliquait à un accusé inapte en permanence; ses effets étaient liés à l'objet dans le cas de l'accusé temporairement inapte.

[113] L'application de la notion de portée excessive permet au tribunal de reconnaître qu'une disposition est rationnelle sous certains rapports, mais que sa portée est trop grande sous d'autres. Malgré la prise en compte de la portée globale de la disposition, l'examen demeure axé sur l'intéressé et sur la question de savoir si l'effet sur ce dernier a un lien rationnel avec l'objet. Par exemple, lorsqu'une disposition est rédigée de manière générale et vise des comportements qui n'ont aucun lien avec son objet afin de faciliter son application, il n'y a pas non plus de lien entre l'objet de la disposition et son effet sur l'intéressé. Faciliter l'application pourrait justifier la portée excessive d'une disposition suivant l'article premier de la Charte.

[115] Dans R. c. Clay, 2003 CSC 75, [2003] 3 R.C.S. 735, l'arrêt connexe à Malmo-Levine, les juges Gonthier et Binnie expliquent :

> Dans ce contexte, la portée excessive s'attache aux atteintes potentielles à la justice fondamentale lorsque l'effet préjudiciable d'une mesure législative sur les personnes qu'elle touche est [totalement] disproportionné [. . .] à l'intérêt général que le texte de loi tente de protéger. À cet égard, comme l'a souligné le juge Cory [dans Heywood], la portée excessive est liée au caractère arbitraire. [Italiques omis; par. 38.]

[116] Le débat est en partie sémantique. Le droit a évolué non par le recours à des étiquettes basis, as courts identified laws that were inherently bad because they violated our basic values.

[117] Moving forward, however, it may be helpful to think of overbreadth as a distinct principle of fundamental justice related to arbitrariness, in that the question for both is whether there is no connection between the effects of a law and its objective. Overbreadth simply allows the court to recognize that the lack of connection arises in a law that goes too far by sweeping conduct into its ambit that bears no relation to its objective.

[118] An ancillary question, which applies to both arbitrariness and overbreadth, concerns how significant the lack of correspondence between the objective of the infringing provision and its effects must be. Questions have arisen as to whether a law is arbitrary or overbroad when its effects are inconsistent with its objective, or whether, more broadly, a law is arbitrary or overbroad whenever its effects are unnecessary for its objective (see, e.g., Chaoulli, at paras. 233-34).

[119] As noted above, the root question is whether the law is inherently bad because there is no connection, in whole or in part, between its effects and its purpose. This standard is not easily met. The evidence may, as in Morgentaler, show that the effect actually undermines the objective and is therefore "inconsistent" with the objective. Or the evidence may, as in Chaoulli, show that there is simply no connection on the facts between the effect and the objective, and the effect is therefore "unnecessary". Regardless of how the judge describes this lack of connection, the ultimate question remains whether the evidence establishes that the law violates basic norms because there is no connection between its effect and its purpose. This is a matter to be determined on a case-by-case basis, in light of the evidence.

strictes, mais d'une décision à l'autre, lorsque les tribunaux ont jugé des dispositions intrinsèquement mauvaises parce qu'elles violaient nos valeurs fondamentales.

[117] Avant de passer au point suivant, toutefois, il peut être utile de voir dans la portée excessive un principe distinct de justice fondamentale lié au caractère arbitraire, l'absence de lien entre les effets d'une disposition et son objectif étant commune aux deux. La portée excessive permet seulement au tribunal de reconnaître l'absence de lien lorsqu'une disposition va trop loin en faisant tomber sous le coup de son application un comportement qui n'a aucun rapport avec son objectif.

[118] Une question accessoire, qui touche à la fois le caractère arbitraire et la portée excessive, concerne l'ampleur que doit revêtir l'absence de correspondance entre l'objectif de la disposition attentatoire et ses effets. On s'est demandé si une disposition était arbitraire ou avait une portée trop grande lorsque ses effets étaient incompatibles avec son objectif ou si, de manière générale, elle était arbitraire ou avait une portée trop grande lorsque ses effets n'étaient pas nécessaires à la réalisation de son objectif (voir, p. ex., Chaoulli, par. 233-234).

[119] Rappelons qu'il s'agit fondamentalement de déterminer si la disposition en cause est intrinsèquement mauvaise du fait de l'absence de lien, en tout ou en partie, entre ses effets et son objet. Satisfaire à cette norme n'est pas chose aisée. Comme dans l'affaire Morgentaler, la preuve peut démontrer que l'effet compromet en fait la réalisation de l'objectif et qu'il est donc « incompatible » avec celui-ci. Il peut aussi ressortir de la preuve, comme dans Chaoulli, qu'il n'y a tout simplement pas de lien entre l'effet et l'objectif, de sorte que l'effet « n'est pas nécessaire ». Peu importe la manière dont le juge qualifie cette absence de lien, la question demeure au fond de savoir si la preuve établit que la disposition viole des normes fondamentales du fait de l'absence de lien entre son effet et son objet. Il faut statuer en fonction du dossier et de la preuve offerte.

[120] La disproportion totale s'attache à d'autres éléments que ceux considérés pour le caractère targets the second fundamental evil: the law's effects on life, liberty or security of the person are so grossly disproportionate to its purposes that they cannot rationally be supported. The rule against gross disproportionality only applies in extreme cases where the seriousness of the deprivation is totally out of sync with the objective of the measure. This idea is captured by the hypothetical of a law with the purpose of keeping the streets clean that imposes a sentence of life imprisonment for spitting on the sidewalk. The connection between the draconian impact of the law and its object must be entirely outside the norms accepted in our free and democratic society.

[121] Gross disproportionality under s. 7 of the Charter does not consider the beneficial effects of the law for society. It balances the negative effect on the individual against the purpose of the law, not against societal benefit that might flow from the law. As this Court said in Malmo-Levine:

> In effect, the exercise undertaken by Braidwood J.A. was to balance the law's salutary and deleterious effects. In our view, with respect, that is a function that is more properly reserved for s. 1. These are the types of social and economic harms that generally have no place in s. 7. [para. 181]

[122] Thus, gross disproportionality is not concerned with the number of people who experience grossly disproportionate effects; a grossly disproportionate effect on one person is sufficient to violate the norm.

[123] All three principles — arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — compare the rights infringement caused by the law with the objective of the law, not with the law's effectiveness. That is, they do not look to how well the law achieves its object, or to how much of the population the law benefits. They do not consider ancillary benefits to the general population. Furthermore, none of the principles measure the percentage of the population that is negatively impacted. The arbitraire et la portée excessive. Elle vise la seconde faille fondamentale, à savoir le fait que les effets de la disposition sur la vie, la liberté ou la sécurité de la personne sont si totalement disproportionnés à ses objectifs qu'ils ne peuvent avoir d'assise rationnelle. La règle qui exclut la disproportion totale ne s'applique que dans les cas extrêmes où la gravité de l'atteinte est sans rapport aucun avec l'objectif de la mesure. Pour illustrer cette idée, prenons l'hypothèse d'une loi qui, dans le but d'assurer la propreté des rues, infligerait une peine d'emprisonnement à perpétuité à quiconque cracherait sur le trottoir. Le lien entre les répercussions draconiennes et l'objet doit déborder complètement le cadre des normes reconnues dans notre société libre et démocratique.

[121] L'analyse de la disproportion totale au regard de l'art. 7 de la Charte ne tient pas compte des avantages de la loi pour la société. Elle met en balance l'effet préjudiciable sur l'intéressé avec l'objet de la loi, et non avec l'avantage que la société peut retirer de la loi. Comme le dit notre Cour dans Malmo-Levine :

> Dans les faits, le juge Braidwood a procédé à la pondération des effets bénéfiques et des effets préjudiciables de la Loi. En toute déférence, nous estimons qu'une telle démarche relève davantage de l'application de l'article premier. Il s'agit là de préjudices sociaux et économiques qui n'ont généralement pas leur place dans l'analyse fondée sur l'art. 7. [par. 181]

[122] Il peut y avoir disproportion totale indépendamment du nombre de personnes touchées; un effet totalement disproportionné sur une seule personne suffit.

[123] Les trois notions — le caractère arbitraire, la portée excessive et la disproportion totale — supposent la comparaison de l'atteinte aux droits causée par la loi avec l'objectif de la loi, et non avec son efficacité. Autrement dit, elles ne s'intéressent pas à la réalisation de l'objectif législatif ou au pourcentage de la population qui bénéficie de l'application de la loi. Elles ne tiennent pas compte des avantages accessoires pour la population en général. De plus, aucune ne requiert la détermination du analysis is qualitative, not quantitative. The question under s. 7 is whether anyone's life, liberty or security of the person has been denied by a law that is inherently bad; a grossly disproportionate, overbroad, or arbitrary effect on one person is sufficient to establish a breach of s. 7.

pourcentage de la population qui est touchée par un effet préjudiciable. L'analyse est qualitative et non quantitative. La question à se poser dans le cadre de l'analyse fondée sur l'art. 7 est celle de savoir si une disposition législative intrinsèquement mauvaise prive qui que ce soit du droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de sa personne; un effet totalement disproportionné, excessif ou arbitraire sur une seule personne suffit pour établir l'atteinte au droit garanti à l'art. 7.

(b) The Relationship Between Section 7 and Section 1

b) Interaction entre l'art. 7 et l'article premier

[124] This Court has previously identified parallels between the rules against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality under s. 7 and elements of the s. 1 analysis for justification of laws that violate Charter rights. These parallels should not be allowed to obscure the crucial differences between the two sections.

[125] Section 7 and s. 1 ask different questions. The question under s. 7 is whether the law's negative effect on life, liberty, or security of the person is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. With respect to the principles of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality, the specific questions are whether the law's purpose, taken at face value, is connected to its effects and whether the negative effect is grossly disproportionate to the law's purpose. Under s. 1, the question is different — whether the negative impact of a law on the rights of individuals is proportionate to the pressing and substantial goal of the law in furthering the public interest. The question of justification on the basis of an overarching public goal is at the heart of s. 1, but it plays no part in the s. 7 analysis, which is concerned with the narrower question of whether the impugned law infringes individual rights.

[125] L'article 7 et l'article premier appellent des questions différentes. Pour les besoins de l'art. 7, l'effet préjudiciable sur le droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne est-il conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale? En ce qui concerne le caractère arbitraire, la portée excessive et la disproportion totale, il faut se demander si, de prime d'abord, l'objet de la disposition présente un lien avec ses effets et si l'effet préjudiciable est proportionné à cet objet. Pour les besoins de l'article premier, il faut plutôt se demander si l'effet préjudiciable sur les droits des personnes est proportionné à l'objectif urgent et réel de défense de l'intérêt public. La justification fondée sur l'objectif public prédominant constitue l'axe central de l'application de l'article premier, mais elle ne joue aucun rôle dans l'analyse fondée sur l'art. 7, qui se soucie seulement de savoir si la disposition contestée porte atteinte à un droit individuel.

[126] As a consequence of the different questions they address, s. 7 and s. 1 work in different ways. Under s. 1, the government bears the burden of showing that a law that breaches an individual's rights can be justified having regard to the government's goal. Because the question is whether the broader public interest justifies the infringement of individual rights, the law's goal must be pressing and substantial. The "rational connection" branch of the s. 1 analysis asks whether the law was a rational means for the legislature to pursue its objective. "Minimal impairment" asks whether the legislature could have designed a law that infringes rights to a lesser extent; it considers the legislature's reasonable alternatives. At the final stage of the s. 1 analysis, the court is required to weigh the negative impact of the law on people's rights against the beneficial impact of the law in terms of achieving its goal for the greater public good. The impacts are judged both qualitatively and quantitatively. Unlike individual claimants, the Crown is well placed to call the social science and expert evidence required to justify the law's impact in terms of society as a whole.

la disposition attentatoire peut être justifiée par l'objectif du législateur. Parce que la question est celle de savoir si l'intérêt public général justifie l'atteinte aux droits individuels, l'objectif doit être urgent et réel. Le volet de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier qui porte sur l'existence d'un « lien rationnel » consiste à déterminer si, pour le législateur, la disposition représente un moyen rationnel d'atteindre son objectif. Le volet relatif à l'« atteinte minimale » établit si le législateur aurait pu concevoir une disposition moins attentatoire; il s'intéresse aux solutions de rechange raisonnables qui s'offrent au législateur. À l'étape finale de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier, le tribunal soupèse l'effet préjudiciable de la disposition sur les droits des personnes et son effet bénéfique sur la réalisation de son objectif dans l'intérêt public supérieur. L'effet est apprécié sur les plans qualitatif et quantitatif. À la différence d'un demandeur individuel, l'État est bien placé pour présenter une preuve relevant des sciences humaines ainsi que le témoignage d'experts qui justifient les répercussions d'une disposition sur l'ensemble de la société.

[127] By contrast, under s. 7, the claimant bears the burden of establishing that the law deprives her of life, liberty or security of the person, in a manner that is not connected to the law's object or in a manner that is grossly disproportionate to the law's object. The inquiry into the purpose of the law focuses on the nature of the object, not on its efficacy. The inquiry into the impact on life, liberty or security of the person is not quantitative — for example, how many people are negatively impacted — but qualitative. An arbitrary, overbroad, or grossly disproportionate impact on one person suffices to establish a breach of s. 7. To require s. 7 claimants to establish the efficacy of the law versus its deleterious consequences on members of society as a whole, would impose the government's s. 1 burden on claimants under s. 7. That cannot be right.

[127] En revanche, l'art. 7 oblige le demandeur à démontrer que la disposition porte atteinte à son droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de sa personne d'une manière qui est sans lien avec l'objet de la disposition ou qui est totalement disproportionnée à celui-ci. La détermination de l'objet s'attache à sa nature et non à son efficacité. La détermination de l'effet sur le droit à la vie, à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne n'est pas quantitative, mais qualitative. On ne se demande donc pas combien de personnes subissent un effet préjudiciable. Il suffit d'un effet arbitraire, excessif ou totalement disproportionné sur une seule personne pour établir l'atteinte à un droit garanti à l'art. 7. Obliger la personne qui invoque l'art. 7 à démontrer l'efficacité de la loi par opposition à ses conséquences néfastes sur l'ensemble de la société revient à lui imposer le même fardeau que celui qui incombe à l'État pour l'application de l'article premier, ce qui ne saurait être acceptable.

[128] In brief, although the concepts under s. 7 and s. 1 are rooted in similar concerns, they are analytically distinct.

[128] En résumé, bien que l'art. 7 et l'article premier fassent intervenir des notions qui s'originent de préoccupations semblables, ils commandent des analyses distinctes.

[129] It has been said that a law that violates s. 7 is unlikely to be justified under s. 1 of the Charter (Motor Vehicle Reference, at p. 518). The significance of the fundamental rights protected by s. 7 supports this observation. Nevertheless, the jurisprudence has also recognized that there may be some cases where s. 1 has a role to play (see, e.g., Malmo-Levine, at paras. 96-98). Depending on the importance of the legislative goal and the nature of the s. 7 infringement in a particular case, the possibility that the government could establish that a s. 7 violation is justified under s. 1 of the Charter cannot be discounted.

(4) Do the Impugned Laws Respect the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

(a) Section 210: The Bawdy-House Prohibition

(i) The Object of the Provision

[130] The bawdy-house provision has remained essentially unchanged since it was moved to Part V of the Criminal Code, "Disorderly Houses, Gaming and Betting", in the 1953-54 Code revision (c. 51, s. 182). In Rockert v. The Queen, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 704, Estey J. found "little, if any, doubt" in the authorities that the disorderly house provisions were not directed at the mischief of betting, gaming and prostitution per se, but rather at the harm to the community in which such activities were carried on in a notorious and habitual manner (p. 712). This objective can be traced back to the common law origins of the bawdy-house provisions (see, e.g., E. Coke, The Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England: Concerning High Treason, and Other Pleas of the Crown and Criminal Causes (1817, first published 1644), at pp. 205-6).

[131] The appellant Attorneys General argue that the object of this provision, considered alone and in conjunction with the other prohibitions, is to

(4) Les dispositions législatives contestées respectent-elles les principes de justice fondamentale?

a) Article 210 : Interdiction des maisons de débauche

(i) Objet de la disposition

[130] La disposition relative aux maisons de débauche est demeurée pour l'essentiel inchangée depuis qu'elle figure à la partie V du Code criminel intitulée « Maisons de désordre, jeux et paris » par suite de la révision de 1953-1954 (ch. 51, art. 182). Dans l'arrêt Rockert c. La Reine, [1978] 2 R.C.S. 704, le juge Estey se dit d'avis que la jurisprudence « ne permet plus de douter » que le méfait visé par ces infractions n'est pas le pari, le jeu et la prostitution en soi, mais plutôt le préjudice porté aux intérêts de la collectivité dans laquelle ces activités s'exercent d'une manière notoire et habituelle (p. 712). On peut faire remonter cet objectif à la common law qui est à l'origine des dispositions sur les maisons de débauche (voir, p. ex., E. Coke, The Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England : Concerning High Treason, and Other Pleas of the Crown and Criminal Causes (1817, publié pour la première fois en 1644), p. 205-206).

[131] Les procureurs généraux appelants soutiennent que, seule ou de concert avec les autres, cette interdiction vise à décourager la prostitution. Le deter prostitution. The record does not support this contention; on the contrary, it is clear from the legislative record that the purpose of the prohibition is to prevent community harms in the nature of nuisance.

[132] There is no evidence to support a reappraisal of this purpose by Parliament. The doctrine against shifting objectives does not permit a new object to be introduced at this point (R. v. Zundel, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 731). On its face, the provision is only directed at in-call prostitution, and so cannot be said to aim at deterring prostitution generally. To find that it operates with the other Criminal Code provisions to deter prostitution generally is also unwarranted, given their piecemeal evolution and patchwork construction, which leaves out-calls and prostitution itself untouched. I therefore agree with the lower courts that the objectives of the bawdy-house provision are to combat neighbourhood disruption or disorder and to safeguard public health and safety.

(ii) Compliance With the Principles of Fundamental Justice

[133] The courts below considered whether the bawdy-house prohibition is overbroad, or grossly disproportionate.

[134] I agree with them that the negative impact of the bawdy-house prohibition on the applicants' security of the person is grossly disproportionate to its objective. I therefore find it unnecessary to decide whether the prohibition is overbroad insofar as it applies to a single prostitute operating out of her own home (C.A., at para. 204). The application judge found on the evidence that moving to a bawdy-house would improve prostitutes' safety by providing the "safety benefits of proximity to others, familiarity with surroundings, security staff, closed-circuit television and other such monitoring that a permanent indoor location can facilitate" (para. 427). Balancing this against the evidence demonstrating dossier n'appuie pas leur prétention; au contraire, il ressort du dossier législatif que l'interdiction a pour objet de faire obstacle au préjudice apparenté à la nuisance qui est infligé à la collectivité.

[132] Nul élément de preuve ne justifie la remise en cause de cet objectif. Le principe qui fait obstacle au changement d'objet ne permet pas de conclure maintenant à l'existence d'un nouvel objectif (R. c. Zundel, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 731). À première vue, la disposition ne vise que la prostitution pratiquée chez soi, de sorte qu'elle ne saurait viser à décourager la prostitution en général. Il n'y a pas lieu non plus de conclure qu'elle a pour effet, avec les autres dispositions du Code criminel, de décourager la prostitution en général, étant donné le caractère parcellaire de l'adoption et de l'évolution des dispositions qui a permis à la prostitution pratiquée chez autrui et à la prostitution comme telle d'échapper à la répression. Je conviens donc avec les juridictions inférieures que l'objectif de la disposition sur les maisons de débauche est de lutter contre les troubles de voisinage et de protéger la santé et la sécurité publiques.

(ii) Conformité aux principes de justice fondamentale

[133] Les juridictions inférieures se demandent si l'interdiction des maisons de débauche a une portée trop grande ou si elle est totalement disproportionnée.

[134] Je conviens avec elles que l'effet préjudiciable de l'interdiction sur le droit à la sécurité des demanderesses est totalement disproportionné à l'objectif. J'estime donc inutile de me prononcer sur sa portée excessive dans le cas de la prostituée qui travaille seule chez elle (C.A., par. 204). La juge de première instance conclut de la preuve que dispenser leurs services dans une maison de débauche accroîtrait la sécurité des prostituées en les faisant bénéficier [TRADUCTION] « de l'avantage sécuritaire de la proximité d'autres personnes, de la familiarisation avec les lieux, d'un personnel chargé de leur sécurité, de la télésurveillance en circuit fermé et de toute autre mesure que permet un lieu permanent that "complaints about nuisance arising from indoor prostitution establishments are rare" (ibid.), she found that the harmful impact of the provision was grossly disproportionate to its purpose.

[135] The Court of Appeal acknowledged that empirical evidence on the subject is difficult to gather, since almost all the studies focus on street prostitution. However, it concluded that the evidence supported the application judge's findings on gross disproportionality — in particular, the evidence of the high homicide rate among prostitutes, with the overwhelming number of victims being street prostitutes. The Court of Appeal agreed that moving indoors amounts to a "basic safety precaution" for prostitutes, one which the bawdy-house provision makes illegal (paras. 206-7).

[136] In my view, this conclusion was not in error. The harms identified by the courts below are grossly disproportionate to the deterrence of community disruption that is the object of the law. Parliament has the power to regulate against nuisances, but not at the cost of the health, safety and lives of prostitutes. A law that prevents street prostitutes from resorting to a safe haven such as Grandma's House while a suspected serial killer prowls the streets, is a law that has lost sight of its purpose.

(b) Section 212(1)(j): Living on the Avails of Prostitution

(i) The Object of the Provision

[137] This Court has held, per Cory J. for the majority in Downey, that the purpose of this provision is to target pimps and the parasitic, exploitative conduct in which they engage:

It can be seen that the majority of offences outlined in s. 195 are aimed at the procurer who entices, encourages or importunes a person to engage in prostitution. Section situé à l'intérieur » (par. 427). Après avoir mis en balance ces éléments avec la preuve selon laquelle « rares sont les plaintes pour nuisance déposées contre un établissement où se pratique la prostitution » (ibid.), elle conclut que l'effet préjudiciable de la disposition est totalement disproportionné à son objectif.

[135] La Cour d'appel reconnaît qu'il est difficile de recueillir des données empiriques sur le sujet étant donné que la plupart des études s'intéressent surtout à la prostitution dans la rue. Elle conclut toutefois que la preuve étaye les conclusions de la juge sur la disproportion totale, en particulier en ce qui concerne le nombre élevé de meurtres de prostituées, en très grande majorité des prostituées travaillant dans la rue. Elle convient que travailler à l'intérieur constitue une [TRADUCTION] « précaution élémentaire » que la disposition sur les maisons de débauche rend illégale pour les prostituées (par. 206-207).

[136] À mon avis, cette conclusion n'est pas erronée. Les préjudices relevés par les juridictions inférieures sont totalement disproportionnés à l'objectif de réprimer le désordre public. Le législateur a le pouvoir de réprimer la nuisance, mais pas au prix de la santé, de la sécurité et de la vie des prostituées. La disposition qui empêche une prostituée de la rue de recourir à un refuge sûr comme Grandma's House alors qu'un tueur en série est soupçonné de sévir dans les rues est une disposition qui a perdu de vue son objectif.

b) Alinéa 212(1)j) : Proxénétisme

(i) Objet de la disposition

[137] Dans l'arrêt Downey, les juges majoritaires de la Cour (sous la plume du juge Cory) concluent que l'al. 212(1)j) vise à réprimer le proxénétisme, ainsi que le parasitisme et l'exploitation qui y sont associés :

On peut constater que la majorité des infractions mentionnées à l'art. 195 visent le proxénète qui entraîne ou encourage une personne à s'adonner à la prostitution

195(1)(j) [now s. 212(1)(j)] is specifically aimed at those who have an economic stake in the earnings of a prostitute. It has been held correctly I believe that the target of s. 195(1)(j) is the person who lives parasitically off a prostitute's earnings. That person is commonly and aptly termed a pimp. [p. 32]

[138] The Attorneys General of Canada and Ontario argue that the true objective of s. 212(1)(j) is to target the commercialization of prostitution, and to promote the values of dignity and equality. This characterization of the objective does not accord with Downey, and is not supported by the legislative record. It must be rejected.

(ii) Compliance With the Principles of Fundamental Justice

[139] The courts below concluded that the living on the avails provision is overbroad insofar as it captures a number of non-exploitative relationships which are not connected to the law's purpose. The courts below also concluded that the provision's negative effect on the security and safety of prostitutes is grossly disproportionate to its objective of protecting prostitutes from harm.

[140] I agree with the courts below that the living on the avails provision is overbroad.

[141] The provision has been judicially restricted to those who provide a service or good to a prostitute because she is a prostitute, thus excluding grocers and doctors, for instance (Shaw v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1962] A.C. 220 (H.L.)). It also has been held to require that exploitation be proven in the case of a person who lives with the prostitute, in order to exclude people in legitimate domestic relationships with a prostitute (Grilo). These refinements render the prohibition narrower than its words might suggest.

[142] The question here is whether the law nevertheless goes too far and thus deprives the applicants of their security of the person in a manner unconnected to the law's objective. The law punishes ou la harcèle à cette fin. L'alinéa 195(1)j) [aujourd'hui remplacé par l'al. 212(1)j)] vise particulièrement ceux qui ont un intérêt financier dans les revenus d'un prostitué. On estime à juste titre, je crois, que la cible visée par l'al. 195(1)j) est la personne qui vit en parasite du revenu d'un prostitué, qu'on appelle communément et fort à propos le souteneur. [p. 32] [138] Le procureur général du Canada et celui de l'Ontario soutiennent que le véritable objectif de l'al. 212(1)j) est de réprimer la commercialisation de la prostitution et de promouvoir les valeurs que sont la dignité et l'égalité. Leur prétention est contraire à l'arrêt Downey et n'est pas étayée par le dossier législatif. Elle doit donc être écartée.

(ii) Conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale

[139] Les juridictions inférieures estiment que la portée de la disposition sur le proxénétisme est excessive en ce que sont ciblés des rapports dénués d'exploitation qui n'ont aucun lien avec l'objet de la disposition. Elles opinent en outre que l'effet préjudiciable de la disposition sur la sécurité des prostituées est totalement disproportionné à l'objectif de les protéger.

[140] Je conviens avec elles que la disposition sur le proxénétisme a une portée excessive.

[141] Les tribunaux n'ont appliqué la disposition qu'à la personne qui offre un service ou un bien à une prostituée parce qu'elle est une prostituée, ce qui exclut, par exemple, l'épicier ou le médecin (Shaw c. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1962] A.C. 220 (H.L.)). Ils ont également statué que, dans le cas d'une personne habitant avec une prostituée, l'exploitation devait être prouvée afin qu'un conjoint de fait légitime ne puisse être inquiété (Grilo). Leur démarche a pour effet de limiter la portée que l'interdiction pourrait avoir si l'on s'en tenait strictement à son libellé.

[142] La question qui se pose en l'espèce est celle de savoir si la disposition va néanmoins trop loin et porte ainsi atteinte au droit à la sécurité des demanderesses selon des modalités qui sont étrangères everyone who lives on the avails of prostitution without distinguishing between those who exploit prostitutes (for example, controlling and abusive pimps) and those who could increase the safety and security of prostitutes (for example, legitimate drivers, managers, or bodyguards). It also includes anyone involved in business with a prostitute, such as accountants or receptionists. In these ways, the law includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose of preventing the exploitation of prostitutes. The living on the avails provision is therefore overbroad.

[143] The appellant Attorneys General argue that the line between an exploitative pimp and a prostitute's legitimate driver, manager or bodyguard, blurs in the real world. A relationship that begins on a non-exploitative footing may become exploitative over time. If the provision were tailored more narrowly — for example, by reading in "in circumstances of exploitation" as the Court of Appeal did — evidentiary difficulties may lead to exploiters escaping liability. Relationships of exploitation often involve intimidation and manipulation of the kind that make it very difficult for a prostitute to testify. For these reasons, the Attorneys General argue, the provision must be drawn broadly in order to effectively capture those it targets.

[144] This argument is more appropriately addressed under the s. 1 analysis. As stated above, if a law captures conduct that bears no relation to its purpose, the law is overbroad under s. 7; enforcement practicality is one way the government may justify an overbroad law under s. 1 of the Charter.

[145] Having found that the prohibition on living on the avails of prostitution is overbroad, I find it unnecessary to consider whether it is also grossly disproportionate to its object of protecting prostitutes from exploitative relationships.

à l'objectif poursuivi. Est sanctionné quiconque vit des produits de la prostitution d'autrui sans que ne soit établie de distinction entre celui qui exploite une prostituée (tel le proxénète contrôlant et violent) et celui qui peut accroître la sécurité d'une prostituée (tel le chauffeur, le gérant ou le garde du corps véritable). La disposition vise également toute personne qui fait affaire avec une prostituée, y compris un comptable ou un réceptionniste. Certains actes sans aucun rapport avec l'objectif de prévenir l'exploitation des prostituées tombent aussi sous le coup de la loi. La disposition sur le proxénétisme a donc une portée excessive.

[144] Cette considération a davantage sa place dans l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier. Je le répète, une disposition a une portée excessive au regard de l'art. 7 lorsqu'elle s'applique à un comportement qui est sans rapport avec son objet; l'utilité pratique sur le plan de l'application est l'une des considérations que le gouvernement peut invoquer pour justifier la portée excessive d'une disposition suivant l'article premier de la Charte.

[145] Vu ma conclusion que la disposition sur le proxénétisme a une portée excessive, il me paraît inutile de déterminer si elle est aussi totalement disproportionnée à son objectif de protéger les prostituées contre l'exploitation.

(c) Section 213(1)(c): Communicating in Public for the Purposes of Prostitution

(i) The Object of the Provision

[146] The object of the communicating provision was explained by Dickson C.J. in the Prostitution Reference:

> Like Wilson J., I would characterize the legislative objective of s. 195.1(1)(c) [now s. 213(1)(c)] in the following manner: the provision is meant to address solicitation in public places and, to that end, seeks to eradicate the various forms of social nuisance arising from the public display of the sale of sex. My colleague Lamer J. finds that s. 195.1(1)(c) is truly directed towards curbing the exposure of prostitution and related violence, drugs and crime to potentially vulnerable young people, and towards eliminating the victimization and economic disadvantage that prostitution, and especially street soliciting, represents for women. I do not share the view that the legislative objective can be characterized so broadly. In prohibiting sales of sexual services in public, the legislation does not attempt, at least in any direct manner, to address the exploitation, degradation and subordination of women that are part of the contemporary reality of prostitution. Rather, in my view, the legislation is aimed at taking solicitation for the purposes of prostitution off the streets and out of public view.
> The Criminal Code provision subject to attack in these proceedings clearly responds to the concerns of home-owners, businesses, and the residents of urban neighbourhoods. Public solicitation for the purposes of prostitution is closely associated with street congestion and noise, oral harassment of non-participants and general detrimental effects on passers-by or bystanders, especially children. [pp. 1134-35]

[147] It is clear from these reasons that the purpose of the communicating provision is not to eliminate street prostitution for its own sake, but to take prostitution "off the streets and out of public view" in order to prevent the nuisances that street prostitution can cause. The Prostitution Reference belies the argument of the Attorneys General that

c) Alinéa 213(1)c) : Communiquer en public à des fins de prostitution

(i) Objet de la disposition

[146] Dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, le juge en chef Dickson explique l'objet de la disposition sur la communication :

> Comme le juge Wilson, je suis d'avis de qualifier l'objectif législatif de l'al. 195.1(1)c) [aujourd'hui remplacé par l'al. 213(1)c)] de la façon suivante : la disposition vise la sollicitation dans les endroits publics et, à cette fin, tente de supprimer les diverses formes de nuisances sociales qui découlent de l'étalage en public de la vente de services sexuels. Mon collègue le juge Lamer conclut que l'al. 195.1(1)c) vise en réalité à empêcher que de jeunes personnes vraisemblablement vulnérables soient exposées à la prostitution, à la violence, aux drogues et au crime qui l'accompagnent et à éliminer l'oppression et la sujétion économique que la prostitution, et particulièrement la sollicitation de rue, représentent pour les femmes. Je ne partage pas l'opinion que l'objectif législatif puisse être qualifié de façon aussi large. En interdisant la vente de services sexuels dans les endroits publics, la loi ne tente pas, à tout le moins directement, de traiter le problème de l'exploitation, de la dégradation et de la subordination des femmes, qui font partie de la réalité quotidienne de la prostitution. À mon avis, la loi vise plutôt à empêcher que la sollicitation en vue de se livrer à la prostitution se fasse dans les rues et sous les regards du public.
> La disposition du Code criminel contestée en l'espèce répond clairement aux préoccupations des propriétaires de maison, des commerces et des habitants des secteurs urbains. La sollicitation en public aux fins de la prostitution est intimement associée à l'encombrement des rues ainsi qu'au bruit, au harcèlement verbal de ceux qui n'y participent pas et à divers effets généralement néfastes sur les passants et les spectateurs, particulièrement les enfants. [p. 1134-1135]

[147] Il s'ensuit clairement que la disposition sur la communication vise non pas à éliminer la prostitution dans la rue comme telle, mais bien « à sortir la prostitution de la rue et à la soustraire au regard du public » afin d'empêcher les nuisances susceptibles d'en découler. Le Renvoi sur la prostitution contredit la thèse des procureurs généraux selon laquelle

Parliament's overall objective in these provisions is to deter prostitution.

(ii) Compliance With the Principles of Fundamental Justice

[148] The application judge concluded that the harm imposed by the prohibition on communicating in public was grossly disproportionate to the provision's object of removing the nuisance of prostitution from the streets. This was based on evidence that she found established that the ability to screen clients was an "essential tool" to avoiding violent or drunken clients (application decision, at para. 432).

[149] The majority of the Court of Appeal found that the application judge erred in her analysis of gross disproportionality by attaching too little importance to the objective of s. 213(1)(c), and by incorrectly finding on the evidence that face-to-face communication with a prospective customer is essential to enhancing prostitutes' safety (paras. 306 and 310).

[150] In my view, the Court of Appeal majority's reasoning on this question is problematic, largely for the reasons set out by MacPherson J.A., dissenting in part. Four aspects of the majority's analysis are particularly troubling.

[151] First, in concluding that the application judge accorded too little weight to the legislative objective of s. 213(1)(c), the majority of the Court of Appeal criticized her characterization of the object of the provision as targeting "noise, street congestion, and the possibility that the practice of prostitution will interfere with those nearby" (C.A., at para. 306). But the application judge's conclusion was in concert with the object of s. 213(1)(c) established by Dickson C.J. in the Prostitution Reference, which the majority of the Court of Appeal endorsed earlier in their reasons (para. 286).

[152] Compounding this error, the majority of the Court of Appeal inflated the objective of the prohibition on public communication by referring to "drug possession, drug trafficking, public l'objectif général de la disposition serait de décourager la prostitution.

(ii) Conformité aux principes de justice fondamentale

[148] La juge de première instance conclut que le préjudice causé par l'interdiction de communiquer en public est totalement disproportionné à l'objet de la disposition, à savoir mettre fin à la nuisance que constitue la prostitution dans la rue. Elle s'appuie sur des éléments de preuve qui, à son avis, démontrent que la possibilité de jauger les clients est [TRADUCTION] « essentielle » à la détection de ceux qui sont violents ou ivres (décision de première instance, par. 432).

[149] Les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel opinent que, dans son analyse de la proportionnalité, la juge de première instance commet l'erreur d'accorder trop peu d'importance à l'objectif de l'al. 213(1)c) et de conclure, à partir de la preuve, que la possibilité d'une communication entre les intéressés est essentielle à la sécurité des prostituées (par. 306 et 310).

[150] À mon avis, le raisonnement des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel sur ce point pose problème, en grande partie pour les motifs qu'invoque le juge MacPherson, dissident en partie. Leur analyse est problématique sous quatre rapports.

[151] Premièrement, pour conclure que la juge accorde trop peu d'importance à l'objectif de l'al. 213(1)c), les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel lui reprochent d'affirmer que la disposition vise [TRADUCTION] « le bruit, l'encombrement des rues et la possibilité que l'exercice de la prostitution gêne ceux qui se trouvent dans les lieux environnants » (C.A., par. 306). Or, la conclusion de la juge s'accorde avec l'objet de l'al. 213(1)c) reconnu par le juge en chef Dickson dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution et auquel les juges majoritaires souscrivent par ailleurs dans leurs motifs (par. 286).

[152] Pour ajouter à cette erreur, les juges majoritaires accroissent la portée de l'objectif de l'interdiction de la communication en public en mentionnant [TRADUCTION] « la possession de drogue, le intoxication, and organized crime" (para. 307), even though Dickson C.J. explicitly excluded the exposure of "related violence, drugs and crime" to vulnerable young people from the objectives of s. 213(1)(c). At most, the provision's effect on these other issues is an ancillary benefit — and, as such, it should not play into the gross disproportionality analysis, which weighs the actual objective of the provision against its negative impact on the individual's life, liberty and security of the person.

trafic de stupéfiants, l'intoxication publique et le crime organisé » (par. 307). Pourtant, dans le Renvoi sur la prostitution, le juge en chef Dickson écarte explicitement des objectifs de l'al. 213(1)c) le fait d'empêcher que de jeunes personnes vulnérables soient exposées « à la prostitution, à la violence, aux drogues et au crime » qui accompagnent la prostitution. Tout au plus, l'effet de cette disposition sur ces autres aspects ne constitue qu'un avantage accessoire, de sorte qu'il ne devrait pas être pris en compte lorsque, dans le cadre de l'analyse de la proportionnalité, on soupèse l'objectif réel de la disposition et son effet préjudiciable sur le droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne.

[153] The three remaining concerns with the majority's reasoning relate to the other side of the balance: the assessment of the impact of the provision.

[154] First, the majority of the Court of Appeal erroneously substituted its assessment of the evidence for that of the application judge. It found that the application judge's conclusion that face-to-face communication is essential to enhancing prostitutes' safety was based only on "anecdotal evidence . . . informed by her own common sense" (para. 311). This was linked to its error, discussed above, in according too little deference to the application judge on findings of social and legislative facts. MacPherson J.A. for the minority, correctly countered that the evidence on this point came from both prostitutes' own accounts and from expert assessments, and provided a firm basis for the application judge's conclusion (paras. 348-50).

[154] Premièrement, les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel substituent à tort leur appréciation de la preuve à celle de la juge de première instance. Ils concluent que cette dernière se fonde sur [TRADUCTION] « des preuves anecdotiques [. . .] éclairées par son propre bon sens » (par. 311) pour conclure que la communication des intéressés est essentielle à la sécurité accrue des prostituées. Leur erreur est imputable à celle, mentionnée précédemment, de déférer trop peu aux conclusions de la juge sur des faits sociaux ou législatifs. Au nom des juges minoritaires, le juge MacPherson rétorque à juste titre que la preuve sur ce point est constituée à la fois de témoignages de prostituées et de témoignages d'experts, et qu'elle étaye solidement la conclusion tirée en première instance (par. 348-350).

[155] Second, the majority ignored the law's effect of displacing prostitutes to more secluded, less secure locations. The application judge highlighted this displacement (at para. 331), citing the evidence found in the report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights Subcommittee on Solicitation Laws (The Challenge of Change: A Study of Canada's Criminal Prostitution Laws (2006)) on the effects of s. 213(1)(c). The majority's conclusion that the application judge did not have a proper basis to conclude that face-to-face communication enhances safety may be explained in part by their failure to consider the impact of the provision on displacement.

[156] Related to this is the uncontested fact that the communication ban prevents street workers from bargaining for conditions that would materially reduce their risk, such as condom use and the use of safe houses.

[157] Finally, the majority of the Court of Appeal majority, in rejecting the application judge's conclusions, relied on its own speculative assessment of the impact of s. 213(1)(c):

> While it is fair to say that a street prostitute might be able to avoid a "bad date" by negotiating details such as payment, services to be performed and condom use up front, it is equally likely that the customer could pass muster at an early stage, only to turn violent once the transaction is underway. It is also possible that the prostitute may proceed even in the face of perceived danger, either because her judgment is impaired by drugs or alcohol, or because she is so desperate for money that she feels compelled to take the risk. [para. 312]

[158] It is certainly conceivable, as this passage suggests, that some street prostitutes would not refuse a client even if communication revealed potential danger. It is also conceivable that the danger may not be perfectly predicted in advance. However, that does not negate the application judge's finding that communication is an essential tool that can decrease risk. The assessment is qualitative, not quantitative. If screening could have prevented one woman from jumping into Robert Pickton's car, the severity of the harmful effects is established.

[159] In sum, the Court of Appeal wrongly attributed errors in reasoning to the application judge and made a number of errors in considering gross disproportionality. I would restore the application l'al. 213(1)c). La conclusion des juges majoritaires suivant laquelle la juge ne disposait pas d'éléments suffisants pour conclure que la communication entre les intéressés accroît la sécurité des prostituées peut s'expliquer en partie par leur omission de tenir compte de l'effet de la disposition sur la migration des prostituées.

[156] À cela s'ajoute le fait incontesté que l'interdiction de communiquer à des fins de prostitution empêche les prostituées de la rue de négocier des conditions susceptibles de réduire sensiblement le risque auquel elles s'exposent, telle l'utilisation du condom ou d'un lieu sûr.

> [TRADUCTION] Bien qu'il soit juste de dire qu'une prostituée de la rue pourrait éviter les incidents malheureux en négociant à l'avance des modalités comme le paiement, les services à rendre et l'utilisation d'un condom, il est également possible que le client jugé acceptable à ce stade préalable devienne ensuite violent lorsque la prestation est en cours. Il est également possible que la prostituée décide d'aller de l'avant malgré le danger pressenti, soit parce que son jugement est altéré par la drogue ou l'alcool, soit parce qu'elle a tellement besoin d'argent qu'elle se sent obligée de courir le risque. [par. 312]

[158] Même si on peut assurément concevoir, comme l'indique cet extrait, qu'une prostituée de la rue ne refuse pas un client même lorsque la communication révèle l'existence d'un risque, il est également concevable que le risque ne puisse être totalement prévisible. Pour autant, la conclusion de la juge selon laquelle la communication entre les intéressés est essentielle à la réduction du risque demeure valable. L'appréciation est qualitative, non quantitative. À supposer que l'évaluation préalable ait pu empêcher une seule femme de monter à bord de la voiture de Robert Pickton, la gravité des effets préjudiciables est démontrée.

[159] En somme, la Cour d'appel relève à tort des erreurs dans le raisonnement de la juge de première instance et elle en commet plusieurs au chapitre de la proportionnalité. Je suis d'avis de rétablir la judge's conclusion that s. 213(1)(c) is grossly disproportionate. The provision's negative impact on the safety and lives of street prostitutes is a grossly disproportionate response to the possibility of nuisance caused by street prostitution.

C. Do the Prohibitions Against Communicating in Public Violate Section 2(b) of the Charter?

[160] Having concluded that the impugned laws violate s. 7, it is unnecessary to consider this question.

D. Are the Infringements Justified Under Section 1 of the Charter?

[161] The appellant Attorneys General have not seriously argued that the laws, if found to infringe s. 7, can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Only the Attorney General of Canada addressed this in his factum, and then, only briefly. I therefore find it unnecessary to engage in a full s. 1 analysis for each of the impugned provisions. However, some of their arguments under s. 7 of the Charter are properly addressed at this stage of the analysis.

[162] In particular, the Attorneys General attempt to justify the living on the avails provision on the basis that it must be drafted broadly in order to capture all exploitative relationships, which can be difficult to identify. However, the law not only catches drivers and bodyguards, who may actually be pimps, but it also catches clearly non-exploitative relationships, such as receptionists or accountants who work with prostitutes. The law is therefore not minimally impairing. Nor, at the final stage of the s. 1 inquiry, is the law's effect of preventing prostitutes from taking measures that would increase their safety, and possibly save their lives, outweighed by the law's positive effect of protecting prostitutes from exploitative relationships.

conclusion de la juge selon laquelle l'al. 213(1)c) est totalement disproportionné. L'effet préjudiciable de cette disposition sur le droit à la sécurité et à la vie des prostituées de la rue est totalement disproportionné au risque de nuisance causée par la prostitution de la rue.

C. Les interdictions de communiquer en public portent-elles atteinte à une liberté garantie à l'al. 2b) de la Charte?

[160] Comme je conclus que les dispositions contestées violent le droit garanti à l'art. 7, point n'est besoin de se prononcer à cet égard.

D. Les atteintes sont-elles justifiées suivant l'article premier de la Charte?

[161] Les procureurs généraux appelants ne prétendent pas sérieusement que si elles sont jugées contraires à l'art. 7, les dispositions en cause peuvent être justifiées en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte. Seul le procureur général du Canada aborde le sujet dans son mémoire, et ce, brièvement. Il m'apparaît donc inutile de me livrer à une analyse exhaustive au regard de l'article premier pour chacune des dispositions attaquées. Par contre, certaines des thèses qu'ils défendent en fonction de l'art. 7 de la Charte sont reprises à juste titre à cette étape de l'analyse.

[162] En particulier, les procureurs généraux tentent de justifier la disposition sur le proxénétisme par la nécessité d'un libellé général afin que tombent sous le coup de son application toutes les relations empreintes d'exploitation, lesquelles peuvent être difficiles à cerner. Or, la disposition vise non seulement le chauffeur ou le garde du corps, qui peut être en fait un proxénète, mais aussi la personne qui entretient avec la prostituée des rapports manifestement dénués d'exploitation (p. ex. un réceptionniste ou un comptable). La disposition n'équivaut donc pas à une atteinte minimale. Pour les besoins du dernier volet de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier, son effet bénéfique — protéger les prostituées contre l'exploitation — ne l'emporte pas non plus sur l'effet préjudiciable qui empêche les prostituées de prendre des mesures pour accroître leur sécurité et, peut-être, leur sauver la vie.

[163] The Attorneys General have not raised any other arguments distinct from those considered under s. 7. I therefore find that the impugned laws are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter.

V. Result and Remedy

[164] I would dismiss the appeals and allow the cross-appeal. Section 210, as it relates to prostitution, and ss. 212(1)(j) and 213(1)(c) are declared to be inconsistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and hence are void. The word "prostitution" is struck from the definition of "common bawdy-house" in s. 197(1) of the Criminal Code as it applies to s. 210 only.

[165] I have concluded that each of the challenged provisions, considered independently, suffers from constitutional infirmities that violate the Charter. That does not mean that Parliament is precluded from imposing limits on where and how prostitution may be conducted. Prohibitions on keeping a bawdy-house, living on the avails of prostitution and communication related to prostitution are intertwined. They impact on each other. Greater latitude in one measure — for example, permitting prostitutes to obtain the assistance of security personnel — might impact on the constitutionality of another measure — for example, forbidding the nuisances associated with keeping a bawdy-house. The regulation of prostitution is a complex and delicate matter. It will be for Parliament, should it choose to do so, to devise a new approach, reflecting different elements of the existing regime.

[166] This raises the question of whether the declaration of invalidity should be suspended and if so, for how long.

[167] On the one hand, immediate invalidity would leave prostitution totally unregulated while Parliament grapples with the complex and sensitive problem of how to deal with it. How prostitution is regulated is a matter of great public concern, and few countries leave it entirely unregulated.

V. Dispositif et réparation

[164] Je suis d'avis de rejeter les pourvois et d'accueillir le pourvoi incident. L'article 210, en ce qui concerne la prostitution, et les al. 212(1)j) et 213(1)c) sont déclarés incompatibles avec la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et sont par conséquent invalidés. Le mot « prostitution » est supprimé de la définition de « maison de débauche » figurant au par. 197(1) du Code criminel pour les besoins de l'art. 210 uniquement.

[165] Je conclus que, considérée isolément, chacune des dispositions contestées comporte des failles constitutionnelles qui portent atteinte à la Charte. Il ne s'ensuit pas que le législateur ne peut décider des lieux et des modalités de la prostitution. L'interdiction de tenir une maison de débauche, celle de s'adonner au proxénétisme et celle de communiquer aux fins de prostitution s'entremêlent. Chacune a une incidence sur l'autre. Atténuer l'une d'elles — par exemple en permettant aux prostituées de retenir les services de préposés à leur sécurité — peut influer sur la constitutionnalité de l'autre, comme celle des nuisances associées à la tenue d'une maison de débauche. L'encadrement de la prostitution est un sujet complexe et délicat. Il appartiendra au législateur, s'il le juge opportun, de concevoir une nouvelle approche qui intègre les différents éléments du régime actuel.

[166] La question se pose alors de savoir s'il doit y avoir invalidation avec effet suspensif et, dans l'affirmative, quelle doit être la durée de cet effet.

[167] L'invalidité avec effet immédiat ferait en sorte que la prostitution échappe à toute réglementation le temps que le législateur trouve une solution au problème épineux et délicat de l'encadrement de la prostitution. La question revêt un intérêt public considérable, et peu de pays s'abstiennent de toute

Whether immediate invalidity would pose a danger to the public or imperil the rule of law (the factors for suspension referred to in Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679) may be subject to debate. However, it is clear that moving abruptly from a situation where prostitution is regulated to a situation where it is entirely unregulated would be a matter of great concern to many Canadians.

[168] On the other hand, leaving the prohibitions against bawdy-houses, living on the avails of prostitution and public communication for purposes of prostitution in place in their present form leaves prostitutes at increased risk for the time of the suspension — risks which violate their constitutional right to security of the person.

[169] The choice between suspending the declaration of invalidity and allowing it to take immediate effect is not an easy one. Neither alternative is without difficulty. However, considering all the interests at stake, I conclude that the declaration of invalidity should be suspended for one year.

réglementation en la matière. Il peut y avoir controverse quant à savoir si l'invalidité avec effet immédiat présenterait un danger pour le public ou compromettrait la primauté du droit (les facteurs favorables à la suspension invoqués dans Schachter c. Canada, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 679). Cependant, il est clair que passer carrément de la situation où la prostitution est réglementée à la situation où elle ne le serait pas du tout susciterait de vives inquiétudes chez de nombreux Canadiens.

[169] Il n'est pas facile de choisir entre l'invalidation avec effet suspensif ou immédiat. L'une et l'autre des mesures comportent des inconvénients. Toutefois, au vu de l'ensemble des intérêts en jeu, je conclus à la nécessité de suspendre l'effet de la déclaration d'invalidité pendant un an.

Applicant brought application for declaration that s. 5(i) and s. 5(j) of Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act is unconstitutional and of no force or effect to extent that reference to "persons and entities" in those subsections apply to legal counsel and for declaration that s. 5 of Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Suspicious Transaction Reporting Regulations is ultra vires Act and unconstitutional — Section 5 of Regulations provides that every legal counsel is subject to Part 1 of Act when he or she engages in certain activities on behalf of any person or entity — Section 5 of Regulations and Part 1 of Act have effect of requiring legal counsel to report suspicious transactions to federal agency within 30 days after suspicion arises — Applicant sought interlocutory order suspending operation of s. 5 of Regulations until hearing of application for declaratory relief — Application for interlocutory relief granted in part — Serious and triable issue existed with respect to impact of impugned provisions on solicitor-client relationship and solicitor-client privilege — Legislation would arguably place lawyers in untenable position of facing prosecution for non-compliance with Act or facing Law Society discipline if they complied with Act and infringed solicitor-client privilege — Appropriate remedy was order that lawyers provide documentation required under Regulation in sealed envelopes identifying file number but not file name to Law Society of Alberta for storage — Law Society not to be subject to any search warrants in respect of those documents — Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, S.C. 2000, c. 17, ss. 5(i), 5(j) — Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Suspicious Transactions Reporting Regulations, SOR/2001-317, s. 5.

APPLICATION for interim stay of impugned legislation.

The Honourable Justice J. Watson*:

1 THE COURT: This particular case involves what I would have to say are manifestly important and even definitive social values in Canada. If one looks at the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Secession Reference, the four key elements of our legal structure which defines Canada as a democratic nation and a free and democratic society within the meaning of section 1 of the Charter, amongst other things, are in fact Democracy, Federalism, Constitutionalism and the Rule of Law, and, of course, Respect for Minorities.

2 What occurs to me in relation to approaching this particular point is that constitutional values of considerable magnitude are being invoked on both sides of this particular argument and that those constitutional values are put forward on a basis that the other side of the equation is inconsistent therewith. This is not a prosaic legal debate about the potential differences between lawyers as a profession and other forms of trades or professions or occupations, but is a matter which is of considerable importance to the social order of Canada and also, though, to Canada's obligations as a nation on the planet.

3 Eloquent submissions have been made by both sides in relation to this matter and I therefore will provide now fairly lengthy oral reasons which I hope will be of some assistance to counsel in relation to interpreting what I am doing here.

4 The point I wish to emphasize at the outset in connection with this, of course, is that notwithstanding anything I might happen to say, I am not predeciding the substantive question raised by the Originating Notice of Motion in any way. I am looking at this as an application at this point for a form of interim remedy pending the ability of both sides to marshal their resources and put forward a full and complete argument on the issues in question.

5 I am cognizant of the fact, though, that Ms. Duckett has pointed out that the Federation of Law Societies of Canada has essentially marshalled its resources to a complete forum already and is in effect prepared to go. Nevertheless, the Parliament of Canada is not a lower tribunal. It is composed of our elected representatives and through the Attorney General of Canada and Minister of Justice it is being represented here, in effect, in vindication of the legal choices that it made in service of what it determined to be the public interest. As mentioned before, that public interest as perceived by Parliament apparently touches not merely on what is in the best interests of Canadians and members of the polity of which we all belong, but also Canada's relationship with the rest of the international community.

6 Starting off, then, with the analytical approach that I think is most appropriate in giving my reasons, I should first indicate that these proceedings came before me initially on the basis of an Originating Notice of Motion which was filed by the Federation of Law Societies of Canada as applicant and with the Attorney General of Canada as respondent, which Originating Notice of Motion indicated that the intention of the Federation of Law Societies of Canada was to seek several forms of declaratory relief as well as the interlocutory order which is specifically before me at this particular time.

7 I do not find any reason to doubt the legitimacy of the Federation of Law Societies of Canada as an applicant in relation either to that Originating Notice of Motion or to the Notice of Motion which is subsidiary thereto, namely the one which relates to the particular motion that I am asked to deal with now, that is the motion for the interim interlocutory order.

8 I should indicate for the record that the Originating Notice of Motion provided for the following relief being sought. Firstly, that there be a "a declaration that sections 5(i) and 5(j) of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, Statutes of Canada 2000, c. 17, are inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada and have no force or effect to the extent that the reference in those subsections to 'persons and entities' includes legal counsel."

9 I pause to mention that in relation to that particular paragraph in the Originating Notice of Motion there seems to me to be the potential for considerable argument about whether or not that notice is sufficient for the purposes of raising a claim under the Constitution of Canada inasmuch as it does not specifically identify which aspects of the Constitution of Canada are being taxed by the legislation. I do not raise that point as something that I have finally determined or to suggest that in any way, in fact, the Notice of Motion is inadequate.

10 I pause to mention in this context that, as we discussed during the course of our debate of this matter this morning the location of the role, shall we say, and constitutional value of the solicitor/client privilege and the relationship between a solicitor and client is perhaps somewhat difficult under our current legislative structure, including the Constitution of Canada. In that sense, therefore, I have no fault for the applicant, Federation of Law Societies of Canada, in formulating the Originating Notice of Motion in that language. Nevertheless, the language, being as it is, raises the concern that there is a legitimate reason for the Attorney of General of Canada to say, I wish to marshal a fairly wide-ranging case in answer to this motion, referring now to the Originating Notice of Motion not the particular motion that is before me.

11 I turn next to the second paragraph in the Originating Notice of Motion which provides "a declaration that sections 5(i) and 5(j) of the Act be read down so as to exclude legal counsel from the 'persons and entities' referred to in those subsections."

12 Paragraph 3 of the Originating Notice of Motion provided "a declaration that section 5 of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Suspicious Transaction Reporting Regulations, SOR/2001-317 is ultra vires the Act and inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada, and is therefore of no force or effect."

13 I pause again at this point to say that this particular declaration raises two different forms of constitutional attack, namely a constitutional attack somewhat in accord with the initial one, namely the suggestion that there is a fundamental affront to a serious constitutional value in the Regulations themselves, but furthermore a secondary form of quasi constitutional attack, namely that the Regulations are ultra vires of the Act themselves.

14 This again raises, it seems to me, a set of arguments of considerable complexity and delicacy for which the Attorney General of Canada on behalf of the Parliament of Canada is entitled to have a reasonable amount of time to respond.

15 I should mention in relation to that point that the concern that is raised, however, by the Federation of Law Societies of Canada is that if one were to grant that considerable time period in order to marshal its resources to respond to those objections to the legislation and the regulations, the net effect upon lawyers in this province could be extremely heavy from the negative point of view. I will turn to that again in a moment.

16 The fourth paragraph refers to the interlocutory order.

17 The fifth paragraph in the Originating Notice of Motion refers to "a declaration that sections 62 and 63 of the Act be read down so as to exclude legal counsel from the 'persons and entities' referred to in those sections."

18 Section 6 of the Originating Notice of Motion goes on to say (seek) "a declaration that section 64 of the Act is inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada and of no force or effect."

19 And paragraph 7 reads "a declaration of section 17 of the Act is inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada and of no force or effect." On that particular point, the main focus of the argument raised before me was concerned with section 5(i) and (j), in particular, and discussion was had about the current state, you might say, of judicial significance of sections 62 and 63 of the Act in particular. As I said before, that is the Originating Notice of Motion that starts the application going in this Court.

20 I should, at this point, address the question of whether or not the Federation of Law Societies of Canada is in some way to be criticized for choosing to proceed before this Court in connection with this issue. In addition to having done so in the Province of British Columbia, part of the debate which was raised by counsel before me turned on the question of whether or not the Attorney General of Canada was being nibbled to death by ducks in connection with numerous applications being made across Canada as opposed to being made in the Federal Court of Canada which, according to Ms. Hutton, would have jurisdiction of the larger sense.

21 The view I take of that particular element of the debate is that the Federation of Law Societies of Canada is properly before this particular Court, as it was properly before the Court in British Columbia. I say that because the lawyers represented by the Federation of Law Societies of Canada in Alberta are, of course, Alberta lawyers. The lawyers represented by the Federation of Law Societies of Canada in British Columbia were British Columbia lawyers.

22 While it may be that the Attorney General of Canada would have found it convenient had the Federation of Law Societies of Canada chosen to proceed in the Federal Court, the Federation of Law Societies of Canada is not required to choose its forum to suit the respondent on the application and can take it to a legitimately able forum before whom to make these applications. The material that has been provided to me, of course, adds that another such application is being made in the Superior Court of Ontario.

23 In the result, I do not think that it is somehow adjudicatively unfair to the Attorney General of Canada for the Federation of Law Societies of Canada to make an application to this particular Court, particularly in light of the history of the negotiations, for lack of a better way of describing it, between the Law Society of Alberta and the Attorney General respecting whether or not the Attorney General would voluntarily accede to the authority of the ruling of Madam Justice Allan in British Columbia and not attempt to enforce the terms of these particular provisions that are under challenge in the Province of Alberta while the proceedings were then pending in British Columbia.

24 I do not, in speaking to this particular point, wish to fault either side, incidentally. I think, as I said before, it is legitimate for the Federation of Law Societies of Canada to choose the forums that it wishes to choose. On the same token, I do not fault the Attorney General of Canada for saying, 'Well, we do not particularly want to be in a position to have to answer the same redundant arguments all across Canada.' It is interesting that the argument of the Attorney General of Canada in that sense, though, cuts both ways in that they are perfectly prepared to defend it in other parts of Canada as long as other parts of Canada follow a different course than Madam Justice Allan. However, I say that without any intention to be critical.

25 So I turn now, then, to the question of the specific Notice of Motion which was placed in front of me, and this, of course, was a Notice of Motion which sought "an interim interlocutory order preserving the status quo and suspending the operation of section 5 of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Suspicious Transaction Reporting Regulations, SOR/2001-317 until the date fixed by this Court for the hearing of the application filed herein.

26 That Notice of Motion went on to say that an additional order that was sought was "an interlocutory order declaring that the decision of the Honourable Madam Justice M.J. Allan of the Supreme Court of British Columbia in the Law Society (British Columbia) v. Canada (Attorney General)[2001 CarswellBC 2569 (B.C. S.C. [In Chambers])] , dated November 20, 2001, should on grounds of comity and res judicata be declared to have effect outside of the Province of British Columbia and in particular in Alberta.

27 The supporting material that has been provided to me in relation to that particular Originating Notice of Motion consists of the Affidavit of Kenneth Nielsen, Q.C., the president elect of the Law Society of Alberta, which was sworn on December 4th of 2001, the Affidavit of Donald F. Thompson, the executive director of the Law Society of Alberta sworn on November 30th of 2001, plus a considerable body of material provided in the contents of the written submissions provided by both counsel very quickly, and to their credit I must say very quickly. And of course a set of documents which I do not think the word enormous necessarily does them justice, which relate to the proceedings in the British Columbia Supreme Court, Court of Appeal, because, of course, they contain a substantial body of material which not doubt would be agreed to as part of the substance of the fundamental challenge raised to the regulations and to the legislation that is before me at the present time.

28 Having set out that sort of background to the matter, I should indicate that the formal order that is sought under the Notice of Motion to which I have referred, which formal order has two parts, can be dealt with, it seems to me, in counter sequential order, that is to say I should deal with the question of the declaration, which is the second paragraph that I have just quoted as to the Notice of Motion. That particular declaration, as mentioned before, deals with the question of comity and res judicata and the specific declaration that was sought was to have the judgment "be declared to have effect outside of the Province of British Columbia, and in particular in Alberta."

29 The specific terminology selected in the Originating Notice of Motion is the driving force behind my approach to that particular paragraph. In my view, it would be wrong in law for me to hold that, either on the grounds of comity or res judicata, I could declare a judgment made by the Superior Court of jurisdiction in British Columbia to have effect in the Province of Alberta. As mentioned before, one of the issues in the Secession Reference had to do with Federalism and I do not think that there is any basis upon which I could declare that to be legally binding in the Province of Alberta.

30 That is not, of course, the same thing as the full faith and credit debate which has been raised by both counsel in connection with this point, unless you just reference the cases which had been the focus of the discussion in relation to full faith and credit. What I mean by this, is that in my view the concept of full faith and credit refers to judicial comity in its traditional form, namely that one Court should not lightly set aside the decision of another Court of co-equal or respectable jurisdiction simply because that particular judgment is not in legal effect in the province in which the judgment was made.

31 The idea of comity is associated very closely with the whole architecture of stare decisis in this country, and stare decisis is a concept which, it seems to me, has a measure of constitutional strength, whether it is a conventional form of constitution element or is a form of constitutional element which is contained within the constitution we inherited from Britain, which, as the Supreme Court of Canada held in the Judges' Case, is a part of the preamble giving rise to a considerable number of implications as to our judicial and legal inheritance.

32 Indeed, at some point, possibly, the argument of the Federation of Law Societies of Canada as applicant in this particular case may be that the preamble itself carries forward the claim of the constitutionality of the solicitor/client privilege and its importance insofar as the concept of Constitutionalism and the Rule of Law in Canada is concerned.

33 However, returning to the question of the cases that were invoked in connection with the subject of judicial comity and res judicata, I say firstly that res judicata, not having been argued, is really not a question here, and therefore it comes down to judicial comity. The first of those cases that was mentioned was, of course, the case of Morguard Investments Ltd. v. De Savoye[(1990), [1991] 2 W.W.R. 217 (S.C.C.)], reported at 1991, volume 2 of the Western Weekly Reports at page 217, written by Mr. Justice LaForest

The next case in the chronological history of the authorities that were provided to me was the decision of George Ernest Hunt v. Lac d'Amiante du Québec Ltée, much better known as Hunt v. T & N plc[(1993), [1994] 1 W.W.R. 129 (S.C.C.)], which is reported at 1994, volume 1 of the Western Weekly Reports at page 129.

34 The third of the authorities that was cited or particularly emphasized, I should say, in connection with this particular issue of judicial comity is the decision reference re the Public Sector Pay Reduction Act of Prince Edward Island v. the Attorney General of Canada, which is more famously known as the Judges' Case and was rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada on September 18th, 1997. The particular citation provided to me in written form was at volume R. v. Campbell (1997), 118 C.C.C. (3d) 193 (S.C.C.) . I will not read the quotations which were provided to me by counsel during the course of argument except to say that the gist and effect of those is that there is a high social value in one court of equal jurisdiction in one province giving respect to another court of equal jurisdiction in another province. This is a very important social value and, as I mentioned before, is one which does not involve a Court simply declaring the other Court to be irrelevant.

35 The concept, though, that (it seems to me that) it is at least partly at the heart of those cases has to do with accepting the legality of the judgment that was made in the other court. In other words, as part of the doctrine of stare decisis it is necessary to accept that in a federal state the rulings made by Superior Courts of criminal jurisdiction, given the cachet that they have been by the Supreme Court of Canada on various occasions, are part of the legal framework of the country. They are, therefore, part of the whole structure of law, whether provincial or federally based, which forms that constitution of -- body of laws, I should say, not constitution of laws, that we have to consider binding upon all of us.

36 The idea there is that everybody should be able to rely upon the law which is always speaking in a manner which gives them some guidance about how they should behave. This is particularly important in this particular instance because, of course, the legal profession represented by the applicant Federation of Law Societies of Canada is asking the Court to tell it how to behave in light of enactments of Parliament when it is suggesting that those enactments of Parliament are constitutionally unacceptable.

37 I do understand entirely what the Supreme Court of Canada was driving at in relation to asserting the essential necessity of judicial comity because there is a great danger to constitutional coherence and to the reputation of the law and to its ability to transmit predictable messages to the public if in fact judges simply disregard other law as if it was not there. That is a form of reverse stare decisis, which I would think would fall into the category of judicial mischief, as this Court of Appeal of Alberta has said from time to time is a serious problem.

38 I will not get into a long disposition about my views about how stare decisis has been perhaps given a uniquely Alberta flavour from time to time in the Breathalyzer law category, for instance, however, suffice it to say, I have to accede to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada to tell me to behave myself and to give some respect to other rulings of comparable authority.

39 In that respect, however, it is clear that the Supreme Court of Canada did not mean to say that I am bound legally by the judgment of Madam Justice Allan. That point is, I think, well posed by counsel for the Attorney General of Canada because she says I should not consider myself bound by that judgment, not only because of its geographical distinction from my location, but because, in Ms. Hutton's very capable submissions, Madam Justice Allan's judgment should be considered to be faulty for several reasons. Ms. Hutton pointed out what she suggested to be five major reasons for that, but the fundamental one that she focused most of her argument upon was that in her submission Madam Justice Allan seriously misconceived the objectives of this particular legislation, its role in the structure and purposes of Canada's executive branch of government, shall we say, in preserving Canada from being a haven for criminals or being a place in which people can conduct crimes with impunity and particularly using lawyers as a shield or vehicle or means by which those crimes can be committed effectively.

40 In this respect, it seems relevant to observe that if one applies the doctrine set out in the Supreme Court of Canada's famous judgment in Rizzo Shoes that the objective of the particular piece of legislation that is before me now, and which will be the subject matter of a constitutional debate later, is as set out in the title. The Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act provides for the following title: It is "an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence." In other words, the essential theme as indicated by the title of that Act is to control by observation and by review the financial transactions inside Canada and between Canada and other places for the purposes of ensuring that the three forms of, or three stages of money laundering to which were referred, Ms. Hutton referred to in her debate, do not occur.

41 I think it is possible to take judicial notice of the fact that that particular form of activity is relatively prevalent in the world and that in fact it finances not only the activities of organized criminals, as set out in the material provided by Ms. Hutton, but in fact is now clearly related to the activities of terrorists across the world who are involved in mass murder. Consequently, one can understand, therefore, why the Parliament of Canada has been particularly anxious to address this particular point, noting in particular, as well, that there has been considerable pressure on the international stage on this issue.

42 Having said all that, I turn, then, back to the question of paragraph number 2 in the Notice of Motion, and as I have mentioned before, I do not believe that an interlocutory order declaring that the decision of Madam Justice Allan should have effect outside the Province of British Columbia is justified and I would not accede to that particular application.

43 That order brings me back, then, to paragraph 1 in the Notice of Motion which provides for an interim interlocutory order doing what counsel for the Federation of Law Societies of Canada called "preserving the status quo" and suspending the operation of section 5 of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Suspicious Transaction Reporting Regulations. I will not try to repeat that title every time I say it, I will just call it the Regulations.

44 The point there is rather interesting in that it may well be part of the debate of this particular substantive motion when ultimately heard as to whether or not it does in fact maintain the status quo, as such. I will not get into that, but on the point of paragraph 1 of the current Notice of Motion, it is clear that there is a three-part test which the Supreme Court of Canada has specified for orders of that kind, because this is an injunctive order that would have the effect of stopping the operation of the legislation, in whole or in part.

45 Even the proposal that I made this morning, which has been discussed and inquired into by both counsel, would have the effect of stopping the effect of the law, or at least stopping the effect of this particular Regulations in some part. So I have to say that I am obliged, therefore, to give consideration to the test which has been set out in the decision of Metropolitan Stores (MTS) Ltd. v. Manitoba Food & Commercial Workers, Local 832, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 110 (S.C.C.), and also RJR-Macdonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199 (S.C.C.). And notably, recently, Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), [2000] 2 S.C.R. 764 (S.C.C.)

46 I mention the Harper case because it has the interesting feature of involving what was suggested to be irreparable harm on both sides of the equation. Quite often the situation in relation to an application for a stay or injunction relates to irreparable harm on one side only. The irreparable harm arguments that are made before me are similar to Harper in the sense that the Attorney General of Canada strongly urges that irreparable harm will be done to the situation of the Law of Canada, and the details of which I will turn to in a second, and of course a fervent application was made of a similar sort on behalf of the lawyers of the Province of Alberta by the Federation of Law Societies of Canada.

47 Having said that, I am obliged firstly, however, before dealing with irreparable harm, to talk about the question of serious and triable issue. Ms. Hutton for the Attorney General of Canada has suggested that I should not reach the conclusion that was reached by Madam Justice Allan that there was a serious and triable issue in this matter because Madam Justice Allan's ruling was, in her submission, incorrect on the basis upon which she would conclude that there was a serious and triable issue.

48 Whether or not that is so, it does seem to me that I must conclude, nevertheless, that a serious and triable issue of various sorts exists in this case. At the core of this debate, as I mentioned at the very outset of my comments, we have a discussion as between the location of the rights of individuals to be able to consult with their clients -- sorry, to be able to consult with their lawyers without some concern that the lawyers will turn state's evidence secretly behind their back and then turn over documents to the government, the sincerity of which is not necessarily enthusiastically endorsed by the client. I make that observation only in passing. It does not really enter into the big picture.

49 My point is, though, that there is a serious and triable issue on the question of where the solicitor/client privilege is located in the Constitution. I mentioned earlier this morning the decision of R. v. McClure[2001 CarswellOnt 496 (S.C.C.)] , and Ms. Duckett mentioned the decision of Law Society (British Columbia) v. Mangat[2001 CarswellBC 2168 (S.C.C.)], both of which are recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada which certainly communicate a level of value of the solicitor/client privilege which, if not constitutional in nature, has a constitutional timbre to it and so there will be a considerable debate on that particular point.

50 If, in fact, solicitor/client privilege was not of a constitutional nature, it would be difficult to put forward the Originating Notice of Motion in this instance, and therefore the Notice of Motion in and of itself raises that question. That is a serious and triable issue. It is a serious and triable issue recently dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada, albeit in different context. It is not one which, in my view, can be set aside during the course of this debate. It is also not one which is raised on some experimental basis by the Federation of Law Societies on a private reference. This is not a situation where the Federation of Law Societies is coming before the Court to sidestep the fact that it does not, like the Governments of Canada, have the ability to make References to the Courts for answers. It is genuinely coming here as a litigant saying, 'We are acting for the lawyers of the Province of Alberta. The lawyers of the Province of Alberta are concerned about how to guide themselves under the current regime of legislation, and they are afraid of the considerable penalties which are set out in the legislation that we are talking about here.'

51 I should, in that respect, refer to, specifically, what the applicant's written submissions very helpfully point out in relation to the implications of those Regulations and I am referring now to the written submissions filed on behalf of the Federation.

52 As pointed out by the Federation, section 5 of the Regulations provides that every legal counsel is subject to part 1 of the Act when they engage in certain activities on behalf of any person or entity. I pause to mention that we are talking about activities which are in the nature of transfer of funds, and movement of assets, and acquisition and sale of real estate, and a lot of the many things which would have to be considered to be fundamental to the actions of a solicitor, at least as historically understood in the history of the western world, shall we say.

53 Paragraph number 3 of the written submissions, the applicant goes on to say that legal counsel is defined by section 2 of the Act as in the Province of Quebec an advocate or notary, and in any other province a barrister and solicitor. Clearly, then, the standing of the Federation of Law Societies is clearly made out in that particular element of it.

54 It goes on to point out that section 5 of the Regulations and part 1 of the Act specifies that legal counsel are required to report to a federal agency, the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre referred to in argument as FINTRAC. The requirement to report concerns information regarding transactions engaged in on behalf of clients when there are reasonable grounds to suspect that the transaction is related to the commission of a money laundering offence. This is important to emphasize because, as mentioned before, the question of whether or not there is a serious and triable issue turns upon whether this is a question involving the relationship between a lawyer and a client. Clearly, that was intended by the Regulations. It has to do with lawyers and client, so at least in that sense, on the face of it, there is a serious and triable issue that connects to that point.

55 The applicant goes on to point out the information must be sent to FINTRAC within 30 days after the suspicion first arises. This is what creates the time limitation problem that we have right now because the law came into effect on November 8th of 2001, and indeed the first of the 30-day limitations will expire on Saturday.

56 The information is required to be provided to FINTRAC in accordance with a schedule to the Regulations and it, as pointed out by counsel for the Federation, is an extensive list of information. The Federation goes on to point out that section 8 of the Act prohibits legal counsel from disclosing to their clients that they have made suspicious transaction reports or from disclosing the contents of the report with intent to prejudice the criminal investigation, whether or not one has begun.

57 I pause to comment on that, that particular aspect of the Act which is implicitly under challenge with the rest of them. It is an interesting point because it raises a question which has been before the Court of Appeal of Alberta, at least recently, in connection with whether or not a person is entitled to notice of an evidentiary step being taken against them by the police authorities. I am referring, in that respect, to a recent decision called S.A.B. in which the question of notice in relation to taking DNA tests was the subject matter of the case and there was a split decision by the Court of Appeal, which is now before the Supreme Court of Canada.

58 I only mention this in passing because it has to do with the ambit of section 8 and the fact that Parliament chose in this particular instance to ensure that not only would legal counsel be required to provide the information, but they would likewise be required to refrain from telling the client that they had done so.

59 The aspect of requiring legal counsel to refrain from doing so is somewhat reminiscent of the ex parte nature of search warrants and, therefore, it does touch upon the point, though, that is raised in the serious and triable issue level and on the irreparable harm issue raised by Ms. Duckett, because, as she pointed out both this morning and this afternoon, this element of it is one of the things which the clients of lawyers in the Province of Alberta would have to raise a concern in their minds about whether or not the government is extracting information behind their back.

60 The client, theoretically under this section, could not even ask the lawyer if they had done it and get an answer. Mind you, that would put the lawyer in a rather awkward position. I will go no further there because we will debate that later.

61 The submission of the applicant goes on to refer to section 11 of the Act which states that nothing in part 1 "requires a legal counsel to disclose any communication that is subject to solicitor/client privilege" and then they contend that nothing in the Act prevents the disclosure of solicitor/client confidential information but indeed compels disclosure of the information as listed in the schedule. In this particular respect, the ultimate argument, possibly, will be something reminiscent of the Lavallee decision before the Supreme Court of Canada in relation to the role of the lawyer and whether or not this creates a conflict between a lawyer and the client in relation to the handling of the obligations contained therein.

62 I mention in this respect those cases which are currently before the Supreme Court of Canada because one of the matters which was of concern to Mr. Justice Côté when he orders judgment here in the Court of Appeal had to do with the question of the -- create division of a wedge between a lawyer and a client in terms of a legal obligation and the -- I should just include in this particular reference to go on to say that as pointed out by the applicant Federation of Law Societies, a very substantial punishment is provided for under section 75 of the Act for noncompliance with this particular provision.

63 I recall mentioning the $25,000 fine and I can recall why I thought that. At the time, it seemed to me because of the provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with summary conviction offences that that popped into my head when we were debating the matter. But that is not the point that is important here, and suffice it to say that section 75 provides for an indictable offence which is also hybrid and could be proceeded by summary conviction.

64 So having said that by way of the background in relation to this case, I do think that there are serious and triable issues of a variety of sorts, but at least one is present, namely the impact that that would have on the solicitor/client relationship and its impact upon solicitor/client privilege as well, which is a somewhat more narrow concept.

65 Now, it is true that Ms. Hutton did suggest that solicitor/client privilege will not be affected by simply providing information as to the transfer of money from a client to a lawyer, or from a lawyer to a bank, or from one bank to another bank under some form of extension of the privilege, and I have to say there is some jurisprudence on this of recent note. Nevertheless, that offers no comfort whatsoever to Ms. Duckett and in light of section 8, which I have referred to, as well as section 11, it may not offer any comfort to the legal profession to know that.

66 So let's turn, then, to the question of irreparable harm. As I mentioned before, the irreparable harm is raised on both sides at this particular point. If I can oversimplify the submission made by Ms. Duckett in this particular respect, she set out three basic suggestions constituting irreparable harm. The first was there would be harm directly to the client. The second was that there would be harm to the lawyer. And the third, that there would be harm to the reputation of the bar and the very functioning of the relationship between lawyers and clients. These are three elements of the argument that she put forward. A lot of them centre around the question of creating divided loyalty between the client -- on the part of the lawyer toward the client and by requiring the lawyer to be a stool pigeon, in a sense, even for information of a somewhat neutral nature which might also, as mentioned by Ms. Hutton, be largely obtained through examination of bank records which also will have to be provided to the FINTRAC under this particular legislation.

67 The distinction that is made in this respect between lawyers and other forms of professionals that is accused, or is suggested by Ms. Hutton to be one that is to be subject of criticism and would raise the eyebrows of the enlightened citizens of Canada is an interesting question. It is one that is advocated strongly by the affiant in the affidavit to which reference has been made, but I observe that in relation to lawyers the desire on the part of those who are advancing this particular piece of legislation to ensure that lawyers are equally dragooned into this particular service along with the other forms of economic contributors, you might say, of a professional nature, is based on the fact that lawyers have a unique advantage to this legislation. Of all the types of individuals who might be, as pointed out by the affidavits, in a position to provide useful information for the purposes of checking into money laundering, lawyers are right up there in terms of primary care candidates, and the interesting element of that, then, is that it suggests that the very nature of lawyers is unique and special even from the proponents of this enactment.

68 Having said that, then, one wonders about the validity of an argument that lawyers are not being singled out -- sorry, that the public is going to think that lawyers are being singled out for special treatment if they get an exemption that nobody else gets, if they are being singled out for special treatment for the application of this particular law. Now, that is something which will be debated in the future by us when we come to discussing this particular point. But in relation to the decision of whether or not irreparable harm is met as a criterion for the purposes of determining whether or not there should be some form of stay, I have to say that it seems to me that the position of lawyers is not being given any more special treatment than it has in almost every other cognizable venue in which the issue has arisen.

69 It is true that Jeremy Bentham thought that only lawyers could come up with the solicitor/client privilege to protect themselves, and only lawyers would dream up this sort of specialized location for them, but the late philosopher notwithstanding, we have lived with this now for at least 150 or more years. It is well reflected as a difference between lawyers and other forms of professionals who might deal in money with clients and I do not think that the enlightened public of Canada would think that somehow there is a special nature to lawyers as some sort of pristine persons of honour who are therefore being given a benefit of an assumption in their favour that is not available to other people. It is the special nature of a legal relationship which is being sedulously fostered and not lawyers themselves.

70 In that respect, I might observe that the British Columbia Court of Appeal's contribution to the Lavallee debate which is now before the Supreme Court of Canada divided to some extent of whether or not lawyers and law firms should be immune from section 487 of the Criminal Code, as well as section 488 -- as well as from the interpretation of section 488.1 of the Criminal Code. The dissenting opinion in the British Columbia Court of Appeal was that section 487 should still apply to lawyers, as well, so that lawyers were not getting any special treatment, at least from her point of view, as the possible subjects of ordinary search in an investigation of crime.

71 Indeed, Ms. Duckett's submission is that one should take into account in relation to deciding irreparable harm on the side of the government that in fact lawyers are indeed individuals who are subject to the law and must obey the law. In relation to that point I suppose I can summarize Ms. Duckett's contentions relative to irreparable harm to the government, and I use the word government loosely because I understand Ms. Hutton's point on government and state. Ms. Duckett appears to say the following, that the reason why there is no irreparable harm if a stay was entered in this instance to the government is because the government did not have this legislation before anyway and it has taken a considerable time period to get to it between 1999 and the present time. I do not, in mentioning that, propose to editorialize on whether the government operated too slowly or not. Ms. Duckett is simply making the point that the urgency of this hearing is not necessarily driven by urgency reflected before the enactment of the legislation.

72 The second point she made, as I mentioned before, was that lawyers have duties. They have to obey the law, they cannot obstruct justice, they cannot destroy evidence, they must in fact maintain records and so forth. In fact, she went on to embellish that particular point about maintaining records by referring to the fact that lawyers are obliged to keep accounting records and things of that sort. I would think that Ms. Hutton could riposte to that particular point by saying, 'Well, if in fact the obligation to report to FINTRAC is not present, why would the lawyers keep the records in the form and with the content which is required by the Regulations. They would presumably just keep the information, if any, in the form that they normally would keep in any record keeping they do in their files.'

73 In that particular point, I have to say we discussed the question of whether there would be an evidentiary impact on the government's side if in fact the lawyers were not required to at least put the forms together in the forms required by the legislation. I have to say that I think there would be an evidentiary impact on the government if they were not required to at least put the forms together and that is something to be considered on the question of whether irreparable harm would follow from this.

74 Nevertheless, dealing with the points that Ms. Duckett has raised, as I mentioned before, it does seem to me relevant to say that it is not irrelevant to observe that lawyers do have to maintain certain records in relation to the transactions with which they are engaged.

75 Ms. Duckett went on to say as well that insofar as the harm question to the state in this matter is concerned if a stay was entered, the privilege that lawyers have only goes so far and that in fact lawyers might be subject to search and apprehension and inquiry and subpoena and all the rest of it.

76 So, in summary, then, and I have considerably oversimplified the position that Ms. Duckett has put forward in relation to irreparable harm, it is this, is that lawyers would be placed in a completely untenable 'Hobson's Choice.' They would face prosecution on the one side or face Law Society discipline on the other side, and that the divided loyalty situation would therefore directly hamper them professionally speaking. It would also directly hamper their client in a manner which could not be repaired simply by, for instance, the downstream immunity under section 7 of the Charter which was discussed earlier this morning.

77 In that respect, I am referring to the fact that if information is conscripted about the client, the derivative immunity in relation to that information would only apply, arguably, within the contours of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. S. (R.J.)[1995 CarswellOnt 2 (S.C.C.)] , and in British Columbia (Securities Commission) v. Branch[1995 CarswellBC 171 (S.C.C.)], and so forth, and there are certain limitations in relation to that, which I do not need to get into now.

78 In addition, the derivative immunity would not protect third parties that might be affected by that whose information might be contained in that documentation. Indeed, I have to say, that is exactly the point of this legislation. They want -- the authorities, with conservatively good motives -- want to find out precisely that sort of information. That is the whole idea. So in that sense there is a risk of harm to the client and that harm may not be trivial. The client himself might be an innocent dupe of some other criminal organization and the acquisition of that information via the lawyer of that client may in fact face great jeopardies for their client which the client might find more proximate and physical than we have not discussed.

79 As far as the reputation of the bar is concerned, there is the concern that the reliability of lawyers generally in this province would become dubious, shall we say, on the subject of whether or not they could be trusted to keep their mouths shut, which is what they are supposed to normally do in relation to their relationship with their clients are seeking advice.

80 On this point, I should mention, as well, since I have covered it briefly before, that while I agree that not every consultation between a lawyer and a client is necessarily something governed by the solicitor/client privilege, the ability to draw that fine distinction from case to case or situation to situation is not necessarily an easy one and the average citizen who is not a lawyer would probably have that concern about the reputation of the bar because they would not know what it is about their lawyer they could trust for sure and so there is the concern on that side.

81 So I will just say that is Ms. Duckett's position relative to the irreparable harm on her side and I have already mentioned her position relative to the irreparable harm on the side of the government. As I say, I apologize for using the term government. I do not think that is really the appropriate way of looking at it. It is the public interest which is really involved. So when I refer to the word government, I am referring to public interest.

82 Now, as I said before, though, this is a case with irreparable harm arguments on the other side. The public interest argument made on behalf of Canada by Ms. Hutton includes the types of damage which are not cosmetic. It is not a trivial matter to say that a piece of legislation shall be suspended in its operation when it is a law of general application and a law of high motive and a law of clear purpose and a law that has a fairly discrete, almost mathematical structure to it, at least insofar as its requirements are concerned. And I do not, in that respect, wish to dismiss an argument about vagueness or over breadth which might later on come, but what I mean is, that in specific terms the focus of this particular demand upon professionals, including lawyers, is to ensure that they report transactions and so at least we all understand what that essentially is involved.

83 As I mentioned before, I do not believe it is a simply cosmetic effect on the part of the government to have this law not in effect for a period of time, especially this period of time. The reason I say that is I have to, I think, take judicial notice of the fact that there is a worldwide investigation going on relative to the location of assets from terrorist organizations and there is nothing to suggest, of course, that any lawyers in the Province of Alberta have the vaguest of knowledge or participation or hint of any such in relation to such things.

84 However, on the international level there is a great deal of interest, not simply on the part of police agencies, but on the part of states generally in making sure that the sources of income, whether direct or indirect, or sideways or anything else, are dried up. That the ability of people to hide or park money for any of these purposes, including just routine organized crime, if there is such a thing, is not encouraged and the effect of Madam Justice Allan's judgment in British Columbia, I do not wish to make this as an interim comment about it, is taken by Canada as in a sense insulating the Province of British Columbia as a place in which that sort of information can now be pipelined through lawyers, at least safely, at least for the time being at least.

85 So it is not -- my point there, as I said before -- it is not simply a trivial matter from the point of view of the government in the practical application of this law. As I mentioned before, as well, the other side of that argument is that it is not a trivial matter relative to the repute or the authority of government, either. The public has in recent years had something to say about the role of courts in Canada in exercising their constitutional authority. This debate is a perfectly legitimate one in a democracy and I therefore have to consider whether or not the undermining of this particular piece of legislation would have some form of negative effect on the repute of the law by virtue of its effect on the authority of the government, shall we say.

86 I have to say, though, that I would not -- having said that -- I would not attach a whole lot of weight to that. Obviously it might have some effect on the government if they passed a law which was completely ridiculous about how to physically treat people and that got struck down by the courts and the public might think the courts are getting involved a little too much there, but I would not think the enlightened public would actually think about that very hard before deciding that the courts were right and that Parliament was off base.

87 So, passing from that point, then, having acknowledged that there are irreparable harm arguments on both sides of the question, I then have to turn to balance of convenience. Balance of convenience, of course, raises the question that I mentioned to counsel at the outset, which is, is there some form of remedy which can be offered which can address the concerns of irreparable harm on both sides. I sought to locate that in the approach that I mentioned, namely the idea of saying, 'Okay, we will not suspend the obligation of the lawyers to file the reports, we simply will not give the fruits of those reports to the government.' We will make sure that the terms of the Regulation are still in force and effect and are not in any way stymied for future reference while the application to challenge this legislation is ongoing. However, we will on the same token, not provide, in effect, the fundamental breach -- feed the concerns that Ms. Duckett has used as described by way of a fundamental breach or fundamental breakdown of the relationship between lawyers and clients.

88 The problem here is actually a very thorny one, I have to say, and it has caused me a lot of thought as to exactly how one would deal with this. I would not want to seize on my own suggestion as being the fount of all wisdom or anything, because it was merely an attempt on my part to attempt to determine some methodology which would not have a zero/sum character to it, in other words, you lose, you win kind of a result.

89 I do think that as mentioned before, that both sides of this particular argument are manifestly important, both of them have considerable weight, both of them invoke incredibly important social values in a constitutional democracy. The result, though, is that it seems to me that I cannot let international pressure, as it were, and the needs of the law, conformity objective that has been referred to very eloquently by Ms. Hutton, dilute or diminish the constitutional rights of Canadians, and where there is a reasonable argument that those rights are protected fundamentally by the rule of lawyers, I do not feel that I should yield to that pressure and that philosophy, as strongly and well-placed and well-stated as it has been made, in somehow reducing the constitutional rights of Canadians.

90 That leads me to conclude, therefore, that a form of stay should be entered pending the grant of this particular hearing, holding of the hearing. And as I said before, therefore, it is a question of whether I use the form of stay that was considered by Madam Justice Allan or something of the sort that I raised myself.

91 I know that what is going to happen is that regardless of how I call this somebody is going to appeal and they will get before the Court of Appeal pretty quickly, and I am not too worried about that. I do my bit, they do theirs, but I conclude that in the end result it would not, in my view, endanger the repute of the legal profession if I was to make the direction that I proposed this morning, and that is therefore the stay will apply to this effect, that the obligation of lawyers under this particular Regulation is not ended, it is not stayed, however, it is to be done in this manner: They will provide the documentation in the form required by the regulation in sealed envelopes identifying their file number, not their file name, and the name of the lawyer. This will be provided to the Law Society of Alberta for storage.

92 The Law Society of Alberta will not be subject to any search warrants in relation to any of these documents. I will enjoin that, in other words, I will, if that is even within my jurisdiction, I would like to that, so I will do it and let somebody appeal it. And the effect, therefore, is that lawyers will be required to do this, carry out the legislation, but they will not be turning over their documentation to either the Court or to FINTRAC or other representatives of the government. And as I said before, the lawyers will not be obliged to provide on the outside of the envelope anything more than a file number by which the lawyer can determine who it is, who it is about, what the amounts involved are, or anything. It is, in other words, in a sense, a secret file that is to be provided to the Law Society, the Law Society having very kindly agreed to be a repository for this particular material.

93 I would ask the Law Society to simply file stamp the envelopes when they arrive, as to date of receipt. They do not have to keep any other records that they do not feel they want to in relation to it, they merely have to store the material and, as I said before, I would make an order directing that this material cannot be seized from the offices of the Law Society without consent of the Court. That is this Court. So, in other words, you cannot go to a Provincial Court Judge and get a search warrant, you would have to come back here to get a search warrant to get any of that stuff.

94 This order is subject to review at the time of the -- if there is a fuller application for review of the stay or at the time of the hearing of the actual motion challenging the Regulations and legislation. And is there anything else that counsel need to clarify that? Any other preservative suggestions that you would have, Ms. Duckett about that?

95 MS. DUCKETT: It may be implicit in the order, but I take it if the legislation is upheld then those documents are to be directed to FINTRAC, and if the legislation is successfully challenged the documents may be destroyed?

96 THE COURT: Well, actually, I would think they would be returned to the lawyers from whom they came, but destroyed, I imagine the lawyers would have copies in there anyways, so -- do I have to actually put that in the order, do you think?

97 MS. HUTTON: My Lord, perhaps the matter could be left to an application at the time that the final determination as to validity of the law is made. Parties appear and apply for an order for the proper disposition of the documents.

98 THE COURT: Right.

99 MS. DUCKETT: I suppose if it's clear that the documents will remain sealed until the final determination of the constitutional issue, then the disposition of the documents can be dealt with at that time.

100 THE COURT: Right. And I should indicate, too, that I guess for clarification, although it is no doubt not a comfortable thing, because I have not stayed the operation of the legislation and the regulation, the secrecy element of it still applies. In other words, when a lawyer has provided a secret envelope to the Law Society, the lawyer is not entitled to let the client know that he or she has done so. And that is, of course, subject to the ultimate determination of whether this law is valid or not, because obviously if I was to rule, by the way, that this law is invalid, the envelopes are not subject to the stay anymore, then it would have to be somebody else who would have to take care of that after that, I would think.

101 So, are there any questions about that so as to clarify the effect of all that? I have talked for almost an hour, in fact more than an hour.

102 MS. HUTTON: My Lord, just a couple of thoughts. As to notifying the profession as to this order, perhaps something needs to happen there.

103 THE COURT: Well, I guess the Law Society presumably will do something, I do not know. They are not going to be happy. I cannot make it -- my advice is going to be worth about what they think it is worth at this point.

104 I might say one thing about this law, is that it has been in the public eye for some time and the people who are engaged in these transactions are already aware that the banks are not going to have this kind of exemption. So I think the people who might be suspicious that their lawyers might be doing this sort of thing as against their interests may as a result be somewhat cautious about what they try to pass through their lawyer's hands as a result, and I am afraid that that concerns me greatly, but I do not think the average citizen buying a house is going to be affected by this, you know, or whatever. But that is beside the point, I guess. So I do not have any suggestion, I guess, to make.

105 Any other comments that are -- or are we all worn out now? Okay. Thanks counsel. I appreciate that. This was a lot of hard work on the part of everybody, a lot of reading, I must say, by me, and I will get back to you and Ms. Hutton in a second. And I want to thank you all for this.

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE LA COLOMBIE-BRITANNIQUE

Droit constitutionnel — Charte des droits — Applicabilité de la Charte — Gouvernement — Un hôpital fait-il partie du gouvernement avec la conséquence que ses politiques sont sujettes à révision en vertu de la Charte? — Dans l'affirmative, la politique de retraite obligatoire est-elle une «loi»? — Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 15, 32.

Droit constitutionnel — Charte des droits — Droits à l'égalité — Égalité devant la loi — Discrimination fondée sur l'âge — Perte automatique à 65 ans des privilèges accordés par un hôpital à moins de preuve de compétence — La politique de retraite obligatoire est-elle une «loi»? — Dans l'affirmative, enfreint-elle l'art. 15(1) de la Charte? — Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 15, 32.

Les intimés avaient des privilèges d'admission au Vancouver General Hospital. Le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations de l'hôpital exige que tous les médecins prennent leur retraite à l'âge de 65 ans sauf to offer the Hospital. The Regulation was approved by the hospital's Board in May of 1984 and was subsequently approved by the Minister of Health as required by statute. The Board decided not to renew the admitting privileges of most of the respondents in May 1985.

Respondents were not employees of the Vancouver General but rather were retained by their patients and paid through the provincial medicare plan. They accordingly did not come within the protection against age-based discrimination found in the Human Rights Act because that protection is limited to employment situations. In Vancouver, doctors have privileges at only one hospital.

The hospital is run by a Board. The government had power to appoint 14 of the 16 members of the Board. The Minister's power with respect to the by-laws of the Vancouver General extended beyond the negative power of veto set out in the Vancouver General Hospital Act to the positive power under the Hospital Act to require the Board of Trustees to adopt new by-laws or change existing by-laws.

The respondents commenced these proceedings to set aside the Board's decision and to obtain a declaration that Regulation 5.04, either by its terms or by the manner of its application, violated ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter and the Human Rights Act. The British Columbia Supreme Court issued an interim injunction restraining the Board from removing respondents' admitting privileges pending the outcome of their application under the Charter and the Human Rights Act. The Court of Appeal upheld the issuance of the interim injunction. The British Columbia Supreme Court then granted respondents' application and the Court of Appeal also upheld that decision.

The constitutional questions before this Court queried: (1) whether the Charter applied to Vancouver General's establishing and administering Regulation 5.04; if so (2) whether the Regulation or (3) its administration contravened s. 15(1) of the Charter; and (4) given an affirmative answer to either questions 2 or 3, whether the Regulation or the manner of its administration was nevertheless justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

The Attorneys General of Canada, Ontario and British Columbia intervened.

s'ils peuvent démontrer qu'ils ont quelque chose d'unique à offrir à l'hôpital. Le conseil d'administration de l'hôpital a approuvé ce règlement en mai 1984 et le ministre de la Santé l'a approuvé plus tard conformément à la loi. Le conseil a décidé de ne pas renouveler les privilèges d'admission de la plupart des intimés en mai 1985.

Les intimés ne sont pas des employés du Vancouver General, mais ils sont retenus par leurs patients et sont payés par le régime d'assurance-maladie de la province. Ils ne jouissent donc pas de la protection contre la discrimination fondée sur l'âge conférée par la Human Rights Act puisque cette protection se limite aux situations liées à l'emploi. À Vancouver, les médecins ont des privilèges à un seul hôpital.

Un conseil d'administration dirige l'hôpital. Le gouvernement a le pouvoir de nommer 14 des 16 membres du conseil d'administration. Au-delà du pouvoir négatif de veto établi dans la Vancouver General Hospital Act, les pouvoirs du ministre relativement aux règlements du Vancouver General Hospital s'étendent au pouvoir réel en vertu de la Hospital Act d'exiger du conseil d'administration qu'il adopte de nouveaux règlements ou modifie les règlements existants.

Les intimés ont intenté cette action en vue d'annuler la décision du conseil d'administration et d'obtenir un jugement déclaratoire portant que le règlement 5.04, soit par sa formulation, soit dans son application, viole les art. 7 et 15 de la Charte et la Human Rights Act. La Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique a décerné une injonction provisoire pour empêcher le conseil de restreindre ou de supprimer les privilèges d'admission des intimés jusqu'à l'issue de la requête des intimés fondée sur la Charte et la Human Rights Act. La Cour d'appel a confirmé l'octroi de l'injonction intérimaire. La Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique a rendu jugement en faveur des intimés sur leur requête et la Cour d'appel a confirmé cette décision.

Les questions constitutionnelles soulevées devant notre Cour sont les suivantes: (1) la Charte s'applique-t-elle à l'adoption et à la mise en œuvre du règlement 5.04 par le Vancouver General? Dans l'affirmative (2) le règlement ou (3) son application enfreignent-ils le par. 15(1) de la Charte? (4) si la réponse aux questions 2 ou 3 est affirmative, le règlement et la façon dont il a été appliqué sont-ils néanmoins justifiés en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte?

Held (Wilson, L'Heureux-Dubé and Cory JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the plaintiffs' action dismissed.

Per Dickson C.J. and La Forest and Gonthier JJ.: The wording of s. 32 of the Charter clearly indicates that the Charter binds only government. The Vancouver General does not form part of government within the meaning of this section and accordingly its actions in adopting and administering Regulation 5.04 do not fall within the Charter's ambit. It is an autonomous body. The provision of a public service, even one as important as health care, does not per se qualify as a governmental function under s. 32.

Regulation 5.04 did not arise because of executive or legislative action and accordingly did not attract Charter review. The requirement for ministerial approval was only supervisory in nature to ensure that the hospital's actions do not run counter to the government's powers to prescribe standards in respect of hospital administration. The Regulation was initiated by the Board and in no way represented ministerial policy with respect to the renewal of admitting privileges. The statutes under which the hospital operated did not require that it adopt a special policy respecting the renewal of privileges of doctors at age 65.

The Vancouver General did not form part of the "administrative branch" of government merely because it was incorporated to provide services mandated under the Province's responsibility for health care. A difference between ultimate or extraordinary and routine or regular control must be drawn. While the fate of the hospital is ultimately in the provincial government's hands, the responsibility for routine matters such as the policy on the renewal of admitting privileges lies with the Board and is not subject to government control, barring extraordinary circumstances. The Minister's power to require the hospital to adopt by-laws or to revise them does not undermine the hospital's responsibility for rules adopted on its own initiative. The Lieutenant Governor's power of appointment was simply a mechanism to ensure the balanced representation of these groups and organizations on the hospital's principal decision-making body. It was not a means to exercise regular government control over the hospital's day-to-day operations.

Arrêt (Les juges Wilson, L'Heureux-Dubé et Cory sont dissidents): Le pourvoi est accueilli et l'action des demandeurs est rejetée.

Le juge en chef Dickson et les juges La Forest et Gonthier: Le texte de l'art. 32 de la Charte indique fortement que seul le gouvernement est lié par la Charte. Le Vancouver General ne fait pas partie du gouvernement au sens de cet article et, en conséquence, l'adoption et l'application du règlement 5.04 ne relèvent pas de la portée de la Charte. C'est un organisme autonome. La prestation d'un service public, même s'il s'agit d'un service aussi important que les soins de santé, ne permet pas de la qualifier de fonction gouvernementale en vertu de l'art. 32.

Le règlement 5.04 ne découle pas d'une action du pouvoir exécutif ou du pouvoir législatif et en conséquence ne donne pas lieu à l'examen fondé sur la Charte. L'obligation d'obtenir l'approbation du ministre n'est qu'un simple pouvoir de contrôle pour veiller à ce que les actions de l'hôpital ne soient pas contraires aux pouvoirs conférés au gouvernement de prévoir des normes en matière d'administration hospitalière. Le règlement est l'œuvre du conseil d'administration et ne constitue nullement une politique ministérielle concernant le renouvellement des privilèges d'admission. Les lois qui régissent l'exploitation du Vancouver General ne l'obligeaient pas à adopter une politique particulière concernant le renouvellement des privilèges des médecins qui ont atteint l'âge de 65 ans.

Le Vancouver General ne fait pas partie de la «branche administrative» du gouvernement parce qu'il a été constitué en personne morale pour dispenser des services qui relèvent de la responsabilité de la province en matière de soins de santé. Il faut établir une différence entre le contrôle absolu ou extraordinaire et le contrôle routinier ou régulier. L'existence de l'hôpital relève en dernier ressort du gouvernement provincial, mais les aspects quotidiens du fonctionnement de l'hôpital, comme l'adoption d'une politique en matière de renouvellement des privilèges d'admission, relèvent du conseil d'administration et, sous réserve d'une situation extraordinaire, ne sont pas assujettis au contrôle du gouvernement. Le pouvoir que possède le ministre d'exiger l'adoption ou la révision par l'hôpital de règlements ne modifie pas la responsabilité de l'hôpital à l'égard des règlements qu'il adopte de sa propre initiative. Le pouvoir de nomination du lieutenant-gouverneur est simplement un mécanisme visant à assurer une représentation équilibrée de certains groupes et organismes au sein du principal organe décisionnel de l'hôpital. Il ne s'agit pas d'un moyen permettant au gouvernement de contrôler régulièrement les activités quotidiennes de l'hôpital.

Had the Charter been applicable, Regulation 5.04 would qualify as a law and the alleged inequality would therefore be one made by "law". The deprivations which arose because of the Board's policy were based on personal characteristics attributed to persons 65 and over and accordingly were discriminatory within the meaning of s. 15(1) of the Charter.

It was thus necessary to consider whether the Regulation and its associated practice constituted a reasonable limit under s. 1 of the Charter. Judicial evaluation of this issue will differ depending on whether the rights of a person have been infringed by the state as "singular antagonist" (as in the criminal law context) or by the state acting to reconcile the claims of competing individuals or groups or to allocate scarce government resources. The courts, in the former situation, will be able to determine with a considerable degree of certainty if the impugned law or other government conduct is the "least drastic means" for achieving the state interest. The same degree of certainty may not be achievable in the latter situation.

The fundamental objective of Regulation 5.04 was sufficiently important to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected guarantee: the promotion of excellence at the Vancouver General as a medical research and teaching centre and as the major acute care hospital in British Columbia.

Regulation 5.04 was rationally connected to the hospital's objective. Staff positions at any hospital are a scarce resource that does not expand at a rate proportionate with the growth in the medical profession. Regulation 5.04 ensured that staff positions would regularly become available for younger doctors recently trained in the latest medical procedures and that this turnover would occur before the decline of ability which usually accompanies advancing age.

Special considerations apply in cases concerned with measures that relate directly to the allocation of resources or that attempt to strike a balance between competing social groups. In such cases, neither the experience of judges nor the institutional limitations of judicial decision-making prepares a court to make a precise determination as to where the balance between legislative objective and the protection of individual or group rights and freedoms is to be drawn.

The Board had a "reasonable basis" for concluding that Regulation 5.04 and the policy by which it was applied impaired respondents' rights of equality "as little as possible" given its pressing and substantial Si la Charte s'appliquait, le règlement 5.04 serait considéré comme une «loi» et l'inégalité reprochée découlerait d'une «loi». Les privations qui découlent de la politique du conseil d'administration dépendent de caractéristiques personnelles attribuées aux personnes de 65 ans et plus et sont, en conséquence, discriminatoires au sens du par. 15(1) de la Charte.

Il fallait donc examiner si le règlement et la pratique qui y est associée constituent une limite raisonnable, en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte. L'appréciation judiciaire de cette question différera selon que l'État est «l'adversaire singulier» de la personne dont les droits ont été violés (comme dans le contexte du droit criminel) ou qu'il cherche plutôt à concilier des revendications contraires de groupes ou d'individus ou à répartir des ressources gouvernementales limitées. Dans le premier cas, les tribunaux pourront déterminer avec un certain degré de certitude si la loi contestée ou toute autre conduite gouvernementale fait appel aux moyens les «moins radicaux» pour atteindre l'objectif de l'État. Il ne sera peut-être pas possible d'atteindre le même degré de certitude dans le second cas.

L'objectif fondamental du règlement 5.04 est suffisamment important pour justifier la suppression d'une garantie constitutionnelle: la recherche de l'excellence par le Vancouver General à titre de centre de recherche médicale et d'enseignement de la médecine et à titre de principal hôpital de soins de courte durée en Colombie-Britannique.

Le règlement 5.04 a un lien rationnel avec l'objectif de l'hôpital. Les postes dans un hôpital sont une ressource limitée qui ne peut augmenter proportionnellement à l'accroissement du personnel médical. Le règlement 5.04 fait en sorte qu'il sera possible d'offrir ces postes aux jeunes médecins récemment formés aux techniques médicales les plus récentes et que ce renouvellement se produira avant le déclin des capacités qui va ordinairement de pair avec l'avance en âge.

Des considérations particulières s'appliquent aux mesures qui portent directement sur la répartition des ressources ou qui tentent d'établir l'équilibre entre des groupes sociaux concurrents. Dans de tels cas, ni l'expérience judiciaire, ni les restrictions institutionnelles du processus décisionnel judiciaire ne préparent un tribunal à déterminer précisément le point d'équilibre entre l'objectif du législateur et la protection des droits et libertés d'un individu ou d'un groupe.

Le conseil était «raisonnablement fondé» à conclure que le règlement 5.04 et la politique en vertu de laquelle il est appliqué portaient le «moins possible» atteinte aux droits à l'égalité des intimés vu son objectif urgent et objective. Regulation 5.04 attempts to strike a balance between young doctors seeking to commence a practice and doctors who have been engaged in practice for some time with respect to their mutual demand for privileges. The Board was amply justified, given the climate of budgetary restraint, in concluding that its ability to bring new doctors on staff depended on the timely retirement of some of those already there. Moreover, it acted reasonably in concluding that retirement policy would ensure the departure from staff of those who would generally be less able to contribute to the hospital's sophisticated practice. The Board recognized, however, that the assumption of declining ability with age would not hold true in all circumstances and provided for an exception where the physician had something unique to offer the hospital. This exemption necessarily operated with regard to the hospital's requirements, rather than with regard to each individual doctor's health and capabilities, because of the overriding objective of making staff positions available to doctors recently trained in the latest theories and methods.

The only alternative to Regulation 5.04 was a program of skills testing or performance evaluation. Such a program would be costly both to implement and operate and, more importantly, would have an invidious and disruptive effect on the medical staff's working environment.

Per Sopinka J.: The reasons of La Forest J. were agreed with except on the issue of whether Regulation 5.04 was law within the meaning of s. 15(1) of the Charter. That issue should not be decided on the basis of an assumption that the hospital is part of government.

Per Wilson J. (dissenting): Section 32 of the Charter extends the reach of the Charter to all those entities and activities that could be construed as "governmental". The criteria relevant in determining whether an entity is subject to the Charter include: (1) whether the legislative, executive or administrative branch of government exercises general control over the entity in question; (2) whether the entity performs a traditional government function or one recognized in more modern times as being a state responsibility; and (3) whether the entity acts pursuant to statutory authority specifically granted to further an objective that government seeks to promote in the broader public interest.

The fact that the Hospital is established and operates pursuant to statutory authority, is heavily regulated by government and discharges a traditional government function in the public interest brings it within the conréel. Le règlement 5.04 tente d'établir un équilibre entre les jeunes médecins qui veulent commencer à pratiquer et les médecins qui pratiquent depuis déjà un certain temps pour ce qui est de leurs demandes et de leurs privilèges respectifs. Le conseil était amplement justifié, compte tenu du climat actuel de restrictions budgétaires, de conclure que sa capacité d'attirer de nouveaux médecins dépendait de la retraite au moment opportun de certains médecins qui s'y trouvaient déjà. En outre, le conseil a agi de façon raisonnable en concluant qu'une politique de mise à la retraite garantirait le départ de ceux qui seraient en général moins capables de contribuer à la pratique spécialisée de l'hôpital. Le conseil a reconnu cependant que le principe de la détérioration des capacités en fonction de l'âge n'est pas toujours exact et il a établi une exception pour les médecins qui avaient quelque chose d'unique à offrir à l'hôpital. Cette exception a forcément été appliquée en fonction des exigences de l'hôpital plutôt qu'en fonction de la santé et des capacités de chaque médecin individuellement en raison de l'objectif prédominant d'offrir des postes aux médecins récemment formés aux théories et aux méthodes les plus nouvelles.

La seule solution de rechange au règlement 5.04 était un programme d'évaluation des aptitudes et du rendement. Un tel programme serait coûteux à instaurer et à appliquer et, ce qui est plus important, il aurait un effet néfaste et créerait un sentiment d'injustice dans le milieu de travail du personnel médical.

Le juge Sopinka: Le juge Sopinka souscrit aux motifs du juge La Forest, sauf quant à savoir si le règlement 5.04 est une loi au sens du par. 15(1) de la Charte. Cette question ne devrait pas être tranchée sur le fondement de l'hypothèse que l'hôpital fait partie du gouvernement.

Le juge Wilson (dissidente): L'article 32 de la Charte étend l'application de la Charte à toutes les entités et activités qu'on peut considérer comme «gouvernementales». Les critères qui servent à déterminer si une entité est assujettie à la Charte sont les suivants: (1) La branche législative, exécutive ou administrative du gouvernement exerce-t-elle un contrôle gé, éral sur l'entité en question? (2) L'entité exerce-t-elle une fonction gouvernementale traditionnelle ou une fonction qui, de nos jours, est considérée comme une responsabilité de l'État? (3) L'entité agit-elle conformément au pouvoir que la loi lui a expressément conféré en vue d'atteindre un objectif que le gouvernement vise à promouvoir dans le plus grand intérêt public?

Comme l'hôpital existe et fonctionne en vertu des lois, comme il est strictement réglementé par le gouvernement et remplit une fonction traditionnellement propre au gouvernement dans l'intérêt public, il s'inscrit dans la cept of "government" for purposes of s. 32. The power to retire flowed from the Vancouver General Hospital Act and Regulation 5.04 which was passed pursuant to it. Regulation 5.04 was therefore subject to review under s. 15 of the Charter. It was not necessary to determine whether s. 15(1) would apply absent a legislative provision mandating the discriminatory action.

The Court should be wary of underestimating the discriminatory effect of any given measure when considering whether a provision violates s. 15(1). Here, the Regulation provided for non-discriminatory exceptions on its face and yet the principle behind the measure remained constitutionally unsound. By its terms Regulation 5.04 stipulated that staff were expected to retire at age 65. In this way the unarticulated premise remained that with increasing age comes increasing incompetence and decreasing ability. It was clearly discriminatory to impose the burden of disproving this stereotype upon those who already suffer the burden of stereotype and prejudice. That the Regulation provided for exceptions did not detract from the fact that the central concept animating the provision fell foul of s. 15(1). Exemption schemes are properly a matter for consideration under s. 1 of the Charter.

The objective of maintaining the Vancouver General as an acute care and teaching hospital with the highest standard of modern medical care, education and research was sufficiently important to override a Charter right and so meets the first branch of the Oakes test. The objective of promoting opportunities for other (younger) physicians to practise medicine, however, did not meet the first branch of the test. The Hospital's claim that its system was "closed" was not proven: constitutional rights will be curtailed only in response to real and not illusory problems.

Whether the foundations of prejudice are based upon observable, reliable facts must be approached in the most cautious manner. It is a matter of common knowledge that with the aging process comes some measure of change in ability, although the nature and extent of that change vary from individual to individual. A rational connection exists between the desire to provide top quality medical care and the decision to have such care provided substantially by younger members of the medical profession.

This was not an appropriate case for relaxing the minimal impairment test articulated in Oakes for the notion de «gouvernement» pour les fins de l'art. 32. La capacité de mettre à la retraite découle de la Vancouver General Hospital Act et du règlement 5.04 adopté en vertu de cette dernière loi. Le règlement est donc susceptible de révision en vertu de l'art. 15 de la Charte. Il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si le par. 15(1) s'appliquerait en l'absence d'une disposition législative qui ordonne l'acte discriminatoire.

Pour déterminer si une disposition enfreint le par. 15(1), la Cour doit se garder de sous-estimer l'effet discriminatoire d'une mesure donnée. En l'espèce, le règlement prévoit des exceptions non discriminatoires par son texte même, mais la prémisse sous-entendue demeure viciée du point de vue constitutionnel. Selon son libellé, le règlement 5.04 dit que les médecins sont censés prendre leur retraite à 65 ans. De cette façon, la prémisse sous-entendue reste que le vieillissement entraîne peu à peu l'incompétence et la diminution des capacités. Il est manifestement discriminatoire d'imposer à ceux qui sont victimes d'un préjugé l'obligation de prouver que ce préjugé ne s'applique pas à eux. Même si le règlement prévoit des exceptions, il n'en reste pas moins que la notion principale sous-jacente à la disposition enfreint le par. 15(1). Les régimes d'exception relèvent à juste titre de l'examen fondé sur l'article premier de la Charte.

L'objectif de conserver au Vancouver General son statut d'hôpital qui dispense des soins de courte durée et de l'enseignement conformes aux normes contemporaines les plus strictes de soins, d'enseignement et de recherche en médecine est suffisamment important pour l'emporter sur un droit garanti par la Charte et satisfaire au premier volet du critère de l'arrêt Oakes. Par contre, l'objectif d'offrir à d'autres médecins (plus jeunes) la possibilité d'exercer leur profession ne satisfait pas à ce premier volet du critère. La prétention de l'hôpital qu'il s'agit d'un système «fermé» n'a pas été prouvée: les droits constitutionnels ne peuvent être limités qu'en raison de problèmes réels, et non de problèmes illusoires.

Il faut agir avec beaucoup de prudence quand il s'agit de savoir si le fondement d'une idée préconçue s'appuie sur des faits observables et exacts. Il est généralement reconnu que le vieillissement amène un certain changement des capacités, quoique la nature et l'étendue de ces changements varient d'une personne à l'autre. Il existe un lien rationnel entre l'intention de fournir des soins médicaux de haute qualité et la décision de faire prodiguer ces soins en grande partie par des médecins plus jeunes.

Il n'y a pas lieu en l'espèce d'assouplir le critère de l'atteinte minimale énoncé dans l'arrêt Oakes pour les reasons given in McKinney. The Hospital was not a closed system and permitting physicians to retain their privileges would have no effect on the availability of practice opportunities for doctors embarking upon their careers. There was accordingly no reason in fact or in law for applying a deferential standard of review.

Other ways of achieving the objective of high quality medical care which recognizes the abilities of individual doctors aged 65 and over exist. Annual performance reviews were not shown to be unsatisfactory in "weeding out" incompetent doctors. Indeed, the primary reason for changing the practice was that it was administratively more convenient to remove incompetent physicians through the mechanism of mandatory retirement. Administrative convenience is not an adequate reason for sacrificing Charter rights.

In discrimination claims of the kind involved here, the guarantee of equality in s. 15(1) must at least mean that, wherever possible, an attempt be made to break free of the apathy of stereotyping and that a sincere effort be made to treat all individuals, whatever their colour, race, sex or age, as individuals deserving of recognition on the basis of their unique talents and abilities. Respect for the dignity of every member of society demands no less. Section 15(1) does not guarantee the right to work but the right to work absent discrimination. Accordingly, Regulation 5.04 would have been reasonable and demonstrably justifiable if it had provided in word and in effect for a bona fide exemption scheme contemplating the continued employment of those able and willing to work.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé J. (dissenting): Under the broad test developed by Wilson J. in McKinney v. University of Guelph, Vancouver General Hospital is acting as "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter. In Canada, both historically and even more so today in terms of function, hospitals are an "arm of government" and perform a government function. An appointed hospital board may enjoy a certain independence in formulating policies, as in Regulation 5.04, but the situation is similar to that of government departments setting up their own agenda and policies, subject only to general guidelines established by the legislature. This situation is totally different from that of universities where gov-motifs exprimés dans l'arrêt McKinney. L'hôpital n'est pas un système fermé et permettre aux médecins intimés de garder leur privilège n'aurait aucun effet sur les possibilités d'exercice de la médecine qui s'offrent aux médecins qui commencent leur carrière. Il n'y a pas de motif de droit ou de fait d'appliquer un critère d'examen fondé sur la retenue.

Il existe d'autres moyens d'atteindre l'objectif visé de fournir des soins médicaux de haute qualité qui permettraient de reconnaître les capacités des médecins âgé de 65 ans et plus. On n'a pas démontré que l'examen annuel du rendement n'ait pas donné satisfaction lorsqu'il s'agissait d'éliminer les médecins incompétents. La raison principale du changement de méthode tient à la commodité administrative qu'il y a à écarter les médecins incompétents par le mécanisme de la retraite obligatoire. La commodité administrative n'est pas un motif valable de supprimer des droits garantis par la Charte.

Dans les affaires de discrimination du genre de celle de l'espèce, la garantie d'égalité en vertu du par. 15(1) doit au moins signifier que, chaque fois que cela est possible, on essaye de renoncer aux idées préconçues trop faciles et qu'un effort sincère sera fait pour traiter tous les individus, quels que soient leur couleur, leur race, leur sexe ou leur âge, comme des individus qui méritent d'être jugés selon leurs talents et leurs capacités propres. Le respect de la dignité de chaque personne dans la société n'en exige pas moins. Le paragraphe 15(1) ne garantit pas le droit de travailler, mais celui de travailler sans faire l'objet de discrimination. En conséquence, le règlement 5.04 aurait pu être raisonnable et susceptible de justification s'il avait comporté dans son texte et dans son application un régime légitime d'exception qui aurait permis à ceux qui étaient capables et désireux de travailler de continuer à travailler.

Le juge L'Heureux-Dubé (dissidente): En vertu du test large formulé par le juge Wilson dans l'arrêt McKinney c. University of Guelph, le Vancouver General Hospital agit comme un «gouvernement» au sens de l'art. 32 de la Charte. Tant sur le plan historique que (encore plus aujourd'hui) sur le plan fonctionnel, les hôpitaux au Canada sont une «branche du gouvernement» et exercent une fonction gouvernementale. Le conseil d'administration d'un hôpital peut bénéficier d'une certaine indépendance dans la formulation de ses politiques, comme dans le cas du règlement 5.04, mais il n'y a pas de différence entre cette situation et celle des ministères du gouvernement qui établissent leur propre programme et formulent leurs politiques, sous réserve des seules directives générales établies par le législateur. Cette situation est tout à fait différente de celle des universités où la participation du gouvernement est ernment involvement is primarily limited to funding. There may be some instances, however, where a hospital would not constitute "government" and so not attract Charter review.

For the reasons given by La Forest J., Regulation 5.04 is "law" for the purposes of s. 15 of the Charter and clearly infringes s. 15(1) because it discriminates by reason of age. The Regulation was not saved by s. 1.

Regulation 5.04 was not rationally connected to its objectives. Forcing the end of a career based on age alone does not pass muster under the Charter for age is not determinative of capacity or competence. "New people" do not need to be infused into the Hospital's system to keep it relevant. Competence is threatened by many things, but age is not necessarily one of them.

Special considerations can apply when the courts are forced to choose between two competing social groups in applying the "minimum impairment" aspect of the Oakes formula. The choice to be made here was between competent medical practitioners who happen to be over 65 and competent doctors under 65 usually entering the medical practice. These circumstances did not warrant special considerations. The same standards should be applied to all practitioners in assessing competence. Different and more onerous standards for measuring competence for those over 65 are a grave intrusion into the right to be treated equally. In addition, the Board, did not have all the requisite characteristics of a legislative body considering resource allocation to warrant the application of these special considerations.

The health of the practitioner may be a factor in the review of a practitioner's abilities. Physical deterioration neither occurs at the "threshold" age of 65 nor is necessarily a factor affecting a practitioner's competence. A practitioner's ongoing health problems are a factor in any review of any individual's performance. The requirement that those practitioners over age 65 show they can make a "unique" contribution to the hospital is too onerous and is applied solely because the individual has reached 65. This method of impairing rights is too severe. Convenience in administrative procedures cannot be used as a possible justification for the breach of rights. Retirement can be encouraged while upholding the dignity of the individual by means more carefully tailored to impairing rights as little as possible.

essentielle au financement. Il peut y avoir des circonstances où un hôpital ne serait pas considéré comme un «gouvernement» et qui ne donneraient ainsi pas lieu à une révision fondée sur la Charte.

Pour les motifs énoncés par le juge La Forest, le règlement 5.04 est une «loi» aux fins de l'art. 15 de la Charte qui viole manifestement le par. 15(1) parce qu'il établit une discrimination fondée sur l'âge. Le règlement 5.04 n'est pas sauvegardé en vertu de l'article premier.

Le règlement 5.04 n'a pas de lien rationnel avec ses objectifs. Forcer une personne à mettre fin à sa carrière simplement en raison de son âge ne saurait résister à un examen fondé sur la Charte puisque l'âge ne détermine pas les capacités ou la compétence. L'apport de «nouveaux membres» n'est pas indispensable à l'hôpital pour qu'il demeure à jour. La compétence est menacée par plusieurs facteurs, mais l'âge n'en fait pas nécessairement partie.

Des considérations particulières peuvent s'appliquer dans l'examen du critère de «l'atteinte minimale» selon l'arrêt Oakes quand les tribunaux sont tenus de faire un choix entre les revendications de deux groupes concurrents. Le choix s'effectue entre des médecins compétents, qui se trouvent à avoir plus de 65 ans, et des médecins compétents de moins de 65 ans, qui débutent habituellement leur pratique médicale. Ces circonstances ne justifient pas l'application de considérations particulières. Les mêmes normes devraient être appliquées à tous les médecins dans l'évaluation de leur rendement. L'application de normes différentes et plus rigides dans l'examen de la compétence des médecins de plus de 65 ans porte gravement atteinte au droit à un traitement égal. De plus, le conseil n'a pas toutes les caractéristiques requises d'un organisme législatif, qui doit tenir compte de la répartition des ressources pour justifier l'application de ces considérations particulières.

La santé du médecin peut être un facteur à considérer dans l'examen de ses aptitudes. La détérioration physique ne commence pas nécessairement à 65 ans et elle n'a pas nécessairement de répercussions sur la compétence du médecin. Les problèmes de santé permanents seraient un facteur pertinent à tout examen de rendement de tout individu. L'obligation, pour les médecins âgés de plus de 65 ans, d'établir qu'ils peuvent faire une contribution «unique» à l'hôpital est trop exigeante et existe seulement parce que l'individu a atteint 65 ans. Cette façon de porter atteinte aux droits est trop drastique. La commodité de certaines procédures administratives ne peut servir de justification possible de la violation des droits. On peut favoriser la retraite, tout en protégeant la dignité de la personne, par des mesures plus adaptées pour porter le moins possible atteinte aux droits.

Per Cory J. (dissenting): The reasons and proposed disposition of Wilson J. were agreed with. For the reasons expressed by La Forest J., the balancing exercise which the Court must undertake in applying s. 1 must be sensitive and not mechanistic.

Substantial differences exist between universities and hospitals and those considerations which applied to universities did not have the same import in the case of hospitals. There was no employment contract struck between the doctors and the hospital and the mandatory retirement policy was not supported by the Medical Association.

Regulation 5.04 could not be justified under the Oakes test. The testing procedure in effect, whereby doctors are reviewed or tested once a year, was sufficient in itself to demonstrate that the s. 1 requirements could not be met. A continuous testing of the skills of all doctors regardless of age during the time of their association with a hospital is essential for the successful operation of the hospital. In the hospital setting this essential testing does not adversely affect any collegiality that may exist.

Le juge Cory (dissident): Le juge Cory souscrit aux motifs du juge Wilson et avec la façon dont elle statuerait en l'espèce. Pour les motifs exposés par le juge La Forest, la juste appréciation à laquelle doit se livrer la Cour dans l'examen de l'application de l'article premier doit être adaptée aux circonstances et non mécanique.

Il existe des différences importantes entre les universités et les hôpitaux. Les facteurs qui s'appliquent aux universités n'ont pas la même importance dans le cas des hôpitaux. Il n'y a pas de contrat d'emploi entre les médecins et l'hôpital et l'association des médecins n'est pas en faveur de la retraite obligatoire.

Le règlement 5.04 ne peut satisfaire au critère de l'arrêt Oakes. Le système d'évaluation en vertu duquel la compétence des médecins est appréciée une fois par année est en soi suffisant pour démontrer que les exigences de l'article premier ne peuvent être satisfaites. Un examen permanent des compétences des médecins qui a lieu sans égard à l'âge au cours des années où ils sont associés à un hôpital est essentiel pour le fonctionnement efficace de celui-ci. Dans le milieu hospitalier, la nécessité de cette évaluation n'a pas d'effet préjudiciable sur la collégialité qui peut exister.

LA FOREST J.—This appeal raises many of the same questions addressed in this Court's decision in McKinney v. University of Guelph, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 229. The application of s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to mandatory retirement is again in issue, although it arises in this appeal in the context of a decision by the Vancouver General Hospital not to renew the admitting privileges of doctors who reach the age of 65. Version française du jugement du juge en chef Dickson et des juges La Forest et Gonthier rendu par

LE JUGE LA FOREST—Ce pourvoi soulève plusieurs des mêmes questions examinées dans l'arrêt McKinney c. Université de Guelph, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 229, rendu en même temps que celui-ci. Il est encore question de l'application du par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés à la retraite obligatoire, bien que ce pourvoi porte sur une décision du Vancouver General Hospital de ne pas renouveler les privilèges d'admission des médecins qui ont atteint 65 ans. Comme dans l'arrêt McKinney, ce pourvoi soulève les questions générales suivantes:

(a) whether s. 15 of the Charter applies to the Vancouver General;

(b) assuming it does, whether the hospital's policy of not renewing the admitting privileges of doctors who reach the age of 65 violates s. 15(1) of the Charter;

(c) whether, if such violation exists, it is justifiable under s. 1 of the Charter.

It should be noted that, unlike McKinney, no reference is made to the application of s. 15 to the British Columbia Human Rights Act, S.B.C. 1984, c. 22. That is because the respondents were not employees of the Vancouver General in the way that the appellants in McKinney were employees of the respondent universities. This was conceded in argument before us. Independently of that concession, it is clear that the respondents did not receive or perform work at the direction of the hospital; nor were they paid by it. Their relationship to the hospital consisted solely of their admitting privileges. Of course, these privileges allowed for access to facilities which in turn assisted respondents in treating their patients, but this did not make them employees of the hospital. It follows that they do not come within the protection against age-based discrimination found in the Act, since that protection is limited to those who experience age-based discrimination in the context of employment. No issue, therefore, arises as to whether the limitation of the prohibition in the Act against discrimination in employment on grounds of age to persons between the ages of 40 and 65 violates s. 15(1) of the Charter.

I should also add that s. 7 of the Charter was originally relied on, but during the argument counsel for the respondents conceded that reliance on this provision was unnecessary and that it was not at issue in this appeal.

Facts

The appellant is the major acute care hospital for the Province of British Columbia and handles about 18,000 high risk patients per year. It is also one of the principal teaching hospitals in the Prov-

a) l'art. 15 de la Charte s'applique-t-il au Vancouver General?

b) en supposant qu'il s'y applique, la politique de l'hôpital de ne pas renouveler les privilèges d'admission des médecins qui ont atteint 65 ans viole-t-elle le par. 15(1) de la Charte?

c) dans l'affirmative, la limite est-elle justifiable en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte?

Il convient de souligner que contrairement à l'arrêt McKinney aucune mention n'est faite de l'application de l'art. 15 de la Human Rights Act, S.B.C. 1984, ch. 22, de la Colombie-Britannique. Il en est ainsi parce que les intimés ne sont pas des employés du Vancouver General au sens où les appelants, dans l'arrêt McKinney, étaient des employés des universités intimées. Ce fait a été admis devant nous au cours des plaidoiries. Indépendamment de cette reconnaissance, il est clair que les intimés n'exécutaient pas un travail sous la direction de l'hôpital; ils n'étaient pas rémunérés par celui-ci non plus. Leurs relations avec l'hôpital se limitaient à leurs seuls privilèges d'admission. Évidemment, ces privilèges leur permettaient d'avoir accès aux installations de l'hôpital, lesquelles à leur tour facilitaient la tâche des intimés dans le traitement de leurs patients, mais cela n'en faisait pas des employés de l'hôpital. Il s'ensuit qu'ils ne sont pas visés par la protection contre toute discrimination fondée sur l'âge établie dans la Loi puisque cette protection se restreint aux victimes d'une discrimination fondée sur l'âge en matière d'emploi. Il n'est donc pas question de déterminer si la limitation, dans la Loi, de l'interdiction de la discrimination fondée sur l'âge en matière d'emploi aux personnes âgées de 40 à 65 ans viole le par. 15(1) de la Charte.

Je dois également ajouter que l'on s'est d'abord appuyé sur l'art. 7 de la Charte mais, au cours des plaidoiries, l'avocat des intimés a reconnu qu'il n'était pas nécessaire d'invoquer cette disposition et qu'elle n'était pas en cause en l'espèce.

Les faits

L'appelant est le principal centre hospitalier de soins de courte durée de la Colombie-Britannique et traite quelque 18 000 patients à risque élevé par année. C'est également l'un des principaux hôpi-ince. In 1985-86, it had an operating budget of $175 million and employed about 6,000 people. Nearly 1,000 doctors practise at the hospital, about three quarters of whom are specialists. With the exception of those who are general practitioners, all the doctors who practise there are required to hold a teaching appointment at the University of British Columbia.

As already mentioned, it would be incorrect to say that the Vancouver General employs doctors. Doctors are retained by their patients and are paid through the provincial medicare plan. Those who practise at the Vancouver General do so by virtue of admitting privileges granted to them on an annual basis. These privileges carry the right to book patients into the hospital, to assume primary responsibility for a patient's treatment and, in the case of a surgeon, to book operating rooms. They also allow doctors to have a voice in the affairs of the hospital. While it was at one time customary for doctors to have admitting privileges at more than one hospital, this is no longer the case, at least in Vancouver.

Decisions as to the granting and renewal of admitting privileges are made by the hospital's Board of Trustees which, by ss. 5 and 6 of the Vancouver General Hospital Act, S.B.C. 1970, c. 55, is empowered to manage the property and affairs of the hospital and to pass by-laws for the purpose. Under that Act, the Vancouver General, originally incorporated in 1902, is continued as a corporation endowed with the power to operate a hospital, acquire and dispose of land and personal property, and, subject to the approval of the Minister of Health, carry on a teaching function.

The composition of the Board of Trustees is laid down in the by-laws of the hospital. By the combined operation of Articles 2(1) and 4(2), it is comprised of the following members:

(a) Fourteen persons appointed for a term of three years by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council as follows:

taux d'enseignement dans la province. En 1985-1986, son budget de fonctionnement était de 175 millions de dollars et quelque 6 000 personnes étaient à son service. Près de 1 000 médecins pratiquent à l'hôpital et les trois quarts environ sont des spécialistes. À l'exception des généralistes, tous les médecins qui pratiquent dans cet hôpital doivent avoir une charge d'enseignement à l'Université de la Colombie-Britannique.

Comme je l'ai déjà souligné, il serait faux de dire que le Vancouver General emploie des médecins. Les médecins sont retenus par leurs patients et sont payés par le régime d'assurance-maladie de la province. Ceux qui pratiquent au Vancouver General le font en vertu de privilèges d'admission qui leur sont accordés sur une base annuelle. Ces privilèges leur permettent de faire admettre des patients à l'hôpital, d'être les premiers responsables du traitement de ceux-ci et, dans le cas des chirurgiens, de réserver des salles d'opération. Ces privilèges permettent également aux médecins d'avoir voix au chapitre des affaires de l'hôpital. Bien qu'à une certaine époque il était habituel que les médecins aient des privilèges d'admission dans plus d'un hôpital, ce n'est plus le cas maintenant, à tout le moins à Vancouver.

C'est le conseil d'administration de l'hôpital qui décide d'accorder et de renouveler les privilèges d'admission et les art. 5 et 6 de la Vancouver General Hospital Act, S.B.C. 1970, ch. 55, lui permettent de gérer les biens et les affaires de l'hôpital et d'adopter des règlements à cette fin. En vertu de cette loi, le Vancouver General, d'abord constitué en personne morale en 1902, existe toujours comme société ayant le pouvoir d'exploiter un hôpital, d'acquérir et d'aliéner des biens meubles et immeubles et, sous réserve de l'approbation du ministre de la Santé, d'exercer des fonctions d'enseignement.

La composition du Conseil d'administration est établie par règlement de l'hôpital. Par l'effet combiné des par. 2(1) et 4(2), le conseil d'administration est composé des membres suivants:

a) Quatorze personnes nommées pour un mandat de trois ans par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil de la façon suivante:

(i) Two persons appointed from nominees submitted by the President of The University of British Columbia;

(ii) Two persons appointed from nominees submitted by the British Columbia Health Association;

(iii) Two persons appointed from nominees submitted by the Board of Vancouver General Hospital;

(iv) One person appointed from nominees submitted by the British Columbia Institute of Technology;

(v) Seven persons appointed from the Community at large;

(b) The Chairman of the Medical Advisory Board; and

(c) The President appointed under these By-Laws.

As can be seen, the government has power to appoint 14 of the 16 members of the Board. It must be underlined, however, that half of these are really nominees of specific groups, including the hospital, and the remaining are intended to represent "the Community at large". The government appointees serve for rotating, but renewable, terms of three years; see Article 4(2). The other two members, the President and the Chairman of the hospital's Medical Advisory Board, are not government appointees, but are selected by the hospital.

The Act provides for a means for governmental supervision by requiring that the by-laws be approved by the Minister of Health before coming into effect (s. 6(b)). This is reinforced by the provisions of the general statute regulating hospitals in the Province, the Hospital Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 176, to which the Vancouver General is also subject. For present purposes the relevant provisions of the latter Act are ss. 2 and 32. Section 2 provides, in part, as follows:

2. (1) Every hospital as defined under section 1, except hospitals owned by the Province or by Canada, shall

(a) make provision for the representation of the Provincial government and the board of the regional

(i) Deux personnes nommées parmi les candidats présentés par le président de l'Université de la Colombie-Britannique;

(ii) Deux personnes nommées parmi les candidats présentés par la British Columbia Health Association;

(iii) Deux personnes nommées parmi les candidats présentés par le Board of Vancouver General Hospital;

(iv) Une personne nommée parmi les candidats présentés par le British Columbia Institute of Technology;

(v) Sept personnes nommées parmi la collectivité en général;

b) Le président du Medical Advisory Board (le «Conseil consultatif médical»);

c) Le président (du conseil d'administration) nommé en vertu de ce règlement.

Comme on peut le constater, le gouvernement a le pouvoir de nommer 14 des 16 membres du conseil. Il convient cependant de souligner que la moitié de ces nominations provient en réalité de groupes spécifiques, y compris l'hôpital, et que l'autre moitié est censée représenter «la collectivité en général». Les membres nommés par le gouvernement exercent, par rotation, des mandats de trois ans qui sont renouvelables; voir le par. 4(2) de la Loi. Les deux autres membres, le président du conseil d'administration de l'hôpital et le président du «conseil consultatif médical», ne sont pas nommés par le gouvernement mais sont choisis par l'hôpital.

En exigeant que les règlements soient approuvés par le ministre de la Santé avant d'entrer en vigueur, la loi prévoit un mécanisme de contrôle gouvernemental (al. 6b)). Ce mécanisme se trouve renforcé par les dispositions de la loi générale régissant les hôpitaux dans la province, la Hospital Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, ch. 176, à laquelle le Vancouver General est également assujetti. Aux fins du présent pourvoi, les art. 2 et 32 sont les dispositions pertinentes de cette Loi. L'article 2 prévoit en partie ce qui suit:

[TRADUCTION] 2. (1) Tous les hôpitaux visés à l'article premier, sauf les hôpitaux appartenant à la province ou au Canada, doivent

a) prévoir, de la manière prescrite, la représentation du gouvernement provincial et du conseil du dis-hospital district on the board of management of the hospital to the extent and in the manner provided;

(c) have a properly constituted board of management and bylaws or rules thought necessary by the minister for the administration and management of the hospital's affairs and the provision of a high standard of care and treatment for patients, and the constitution and bylaws or rules of a hospital are not effective until approved by the minister;

(d) comply with further conditions prescribed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

(3) Notwithstanding any other Act, or the constitution, bylaws or rules of a hospital, for this section, the Lieutenant Governor in Council may appoint a person or persons to represent the Provincial government on the board of management of a hospital for a term not exceeding 2 years or until his successor is appointed.

Section 32 provides:

32. The minister may require that the bylaws or rules of a hospital or a society or corporation having among its objects the provision of hospital facilities or the operation of a hospital be revised in a manner satisfactory to him in order to meet changing conditions and policies, and to provide for greater uniformity and efficiency in all matters concerning the administration and operation of hospitals.

The effect of these provisions may thus be summarized. Section 2(1)(c) and s. 32 extend the Minister's power in respect to the by-laws of the Vancouver General beyond the negative power of veto set out in s. 6 of the Vancouver General Hospital Act. Together, they confer on the Minister the positive power to require the Board of Trustees to adopt new by-laws or change existing by-laws. Sections 2(1)(a) and (3) provide for the direct representation of the provincial government on the Board, the former imposing an obligation on the hospital to allow for such representation, the latter conferring a power of appointment on the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

c) avoir un conseil d'administration dûment constitué et des règlements ou des règles que le ministre estime nécessaires à l'administration et à la gestion des affaires de l'hôpital, ainsi qu'à la prestation de soins et de traitements de première qualité; l'acte constitutif et les règlements ou règles d'un hôpital n'entrent en vigueur qu'après approbation du ministre;

d) se conformer aux autres conditions prescrites par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil.

(3) Nonobstant toute autre loi, l'acte constitutif, les règlements ou règles d'un hôpital, le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil peut, aux fins du présent article, nommer une ou plusieurs personnes pour représenter le gouvernement provincial au conseil d'administration d'un hôpital pour un mandat n'excédant pas deux ans ou jusqu'à la nomination de leur successeur.

L'article 32 prévoit:

[TRADUCTION] 32. Le ministre peut exiger que les règlements ou règles d'un hôpital, d'une société ou d'une compagnie dont l'un des objets est de fournir des services hospitaliers ou d'exploiter un hôpital soient examinés d'une manière qu'il estime satisfaisante en vue de répondre à des conditions et des politiques en évolution et d'apporter plus d'uniformité et d'efficacité dans les domaines relevant de l'administration et de l'exploitation des hôpitaux.

L'effet de ces dispositions peut être résumé ainsi. L'alinéa 2(1)c) et l'art. 32 étendent la portée des pouvoirs du ministre relativement aux règlements du Vancouver General au-delà du pouvoir négatif de veto établi à l'art. 6 de la Vancouver General Hospital Act. Ensemble, ils confèrent au ministre le pouvoir réel d'imposer au conseil d'administration l'adoption de nouveaux règlements ou la modification des règlements existants. L'alinéa 2(1)a) et le par. (3) prévoient que le gouvernement provincial est directement représenté au conseil d'administration puisque la première disposition oblige l'hôpital à prévoir cette représentation et la deuxième confère un pouvoir de nomination au lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil.

In this legislative context, the Board approved Medical Staff Regulation 5.04 in May of 1984, which was then approved by the Minister of Health. Regulation 5.04 provides as follows:

5.04 Retirement: Members of the Staff shall be expected to retire at the end of the appointment year in which they pass their 65th birthday. Members of the Staff who wish to defer their retirement may make special application to the Board. The Board shall request the Medical Advisory Committee for a recommendation in each such case. The Medical Advisory Committee shall, in making its recommendation, consider the report of a personal interview which shall take place between the applicant and the Department Head concerned which shall include a review of the health and continuing performance of the applicant.

In implementing this Regulation, the Board seems to have operated on the view that all physicians were expected to retire on their 65th birthday unless it could be shown that they "had something unique to offer the hospital". On this basis the Board, on May 31, 1985, decided not to renew the admitting privileges of most of the respondents to this appeal, all of whom had turned 65 and most of whom were general practitioners.

The respondents commenced these proceedings to set aside the decision of the Board and to obtain a declaration that Regulation 5.04, either by its terms or by the manner of its application, violated ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. The respondents also argued that the Regulation or the manner of its application was contrary to the Human Rights Act. An interim injunction restraining the Board from limiting or removing the admitting privileges of the respondents pending the outcome of respondents' application under the Charter and the Human Rights Act was issued by McKenzie J. of the British Columbia Supreme Court on June 27, 1985. His decision was upheld by the British Columbia Court of Appeal. Judgment in favour of the respondents' application was later given by Taylor J. of the same court on July 23, 1986, and the British Columbia Court of Appeal dismissed the appellants' appeal in a decision rendered on Dans ce contexte législatif, le conseil d'administration a approuvé le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations en mai 1984, lequel a ensuite été approuvé par le ministre de la Santé. Le règlement 5.04 prévoit ce qui suit:

Dans la mise en œuvre de ce règlement, le conseil d'administration semble avoir tenu pour acquis que tous les médecins étaient censés prendre leur retraite à leur 65e anniversaire de naissance, sauf s'ils pouvaient démontrer qu'ils [TRADUCTION] «avaient quelque chose d'unique à offrir à l'hôpital». C'est en fonction de ce critère que, le 31 mai 1985, le conseil d'administration a décidé de ne pas renouveler les privilèges d'admission de la plupart des intimés en l'espèce, lesquels avaient tous atteint 65 ans et étaient pour la plupart des généralistes.

Les intimés ont intenté cette action en vue d'annuler la décision du conseil d'administration et d'obtenir un jugement déclaratoire portant que le règlement 5.04, soit par sa formulation, soit dans son application, violait les art. 7 et 15 de la Charte. Les intimés ont également soutenu que le règlement ou son application étaient contraires à la Human Rights Act. Le 27 juin 1985, le juge McKenzie de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique a décerné une injonction provisoire pour empêcher le conseil de restreindre ou de supprimer les privilèges d'admission des intimés jusqu'à l'issue de la requête des intimés fondée sur la Charte et la Human Rights Act. La Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a confirmé cette décision. Le 23 juillet 1986, le juge Taylor de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique a rendu jugement en faveur des intimés et la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a rejeté l'appel des appe-

January 6, 1988. In doing so, it found it unnecessary to reach any conclusion as to the effect or application of the Human Rights Act. Leave to appeal to this Court was granted on April 21, 1988.

Judicial History

British Columbia Supreme Court (1986), 30 D.L.R. (4th) 700

Taylor J., we saw, found in favour of the respondents' application. He held that the Charter applied both to the enactment of Regulation 5.04 and the manner in which it was applied by the Board. In respect to the former conclusion, he pointed to the facts that 14 of the 16 trustees who adopted the Regulation were appointed directly by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, and that under the Vancouver General Hospital Act, by-laws of the Board only came into effect if approved by the Minister of Health. From this he concluded, at p. 704, that "the provincial government effectively controls the affairs of the hospital". Taylor J. amplified this conclusion, at p. 704, by pointing to the "broad ministerial supervision" to which the Vancouver General was subject by virtue of the terms of the Hospital Act. After noting that s. 2(1)(c) of the latter Act required the Board to "have such by-laws and other rules as the Minister deems necessary", he concluded, at pp. 704-705, that the phrase "government of each province" in s. 32(1)(b) of the Charter

> ... extends not only to actual provincial ministries and to entities created by a provincial government which exercise governmental authority, but also to agencies set up by a provincial government which carry out government functions under government control without exercising governmental powers, that is to say those vested only with organizational powers which provide government services to the public, provided at least that the conduct in question relates to the provision of government services.

Applying this conclusion to the case, Taylor J. found, at p. 705, that the "management of the Vancouver General Hospital is for practical purlants dans une décision rendue le 6 janvier 1988. Ce faisant, elle a jugé inutile de tirer une conclusion sur l'effet ou l'application de la Human Rights Act. Le 21 avril 1988, notre Cour accordait l'autorisation de pourvoi.

L'historique judiciaire

Nous avons vu que le juge Taylor a statué en faveur des intimés. Il a conclu que la Charte s'appliquait tant à l'adoption du règlement 5.04 qu'à la manière dont le conseil l'avait appliqué. Quant à la première conclusion, il a souligné que 14 des 16 membres du conseil d'administration qui avaient adopté le règlement avaient été nommés directement par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil et qu'en vertu de la Vancouver General Hospital Act les règlements internes du conseil d'administration n'entraient en vigueur que sur approbation du ministre de la Santé. Il a donc conclu, à la p. 704, que [TRADUCTION] «le gouvernement provincial contrôle effectivement les affaires de l'hôpital». À la page 704, le juge Taylor a réaffirmé cette conclusion en mentionnant le [TRADUCTION] «contrôle ministériel étendu» dont faisait l'objet le Vancouver General en raison des termes de la Hospital Act. Après avoir souligné que l'al. 2(1)c) de cette loi exigeait du conseil d'administration d'avoir [TRADUCTION] «les règlements ou les règles que le ministre estime nécessaires», il a conclu, aux pp. 704 et 705, que l'expression «gouvernement de chaque province» à l'al. 32(1)b) de la Charte > [TRADUCTION] ... s'étend non seulement aux ministères provinciaux existants et aux entités créées par un gouvernement provincial qui exercent un pouvoir gouvernemental, mais également aux organismes mis sur pied par un gouvernement provincial exerçant des fonctions gouvernementales sous le contrôle du gouvernement sans exercer de pouvoirs gouvernementaux, c'est-à-dire ceux qui n'ont que des pouvoirs organisationnels en vue d'offrir au public des services gouvernementaux, pourvu à tout le moins que leurs fonctions en question se rapportent à la prestation de services gouvernementaux.

Appliquant cette conclusion en l'espèce, le juge Taylor a conclu que [TRADUCTION] «la gestion du Vancouver General Hospital relève à toutes fins poses as fully under provincial government direction and control as would have been the case had it been operated within a ministry".

As to the question of whether the Charter applied to the conduct of the Board in implementing Regulation 5.04, Taylor J. was of the opinion, at p. 705, that "since regulations made by the trustees are, as I have found, governmental in nature, and therefore subject to the Charter, it follows that the way in which those rules are applied must be subject to the same constraints". He added that the "enactment, approval and application of the regulation involved the creation and administration of 'law' as that word is used in s. 15(1)" of the Charter.

Turning to s. 15(1) and the argument of the respondents that they had been discriminated against on the basis of age, Taylor J. held that Regulation 5.04 did not by itself constitute a contravention of s. 15(1). After holding that age-based distinctions were to be found discriminatory if it were shown that "age is entirely irrelevant in the context" or that the consequences for those affected by the distinction "are clearly beyond anything which can reasonably and fairly be justified by any legitimate purpose served" (p. 708), Taylor J. found nothing discriminatory in the Vancouver General's use of the concept of an "expected retirement age" in the making of decisions as to the renewal of admitting privileges. This was because it was obvious that age was relevant to one's ability to practise medicine. As well, the burden it placed on older doctors was consistent with their duty, as professionals, to ensure that others were trained in their calling and to pass on their own practices while they were themselves still able to practise efficiently. With respect to the question of whether 65 was the appropriate "expected retirement age", Taylor J. concluded, at p. 708, that it was within "a range which reasonable, fair-minded people would accept". As a pratiques autant du contrôle du gouvernement provincial que si son exploitation relevait d'un ministère» (p. 705).

Quant à la question de savoir si la Charte s'appliquait à la façon dont le conseil d'administration a mis en œuvre le règlement 5.04, le juge Taylor était d'avis que [TRADUCTION] «puisque le règlement pris par les membres du conseil d'administration est, comme je l'ai conclu, de nature gouvernementale, et donc assujetti à la Charte, il s'ensuit qu'il en est de même pour la façon dont ce règlement est appliqué» (p. 705). Il a ajouté que [TRADUCTION] «l'adoption, l'approbation et l'application du règlement impliquaient la création et l'application d'une 'loi' au sens du par. 15(1)» de la Charte.

Examinant le par. 15(1) et l'argument des intimés qu'ils ont été victimes de discrimination fondée sur l'âge, le juge Taylor a conclu que le règlement 5.04 ne contrevenait pas en soi au par. 15(1). Après avoir décidé que les distinctions fondées sur l'âge sont discriminatoires si on établit que [TRADUCTION] «l'âge n'est absolument pas pertinent dans le contexte» ou que les conséquences pour les personnes visées par les distinctions [TRADUCTION] «vont clairement au-delà de tout ce qui peut raisonnablement et équitablement être justifié dans la poursuite d'un objectif légitime» (p. 708), le juge Taylor a conclu que le recours par le Vancouver General à la notion d'un [TRADUCTION] «âge prévu pour la retraite» pour décider du renouvellement des privilèges d'admission n'avait rien de discriminatoire. Et ce, parce qu'il était évident que l'âge avait un rapport avec les capacités d'une personne de pratiquer la médecine. En outre, le fardeau imposé aux médecins plus âgés était conforme à leur devoir, comme professionnels, de veiller à ce que les autres reçoivent la formation nécessaire à leur profession et de transmettre leur propre expertise alors qu'ils étaient eux-mêmes encore capables de pratiquer efficacement. Quant à la question de savoir s'il était approprié de fixer à 65 ans [TRADUCTION] «l'âge prévu pour la retraite», le juge Taylor a conclu, à la p. 708, que celui-ci se trouvait dans [TRADUCTION] «une catégorie que les gens raisonnables et impartiaux accepteraient». Par conséquent, il était result, he thought, it would be inappropriate for the court to substitute its opinion as to an appropriate "expected age of retirement" for that of the hospital's Board of Trustees.

Taylor J. came to a different conclusion respecting the respondents' argument that s. 15(1) had been contravened by the manner in which the Board applied Regulation 5.04. With respect to the Board's policy decision not to renew the admitting privileges of any doctor who came within the Regulation unless it was shown that they "had something unique to offer the hospital", he stated, at pp. 716-17:

> By deciding to reject the applications of all doctors over 65 who lack unique skills, the trustees added a requirement which effectively denied those over 65 the right to be judged on the basis of "health and continuing performance", the criteria which the regulation indicated would be considered in deciding whether their privileges would be continued. The plaintiffs were plainly denied the benefit of Reg. 5:04, and equal benefit of the hospital regulations generally, solely on the basis of age, and with no concomitant benefit to others. The policy was adopted essentially for administrative convenience. I find that this was neither reasonable nor, in the relevant sense, "fair".

On these grounds Taylor J. concluded that the application of Regulation 5.04 amounted to discrimination on the basis of age within the meaning of s. 15(1) of the Charter. He also found that the application of the Regulation constituted a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of s. 7 of the Charter that was not in accordance with "the principles of fundamental justice".

With respect to s. 1 of the Charter, Taylor J. held, at p. 718, that the qualification the Board placed on Regulation 5.04 was not a "limit prescribed by law", as was required by s. 1, but rather "a limit which they placed on law". He added that even if he had found the policy of the Board to be a "limit prescribed by law", it had not been shown to meet the requirements of s. 1 as a "reasonable limit" on the respondents' rights under ss. 15 and 7.

d'avis qu'il ne serait pas approprié que le tribunal substitue son opinion à celle du conseil d'administration de l'hôpital quant au caractère approprié de [TRADUCTION] «l'âge prévu pour la retraite».

Le juge Taylor est parvenu à une conclusion différente quant à l'argument des intimés que le conseil d'administration avait contrevenu au par. 15(1) dans l'application du règlement 5.04. En ce qui concerne la politique du conseil de ne pas renouveler les privilèges d'admission des médecins visés par le règlement à moins qu'ils n'établissent qu'ils «avaient quelque chose d'unique à offrir à l'hôpital», il a affirmé, aux pp. 716 et 717:

Pour ces motifs, le juge Taylor a conclu que l'application du règlement 5.04 constituait une discrimination fondée sur l'âge au sens du par. 15(1) de la Charte. Il a également conclu que l'application du règlement privait les intimés du droit à la liberté au sens de l'art. 7 de la Charte d'une façon non conforme aux «principes de justice fondamentale».

Quant à l'article premier de la Charte, le juge Taylor a conclu, à la p. 718, que la restriction apportée au règlement 5.04 par le conseil d'administration ne constituait pas une «limite prescrite par une règle de droit», comme l'exige l'article premier, mais plutôt [TRADUCTION] «une limite apportée à la règle de droit». Il a ajouté que même s'il avait conclu que la politique du conseil était une «limite prescrite par une règle de droit», on n'avait pas démontré qu'elle satisfaisait aux exigences de l'article premier comme une «limite raisonnable» aux droits des intimés reconnus par les art. 15 et 7.

On appeal, the British Columbia Court of Appeal held that the Charter applied to the hospital both in respect of its passage of Regulation 5.04 and of its application of that Regulation. It was of the opinion, at p. 168, that the "control exercised by the government over the operation of the hospital generally, and the formulation of its retirement policy in particular, put the question beyond doubt". Citing this Court's decision in RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573, the Court of Appeal stated that the question to be answered was whether the alleged infringement was an act of the legislative, executive or administrative branches of government or was connected to an act of one of these branches of government in a direct and precisely-defined way. It answered this question in the affirmative, stating, at p. 169:

> The regulation at issue in these proceedings, Reg. 5:04, was approved by the minister in October 1984. That approval suffices, in our opinion, to establish the direct and precisely defined connection with government referred to in Dolphin Delivery as bringing the act of a non-governmental body under the Charter. The impugned regulation was initiated by an act of the hospital, but it came into force only upon the approval of the executive arm of the provincial government.

The court concluded its consideration of the application issue by stating, at p. 169, that "If Reg. 5:04 falls under the Charter, so does the conduct of those bodies charged with administering it". In its view, this brought the policy of the Board of only renewing the admitting privileges of those doctors who were over 65 who "had something unique to offer the hospital" within the purview of the Charter.

Turning to s. 15(1) of the Charter, the Court of Appeal found that Regulation 5.04 came within the right to equality "before and under the law" guaranteed by that section. This was because Regulation 5.04 was "a rule or system of rules formulated by government and imposed upon the whole or a segment of society" (p. 169), with the result that it was a law for the purposes of s. 15.

En appel, la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a conclu que la Charte s'appliquait à l'hôpital tant à l'égard de l'adoption du règlement 5.04 que de son application. Elle était d'avis que [TRADUCTION] «le contrôle exercé par le gouvernement sur l'exploitation de l'hôpital en général et la formulation de sa politique de retraite en particulier ne soulevaient aucun doute» (p. 168). Citant l'arrêt SDGMR c. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 R.C.S. 573, de notre Cour, la Cour d'appel a affirmé que la question était de savoir si la violation alléguée était un acte du pouvoir législatif, exécutif ou administratif du gouvernement ou s'il se rattachait à un acte de l'une de ces branches du gouvernement d'une manière directe et définie précisément. Elle a répondu par l'affirmative, à la p. 169:

> [TRADUCTION] Le règlement contesté en l'espèce, le règlement 5.04, a été approuvé par le ministre en octobre 1984. À notre avis, cette approbation suffit pour établir le lien direct et précisément défini avec le gouvernement dont il était question dans l'arrêt Dolphin Delivery, et qui assujettit à la Charte l'action d'un organisme non gouvernemental. Le règlement contesté découle d'une action de l'hôpital, mais il n'est entré en vigueur qu'à la suite de l'approbation du pouvoir exécutif du gouvernement provincial.

La cour a conclu son examen de la question de l'application de la Charte en affirmant, à la p. 169, que [TRADUCTION] «[s]i le règlement 5.04 est visé par la Charte, il en est de même des actes des organismes responsables de son application». À son avis, cela signifiait que la Charte s'appliquait à la politique du conseil de ne renouveler les privilèges d'admission des médecins de plus de 65 ans que s'ils avaient [TRADUCTION] «quelque chose d'unique à offrir à l'hôpital».

Examinant le par. 15(1) de la Charte, la Cour d'appel a conclu que le règlement 5.04 relevait du droit à l'égalité [TRADUCTION] «devant la loi» devant la loi garanti par cet article. Il en était ainsi parce que le règlement 5.04 constituait [TRADUCTION] «une règle ou un système de règles formulé par le gouvernement et imposé à tout ou partie de la société» (p. 169), ce qui en faisait une loi aux

As to whether a violation of s. 15(1) had been shown, the Court of Appeal stated, at p. 170, that the question "is whether Reg. 5:04 makes a distinction adverse to the plaintiffs, which can be said to be unreasonable and unfair having due regard to their interests and the interests of others affected by the regulations". Citing evidence showing that the failure of the hospital to renew the admitting privileges of the respondents had meant the curtailment or end of their professional practices, the court found that Regulation 5.04 clearly made a distinction based on age which was adverse to those to whom it applied. It then found that this distinction could not be said to be reasonable and fair. After noting that there was no evidence that any of the respondents were incompetent or had prevented other physicians from obtaining admitting privileges or that physicians over 65 were, as a general rule, unable to perform to the high standards of the hospital, the court held, at pp. 171-72, that:

> A regulation terminating admitting privileges at age 65 cannot logically be justified merely because it will prevent the possibility of an incompetent physician being associated with the hospital at some point thereafter. To justify such a provision, a correlation must be shown between the age of 65 and incompetence or other detriment to the operation of the hospital. In the absence of such a correlation, we cannot say that the distinction entailed in requiring retirement at age 65 is reasonable and fair.

The court then considered and rejected the argument that Regulation 5.04 did not lay down a mandatory retirement policy, but simply provided a method for determining whether those over 65 remained fit to practise. In this respect, it observed that although Regulation 5.04 stipulated that "health and continuing performance" were to be considered in determining whether a particular doctor was to be allowed to defer retirement, it did not confine its consideration to those factors. It also observed that Regulation 5.04 was interpreted and applied by the Board as a mandatory retirement provision, since only those doctors with fins de l'art. 15. Quant à savoir si la violation du par. 15(1) avait été démontrée, la Cour d'appel a affirmé, à la p. 170, que la question [TRADUCTION] «est de savoir si le règlement 5.04 établit une distinction préjudiciable aux appelants que l'on peut qualifier d'abusive ou d'injuste compte tenu de leurs intérêts et des intérêts des autres personnes visées par les règlements». Produisant des éléments de preuve démontrant que le refus de l'hôpital de renouveler les privilèges d'admission des intimés revenait à restreindre leur pratique professionnelle, ou à y mettre fin, la cour a conclu que le règlement 5.04 établissait clairement une distinction fondée sur l'âge qui était préjudiciable à ceux qu'il visait. Elle a ensuite conclu que cette distinction ne pouvait être qualifiée de raisonnable et d'équitable. Après avoir souligné qu'il n'y avait aucune preuve que les intimés étaient incompétents ou avaient empêché d'autres médecins d'obtenir des privilèges d'admission ou que les médecins de plus de 65 ans étaient, de façon générale, incapables de respecter les normes élevées de l'hôpital, la cour a conclu ce qui suit, aux pp. 171 et 172:

> [TRADUCTION] En toute logique, on ne peut justifier un règlement mettant fin aux privilèges d'admission à partir de 65 ans simplement parce que cela écartera la possibilité qu'un médecin incompétent soit rattaché à l'hôpital par la suite. Pour justifier une telle disposition, un rapport doit être établi entre l'âge de 65 ans et l'incompétence des médecins ou un autre préjudice portant atteinte à l'exploitation de l'hôpital. En l'absence d'un tel rapport, nous ne pouvons affirmer que la distinction établie par la mise à la retraite obligatoire à 65 ans est raisonnable et équitable.

La cour a ensuite examiné et rejeté l'argument que le règlement 5.04 n'établissait pas une politique de retraite obligatoire, mais constituait simplement une façon de déterminer ceux qui demeuraient habiles à pratiquer après 65 ans. À cet égard, la cour a souligné que bien que le règlement 5.04 précise que [TRADUCTION] «l'état de santé et le rendement continu» devaient être examinés pour décider de permettre à un médecin de reporter la date de sa retraite, le règlement ne restreignait pas l'examen à ces facteurs. Elle a également souligné que le conseil d'administration interprétait et appliquait le règlement 5.04 comme une disposi-

"unique skills" were in fact allowed to defer retirement.

Turning to s. 1 of the Charter, the court held that the objective of Regulation 5.04—the maintenance of the highest standards of medical care and instruction—was sufficiently important to warrant overriding a constitutionally-protected right. But it found that it had not been shown that the means chosen to achieve this objective were demonstrably justified, having regard to the guidelines set out in this Court's decision in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103. This was because Regulation 5.04 "must be viewed as unfair and arbitrary in the absence of evidence or other clear indication that there is a correlation between the age of 65 and the inability to practise medicine properly or other detriment to the hospital's operations" (p. 173). It was also because the failure to show the above-mentioned correlation meant that it "cannot be said that denial of admitting privileges to all physicians who reach that age impairs the rights of those physicians as little as possible having regard to the aim of maintaining high medical standards at the hospital" (p. 173). Finally, there was a lack of overall proportionality between the object Regulation 5.04 sought to achieve and the means it employed, in which respect the court again returned to the "lack of a convincing link between the age of 65 and the ability of the hospital to deliver the high level of care, teaching and research to which it aspires" (p. 174).

Having found in favour of the respondents on the s. 15 argument, the Court of Appeal found it unnecessary to consider whether an infringement of s. 7 of the Charter could also be established.

Leave to appeal to this Court was granted and the following constitutional questions were stated by Chief Justice Dickson on August 30, 1988:

1. Do the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms apply to the actions of the Vancouver tion de mise à la retraite obligatoire puisque seuls les médecins aux [TRADUCTION] «compétences particulières» avaient en réalité la permission de reporter leur retraite.

Examinant l'article premier de la Charte, la cour a conclu que l'objectif du règlement 5.04—la prestation de soins médicaux et d'une formation médicale de première qualité—était suffisamment important pour justifier la suppression d'un droit protégé par la Constitution. Mais elle a décidé qu'on n'avait pas établi que les mesures choisies pour parvenir à cet objectif étaient de celles dont la justification peut se démontrer, compte tenu des directives formulées par notre Cour dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103. Et ce, parce que le règlement 5.04 [TRADUCTION] «doit être considéré comme injuste et arbitraire en l'absence d'une preuve ou d'une autre indication claire qu'il y a un rapport entre l'âge de 65 ans et l'incapacité à pratiquer correctement la médecine ou un autre préjudice portant atteinte au fonctionnement de l'hôpital» (p. 173). Autre motif de la cour, le défaut d'établir le rapport en question signifiait qu'on [TRADUCTION] «ne pouvait pas affirmer que le retrait des privilèges d'admission aux médecins qui atteignent cet âge porte le moins possible atteinte à leurs droits compte tenu de l'objectif poursuivi, le maintien des normes médicales de première qualité à l'hôpital» (p. 173). Enfin, il y avait une absence de proportionnalité générale entre l'objectif que visait à atteindre le règlement 5.04 et les mesures employées, ce qui a amené la cour à réaffirmer [TRADUCTION] «l'absence d'un lien convaincant entre l'âge de 65 ans et la capacité de l'hôpital de respecter les normes de première qualité auxquelles il aspire en matière de soins, d'enseignement et de recherche» (p. 174).

Ayant statué en faveur des intimés à l'égard de l'argument fondé sur l'art. 15, la Cour d'appel a conclu qu'il n'était pas nécessaire d'examiner s'il y avait violation de l'art. 7 de la Charte.

Notre Cour a accordé l'autorisation de pourvoi et le juge en chef Dickson a formulé les questions constitutionnelles suivantes le 30 août 1988:

1. Les dispositions de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés s'appliquent-elles aux actions du Vancouver

General Hospital in establishing and administering Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations?

2. If the answer to question 1 is yes, is Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations contrary to s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

3. If the answer to question 1 is yes, was the administration of Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations by the Vancouver General Hospital contrary to s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

4. If the answer to either questions 2 or 3 is yes, is Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations or the manner of its administration by the Vancouver General Hospital nevertheless justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

The Attorneys General of Canada, Ontario and of British Columbia intervened.

The Application of the Charter

The question of whether or not the Charter applies in a particular case is to be answered in light of s. 32(1), which reads:

32. (1) This Charter applies

(a) to the Parliament and government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament including all matters relating to the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories; and

(b) to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

As I commented in McKinney, these words give a strong message that only government is to be bound by the Charter. Various explanations can be advanced as to why the decision to so limit the Charter was taken, some of which I outlined in McKinney. These include the historical association of bills of rights with the struggle to constrain the exceptional power of government to impose its will upon the individual or minority groups; the belief that the values which a bill of rights seeks to promote and protect can be better and more flexibly achieved in the private sphere if left to the various specialized administrative or quasi-judicial bodies which are mandated and equipped to deal with discrimination in specific social and economic

General Hospital relativement à la rédaction et à la mise en œuvre du règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations?

2. Si la réponse à la question 1 est affirmative, le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations est-il contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

3. Si la réponse à la question 1 est affirmative, l'application du règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations par le Vancouver General Hospital est-elle contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

4. Si la réponse aux questions 2 ou 3 est affirmative, le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations ou la façon dont il est appliqué par le Vancouver General Hospital sont-ils néanmoins justifiés en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Les procureurs généraux du Canada, de l'Ontario et de la Colombie-Britannique sont intervenus.

L'application de la Charte

Pour décider de l'application de la Charte dans un cas particulier, il faut tenir compte du par. 32(1) qui se lit ainsi:

32. (1) La présente charte s'applique:

a) au Parlement et au gouvernement du Canada, pour tous les domaines relevant du Parlement, y compris ceux qui concernent le territoire du Yukon et les territoires du Nord-Ouest;

b) à la législature et au gouvernement de chaque province, pour tous les domaines relevant de cette législature.

Comme je l'ai dit dans l'arrêt McKinney, ces mots indiquent fortement que seul le gouvernement est lié par la Charte. Diverses explications peuvent être apportées pour justifier la décision de restreindre ainsi la Charte, et j'en ai mentionné quelques-unes dans l'arrêt McKinney. Parmi celles-ci, on note les liens historiques entre les déclarations des droits et les luttes pour restreindre le pouvoir exceptionnel du gouvernement d'imposer sa volonté aux individus ou groupes minoritaires; la croyance que les valeurs qu'une déclaration des droits vise à promouvoir et à protéger peut se réaliser mieux et de manière plus souple dans le domaine privé, si on s'en remet aux divers organismes administratifs ou quasi judiciaires spécialisés contexts; the concomitant apprehension that a generally applicable bill of rights would have an unduly chilling effect on the confidence which is essential to the meaningful enjoyment of the individual freedom a bill of rights seeks to protect; and the heavy if not impossible burden which application of the Charter to private conduct would impose on the courts.

Other considerations of this sort could and have been suggested. The challenge for the courts is to find a principled basis on which to give effect to the deliberate choice that has been made in favour of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms that applies only to government and its emanations. The leading authority in this respect is, of course, this Court's decision in RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., supra. There McIntyre J., speaking for the Court, observed, at p. 598, that s. 32(1) treated Parliament and the legislatures "as separate or specific branches of government, distinct from the executive branch of government", from which it followed that "where the word 'government' is used in s. 32 it refers not to government in its generic sense—meaning the whole of the governmental apparatus of the state— but to a branch of government". On this basis he concluded that "The word 'government', following as it does the words 'Parliament' and 'Legislature', must ... refer to the executive or administrative branch of government", a conclusion he buttressed by referring to the manner in which the word "government" was used in the Constitution Act, 1867.

In short, McIntyre J. was of the view that the references in s. 32(1) to the "government of Canada" and the "government of each province" could not be interpreted as bringing within the ambit of the Charter the whole of that amorphous entity which in contemporary political theory might be thought of as "the state". Instead, they were to be interpreted as references to what has traditionally been thought of as the institutions of government—those bodies and offices upon which the Constitution confers power to make and enforce laws generally applicable across the body politic. This did not mean that the Charter was only to qui sont tenus et capables de traiter de la discrimination dans des contextes sociaux et économiques particuliers; la crainte concomitante qu'une déclaration des droits d'application générale aurait un effet trop paralysant sur la confiance qui est essentielle au véritable exercice de la liberté individuelle qu'une charte des droits vise à protéger; et le lourd sinon impossible fardeau que l'application de la Charte aux actions de nature privée imposerait aux tribunaux.

D'autres considérations de ce genre pourraient être apportées et l'ont été. Le défi des tribunaux est de trouver un principe sur lequel fonder la décision délibérée de n'appliquer une charte des droits et libertés qu'au gouvernement et à ses émanations. L'arrêt de principe à cet égard est évidemment l'arrêt SDGMR c. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., précité, de notre Cour. Dans cet arrêt, le juge McIntyre, au nom de la Cour, a souligné, à la p. 598, que le par. 32(1) considère le Parlement et les législatures «comme des branches de gouvernement séparées ou spécifiques, distinctes de l'exécutif» et que, par conséquent, le terme «gouvernement» utilisé à l'art. 32 désigne non pas le gouvernement au sens général—c'est-à-dire au sens de l'ensemble de l'appareil gouvernemental de l'État—mais plutôt une branche de gouvernement». D'où sa conclusion que «[l]e terme 'gouvernement', qui suit les termes 'Parlement' et 'législature', doit alors [...] désigner la branche exécutive ou administrative du gouvernement», une conclusion qu'il étaye en mentionnant la manière dont le terme «gouvernement» a été utilisé dans la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867.

En résumé, le juge McIntyre était d'avis que les mentions au par. 32(1) du «gouvernement du Canada» et du «gouvernement de chaque province» ne pouvaient être interprétées de manière à faire relever de la Charte l'ensemble de cette entité vague que l'on désigne parfois de nos jours en science politique comme [TRADUCTION] «l'État». Ces mentions devaient plutôt être interprétées comme désignant ce que l'on a traditionnellement considéré être les institutions du gouvernement—ces organismes auxquels la Constitution confère le pouvoir d'adopter et d'appliquer des lois d'application générale aux entités politiques. Ce qui ne veut apply to Parliament, Legislatures and Ministers of the Crown. For although this Court was not called upon in Dolphin Delivery to delineate the circumstances in which the Charter applies to the actions of subordinate bodies that are created, supported or supervised by government, McIntyre J. clearly countenanced the application of the Charter to such bodies by including the "administrative branch" within his definition of the word "government". More specifically, he said, at p. 602:

> It would also seem that the Charter would apply to many forms of delegated legislation, regulations, orders in council, possibly municipal by-laws, and by-laws and regulations of other creatures of Parliament and the Legislatures.

Nor did the Court in Dolphin Delivery preclude the possibility of a successful reliance on the Charter by a party to a dispute between private individuals, provided it could be shown that the party against whom the Charter was invoked relied upon some form of governmental action. As to the question of what would amount to a sufficient element of governmental intervention, McIntyre J. was not called upon to give a determinative answer. However, in the course of a consideration of the circumstances in which the Charter would apply to court orders in private litigation, he did note, at p. 601, that a "more direct and a more precisely-defined connection between the element of government action and the claim advanced" than was shown by the appellant in Dolphin Delivery was required.

The respondents argued that it is unnecessary in this appeal to consider whether the Vancouver General is one of the subordinate bodies to which the Charter applies. They argue that because Regulation 5.04 could only take effect upon the approval of the Minister of Health, its adoption and subsequent administration must be characterized as actions of the executive branch of government, to which the Charter obviously applies. In support of this argument, they cite this Court's decision in Attorney General of Quebec v. Blaikie, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 312 (Blaikie No. 2).

pas dire que la Charte devait seulement s'appliquer au Parlement, aux législatures et aux ministres de la Couronne. Car bien que la Cour n'ait pas été appelée dans l'arrêt Dolphin Delivery à déterminer les circonstances dans lesquelles la Charte s'applique aux actions des organismes subordonnés créés, financés ou contrôlés par le gouvernement, le juge McIntyre s'est clairement prononcé en faveur de l'application de la Charte à ces organismes en incluant la «branche administrative» dans sa définition du terme «gouvernement». Plus précisément, il a dit, à la p. 602:

> Il semblerait aussi que la Charte s'appliquerait à plusieurs formes de législation déléguée, de réglementation, de décrets, peut-être de règlements municipaux et de règlements administratifs et généraux d'autres organes créés par le Parlement et les législatures.

La Cour, dans l'arrêt Dolphin Delivery, n'a pas non plus écarté la possibilité qu'une partie à un litige privé puisse avoir gain de cause en invoquant la Charte, pourvu qu'elle puisse démontrer que la partie contre qui la Charte a été invoquée devait recourir à une certaine forme d'action gouvernementale. Quant à savoir ce qui constituerait une intervention gouvernementale suffisante, le juge McIntyre n'avait pas à donner de réponse définitive. Cependant, alors qu'il examinait les circonstances dans lesquelles la Charte s'appliquerait aux ordonnances judiciaires dans un litige entre particuliers, il a souligné, à la p. 601, qu'un «lien plus direct et mieux défini entre l'élément d'action gouvernementale et la revendication qui est faite» était nécessaire, ce qui n'avait pas été établi par l'appelant dans l'arrêt Dolphin Delivery.

En l'espèce, les intimés ont soutenu qu'il n'était pas nécessaire d'examiner si le Vancouver General constitue l'un de ces organismes subordonnés auxquels la Charte s'applique. Ils soutiennent que parce que le règlement 5.04 ne pouvait entrer en vigueur que sur approbation du ministre de la Santé, son adoption et son application ultérieure doivent être qualifiées comme des actions du pouvoir exécutif du gouvernement auquel la Charte s'applique évidemment. À l'appui de cet argument, ils citent l'arrêt Procureur général du Québec c. Blaikie, [1981] 1 R.C.S. 312 (l'affaire Blaikie no. 2), de notre Cour.

I do not think that the question of the applicability of the Charter to the facts of this case can be so easily disposed of. To my mind, the fact that Regulation 5.04 only came into effect when approved by the Minister of Health does not alter its character as a regulation for the internal management of the hospital and its staff, which was developed, written and adopted by the authorities entrusted with the ongoing management of the hospital's internal affairs by the terms of the Vancouver General Hospital Act. The evidence does not show that Regulation 5.04 was instigated by the Minister of Health, or that it in any way represents ministerial policy with respect to the renewal of admitting privileges. Instead, it shows that Regulation 5.04 was the end result of an internal review of policies relating to the retirement of medical staff which the hospital undertook at the initiative of its Board of Trustees in 1979. Leaving aside for the moment the question whether the Board should itself be regarded as part of government by virtue of the fact that the vast majority of its members are appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, Regulation 5.04 can, in these circumstances, be interpreted as a recognition that the hospital is accorded a large degree of autonomy with respect to matters relating to its internal management. To put it somewhat differently, there is no reason to assign greater weight to the fact that Regulation 5.04 took effect after being approved by the Minister of Health than is assigned to the fact that it emerged from an internal policy review undertaken independently of the ministry or overall government policy. I agree with the appellants that this view is supported by the evidence that there is considerable variety between the hospital by-laws dealing with retirement that have obtained ministerial approval in British Columbia. This evidence suggests that retirement policy is left to the judgment of those entrusted with the responsibility of managing individual hospitals.

It is particularly difficult to see how the need for ministerial approval can be said to lead to the conclusion that the administration of Regulation 5.04 must be regarded as an action of the executive branch of government. There is absolutely no evidence that the policy of the Board to only renew

Je ne crois pas que l'on puisse décider aussi facilement la question de l'applicabilité de la Charte aux faits de l'espèce. À mon avis, le fait que le règlement 5.04 ne soit entré en vigueur que lorsqu'il a été approuvé par le ministre de la Santé ne modifie pas sa nature de règlement de gestion interne de l'hôpital et de son personnel, qui a été conçu, rédigé et adopté par les autorités responsables de la gestion quotidienne des affaires internes de l'hôpital selon la Vancouver General Hospital Act. La preuve n'indique pas que le règlement 5.04 a été adopté à la demande du ministre de la Santé ni qu'il constitue d'une façon quelconque une politique ministérielle concernant le renouvellement des privilèges d'admission. La preuve indique plutôt que le règlement 5.04 est le produit d'un examen interne entrepris par l'hôpital à la demande de son conseil d'administration en 1979 concernant la retraite du personnel médical. Sans traiter pour l'instant de la question de savoir si le conseil d'administration devrait lui-même être considéré comme un élément du gouvernement parce que la vaste majorité de ses membres sont nommés par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil, on peut dire, dans ces circonstances, que le règlement 5.04 témoigne que l'hôpital jouit d'une large marge d'autonomie dans sa gestion interne. En d'autres termes, il n'y a aucune raison d'accorder une importance plus considérable au fait que le règlement 5.04 est entré en vigueur après approbation du ministre de la Santé qu'au fait qu'il résulte d'un examen des politiques internes de l'hôpital entrepris indépendamment du ministère ou de l'ensemble de la politique gouvernementale. Je suis d'accord avec les appelants que cette opinion est étayée par la preuve que les règlements portant sur la retraite qui ont reçu l'approbation ministérielle en Colombie-Britannique varient considérablement d'un hôpital à l'autre. Ce qui laisse entendre que la politique de la retraite est laissée à l'appréciation des responsables de la gestion de chaque hôpital.

Il est particulièrement difficile de voir comment la nécessité de l'approbation ministérielle peut entraîner la conclusion qu'il faille considérer l'application du règlement 5.04 comme une action du pouvoir exécutif du gouvernement. Il n'y a absolument aucune preuve que la politique du conseil the admitting privileges of those who came within Regulation 5.04 if they "had something unique to offer the hospital" even came to the attention of the Minister or his staff. The only sense in which the adoption and application of that policy could be said to be the action of the Minister is that it was not precluded by the wording of the by-law approved by the Minister, assuming for the moment that such approval could by itself have made Regulation 5.04 a governmental act. On that reasoning, however, the organs of government would be responsible, and the Charter would apply, to all actions which in any way turned on the interpretation of the Regulation.

I do not think the respondents' argument in this respect is assisted by Blaikie No. 2, supra. The question in that case was as to the scope of s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867. This Court held that s. 133 applied not only to statutes enacted by the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, but also to the regulations and orders of statutory bodies, provided there was some connection between those regulations or orders, apart from the delegation of the power to enact them, and the Quebec Legislature to which s. 133 is by its terms limited. Citing the principle that "in our constitutional system the enactments of the Government should be assimilated with the enactments of the Legislature", the Court concluded, at p. 329, that subsidiary regulations and orders fell within s. 133 whenever "these other regulations are made subject to the approval of the Government". It stated, at p. 329:

> The particular form of words used in this respect by various statutes matters little. Whether it be provided that some regulations "shall have no force and effect until approved and sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council" or "shall not be carried into execution until approved by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council" or "shall not have force and effect until confirmed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council", they can be assimilated with the enactments of the Government and therefore of the Legislature as long as positive action of the Government is required to breathe life into them.

d'administration de ne renouveler les privilèges d'admission des médecins visés par le règlement 5.04 que s'ils [TRADUCTION] «avaient quelque chose d'unique à offrir à l'hôpital» a même été portée à l'attention du ministre ou de son personnel. La seule façon de dire que l'adoption et l'application de cette politique résultent de l'action du ministre est qu'elles n'étaient pas interdites par le texte du règlement approuvé par le ministre, en supposant pour l'instant que cette approbation pouvait en soi avoir fait du règlement 5.04 une action gouvernementale. Cependant, d'après ce raisonnement, les organes du gouvernement seraient responsables de toutes les actions qui porteraient d'une façon quelconque sur l'interprétation du règlement et la Charte s'appliquerait à toutes ces actions.

Je ne crois pas que l'arrêt Blaikie no. 2, précité, puisse être d'aucun secours à la position des intimés à cet égard. La question dans cet arrêt concernait la portée de l'art. 133 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867. Notre Cour a conclu que l'art. 133 s'appliquait non seulement aux lois adoptées par la législature de la province de Québec, mais également aux règlements et aux ordonnances des organismes statutaires, pourvu qu'il y ait un certain lien entre d'une part, ces règlements ou ordonnances, mis à part le pouvoir délégué de les adopter, et d'autre part, la législature du Québec à laquelle l'art. 133 est restreint selon ses termes. Citant le principe que «dans notre régime constitutionnel, les mesures édictées par le gouvernement doivent être assimilées aux mesures adoptées par la Législature», la Cour a conclu, à la p. 329, que les règlements et ordonnances subsidiaires relevaient de l'art. 133 chaque fois que «ces autres règlements sont soumis à l'approbation du gouvernement». Elle a affirmé, à la p. 329:

> Le texte particulier des différentes lois importe peu à cet égard. Que la loi dispose que certains règlements «n'entreront en vigueur que lorsqu'ils auront été approuvés et sanctionnés par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil» ou «ne seront pas mis à exécution avant d'avoir été approuvés par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil» ou «n'auront aucun effet avant d'avoir été confirmés par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil», ils peuvent être assimilés à des mesures du gouvernement et, par conséquent, de la Législature tant qu'une action positive du gouvernement est nécessaire pour leur insuffler la vie.

Without such approval or confirmation, they are a nullity . . . or at least inoperative.

Relying on this statement, the respondents argue that the fact that the by-laws of the Vancouver General only come into force on receiving the approval of the Minister of Health should bring them within the compass of s. 32(1) of the Charter in the same way that the need for executive approval brings the regulations and orders of subsidiary bodies of the Government of Quebec within the compass of s. 133. It must be remembered however, that whereas s. 133 relates to the scope of a specific, albeit important, interest or right, s. 32(1) relates to the scope of a comprehensive bill of rights encompassing many different types of rights and freedoms and, thus, many different aspects of government activity. I do not think that what the Court has said with regard to the scope of the former is neatly transferable to the task of delimiting the scope of the latter. It should also be noted that the following statement appears in the introduction to this Court's decision in Blaikie No. 2, at p. 319:

It must be emphasized that regulations or orders in issue in the case at bar are regulations or orders which constitute delegated legislation properly so called and not rules or directives of internal management.

Pursuant to what I have said above, I would think it clear that Regulation 5.04, concerned as it is with the retirement of medical staff, is not delegated legislation, but is quintessentially a "rule or directive of internal management". It follows that it is not the type of regulation the Court had in mind when setting out the boundaries of s. 133. The requirement of approval by the government is nothing more than a mechanism to ensure that the hospital's actions do not run counter to the powers conferred on the government by the legislature to prescribe standards in respect of hospital administration. It is a mere supervisory power to that end. It does not displace the ongoing responsibility of its Board to manage the affairs of the hospital for the benefit of the community.

Sans cette approbation ou confirmation, ils sont nuls [. . .] ou à tout le moins inopérants.

S'appuyant sur cette affirmation, les intimés soutiennent que le fait que les règlements du Vancouver General n'entrent en vigueur qu'après avoir reçu l'approbation du ministre de la Santé devrait les faire relever du par. 32(1) de la Charte de la même façon que la nécessité de l'approbation du pouvoir exécutif fait relever de l'art. 133 les règlements et ordonnances des organismes subsidiaires du gouvernement du Québec. Il convient cependant de rappeler que, alors que l'art. 133 concerne la portée d'un intérêt ou d'un droit précis, bien qu'important, le par. 32(1) concerne la portée d'une déclaration des droits générale englobant plusieurs types de droits et de libertés différents et donc plusieurs aspects de l'activité du gouvernement. Je ne crois pas que ce que la Cour a affirmé en ce qui concerne la portée de l'art. 133 se transpose facilement pour délimiter la portée du par. 32(1). Il convient également de souligner que l'affirmation suivante se retrouve dans l'introduction des motifs de notre Cour dans l'arrêt Blaikie no. 2, à la p. 319:

Il importe de souligner qu'il s'agit dans la présente affaire de règlements qui constituent de la législation déléguée proprement dite et non pas des règles ou directives de régie interne.

Conformément à ce que j'ai déjà dit, je pense qu'il est clair que le règlement 5.04, traitant comme il le fait de la retraite du personnel médical, n'est pas une disposition législative déléguée, mais fait partie essentiellement des «règles ou directives de régie interne». Il s'ensuit qu'il ne s'agit pas du type de règlements dont se préoccupait la Cour lorsqu'elle établissait les paramètres de l'art. 133. L'obligation d'obtenir l'approbation du gouvernement n'est rien de plus qu'un mécanisme pour veiller à ce que les actions de l'hôpital ne soient pas contraires aux pouvoirs conférés au gouvernement par la législature de prévoir des normes en matière d'administration hospitalière. Il ne s'agit que d'un simple pouvoir de contrôle destiné à cette fin. Il ne modifie pas la responsabilité permanente du conseil d'administration de gérer les affaires de l'hôpital à l'avantage de la collectivité.

In light of the foregoing, I would conclude that neither Regulation 5.04 or its administration can properly be said to be acts of the executive branch of government. I take it to be self-evident that they cannot be regarded as acts of the legislative branch of government, as there does not appear to be any provision in either of the statutes under which the Vancouver General operates that requires it to adopt a special policy respecting the renewal of admitting privileges of doctors who have reached the age of 65. There is certainly nothing in the relevant statute law that requires the adoption of the particular policy which the hospital has in fact adopted. The question therefore becomes whether the Vancouver General is part of what McIntyre J. designated the "administrative branch" of government.

This question cannot be answered by simply pointing out that the provision of health care and hospital services is an important part of the legislative mandate of provincial governments, and that the Vancouver General was incorporated for the express purpose of providing such care and services. If that was by itself sufficient to bring the hospital and all other bodies and individuals concerned with the provision of health care or hospital services within the reach of the Charter, a wide range of institutions and organizations commonly regarded as part of the private sector, from airlines, railways, and banks, to trade unions, symphonies and other cultural organizations, would also come under the Charter. For each of these entities, along with many others, are concerned with the provision of a service which is an important part of the legislative mandate of one or the other level of government.

In short, as in McKinney, we must look beyond the fact that the Vancouver General is an incorporated body which performs an important public service. In this regard the respondents adopt the findings of the Court of Appeal as to the degree and significance of government involvement in the operation of the Vancouver General. In concluding that the hospital was controlled by the Government of British Columbia and therefore subject to Compte tenu de ce qui précède, je suis d'avis de conclure que ni le règlement 5.04 ni son application ne peuvent être véritablement considérés comme des actes du pouvoir exécutif du gouvernement. J'estime qu'il est évident qu'ils ne peuvent être considérés comme des actes du pouvoir législatif du gouvernement puisqu'il ne semble pas y avoir de disposition dans l'une ou l'autre des lois régissant l'exploitation du Vancouver General qui l'oblige à adopter une politique particulière concernant le renouvellement des privilèges d'admission des médecins qui ont atteint 65 ans. Il n'y a certainement rien dans la législation applicable qui exige l'adoption de la politique particulière que l'hôpital a de fait adoptée. La question est donc de savoir si le Vancouver General fait partie de ce que le juge McIntyre a appelé la «branche administrative» du gouvernement.

On ne peut simplement y répondre en soulignant que la prestation des soins de santé et des services hospitaliers constitue une partie importante du mandat législatif des gouvernements provinciaux, et que le Vancouver General a été constitué en personne morale dans le but précis de fournir ces soins et ces services. Si cela suffisait en soi pour rendre la Charte applicable à l'hôpital et aux autres organismes et individus visés par les soins de santé ou les services hospitaliers, un vaste éventail d'institutions et d'organismes considérés habituellement comme faisant partie du secteur privé, allant des compagnies aériennes, des chemins de fer et des banques aux syndicats, aux orchestres et aux autres organismes culturels, relèverait également de la Charte. En effet, chacune de ces entités, ainsi que plusieurs autres, ont pour but de fournir un service qui constitue un élément important du mandat législatif de l'un ou l'autre palier de gouvernement.

En résumé, comme dans l'arrêt McKinney, nous ne devons pas nous arrêter uniquement au fait que le Vancouver General est un organisme constitué en personne morale qui offre un important service public. À cet égard, les intimés adoptent les conclusions de la Cour d'appel quant à la mesure et l'importance de la participation du gouvernement dans l'exploitation du Vancouver General. En concluant que l'hôpital était contrôlé par le gouverne-the Charter, the Court of Appeal summarized, at pp. 168-69, what it took to be the relevant provisions of the Hospital Act in the following terms:

Section 2(1) requires the hospital to make room for government representation on its management board in whatever manner the government thinks necessary; to have a board and by-laws thought necessary by the minister and any constitution, by-laws or rules are ineffective without ministerial approval; and to comply with the conditions prescribed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council—a provision which leaves it open for the Lieutenant Governor to set virtually any requirement deemed appropriate.

Section 2(3) gives government an unassailable right to appoint persons to the hospital management board. Section 32 states that the minister may require that by-laws be revised to his satisfaction and s. 36(1) permits the Lieutenant Governor to make any additional regulations he thinks necessary—regulations which under s. 36(3) may include virtually all aspects of running the hospital. Section 41(1) provides for additional ministerial control where hospitals receive money for building, and s. 44(4) and (6) allows the government to appoint a public administrator to manage the hospital and displace the board. That administrator can be given total control of the hospital (s. 44(5)), governed by conditions set by the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

The effective control of the hospital by the government is affirmed by the Vancouver General Hospital Act, which states that by-laws passed by the hospital's board come into force only when approved by the minister: s. 6.

While I accept this summary as substantially accurate, I respectfully disagree with the view of the Court of Appeal that it reveals governmental control of a character and quality that would justify application of the Charter. I have already given my opinion as to the limited significance of the requirement that the hospital's by-laws be approved by the Minister of Health. I also think that it is not very significant that the Hospital Act provides for ministerial control in respect of the use which the hospital makes of any grant received from the Province toward, in the words of s. 41(1), "the planning, constructing, reconstructing, purchasing and equipping of a hospital ... or the ment de la Colombie-Britannique et donc assujetti à la Charte, la Cour d'appel a résumé comme suit, aux pp. 168 et 169, ce qu'elle estimait être les dispositions pertinentes de la Hospital Act:

[TRADUCTION] Le paragraphe 2(1) oblige l'hôpital à prévoir la représentation du gouvernement au conseil de gestion, de la manière que le gouvernement estime nécessaire; à avoir un conseil et des règlements que le ministre juge nécessaires, tout acte constitutif, règlement ou règle étant inopérants sans l'approbation du ministre; et à se conformer aux conditions établies par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil—une disposition qui permet au lieutenant-gouverneur d'imposer pratiquement toute exigence qu'il estime appropriée.

Le paragraphe 2(3) accorde au gouvernement un droit absolu de nommer les personnes au conseil de gestion de l'hôpital. L'article 32 prévoit que le ministre peut exiger que les règlements soient examinés d'une manière qu'il estime satisfaisante et le par. 36(1) permet au lieutenant-gouverneur d'adopter tout autre règlement qu'il estime nécessaire—des règlements qui peuvent viser pratiquement tous les aspects de l'exploitation d'un hôpital en vertu du par. 36(3). Le paragraphe 41(1) prévoit un contrôle ministériel supplémentaire lorsque les hôpitaux reçoivent des subsides à des fins de construction et les par. 44(4) et (6) permettent au gouvernement de nommer un administrateur public pour gérer l'hôpital et remplacer le conseil. Cet administrateur peut se voir accorder le contrôle entier de l'hôpital (par. 44(5)), sous réserve des conditions établies par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil.

Le contrôle réel de l'hôpital par le gouvernement est confirmé par l'art. 6 du Vancouver General Hospital Act qui prévoit que les règlements adoptés par le conseil de l'hôpital n'entrent en vigueur que sur approbation du ministre.

Bien que ce résumé m'apparaisse essentiellement exact, avec égards, je ne puis partager l'opinion de la Cour d'appel qu'il implique l'existence d'un contrôle gouvernemental d'une nature et d'une qualité qui justifieraient l'application de la Charte. J'ai déjà exprimé mon opinion quant à l'importance relative de la nécessité de l'approbation du règlement de l'hôpital par le ministre de la Santé. J'estime également peu important que la Hospital Act prévoie un contrôle ministériel quant à l'emploi par l'hôpital des subventions reçues de la province et affectées, selon les termes du par. 41(1), [TRADUCTION] «à la planification, la construction, la reconstruction, l'achat et l'équipement acquiring of land or buildings for hospital purposes". The fact that the Vancouver General is not autonomous when it comes to the use of money given to it by the government for specific capital investments says little regarding the degree of autonomy it enjoys overall. If anything, it suggests that direct government involvement in hospital decision-making is the exception rather than the rule.

This point can be made with even greater force with respect to s. 36(1), which permits the Lieutenant Governor in Council to make such additional regulations as he thinks necessary, and s. 44, which provides for the appointment of a public administrator and the displacement of the Board. When it is considered that the power of the Minister under s. 36(1) is to make "any regulations deemed necessary for the carrying out of the provisions of this Act to meet any contingency not expressly provided for in it" (emphasis added), it becomes clear that both provisions have nothing to do with the day-to-day operation of the hospitals to which they apply. Instead, they make allowance for those exceptional circumstances where a high degree of direct government involvement in the management of a hospital is deemed to have become necessary. Again, the fact that the Act makes special allowance for ministerial intervention in these situations indicates that it assumes that the management of a hospital would ordinarily be a matter for the judgment of its own Board of Trustees.

In sum, it is crucial in assessing the statutory framework summarized by the Court of Appeal to bear in mind the difference between ultimate or extraordinary, and routine or regular control. While it is indisputable that the fate of the Vancouver General is ultimately in the hands of the Government of British Columbia, I do not think it can be said that the Hospital Act makes the daily or routine aspects of the hospital's operation, such as the adoption of policy with respect to the renewal of the admitting privileges of medical staff, subject to government control. On the contrary, it d'un hôpital [. . .] ou à l'acquisition de bien-fonds ou d'édifices pour les hôpitaux». Le fait que le Vancouver General ne soit pas autonome lorsqu'il est question de l'utilisation des sommes qui lui sont remises par le gouvernement à des fins d'investissements en capital déterminés ne révèle rien du degré d'autonomie dont l'hôpital bénéficie dans l'ensemble. Cela indique plutôt que la participation directe du gouvernement dans le processus décisionnel de l'hôpital est l'exception plutôt que la règle.

Cet argument peut même s'appliquer plus vigoureusement en ce qui concerne le par. 36(1), qui permet au lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil d'adopter les autres règlements qu'il estime nécessaires, et l'art. 44, qui prévoit la nomination d'un administrateur public et le remplacement du conseil d'administration. Lorsque l'on comprend que le pouvoir du ministre en vertu du par. 36(1) est d'adopter [TRADUCTION] «tout autre règlement qu'il estime nécessaire aux fins de l'application des dispositions de cette Loi pour répondre aux situations d'urgence que celle-ci ne prévoit pas expressément» (je souligne), il devient clair que les deux dispositions n'ont rien à voir avec l'exploitation quotidienne des hôpitaux auxquels elles s'appliquent. Elles prévoient plutôt les circonstances exceptionnelles où l'on estime nécessaire la participation directe et importante du gouvernement dans la gestion d'un hôpital. Encore une fois, le fait que la loi prévoie spécialement l'intervention du ministre dans ces situations indique qu'elle suppose que la gestion d'un hôpital est une question qui relève habituellement du jugement de son conseil d'administration.

En résumé, il est capital dans l'évaluation du cadre législatif résumé par la Cour d'appel d'avoir présent à l'esprit la différence entre le contrôle absolu ou extraordinaire et le contrôle routinier ou régulier. Bien qu'on ne puisse contester que l'existence du Vancouver General relève en dernier ressort du gouvernement de la Colombie-Britannique, je ne crois pas que l'on puisse affirmer que la Hospital Act assujettit les aspects quotidiens ou routiniers du fonctionnement de l'hôpital, comme l'adoption d'une politique en matière de renouvellement des privilèges d'admission accordés au per-implies that the responsibility for such matters will, barring some extraordinary development, rest with the Vancouver General's Board of Trustees. It could in fact be said to contain an explicit recognition to this effect, in that it defines "board of management" as "the directors, managers, trustees or other body of persons having the control and management of a hospital" (s. 1). To similar effect is s. 5 of the Vancouver General Hospital Act, which provides that the "property and affairs of the corporation shall be managed by a Board of Trustees". These two provisions would be meaningless unless the Hospital Act is interpreted in accordance with the distinction between ultimate or extraordinary, and routine or regular control which I have described above.

sonnel médical, au contrôle du gouvernement. Au contraire, cela signifie que la responsabilité en ces matières, sous réserve d'une situation extraordinaire, relève du conseil d'administration du Vancouver General. On pourrait d'ailleurs affirmer qu'elle le reconnaît expressément, en ce qu'elle définit le terme [TRADUCTION] «conseil d'administration» comme [TRADUCTION] «les directeurs, gestionnaires, fiduciaires ou autre groupe de personnes ayant le contrôle et la gestion d'un hôpital» (art. 1). L'article 5 de la Vancouver General Hospital Act va dans le même sens puisqu'il prévoit que [TRADUCTION] «les biens et les affaires de la société sont gérés par un conseil d'administration». Ces deux dispositions seraient inutiles à moins que la Hospital Act ne soit interprétée conformément à la distinction entre les contrôles ultimes ou extraordinaires et les contrôles routiniers ou réguliers que j'ai déjà décrits.

To this, it may be objected that the Board of Trustees is itself an extension of the Minister of Health and an instrument of government policy. Such an objection could draw support from s. 2(1) of the Hospital Act, which imposes a duty on all hospitals to have the "bylaws or rules thought necessary by the minister for the administration and management of the hospital's affairs and the provision of a high standard of care and treatment for patients". It could also draw support from s. 32, which empowers the Minister to "require that the bylaws or rules of a hospital . . . be revised in a manner satisfactory to him in order to meet changing conditions and policies, and to provide for greater uniformity and efficiency in all matters concerning the administration and operation of hospitals". Finally, it could be said that the subservient status of the Board of Trustees is plainly indicated by s. 2(3), which gives the government what the Court of Appeal called an "unassailable right to appoint persons to the hospital management board". As the respondents point out, the government appoints 14 of the 16 members of the Vancouver General's Board of Trustees.

À cet argument, on peut opposer que le conseil d'administration est en soi une extension du ministre de la Santé et un instrument de la politique du gouvernement. Cette objection pourrait s'appuyer sur le par. 2(1) de la Hospital Act, qui impose à tous les hôpitaux l'obligation d'avoir [TRADUCTION] «des règlements ou des règles que le ministre estime nécessaires à l'administration et à la gestion des affaires de l'hôpital ainsi qu'à la prestation de soins et de traitements de première qualité». Elle pourrait également s'appuyer sur l'art. 32 qui confère au ministre le pouvoir [TRADUCTION] «d'exiger que les règlements ou règles d'un hôpital [. . .] soient examinés d'une manière qu'il estime satisfaisante en vue de répondre à des conditions et des politiques en évolution et d'apporter plus d'uniformité et d'efficacité dans les domaines relevant de l'administration et de l'exploitation des hôpitaux». Enfin, on pourrait dire que le rôle subordonné du conseil d'administration ressort clairement du par. 2(3), lequel accorde au gouvernement ce que la Cour d'appel qualifie de «droit absolu de nommer les personnes au conseil de gestion de l'hôpital». Comme les intimés le soulignent, le gouvernement nomme 14 des 16 membres du conseil d'administration du Vancouver General.

To this argument I would make the following rejoinders. First, I do not think the fact that the Board of Trustees can be required to adopt by-laws that are thought necessary by the Minister of Health can undermine its responsibility for by-laws or rules, such as Regulation 5.04, which it adopts on its own initiative and pursuant to its own sense of what is in the best interests of the Vancouver General. The same can be said with respect to the Minister's power to order a revision of a hospital's by-laws, at least until such revision has actually been ordered.

As to the Lieutenant Governor's power to appoint members of the Board, while it is true, as noted, that the hospital's by-laws provide for the appointment of fourteen members of the Board of Trustees by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, it then specifies that two are to be appointed from each of the lists of nominees submitted by the President of The University of British Columbia, the British Columbia Health Association and the Board of the Vancouver General itself. One is to be appointed from nominees submitted by the British Columbia Institute of Technology, while seven members are to be appointed "from the Community at large". What this shows, I think, is that the Lieutenant Governor's power of appointment is far less discretionary than the respondents contend. It also shows, especially when it is remembered that the two remaining members of the Board are the hospital's President and the Chairman of the hospital's Medical Advisory Committee, that no member of the Board sits as the representative of the Minister of Health or the government generally. Instead, each sits as a representative of one of the groups or organizations that have a direct interest in the Vancouver General and the service it provides. It is not going too far to say that the Lieutenant Governor's power of appointment is, in light of Article 2, simply a mechanism to ensure the balanced representation of these groups and organizations on the hospital's principal decision-making body. It is not a means for the exercise of regular government control over the day-to-day operations of the hospital. This Je statuerais sur cet argument de la façon suivante. Premièrement, je ne crois pas qu'obliger le conseil d'administration à adopter des règlements que le ministre de la Santé estime nécessaires modifie sa responsabilité à l'égard des règlements ou des règles, comme le règlement 5.04, qu'il adopte de sa propre initiative et conformément à ce qu'il estime être les meilleurs intérêts du Vancouver General. On peut dire la même chose du pouvoir du ministre d'ordonner l'examen des règlements de l'hôpital, à tout le moins jusqu'à ce que cet examen soit effectivement ordonné.

Quant au pouvoir du lieutenant-gouverneur de nommer les membres du conseil d'administration, bien qu'il soit vrai, comme je l'ai déjà noté, que le règlement de l'hôpital prévoit la nomination de 14 membres du conseil d'administration par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil, il précise ensuite que deux membres doivent être nommés à partir de chacune des listes de candidats présentées respectivement par le président de l'Université de la Colombie-Britannique, la British Columbia Health Association et le conseil d'administration du Vancouver General lui-même. L'un des membres doit être nommé à partir des candidats présentés par le British Columbia Institute of Technology, alors que sept membres doivent provenir «de la collectivité en général». Je pense que cela signifie que le pouvoir de nomination du lieutenant-gouverneur est bien loin d'être aussi discrétionnaire que les intimés le prétendent. Cela indique également, surtout lorsqu'on se rappelle que les deux autres membres du conseil d'administration sont le président de l'hôpital et le président du conseil consultatif médical de l'hôpital, qu'aucun membre du conseil d'administration ne représente le ministre de la Santé ou le gouvernement en général. Chacun représente plutôt l'un des groupes ou des organismes qui ont un intérêt direct dans le Vancouver General et les services qu'il offre. Il n'est pas exagéré de dire que le pouvoir de nomination du lieutenant-gouverneur est simplement, compte tenu de l'art. 2, un mécanisme visant à assurer une représentation équilibrée de ces groupes et organismes au sein du principal organisme décisionnel de l'hôpital. Il ne s'agit pas d'un moyen permettant au gouvernement de contrôler régulièrement les activités quotidiennes de l'hôpital. Cette conclu-conclusion is supported by the fact that under s. 2 of Article 2, appointments to the Board are for fixed terms.

On the basis of the foregoing, I would conclude that the appellant hospital does not form part of government within the meaning of s. 32 of the Charter. It follows that its actions in adopting and administering Regulation 5.04 do not fall within the ambit of the Charter. I would add that there can be no question of the Vancouver General's being held subject to the Charter on the ground that it performs a governmental function, for it follows from what I have said above that the provision of a public service, even if it is one as important as health care, is not the kind of function which qualifies as a governmental function under s. 32. The case differs in this respect from the cases of Re McCutcheon and City of Toronto (1983), 147 D.L.R. (3d) 193 (Ont. H.C.), and Re Klein and Law Society of Upper Canada (1985), 16 D.L.R. (4th) 489 (Ont. Div. Ct.), assuming those cases to have been correctly decided. I would also add that this is not a case for the application of the Charter to a specific act of an entity which is not generally bound by the Charter. The only specific connection between the actions of the Vancouver General in adopting and applying Regulation 5.04 and the actions of the Government of British Columbia was the requirement that Regulation 5.04 receive ministerial approval. In light of what I have said above in regard to this requirement, a "more direct and a more precisely-defined connection", to borrow McIntyre J.'s phrase used in Dolphin Delivery, would have to be shown before I would conclude that the Charter applied on this ground.

Compte tenu de ce qui précède, je suis d'avis que l'hôpital appelant ne fait pas partie du gouvernement au sens de l'art. 32 de la Charte. Il s'ensuit que son adoption et son application du règlement 5.04 ne relèvent pas de la portée de la Charte. J'ajouterais qu'il ne peut être question que le Vancouver General soit assujetti à la Charte parce qu'il exerce une fonction gouvernementale, car il découle de ce que j'ai déjà dit que la prestation d'un service public, même s'il s'agit d'un service aussi important que les soins de santé, ne relève pas du genre de fonction que l'on peut qualifier de fonction gouvernementale en vertu de l'art. 32. À cet égard, cette affaire diffère des situations visées dans les décisions Re McCutcheon and City of Toronto (1983), 147 D.L.R. (3d) 193 (H.C. Ont.), et Re Klein and Law Society of Upper Canada (1985), 16 D.L.R. (4th) 489 (C. Div. Ont.), à supposer qu'elles soient bien fondées. J'ajouterais également qu'il ne s'agit pas d'une affaire où la Charte s'applique à une action précise d'un organisme qui n'est pas généralement lié par la Charte. Le seul lien précis entre les actions du Vancouver General relativement à l'adoption et à l'application du règlement 5.04 et les actions du gouvernement de la Colombie-Britannique était l'exigence selon laquelle le règlement 5.04 devait recevoir l'approbation du ministre. Compte tenu de ce que j'ai déjà dit au sujet de cette obligation, «un lien plus direct et mieux défini», pour reprendre les propos du juge McIntyre dans l'arrêt Dolphin Delivery, devrait être démontré pour m'inciter à conclure que la Charte s'applique à cet égard.

These conclusions are sufficient to dispose of this appeal in favour of the appellant hospital. However, as in McKinney, I shall also deal with the case on the assumption that the Vancouver General is a part of government and discuss the issue of whether Regulation 5.04 and the actions taken in its application violate s. 15 of the Charter.

Ces conclusions suffisent pour disposer du pourvoi en faveur de l'hôpital appelant. Cependant, comme dans l'arrêt McKinney, je vais également examiner l'affaire en supposant que le Vancouver General fait partie du gouvernement et analyser la question de savoir si le règlement 5.04 et les mesures prises pour l'appliquer violent l'art. 15 de la Charte.

Section 15 of the Charter

On the assumption that the Vancouver General is part of government within the meaning of s. 32, I now propose to deal with the question whether its policy of not renewing the admitting privileges of doctors who have reached the age of 65 unless they have "something unique to offer the hospital" violates s. 15 of the Charter.

In the first instance, the answer to this question depends on whether the alleged inequality is one made by "law". I think it obvious that Regulation 5.04, if made by government, would qualify as a law, and that it is unnecessary to explain its characterization as such at any great length. This is in this respect a much clearer case than McKinney, as there is no question in this case of the challenged conduct's being the outcome of negotiations with the representatives of those who claim a violation of their s. 15 rights. It is also clear that the "law" in question comprehends not just Regulation 5.04 alone, but the policy which is followed in its application to those who come within its terms as well. It would be incongruous if our entitlement to equality "before and under the law" and to the "equal protection and equal benefit of the law" did not reach the manner in which a law was interpreted and enforced by those charged with its operation. It will often be this process of interpretation and enforcement that determines the impact that a law has on the lives of those who come within its scope. These views accord with this Court's decision in Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038, as well as with the remarks of Linden J. in Re McCutcheon and City of Toronto, supra, at p. 202. They also accord with the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which it is clear that constitutional protection against discriminatory state action is not limited to the legislative context; see Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978); Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957).

Having determined that Regulation 5.04 and the policy that the Board of Trustees adopted as a guide to its application come within the sphere of constitutional protection afforded by s. 15, the

L'article 15 de la Charte

En supposant que le Vancouver General fait partie du gouvernement au sens de l'art. 32, je vais maintenant examiner la question de savoir si sa politique de ne pas renouveler les privilèges d'admission des médecins qui ont atteint 65 ans à moins qu'ils n'aient «quelque chose d'unique à offrir à l'hôpital» viole l'art. 15 de la Charte.

Tout d'abord, pour répondre à cette question, il faut déterminer si l'inégalité reprochée découle d'une «loi». Je pense qu'il est évident que si le règlement 5.04 avait été adopté par le gouvernement, il serait considéré comme une loi, et il n'est pas nécessaire d'expliquer cette qualification en détail. À cet égard, il s'agit d'une affaire beaucoup plus claire que l'affaire McKinney, car en l'espèce la conduite contestée n'est pas le résultat de négociations avec les représentants de ceux qui prétendent que les droits que leur reconnaît l'art. 15 sont violés. Il est aussi clair que la «loi» en question ne comprend pas seulement le règlement 5.04 mais aussi la politique suivie en l'appliquant à ceux qui y sont assujettis. Il serait absurde que notre droit à l'égalité «devant la loi» et à «la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi» ne comprenne pas la manière dont une loi est interprétée et appliquée par les responsables de son application. C'est souvent ce processus d'interprétation et d'application qui détermine les répercussions d'une loi sur la vie de ceux qu'elle vise. Ces opinions sont conformes à la décision de notre Cour dans l'arrêt Slaight Communications Inc. c. Davidson, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1038, ainsi qu'aux remarques du juge Linden dans la décision Re McCutcheon and City of Toronto, précité, à la p. 202. Elles sont également conformes à la jurisprudence de la Cour suprême des États-Unis, qui reconnaît clairement que la protection constitutionnelle contre l'action discriminatoire de l'État ne se restreint pas au contexte législatif; voir les arrêts Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978); Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957).

Ayant conclu que le règlement 5.04 et la politique adoptée par le conseil d'administration comme guide pour son application relèvent de la protection constitutionnelle conférée par l'art. 15, la question becomes whether they are discriminatory in light of this Court's decision in Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143. As in the case of the university policies of mandatory retirement considered in McKinney, I think it would be difficult to argue that they are not. They make a distinction based on age, one of the personal characteristics enumerated in s. 15(1). It is a distinction which is clearly discriminatory within the test set out by this Court in Andrews. In this regard, the following statement, taken from the reasons of McIntyre J., at pp. 174-75, is representative of the Court's reasoning:

> I would say then that discrimination may be described as a distinction, whether intentional or not but based on grounds relating to personal characteristics of the individual or group, which has the effect of imposing burdens, obligations, or disadvantages on such individual or group not imposed upon others, or which withholds or limits access to opportunities, benefits, and advantages available to other members of society. Distinctions based on personal characteristics attributed to an individual solely on the basis of association with a group will rarely escape the charge of discrimination, while those based on an individual's merits and capacities will rarely be so classed.

There is no doubt that Regulation 5.04 and the associated policy of the Vancouver General's Board of Trustees impose a burden on doctors who practise at the hospital and who have turned 65 which is not imposed on their colleagues of a younger age. The evidence shows that for most of the respondents, the hospital's refusal to renew their admitting privileges will mean that they will have to drastically curtail their practices. For some, it will mean the end of their practices. In short, Regulation 5.04 as applied by the Board of Trustees will mean that the respondents are being forced either into partial or full retirement. The loss this can entail for a person's physical and psychological well-being is serious. In Reference Re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 313, employment was described in the following terms, at p. 368:

question est de savoir s'ils sont discriminatoires compte tenu de la décision de notre Cour dans l'arrêt Andrews c. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 143. Comme c'est le cas pour les politiques de retraite obligatoire des universités qui ont été examinées dans l'arrêt McKinney, je pense qu'il serait très difficile de prétendre qu'ils ne le sont pas. Ils établissent une distinction fondée sur l'âge, l'une des caractéristiques personnelles énumérées au par. 15(1). Il s'agit d'une distinction clairement discriminatoire au sens du critère formulé par notre Cour dans l'arrêt Andrews. À cet égard, l'affirmation suivante, tirée des motifs du juge McIntyre, aux pp. 174 et 175, illustre le raisonnement de la Cour:

> J'affirmerais alors que la discrimination peut se décrire comme une distinction, intentionnelle ou non, mais fondée sur des motifs relatifs à des caractéristiques personnelles d'un individu ou d'un groupe d'individus, qui a pour effet d'imposer à cet individu ou à ce groupe des fardeaux, des obligations ou des désavantages non imposés à d'autres ou d'empêcher ou de restreindre l'accès aux possibilités, aux bénéfices et aux avantages offerts à d'autres membres de la société. Les distinctions fondées sur des caractéristiques personnelles attribuées à un seul individu en raison de son association avec un groupe sont presque toujours taxées de discriminatoires, alors que celles fondées sur les mérites et capacités d'un individu le sont rarement.

Il n'y a pas de doute que le règlement 5.04 et la politique du conseil d'administration du Vancouver General qui en découle imposent aux médecins qui pratiquent à l'hôpital et qui ont atteint 65 ans un fardeau qui n'est pas imposé à leurs collègues plus jeunes. La preuve indique que, pour la plupart des intimés, le refus de l'hôpital de renouveler leurs privilèges d'admission signifie qu'ils devront restreindre de manière draconienne l'exercice de leur profession. Pour certains, cela signifie la fin de leur pratique médicale. En résumé, le règlement 5.04, tel qu'il est appliqué par le conseil d'administration, impose aux intimés une retraite partielle ou complète. Les répercussions qu'entraîne cette politique sur le bien-être physique et psychologique d'un individu sont graves. Dans le Renvoi relatif à la Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alb.), [1987] 1 R.C.S. 313, on a décrit le travail de la façon suivante, à la p. 368:

Work is one of the most fundamental aspects in a person's life, providing the individual with a means of financial support and, as importantly, a contributory role in society. A person's employment is an essential component of his or her sense of identity, self-worth and emotional well-being.

McDougal, Lasswell and Chen, Human Rights and World Public Order (1980), have described the "traumatic impact of the sudden loss of accustomed roles, precipitated by involuntary retirement" (p. 781). The effect of Regulation 5.04 and the associated policy of the Board of Trustees is to impose these deprivations on the basis of a personal characteristic attributed to individuals solely because of his association with a group, that is, those over 65. They are for that reason discriminatory within the meaning of s. 15(1) of the Charter.

The argument of the appellants respecting this branch of the case was essentially that there was no discrimination because Regulation 5.04 and the policy decision under which it was implemented were reasonable having regard to the purposes they were designed to serve. In this regard, counsel drew our attention to the testimony of various expert witnesses who appeared at trial regarding the effect of age on a doctor's capabilities. He also drew attention to what he described as the "institutional concerns" of the Vancouver General, which he argued Regulation 5.04 addressed. These were: the need to control the size of the medical staff in order to foster the staff cohesiveness that was essential to the hospital's team approach to the provision of medical treatment, the role which a regular turnover in staff played in keeping the hospital at the leading edge of research and acute care technique, and the need to ensure that the hospital's limited resources were made available to those who could make most efficient and productive use of them. These various concerns, he maintained, were especially important in the case of the Vancouver General given its role and responsibilities as a research, teaching and acute care institution. Together with the evidence as to the effects of aging, he added, they showed that the actions of the hospital in adopting and applying Regulation

Le travail est l'un des aspects les plus fondamentaux de la vie d'une personne, un moyen de subvenir à ses besoins financiers et, ce qui est tout aussi important, de jouer un rôle utile dans la société. L'emploi est une composante essentielle du sens de l'identité d'une personne, de sa valorisation et de son bien-être sur le plan émotionnel.

McDougall, Lasswell et Chen dans leur ouvrage, Human Rights and World Public Order (1980), ont décrit les [TRADUCTION] «répercussions traumatisantes de la perte subite des rôles habituels, précipitées par une retraite forcée» (p. 781). L'effet du règlement 5.04 et de la politique du conseil d'administration qui en découle est d'imposer ces privations en fonction d'une caractéristique personnelle attribuée aux individus en raison seulement de leur appartenance à un groupe, c'est-à-dire, à celui des gens âgés de plus de 65 ans. Ils sont pour cette raison discriminatoires au sens du par. 15(1) de la Charte.

L'argument des appelants concernant cet aspect de l'affaire est essentiellement qu'il n'y a pas discrimination parce que le règlement 5.04 et la décision de politique en vertu de laquelle il a été appliqué sont raisonnables compte tenu des fins qu'ils visent. À cet égard, l'avocat des appelants a attiré notre attention sur le témoignage de divers témoins experts qui ont comparu à l'audience concernant l'effet de l'âge sur les aptitudes d'un médecin. Il a également attiré notre attention sur ce qu'il a décrit comme les [TRADUCTION] «préoccupations institutionnelles» du Vancouver General qu'il prétendait être visées par le règlement 5.04. Ces préoccupations sont: la nécessité de contrôler la taille du personnel médical pour favoriser sa cohésion, qui est essentielle à la pratique de l'hôpital de s'adresser à des équipes dans la prestation des traitements médicaux, le rôle qu'un changement régulier de personnel joue pour permettre à l'hôpital d'être à la fine pointe de la recherche et des techniques de soins de courte durée, et la nécessité de voir à ce que les ressources limitées de l'hôpital soient mises à la disposition de ceux qui peuvent en faire l'usage le plus efficace et le plus productif. Selon lui, ces diverses préoccupations sont particulièrement importantes dans le cas du Vancouver General compte tenu de son rôle et de ses responsabilités comme institution de recherche, 5.04 were entirely reasonable. From this it followed that the respondents had not been discriminated against.

The problem with this argument can be quickly stated; it confuses the question of whether discrimination has taken place with that of whether the discrimination is "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". The evidence and "institutional concerns" referred to address the latter question and, as such, fall to be considered under s. 1 of the Charter. They do not go to the question of whether or not there has been a violation of s. 15(1). Accordingly, I now turn to s. 1.

Section 1 of the Charter

General

As noted in McKinney, this Court first set out a detailed approach for the application of s. 1 in R. v. Oakes, supra. The onus of justifying a limitation to a Charter right rests on the parties seeking to uphold the limitation. The starting point of the inquiry is an assessment of the objectives of the law to determine whether they are sufficiently important to warrant the limitation of a constitutional right. The challenged law is then subjected to a proportionality test in which the objective of the impugned law is balanced against the nature of the right it violates, the extent of the infringement and the degree to which the limitation furthers other rights or policies of importance in a free and democratic society.

As this Court recently pointed out in United States of America v. Cotroni, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1469, and as I reiterated in McKinney, this balancing task should not be approached in a mechanistic fashion. At pages 1489-90 of Cotroni, it was said that "While the rights guaranteed by the Charter must be given priority in the equation, the underlying values must be sensitively weighed in a par-de formation et de soins de courte durée. Il a ajouté que ces préoccupations, jointes à la preuve sur les effets du vieillissement, indiquent que les actions de l'hôpital dans l'adoption et l'application du règlement 5.04 sont tout à fait raisonnables. Il s'ensuit donc que les intimés n'ont pas été victimes de discrimination.

Le problème que soulève cet argument peut être rapidement formulé; il confond la question de savoir s'il y a eu discrimination avec celle de savoir si la discrimination peut se justifier «dans une société libre et démocratique». La preuve et les [TRADUCTION] «préoccupations institutionnelles» mentionnées portent sur cette dernière question et, comme telles, doivent être considérées en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte. Elles ne répondent pas à la question de savoir s'il y a eu violation du par. 15(1). Par conséquent, j'examine maintenant l'article premier.

Généralités

Comme je l'ai souligné dans l'arrêt McKinney, c'est dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, précité, que notre Cour a présenté pour la première fois un mode détaillé d'application de l'article premier. L'obligation de justifier la limite apportée à un droit reconnu par la Charte incombe aux parties qui veulent la maintenir. Le point de départ de l'analyse consiste à évaluer les objectifs de la loi pour déterminer s'ils sont suffisamment importants pour justifier la limitation du droit garanti par la Constitution. La loi contestée est ensuite assujettie à un critère de proportionnalité où l'objectif de cette loi est soupesé en fonction de la nature du droit, de l'étendue de sa violation et de la mesure dans laquelle la limite apportée favorise d'autres droits ou politiques importants dans une société libre et démocratique.

Comme notre Cour l'a récemment affirmé dans l'arrêt États-Unis d'Amérique c. Cotroni, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1469, et comme je l'ai répété dans l'arrêt McKinney, cette tâche ne devrait pas être envisagée d'une manière mécaniste. Aux pages 1489 et 1490 de l'arrêt Cotroni, on a dit que «[b]ien qu'il faille accorder priorité dans l'équation aux droits garantis par la Charte, les valeurs sous-jacentes ticular context against other values of a free and democratic society sought to be promoted by the legislature". Early in the development of the balancing test, Dickson C.J. underlined this point by stating: "Both in articulating the standard of proof and in describing the criteria comprising the proportionality requirement the Court has been careful to avoid rigid and inflexible standards". See R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 713, at pp. 768-69. I elaborated on this in the specific context of s. 15(1) in the following passage from Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, supra, at p. 198:

> The degree to which a free and democratic society such as Canada should tolerate differentiation based on personal characteristics cannot be ascertained by an easy calculus. There will rarely, if ever, be a perfect congruence between means and ends, save where legislation has discriminatory purposes. The matter must, as earlier cases have held, involve a test of proportionality. In cases of this kind, the test must be approached in a flexible manner. The analysis should be functional, focussing on the character of the classification in question, the constitutional and societal importance of the interests adversely affected, the relative importance to the individuals affected of the benefit of which they are deprived, and the importance of the state interest.

As in McKinney, it is important in considering the issues raised by a case like the present to note that judicial evaluation of the state's interest will differ depending on whether the state is the "singular antagonist" of the person whose rights have been violated, as it usually will be where the violation occurs in the context of the criminal law, or whether it is instead defending legislation or other conduct concerned with "the reconciliation of claims of competing individuals or groups or the distribution of scarce government resources". See Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, at p. 994. In the former situation, the courts will be able to determine whether the impugned law or other government conduct is the "least drastic means" for the achievement of the state interest with a considerable measure of certainty, given their familiarity with the values and operation of the criminal justice system and the doivent être, dans un contexte particulier, évaluées délicatement en fonction d'autres valeurs propres à une société libre et démocratique que le législateur cherche à promouvoir». Au début de la formulation de ce critère d'évaluation, le juge en chef Dickson a souligné que «[t]ant dans son élaboration de la norme de preuve que dans sa description des critères qui comprennent l'exigence de proportionnalité, la Cour a pris soin d'éviter de fixer des normes strictes et rigides. Voir l'arrêt R. c. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 R.C.S. 713, aux pp. 768 et 769. Dans le contexte particulier du par. 15(1), j'ai précisé ce point dans l'extrait suivant de l'arrêt Andrews c. Law Society of British Columbia, précité, à la p. 198:

> Il n'est pas facile de vérifier jusqu'à quel point une société libre et démocratique comme le Canada devrait tolérer la différenciation fondée sur des caractéristiques personnelles. Il y aura rarement, si jamais il peut y en avoir, de correspondance parfaite entre les moyens et les fins sauf si la loi a des objectifs discriminatoires. Comme il ressort de décisions antérieures, un critère de proportionnalité doit jouer. Dans des cas comme celui-ci, le critère doit être abordé d'une manière souple. L'analyse devrait être pratique et porter sur la nature de la classification en question, l'importance des intérêts lésés sur les plans de la Constitution et de la société, l'importance relative que revêt pour les individus touchés l'avantage dont ils sont privés et l'importance de l'intérêt de l'État.

Comme je l'ai souligné dans l'arrêt McKinney, il est important dans l'examen des questions soulevées par une affaire comme celle-ci de souligner que l'appréciation judiciaire de l'intérêt de l'État différera selon que l'État est «l'adversaire singulier» de la personne dont les droits ont été violés, comme ce sera habituellement le cas lorsque la violation se produit dans le contexte du droit criminel, ou selon qu'il cherche plutôt à défendre une loi ou une autre conduite portant sur «la conciliation de revendications contraires de groupes ou d'individus ou la répartition de ressources gouvernementales limitées»: voir l'arrêt Irwin Toy Ltd. c. Québec (Procureur général), [1989] 1 R.C.S. 927, à la p. 994. Dans le premier cas, les tribunaux pourront déterminer avec un certain degré de certitude si la loi contestée ou toute autre conduite gouvernementale fait appel aux «moyens les moins radicaux» pour atteindre l'objectif de l'État, judicial system generally. As this Court has noted in Irwin Toy, however, the same degree of certainty may not be achievable in the latter situation.

I now turn to the objectives of the "law" at hand.

Objectives

Given that counsel for the appellants addressed his arguments as to the reasonableness of Regulation 5.04 and the policy under which it was applied to the question of whether there was discrimination within the meaning of s. 15 of the Charter, he did not specifically define their underlying objectives for the purposes of a s. 1 analysis. He did, however, enumerate the "institutional concerns" which he said the Board of Trustees hoped to address through the adoption of Regulation 5.04. These consisted of the need to limit the growth of the hospital's staff to take account of budgetary and resource limitations under which the Vancouver General must operate, the desire to limit the size of staff so as to encourage and preserve a cohesive staff capable of taking a team approach to the practice of medicine, and the need to make some of the hospital's staff positions and resources available to younger doctors recently trained in the latest approaches to medical practice.

It is this final "institutional concern" which points towards what I regard to be the fundamental objective of Regulation 5.04 and the policy that was adopted with respect to its application. In this respect, Regulation 5.04 is akin to the policies of mandatory retirement considered in McKinney. Just as those policies were directed toward the achievement of excellence in the universities' pursuit of higher learning, Regulation 5.04 and its attendant policy were intended to maintain and enhance the quality of medical care the Vancouver General is capable of providing. They were, in a word, intended to promote excellence in the hospital's pursuit of its mandate as a centre of medical compte tenu de leur connaissance des valeurs et du fonctionnement du système de justice criminelle et du système judiciaire en général. Cependant, comme notre Cour l'a souligné dans l'arrêt Irwin Toy, il ne sera peut-être pas possible d'atteindre le même degré de certitude dans le second cas.

J'examine maintenant les objectifs de la «loi» en question.

Les objectifs

Puisque les arguments de l'avocat des appelants quant au caractère raisonnable du règlement 5.04 et de la politique en vertu de laquelle ce dernier a été appliqué ont porté sur la question de savoir s'il y avait discrimination au sens de l'art. 15 de la Charte, il n'a pas défini précisément leurs objectifs sous-jacents aux fins d'un examen fondé sur l'article premier. Il a cependant énuméré les [TRADUCTION] «préoccupations institutionnelles» que, selon lui, le conseil d'administration avait à l'esprit en adoptant le règlement 5.04. Font partie de ces préoccupations la nécessité de restreindre l'accroissement du personnel de l'hôpital pour tenir compte des restrictions en matière de budget et de ressources en vertu desquelles le Vancouver General doit fonctionner, la volonté de restreindre la taille du personnel pour encourager et maintenir la cohésion d'un personnel capable de pratiquer la médecine dans un esprit d'équipe, et la nécessité d'offrir aux jeunes médecins récemment formés selon les dernières techniques médicales certains des postes et des ressources de l'hôpital.

C'est cette dernière «préoccupation institutionnelle» qui porte sur ce que j'estime être l'objectif fondamental du règlement 5.04 et de sa politique d'application. À cet égard, le règlement 5.04 est semblable aux politiques de retraite obligatoire examinées dans l'arrêt McKinney. Tout comme ces politiques faisaient partie de la recherche de l'excellence dans les universités en matière de haut savoir, le règlement 5.04 et la politique qui s'y rattache visaient à maintenir et à promouvoir la qualité des soins médicaux que pouvait offrir le Vancouver General. Bref, ils faisaient partie de la recherche de l'excellence par l'hôpital dans le cadre de son mandat comme centre de recherche et research and teaching and as the major acute care hospital in the Province of British Columbia.

I have little doubt that this objective meets the "objectives test" as it has been developed in the jurisprudence; it is an objective that warrants the overriding of constitutional guarantees, provided it can satisfy the other requirements of the s. 1 test. Excellence in the practice of medicine and the provision of hospital services is certainly a highly important goal, one that produces obvious social benefits. It is crucial in this regard to emphasize the special responsibilities that devolve upon the Vancouver General by virtue of its mandate as the major acute care hospital in the Province with its extensive involvement in teaching and research. From this it is fair to assume that the specialized care it provides is beyond the capabilities of most, if not all, the other hospitals in the Province. Consequently, the ability of people in all parts of the Province to obtain high quality medical care when they most seriously require it may be said to depend on the quality of treatment available at the Vancouver General. Just as importantly, the teaching and research function carried out at the hospital is crucial to the future availability of competent and well-trained doctors in every part of the Province.

Accordingly, having determined that a pressing and substantial government objective lies behind Regulation 5.04 and its attendant policy, I turn to the question whether the Regulation and policy are appropriate or proportionate to the objective they seek to promote.

Proportionality

As Dickson C.J. stated in R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra, a three-step approach to the question of proportionality as between objectives and means is ordinarily to be followed. He set out this approach, at p. 768 of his judgment, where he stated:

de formation médicales et comme principal hôpital de soins de courte durée dans la province de la Colombie-Britannique.

Je ne doute pas que cet objectif réponde au [TRADUCTION] «critère des objectifs» tel qu'il a été formulé dans la jurisprudence; il s'agit d'un objectif qui justifie la suppression de garanties constitutionnelles, pourvu qu'il satisfasse aux autres exigences du critère de l'article premier. L'excellence dans la pratique de la médecine et dans la prestation des services médicaux constitue certainement un objectif très important qui apporte évidemment des avantages à la société. Il est capital à cet égard de souligner les responsabilités particulières qui incombent au Vancouver General en raison de son mandat comme principal hôpital de soins de courte durée dans la province et de sa participation importante en matière de formation et de recherche. Il est donc juste de présumer que les soins spécialisés qu'il offre dépassent les possibilités de la plupart des autres hôpitaux de la province, sinon de tous. Par conséquent, on peut dire que la possibilité pour les gens de toutes les régions de la province d'obtenir des soins médicaux de grande qualité lorsqu'ils en ont le plus besoin dépend de la qualité des traitements qu'offre le Vancouver General. Et de façon toute aussi importante, la formation et la recherche assurées par l'hôpital sont essentielles pour que chaque région de la province ait à l'avenir des médecins compétents et bien formés.

Par conséquent, ayant déterminé que le règlement 5.04 et la politique qui s'y rattache constituent un objectif gouvernemental urgent et important, je vais maintenant déterminer si le règlement et sa politique sont appropriés ou proportionnels à l'objectif qu'ils visent à promouvoir.

La proportionnalité

Comme le juge en chef Dickson l'a formulé dans l'arrêt R. c. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., précité, il faut habituellement suivre une démarche en trois étapes pour déterminer si les mesures appliquées sont proportionnelles aux objectifs fixés. Il a établi cette démarche dans ses motifs, à la p. 768, lorsqu'il a affirmé:

Second, the means chosen to attain those objectives must be proportional or appropriate to the ends. The proportionality requirement, in turn, normally has three aspects: the limiting measures must be carefully designed, or rationally connected, to the objective; they must impair the right as little as possible; and their effects must not so severely trench on individual or group rights that the legislative objective, albeit important, is nevertheless outweighed by the abridgment of rights.

I will now consider the case at bar in light of each of these "aspects" of the proportionality requirement: rationality, minimal impairment and deleterious effects, or as it has sometimes been referred to, overall proportionality.

Rationality

Regulation 5.04 and the policy under which it was applied have much the same relation to the Vancouver General's pursuit of excellence in the provision of medical treatment and medical teaching and research as was found to exist in McKinney, supra, between a policy of mandatory retirement and the pursuit of academic excellence in universities. It allows for regular staff renewal and the intellectual invigoration that flows from it. What I had to say in McKinney, at p. 284, with respect to the case of universities seems, with slight modification, applicable here:

> Mandatory retirement not only supports the tenure system which undergirds the specific and necessary ambience of university life. It ensures continuing faculty renewal, a necessary process to enable universities to be centres of excellence. Universities need to be on the cutting edge of new discoveries and ideas, and this requires a continuing infusion of new people. In a closed system with limited resources, this can only be achieved by departures of other people. Mandatory retirement achieves this in an orderly way that permits long-term planning both by the universities and the individual. [Emphasis in original.]

Leaving aside the reference to the system of academic tenure for the moment, I think a similar analysis can be made of Regulation 5.04 and its associated policy of implementation. For obvious

En second lieu, les moyens choisis pour atteindre ces objectifs doivent être proportionnels ou appropriés à ces fins. La proportionnalité requise, à son tour, comporte normalement trois aspects: les mesures restrictives doivent être soigneusement conçues pour atteindre l'objectif en question, ou avoir un lien rationnel avec cet objectif; elles doivent être de nature à porter le moins possible atteinte au droit en question et leurs effets ne doivent pas empiéter sur les droits individuels ou collectifs au point que l'objectif législatif, si important soit-il, soit néanmoins supplanté par l'atteinte aux droits.

Je vais maintenant examiner l'espèce en fonction de chacun de ces «aspects» du critère de proportionnalité: le lien rationnel, l'atteinte minimale et les effets préjudiciables ou, comme on l'indique parfois, la proportionnalité générale.

La rationalité

Le règlement 5.04 et sa politique d'application ont sensiblement le même lien avec la recherche de l'excellence par le Vancouver General en matière de traitements médicaux, de recherche et de formation en matière médicale que celui qui existe dans l'arrêt McKinney, précité, entre une politique de retraite obligatoire et la recherche de l'excellence en matière d'enseignement dans les universités. Ce rapport permet le renouvellement régulier du personnel et l'apport intellectuel qui en découle. Ce que j'ai dit dans l'arrêt McKinney, à la p. 284, dans le cas des universités semble s'appliquer en l'espèce avec de légères modifications:

> La retraite obligatoire ne justifie pas seulement le système de la permanence qui détermine l'ambiance particulière et essentielle de la vie universitaire. Elle assure le renouvellement continu des membres du corps professoral, un processus nécessaire pour permettre aux universités d'être des centres d'excellence. Les universités doivent être à la fine pointe des découvertes et des nouvelles idées, et cela exige l'injection permanente de nouvelles ressources humaines. Dans un système fermé ayant des ressources limitées, on ne peut y parvenir qu'avec le départ d'autres personnes. La retraite obligatoire réalise cela d'une façon méthodique qui permet une planification à long terme tant par les universités que par l'individu. [Souligné dans l'original.]

Mettant de côté pour l'instant la question du système de la permanence, je pense qu'on peut faire un examen semblable du règlement 5.04 et de la politique d'application qui s'y rattache. Pour des reasons, hospitals as much as universities, "need to be on the cutting edge of new discoveries and ideas". If anything, it is even more important that hospitals remain fully apprised of the latest developments, given that human life and health may depend upon it, and that developments in medical knowledge and method occur at such a rapid pace. These rather trite observations, which apply to hospitals generally, are especially pertinent in the case of a hospital concerned with the provision of the kind of sophisticated and specialized treatment that is the responsibility of the Vancouver General. They also apply with special force to a hospital which, like the Vancouver General, carries out an important research and teaching function.

raisons évidentes, les hôpitaux, tout comme les universités, «doivent être à la fine pointe des découvertes et des nouvelles idées». Il serait même plus important que les hôpitaux soient toujours au courant des progrès les plus récents, puisque la vie et la santé humaines peuvent en dépendre et que les découvertes en matière de savoir médical et de techniques médicales progressent à un rythme si rapide. Ces remarques plutôt évidentes, qui s'appliquent aux hôpitaux en général, sont particulièrement pertinentes dans le cas d'un hôpital qui offre le genre de soins délicats et spécialisés dont est responsable le Vancouver General. Elles s'appliquent également avec une rigueur particulière à un hôpital comme le Vancouver General qui exerce des fonctions de recherche et de formation importantes.

It is equally obvious that hospitals are like universities in that their ability to remain abreast of new discoveries and ideas "requires a continuing infusion of new people". More particularly, and as was recognized by the courts below, it depends on their ability to regularly make room on their staffs for younger doctors who, by virtue of their recent training, are fully conversant with the latest theories, discoveries and techniques. And since hospitals are, as much as universities, a "closed system with limited resources", this regular infusion with the vitality and perspective of the young can only be achieved by the corresponding departure of some of those already on staff. I note in this respect the submission of counsel for the appellants to the effect that the resource limitations under which the Vancouver General must operate was one of the "institutional concerns" motivating the adoption of Regulation 5.04 and the actions taken in respect of its implementation.

Il est de même évident que les hôpitaux sont comme les universités en ce que leur capacité de se maintenir à la fine pointe des découvertes et des nouvelles idées «exige le concours permanent de nouveaux membres». Elle dépend plus particulièrement, comme l'ont reconnu les tribunaux d'instance inférieure, de leur capacité d'accueillir régulièrement au sein de leur personnel des jeunes médecins qui, en raison de leur formation récente, sont pleinement au courant des dernières théories, découvertes et techniques. Et comme les hôpitaux sont tout autant que les universités un «système fermé ayant des ressources limitées», cet apport régulier que fournissent les jeunes avec leur vitalité et leurs idées ne peut être réalisé que par le départ concomitant de certains des membres qui font déjà partie du personnel. Je souligne à cet égard la prétention de l'avocat des appelants que les ressources limitées en vertu desquelles le Vancouver General doit fonctionner faisaient partie des «préoccupations institutionnelles» à l'origine de l'adoption du règlement 5.04 et des mesures prises pour son application.

So viewed, I think it clear that Regulation 5.04 and the policy under which it was applied are "rationally connected" to the objective that lies behind them. Together they ensure that staff positions for younger doctors will regularly become available as members of the existing staff reach the age of 65. It is valuable in this respect to think of a staff position at the Vancouver General or any other hospital as a resource which is allocated through decisions as to the granting, renewal or non-renewal of admitting privileges. The resource is "scarce" in that it does not expand at a rate proportionate with the growth in the medical profession. It follows that it will not be allocated to those younger doctors who are needed on staff if a hospital is to remain "on the cutting edge of new discoveries and ideas", unless it is regularly and predictably relinquished by some of those who already have possession of it. Regulation 5.04 ensures that this will occur.

Vu sous cet angle, je pense qu'il est clair que le règlement 5.04 et sa politique d'application ont «un lien rationnel» avec l'objectif qui les sous-tend. Ensemble, ils permettent aux jeunes médecins d'occuper des postes de façon régulière au fur et à mesure que les membres du personnel actuel atteindront 65 ans. Il est utile à cet égard d'envisa-

To the above I would add that Regulation 5.04 and its attendant policy are "rationally connected" to their underlying objective in an even more direct fashion. For they ensure not only that room is made on staff for younger and recently trained doctors, but also that it is made by the departure from staff of those who, by reason of advancing age, will be increasingly unable to function at the high level the Vancouver General must demand of its doctors. Common experience teaches that there will be considerable variety between individuals as to the rate at which the skills and aptitudes essential to the practice of medicine deteriorate. But it also teaches, and the evidence broadly confirms, that as a general rule such deterioration will accelerate as a person enters the later stages of life. It follows that a rule, which provides for the retirement of doctors before such deterioration will normally undermine their ability to function as full and competent members of medical staff, is "rationally connected" to the determination of the Vancouver General to provide hospital care and medical instruction conforming to the highest standards of professional competence and expertise.

Minimal Impairment

In approaching the question whether Regulation 5.04 and the policy by which it was implemented violated the respondents' s. 15 rights "as little as possible", I would reiterate what I have said above regarding the special considerations that apply in cases concerned with measures that relate directly ger un poste au Vancouver General ou à tout autre hôpital comme une ressource offerte à la suite de la décision d'accorder ou de renouveler ou non des privilèges d'admission. La ressource est «limitée» en ce qu'elle ne peut augmenter de manière proportionnelle à l'accroissement du personnel médical. Il s'ensuit qu'elle ne sera pas offerte aux jeunes médecins dont un hôpital a besoin pour demeurer «à la fine pointe des découvertes et des nouvelles idées», à moins que certains de ceux qui en jouissent déjà n'y renoncent régulièrement et de manière prévisible. Le règlement 5.04 fait en sorte qu'il en sera ainsi.

À ce qui précède, j'ajouterais que le règlement 5.04 et la politique qui s'y rattache ont un «lien rationnel» avec leur objectif sous-jacent d'une manière encore plus directe. En effet, grâce à eux non seulement des places seront-elles accordées aux jeunes médecins récemment formés, mais encore elles s'offriront à la suite du départ de membres du personnel qui, en raison de leur âge, seront de moins en moins capables de faire preuve de la haute compétence que le Vancouver General attend de ses médecins. L'expérience de tous les jours montre que le rythme de détérioration des compétences et des aptitudes essentielles à la pratique de la médecine varie considérablement d'un individu à l'autre. Mais elle enseigne également, et la preuve le confirme généralement, qu'en règle générale cette détérioration s'accentuera lorsqu'une personne atteindra les dernières étapes de sa vie. Il s'ensuit qu'une règle qui prévoit la retraite des médecins avant que cette détérioration porte normalement atteinte à leur capacité de fonctionner pleinement et de manière compétente comme membres du personnel médical, a «un lien rationnel» avec la volonté du Vancouver General d'offrir des soins de santé et une formation médicale conformes aux normes les plus élevées de la compétence et de l'expertise professionnelles.

Pour aborder la question de savoir si le règlement 5.04 et sa politique d'application violent «le moins possible» les droits que reconnaît l'art. 15 aux intimés, je répéterais ce que j'ai déjà dit au sujet des considérations particulières applicables aux mesures qui portent directement sur la répartito the allocation of resources or that attempt to strike a balance between competing social groups. In such cases, neither the experience of judges nor the institutional limitations of judicial decision making prepares a court to make a precise determination as to where the balance between legislative objective and the protection of individual or group rights and freedoms is to be drawn. As the majority of this Court observed in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), supra, at p. 993:

> ... in matching means to ends and asking whether rights or freedoms are impaired as little as possible, a legislature mediating between the claims of competing groups will be forced to strike a balance without the benefit of absolute certainty concerning how that balance is best struck.

Accordingly, it is only appropriate that the courts have exhibited considerable flexibility in assessing legislation of this sort through the lens of s. 1 of the Charter. That is so not only out of recognition of the difficulty of the choice that has to be made but also because such legislation impacts on many different and interrelated aspects of society and government policy. It is also because there are inherent advantages in a democratic society of having representative institutions deal with matters such as the division of scarce social resources between competing groups. This was expressly recognized in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), supra. There the majority put it this way, at pp. 993-94:

> When striking a balance between the claims of competing groups, the choice of means, like the choice of ends, frequently will require an assessment of conflicting scientific evidence and differing justified demands on scarce resources. Democratic institutions are meant to let us all share in the responsibility for these difficult choices. Thus, as courts review the results of the legislature's deliberations, particularly with respect to the protection of vulnerable groups, they must be mindful of the legislature's representative function. For example, when "regulating industry or business it is open to the legislature to restrict its legislative reforms to sectors in which there appear to be particularly urgent concerns or tion des ressources ou qui tentent d'établir un équilibre entre les revendications contraires de groupes concurrents. Dans ces cas, ni l'expérience des juges ni les restrictions institutionnelles du processus décisionnel judiciaire ne préparent un tribunal à déterminer précisément le point d'équilibre entre l'objectif du législateur et la protection des droits et libertés d'un individu ou d'un groupe. Comme les juges de notre Cour, à la majorité, l'ont souligné dans l'arrêt Irwin Toy Ltd. c. Québec (Procureur général), précité, à la p. 993:

> ... en faisant correspondre les moyens et les fins, et en se demandant s'il a été porté le moins possible atteinte aux droits ou aux libertés, le législateur en arbitrant entre les revendications de groupes concurrents, sera encore obligé de trouver le point d'équilibre sans pouvoir être absolument certain d'où il se trouve.

Par conséquent, il sied donc que les tribunaux aient fait preuve d'une très grande souplesse dans l'examen d'une loi de ce genre en fonction de l'article premier de la Charte. Il en est ainsi non seulement parce que les tribunaux reconnaissent qu'il est difficile de faire un choix, mais également parce que cette loi a des répercussions sur des aspects très différents et reliés de la société et de la politique du gouvernement. Il en est également ainsi parce que dans une société démocratique il y a des avantages inhérents à laisser aux institutions représentatives le soin de traiter de questions comme le partage de ressources sociales limitées entre des groupes concurrents. On l'a reconnu expressément dans l'arrêt Irwin Toy Ltd. c. Québec (Procureur général), précité. Voici comment les juges de la majorité se sont exprimés, aux pp. 993 et 994:

> Pour trouver le point d'équilibre entre des groupes concurrents, le choix des moyens, comme celui des fins, exige souvent l'évaluation de preuves scientifiques contradictoires et de demandes légitimes mais contraires quant à la répartition de ressources limitées. Les institutions démocratiques visent à ce que nous partagions tous la responsabilité de ces choix difficiles. Ainsi, lorsque les tribunaux sont appelés à contrôler les résultats des délibérations du législateur, surtout en matière de protection de groupes vulnérables, ils doivent garder à l'esprit la fonction représentative du pouvoir législatif. Par exemple «en réglementant une industrie ou un commerce, il est loisible au législateur de limiter sa réforme législative to constituencies that seem especially needy" (Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra, at p. 772).

In short, as the Court went on to say, the question is whether the hospital authorities had a reasonable basis for concluding that it impaired the relevant right as little as possible in its attempts to achieve its pressing and substantial objectives. The following statement from Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), supra, at p. 994, regarding the limitation of freedom of expression that was there in question is of general application:

> In the instant case, the Court is called upon to assess competing social science evidence respecting the appropriate means for addressing the problem of children's advertising. The question is whether the government had a reasonable basis, on the evidence tendered, for concluding that the ban on all advertising directed at children impaired freedom of expression as little as possible given the government's pressing and substantial objective. [Emphasis added.]

Returning to the case at bar, it follows from what I have said that Regulation 5.04 and its attendant policy attempt to strike a balance between young doctors seeking to commence a practice and doctors who have been engaged in practice for some time. It seeks to strike a balance with respect to their mutual demand for access to the resource that is the sine qua non of a full medical practice, a position on a hospital medical staff. Remembering that the courts are not to attempt an artificial precision in assessing whether "the correct balance" has been struck, I would nevertheless suggest that the Board of Trustees of the Vancouver General had a "reasonable basis" for concluding that Regulation 5.04 and the policy by which it was applied impaired respondents' rights of equality "as little as possible" given its pressing and substantial objective.

In my view, the Board was amply justified, given the current climate of budgetary restraint pervasive in the public sector, in concluding that its ability to bring new doctors on staff depended on the timely retirement of some of those already à des secteurs où il semble y avoir des préoccupations particulièrement urgentes ou à des catégories où cela semble particulièrement nécessaire» (Edwards Books and Art Ltd., précité, à la p. 772).

En résumé, comme la Cour l'a affirmé par la suite, la question est de savoir si les responsables de l'hôpital étaient raisonnablement fondés à conclure qu'ils portaient le moins possible atteinte au droit visé dans la poursuite de leurs objectifs urgents et réels. L'extrait suivant de l'arrêt Irwin Toy Ltd. c. Québec (Procureur général), précité, à la p. 994, concernant la restriction de la liberté d'expression dont il était question dans cet arrêt est d'application générale:

> En l'espèce, la Cour est appelée à évaluer des preuves contradictoires, qui relèvent des sciences humaines, quant aux moyens appropriés de faire face au problème de la publicité destinée aux enfants. La question est de savoir si le gouvernement était raisonnablement fondé, compte tenu de la preuve offerte, à conclure qu'interdire toute publicité destinée aux enfants portait le moins possible atteinte à la liberté d'expression étant donné l'objectif urgent et réel que visait le gouvernement. [Je souligne.]

Pour en revenir aux faits de l'espèce, il découle de ce que j'ai dit que le règlement 5.04 et sa politique d'application tentent d'établir un équilibre entre les jeunes médecins qui veulent commencer à pratiquer et les médecins qui pratiquent depuis déjà un certain temps. Le règlement tente d'établir un équilibre entre leur demande mutuelle d'accès à une ressource essentielle à une pleine pratique médicale, soit un poste au sein du personnel médical de l'hôpital. Me rappelant que les tribunaux ne doivent pas tenter d'atteindre une précision artificielle pour déterminer si «l'équilibre approprié» a été établi, je suis toutefois d'avis que le conseil d'administration du Vancouver General était «raisonnablement fondé» à conclure que le règlement 5.04 et sa politique d'application portaient «le moins possible atteinte» aux droits à l'égalité des intimés compte tenu de son objectif urgent et réel.

À mon avis, le conseil était amplement justifié, compte tenu du climat actuel de restrictions budgétaires dans le secteur public, de conclure que sa capacité d'attirer de nouveaux médecins dépendait de la retraite au moment opportun de certains des there. Moreover, it cannot be said to have acted unreasonably in concluding that the retirement, as a matter of course, of those who had reached the age of 65 would ensure the departure from staff of those who would generally be less able to contribute to the hospital's sophisticated practice. It must be stressed that the policy of applying Regulation 5.04 without exception, save in those "special cases where the physician had something unique to offer the hospital", was an attempt by the Board to recognize that the assumption of declining capabilities in those 65 and over would not always hold true. Although it operated with regard to the hospital's requirements rather than with regard to each individual doctor's health and capabilities, this was probably necessary given the overriding objective of making staff positions available to doctors recently trained in the latest theories and methods.

It cannot be denied that Regulation 5.04 and the associated policy of implementation imposes a heavy loss on those who reach the age of 65 and who wish to continue in practice. The evidence clearly shows that those who are denied a renewal of their admitting privileges pursuant to Regulation 5.04 will be unable to continue their practices in the manner and to the extent that they have become accustomed. In some cases, failure to obtain a renewal will mean the complete cessation of long-standing practices and the end of professional careers. But the anguish and sense of loss this entails cannot be considered in isolation from the frustration and anger younger doctors would experience if they were prevented from entering into a full practice upon completion of long years of arduous study and preparation.

The dynamics of the equation are not significantly altered by throwing the fate of the patients of those forced to retire into the balance, as counsel for the respondents does. Given the deterioration which is an undeniable characteristic of increasing age, the only hardships Regulation 5.04 can be said to impose on these patients is to force them to change their doctors sooner than they might otherwise have done. More importantly, any loss thereby incurred must surely be more than médecins qui s'y trouvaient déjà. En outre, on ne peut dire que le conseil a agi de façon déraisonnable en concluant que la mise à la retraite réglementaire de ceux qui ont atteint 65 ans garantirait le départ de ceux qui seraient en général moins capables de contribuer à la pratique spécialisée de l'hôpital. Il convient de souligner qu'en appliquant sans exception le règlement 5.04, sauf dans les «cas particuliers où un médecin a quelque chose d'unique à offrir à l'hôpital», le conseil tentait de reconnaître que le principe de la détérioration des capacités de ceux qui ont 65 ans et plus n'était pas toujours exact. Bien que le règlement ait été appliqué en fonction des exigences de l'hôpital plutôt que de la santé et des capacités de chaque médecin individuellement, cela était probablement nécessaire compte tenu de l'objectif prédominant d'offrir des postes aux médecins récemment formés aux théories et aux méthodes les plus récentes.

On ne peut nier que le règlement 5.04 et sa politique d'application imposent une lourde perte à ceux qui ont 65 ans et souhaitent continuer à pratiquer. La preuve démontre clairement que ceux qui sont privés du renouvellement de leurs privilèges d'admission par suite de l'application du règlement 5.04 seront incapables de continuer à pratiquer la médecine de la manière et dans la mesure où ils l'avaient fait jusqu'à maintenant. Dans certains cas, le non-renouvellement signifie la cessation complète de pratiques établies depuis longtemps et la fin de carrières professionnelles. Mais l'angoisse et le sentiment de perte que cela comporte ne peuvent être considérés indépendamment de la frustration et de la colère que les jeunes médecins connaîtraient s'ils étaient empêchés de pratiquer pleinement après de longues années de préparation et d'études sérieuses.

Les éléments de l'équation ne sont pas véritablement modifiés si, comme le fait l'avocat des intimés, on tient compte du sort des patients de ceux qui sont obligés de prendre leur retraite. Compte tenu de la détérioration qui est une caractéristique incontestable du vieillissement, on peut dire que le seul préjudice que le règlement 5.04 impose à ces patients, c'est de les obliger à changer de médecin plus tôt qu'ils ne l'auraient fait autrement. Plus important encore, tout préjudice ainsi subi est compensated for by the benefit that they and all other clients of the British Columbia health system derive from the regular infusion of new talent and new ideas into the Province's major acute care and research hospital.

This view of Regulation 5.04 and the associated policy is confirmed when the question of whether they strike a reasonable balance between competing resource users is viewed from the point of view of alternative measures. The only alternative that appears to have been mooted was the suggestion that the Vancouver General could have instituted a program of skills testing or performance evaluation. The evidence suggests that such a program would be costly both to implement and operate, a not unimportant consideration given the financially straitened circumstances in which most hospitals and the health care system generally must now operate. But more important is the invidious and disruptive effect such a program would have on the environment in which all members of the hospital's medical staff must work. As I explained in McKinney, skills testing and performance evaluation can be demeaning, especially when applied to highly trained and senior members of a professional community. As a trigger for the application of a rule of mandatory retirement, they would be the very antithesis of the kind of dignified departure that should be the crowning moment of a professional career. Just as detrimental is the added pressure which performance-based retirement would introduce into what must already be a very high pressure work environment. Nor is it difficult to imagine how such a scheme could sow suspicion and dissension among a hospital staff.

It is important in this regard to note that the development of a cohesive staff whose members are comfortable working as members of a team was one of the "institutional concerns" the Vancouver General had in mind in passing Regulation 5.04. While counsel seemed to relate this concern certainement plus que compensé par les avantages que ces patients et tous les autres bénéficiaires du système de santé de la Colombie-Britannique tirent de l'apport régulier de nouveaux talents et de nouvelles idées au sein du principal hôpital de la province spécialisé en soins de courte durée et en recherche.

Cette façon de considérer le règlement 5.04 et la politique qui s'y rattache est confirmée lorsque la question de savoir s'ils établissent un équilibre raisonnable entre les usagers concurrents des ressources en cause est abordée dans l'optique des autres mesures possibles. La seule autre mesure qui semble avoir été envisagée était l'idée que le Vancouver General ait pu mettre sur pied un programme d'évaluation des aptitudes et du rendement. La preuve indique qu'un tel programme serait coûteux tant en ce qui concerne sa mise en œuvre que son fonctionnement, un facteur qui n'est pas négligeable compte tenu de la situation financière difficile dans laquelle la plupart des hôpitaux et les services de soins de santé doivent maintenant fonctionner en général. Mais ce qui est plus important, c'est le sentiment d'injustice et l'effet néfaste qu'un tel programme provoquerait dans le milieu de travail de tous les membres du personnel médical de l'hôpital. Comme je l'ai expliqué dans l'arrêt McKinney, les évaluations d'aptitudes et de rendement peuvent être humiliantes, surtout lorsqu'elles sont appliquées à des professionnels chevronnés et expérimentés. Comme facteur d'application d'une règle de retraite obligatoire, elles iraient tout à fait à l'encontre de la dignité du départ qui devrait couronner une carrière professionnelle. La tension qu'ajouterait un système de retraite fondé sur le rendement dans un milieu de travail qui comporte déjà énormément de pression serait tout aussi préjudiciable. Il n'est pas difficile non plus d'imaginer comment un tel système susciterait la méfiance et la dissension au sein du personnel de l'hôpital.

À cet égard, il est important de souligner que la cohésion d'un personnel hospitalier dont les membres se plaisent à travailler au sein d'une équipe était l'une des «préoccupations institutionnelles» à l'origine de l'adoption du règlement 5.04 par le Vancouver General. Bien que l'avocat des appeexclusively to a desire to limit the number of doctors on staff, I think it is also clearly relevant to the desire to avoid the disruptive effects of performance-related retirement. What I have said in McKinney regarding the role that mandatory retirement plays in the preservation of the "necessary ambience of university life" is also applicable to the present case, notwithstanding that the institution of tenure, and the animosity toward regular performance evaluation it engenders, is not per se part of the hospital setting.

As a final comment on this branch of the appeal, I would simply say that it is not appropriate for this Court to "second-guess" the government's determination that 65 is the appropriate age at which to implement its policy of de facto mandatory retirement. On this issue, I refer to the comments made in R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra, at pp. 781-82, 800-801, to the effect that the exercise of "line-drawing" was one that should generally be left to the legislature.

Deleterious Effects

It is evident from what I have said in relation to "minimal impairment" that the effects of Regulation 5.04 and its attendant policy are not so severe as to outweigh the government's pressing and substantial objectives. In the circumstances, and given that a full explanation would cover the ground already covered under the previous heading, I find it unnecessary to say anything further regarding deleterious effects.

Conclusion and Disposition

I would dispose of this appeal on the ground that the appellant hospital is not a part of government within the meaning of s. 32 of the Charter. It is therefore not bound by the Charter. Even if the hospital were a part of government, I would hold that although Regulation 5.04 and the policy the Board of Trustees of the Vancouver General followed in applying it are discriminatory under s. 15 lants semble relier cette préoccupation au seul désir de limiter le nombre de médecins, je pense qu'elle est également tout à fait pertinente à la volonté d'éviter les effets perturbateurs d'une mise à la retraite fondée sur l'évaluation du rendement. Ce que j'ai dit dans l'arrêt McKinney sur le rôle que la retraite obligatoire joue dans le maintien de «l'ambiance [. . .] essentielle de la vie universitaire» s'applique également en l'espèce, peu importe que le système de la permanence, et l'animosité à l'égard des évaluations régulières de rendement qu'elle engendre, ne fasse pas partie en soi du milieu hospitalier.

À titre de dernière remarque sur cet aspect du pourvoi, j'ajouterais simplement qu'il n'est pas approprié que notre Cour [TRADUCTION] «se prononce après coup» sur la conclusion du gouvernement que 65 ans est l'âge approprié pour mettre en œuvre sa politique de retraite obligatoire dans les faits. Sur cette question, je mentionne les remarques faites dans l'arrêt R. c. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., précité, aux pp. 781 et 782, 800 et 801, selon lesquelles la tâche d'établir une «ligne de démarcation» devrait généralement être laissée au législateur.

Les effets préjudiciables

Il découle clairement de ce que j'ai dit de «l'atteinte minimale» que les effets du règlement 5.04 et de la politique qui s'y rattache ne sont pas sévères au point de l'emporter sur les objectifs urgents et réels du gouvernement. Dans ces circonstances, et parce qu'une explication complète reprendrait ce qui a déjà été dit dans la section précédente, je conclus qu'il n'est pas nécessaire d'ajouter quoi que ce soit concernant les effets préjudiciables du règlement contesté et de sa politique d'application.

Conclusion et dispositif

Je suis d'avis de disposer de ce pourvoi en affirmant que l'hôpital appelant ne fait pas partie du gouvernement au sens de l'art. 32 de la Charte. Il n'est donc pas lié par la Charte. Même si l'hôpital faisait partie du gouvernement, je suis d'avis de conclure que, bien que le règlement 5.04 et sa politique d'application suivie par le conseil d'administration du Vancouver General soient dis-of the Charter, they are saved under s. 1 as a "reasonable [limit] prescribed by law" which is "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society".

I would, therefore, allow the appeal, reverse the decisions of the trial judge and the Court of Appeal, and dismiss the plaintiffs' action with costs. I would answer the constitutional questions as follows:

1. Do the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms apply to the actions of the Vancouver General Hospital in establishing and administering Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations?

No.

2. If the answer to question 1 is yes, is Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations contrary to s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

If the Regulation had been enacted by government, it would be contrary to s. 15(1) of the Charter.

3. If the answer to question 1 is yes, was the administration of Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations by the Vancouver General Hospital contrary to s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

If the policy had been adopted by government, it would be contrary to s. 15(1).

4. If the answer to either questions 2 or 3 is yes, is Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations or the manner of its administration by the Vancouver General Hospital nevertheless justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

If questions 2 and 3 had been answered in the affirmative, the Regulation and policy would nevertheless be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

The following are the reasons delivered by

WILSON J. (dissenting)—I have had the benefit of the reasons of my colleague La Forest J. and, for the reasons I gave in McKinney v. University of Guelph, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 229, I must respectfully criminatoires en vertu de l'art. 15 de la Charte, ils sont justifiés en vertu de l'article premier parce qu'il s'agit d'une «règle de droit» qui est restreinte «dans des limites [...] raisonnables» et dont «la justification [peut] se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique».

Je suis donc d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'infirmer les décisions du juge de première instance et de la Cour d'appel et de rejeter l'action des intimés. Je suis d'avis de répondre aux questions constitutionnelles de la façon suivante:

1. Les dispositions de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés s'appliquent-elles aux actions du Vancouver General Hospital relativement à la rédaction et à la mise en œuvre du règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations?

Non.

2. Si la réponse à la question 1 est affirmative, le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations est-il contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Si le règlement avait été adopté par le gouvernement, il serait contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte.

3. Si la réponse à la question 1 est affirmative, l'application du règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations par le Vancouver General Hospital est-elle contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Si la politique avait été adoptée par le gouvernement, elle serait contraire au par. 15(1).

4. Si la réponse aux questions 2 ou 3 est affirmative, le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations ou la façon dont il est appliqué par le Vancouver General Hospital sont-ils néanmoins justifiés en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Si la réponse aux questions 2 ou 3 avait été affirmative, le règlement et la politique seraient néanmoins justifiés en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte.

Version française des motifs rendus par

LE JUGE WILSON (dissidente)—J'ai eu l'avantage de lire les motifs de jugement de mon collègue le juge La Forest et, pour les motifs que j'ai exprimés dans l'arrêt McKinney c. Université de disagree with him that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms has no application to the Vancouver General Hospital. In my view, the Charter does apply and as a consequence the appellant's policy of mandatory retirement is unconstitutional. While the questions raised by these appeals are generally similar to those this Court addressed in McKinney, there are some important differences and I wish to deal with those.

I. Application of the Charter to the Vancouver General Hospital

The scope of application of the Charter is governed by s. 32(1) which provides:

> 32. (1) This Charter applies
>
> (a) to the Parliament and government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament including all matters relating to the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories; and
> (b) to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

In McKinney, I discussed s. 32(1) at some length. I found that the purpose of the section was to extend the reach of the Charter to all those entities and activities that could be construed as "governmental". I identified the criteria I thought were relevant in determining whether an entity is subject to the Charter under s. 32. I indicated at p. 370 that:

> . . . I would favour an approach that asks the following questions about entities that are not self-evidently part of the legislative, executive or administrative branches of government:
> 1. Does the legislative, executive or administrative branch of government exercise general control over the entity in question?
>
> 2. Does the entity perform a traditional government function or a function which in more modern times is recognized as a responsibility of the state?
> 3. Is the entity one that acts pursuant to statutory authority specifically granted to it to enable it to further an objective that government seeks to promote in the broader public interest?

Guelph, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 229 rendus en même temps que les présents pourvois, je ne saurais, avec égards, être de son avis que la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés ne s'applique pas au Vancouver General Hospital. À mon avis, la Charte s'applique et, en conséquence, la politique de retraite obligatoire instaurée par l'hôpital appelant est inconstitutionnelle. Bien que les questions soulevées par les présents pourvois soient, dans l'ensemble, semblables à celles que notre Cour a examinées dans l'arrêt McKinney, il y a d'importantes différences que je veux analyser.

I. L'application de la Charte au Vancouver General Hospital

Le paragraphe 32(1) définit la portée d'application de la Charte.

> 32. (1) La présente charte s'applique:
>
> a) au Parlement et au gouvernement du Canada, pour tous les domaines relevant du Parlement, y compris ceux qui concernent le territoire du Yukon et les territoires du Nord-Ouest;
> b) à la législature et au gouvernement de chaque province, pour tous les domaines relevant de cette législature.

Dans l'arrêt McKinney, j'ai assez longuement analysé le par. 32(1). J'ai conclu que ce paragraphe avait pour objet d'étendre l'application de la Charte à toutes les entités et activités qu'on peut considérer comme «gouvernementales». J'ai défini les critères qui, selon moi, servaient à déterminer si une entité est assujettie à la Charte en vertu de l'art. 32. J'y ai dit à la p. 370 que:

> . . . je favoriserais une méthode qui soulève les questions suivantes quant aux entités dont il n'est pas évident en soi qu'elles font partie des branches législative, exécutive ou administrative du gouvernement:
> 1. La branche législative, exécutive ou administrative du gouvernement exerce-t-elle un contrôle général sur l'entité en question?
>
> 2. L'entité exerce-t-elle une fonction gouvernementale traditionnelle ou une fonction qui, de nos jours, est reconnue comme une responsabilité de l'État?
> 3. L'entité agit-elle conformément au pouvoir que la loi lui a expressément conféré en vue d'atteindre un objectif que le gouvernement cherche à promouvoir dans le plus grand intérêt public?

In my respectful view, the application of these three tests leads inexorably to a finding that the Charter applies to the Vancouver General Hospital.

1. Application of the Criteria to the Vancouver General Hospital

(a) The "Control" Test

A review of the various connections between the Province and the Hospital leads me to conclude that the provincial government exercises a substantial amount of control over the appellant. In particular, the government has exercised control over the Vancouver General Hospital in three areas: (1) governing structure; (2) policy; and (3) funding.

Dealing first with control over the governing structure of the Hospital, the Hospital Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 176, sets out the function and powers of the Hospital and its constituent elements. Section 30 provides that the Lieutenant Governor may appoint inspectors whose function it is to inspect the accounts, books, equipment and any other thing on or about the hospital. Section 37 provides that the Lieutenant Governor may, by regulation, establish one or more medical appeal boards. These boards are vested with the jurisdiction to review management decisions regarding permits to practise medicine or dentistry in the Hospital. Under s. 2(1)(c) of the Act every hospital is required to have a properly constituted board of management. It is in this Board that the governance of hospital affairs is largely reposed.

The composition of the Board is dealt with under both the Hospital Act and the Vancouver General Hospital Act, S.B.C. 1970, c. 55. Under s. 2(1)(a) of the former Act, the Hospital is obliged to make provision for, inter alia, representation of the provincial government on the Board. This directive has been carried out under s. 5 of the Vancouver General Hospital Act which provides that the Board shall consist of those persons appointed under the Hospital Act. The actual composition of the Board is dealt with in Article 4, s. 2, of the Vancouver General Hospital by-laws.

Avec égards, j'estime que l'application de ces trois critères nous amène forcément à conclure que la Charte s'applique au Vancouver General Hospital.

1. Application de ces critères au Vancouver General Hospital

a) Le critère du «contrôle»

L'examen des différents liens qui existent entre la province et l'hôpital appelant m'amène à conclure que le gouvernement provincial exerce un contrôle important sur celui-ci. Plus précisément, le gouvernement exerce un contrôle sur le Vancouver General Hospital dans trois domaines: (1) l'administration interne, (2) les politiques et (3) le financement.

Commençons par le contrôle sur l'administration interne de l'hôpital; la Hospital Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, ch. 176, établit le rôle et les pouvoirs de l'hôpital appelant et de ses éléments constituants. L'article 30 prescrit que le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil peut nommer des inspecteurs dont le rôle consiste à examiner les comptes, les registres et le matériel et toute autre chose ayant trait à l'hôpital. L'article 37 édicte que le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil peut, par règlement, établir un ou plusieurs comités médicaux d'appel. Ces comités ont la compétence d'exercer un contrôle sur toutes les décisions de l'administration au sujet des questions relatives à l'exercice de la médecine ou de l'art dentaire à l'hôpital appelant. En vertu de l'al. 2(1)c) de la Loi, tout hôpital est tenu d'avoir un conseil d'administration régulièrement constitué. Ce conseil voit dans une grande mesure à l'administration générale de l'hôpital.

La Hospital Act et la Vancouver General Hospital Act, S.B.C. 1970, ch. 55, déterminent la composition du conseil d'administration. En vertu de l'al. 2(1)a) de la première Loi, l'hôpital appelant est tenu de prévoir, notamment, la représentation du gouvernement provincial au conseil d'administration. Cette disposition est mise en œuvre en vertu de l'art. 5 de la Vancouver General Hospital Act qui dispose que le conseil d'administration est composé de personnes nommées en vertu de la Hospital Act. La composition même du conseil est régie par le par. 4(2) du règlement du Section 2 (in combination with Article 2, s. 1) provides that the Lieutenant Governor shall appoint 14 of the Board's 16 members, the appointees to be chosen from several specified communities. If, however, any of the specified organizations fail to submit candidates, the Lieutenant Governor may appoint whomever he or she wishes (s. 3).

The authority of the Board of Trustees is broad and diverse. Section 2(1)(b) provides that the Board is to have full control over the revenue and expenditure of the Hospital. The Hospital is also to have by-laws or rules thought necessary by the Minister for carrying out the administration and management of the Hospital's affairs and providing a high standard of care (s. 2(1)(c)). Under s. 6 of the Vancouver General Hospital Act, the power to pass such by-laws has been reposed in the Hospital's Board of Trustees. The Hospital enjoys special government-like powers in a number of respects and the exercise of these would presumably fall under the jurisdiction of the Board. For example, the property of the Hospital is protected from expropriation under s. 45 of the Hospital Act and s. 11 of the Vancouver General Hospital Act.

The powers of the Board of Trustees are subject to the authority of the Lieutenant Governor and the Minister of Health. Both the Lieutenant Governor and the Minister have the power to intervene in significant ways in the operations of the Board. The Lieutenant Governor may order the Hospital to comply with any conditions in addition to those enumerated in the Hospital Act as he or she may prescribe (s. 2(1)(d)). He may also make any additional regulations he thinks necessary (s. 36(1)). As well, under s. 2(1)(c) of that Act by-laws or rules et cetera passed by hospital boards are ineffective without ministerial approval and this requirement is repeated in s. 6 of the Vancouver General Hospital Act. The Minister may require that any by-law be revised to his satisfaction (s. 32). As well, the composition of the governing bodies of the Hospital may be radically altered by the Minister and the Lieutenant governor. Section 2(3) of the Hospital Act provides that the Lieutenant Governor may appoint to the Board any number of persons to represent the provincial Vancouver General Hospital. L'article 2 (et le par. 2(1)) édicte que le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil nomme 14 des 16 membres du conseil d'administration, les personnes ainsi nommées devant être choisies dans différents groupes déterminés. Si, cependant, un groupe déterminé ne propose pas de candidat, le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil peut nommer qui il veut (art. 3).

La compétence du conseil d'administration est générale et diversifiée. L'alinéa 2(1)b) prescrit que le conseil a plein contrôle sur les recettes et les dépenses de l'hôpital appelant. Celui-ci doit aussi avoir le règlement que le ministre estime nécessaire à l'administration de l'hôpital et à la prestation de soins de haute qualité (al. 2(1)c)). En vertu de l'art. 6 de la Vancouver General Hospital Act, la compétence d'adopter ce règlement est attribuée au conseil d'administration. L'hôpital appelant dispose de pouvoirs spéciaux apparentés à ceux d'un gouvernement à bon nombre d'égards et l'exercice de ces pouvoirs relève présumément du conseil d'administration. Par exemple, les biens-fonds de l'hôpital appelant ne sont pas sujets à l'expropriation en vertu de l'art. 45 de la Hospital Act et de l'art. 11 de la Vancouver General Hospital Act.

Les pouvoirs du conseil d'administration sont subordonnés à l'autorité du lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil et du ministre de la Santé. Le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil et le ministre ont le pouvoir d'intervenir de façon importante dans l'administration du conseil. Le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil peut enjoindre à l'hôpital appelant de respecter toute obligation qui s'ajoute à celles que la Hospital Act impose (al. 2(1)d)). Il peut aussi édicter tout règlement supplémentaire qu'il estime nécessaire (par. 36(1)). De plus, en vertu de l'al. 2(1)c) de la Loi, les dispositions réglementaires adoptées par les conseils d'administration des hôpitaux sont inopérantes jusqu'à ce qu'elles aient été approuvées par le ministre; cette exigence est aussi reprise par l'art. 6 de la Vancouver General Hospital Act. Le ministre peut exiger que tout règlement soit modifié dans le sens qu'il souhaite (art. 32). Le ministre et le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil peuvent aussi modifier radicalement la composition des corps dirigeants de l'hôpital appelant. Le paragraphe 2(3) de la Hospital Act édicte government notwithstanding any other Act or the constitution, by-laws or rules of any hospital. Finally, and perhaps most tellingly, the Province may simply "take over" the running of the Hospital. The Minister may under s. 44(1) appoint an examining board to examine any aspect of the Hospital's operations. Upon receipt of the examining board's report the Minister may make recommendations to the Lieutenant Governor who in turn under s. 44 may appoint a public administrator and completely usurp the Board of Trustees.

With respect to Hospital policy, I believe that the Province exercises a significant amount of control in this area as well. For instance, under the Hospital Act the Hospital is prohibited from refusing to admit any person on account of their indigent circumstances (s. 4). Hospitals are precluded from admitting any person with a communicable disease unless the Minister is satisfied that the hospital has sufficient facilities for the handling of such a person (s. 3). All persons being treated in hospital for tuberculosis of the respiratory tract are subject to supervision by a medical health officer appointed by the Lieutenant Governor. Every hospital is under a statutory obligation to keep detailed patient records (s. 18). Further, certain hospitals including the appellant must provide reasonable facilities for giving clinical instruction to medical students. If the hospital and the university are unable to agree as to the nature and extent of the facilities to be granted the dispute is determined by the Lieutenant Governor. Under the regulations passed pursuant to the Hospital Act (Hospital Act Regulations, B.C. Reg. 289/73 as am.), a number of provisions were passed by the Lieutenant Governor dealing with procedures for admission and discharge of patients (ss. 2 and 3) and the substantive requirements that must be met before hospitals can treat patients (s. 4). Further, que le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil peut nommer au conseil un nombre quelconque de personnes pour représenter le gouvernement de la province en dépit de toute autre loi, ou de l'acte constitutif et du règlement de tout hôpital. Enfin, ce qui est peut-être le plus significatif, la province peut tout simplement prendre en charge le fonctionnement de l'hôpital appelant. En vertu du par. 44(1), le ministre peut nommer un comité d'enquête pour examiner tout aspect quelconque du fonctionnement de l'hôpital appelant. Sur réception du rapport du comité d'enquête, le ministre peut faire des recommandations au lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil qui, à son tour, peut, en vertu de l'art. 44, nommer un administrateur public et évincer complètement le conseil d'administration.

À l'égard des politiques de l'hôpital appelant, je crois que la province exerce là aussi une mesure importante de contrôle. Par exemple, en vertu de la Hospital Act, l'hôpital appelant ne peut refuser d'admettre une personne parce qu'elle n'a pas de ressources financières (art. 4). Les hôpitaux ne sont pas autorisés à admettre une personne atteinte d'une maladie contagieuse à moins que le ministre ne soit convaincu que l'hôpital dispose des installations nécessaires pour soigner cette personne (art. 3). Toutes les personnes traitées à l'hôpital pour la tuberculose des voies respiratoires sont soumises à une surveillance de la part d'un agent de santé désigné par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil. Tout hôpital a l'obligation légale de tenir un dossier médical détaillé des patients (art. 18). De plus, certains hôpitaux, dont l'hôpital appelant, ont l'obligation de fournir des installations suffisantes pour donner une formation clinique à des étudiants en médecine. Si l'hôpital et l'université ne peuvent se mettre d'accord sur la nature et l'étendue des installations à affecter à cette fin, le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil tranche la question. En vertu des règlements adoptés sous l'empire de la Hospital Act, (Hospital Act Regulations, B.C. Reg. 289/73 et modifications), le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil a édicté un certain nombre de dispositions relatives aux procédures d'admission et de congé des patients (art. 2 et 3) et aux conditions de fond qui doivent être respectées avant que les hôpitaux puissent traiter des patients (art. 4). De plus, les règlements régissent l'organi-the regulations make provision for the organization of medical staff and delineate the duties which such staff organizations must perform (s. 5).

As I demonstrated above, even although the Board of Trustees is vested with a large amount of authority respecting the operations of the hospital, the Minister and the Lieutenant Governor have each been granted broad powers to impose their will upon the Board and thus to enforce government policy. The following provisions illustrate how extensive these powers are. Section 32 provides:

32. The minister may require that the bylaws or rules of a hospital or society or corporation having among its objects the provision of hospital facilities or the operation of a hospital be revised in a manner satisfactory to him in order to meet changing conditions and policies, and to provide for greater uniformity and efficiency in all matters concerning the administration and operation of hospitals.

Section 36 indicates the scope of the Lieutenant Governor's regulation-making power:

36. (1) The Lieutenant Governor in Council may make any regulations deemed necessary for the carrying out of the provisions of this Act to meet any contingency not expressly provided for in it, and providing for the returns to be rendered by the secretary or other executive officer of a hospital.

(2) All regulations under this section shall be presented to the Legislative Assembly.

(3) The power to make regulations under this section extends to prescribing, for any hospital as defined under any of the provisions of this Act, the

(a) proportion of the accommodation which shall be used as public or standard ward accommodation;

(b) number or proportion of persons who, being persons in receipt of social services as defined in the Guaranteed Available Income for Need Act, are to be provided with the necessary care and accommodation at the rates payable under that Act;

(c) rules or standards for the ownership, capital debt, maintenance, operation and management of hospitals or licensed hospitals;

sation du corps médical et définissent les fonctions que ces organismes médicaux doivent remplir (art. 5).

Comme je l'ai déjà indiqué, bien que le conseil d'administration soit doté de pouvoirs étendus à l'égard du fonctionnement de l'hôpital, le ministre et le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil disposent de pouvoirs généraux d'imposer leur volonté au conseil d'administration et d'appliquer de la sorte les politiques du gouvernement. Les dispositions suivantes montrent l'ampleur de ces pouvoirs. L'article 32 est ainsi conçu:

[TRADUCTION] 32. Le ministre peut exiger que les règlements ou règles d'un hôpital, d'une société ou d'une compagnie dont l'un des objets est de fournir des services hospitaliers ou d'exploiter un hôpital soient examinés d'une manière qu'il estime satisfaisante en vue de répondre à l'évolution des conditions et des politiques et d'apporter plus d'uniformité et d'efficacité dans les domaines relevant de l'administration et de l'exploitation des hôpitaux.

L'article 36 fait état de l'étendue du pouvoir de réglementation du lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil:

(2) Tous les règlements pris en vertu du présent article seront déposés auprès de l'Assemblée législative.

(3) Le pouvoir de prendre des règlements conféré en vertu du présent article s'étend à celui de prescrire, à l'égard de tout hôpital, tel que défini en vertu d'une disposition de la présente loi,

a) la proportion des lits dudit hôpital qui devra servir aux salles d'hôpital publiques—ou conventionnelles;

b) le nombre ou la proportion de personnes qui, étant des personnes recevant l'assistance sociale suivant la définition donnée dans la Guaranteed Available Income for Need Act, doivent y recevoir les soins nécessaires et le logement aux taux payables en vertu de cette loi;

c) les règles ou les normes relatives à la propriété, à la dette d'établissement, à l'entretien, à l'exploitation et à la gestion des hôpitaux ou des hôpitaux licenciés;

(d) issue, by the board of management, of permits authorizing the treatment of patients by physicians, dentists or paramedical personnel;

(e) establishment of medical staff organizations and other bodies comprised of persons to whom permits are issued under paragraph (d) and the promulgation, by a board of management, of bylaws or rules governing those organizations or other bodies;

(f) requirements governing the admission to and discharge from hospitals of patients;

(g) rules or standards regarding the care and treatment of patients;

(h) records and documents respecting patients kept by a hospital or supplied by a medical practitioner or dentist to a hospital, and the minimum period for the retention of the records and documents by a hospital;

(i) powers, duties and responsibilities of a public administrator appointed under section 44, and any matter respecting a hospital corporation for which the appointment is made; and

(j) terms and conditions of the planning and operation of a hospital following public administration under section 44.

(4) Where regulations are made,

(a) each hospital to which the regulations are applicable shall observe them, and

(b) the person having charge of admissions to a hospital to which regulations made under subsection (3)(b) are applicable shall, if the number or proportion of the persons to whom that paragraph refers accommodated in that hospital is less than the number or proportion prescribed, give preference of admission to those persons.

Apart from the extraordinary powers of the Lieutenant Governor, the routine discharge of the Board's function involves the articulation and implementation of hospital policy by a body dominated by government representatives. With respect to its managerial responsibilities, the Board is obliged under s. 8 of B.C. Reg. 289/73 to appoint an administrator who shall be the representative of the Board and shall execute all orders of the Board concerning the administration of the Hospital. With respect to policies concerning the provision

d) la délivrance, par le conseil de gestion, des permis autorisant le traitement des patients par les médecins, les dentistes et le personnel paramédical;

e) la constitution de conseils de professionnels de la santé et d'autres organismes formés de personnes à qui des permis sont délivrés en vertu de l'alinéa d), et la promulgation par un conseil de gestion des règles ou règlements régissant ces organismes ou d'autres organismes;

f) les conditions d'admission et de congé des patients;

g) les règles ou normes applicables aux soins et aux traitements prodigués aux patients;

h) les dossiers ou pièces établis et conservés à l'égard des patients par l'hôpital ou ceux fournis à l'hôpital par un médecin ou un dentiste et la durée minimale de conservation par l'hôpital des dossiers et archives;

i) les pouvoirs, les devoirs et les responsabilités de l'administrateur public nommé en application de l'article 44 et tout autre sujet relatif à une institution hospitalière à l'égard de laquelle la nomination est faite;

j) les conditions de planification et d'exploitation d'un hôpital après la nomination d'un administrateur en vertu de l'article 44.

(4) Dès la promulgation des règlements,

a) tout hôpital auquel les règlements s'appliquent est tenu de les observer et

b) les personnes responsables de l'admission des patients à un hôpital auquel s'appliquent les règlements pris en vertu de l'alinéa 3b), doivent, si le nombre ou la proportion des personnes mentionnées à cet alinéa et admises à cet hôpital est moindre que le nombre ou la proportion prescrite, accorder la préférence d'admission à ces personnes.

Outre les pouvoirs extraordinaires dont dispose le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil, l'exercice quotidien des fonctions du conseil d'administration comporte la formulation et la mise en œuvre des politiques de l'hôpital par un organisme dominé par les représentants du gouvernement. En vertu de ses responsabilités de gestion, le conseil d'administration est tenu, en vertu de l'art. 8 du B.C. Reg. 289/73 de nommer un administrateur qui représente le conseil et applique toutes ses directives afférentes à l'administration de l'hôpital appeof medical services, the Board is obliged under s. 6 of the regulations to make provision for medical staff procedures in the by-laws. Under Article 6 of the Vancouver General Hospital By-Laws, the Board of Trustees has delegated this function to a number of specialized committees who report back to the Board.

With respect to the issue of funding, the evidence discloses that the operating costs of the Hospital are borne almost entirely by the Province. The provision of these funds has gone hand in hand with the Regulation. Under the Hospital Act provisions exist for the supervision of hospital expenditures. Section 40 provides that the Lieutenant Governor may withhold amounts payable to the Hospital where the board of management refuses or neglects to comply with the Act or the regulations or fails to administer the Hospital in a manner satisfactory to the Minister. Section 41 prescribes the conditions applicable upon the Hospital's receiving financial assistance toward the planning, constructing, reconstructing, purchasing and equipping of the hospital.

Finally, the Province also subsidizes the Hospital's clientele, the patients. As has been mentioned by my colleague La Forest J., the physicians who initiated this action are not, strictly speaking, employees of the Hospital. Instead, they are paid by the Province on a fee for service basis. That is, they are paid by the government for the treatments they administer to their patients. Thus, the Province directly finances the provision of health care at the Vancouver General Hospital.

In my view, the extensive supervisory power which the Province exercises over the Hospital supports the conclusion that the appellant is a government entity for the purposes of s. 32(1) of the Charter. Before leaving this branch of the s. 32(1) inquiry, however, I would like to address the question whether, regardless of the Hospital's status as a governmental entity, the particular action complained of here is or is not government action.

lant. Pour ce qui a trait aux politiques de prestation des soins de santé, le conseil d'administration est tenu, en vertu de l'art. 6 du règlement, d'établir, par règlement, les règles que le personnel médical doit observer. En vertu de l'art. 6 du règlement du Vancouver General Hospital, le conseil d'administration a délégué cette tâche à plusieurs comités spécialisés qui font rapport au conseil.

Quant à la question du financement, la preuve révèle que la province défraie presque entièrement les coûts d'exploitation de l'hôpital appelant. La fourniture de ces fonds va de pair avec la réglementation. En effet, la Hospital Act prévoit la surveillance des dépenses des hôpitaux. L'article 40 dispose que le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil peut retenir les sommes affectées à l'hôpital si le conseil de gestion refuse ou néglige de se conformer à une disposition de la Loi ou du règlement ou n'administre pas l'hôpital à la satisfaction du ministre. L'article 41 détermine les conditions en vertu desquelles l'hôpital peut recevoir des subventions de planification, de construction, de reconstruction, d'achat de fournitures et d'équipement.

Enfin, la province défraie aussi les dépenses des clients de l'hôpital, c'est-à-dire les patients. Comme mon collègue le juge La Forest l'a mentionné, les médecins qui ont intenté la présente action ne sont pas, au sens strict, des employés de l'hôpital appelant. Ils sont plutôt rémunérés par la province selon un système d'honoraires. En effet, ils sont payés par le gouvernement en fonction des traitements qu'ils administrent à leurs patients. Ainsi, la province finance directement la prestation des soins médicaux au Vancouver General Hospital.

À mon avis, l'étendue des pouvoirs de surveillance que la province exerce sur l'hôpital étaye la conclusion que l'hôpital appelant est une entité gouvernementale pour les fins du par. 32(1) de la Charte. Avant de laisser cet aspect de l'examen fondé sur le par. 32(1), cependant, j'aborderai la question de savoir si, indépendamment du statut d'entité gouvernementale de l'hôpital, l'action contestée en l'espèce constitue ou non un acte du gouvernement.

The respondents submit that because Regulation 5.04 could only take effect upon the approval of the Minister, its enactment and subsequent application must be characterized as an act of government. They rely on the decision of this Court in Attorney General of Quebec v. Blaikie, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 312 (Blaikie No. 2) in support of this submission.

In Blaikie No. 2 the Court was asked to decide whether regulations and orders issued by statutory bodies are Acts of the Legislature within the meaning of s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 which reads:

133. Either the English or the French Language may be used by any Person in the Debates of the Houses of the Parliament of Canada and of the Houses of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those Languages shall be used in the respective Records and Journals of those Houses; and either of those Languages may be used by any Person or in any Pleading or Process in or issuing from any Court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the Courts of Quebec.

The Acts of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those Languages.

The Court concluded that delegated legislation fell within the compass of s. 133. It stated at p. 329:

The particular form of words used in this respect by various statutes matters little. Whether it be provided that some regulations "shall have no force and effect until approved and sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council" or "shall not be carried into execution until approved by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council" or "shall not have force and effect until confirmed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council", they can be assimilated with the enactments of the Government and therefore of the Legislature as long as positive action of the Government is required to breathe life into them. Without such approval or confirmation, they are a nullity . . . or at least inoperative.

My colleague La Forest J. has distinguished Blaikie No. 2 on the basis that it was decided in the context of a constitutional provision protecting certain defined and restricted rights (i.e., the right

Les intimés soutiennent que, puisque le règlement 5.04 ne devenait applicable qu'après son approbation par le Ministre, son adoption et son application subséquente doivent être qualifiées d'action du gouvernement. Ils invoquent l'arrêt de notre Cour Procureur général du Québec c. Blaikie, [1981] 1 R.C.S. 312 (Blaikie nº 2), à l'appui de cette prétention.

Dans Blaikie nº 2, notre Cour devait déterminer si les règlements et les décrets pris par les organismes constitués en vertu des lois sont des lois de la législature au sens de l'art. 133 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867, ainsi conçu:

Les lois du parlement du Canada et de la législature de Québec devront être imprimées et publiées dans ces deux langues.

Notre Cour a conclu que la législation par délégation tombe sous le coup de l'art. 133. Elle dit, à la p. 329:

Le texte particulier des différentes lois importe peu à cet égard. Que la loi dispose que certains règlements «n'entreront en vigueur que lorsqu'ils auront été approuvés et sanctionnés par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil» ou «ne seront pas mis à exécution avant d'avoir été approuvés par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil» ou «n'auront aucun effet avant d'avoir été confirmés par le lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil», ils peuvent être assimilés à des mesures du gouvernement et, par conséquent, de la Législature tant qu'une action positive du gouvernement est nécessaire pour leur insuffler la vie. Sans cette approbation ou confirmation ils sont nuls [. . .] ou à tout le moins inopérants.

Mon collègue le juge La Forest établit une distinction entre l'arrêt Blaikie nº 2 et l'espèce parce que celui-ci porte sur l'interprétation d'une disposition constitutionnelle qui protège certains to use either the French or the English language in certain defined circumstances) whereas the present appeals are to be decided in the context of s. 32(1) which affects the scope of every guarantee in the Charter. I agree with La Forest J. that because Blaikie No. 2 was decided in a different constitutional context and in relation to a different constitutional guarantee its usefulness in construing s. 32(1) is limited.

In McKinney I noted that it was not necessary that there be a clear nexus between government and the particular impugned activity in order that the control test be met. On the other hand, I observed at p. 363:

> The evidence that one is dealing with government action will, of course, be even stronger if one can point to a direct nexus between government and the activity in question. But I do not think that the specific questions the control test poses about the presence of such a nexus are in any sense necessary conditions for a finding that there is government action. I am quite prepared to accept that, even in the absence of such a nexus, there may be sufficient government control to enable one to conclude that government action is in issue.

In my respectful view, the conclusion I have reached respecting the general relationship of control which the Province has with the Hospital is strengthened when it is recognized that the government also has specific control over the particular action in issue in these appeals. Regulation 5.04 would be totally ineffectual without the prior written approval of the Minister. Indeed, had the Minister not been prepared to approve the Regulation, he had the power to forestall its enactment and compel the Board of Trustees to enact a by-law more to his liking. In such circumstances I fail to see how the Regulation could be characterized as beyond government control or as anything other than a simple reflection of government policy. To my mind, the fact that the Province through the Minister had the power to treat the by-law in this way provides an exceedingly strong indication that what is at issue in these appeals is government action. Indeed, in this case I might be prepared to find that the requirements of s. 32(1) droits définis et restreints (c'est-à-dire le droit de se servir du français ou de l'anglais dans certaines circonstances déterminées) alors que les présents pourvois dépendent de l'interprétation du par. 32(1), lequel détermine la portée de tous les droits garantis par la Charte. Je suis d'accord avec le juge La Forest pour dire que, parce que l'arrêt Blaikie n° 2 a été décidé dans un contexte constitutionnel différent et en fonction d'une garantie constitutionnelle différente, son utilité pour l'interprétation du par. 32(1) est limitée.

Dans l'arrêt McKinney, j'ai souligné qu'il n'était pas nécessaire qu'il y ait un lien apparent entre le gouvernement et l'activité précise mise en cause pour satisfaire au critère du contrôle. D'autre part, j'ai fait remarquer ceci à la p. 363:

> La preuve qu'il s'agit d'une action gouvernementale sera évidemment plus solide si l'on peut déceler un lien direct entre le gouvernement et l'activité en question. Mais je ne crois pas que les questions précises que soulève le critère du contrôle quant à l'existence d'un tel lien soient de toute façon des conditions nécessaires pour conclure à l'existence d'une action gouvernementale. Je suis tout à fait disposée à reconnaître que, même en l'absence d'un tel lien, le gouvernement peut exercer suffisamment de contrôle pour conclure qu'il s'agit d'une action gouvernementale.

À mon avis, la conclusion à laquelle j'en suis venue au sujet du contrôle que la province exerce sur l'hôpital appelant est étayée lorsque l'on reconnaît que le gouvernement a aussi un contrôle exprès sur l'action particulière contestée dans les présents pourvois. Le règlement 5.04 serait totalement sans effet sans l'approbation préalable donnée par écrit par le ministre. De plus, si le ministre n'avait pas voulu approuver le règlement, il avait le pouvoir d'empêcher son adoption et de forcer le conseil d'administration à en adopter un autre qui lui aurait plu davantage. Dans ces circonstances, je ne vois pas comment on peut dire que le règlement échappe au contrôle du gouvernement ou qu'il reflète autre chose que la politique du gouvernement. Selon moi, la façon dont la province pouvait, par l'entremise du ministre, traiter le règlement donne une indication très forte que ce qui est contesté en l'espèce est une action du gouvernement. En l'espèce, je pourrais être prête à conclure que les conditions exigées en vertu du par. 32(1) are met on the basis of the control test alone. It is not necessary to do so, however, since in my view the government function test and the government entity test provide further support for my conclusion that the Charter applies to the Vancouver General Hospital.

(b) The "Government Function" Test

As I indicated in McKinney, in applying the "government function" test, the general principle is that a function becomes governmental because a government has decided to perform it, not because the function is inherently governmental.

Public health in general and hospitals in particular have been supported by local and provincial governments in Canada since pre-Confederation times. In 1830, for example, the legislature of Upper Canada provided funding for the hospital at York established by the Lieutenant Governor, Sir John Colborne: see An Act to grant a sum of Money to His Majesty in aid of the York Hospital, S.U.C. 1830, c. 31. In British Columbia the legislature enacted in 1869 a statute conferring on the Governor-in-Council power to establish local health boards and to regulate sanitary and other conditions in hospitals: see An Ordinance for promoting the Public Health in the Colony of British Columbia, C.S.B.C. 1877, c. 83. The legislature of British Columbia also passed the Insane Asylums Act, C.S.B.C. 1888, c. 61, providing for the establishment of mental hospitals in the Province. Finally, in 1888 it instituted a complete regime of public health under the Health Act, R.S.B.C. 1897, c. 91. In 1832 the legislature of Lower Canada passed an Act to support certain hospitals: see An Act to appropriate certain sums of money for the support of the Emigrant Hospital at Quebec and of the Fever Hospital at Point Levi, and for other purposes therein mentioned, S.L.C. 1832, c. 15. And in New Brunswick the legislature established a Board of Health in the City and County of St. John and conferred on the Board authority to "purchase, build or hire" hospitals and power to regulate them: see An Act to estab- sont remplies en raison du seul critère du contrôle. Il n'est cependant pas nécessaire que je le fasse puisque, selon moi, les critères de la fonction gouvernementale et de l'organisme gouvernemental renforcent encore la conclusion à laquelle j'arrive que la Charte s'applique au Vancouver General Hospital.

b) Le critère de la «fonction gouvernementale»

Comme je l'ai indiqué dans l'arrêt McKinney, le principe général régissant l'application du critère de la «fonction gouvernementale» veut qu'une fonction devienne gouvernementale parce que le gouvernement a décidé de la remplir, non parce que la fonction est gouvernementale de par sa nature même.

Au Canada, les gouvernements locaux et provinciaux ont pris en charge la santé publique en général et les hôpitaux en particulier depuis une époque antérieure à la Confédération. En 1830, par exemple, la législature du Haut-Canada affectait des fonds à l'hôpital de York fondé par le lieutenant-gouverneur sir John Colborne: voir An Act to grant a sum of Money to His Majesty in aid of the York Hospital, S.U.C. 1830, ch. 31. En Colombie-Britannique, l'assemblée législative a adopté en 1869 une loi qui accordait au lieutenant-gouverneur en conseil le pouvoir de créer des commissions locales d'hygiène et de réglementer les conditions d'hygiène et autres conditions dans les hôpitaux: voir An Ordinance for promoting the Public Health in the Colony of British Columbia, C.S.B.C. 1877, ch. 83. L'assemblée législative de la Colombie-Britannique a aussi adopté la Insane Asylums Act, C.S.B.C. 1888, ch. 61, pour pourvoir à l'établissement d'hôpitaux psychiatriques dans la province. Enfin, en 1888, elle a établi un régime complet de santé publique en vertu de la Health Act, R.S.B.C. 1897, ch. 91. En 1832, l'assemblée législative du Bas-Canada a adopté une loi pour pourvoir au fonctionnement de certains hôpitaux: voir Acte pour affecter certaines sommes d'argent pour le soutien de l'Hôpital des Émigrés à Québec, et de l'Hôpital pour les cas de Fièvres à la Pointe Lévi, et pour d'autres fins y mentionnées, S.B.-C. 1832, ch. 15. Au Nouveau-Brunswick, l'assemblée législative a créé une Commis-lish a Board of Health in the City and County of Saint John, S.N.B. 1855, c. 40, s. 11.

Section 92(7) of the Constitution Act, 1867, gives the provinces exclusive jurisdiction over 92. . . .

7. The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Hospitals, Asylums, Charities, and Eleemosynary Institutions in and for the Province, other than Marine Hospitals.

Pursuant to this grant of authority provincial legislatures have become increasingly involved over the years in the public health and hospital area. For example, in Manitoba the legislature enacted The General Hospital Act, C.S.M. 1880, c. 26, which established the Winnipeg General Hospital. The Nova Scotia legislature, through Title VI of the R.S.N.S. 1900, set up a regime of hospitals and public health regulation. Chapter 47 [Of Local Hospitals] Title IV provides that municipal and town councils shall be authorized to establish and support local public hospitals. In Ontario, the legislature provided financial aid to a number of hospitals through The Charity Aid Act, R.S.O. 1877, c. 223. They also ensured the government's right to inspect such facilities through The Prison and Asylum Inspection Act, R.S.O. 1877, c. 224, s. 14.

Finally, the administration of hospitals in the provinces is under the general authority of provincial Ministers of Health: see, for example, Public Hospitals Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 410; Hospitals Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. H-11; The Hospital Standards Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. H-10; and An Act Respecting the Ministère de la santé et des services sociaux, R.S.Q., c. M-19.2.

This brief overview of the legislation in place both before and after Confederation leads me to conclude that the establishment and maintenance sion d'hygiène dans la ville et le comté de St. John et lui a octroyé le pouvoir d'[TRADUCTION] «acquérir, construire ou louer» des hôpitaux et celui de les réglementer: voir An Act to establish a Board of Health in the City and County of Saint John, S.N.-B. 1855, ch. 40, art. 11.

Le paragraphe 92(7) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 accorde aux provinces la compétence exclusive sur

92. . . .

7. L'établissement, l'entretien et l'administration des hôpitaux, asiles, institutions et hospices de charité dans la province, autres que les hôpitaux de marine;

En raison de cette attribution de compétence, les autorités provinciales se sont occupées de plus en plus au fil des ans de la santé publique et des hôpitaux. Par exemple, au Manitoba, l'assemblée législative a adopté The General Hospital Act, C.S.M. 1880, ch. 26 qui établit l'Hôpital général de Winnipeg. L'assemblée législative de la Nouvelle-Écosse a établi, en vertu du Titre VI des R.S.N.S. 1900, une réglementation des hôpitaux et de la santé publique. Le chapitre 47 [Of Local Hospitals] du Titre VI édicte que les conseils municipaux des villes et villages auront l'autorité d'établir des hôpitaux publics locaux et de pourvoir à leur fonctionnement. En Ontario, l'assemblée législative a accordé une aide financière à plusieurs hôpitaux en vertu de The Charity Aid Act, R.S.O. 1877, ch. 223. L'Assemblée a aussi accordé au gouvernement le droit d'inspecter ces installations en vertu de The Prison and Asylum Inspection Act, R.S.O. 1877, ch. 224, art. 14.

Enfin, l'administration des hôpitaux dans les provinces relève de la compétence générale des ministres de la santé provinciaux: voir Loi sur les hôpitaux publics, L.R.O. 1980, ch. 410; la Hospitals Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. H-11; The Hospital Standards Act, R.S.S. 1978, ch. H-10; et la Loi sur le ministère de la santé et des services sociaux, L.R.Q., ch. M-19.2.

Ce bref survol des lois adoptées avant et après la Confédération m'amène à conclure que la création of hospitals is a traditional function of government.

(c) The "Statutory Authority and the Public Interest" Test

It has already been established that the Hospital is broadly empowered to conduct its affairs through its "enabling" statutes. It has also been established that government has traditionally assumed a responsibility for the provision of basic medical services to its citizens. Justification for state involvement in the public health field is not hard to find. Simply put, government has recognized for some time that access to basic health care is something no sophisticated society can legitimately deny to any of its members. Less philosophically, government has also recognized that the promotion and protection of health is crucial to the maintenance of a viable and productive society.

I believe that the fact that the Hospital is established and operates pursuant to statutory authority, is heavily regulated by government and discharges a traditional government function in the public interest brings it within the concept of "government" for purposes of s. 32. Regulation 5.04 is therefore subject to review under s. 15 of the Charter.

II. Does the Hospital's Mandatory Retirement Policy Infringe Section 15 of the Charter?

The Hospital's power to retire the physicians who practise at the Hospital is found in ss. 5 and 6 of the Vancouver General Hospital Act which empowers the Board of Trustees to pass by-laws for the purposes of managing the property and affairs of the Hospital. The Board approved of Medical Staff Regulation 5.04 which was further approved by the Minister. Regulation 5.04 provides:

5.04 Retirement: Members of the Staff shall be expected to retire at the end of the appointment year in which they pass their 65th birthday. Members of the Staff who wish to defer their retirement may make special application to the Board. The Board shall request the Medical Advisory Committee for a recommendation in each such case. The Medical Advisory Committee shall, in making its recommendation, consider the report of a personal et l'entretien des hôpitaux est une fonction traditionnelle de gouvernement.

c) Le critère de la «compétence législative et de l'intérêt public»

Il a déjà été mentionné que l'hôpital appelant possède des pouvoirs généraux relativement à son exploitation en vertu de ses lois «habilitantes». Il a aussi été établi que le gouvernement a, par tradition, joué un rôle dans la prestation des soins médicaux essentiels à ses citoyens. La justification de l'intervention de l'État dans le domaine de la santé publique n'est pas difficile à établir. En bref, le gouvernement a reconnu depuis un certain nombre d'années que l'accès aux soins de santé essentiels est un service dont aucune société évoluée ne peut légitimement priver ses citoyens. D'une façon plus pratique, le gouvernement reconnaît aussi que l'avancement et la protection de la santé favorisent le maintien d'une société productive et saine.

À mon sens, comme l'hôpital appelant existe et fonctionne en vertu de lois, comme il est strictement réglementé par le gouvernement et remplit une fonction traditionnellement propre au gouvernement dans l'intérêt public, il s'inscrit dans la notion de «gouvernement» pour les fins de l'art. 32. Le règlement 5.04 est donc susceptible de révision en vertu de l'art. 15 de la Charte.

II. La politique de retraite obligatoire de l'hôpital appelant enfreint-elle l'art. 15 de la Charte?

La capacité qu'a l'hôpital appelant de mettre à la retraite les médecins qui y exercent découle des art. 5 et 6 de la Vancouver General Hospital Act qui accorde au conseil d'administration le droit d'adopter des règlements relatifs à la gestion des biens et des affaires de l'hôpital. Le conseil a approuvé le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations, qui a aussi été approuvé par le ministre. Le règlement 5.04 est ainsi conçu:

[TRADUCTION] 5.04 La retraite: Les membres du personnel sont censés prendre leur retraite à la fin de l'année d'exercice au cours de laquelle ils atteignent 65 ans. Les membres du personnel qui veulent reporter leur mise à la retraite peuvent présenter une demande spéciale au conseil d'administration, qui demande la recommandation du «conseil consultatif médical» dans chaque cas. Avant de faire sa recommandation, le conseil con-interview which shall take place between the applicant and the Department Head concerned which shall include a review of the health and continuing performance of the applicant.

As was the case in McKinney, it is unnecessary for me to determine whether s. 15(1) would apply in the absence of a legislative provision mandating or permitting the discriminatory action complained of. In the context of these appeals it is evident that the power to retire flows from the Vancouver General Hospital Act and the Regulation passed pursuant to it.

Turning now to the question whether Regulation 5.04 infringes s. 15(1), it is to be noted that the constitutional questions posed by Chief Justice Dickson regarding the application of s. 15(1) of the Charter embrace two possibilities: whether Regulation 5.04 is on its face contrary to s. 15(1); and whether the way in which the Regulation is administered violates the equality guarantee. The constitutional questions are posed in this way because of the unique structure of the Regulation. The Regulation differs from the provisions at issue in McKinney in that it contemplates by its terms exceptions to the general rule that members of the medical staff are required to retire at age 65. Specifically, the Regulation stipulates that members of the staff who wish to retain their admitting privileges may make special application to the Medical Advisory Committee to permit them to stay on at the Hospital. The Regulation provides that the Committee shall conduct a personal interview which shall include a review of the health and continuing performance of the applicant. Based on this interview the Committee makes a recommendation to the Board.

Is the Regulation, apart from the manner in which it has been administered, contrary to s. 15(1)? In McKinney the provisions at issue were found to infringe s. 15(1) because they reinforced the stereotype of older workers as incompetent and were therefore discriminatory within the meaning of s. 15(1): see Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143, and R. v. Turpin, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1296. Senior academics were sultatif médical tient compte du rapport d'une entrevue personnelle entre le requérant et le chef de département concerné, y compris un rapport de l'état de santé et du rendement continu du requérant.

Comme dans l'arrêt McKinney, il n'est pas nécessaire que je décide si le par. 15(1) s'appliquerait en l'absence d'une disposition législative qui permet ou ordonne l'acte discriminatoire contesté. Dans le contexte des présents pourvois, il est évident que le pouvoir qu'a l'hôpital appelant de mettre à la retraite découle de la Vancouver General Hospital Act et de son règlement d'application.

Quant à ce qui est de savoir si le règlement 5.04 enfreint le par. 15(1), il faut remarquer que les questions constitutionnelles établies par le juge en chef Dickson au sujet de l'application du par. 15(1) de la Charte envisagent deux possibilités: que le règlement 5.04 soit contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte par sa rédaction même et que la façon d'appliquer le règlement viole la garantie d'égalité. Les questions constitutionnelles sont ainsi formulées vu la conception particulière du règlement. Celui-ci se distingue des dispositions contestées dans l'arrêt McKinney en ce que le règlement lui-même prévoit une exception à la règle générale qui oblige le personnel médical à prendre sa retraite à l'âge de 65 ans. Le règlement dit précisément que les médecins qui veulent conserver leurs privilèges d'admission peuvent présenter une demande spéciale au conseil consultatif médical afin d'être autorisés à continuer d'exercer leur profession à l'hôpital appelant. Le règlement précise que le conseil doit faire subir une entrevue personnelle qui comporte un examen de la santé et du rendement du demandeur. En fonction des résultats de l'entrevue, le conseil consultatif soumet une recommandation au conseil d'administration.

Le règlement est-il contraire au par. 15(1) indépendamment de la manière dont il est appliqué? Dans l'arrêt McKinney, les dispositions contestées ont été jugées contraires au par. 15(1) parce qu'elles renforcent le préjugé que les travailleurs âgés sont incompétents et, par conséquent, ont été jugées discriminatoires au sens du par. 15(1): voir Andrews c. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 143 et R. c. Turpin, [1989] 1 compelled to retire irrespective of their individual capabilities and solely upon the basis of their having advanced in years. The interests which the guarantee of equality embodied in s. 15 were meant to protect, i.e., human dignity and the sense of self-worth and self-esteem, were thus violated. In this case, on the other hand, provision has in fact been made to permit senior physicians to retain their hospital privileges and thus continue the practice of their profession so long as they are capable of performing satisfactorily. The question therefore becomes whether Regulation 5.04 is discriminatory in spite of the fact that it provides an exception for those who can demonstrate individual capacity to perform. Put another way, can it be said that the Regulation discriminates even although it invokes the concept of individual merit and ability rather than the stereotype of older physicians as incompetent? In my view, the answer to this question is "yes".

It seems to me that in considering whether a provision violates s. 15(1) the Court should be wary of underestimating the discriminatory effect of any given measure. Here, for instance, even although the Regulation provides on its face for non-discriminatory exceptions, the principle behind the measure remains constitutionally unsound. By its terms Regulation 5.04 stipulates that staff are expected to retire at age 65. In this way the unarticulated premise remains that with increasing age comes increasing incompetence and decreasing ability. That the Regulation provides for exceptions does not, in my view, detract from the fact that the central concept animating the provision falls foul of s. 15(1).

This difficulty with the Regulation is compounded by the fact that it goes on to direct those who wish to continue to work to demonstrate that the stereotype does not apply to them. It seems to me clearly discriminatory to impose this burden upon those who already suffer the burden of stereotype and prejudice (and who thereby have suffered a blow to their sense of self-worth and self-esteem as useful and productive citizens).

R.C.S. 1296. Les professeurs d'université âgés étaient tenus de prendre leur retraite quelles que soient leurs capacités personnelles uniquement parce qu'ils avaient atteint un âge déterminé. Les intérêts que le droit à l'égalité consacré par l'art. 15 vise à protéger, c'est-à-dire la dignité et le sens de l'estime de soi et de sa propre valeur, se trouvaient violés. En l'espèce, d'autre part, le règlement donne aux médecins âgés la possibilité de conserver leurs privilèges auprès de l'hôpital et ainsi de continuer à exercer leur profession pourvu que leur rendement soit satisfaisant. La question est donc de savoir si le règlement 5.04 est discriminatoire même s'il permet une exception en faveur de ceux qui se montrent capables d'exercer leur profession. Autrement dit, peut-on dire que le règlement est discriminatoire même s'il fait appel aux notions de mérite individuel et de compétence plutôt qu'au stéréotype du médecin âgé, donc incompétent? À mon avis, la réponse à cette question est «oui».

Il me semble que pour déterminer si une disposition enfreint le par. 15(1) la Cour doit se garder de sous-estimer l'effet discriminatoire d'une mesure donnée. En l'espèce, par exemple, même si le règlement prévoit des exceptions non discriminatoires, le principe de la mesure contestée demeure vicié du point de vue constitutionnel. Par sa rédaction même, le règlement 5.04 affirme que les médecins sont censés prendre leur retraite à 65 ans. De cette façon, la prémisse sous-entendue reste que le vieillissement entraîne peu à peu l'incompétence et la diminution des capacités. Bien que le règlement prévoie des exceptions, il n'en reste pas moins, selon moi, que la notion principale sous-jacente à la disposition enfreint le par. 15(1).

Ce problème que le règlement pose est amplifié du fait qu'il exige en plus de ceux qui veulent continuer d'exercer leur profession qu'ils démontrent que le préjugé en cause ne s'applique pas à eux. Il me semble manifestement discriminatoire d'imposer ce fardeau à ceux qui sont déjà victimes d'un préjugé (et qui, en conséquence, sont déjà atteints dans l'estime qu'ils se portent et dans la perception de leur valeur propre en tant que citoyens utiles et productifs).

The Court of Appeal also found that Regulation 5.04 was on its face in violation of s. 15(1) although for different reasons. The Court of Appeal noted that the operation of the exemption contained in the Regulation was not confined to issues of competence alone and therefore permitted consideration of irrelevant factors by the Board. In other words, health and continuing performance were factors to be included in the determination of whether a particular individual would be allowed to retain his or her admitting privileges, but they were not the sole basis upon which these reviews were to be conducted. I agree with this analysis and find that it provides further support for my conclusion that Regulation 5.04 is discriminatory on its face.

I should add, however, that I do not consider schemes such as that embodied in this Regulation to be on the same footing as "blanket rules" like those at issue in McKinney. In my opinion, any mechanism which seeks to take account of individual differences is preferable to one that flatly denies opportunities on the basis of stereotypical and prejudicial notions of ability. It should be emphasized, however, that the merits of exemption schemes are irrelevant to whether or not there has been a violation of s. 15(1). Exemption schemes such as that contemplated by Regulation 5.04 are properly a matter for consideration under s. 1 of the Charter.

Turning now to the question whether Regulation 5.04 was administered in a manner contrary to the Charter, I think the answer to this question is also "yes". The evidence is clear that the Regulation has been applied by the Board in a discriminatory fashion. The Court of Appeal found that the Board interpreted the provision as a mandatory retirement policy. Its practice was to terminate admitting privileges at age 65 subject to a finding not only that the applicant was of good health and performing satisfactorily, but also that the applicant possessed "unique" skills. Clearly the manner of application of Regulation 5.04 adopted by the Board is discriminatory because it perpetuates and reinforces the stereotype identified earlier of older workers as incompetent.

La Cour d'appel a aussi conclu, quoique pour des motifs différents, que le règlement 5.04 enfreint le par. 15(1) par sa rédaction même. Elle a signalé que l'application de l'exception portée au règlement ne se limitait pas exclusivement à des questions de compétence, mais qu'elle permettait au conseil de prendre en compte des facteurs non pertinents. En d'autres termes, la santé et le rendement constant d'une personne en particulier comptaient au nombre des facteurs servant à déterminer si elle pouvait être autorisée à conserver ses privilèges d'admission, mais ils ne constituaient pas les seuls sujets de l'examen. Je souscris à cette analyse et je trouve qu'elle étaye la conclusion à laquelle j'arrive que le règlement 5.04 est discriminatoire par sa rédaction même.

Je dois ajouter cependant que je ne considère pas que les régimes semblables à celui que ce règlement contient sont sur le même pied que les «règles générales» contestées dans l'arrêt McKinney. À mon avis, tout mécanisme qui cherche à tenir compte des différences particulières est préférable à celui qui écarte carrément toute possibilité en vertu de notions d'habileté fondées sur des idées préconçues et des préjugés. Il faut cependant souligner que le bien-fondé des régimes d'exception n'est pas pertinent à la question de savoir s'il y a ou non violation du par. 15(1). Les régimes d'exception comme celui que prévoit le règlement 5.04 sont des questions qui se prêtent à un examen fondé sur l'article premier de la Charte.

Quant à savoir si le règlement 5.04 a été appliqué d'une manière contraire à la Charte, je crois qu'il faut aussi répondre «oui». La preuve indique manifestement que le conseil d'administration a appliqué le règlement de manière discriminatoire. La Cour d'appel a conclu que le conseil a vu dans ces dispositions une politique de retraite obligatoire. Il avait l'habitude de mettre fin aux privilèges d'admission des médecins ayant atteint 65 ans sauf si, en plus d'être en bonne santé et de bien remplir leurs fonctions, ils possédaient une compétence «particulière». Manifestement, la façon dont le conseil appliquait le règlement était discriminatoire parce qu'elle perpétuait et renforçait le stéréotype déjà mentionné voulant que les travailleurs âgés soient incompétents.

I find that Regulation 5.04 violates s. 15(1) both in terms and in the manner in which those terms have been interpreted and applied.

III. Is the Hospital's Mandatory Retirement Policy Reasonable and Demonstrably Justifiable Under Section 1 of the Charter?

Section 1 of the Charter provides:

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

The factors to be considered by the Court in applying s. 1 were first set out in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103. The Oakes "test" was succinctly summarized by Dickson C.J. in R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 713, at p. 768, as follows:

> Two requirements must be satisfied to establish that a limit is reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. First, the legislative objective which the limitation is designed to promote must be of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a constitutional right. It must bear on a "pressing and substantial concern". Second, the means chosen to attain those objectives must be proportional or appropriate to the ends. The proportionality requirement, in turn, normally has three aspects: the limiting measures must be carefully designed, or rationally connected, to the objective; they must impair the right as little as possible; and their effects must not so severely trench on individual or group rights that the legislative objective, albeit important, is nevertheless outweighed by the abridgment of rights.

It is this test that must be applied in ascertaining whether the Hospital's mandatory retirement policy meets the requirements of s. 1 of the Charter.

1. Objectives

The Hospital cites two objectives which its policy of retiring physicians at age 65 is meant to serve. First, it maintains that it is crucial that the Je conclus que le règlement 5.04 enfreint le par. 15(1) tant par son libellé que par la façon dont il a été interprété et appliqué.

III. La politique de retraite obligatoire appliquée par l'hôpital appelant est-elle raisonnable et justifiable en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte?

L'article premier de la Charte est ainsi conçu:

1. La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés. Ils ne peuvent être restreints que par une règle de droit, dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

Les facteurs dont la Cour doit tenir compte dans l'application de l'article premier sont énoncés dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103. Le juge en chef Dickson a bien résumé le critère de l'arrêt Oakes dans l'arrêt R. c. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 R.C.S. 713, à la p. 768:

> Pour établir qu'une restriction est raisonnable et que sa justification peut se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique, il faut satisfaire à deux exigences. En premier lieu, l'objectif législatif que la restriction vise à promouvoir doit être suffisamment important pour justifier la suppression d'un droit garanti par la Constitution. Il doit se rapporter à des «préoccupations urgentes et réelles». En second lieu, les moyens choisis pour atteindre ces objectifs doivent être proportionnels ou appropriés à ces fins. La proportionnalité requise, à son tour, comporte normalement trois aspects: les mesures restrictives doivent être soigneusement conçues pour atteindre l'objectif en question, ou avoir un lien rationnel avec cet objectif; elles doivent être de nature à porter le moins possible atteinte au droit en question et leurs effets ne doivent pas empiéter sur les droits individuels ou collectifs au point que l'objectif législatif, si important soit-il, soit néanmoins supplanté par l'atteinte aux droits.

C'est ce critère qu'il faut appliquer pour déterminer si la politique de retraite obligatoire de l'hôpital appelant satisfait aux exigences de l'article premier de la Charte.

1. Les objectifs

L'hôpital appelant mentionne deux objectifs que sa politique de retraite obligatoire des médecins à 65 ans vise à atteindre. D'abord, l'hôpital soutient

Hospital, as an acute care and teaching hospital, provide the highest standard of modern medical care, education and research. The evidence establishes that the Vancouver General Hospital has developed as a highly specialized institution providing unique treatment services which other hospitals in the Province are unable to offer. It is a hospital of last resort, so to speak, for patients with specialized medical problems. I do not think it can be seriously questioned that this objective is of sufficient importance to override Charter rights and freedoms. It is an objective of "pressing and substantial" proportions and therefore meets the first branch of the Oakes test.

qu'il est essentiel qu'à titre d'hôpital d'enseignement et de soins de courte durée, les soins médicaux, la formation et la recherche qu'il dispense répondent aux normes contemporaines les plus élevées. La preuve démontre que le Vancouver General Hospital est devenu un établissement hautement spécialisé qui dispense des traitements uniques que les autres hôpitaux de la province ne peuvent offrir. C'est un hôpital de dernier recours, dans un certain sens, pour les patients ayant des problèmes médicaux particuliers. Je ne crois pas qu'on puisse sérieusement contester que cet objectif a suffisamment d'importance pour l'emporter sur les droits et libertés garantis par la Charte. C'est donc un objectif assez «urgent et réel» pour satisfaire à la première partie du critère de l'arrêt Oakes.

The Hospital also suggests that another objective of Regulation 5.04 is the promotion of opportunities for other (younger) physicians to practise medicine. The appellant argues that the Hospital can only accommodate a fixed number of medical personnel. Accordingly, if senior physicians are permitted to retain their admitting privileges, opportunities will as a necessary consequence be denied to younger physicians. In McKinney a similar argument was raised respecting the reduction of employment opportunities for younger academics. As in that case, my colleague La Forest J. has accepted that the Hospital is a "closed system" and therefore that permitting senior physicians to continue their relationship with the Hospital will necessarily result in junior physicians being denied opportunities. The evidence in this case, however, does not support this. It was accepted by both the trial judge and the Court of Appeal that permitting the respondents to retain their hospital privileges would not prevent other physicians from gaining admitting privileges.

L'hôpital appelant mentionne aussi que le règlement 5.04 vise à offrir à d'autres médecins (plus jeunes) la possibilité d'exercer leur profession. En effet, l'hôpital appelant soutient qu'il ne peut recevoir qu'un nombre limité de médecins. Conséquemment, s'il permet aux médecins plus âgés de garder leurs privilèges d'admission, les médecins plus jeunes auront forcément moins de possibilités. Dans l'arrêt McKinney, on a invoqué un argument semblable au sujet de la diminution des possibilités d'emploi pour les professeurs plus jeunes. Comme dans cette affaire-là, mon collègue le juge La Forest a accepté l'argument que l'hôpital appelant constitue un «système fermé» et que s'il est permis aux médecins plus âgés de continuer à y exercer, il en résultera forcément moins de chances d'avancement pour les médecins plus jeunes. La preuve en l'espèce n'étaye toutefois pas cet argument. Le juge de première instance et la Cour d'appel ont conclu l'un et l'autre que permettre aux intimés de garder les privilèges que l'hôpital leur accorde n'empêcherait pas d'autres médecins d'avoir le privilège de faire admettre des patients.

This Court has recognized that in some situations evidence need not be led to prove government's assertion that there exists a pressing and substantial concern that must be addressed. Indeed, the gravity of a problem may be self-evident and the Court may simply take judicial notice of it. Where, however, a serious question is raised

Notre Cour a déjà reconnu que, dans certaines situations, il n'est pas nécessaire de présenter des éléments de preuve au soutien de l'affirmation du gouvernement qu'il existe une préoccupation «urgente et réelle». En effet, la gravité d'un problème peut être évidente et la Cour peut simplement en prendre connaissance d'office. Cependant, lorsas to whether a pressing concern as alleged in fact exists, it is incumbent on the party bearing the burden of proof under s. 1 to establish the pressing and substantial concern. In my view, where there is no evidence to support the allegation that a significant problem exists, the first branch of the Oakes test will not be met. The purpose behind this branch of the Oakes test is to ensure that constitutional rights and freedoms will only be sacrificed where it is reasonable and justifiable to do so. The concept of constitutional entrenchment requires that rights and freedoms be curtailed only in response to real and not illusory problems. In my view, therefore, this Court cannot, absent some form of proof, give effect to the Hospital's claim that its system is "closed". Consequently, it remains to be determined whether the infringement of the respondent physician's equality rights is proportional to the Hospital's aim of providing high quality health care.

2. Means

(a) Rational Connection

Is there a rational connection between the imposition of mandatory retirement and ensuring a high standard of medical care, education and research? The appellant Hospital argues that the infusion of young physicians carries with it the infusion of new discoveries and new ideas. It maintains that retiring senior physicians from and introducing junior physicians to the hospital system will upgrade the quality of medical service. I accept that there is a rational connection in this case between the objective sought to be achieved and the means adopted to achieve it. However, I wish to deal briefly with the implications of this conclusion.

First, it should be emphasized that the question whether a basis exists for treating groups in a discriminatory manner is not a concern of s. 15 but of s. 1. Section 15 deals with prejudice, disadvantage and stereotype regardless of its origin and s. 1 deals with its justification.

que l'existence de la préoccupation urgente invoquée suscite un doute sérieux, il incombe à la partie chargée du fardeau de la preuve en vertu de l'article premier d'établir qu'il existe bien une préoccupation urgente et réelle. À mon avis, quand il n'y a pas de preuve pour étayer l'allégation qu'il existe un problème important, le premier volet du critère de l'arrêt Oakes n'est pas respecté. L'objet de ce premier volet est d'assurer que les droits et libertés garantis par la Constitution ne seront sacrifiés que s'il est raisonnable et justifiable de le faire. La notion de la consécration des droits et libertés par la constitution exige que ceux-ci ne soient limités qu'en raison de problèmes réels et non illusoires. J'estime donc que notre Cour ne peut, sans aucune sorte de preuve, admettre la prétention de l'hôpital appelant qu'il constitue un système «fermé». En conséquence, il reste à déterminer s'il existe un lien de proportionnalité entre la violation des droits à l'égalité des médecins intimés et le but visé par l'hôpital de fournir des soins de haute qualité.

2. Les moyens

a) Le lien rationnel

Existe-t-il un lien rationnel entre l'imposition de la retraite obligatoire et la recherche de l'excellence en matière de formation, de recherche et de soins médicaux? L'hôpital appelant soutient que la présence de jeunes médecins implique l'apport de nouvelles découvertes et de nouvelles idées. Il soutient que la mise à la retraite des médecins âgés et la venue de jeunes médecins à l'hôpital aura pour effet d'améliorer la qualité des soins médicaux. Je reconnais qu'il y a un lien rationnel en l'espèce entre l'objectif poursuivi et les moyens adoptés pour le réaliser. Cependant, je veux expliquer brièvement les conséquences de cette conclusion.

D'abord, il faut souligner que la question de savoir s'il existe un motif de traiter des groupes de façon discriminatoire ne relève pas de l'art. 15, mais de l'article premier. L'article 15 porte sur les préjugés, les désavantages et les stéréotypes quelle que soit leur origine et l'article premier porte sur leur justification.

I believe also that the question whether the foundations of prejudice are based upon observable, reliable facts is one which this Court should approach in the most cautious manner. Throughout these appeals the parties have grappled with the question of the extent to which age and ability correlate. It is, in my view, a matter of common knowledge that with the aging process comes some measure of change in ability, although, of course, the nature and extent of that change varies from individual to individual. Even although I am prepared to accept that the rational connection branch of the Oakes test has been met in this case, I would not wish to be understood as suggesting that all infringements of equality have some basis in fact and that a rational connection between various objectives and stereotypes will in all cases be established. Indeed, this Court will doubtless be obliged in future to address whether other forms of discrimination based on different grounds have any foundation in biology or whether they are premised instead on misplaced notions about the nature and abilities of various groups. This is a most delicate determination. History unfortunately demonstrates how easily such misperceptions can be accepted with untold costs. It cannot be overemphasized, in my opinion, that this matter is fraught with difficulty and that the utmost care has to be taken in dealing with such questions.

Je crois aussi que notre Cour doit agir avec beaucoup de prudence quand il s'agit de savoir si le fondement d'une idée préconçue s'appuie sur des faits observables et exacts. Tout au long de ces pourvois, les parties se sont interrogées sur la mesure dans laquelle l'âge et l'habileté sont liés. Il est, d'après moi, généralement reconnu que le vieillissement amène un certain changement des capacités même si, il va de soi, la nature et l'étendue du changement varient d'une personne à l'autre. Même si je suis prête à reconnaître que l'exigence du critère de l'arrêt Oakes relative au lien rationnel est respectée en l'espèce, je ne veux pas que l'on comprenne que toutes les atteintes à l'égalité ont quelque fondement dans des faits et qu'un lien rationnel entre divers objectifs et idées préconçues sera prouvé dans tous les cas. Certes, notre Cour sera sans doute appelée plus tard à juger si d'autres formes de discrimination appuyées sur d'autres motifs ont un fondement biologique ou si elles sont plutôt fondées sur de fausses notions sur la nature et l'habilité de différents groupes. C'est une des questions les plus délicates à déterminer. L'histoire nous enseigne à quel point ces fausses idées peuvent être dommageables. On ne saurait trop souligner, selon moi, que ces sujets sont difficiles et qu'il faut les aborder avec une extrême prudence.

For example, close scrutiny of the rational connection being advanced may take place in at least two ways. Vigilance should be exercised in examining the nature of the correlation advanced. It seems to me that in this case the deleterious effects of age have been painted with too broad a brush. The Hospital argues that with increasing age comes a decrease in all skills associated with the practice of medicine. This cannot be so. Diagnostic ability, for example, may actually increase with years in practice. Similarly, the Court should carefully scrutinize assertions regarding the extent of the relationship between the grounds of the infringement and its justification. For example, in this case a line has been drawn by the appellant Hospital at age 65. It seems to me that different considerations might prevail had the retirement age been set at 80.

Ainsi, un examen minutieux du lien rationnel proposé peut se faire d'au moins deux façons. Il faut être prudent au moment d'examiner le lien proposé. Il me semble qu'en l'espèce on a dépeint à trop grands traits les effets néfastes du vieillissement. L'hôpital appelant soutient que le vieillissement emporte une diminution de toutes les capacités liées à l'exercice de la médecine. Ce ne peut pas être le cas. Par exemple, l'habilité d'établir un diagnostic peut de fait augmenter avec l'expérience. De même, la Cour doit-elle examiner de façon critique les prétentions au sujet de la solidité du lien entre les motifs de l'atteinte aux libertés et sa justification. En l'espèce, par exemple, l'hôpital appelant a établi une limite fixe à l'âge de 65 ans. Il me semble qu'il aurait fallu tenir compte d'autres facteurs si on avait fixé l'âge de la retraite à 80 ans.

All of this is merely to say that the role the rational connection branch of the proportionality test is meant to serve should not be forgotten. Its purpose is to engage the Court in an examination of whether government is proceeding logically in the pursuit of its aims. Technically, all the rational connection branch of s. 1 requires is a demonstration that there is some logical connection, however slight, between the objective and the means by which it is sought to be achieved. When, however, the inquiry turns to other elements of the Oakes test, the quality and extent of the connection becomes crucial.

In this case, as I have indicated, I am prepared to conclude that there does exist a rational connection between the desire to provide top quality medical care and the decision to have such care provided substantially by younger members of the medical profession. The real issue, in my view, is whether reliance upon these generalized notions of ability is justifiable. I turn then to consider whether the means chosen by the Hospital impairs the rights of the respondent doctors as little as possible.

(b) Minimal Impairment

In Edwards Books, supra, and Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, this Court recognized that a strict application of the minimal impairment branch of the Oakes test is not always appropriate. My colleague La Forest J. has characterized the issue at stake in this appeal as falling within the class of exceptional cases envisioned in Edwards Books and Irwin Toy and concluded therefore that the more generous standard of review contemplated by those decisions should apply. In effect, he sees the question which this Court must address as the efficacy of the policy of mandatory retirement in a closed system with limited resources. For the reasons I gave in McKinney I must respectfully disagree with him that this is an appropriate case for the relaxation of the minimal impairment test.

Tout ceci vise seulement à rappeler qu'il ne faut pas perdre de vue le rôle que doit jouer le volet du lien rationnel que comprend le critère de la proportionnalité. Son rôle consiste à inviter la Cour à déterminer si le gouvernement procède de façon logique dans la poursuite du but qu'il vise. Techniquement, tout ce qu'exige la partie de l'article premier quant au lien rationnel, c'est la démonstration d'un lien logique quelconque, si petit soit-il, entre l'objectif poursuivi et les moyens employés pour le réaliser. Cependant, au moment d'examiner les autres éléments du critère de l'arrêt Oakes, la vigueur et l'étendue du lien deviennent déterminants.

En l'espèce, comme je l'ai déjà mentionné, je suis prête à conclure qu'il existe un lien rationnel entre l'intention de fournir des soins médicaux de haute qualité et la décision de faire prodiguer ces soins en grande partie par des médecins plus jeunes. La vrai question en litige est, selon moi, de savoir si le recours à ces notions générales relatives aux capacités est fondé. Je me demanderai donc si le moyen choisi par l'hôpital appelant porte atteinte le moins possible aux droits des médecins intimés.

b) L'atteinte minimale

Dans les arrêts Edwards Books, précité, et Irwin Toy Ltd. c. Québec (Procureur général), [1989] 1 R.C.S. 927, notre Cour a reconnu qu'il ne convient pas toujours d'appliquer strictement la partie du critère de l'arrêt Oakes qui porte sur l'atteinte minimale. Mon collègue, le juge La Forest, a estimé que la question en litige dans les présents pourvois appartient à la catégorie des cas d'exception dont parlent les arrêts Edwards Books et Irwin Toy, et il a donc conclu qu'il faut appliquer la norme d'examen plus généreuse énoncée dans ces arrêts. En somme, il considère que la question que notre Cour doit résoudre est celle qui porte sur l'efficacité d'une politique de retraite obligatoire dans un système fermé disposant de ressources limitées. Pour les motifs que j'ai exposés dans l'arrêt McKinney, je ne saurais partager son avis qu'il y a lieu, en l'espèce, d'assouplir le critère de l'atteinte minimale.

As I have already noted, it has not been established that the Hospital is in fact a "closed system". On the contrary, the evidence demonstrated that permitting the respondent physicians to retain their admitting privileges would have absolutely no effect on the availability of practice opportunities for doctors embarking upon their careers. That being the case, I see no reason in fact or in law for applying a deferential standard of review. For the same reasons as I expressed in McKinney, I hasten to add that, even if it were accepted in principle that the Irwin Toy standard should apply, the record simply does not reveal any evidentiary basis for deviating from Oakes. No suggestion has been made that positions freed up through retirement have been filled by younger physicians who would otherwise have experienced limited employment opportunities due to senior physicians being permitted to practise their profession beyond age 65. In my opinion, therefore, the minimal impairment test as articulated in Oakes should apply.

Comme je l'ai déjà fait remarquer, on n'a pas fait la preuve que l'hôpital appelant constitue en réalité un «système fermé». Au contraire, la preuve indique que permettre aux médecins intimés de garder leur privilège d'admission n'aurait aucun effet sur les possibilités d'exercice de la médecine qui s'offrent aux médecins qui commencent leur carrière. Puisqu'il en est ainsi, je ne vois pas de motif de fait ou de droit d'appliquer un critère d'examen déférentiel. Pour les mêmes motifs que j'ai exprimés dans l'arrêt McKinney, je me hâte d'ajouter que, même si l'on acceptait le principe que le critère de l'arrêt Irwin Toy devrait s'appliquer, le dossier ne comporte aucun élément de preuve qui permettrait de s'écarter du critère de l'arrêt Oakes. On n'a pas soutenu que les postes libérés par les mises à la retraite ont été occupés par des médecins plus jeunes qui autrement n'auraient pas eu les mêmes chances d'exercer leur profession, étant donné que des médecins plus âgés étaient autorisés à exercer leur profession au-delà de l'âge de 65 ans. Donc, à mon avis, le critère de l'atteinte minimale énoncé dans l'arrêt Oakes doit s'appliquer.

The issue therefore comes down to this: Even accepting that there is some correlation between age and ability (a correlation which has, in my view, been overstated by the Hospital), is there not some other way of achieving the objective of high quality medical care which recognizes and takes account of the abilities of individual doctors aged 65 and over? I think the answer to this question is plainly "yes".

La question en litige se ramène donc à ceci: même si l'on reconnaît qu'il existe un certain lien entre l'âge et les capacités (un lien sur lequel l'hôpital appelant a, selon moi, trop insisté), n'y a-t-il pas quelque autre moyen de fournir, tel que souhaité, des soins médicaux de haute qualité qui permettrait de reconnaître et de prendre en considération les capacités des médecins âgés de 65 ans et plus? Je crois que la réponse à cette question est manifestement «oui».

In McKinney the appellant professors suggested alternative ways of dealing with the objective of faculty renewal. The situation in these appeals is somewhat different in that the doctors are not suggesting that the Hospital attempt some new, untried mechanism for ensuring that the Hospital meet its goal of providing high quality medical care. Instead, they are merely asking that the Hospital revert back to its former way of implementing its objectives. Before Regulation 5.04 was enacted the Hospital dealt with the issue of physician competency in the following manner. Admitting privileges, once granted, were renewed on an

Dans l'arrêt McKinney, les professeurs appelants ont proposé des moyens subsidiaires d'arriver au renouvellement du corps enseignant. La situation dans les présents pourvois est un peu différente parce que les médecins n'ont pas proposé que l'hôpital appelant ait recours à un nouveau mécanisme non éprouvé pour fournir comme il le souhaite des soins médicaux de haute qualité. Il ont plutôt demandé que l'hôpital appelant revienne à son ancienne méthode de réaliser son objectif. Avant l'adoption du règlement 5.04, l'hôpital appelant réglait ainsi la question relative aux capacités des médecins. Les privilèges d'admission des annual basis. Renewal was assured so long as the Board was satisfied that the staff member was in good health and had the ability to continue performing safely and competently. In addition, internal auditing procedures were in place under which Department Heads had responsibility for ensuring the competency of the staff. This practice, which applied to physicians of all ages, was changed in 1984 when the Minister approved Regulation 5.04.

Why did the Hospital change this practice of treating the competency of all doctors on the same footing? It would appear that the primary reason for the change was that it was administratively convenient to remove incompetent physicians through the mechanism of mandatory retirement rather than staging annual performance reviews as had previously been done. There is no evidence that the former practice had been unsatisfactory in terms of "weeding out" incompetent doctors.

This Court has established that administrative convenience is not an adequate reason for sacrificing Charter rights and freedoms. In Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 177, the federal government had adopted a procedure respecting immigration claims which violated s. 7 of the Charter and cited administrative convenience as the reason. At pages 218-19 of my reasons I stated:

> Certainly the guarantees of the Charter would be illusory if they could be ignored because it was administratively convenient to do so. No doubt considerable time and money can be saved by adopting administrative procedures which ignore the principles of fundamental justice but such an argument, in my view, misses the point of the exercise under s. 1. The principles of natural justice and procedural fairness which have long been espoused by our courts, and the constitutional entrenchment of the principles of fundamental justice in s. 7, implicitly recognize that a balance of administrative convenience does not override the need to adhere to these principles.

patients, une fois accordés, étaient renouvelables chaque année. Le renouvellement avait lieu à la condition que le conseil soit convaincu que l'intéressé était en bon état de santé et qu'il avait la capacité de continuer de remplir ses fonctions avec prudence et compétence. De plus, il existait des procédures de vérification interne qui rendaient les chefs des départements responsables du contrôle de la compétence du personnel. Cette méthode, qui s'appliquait aux médecins de tous âges a été modifiée en 1984 par l'approbation du règlement 5.04 par le ministre.

Pourquoi l'hôpital appelant a-t-il modifié sa méthode de traiter les capacités de tous les médecins de la même façon? Il semblerait que la raison principale du changement tient à la commodité administrative qu'il y à écarter les médecins incompétents par le mécanisme de la retraite obligatoire plutôt qu'en organisant des examens annuels du rendement comme on le faisait auparavant. Il n'y a pas d'élément de preuve indiquant que la pratique antérieure n'ait pas donné satisfaction lorsqu'il s'agissait d'éliminer les médecins incompétents.

Notre Cour a statué que la commodité administrative n'est pas un motif valable de supprimer des droits et libertés garantis par la Charte. Dans l'affaire Singh c. Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 177, le gouvernement fédéral avait suivi une procédure applicable aux demandes d'immigration qui violait l'art. 7 de la Charte et il a invoqué la commodité administrative comme justification. J'ai dit, aux pp. 218 et 219 de mes motifs:

> Les garanties de la Charte seraient certainement illusoires s'il était possible de les ignorer pour des motifs de commodité administrative. Il est sans doute possible d'épargner beaucoup de temps et d'argent en adoptant une procédure administrative qui ne tient pas compte des principes de justice fondamentale, mais un tel argument, à mon avis, passe à côté de l'objet de l'art. 1. Les principes de justice naturelle et d'équité en matière de procédure que nos tribunaux ont adoptés depuis longtemps et l'enchâssement constitutionnel des principes de justice fondamentale à l'art. 7 comportent la reconnaissance implicite que la prépondérance des motifs de commodité administrative ne l'emporte pas sur la nécessité d'adhérer à ces principes.

In my opinion, these comments apply with equal force to the guarantee of equality embodied in s. 15(1). It seems to me that it will always be more convenient from an administrative point of view to treat disadvantaged groups in society as an indistinguishable mass rather than to determine individual merit. But s. 15(1) demands otherwise. In discrimination claims of the kind involved here, if the guarantee of equality is to mean anything, it must at least mean this: that wherever possible an attempt be made to break free of the apathy of stereotyping and that we make a sincere effort to treat all individuals, whatever their colour, race, sex or age, as individuals deserving of recognition on the basis of their unique talents and abilities. Respect for the dignity of every member of society demands no less.

À mon avis, ces commentaires s'appliquent avec autant de vigueur aux libertés garanties en vertu du par. 15(1). Il me semble qu'il sera toujours plus commode du point de vue administratif de traiter les groupes défavorisés de la société de façon impersonnelle plutôt que de se fonder sur le mérite individuel. Le paragraphe 15(1) exige toutefois que l'on procède autrement. Dans les affaires de discrimination du genre de celles de l'espèce, si la garantie d'égalité doit avoir un sens, il faut au moins qu'elle signifie ceci: que chaque fois que cela est possible, on doit essayer de renoncer aux idées préconçues trop faciles et faire l'effort sincère de traiter les particuliers, quels que soient leur couleur, leur race, leur sexe ou leur âge, comme des individus qui méritent d'être jugés selon leurs talents et leurs capacités propres. Le respect de la dignité de chaque personne dans la société n'en exige pas moins.

The comments made in Singh also have an important bearing on the issue of minimal impairment. Under this branch of the Oakes test the question is whether other means are available to achieve the objective which impinge upon Charter rights less severely. Here, the past practice of the appellant Hospital both served its objective and respected the Constitution. The high calibre of the medical staff was ensured by subjecting all physicians to regular review of their performance. And the equality rights of the respondents were ensured by not subjecting them to the arbitrary forces of prejudice. It seems to me indisputable that where the sole reason for a change from a constitutionally sound to a constitutionally unsound system is administrative convenience, the minimal impairment branch of the proportionality test cannot be satisfied.

Les commentaires de l'arrêt Singh ont aussi une grande portée sur le sujet de l'atteinte minimale. En vertu de cette partie du critère de l'arrêt Oakes, il faut se demander s'il est possible de réaliser le même objectif par des moyens moins contraires à la Charte. En l'espèce, l'ancienne pratique suivie par l'hôpital appelant remplissait cette condition et respectait la constitution. En assujettissant tous les médecins à un examen périodique de leur rendement, on s'assurait de leur haute compétence et on respectait leurs droits à l'égalité en ne les soumettant pas aux forces arbitraires des préjugés. Il me semble incontestable que lorsque le seul motif pour substituer une méthode inconstitutionnelle à une méthode constitutionnelle est la commodité administrative, il ne saurait y avoir respect de la condition d'atteinte minimale des droits visés exposée au critère de la proportionnalité.

I should note that these comments are in no way meant to suggest that the only constitutionally permissible method of dealing with the issue of incompetency is by way of annual reviews of performance. It must be emphasized that had Regulation 5.04 been phrased and interpreted as establishing 65 as the presumptive age of retirement but allowing those aged 65 and over to retain their hospital privileges so long as they were found to be healthy and capable, I would think that an arguable case could be made that the minimal impairment test was met. The protection afforded by s. 15(1) is not a guarantee of the right to continue in employment during the later years of life irrespective of ability. What s. 15(1) guarantees is the right not to be ousted from employment on the basis of stereotypical assumptions about one's capabilities to perform in a satisfactory way. In other words, in a context such as this, s. 15(1) does not guarantee the right to work but the right to work absent discrimination. Accordingly, had Regulation 5.04 in word and in effect provided for a bona fide exemption scheme contemplating the continued employment of those able and willing to work, one would be hard pressed to say that the provision was not reasonable and demonstrably justifiable.

Je veux ajouter que ces commentaires ne signifient nullement que la seule méthode constitutionnelle de régler la question de l'incompétence réside dans l'examen annuel du rendement. Il faut souligner que si le règlement 5.04 avait été rédigé et interprété de façon à faire de l'âge de 65 ans l'âge ordinaire de la retraite, mais à laisser à ceux qui avaient atteint cet âge le privilège de faire admettre des patients aussi longtemps qu'ils conservaient

leur santé et leurs capacités, je crois qu'on aurait pu soutenir que la condition relative à l'atteinte minimale des droits exposée au critère susmentionné était respectée. Le paragraphe 15(1) ne garantit pas notre droit de continuer de travailler à un âge avancé sans égard à notre aptitude à le faire. Ce que le par. 15(1) garantit, c'est notre droit de ne pas être privés de notre travail en vertu de présomptions fondées sur des préjugés relatifs à notre capacité de donner un bon rendement. En d'autres termes, dans un contexte semblable à celui de l'espèce, le par. 15(1) ne garantit pas le droit de travailler, mais celui de travailler sans faire l'objet de discrimination. En conséquence, si le règlement 5.04 avait comporté dans son texte et son application un régime légitime d'exception qui aurait permis à ceux qui étaient encore capables de travailler, de continuer à le faire s'ils le souhaitaient, il aurait été difficile d'affirmer que la disposition n'était pas raisonnable et susceptible de justification.

In conclusion I find that the Regulation by its terms does not meet the requirement that it impair the rights of those adversely affected by it as little as possible. I find also that the Regulation has been administered in a manner which violates s. 15(1) of the Charter. It is not saved by s. 1.

En conséquence, je conclus que le règlement, comme il est rédigé, ne satisfait pas à la condition selon laquelle il doit être porté atteinte le moins possible aux droits de ceux qui en subissent les effets. Je conclus aussi que le règlement a été appliqué d'une façon qui viole le par. 15(1) de la Charte. Il n'est pas justifié en vertu de l'article premier.

IV. Disposition

I would dismiss the Hospital's appeal with costs.

Addressing the relief sought by the respondents in their statement of claim, I would grant the respondents a declaration that Regulation 5.04, by its terms and in the manner of its application, is contrary to s. 15(1) of the Charter and is accordingly of no force or effect. I would also grant them a declaration that the decisions of the appellants made pursuant to the Regulation terminating the admitting privileges of the respondents are null and void. I would direct the Vancouver General Hospital to reinstate the hospital admitting privileges of the respondents.

IV. Dispositif

Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi de l'hôpital avec dépens.

Quant au redressement recherché par les intimés dans leur déclaration, je suis d'avis de rendre un jugement déclarant que le règlement 5.04 est contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte dans ses dispositions et son application et qu'il est par conséquent inopérant. Je suis également d'avis de rendre jugement déclarant que les décisions des appelants, prises en vertu du règlement, de mettre fin aux privilèges accordés aux intimés d'admettre des patients sont nulles. Je suis d'avis d'enjoindre au Vancouver General Hospital de rétablir les privilèges hospitaliers des intimés d'admettre des patients.

I would answer the constitutional questions posed by Chief Justice Dickson as follows:

1. Do the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms apply to the actions of the Vancouver General Hospital in establishing and administering Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations?

   Yes.

2. If the answer to question 1 is yes, is Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations contrary to s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

   Yes.

3. If the answer to question 1 is yes, was the administration of Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations by the Vancouver General Hospital contrary to s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

   Yes.

4. If the answer to either questions 2 or 3 is yes, is Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations or the manner of its administration by the Vancouver General Hospital nevertheless justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

   No.

L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ J. (dissenting)—There is one principal issue in this case. That is whether Regulation 5.04, which was passed by the Trustees of the Hospital and approved by the Minister of Health according to the Vancouver General Hospital Act, S.B.C. 1970, c. 55, s. 6, is constitutional. The Regulation reads:

5.04 Retirement: Members of the Staff shall be expected to retire at the end of the appointment year in which they pass their 65th birthday. Members of the Staff who wish to defer their retirement may make special application to the Board. The Board shall request the Medical Advisory Committee for a recommendation in each such case. The Medical Advisory Committee shall, in making its recommendation, consider the report of a personal interview which shall take place between the applicant and the Department Head concerned which shall include a review of the health and continuing performance of the applicant.

Je suis d'avis de répondre comme suit aux questions constitutionnelles formulées par le juge en chef Dickson:

1. Les dispositions de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés s'appliquent-elles aux actions du Vancouver General Hospital relativement à la rédaction et à la mise en œuvre du règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations?

   Oui.

2. Si la réponse à la question 1 est affirmative, le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations est-il contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

   Oui.

3. Si la réponse à la question 1 est affirmative, l'application du règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations par le Vancouver General Hospital est-elle contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

   Oui.

4. Si la réponse aux questions 2 ou 3 est affirmative, le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations ou la façon dont il est appliqué par le Vancouver General Hospital sont-ils néanmoins justifiés en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

   Non.

Les motifs suivants ont été rendus par

LE JUGE L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ (dissidente)—Ce pourvoi soulève la principale question de déterminer si le règlement 5.04, adopté par les administrateurs de l'hôpital et approuvé par le ministre de la Santé conformément à la Vancouver General Hospital Act, S.B.C. 1970, ch. 55, art. 6, est constitutionnel. Le règlement se lit ainsi:

[TRADUCTION] 5.04 La retraite: Les membres du personnel sont censés prendre leur retraite à la fin de l'année d'exercice au cours de laquelle ils atteignent 65 ans. Les membres du personnel qui veulent reporter leur mise à la retraite peuvent présenter une demande spéciale au conseil d'administration, qui demande la recommandation du «conseil consultatif médical» dans chaque cas. Avant de faire sa recommandation, le conseil consultatif médical tient compte du rapport d'une entrevue personnelle entre le requérant et le chef de département concerné, y compris le rapport de l'état de santé et du rendement continu du requérant.

Three questions need to be answered. First, does Vancouver General Hospital fall under "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and is Regulation 5.04 "law" as understood in s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982? Second, if so, does Regulation 5.04 violate s. 15(1) of the Charter? Third, in the affirmative, can the Regulation be saved by s. 1 of the Charter?

I agree with my colleague Madame Justice Wilson that under the broad test she has developed in McKinney v. University of Guelph, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 229, Vancouver General Hospital is acting in this case as "government" for s. 32 of the Charter. Both historically and (even more so today) in functional terms, hospitals in Canada are an "arm of government" and perform a government function. My only hesitation perhaps stems from the fact that the Hospital's Board of Governors enjoys a certain independence in formulating policies, including the policy which presided over Regulation 5.04. However, even though members of the Board are appointed by the government, I see no difference between this situation and that of government departments setting up their own agenda and policies, subject only to general guidelines established by the legislature. This situation is, in my view, totally different from that of universities. In the case of the universities, as demonstrated in McKinney, supra, government involvement is primarily limited to funding. I do not wish to suggest, however, that all actions of every hospital would attract review of the Charter under s. 32. There may be some instances where a hospital would not constitute "government". Nevertheless, in this case the Hospital is "government" for the purposes of s. 32.

Notwithstanding his conclusion that the appellants are not "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter, my colleague Justice La Forest goes on to discuss the constitutionality of Regula-

Trois questions se posent ici. Premièrement, le Vancouver General Hospital fait-il partie du «gouvernement» aux fins de l'art. 32 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et le règlement 5.04 constitue-t-il une «règle de droit» au sens de l'art. 52 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982? Deuxièmement, dans l'affirmative, le règlement 5.04 viole-t-il le par. 15(1) de la Charte? Troisièmement, dans l'affirmative, le règlement peut-il se justifier en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte?

Je partage l'opinion de ma collègue le juge Wilson qu'en raison du test large qu'elle a formulé dans l'arrêt McKinney c. Université de Guelph, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 229, le Vancouver General Hospital agit, dans la présente instance, en tant que «gouvernement» au sens de l'art. 32 de la Charte. Tant sur le plan historique que (encore plus aujourd'hui) sur le plan fonctionnel, les hôpitaux au Canada sont une «branche du gouvernement» et exercent une fonction gouvernementale. Ma seule hésitation découle peut-être du fait que le conseil d'administration de l'hôpital bénéficie d'une certaine indépendance dans la formulation de ses politiques, y compris celle à l'origine du règlement 5.04. Cependant, même si les membres du conseil d'administration sont nommés par le gouvernement, je ne vois aucune différence entre cette situation et celle des ministères du gouvernement qui établissent leur propre programme et formulent leurs politiques, sous réserve des seules directives générales établies par le législateur. J'estime que cette situation est à tout à fait différente de celle des universités. Dans le cas des universités, comme il ressort de l'arrêt McKinney, précité, la participation du gouvernement est essentiellement restreinte au financement. Je ne voudrais cependant pas laisser entendre que toutes les actions de tous les hôpitaux puissent être susceptibles d'examen en vertu de l'art. 32 de la Charte. Il peut y avoir des circonstances où un hôpital ne serait pas considéré comme «gouvernement». Quoi qu'il en soit, en l'espèce, l'hôpital fait partie du «gouvernement» aux fins de l'art. 32.

Malgré sa conclusion que les appelants ne font pas partie du «gouvernement» aux fins de l'art. 32 de la Charte, mon collègue le juge La Forest n'en examine pas moins la constitutionnalité du règletion 5.04 under s. 15(1) of the Charter. For the purposes of my discussion of these topics, I agree with him, for the reasons that he gives, that Regulation 5.04 is "law" for the purposes of s. 15 of the Charter. I also agree with my colleague that Regulation 5.04 clearly infringes s. 15(1) of the Charter because it discriminates by reason of age, a prohibited ground of discrimination enumerated in s. 15(1).

Where I disagree with my colleague La Forest J., however, and agree in the result with my colleague Wilson J., is on the question of whether this Regulation is a reasonable limit in a free and democratic society as provided in s. 1 of the Charter and under the analysis enunciated in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103. In my opinion (and I differ in part from Wilson J.'s reasoning), Regulation 5.04 does not satisfy the requirements of Oakes, mainly because the objectives sought by the Regulation are not rationally connected to the means chosen to achieve those ends and, in addition, the minimal impairment test has not been respected.

Section 1 of the Charter

The approach recognized by this Court under s. 1 is well known and need not be repeated in detail here. It should be clear that the balancing which is undertaken under this section of the Charter involves the particular law in question, and the severity of the violation of the right or freedom under the application of that law. We look to whether the objective of the law is sufficiently important to warrant overriding a protected right, and whether the means used in the violation are appropriate in view of the right breached.

My colleague La Forest J. undertakes an analysis comparable to that in McKinney in assessing whether the hospital's Regulation and policy are reasonable limits for the purposes of s. 1. One proposed objective of Regulation 5.04 and its attendant policy is competence. La Forest J. states at p. 522:

ment 5.04 au regard du par. 15(1) de la Charte. Pour les fins de mon analyse de ces questions, je partage son avis, pour les motifs qu'il donne, que le règlement 5.04 est une «loi» aux fins de l'art. 15 de la Charte. Je partage également son avis que le règlement 5.04 contrevient clairement au par. 15(1) de la Charte parce qu'il établit une discrimination fondée sur l'âge, un motif prohibé de discrimination énuméré au par. 15(1).

Là où je suis en désaccord avec mon collègue le juge La Forest et où je souscris à la conclusion de ma collègue le juge Wilson, c'est sur la question de savoir si ce règlement constitue une limite raisonnable dans une société libre et démocratique en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte et en vertu du test formulé dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103. À mon avis, (et je ne partage pas ici entièrement le raisonnement du juge Wilson) le règlement 5.04 ne satisfait pas aux exigences de l'arrêt Oakes, et ce, principalement parce que les objectifs visés par le règlement n'ont pas de lien rationnel avec les mesures choisies pour y parvenir et, en outre, parce que le critère de l'atteinte minimale n'a pas été respecté.

La méthode retenue par notre Cour en vertu de l'article premier est bien connue et il n'est pas nécessaire d'y référer ici en détail. Il devrait être clair que l'exercice qui doit être entrepris en vertu de cette disposition de la Charte vise à soupeser la loi particulière en jeu au regard de la gravité de la violation du droit ou de la liberté résultant de l'application de cette loi particulière. Nous devons déterminer si l'objectif de la loi est suffisamment important pour justifier la suppression d'un droit protégé et si les moyens utilisés à cette fin sont appropriés compte tenu du droit qui est violé.

Mon collègue le juge La Forest entreprend une analyse comparable à celle de l'arrêt McKinney pour déterminer si le règlement et la politique de l'hôpital constituent des limites raisonnables aux fins de l'article premier. L'un des objectifs que visent le règlement 5.04 et la politique qui le sous-tend est la compétence. Le juge La Forest affirme, à la p. 522:

Just as those policies [in McKinney] were directed toward the achievement of excellence in the universities' pursuit of higher learning, Regulation 5.04 and its attendant policy were intended to maintain and enhance the quality of medical care the Vancouver General is capable of providing.

In addition to this concern over "quality", there is mention of the teaching and research functions carried out at the hospital. My colleague Wilson J. has found another possible objective, that of promoting opportunities for younger physicians to practise medicine. I agree with her that there is no evidence to suggest that the Hospital is a "closed system", and therefore this objective is not sufficiently pressing to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right. Unlike Wilson J. however, I also question the attempt to justify the violation of the respondents' rights on the principal objective of competence.

One cannot oppose a hospital's efforts to maintain high levels of competence among its staff, and in few areas can this objective be seen as so important. When knowledge and skill are fundamental in some cases to the survival of a patient, we applaud high standards of competence in our hospitals. The question is, however, whether this is what is addressed by Regulation 5.04.

In McKinney, I expressed the view that forcing the end of a career based on age alone does not pass muster under the Charter, as age is surely not determinative of capacity or competence. One is no less competent the day after one's 65th birthday, than the day before. Fundamentally it is a question of personal dignity and fairness. I concluded also that the potential negative consequences of stopping the mandatory retirement practice were outweighed by the clear positive aspects of allowing perfectly competent persons who happen to be over 65, to continue in their positions. The same concerns can be raised in this case. Medical practitioners do not become incompetent at a given age. One falls below acceptable levels of proficiency through inattention to medical advances and, inter alia, inade-

Tout comme ces politiques [dans l'arrêt McKinney] faisaient partie de la recherche de l'excellence dans les universités en matière de haut savoir, le règlement 5.04 et la politique qui s'y rattache visaient à maintenir et à promouvoir la qualité des soins médicaux que pouvait offrir le Vancouver General.

En plus de cette préoccupation concernant la «qualité», on mentionne également la formation et la recherche qui sont effectuées à l'hôpital. Ma collègue le juge Wilson voit un autre objectif possible, celui de favoriser les chances d'emploi des jeunes médecins qui veulent pratiquer la médecine. Je partage son avis que rien dans la preuve n'indique que l'hôpital est un «système fermé»; cet objectif n'est donc pas suffisamment pressant pour justifier la suppression d'un droit protégé par la Constitution. Cependant, contrairement au juge Wilson, je mets également en doute la tentative de justifier la violation des droits des intimés en invoquant l'objectif principal de la compétence.

On ne saurait s'opposer aux efforts d'un hôpital en vue de maintenir un haut niveau de compétence au sein de son personnel, et il est peu de domaines où cet objectif doit être considéré comme aussi important. Lorsque la connaissance et la compétence sont aussi essentielles, dans certains cas à la survie d'un patient, il y a lieu de se féliciter des hauts standards de compétence de nos hôpitaux. La question est toutefois de savoir si c'est là ce que vise le règlement 5.04.

Dans l'arrêt McKinney, j'ai estimé que forcer une personne à mettre fin à sa carrière simplement en raison de son âge ne saurait résister à un examen fondé sur la Charte puisque l'âge ne détermine certainement pas les capacités ou la compétence d'une personne. On ne devient pas moins compétent le lendemain de son 65e anniversaire que la veille de celui-ci. Fondamentalement, il s'agit d'une question de dignité personnelle et de justice. J'en suis également venue à la conclusion que les conséquences possiblement défavorables de la suppression de la retraite obligatoire devaient céder le pas devant les aspects clairement positifs qu'il y a à permettre à des personnes parfaitement compétentes âgées de plus de 65 ans de continuer à exercer leurs fonctions. Les mêmes préoccupations se soulèvent en l'espèce. Les médecins ne devien-quate physical stamina and health. But a forced retirement policy is arbitrary and simply sets a date for all this to occur. It confounds logic to suggest that these concerns simply occur on the passing of a given day in all cases.

In this particular case we are faced with a Regulation and policy which contain an element of ongoing testing for proficiency and competence. The health of the practitioner is considered. And a personal interview is held. At first glance, it seems that this is a more humane and rather effective way to manage the retirement of older medical employees. But on further examination and reflection, it becomes apparent that the treatment remains unfair and cannot justify the violations of the equality rights in question.

The Regulation and its attached policy serve to implement the Board of Trustees' retirement policy at an administrative level. No one will question efforts of the Board to maintain an efficient hospital. But the Regulation and its policy must be rationally connected to the objectives they seek to attain. In my view they are not so rationally connected. In his analysis my colleague La Forest J. applies his reasoning on this point in McKinney, at p. 524, to the effect that the policies allow for "regular staff renewal and the intellectual invigoration that flows from it". To keep on the "cutting edge" and to maintain research and teaching standards, the mandatory retirement of older workers attempts to infuse the hospitals with new people. My colleague states, at p. 525, that the ability of the hospital to remain up to date

> . . . depends on their ability to regularly make room on their staffs for younger doctors who, by virtue of their recent training, are fully conversant with the latest theories, discoveries and techniques. And since hospitals are, as much as universities, a "closed system with limited resources", this regular infusion with the vitality

nent pas incompétents à un âge donné. S'ils le deviennent, cela tient surtout au fait qu'ils ne se tiennent plus au courant des avances de la science médicale et, entre autres, que leur résistance physique et leur santé diminuent. Mais une politique de mise à la retraite obligatoire est arbitraire et ne fait qu'établir la date à laquelle cela est présumé se produire. C'est défier toute logique d'affirmer que dans tous les cas cet état de choses ne se produit que lors de l'avènement d'un jour précis.

Dans notre cas, nous faisons face à un règlement et une politique qui prévoient notamment l'évaluation permanente de l'efficacité et de la compétence. La santé du médecin est évaluée, et une entrevue personnelle est tenue. À première vue, cela semble être une façon plus humaine et plutôt efficace de procéder à la mise à la retraite des employés médicaux plus âgés. Mais si l'on pousse l'examen et la réflexion, on se rend compte que le traitement demeure injuste et ne peut justifier les violations des droits à l'égalité en question.

Le règlement et la politique qui s'y rattache visent à mettre en œuvre la politique de mise à la retraite du conseil d'administration sur le plan administratif. Personne ne peut douter des efforts du conseil afin de préserver l'efficacité de l'hôpital. Mais le règlement et sa politique d'application doivent avoir un lien rationnel avec les objectifs qu'ils visent à atteindre; j'estime que ce n'est pas le cas en l'espèce. Dans son analyse, mon collègue le juge La Forest applique à cet égard le raisonnement qu'il a tenu dans l'arrêt McKinney (à la p. 524), selon lequel les politiques permettent «le renouvellement régulier du personnel et l'apport intellectuel qui en découle». La retraite obligatoire des travailleurs plus âgés vise à faire profiter les hôpitaux de l'apport de nouveaux membres et, partant, à leur permettre de demeurer à «la fine pointe» et de maintenir les normes de recherche et de formation fixées. En effet, mon collègue affirme à la p. 525 que la capacité des hôpitaux de rester à la fine pointe

> . . . dépend [. . .] de leur capacité d'accueillir régulièrement au sein de leur personnel des jeunes médecins qui, en raison de leur formation récente, sont pleinement au courant des dernières théories, découvertes et techniques. Et comme les hôpitaux sont tout autant que les universités un «système fermé ayant des ressources limi-and perspective of the young can only be achieved by the corresponding departure of some of those already on staff.

Even accepting the "closed system" argument, I cannot see why "new people" must be infused into the hospital's system to keep it relevant. Like many professionals, medical practitioners are faced every day with the need for ongoing training and must make continual efforts to remain abreast of new developments in the technology and the research. Basic university education provides only the groundwork for a successful and competent career. Medical practitioners must always be sensitive to new theories and discoveries. The fact that a practitioner has a 40th, 50th or 60th birthday alters this no more than the 65th birthday. Competence is threatened by many things, but age is not necessarily one of them.

My colleague La Forest J. also maintains that the hospital as an institution is forced to choose between "competing social groups" and, as a result, special considerations apply in considering the "minimal impairment" aspect of the Oakes formula. I agree that the Trustees do make a choice between groups in this situation. However, I cannot agree that in the present case the allocation of resources is a fundamental issue. That is not the kind of choice being made pursuant to this policy. The choice as I see it is made between competent medical practitioners who happen to be over 65, and competent doctors under 65, usually entering the medical practice. I do not see these circumstances warranting special considerations. I would add that the Board, even if it were a lawmaking body for the purposes of the Charter, does not have all the requisite characteristics of a legislative body considering resource allocation, to warrant these special considerations being applied.

tées», cet apport régulier que fournissent les jeunes avec leur vitalité et leurs idées ne peut être réalisé que par le départ concomitant de certains des membres qui font déjà partie du personnel.

Même en acceptant l'argument du «système fermé», je ne vois pas pourquoi l'hôpital a besoin de l'apport de «nouveaux membres» pour demeurer à jour. Comme plusieurs professionnels, les médecins font face tous les jours à la nécessité d'une formation permanente et doivent continuellement faire des efforts pour se tenir au fait des nouveaux progrès en matière de technologie et de recherche. La formation universitaire ordinaire ne sert que de fondement à une carrière brillante et compétente. Les médecins doivent toujours être conscients des nouvelles théories et découvertes. Le fait qu'un médecin célèbre ses 40, 50 ou 60 ans ne modifie pas plus cet état de choses que l'arrivée de son 65e anniversaire. La compétence est menacée par plusieurs facteurs, mais l'âge n'en fait pas nécessairement partie.

Mon collègue le juge La Forest affirme également que l'hôpital, comme institution, est tenu de faire un choix entre «les revendications de groupes concurrents» et, par conséquent, des considérations particulières s'appliquent dans l'examen du critère de «l'atteinte minimale» selon l'arrêt Oakes. Je reconnais que, dans cette situation, les administrateurs font ce choix entre différents groupes. Cependant, je ne suis pas d'accord qu'en l'espèce la répartition des ressources soit une question fondamentale. Ce n'est pas ce genre de choix qui est fait en application de cette politique. À mon avis, le choix s'effectue entre des médecins compétents qui se trouvent à avoir plus de 65 ans, et des médecins compétents de moins de 65 ans, qui débutent habituellement dans la pratique médicale. Je ne crois pas que ces circonstances justifient l'application de considérations particulières. J'ajouterais que le conseil d'administration, même s'il s'agissait d'un organisme investi du pouvoir de légiférer aux fins de la Charte, ne possède pas toutes les caractéristiques requises d'un organisme législatif qui doit tenir compte de la répartition des ressources pour justifier l'application de ces considérations particulières.

The Regulation, the policy and the evidence should be considered together. The Regulation mandates retirement on reaching one's 65th birthday. The policy puts a further onus on the practitioner to show he or she has something unique to offer the Hospital. One must make special application to the Board to ask that retirement be deferred. The Medical Advisory Committee considers the report of the Department Head who has arranged a personal interview and an assessment of the health and performance of the individual practitioner. The Committee recommends to the Board.

Some of the evidence on examination for discovery of Mr. James B. Flett was admitted and read in at the trial. Mr. Flett is President of the Vancouver General Hospital. This evidence reveals that, even prior to the Regulation's being passed, the heads of the clinical departments of the Hospital were responsible for ensuring that each practitioner past "a certain age" continued to have the ability to perform safely and efficiently, prior to recommending to the Medical Advisory Board that the practitioner be reappointed. Practitioners are reappointed annually. This was one aspect of the Hospital's existing internal audits of competence, along with the health of the applicant. There was no suggestion that the standards were inadequate. The respondents, for their part, take no issue with the general standards applied by the Hospital and accepted at the hearing before this Court that closer scrutiny may be necessary of those practitioners in their later years of practice. Respondents argue however, and I agree, that the same standards should be applied to all practitioners in assessing competence. Different and more onerous standards for measuring competence for those over 65 are a grave intrusion into the right to be treated equally.

Another factor considered in the process under Regulation 5.04 is health. My colleague La Forest J. suggests (p. 563) that "deterioration" is an "undeniable characteristic of increasing age". There is no evidence before us to suggest that age 65 is a threshold age for physical deterioration, nor Le règlement, sa politique d'application et la preuve devraient être examinés comme un tout. Le règlement impose la retraite à l'âge de 65 ans. Sa politique d'application impose une obligation supplémentaire aux médecins, celle d'établir qu'ils ont quelque chose d'unique à offrir l'hôpital. Le report de la retraite doit faire l'objet d'une demande spéciale au conseil d'administration. Le conseil consultatif médical examine le rapport du chef de département qui s'est entretenu personnellement avec le médecin en cause et l'évaluation de la santé et du rendement de celui-ci. Le comité présente ses recommandations au conseil d'administration.

Une partie de l'examen au préalable de M. James B. Flett a été admise en preuve lors du procès. M. Flett est président du Vancouver General Hospital. Cette preuve révèle que, même avant l'adoption du Règlement, les chefs des départements cliniques de l'hôpital devaient s'assurer que chaque praticien ayant dépassé «un certain âge» continuait à avoir l'habileté requise pour pratiquer de façon sûre et efficace avant de recommander au conseil consultatif médical que le praticien soit renommé. Le renouvellement des privilèges des médecins se fait annuellement. C'était là l'un des aspects des vérifications internes de compétence de la part de l'hôpital, de même que la santé du médecin qui faisait application. Rien n'indique que les standards étaient inadéquats. De leur côté, les intimés ne contestent pas les normes générales appliquées par l'hôpital, et ils ont reconnu devant notre Cour qu'un examen plus attentif pourrait être nécessaire au cours des dernières années de pratique des médecins. Les intimés soutiennent cependant, et je partage leur avis, que les mêmes normes devraient être appliquées à tous les médecins dans l'évaluation de leur compétence. L'application de normes différentes et plus rigides dans l'examen de la compétence des médecins de plus de 65 ans porte gravement atteinte au droit à un traitement égal.

La santé est un autre facteur considéré dans le processus visé par le règlement 5.04. Mon collègue le juge La Forest laisse entendre que la «détérioration» est une «caractéristique incontestable du vieillissement» (p. 563). Il n'y a aucune preuve à l'effet que 65 ans est l'âge où commence la détériothat this would necessarily affect the competence of the practitioner. The health of the practitioner may be a factor in the review of a practitioner's abilities. But surely ongoing health problems of a practitioner would be a factor in any review of any individual's performance. Inability to perform one's duties for health reasons is not limited to those over 65.

What is evident then, is that the system for "special application" does not really allow the practitioner any leeway beyond showing that something "unique" may be offered to the Hospital. In my view, the violation of the rights thus cannot be justified by the appellants. The requirement of showing extra competence or other special qualities is too great. This higher standard is applied solely because the individual has reached 65. This Court has already admonished the use of convenience in administrative procedures as a possible justification for the breach of rights: Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 177, at pp. 218-19, per Wilson J. It seems self-evident that the retirement Regulation and policy set an arbitrary and easy mark for the end of a career—one's 65th birthday. The combination of these factors leads me to the conclusion that the mark is set too high for the practitioners affected: the rights have not been impaired "as little as possible", in my view.

There are acceptable alternatives to the procedures developed by the Board of Trustees, to encourage retirement. A recommended age for retirement could be established, and could be made at the point where it becomes clear that physical difficulties are prevalent, with exceptions made in the appropriate case. Reviews of competence could be semi-annual for those over, for example, 70 years of age. These measures among others can be implemented discretely and using a process upholding the dignity of the individual.

I would only add that the number of persons wishing to work beyond 70 or 75 will not be staggering. But there are people who can (and do) make significant contributions well beyond their ration physique ni qu'elle a nécessairement des répercussions sur la compétence du médecin. La santé du médecin peut être un facteur à considérer dans l'examen de ses aptitudes. Mais assurément, les problèmes de santé permanents d'un médecin seraient un facteur pertinent à tout examen de rendement de tout individu. L'incapacité d'exécuter ses fonctions pour des raisons de santé n'est pas limitée aux personnes de plus de 65 ans.

Ce qui ressort clairement c'est que le système de la «demande spéciale» n'accorde pas vraiment de marge de manœuvre au médecin sinon celle d'établir qu'il a quelque chose d'«unique» à offrir à l'hôpital. À mon avis, les appelants ne peuvent donc justifier la violation des droits en cause. L'obligation d'établir une compétence supérieure ou d'autres qualités spéciales est trop exigeante. Cette norme supérieure n'est appliquée que parce que l'individu a atteint 65 ans. Notre Cour a déjà condamné l'utilisation de motifs de commodité administrative comme justification possible de la violation des droits: Singh c. Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 177, aux pp. 218 et 219 (le juge Wilson). Il semble évident que le règlement et la politique de retraite obligatoire établissent un seuil arbitraire et facile pour mettre fin à la carrière d'une personne—son 65e anniversaire de naissance. La combinaison de ces facteurs m'amène à conclure que ce seuil est trop sévère pour les médecins visés: j'estime qu'on n'a pas porté atteinte «le moins possible» à leurs droits.

Il existe d'autres solutions de rechange acceptables aux règles formulées par le conseil d'administration pour favoriser la retraite. On pourrait recommander un âge de retraite et le fixer lorsqu'il devient clair que les problèmes physiques sont prédominants, sous réserve d'exceptions dans les cas appropriés. Par exemple, des examens de rendement pourraient être tenus deux fois par année pour les médecins âgés de plus de 70 ans. Ces mesures parmi d'autres pourraient être mises en œuvre discrètement et d'une façon qui ne porte pas atteinte à la dignité de la personne.

Je tiens seulement à ajouter que le nombre de personnes désirant travailler au-delà de 70 ou 75 ans ne sera pas considérable. Mais il existe des gens qui peuvent apporter (et qui apportent) une 65th birthday, whether it be in conducting an orchestra, running a private business or leading a country. These people should be afforded the opportunity to continue in their chosen fields. They should not suddenly be presumed to be no longer fit to perform. Finally, persons reaching these ages are usually well aware of their decreased physical capacities if they exist. Handled in a mature and respectful fashion, the retirement process can be a smooth and dignified transition both for the individual and for the institution in question.

I recognize the able submissions of counsel for the Hospital and the Board of Trustees, to the effect that there is an increasing number of practitioners and that the admitting privileges available to the hospital are not unlimited. The Hospital must be efficient and cohesive. But I cannot accept that this can justify the imposition of the measures in question. The bottom line is competence. I doubt anyone would argue that experienced practitioners have expertise which cannot be found in a textbook. And any practitioner who has not kept up with recent developments should and will be screened out in annual reviews. Younger practitioners have greater physical stamina in some cases, but the health of all practitioners is relevant to their ongoing competence. We are left with the bare imposition of a different and higher standard on those over 65. This method of impairing rights is too severe. In this case, the means used should have been more carefully tailored to impair the rights in a more appropriate manner.

I conclude then that Regulation 5.04 and the policy attached to it cannot be saved by s. 1 of the Charter and therefore is unconstitutional. Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal with costs, and answer the constitutional questions as follows:

1. Do the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms apply to the actions of the Vancouver contribution importante bien au-delà de leur 65e anniversaire de naissance, qu'il s'agisse de diriger un orchestre, d'exploiter une entreprise privée ou de diriger un pays. Ces personnes devraient se voir donner l'opportunité de pouvoir continuer à exercer dans le domaine de leur choix. On ne devrait pas subitement présumer qu'elles ne sont plus en mesure de le faire. Enfin, les personnes qui atteignent cet âge sont habituellement bien conscientes de la diminution de leurs capacités physiques, le cas échéant. Abordée d'une manière responsable et respectueuse, la retraite peut être un processus de transition paisible et digne tant pour l'individu que pour l'institution en question.

Je reconnais les arguments valables des procureurs de l'hôpital et du conseil d'administration, soit qu'il y a un nombre croissant de médecins et que les privilèges d'admission à l'hôpital ne sont pas illimités. L'hôpital doit être efficace et cohérent. Mais je ne peux accepter que cela justifie l'imposition des mesures en question. À la limite, c'est une question de compétence. Je pense que personne ne contesterait que les médecins chevronnés ont une expertise qui ne se trouve pas dans un manuel de médecine. Et tout médecin qui ne s'est pas tenu au courant des récents développements devrait être et sera repéré lors des examens annuels. Les médecins plus jeunes ont une plus grande vigueur physique dans certains cas, mais la santé de tous les médecins est pertinente à leur compétence permanente. Nous nous retrouvons donc avec l'imposition flagrante d'une norme différente et plus sévère pour les personnes de plus de 65 ans. Cette façon de porter atteinte aux droits est trop drastique. En l'espèce, les mesures utilisées auraient dû être adaptées de façon plus circonscrite et d'une manière plus appropriée lorsqu'il s'agit de porter atteinte aux droits d'un individu.

Je conclus donc que le règlement 5.04 et la politique qui s'y rattache ne sauraient être justifiés en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte et sont donc inconstitutionnels. Par conséquent, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi avec dépens et de répondre aux questions constitutionnelles de la façon suivante:

1. Les dispositions de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés s'appliquent-elles aux actions du Vancouver

General Hospital in establishing and administering Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations?

Yes.

2. If the answer to question 1 is yes, is Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations contrary to s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Yes.

3. If the answer to question 1 is yes, was the administration of Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations by the Vancouver General Hospital contrary to s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Yes.

4. If the answer to either questions 2 or 3 is yes, is Regulation 5.04 of the Medical Staff Regulations or the manner of its administration by the Vancouver General Hospital nevertheless justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

No.

The following are the reasons delivered by

SOPINKA J.—For the reasons which I gave in McKinney v. University of Guelph, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 229, I agree with the conclusions and reasons of Justice La Forest in respect of all issues except whether Regulation 5.04 is law within the meaning of s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which I would prefer not to decide on the basis of an assumption that the Hospital is part of government.

The following are the reasons delivered by

CORY J. (dissenting)—On this appeal I am in agreement with the reasons of Justice Wilson and her proposed disposition of the case. However, I must briefly explain the basis for my conclusion that s. 1 of the Charter could not save the Hospital's mandatory retirement regulations while it could quite properly be employed to maintain the universities' compulsory retirement regulations.

I agree with Justice La Forest that, for the reasons he expressed, the balancing exercise which General Hospital relativement à la rédaction et à la mise en œuvre du règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations?

Oui.

2. Si la réponse à la question 1 est affirmative, le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations est-il contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Oui.

3. Si la réponse à la question 1 est affirmative, l'application du règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations par le Vancouver General Hospital est-elle contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Oui.

4. Si la réponse aux questions 2 ou 3 est affirmative, le règlement 5.04 des Medical Staff Regulations ou la façon dont il est appliqué par le Vancouver General Hospital sont-ils néanmoins justifiés en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Non.

Version française des motifs rendus par

LE JUGE SOPINKA—Pour les motifs que j'ai exposés dans l'arrêt McKinney c. Université de Guelph, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 229, je partage les conclusions et les motifs du juge La Forest relativement à toutes les questions en litige à l'exception de celle de savoir si le règlement 5.04 est une loi au sens du par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, que je préfère ne pas trancher sur le fondement de l'hypothèse que l'hôpital fait partie du gouvernement.

Version française des motifs rendus par

LE JUGE CORY (dissident)—Dans ce pourvoi, je me range aux motifs du juge Wilson et à la façon dont elle statuerait en l'espèce. Cependant, je dois expliquer brièvement le fondement de ma conclusion que l'article premier de la Charte ne peut être invoqué pour justifier les règlements de l'hôpital sur la retraite obligatoire alors qu'il pouvait fort bien l'être pour justifier les règlements des universités sur la retraite obligatoire.

Je suis d'accord avec le juge La Forest, pour les motifs qu'il a exposés, quand il dit que la juste the Court must undertake in a consideration of the application of s. 1 to the universities' regulations should be sensitive and not mechanistic.

Certainly there are substantial differences between universities and hospitals. The universities justified their policies of mandatory retirement on the basis that they were intended to enhance their capacity to seek and maintain excellence by permitting flexibility in resource allocation and faculty renewal and to preserve academic freedom and the collegial form of association by minimizing distinctive modes of performance evaluation.

The importance of these objects was recognized by La Forest J. in this way, at pp. 286-87 [McKinney v. University of Guelph, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 229]:

> Academic freedom and excellence is essential to our continuance as a lively democracy. Faculty renewal is required if universities are to stay on the cutting edge of research and knowledge. Far from being wholly detrimental to the group affected, mandatory retirement contributes significantly to an enriched working life for its members. It ensures that faculty members have a large measure of academic freedom with a minimum of supervision and performance review throughout their period at university. They need not be unduly concerned with a "bad year" or a few bad years, or that their productive capacity may decline with the passing years. Security of employment is well protected for a substantial number of years and they are spared demeaning tests that would otherwise have to be employed. That is not to say, and there can be no doubt, that mandatory retirement can be a source of considerable anguish for those who do not wish to retire. But the "bargain" involved in taking a tenured position has clear compensatory features even for the individual affected, and it is noteworthy that it is the bargain sought by faculty associations and indeed by labour unions in many other sectors of our society.

Against the detriment to those affected must be weighed the benefit of the universities' policies to society generally and the individuals who compose it. It must be remembered as well that, in a closed system with limited resources like universities, there is a significant correlation between those who retire and those who may be appréciation à laquelle doit se livrer la Cour dans l'examen de l'application de l'article premier aux règlements des universités doit être adaptée aux circonstances et non mécanique.

Il y a évidemment des différences importantes entre les universités et les hôpitaux. Les universités justifient leurs politiques de retraite obligatoire en affirmant qu'elles visent à favoriser leur aptitude à promouvoir l'excellence en faisant preuve de souplesse dans la répartition des ressources et le renouvellement du personnel, et à préserver la liberté académique et la collégialité en restreignant les modes distincts d'évaluation du rendement.

Le juge La Forest a reconnu l'importance de ces objectifs lorsqu'il a affirmé aux pp. 286 et 287 [McKinney c. Université de Guelph, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 229]:

> La liberté académique et l'excellence sont essentielles à la vitalité de notre démocratie. Le renouvellement du corps professoral est nécessaire si les universités veulent rester à la fine pointe de la recherche et du savoir. Loin d'être tout à fait préjudiciable au groupe visé, la retraite obligatoire contribue considérablement à l'enrichissement du milieu de travail des membres du corps professoral. Elle assure aux professeurs une large mesure de liberté académique avec un minimum de surveillance et d'évaluation du rendement pendant toute leur carrière à l'université. Ils n'ont pas à trop se préoccuper d'une [TRADUCTION] «mauvaise année» ou de quelques mauvaises années, ou du fait que leur productivité puisse diminuer avec le passage des années. La sécurité d'emploi est bien protégée pendant un nombre considérable d'années et ils échappent à des critères avilissants qui devraient autrement être appliqués. Cela ne veut pas dire que la retraite obligatoire ne peut être une source d'angoisse considérable pour ceux qui ne veulent pas prendre leur retraite, et il ne fait pas de doute qu'elle l'est d'ailleurs. Mais le [TRADUCTION] «marché» que comporte l'acceptation d'un poste permanent a clairement des aspects compensatoires même pour la personne visée et il convient de souligner que c'est ce marché que recherchent les associations de professeurs et même les syndicats dans plusieurs autres secteurs de notre société.

Au préjudice que subissent les personnes visées, il faut opposer le bénéfice des politiques universitaires que tirent la société en général et les individus qui la composent. Il faut également se rappeler que dans un système fermé ayant des ressources limitées comme les universités, il existe une corrélation significative entre ceux qui hired. Thus the young must be deprived of the opportunities to contribute to society through work in the universities as part of the cost of retaining those currently employed on an indefinite basis.

These factors were in large part responsible for determining that the compulsory retirement regulations of the universities met all the requirements of s. 1 of the Charter. They do not have the same significance in the case of hospitals. Doctors with admitting or operating privileges have no security of tenure. It follows that tenure can hardly be said to be the essential part or indeed any part of the bargain struck between the doctor and the hospital. It is not without significance that in the university setting the Faculty Association supported the mandatory retirement policy, whereas there was no such support by the Medical Association for the Hospital's policy.

At the Hospital the doctor's level of skill is tested at least annually. There was a system in place for testing doctors before the mandatory retirement policy came into effect. There is still a testing procedure in effect whereby doctors are reviewed or tested once a year. That review system is sufficient in itself to demonstrate that the s. 1 requirements cannot be met by the Hospital. A continuous testing of the skills of doctors throughout their years of association with a hospital is essential for the successful operation of the Hospital. The testing takes place without regard to age. In the hospital setting the essential testing of doctors cannot adversely affect any collegiality that may exist. Indeed, collegiality does not appear to be an essential factor in the operation of a hospital as it is for a university. Nor can the testing be said to impair in any way security of tenure at the hospital. Clearly, tenure must be dependent upon the doctor's demonstrating a satisfactory level of skill in order to continue to work at the Hospital.

It can thus be seen that the factors which operated to bring the university retirement policy prennent leur retraite et ceux qui peuvent être embauchés. Il faut donc notamment priver les jeunes de la chance de contribuer à la société par leur travail dans les universités, pour garder indéfiniment ceux qui s'y trouvent actuellement.

Ces facteurs ont en grande partie servi à déterminer que les règlements des universités sur la retraite obligatoire satisfaisaient aux exigences de l'article premier de la Charte. Ils n'ont pas la même importance dans le cas des hôpitaux. Les médecins qui détiennent des privilèges d'admission ou de chirurgie n'ont aucune sécurité d'emploi. Il s'ensuit qu'on peut difficilement affirmer que la permanence est une partie essentielle ou même une partie du marché conclu entre le médecin et l'hôpital. Il est important de signaler que, dans le milieu universitaire, l'association des professeurs était en faveur de la politique de retraite obligatoire alors que dans le milieu hospitalier, l'association des médecins ne l'était pas.

Dans le milieu hospitalier, le niveau de compétence des médecins est évalué au moins une fois par année. Il y avait un système d'évaluation des médecins avant que la politique de retraite obligatoire entre en vigueur. Il existe toujours une procédure d'évaluation en vertu de laquelle la compétence des médecins est appréciée une fois par année. Ce système d'évaluation est en soi suffisant pour démontrer que les hôpitaux ne peuvent satisfaire aux exigences de l'article premier. Un examen permanent des compétences des médecins au cours des années où ils sont associés à un hôpital est essentiel pour le fonctionnement efficace de celui-ci. L'appréciation a lieu sans égard à l'âge. Dans le milieu hospitalier, l'appréciation essentielle des compétences des médecins ne peut avoir un effet préjudiciable sur la collégialité qui peut exister. D'ailleurs, la collégialité ne semble pas être un facteur essentiel dans le fonctionnement d'un hôpital comme elle l'est dans une université. On ne peut non plus affirmer que l'appréciation porte atteinte à la sécurité d'emploi à l'hôpital. Il est clair que cette sécurité doit dépendre de la preuve faite par le médecin d'un niveau satisfaisant de compétences.

On peut donc constater que les facteurs qui ont contribué à justifier la politique de retraite dans within the scope of s. 1 of the Charter are not applicable to the Hospital. There would seem to be no valid reason why continued testing could not serve to ensure that the doctors over 65 years of age possessed a satisfactory degree of skill.

les universités selon l'article premier de la Charte ne s'appliquent pas aux hôpitaux. Il semble donc n'y avoir aucune raison valable pour que l'évaluation permanente ne puisse servir à établir que les médecins de plus de 65 ans possèdent un niveau de compétence satisfaisant.

C-46, art. 161(1)c), d).

Section 11(i) of the Charter provides that, if the punishment for an offence is varied after a person commits the offence, but before sentencing, the person is entitled to "the benefit of the lesser punishment". When offenders are convicted of certain sexual offences against a person under the age of 16 years, s. 161(1) of the Criminal Code gives sentencing judges the discretion to prohibit them from engaging in a variety of everyday conduct upon their release into the community, subject to any conditions or exemptions the judge considers appropriate. In 2012, Parliament expanded the scope of s. 161(1), empowering sentencing judges to prohibit sexual offenders from having any contact with a person under 16 years of age (s. 161(1)(c)) or from using the Internet or other digital network (s. 161(1)(d)). In doing so, Parliament intended to give sentencing judges the discretion to impose the expanded prohibition measures on all offenders, even those who offended before the amendments came into force. In March 2013, the accused pleaded guilty to incest and the creation of child pornography. The offences were committed between 2008 and 2011. By virtue of the convictions and the age of the victim, the sentencing judge was required to consider whether to impose a prohibition under s. 161(1). The question arose as to whether the 2012 amendments could operate retrospectively such that they could be imposed on the accused.

The sentencing judge concluded that an order under the new s. 161(1)(c) and (d) constitutes punishment within the meaning of s. 11(i) of the Charter, such that the provisions cannot be applied retrospectively. He therefore imposed a prohibition order under s. 161, but limited the prohibited activities to those described in the version of s. 161(1) that existed when the accused committed the offences. On the Crown appeal, the majority of the Court of Appeal concluded that the 2012 amendments were enacted to protect the public, rather than to punish offenders, and therefore, they do not qualify as punishment within the meaning of s. 11(i). The majority allowed the appeal and imposed the conditions in s. 161(1)(c) and (d) retrospectively on the accused.

Held (Abella and Brown JJ. dissenting in part): The appeal should be allowed in part. The amendments to s. 161(1)(c) and (d) of the Criminal Code qualify as punishment such that their retrospective operation limits the right protected by s. 11(i) of the Charter. Under s. 1 of L'alinéa 11*i*) de la Charte prévoit, lorsque la peine qui sanctionne une infraction est modifiée après la perpétration de celle-ci, mais avant la détermination de la peine, que le contrevenant a le droit « de bénéficier de la peine la moins sévère ». Lorsqu'une personne est déclarée coupable d'une infraction sexuelle énumérée à l'égard d'une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans, le par. 161(1) du Code criminel confère au juge qui détermine la peine un pouvoir discrétionnaire lui permettant d'interdire au délinquant de se livrer à différentes activités quotidiennes après sa libération et une fois de retour dans la collectivité, sous réserve de certaines conditions ou exemptions. En 2012, le législateur a étendu la portée du par. 161(1) en conférant au juge le pouvoir d'interdire au délinquant sexuel d'avoir des contacts avec une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans (al. 161(1)c)) ou d'utiliser Internet ou tout autre réseau numérique (al. 161(1)d)). Le législateur entendait ainsi investir le juge qui détermine la peine d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire qui lui permette de soumettre aux nouvelles interdictions tout contrevenant, y compris celui qui a commis l'acte criminel avant l'entrée en vigueur des modifications. En mars 2013, l'accusé a plaidé coupable à des accusations d'inceste et de production de pornographie juvénile. Les infractions avaient été commises entre 2008 et 2011. Étant donné les déclarations de culpabilité et l'âge de la victime, le juge était tenu de se demander s'il y avait lieu de prononcer une interdiction fondée sur le par. 161(1). La question s'est alors posée de savoir si les dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 pouvaient s'appliquer rétrospectivement de sorte que l'accusé y soit assujetti.

Le juge chargé de la détermination de la peine a conclu qu'une ordonnance fondée sur les nouveaux al. 161(1)c) et d) constitue une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte, de sorte que les dispositions ne peuvent s'appliquer rétrospectivement. Il a donc interdit sur le fondement de l'art. 161 les seules activités mentionnées dans la version du par. 161(1) qui était en vigueur lorsque l'accusé avait commis les infractions. Dans le cadre de l'appel du ministère public, les juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel ont conclu que les nouvelles interdictions issues des modifications de 2012 visaient à protéger le public, non à punir les contrevenants, de sorte qu'elles ne pouvaient être considérées comme une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*). Ils ont accueilli l'appel et soumis l'accusé aux interdictions prévues aux al. 161(1)c) et d), appliquant ceux-ci rétrospectivement.

Arrêt (les juges Abella et Brown sont dissidents en partie) : Le pourvoi est accueilli en partie. Les dispositions issues des modifications apportées aux al. 161(1)c) et d) du Code criminel sont assimilées à une peine, de sorte que leur application rétrospective restreint le droit the Charter, while the retrospective operation of the no contact provision in s. 161(1)(c) is not a reasonable limit on the s. 11(i) right, the retrospective operation of the Internet prohibition in s. 161(1)(d) is a reasonable limit. Accordingly, the appeal should be allowed with respect to s. 161(1)(c), but dismissed with respect to s. 161(1)(d).

Per McLachlin C.J. and Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner, Gascon and Côté JJ.: Section 11(i) of the Charter constitutionally enshrines the fundamental notion that criminal laws should generally not operate retrospectively. This constitutional aversion for retrospective criminal laws is primarily motivated by the desire to protect the fairness of criminal proceedings and safeguard the rule of law. Rules pertaining to criminal punishment should be clear and certain. To attract the protection of s. 11(i), the new prohibition measures must qualify as "punishment". In R. v. Rodgers, 2006 SCC 15, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 554, this Court developed a two-part test for determining whether a consequence amounts to punishment under s. 11(i): (1) the measure must be a consequence of a conviction that forms part of the arsenal of sanctions to which an accused may be liable in respect of a particular offence; and (2) it must be imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing.

This test requires two clarifications. First, while not all measures imposed to protect the public constitute punishment, public protection is at the core of the purpose and principles of sentencing and is therefore an insufficient litmus test for defining punishment. Thus, sanctions intended to advance public safety do not constitute a broad exception to the protection s. 11(i) affords and may qualify as punishment. Second, the s. 11(i) test for punishment must embody a clearer, more meaningful consideration of the impact a sanction can have on an offender. Doing so enhances fairness and predictability in punishment and is consistent with this Court's jurisprudence.

Accordingly, the s. 11(i) test for punishment should be restated as follows: a measure constitutes punishment if (1) it is a consequence of conviction that forms part of the arsenal of sanctions to which an accused may be liable in respect of a particular offence, and either (2) it garanti par l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte. À la lumière de l'article premier de la Charte, l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c), qui permet d'interdire tout contact, ne constitue pas une restriction raisonnable du droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*), mais celle de l'al. 161(1)d), qui permet d'interdire l'utilisation d'Internet, constitue une restriction raisonnable. Par conséquent, le pourvoi est accueilli quant à l'al. 161(1)c), mais rejeté quant à l'al. 161(1)d).

La juge en chef McLachlin et les juges Cromwell, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner, Gascon et Côté : L'alinéa 11*i*) de la Charte constitutionnalise la notion fondamentale voulant que, en matière pénale, une disposition ne doive généralement pas s'appliquer rétrospectivement. Cette aversion de la Constitution pour les dispositions pénales d'application rétrospective tient principalement à la volonté de protéger l'équité des procédures criminelles et de garantir la primauté du droit. Les règles applicables aux sanctions criminelles doivent être claires et certaines. Pour faire jouer la protection de l'al. 11*i*), les nouvelles interdictions doivent constituer une « peine ». Dans R. c. Rodgers, 2006 CSC 15, [2006] 1 R.C.S. 554, la Cour a dégagé un critère à deux volets qui permet de décider si une conséquence équivaut ou non à une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*) : (1) la mesure doit être une conséquence de la déclaration de culpabilité et faire partie des sanctions dont est passible un accusé pour une infraction donnée et (2) elle doit être conforme à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine.

Deux précisions s'imposent relativement à ce critère. Premièrement, même si toute mesure imposée pour protéger le public ne constitue pas une peine, la protection du public est au cœur de l'objectif et des principes de la détermination de la peine et elle n'est donc pas une considération suffisante pour décider qu'une sanction constitue ou non une peine. Par conséquent, la sanction qui vise à promouvoir la sécurité du public ne bénéficie pas d'une exception générale à la protection qu'offre l'al. 11*i*) et elle peut être considérée comme une peine. Deuxièmement, le critère qui permet d'assimiler une mesure à une peine pour les besoins de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte doit englober une prise en compte plus claire et plus soutenue de l'incidence de la sanction sur le contrevenant. Une telle prise en compte permet d'accroître le caractère équitable de la peine et la prévisibilité de son infliction et elle est compatible avec la jurisprudence de la Cour.

Ainsi, il convient de reformuler comme suit le critère permettant d'assimiler une mesure à une peine pour les besoins de l'al. 11*i*) : une mesure constitue une peine si (1) elle est une conséquence d'une déclaration de culpabilité qui fait partie des sanctions dont est passible un is imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing, or (3) it has a significant impact on an offender's liberty or security interests. To satisfy the third branch of this test, a consequence of conviction must significantly constrain a person's ability to engage in otherwise lawful conduct or impose significant burdens not imposed on other members of the public.

Applying this reformulated test, the 2012 amendments to s. 161(1) constitute punishment. The prohibitions found in these amendments are a consequence of conviction, imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing, and they can have a significant impact on the liberty and security of offenders. Clearly, the 2012 amendments constitute greater punishment than the previous prohibitions. Accordingly, the retrospective operation of these provisions limits the s. 11(i) right as it deprives the accused of the benefit of the less restrictive community supervision measures captured in the previous version of s. 161 — that is, the lesser punishment.

To be justified under s. 1 of the Charter, a law that limits a constitutional right must do so in pursuit of a sufficiently important objective that is consistent with the values of a free and democratic society. The legislative history, judicial interpretation, and design of s. 161 all confirm that the overarching goal of the section is to protect children from sexual violence perpetrated by recidivists. It follows naturally that the objective of the retrospective operation of the 2012 amendments — the infringing measure — is to better protect children from the risks posed by offenders like the accused who committed their offences before, but were sentenced after, the amendments came into force. This latter objective anchors the s. 1 analysis and is of sufficient importance to warrant further scrutiny.

There is clearly a rational connection between this objective and retrospectively giving sentencing judges the discretionary power to limit those offenders who pose a continuing risk to children in contacting children in person or online, and in engaging with online child pornography (the means chosen). Reason and logic suffice to establish that Parliament proceeded rationally in opting to give s. 161(1)(c) and (d) retrospective effect. Further, given accusé pour une infraction donnée et (2) soit elle est conforme à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine, (3) soit elle a une grande incidence sur le droit du contrevenant à la liberté ou à la sécurité. Pour satisfaire au troisième volet du critère, la conséquence de la déclaration de culpabilité doit restreindre sensiblement la faculté qu'a une personne de se livrer à une activité par ailleurs licite ou soumettre une personne à des contraintes substantielles auxquelles les autres citoyens ne sont pas soumis.

Au vu du critère ainsi reformulé, les nouvelles interdictions issues des modifications apportées au par. 161(1) en 2012 constituent une peine. Elles sont une conséquence de la déclaration de culpabilité, elles sont conformes à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine et elles peuvent avoir une grande incidence sur le droit à la liberté et à la sécurité du contrevenant. De toute évidence, elles emportent l'infliction d'une peine plus importante que les interdictions antérieures. Par conséquent, l'application rétrospective des dispositions qui les prévoient restreint le droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) puisqu'elle empêche l'accusé de faire l'objet des mesures de surveillance dans la collectivité moins restrictives qui figuraient dans la version antérieure de l'art. 161, c'est-à-dire de la peine la moins sévère.

Pour être justifiée au regard de l'article premier de la Charte, la règle de droit qui restreint un droit constitutionnel doit le faire conformément à un objectif suffisamment important qui se concilie avec les valeurs d'une société libre et démocratique. L'historique législatif de l'art. 161, son interprétation judiciaire et la manière dont il est conçu confirment que l'objectif prépondérant de l'article est de protéger les enfants contre la violence sexuelle aux mains de récidivistes. Il s'ensuit naturellement que l'objectif de l'application rétrospective des modifications de 2012 — la mesure attentatoire — est de mieux protéger les enfants contre le risque que présente un contrevenant qui, comme l'accusé, a commis l'acte criminel avant l'entrée en vigueur des modifications, mais a été condamné après celle-ci. C'est en fonction de cet objectif que s'effectue l'analyse au regard de l'article premier et il s'agit d'un objectif suffisamment important pour justifier la poursuite de l'examen.

Il existe manifestement un lien rationnel entre cet objectif et l'octroi rétrospectif au tribunal qui détermine la peine d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire lui permettant de soumettre à des contraintes le contrevenant qui représente toujours un risque pour les enfants du fait qu'il peut communiquer en personne ou en ligne avec eux et accéder à de la pornographie juvénile en ligne (le moyen choisi). La raison et la logique suffisent pour établir que the discretionary and tailored nature of s. 161 and the fact that a purely prospective application of the amendments would have compromised Parliament's full objective, the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) and (d) impairs the s. 11(i) rights as little as reasonably possible.

Finally, the deleterious and salutary effects of the law must be assessed. This final stage of the proportionality inquiry is important because it allows courts to transcend the law's purpose and engage in a robust examination of the law's impact on Canada's free and democratic society in direct and explicit terms. Although this examination entails difficult value judgments, it is preferable to make these judgments explicit, as doing so enhances the transparency and intelligibility of the ultimate decision. While the minimal impairment test has come to dominate much of the s. 1 discourse in Canada, this final step permits courts to address the essence of the proportionality enquiry at the heart of s. 1.

The deleterious effects flowing from the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) are substantial. The new s. 161(1)(c) goes much further and prohibits any contact — including communicating by any means — with a person who is under the age of 16 years in a public or private space. By impacting people like the accused with a punishment of which they had no notice, the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) undermines fairness in criminal proceedings and compromises the rule of law. Unfortunately, sexual offences against children have persisted for centuries. The Crown has failed to lead much, if any, evidence to establish the degree of enhanced protection s. 161(1)(c) provides in comparison to the previous version of the prohibition. The benefits society stands to gain are marginal and speculative. The Crown has provided no temporal justification for the retrospective limitation, yet, at its root, s. 11(i) is about the timing of changes to penal laws. The retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) therefore cannot be justified under s. 1. As a result, s. 161(1)(c) should apply only prospectively — that is, only to offenders who committed their offences after the 2012 amendments came into force.

le législateur a agi de manière rationnelle en conférant aux al. 161(1)c) et d) un effet rétrospectif. En outre, puisque l'art. 161 confère un pouvoir discrétionnaire et qu'il est adapté à son objectif, et comme l'application strictement prospective aurait compromis la réalisation intégrale de l'objectif du législateur, l'application rétrospective des al. 161(1)c) et d) porte atteinte au droit protégé par l'al. 11*i*) aussi peu qu'il est raisonnablement possible de le faire.

Enfin, il faut apprécier les effets préjudiciables et les effets bénéfiques de la règle de droit. Cette dernière étape de l'examen de la proportionnalité est importante car le tribunal peut alors transcender l'objectif de la règle de droit et se livrer à un examen rigoureux de l'incidence de la règle de droit sur la société libre et démocratique canadienne d'une manière directe et explicite. Même si l'examen suppose des jugements de valeur difficiles, il vaut mieux faire en sorte que ces jugements soient explicites, de manière à accroître la transparence et l'intelligibilité de la décision ultime. Bien que, de nos jours, au Canada, l'atteinte minimale occupe la place la plus grande dans le discours relatif à l'article premier, le tribunal peut, à cette dernière étape, se pencher sur l'essence de l'examen de la proportionnalité qui est au cœur de l'application de l'article premier.

Les effets préjudiciables de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) sont importants. Le nouvel al. 161(1)c) permet au tribunal d'aller beaucoup plus loin et d'interdire d'avoir des contacts — notamment communiquer par quelque moyen que ce soit — avec une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans dans un lieu public ou privé. En condamnant un contrevenant comme l'accusé à une peine dont il ne se savait pas passible, l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) compromet l'équité des procédures criminelles et la primauté du droit. Les enfants sont malheureusement victimes d'infractions sexuelles depuis des siècles. Le ministère public n'a présenté que peu d'éléments ou n'en a pas présenté du tout pour établir le degré de protection accrue offert par le nouvel al. 161(1)c) comparativement au libellé antérieur de l'interdiction. Les effets bénéfiques éventuels pour la société sont négligeables et hypothétiques. Le ministère public n'a pas fait valoir l'existence d'une justification d'ordre temporel de la restriction rétrospective du droit et, pourtant, l'al. 11*i*) s'intéresse foncièrement au moment où intervient la modification d'une disposition à caractère punitif. L'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) ne saurait donc pas se justifier au regard de l'article premier. Dès lors, l'alinéa ne devrait s'appliquer que prospectivement, c'est-à-dire seulement au contrevenant dont l'acte criminel est postérieur à l'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles dispositions en 2012.

The deleterious effects resulting from the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d) are also significant. A complete ban on using the Internet or other digital network is more intrusive than the previous ban on using a computer system for the purpose of communicating with young people. As with the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c), the imposition of punishment without notice translates into broader societal harms, including compromising the fairness of criminal proceedings and challenging the rule of law. However, s. 161(1)(d) is directed at grave, emerging harms precipitated by a rapidly evolving social and technological context. This evolving context has changed both the degree and nature of the risk of sexual violence facing young persons. As a result, the previous iteration of s. 161 became insufficient to respond to the modern risks children face. By closing this legislative gap and mitigating these new risks, the benefits of the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d) are significant and fairly concrete. The previous prohibition was insufficient to address the evolving risks. On balance, Parliament was justified in giving s. 161(1)(d) retrospective effect in the unique context within which it was legislating. The harms at stake are particularly powerful. The statutory regime is highly tailored and discretionary. An Internet prohibition, while invasive, is not among the most onerous punishments, such as increased incarceration. The benefits of the law outweigh its deleterious effects.

In summary, the 2012 amendments to s. 161(1)(c) and (d) qualify as punishment based on both the objective and impact of the prohibitions. The retrospective imposition of these prohibitions therefore limits the right protected by s. 11(i) of the Charter. While the retrospective operation of the no contact provision in s. 161(1)(c) is not a reasonable limit on the s. 11(i) right, the retrospective operation of the Internet prohibition in s. 161(1)(d) is a reasonable limit.

Per Abella J. (dissenting in part): The Charter breach of s. 161(1)(d) cannot be justified. The wording of s. 11(i) is unequivocal. The absolutist language used by the drafters of the Charter in s. 11 must colour the s. 1 analysis by demanding the most stringent of justifications.

The Crown has the highest possible evidentiary burden, namely, to demonstrate through compelling evidence Les effets préjudiciables de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d) sont eux aussi importants. L'interdiction totale d'utiliser Internet ou tout autre réseau numérique constitue un plus grand empiétement que l'interdiction antérieure d'utiliser un ordinateur dans le but de communiquer avec de jeunes personnes. Comme pour l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c), l'infliction d'une peine dont le contrevenant ne pouvait se savoir passible cause un préjudice général à la société, notamment en compromettant l'équité des procédures criminelles et en remettant en question la primauté du droit. Toutefois, l'al. 161(1)d) s'attaque aux nouveaux préjudices graves dont l'infliction est précipitée par l'évolution rapide du contexte sociotechnologique. Ce contexte en constante évolution a modifié tant le degré que la nature du risque de violence sexuelle auquel sont exposées les jeunes personnes. Par conséquent, la version antérieure de l'art. 161 ne permettait plus de contrer le risque que courent les enfants de nos jours. Du fait qu'elle comble cette lacune législative et réduit les risques nouveaux, l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d) comporte des effets bénéfiques importants assez concrets. L'interdiction antérieure n'était plus adaptée à l'évolution du risque. Tout bien considéré, le législateur était justifié, vu le contexte unique dans lequel il intervenait, de conférer à l'al. 161(1)d) un effet rétrospectif. Les préjudices en jeu sont particulièrement convaincants. Le régime législatif a une portée très bien circonscrite et confère un pouvoir discrétionnaire. L'interdiction d'utiliser Internet, même si elle est attentatoire, ne fait pas partie des sanctions les plus lourdes, telle la peine d'emprisonnement accrue. Les effets bénéfiques de la règle de droit l'emportent sur ses effets préjudiciables.

Bref, les interdictions prévues aux al. 161(1)c) et d) depuis les modifications apportées en 2012 peuvent être assimilées à une peine en raison tant de leur objectif que de leurs répercussions. L'application rétrospective de ces interdictions restreint donc le droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte. L'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c), qui permet d'interdire tout contact, ne constitue pas une restriction raisonnable du droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*), mais celle de l'al. 161(1)d), qui permet d'interdire l'utilisation d'Internet, constitue une restriction raisonnable.

La juge Abella (dissidente en partie) : L'atteinte de l'al. 161(1)d) à la Charte ne saurait se justifier. Le libellé de l'al. 11*i*) est sans équivoque. La formulation absolue employée à l'art. 11 par les rédacteurs de la Charte doit influer sur l'analyse que commande l'article premier par l'exigence de la justification la plus stricte.

Le ministère public a le fardeau de preuve le plus strict qui soit, de sorte qu'il doit convaincre le tribunal that the previous provisions so significantly undermined the government's objectives, that the retrospective application of the greater punishment was justified. The Crown's evidentiary record here was insufficient to justify the retrospective application of the impugned provisions. Far from offering compelling evidence, the Crown offered no evidence in the context of s. 161(1)(d), to show that the former provisions so significantly undermined its objectives, that the retroactive application of greater restrictions was justified. If all that is needed to justify a breach of s. 11(i) is the suggestion of a possible reduction in recidivism rates, whether based on changes in technology or otherwise, the state could, in theory, justify the retrospective application of more stringent punishments so routinely that s. 11(i) is written out of the Charter. In this case, there was no evidence about how the retrospective application of s. 161(1)(d) was expected to, or would, reduce recidivism rates any more than those under the former restrictions. As a result, while there is agreement with the majority that both s. 161(1)(c) and (d) of the Criminal Code violate s. 11(i) of the Charter and that s. 161(1)(c) cannot be justified under s. 1, neither can s. 161(1)(d) be justified.

Per Brown J. (dissenting in part): There is agreement with the majority that the conditions which a sentencing judge may impose under s. 161(1)(c) and (d) of the Criminal Code constitute punishment within the meaning of s. 11(i) of the Charter and that their retrospective application infringes s. 11(i). There is also agreement that the Crown has met its burden of justifying the infringement of s. 11(i) in respect of the conditions relating to Internet use contained in s. 161(1)(d). However, the Crown has also done so in respect of the conditions imposable under s. 161(1)(c) relating to contact with children. The retrospective application of both conditions should therefore be upheld under s. 1 of the Charter.

The harm addressed by s. 11(i) is not the punishment itself, but rather the means by which it is imposed. This means-based quality of the s. 11(i) protection affects the analysis to be applied under s. 1, since the Oakes analysis considers the proportionality between a legislative objective and the Charter-infringing effects resulting from its pursuit, not the choice of means that, by itself, constitutes a Charter infringement. The Oakes test is not, and should not be treated as, a technical inquiry. The majority's rigid and acontextual application of Oakes causes it to lose sight of the broader context and overall goals que l'application des dispositions antérieures aurait si considérablement compromis les objectifs de l'État que l'application rétrospective d'une peine plus sévère était justifiée. Le dossier de preuve du ministère public en l'espèce est insuffisant pour justifier l'application rétrospective des dispositions contestées. Loin d'offrir une preuve de nature à convaincre, le ministère public n'a produit à l'appui de l'al. 161(1)d) aucun élément selon lequel les dispositions antérieures compromettaient si considérablement les objectifs de l'État que l'application rétrospective d'interdictions de plus grande portée était justifiée. Si, pour justifier la restriction du droit garanti à l'al. 11*i*), il suffit d'invoquer la réduction possible des taux de récidive, de pair avec l'évolution technologique ou toute autre considération, l'État pourrait en théorie justifier dans tous les cas l'application rétrospective de peines accrues, au point de réduire à néant l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte. En l'espèce, nul élément de la preuve n'indique comment l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d) devait réduire ou aurait réduit les taux de récidive davantage que ne le permettaient les anciennes interdictions. Par conséquent, il y accord avec les juges majoritaires que les al. 161(1)c) et d) du Code criminel contreviennent tous deux à l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte et que l'al. 161(1)c) ne peut être justifié au regard de l'article premier. L'alinéa 161(1)d) ne peut cependant pas être justifié non plus.

Le juge Brown (dissident en partie) : Comme le concluent les juges majoritaires, chacune des interdictions que le juge qui détermine la peine peut prononcer en vertu des al. 161(1)c) et d) du Code criminel constitue une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte et l'application rétrospective des dispositions qui les prévoient contrevient à l'al. 11*i*). Le ministère public s'est certes acquitté de son obligation de justifier l'atteinte au droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) en ce qui concerne l'interdiction d'utiliser Internet prévue à l'al. 161(1)d). Toutefois, il s'en est également acquitté quant à l'interdiction prévue à l'al. 161(1)c), à savoir celle d'avoir des contacts avec des enfants. L'application rétrospective des deux interdictions devrait donc être jugée conforme à l'article premier de la Charte.

Le préjudice que vise à contrer l'al. 11*i*) n'est donc pas la peine comme telle, mais plutôt le moyen par lequel elle est infligée. Cette caractéristique de la protection de l'al. 11*i*) fondée sur le moyen entre en jeu dans l'analyse que commande l'article premier, étant donné que, dans l'arrêt Oakes, la Cour se penche sur la proportionnalité de l'objectif législatif et des effets attentatoires à la Charte qui découlent des mesures prises pour l'atteindre, et non sur le choix du moyen qui équivaut en soi à une atteinte constitutionnelle. L'application du critère de l'arrêt Oakes ne se veut pas formaliste, et elle ne devrait pas sought by Parliament. It holds Parliament to an exacting standard of proof, thereby denying Parliament the room necessary to perform its legislative policy-development role when addressing a chronic social problem. And it also insists on direct evidence of anticipated benefits which, given that chronic nature of the harm, is likely impossible to obtain.

A broad examination of Parliament's purpose is necessary in order to anchor a useful proportionality analysis because of the unique means-based quality of s. 11(i)'s protection. The measure that gave rise to the Charter infringement, and which should anchor the proportionality analysis, comprises the amendments to s. 161 as a whole. And, as to that measure, the majority's characterization of the objective should be accepted: the objective is to enhance the protection s. 161 affords to children against the risk of harm posed by sexual offenders. The retrospective application of these amendments is rationally connected to that protective purpose, since the risk an offender poses to reoffend sexually against children is not affected by whether the offence occurred before or after the measure's enactment. And, given Parliament's objective of enhancing the protections that s. 161 affords to children, there are no less-impairing alternate measure that would allow for s. 161(1)'s protections to be realized in respect of an offender who committed his or her offence before the amendments came into force and who poses a risk to reoffend.

The final stage of the proportionality analysis is tied to the practical impacts and benefits of the law, but what is ultimately being weighed is much more abstract and philosophical: the detriment to Charter-protected rights against the public benefit sought. Insisting upon too strict an evidentiary burden must be carefully avoided. However, the majority does precisely that by demanding empiricism where none can exist. Given the complex social context in which Parliament develops policy, it will sometimes be difficult, if not impossible, for the state to provide reliable and direct evidence of the benefits its measure will achieve.

The majority errs by overstating the deleterious effects of s. 161(1)(c)'s retrospective operation while understating its salutary effects. Section 161(1)(c) prohibits être tenue pour telle. En appliquant l'arrêt Oakes avec rigidité et sans tenir compte du contexte, les juges majoritaires perdent de vue le tableau général et l'objectif global du législateur. Ils soumettent le législateur à une norme de preuve très stricte et lui refusent ainsi la marge de manœuvre dont il a besoin pour s'acquitter de sa fonction de mise en œuvre de politiques en matière législative lorsqu'il s'agit de s'attaquer à un problème social chronique. Ils exigent en outre une preuve directe des effets bénéfiques escomptés, mais étant donné la nature chronique du problème, il est impossible de produire une telle preuve.

Pour se prononcer utilement sur la proportionnalité, il faut donc rechercher plus largement l'intention du législateur en raison de la caractéristique propre à l'al. 11*i*), soit la protection fondée sur le moyen. La mesure attentatoire qui doit être soumise à l'examen consiste dans la totalité des modifications apportées à l'art. 161. La caractérisation par les juges majoritaires de l'objectif de cette mesure, à savoir accroître la protection qu'offre aux enfants l'art. 161 contre le risque de préjudice que représentent les personnes déclarées coupables d'infractions sexuelles, doit être retenue. L'application rétrospective des dispositions issues des modifications a un lien rationnel avec cette vocation protectrice, car le risque que le contrevenant s'en prenne à nouveau sexuellement à des enfants n'a rien à voir avec le fait que l'acte criminel a été commis avant ou après l'adoption de la mesure. Et vu l'objectif du législateur d'accroître la protection qu'offre aux enfants l'art. 161, aucune autre mesure moins attentatoire ne ferait jouer la protection offerte par le par. 161(1) dans le cas du contrevenant qui a commis l'acte criminel avant l'entrée en vigueur des modifications et qui présente un risque de récidive.

La dernière étape de l'examen de la proportionnalité se rattache à l'incidence réelle et aux effets bénéfiques de la règle de droit, mais l'objet de la mise en balance est somme toute de nature beaucoup plus abstraite et philosophique : l'effet préjudiciable sur le droit garanti par la Charte comparé à l'effet bénéfique recherché pour la société. Il faut bien se garder d'imposer un fardeau de preuve trop strict. Or, c'est précisément ce que font les juges majoritaires en exigeant une preuve empirique alors qu'il n'en existe aucune. Compte tenu du contexte social complexe dans lequel les politiques du législateur voient souvent le jour, il sera parfois difficile, voire impossible, pour l'État d'avancer une preuve fiable et directe des effets bénéfiques d'une mesure.

Les juges majoritaires font erreur en exagérant les effets préjudiciables de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) tout en sous-estimant ses effets bénéfiques.

only unsupervised contact with children, and is subject to any other exemptions that the sentencing judge sees fit to impose. The majority's interpretation of the restriction on liberty worked by s. 161(1)(c) is over-expansive and is at odds with the well-established principle that the criminal law's prohibitions on conduct should be construed strictly. Further, the majority's insistence on a compelling temporal justification for the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) when assessing the deleterious impact of its retrospective operation on the rule of law is inappropriate. The majority is, in substance questioning whether Parliament's objective in enacting a retrospective increase in punishment was truly pressing and substantial. Temporal considerations are not relevant when assessing the deleterious effect of a retrospective punishment on the rule of law because all retrospective changes to the law derogate from the rule of law, irrespective of Parliament's reasons for enacting them.

As to the salutary effects, the risk posed to children by offenders like the accused simply cannot be mitigated by the original version of s. 161(1). The evidence before Parliament showed that a majority of sexual offences against children were committed by family members or acquaintances. The previous version of s. 161(1) could not be used to restrict an offender's ability to interact with children in private, even if that is where the offender poses the greatest risk to reoffend sexually against children. The salutary effects of s. 161(1)(c)'s retrospective operation seem manifest.

All the reasons identified by the majority in support of the conclusion that the limit imposed on the s. 11(i) right by the retrospective application of s. 161(1)(d) is justified are equally applicable to the retrospective application of s. 161(1)(c). The condition in s. 161(1)(c) is also highly tailored and discretionary, since it is imposed only where the sentencing judge deems it necessary, and also since it is subject to such exemptions as the sentencing judge sees fit to allow. If the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d) is a proportional and justified limit on an offender's s. 11(i) right, the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) must be as well.

Cette disposition n'interdit que les contacts non supervisés avec des enfants, et l'ordonnance rendue sur son fondement peut être assortie de toute exemption que le juge chargé de déterminer la peine estime indiquée. L'interprétation par les juges majoritaires de la restriction du droit à la liberté opérée par l'al. 161(1)c) est indûment libérale et va directement à l'encontre du principe bien établi en droit criminel voulant que l'interdiction d'une conduite doive être interprétée restrictivement. En outre, l'accent mis par les juges majoritaires sur l'existence d'une justification d'ordre temporel convaincante de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) dans leur appréciation de l'effet préjudiciable de l'application rétrospective n'est pas opportun. Ils remettent essentiellement en cause l'objectif poursuivi par le législateur par l'augmentation rétrospective de la peine lorsqu'ils se demandent s'il était véritablement urgent et réel. Les considérations d'ordre temporel ne sont pas pertinentes pour apprécier l'effet préjudiciable d'une peine d'application rétrospective sur la primauté du droit, car toute modification apportée rétrospectivement à une règle de droit porte atteinte à la primauté du droit, quelle que soit la motivation du législateur.

En ce qui a trait aux effets bénéfiques, le risque que fait courir aux enfants un contrevenant comme l'accusé ne peut tout simplement pas être réduit en appliquant la version antérieure du par. 161(1). Selon la preuve dont disposait le législateur, la plupart des infractions sexuelles perpétrées contre des enfants le sont par des membres de la famille ou par des connaissances. La version antérieure du par. 161(1) ne pouvait empêcher le délinquant d'interagir avec des enfants dans un lieu privé, alors que c'est précisément le contexte dans lequel le délinquant présente le risque le plus grand de récidive sexuelle contre des enfants. Les effets bénéfiques de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) paraissent manifestes.

Les raisons invoquées par les juges majoritaires à l'appui de leur conclusion selon laquelle est justifiée la restriction du droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*), du fait de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d), valent également toutes pour l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c). L'interdiction que prévoit l'al. 161(1)c) est elle aussi très bien circonscrite et relève du pouvoir discrétionnaire puisqu'elle n'est prononcée que lorsque le juge qui détermine la peine conclut qu'elle est nécessaire et, en outre, qu'elle fait l'objet de toute exemption que le juge indique. Si l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d) constitue une restriction proportionnée et justifiée du droit que l'al. 11*i*) garantit au contrevenant, il doit en aller de même pour l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c).

Balancing the salutary and deleterious effects of a Charter-infringing law is not an objective calculation because it requires the court to weigh incommensurables — in this case, to weigh the deleterious impact on the sexual offender and the rule of law against the possible benefit of protecting children from sexual offenders. However, despite the impossibility of weighing incommensurables objectively, a reviewing court must nevertheless come to a reasoned conclusion. The salutary effects pursued in this case are worth the cost in rights limitation: the harms sought to be addressed are grave, persistent, and worthy of Parliament's efforts in the criminal law realm. The provisions are sufficiently tailored so that no offender's s. 11(i) rights will be unduly limited. Neither of the impugned provisions works a drastic increase in the punishment imposed. On balance, the potential salutary effect of the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) and (d) of better protecting children from all sexual offenders who pose a risk to reoffend sexually against them, regardless of when the offender committed a designated offence, outweighs the modest impact on fairness and the rule of law.

La mise en balance des effets préjudiciables et des effets bénéfiques d'une règle de droit attentatoire ne constitue pas un calcul utilitaire objectif, car le tribunal doit soupeser des choses non mesurables, en l'occurrence l'effet préjudiciable sur le délinquant sexuel et sur la primauté du droit par rapport à l'effet bénéfique possible de la protection des enfants contre les délinquants sexuels. Cependant, malgré l'impossibilité de soupeser objectivement des choses non mesurables, le tribunal de révision doit néanmoins arriver à une conclusion raisonnée. Les effets bénéfiques escomptés en l'espèce justifient la restriction des droits : les préjudices que l'on cherche à contrer sont graves et persistants et justifient la prise de mesures législatives relevant du droit criminel. La portée des dispositions est suffisamment circonscrite pour que les droits du contrevenant garantis par l'al. 11*i*) ne soient pas indûment restreints. Ni l'al. 161(1)c) ni l'al. 161(1)d) n'emportent un accroissement draconien de la peine infligée. Tout bien considéré, l'effet bénéfique potentiel de l'application rétrospective des alinéas en cause qui réside dans la protection accrue des enfants contre tous les délinquants sexuels susceptibles de récidiver et de s'en prendre à nouveau à eux, peu importe le moment où le contrevenant a commis une infraction énumérée, prime l'effet modéré qui en résulte sur l'équité des procédures criminelles et sur la primauté du droit.

I. Introduction

[1] People's conduct and the legal consequences that flow from it should be judged on the basis of the law in force at the time. This is a basic tenet of our legal system.

[2] In recognition of this principle, s. 11(i) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides that, if the punishment for an offence is varied after a person commits the offence, but before sentencing, the person is entitled to "the benefit of the lesser punishment". Like the other legal rights enshrined in s. 11 of the Charter, s. 11(i) is fundamentally important to our justice system because it protects the fairness of criminal proceedings and safeguards the rule of law.

[3] When offenders are convicted of certain sexual offences against a person under the age of 16 years, s. 161(1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, gives sentencing judges the discretion to prohibit them from engaging in a variety of everyday conduct upon their release into the community, subject to any conditions or exemptions the judge considers appropriate. In 2012, Parliament expanded

La juge Karakatsanis —

I. Introduction

[1] Un tribunal devrait se prononcer sur la conduite d'une personne et sur les conséquences juridiques qui en découlent en fonction du droit qui s'appliquait au moment de la conduite reprochée. C'est là un précepte fondamental de notre système juridique.

[2] Conformément à ce principe, l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés prévoit, lorsque la peine qui sanctionne une infraction est modifiée après la perpétration de celle-ci, mais avant la détermination de la peine, que le contrevenant a le droit « de bénéficier de la peine la moins sévère ». Comme les autres droits consacrés par l'art. 11 de la Charte, celui conféré à l'al. 11*i*) revêt une importance fondamentale pour notre système de justice, car il assure l'équité des procédures criminelles et garantit la primauté du droit.

[3] Lorsqu'une personne est déclarée coupable d'une infraction sexuelle énumérée à l'égard d'une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans, le par. 161(1) du Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-46, confère au juge qui détermine la peine un pouvoir discrétionnaire lui permettant de lui interdire de se livrer à différentes activités quotidiennes après sa libération et une fois de retour dans la collectivité, the scope of s. 161(1), empowering sentencing judges to prohibit sexual offenders from having any contact with a person under 16 years of age (s. 161(1)(c)) or from using the Internet or other digital network (s. 161(1)(d)).

[4] In doing so, Parliament intended to give sentencing judges the discretion to impose the expanded prohibition measures on all offenders, even those who offended before the amendments came into force. In other words, Parliament intended the 2012 amendments to operate retrospectively.

[5] The issue in this appeal is whether the retrospective operation of the 2012 amendments to s. 161(1)(c) and (d) of the Criminal Code is constitutional. This issue engages two subsidiary questions. First, do the prohibition measures contained in s. 161(1)(c) and (d) constitute "punishment" such that their retrospective operation limits s. 11(i) of the Charter? Second, if so, is the limit a reasonable one as can be demonstrably justified under s. 1 of the Charter? The application of these expanded prohibition measures to offenders who committed their offences after the amendments came into force is not at issue.

[6] I conclude that the 2012 amendments to s. 161(1)(c) and (d) qualify as punishment based on both the objective and impact of the prohibitions. The retrospective imposition of these prohibitions therefore limits s. 11(i) of the Charter.

[7] Turning to s. 1 of the Charter, I reach opposite conclusions with respect to s. 161(1)(c) and (d): while the retrospective operation of the no contact provision in s. 161(1)(c) is not a reasonable limit on the s. 11(i) right, the retrospective operation of the Internet prohibition in s. 161(1)(d) is a reasonable limit. My conclusion with respect to s. 161(1)(d) is chiefly due to the fact that Parliament enacted sous réserve des conditions ou exemptions qu'il indique. En 2012, le législateur a étendu la portée du par. 161(1) en conférant au juge le pouvoir d'interdire au délinquant sexuel d'avoir des contacts avec une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans (al. 161(1)c)) ou d'utiliser Internet ou tout autre réseau numérique (al. 161(1)d)).

[5] Nous devons décider si l'application rétrospective des dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 (les nouveaux al. 161(1)c) et d) du Code criminel) est constitutionnelle. Deux questions subsidiaires se posent alors. Premièrement, les interdictions prévues aux al. 161(1)c) et d) constituent-elles une « peine », de sorte que leur application rétrospective restreigne le droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte? Deuxièmement, dans l'affirmative, s'agit-il d'une restriction raisonnable dont la justification peut se démontrer au regard de l'article premier de la Charte? L'application des nouvelles interdictions au contrevenant dont les actes criminels sont ultérieurs à l'entrée en vigueur des modifications n'est pas en cause.

[6] Je conclus que les interdictions prévues aux al. 161(1)c) et d) depuis les modifications apportées en 2012 peuvent être assimilées à une peine en raison tant de leur objectif que de leurs répercussions. L'application rétrospective de ces interdictions restreint donc le droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte.

[7] En ce qui concerne l'article premier de la Charte, je tire des conclusions opposées à l'égard des al. 161(1)c) et d). L'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c), qui permet d'interdire tout contact, ne constitue pas une restriction raisonnable du droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*), mais celle de l'al. 161(1)d), qui permet d'interdire l'utilisation d'Internet, constitue une restriction raisonnable. Ma conclusion relative à the provision within a rapidly evolving social and technological context, which changed both the degree and nature of the risk of sexual violence facing young persons. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal in part.

II. Facts and Legislative History

[8] On March 6, 2013, the appellant pleaded guilty to incest and the creation of child pornography. The offences were committed between 2008 and 2011, and involved the appellant's preschool-aged daughter.

[9] When the appellant committed the offences, s. 161(1) of the Criminal Code read as follows:

> 161. (1) When an offender is convicted, or is discharged on the conditions prescribed in a probation order under section 730, of an offence referred to in subsection (1.1) in respect of a person who is under the age of 16 years, the court that sentences the offender or directs that the accused be discharged, as the case may be, in addition to any other punishment that may be imposed for that offence or any other condition prescribed in the order of discharge, shall consider making and may make, subject to the conditions or exemptions that the court directs, an order prohibiting the offender from
> (a) attending a public park or public swimming area where persons under the age of 16 years are present or can reasonably be expected to be present, or a day-care centre, schoolground, playground or community centre;
>
> (b) seeking, obtaining or continuing any employment, whether or not the employment is remunerated, or becoming or being a volunteer in a capacity, that involves being in a position of trust or authority towards persons under the age of 16 years; or
> (c) using a computer system within the meaning of subsection 342.1(2) for the purpose of communicating with a person under the age of 16 years.

[10] After the appellant committed the offences, but before he was sentenced, s. 161(1) was amended l'al. 161(1)d) s'appuie principalement sur le fait que le législateur a adopté la disposition dans un contexte sociotechnologique en constante évolution, un contexte qui a modifié à la fois le degré et la nature du risque de violence sexuelle auquel sont exposées les jeunes personnes. Par conséquent, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi en partie.

II. Faits et historique législatif

[8] Le 6 mars 2013, l'appelant a plaidé coupable à des accusations d'inceste et de production de pornographie juvénile. Les infractions ont été commises entre 2008 et 2011, et la victime est la fillette de l'appelant.

[9] Lors de la perpétration des infractions, le par. 161(1) du Code criminel était libellé comme suit :

> 161. (1) Dans le cas où un contrevenant est déclaré coupable, ou absous en vertu de l'article 730 aux conditions prévues dans une ordonnance de probation, d'une infraction mentionnée au paragraphe (1.1) à l'égard d'une personne âgée de moins de seize ans, le tribunal qui lui inflige une peine ou ordonne son absolution, en plus de toute autre peine ou de toute autre condition de l'ordonnance d'absolution applicables en l'espèce, sous réserve des conditions ou exemptions qu'il indique, peut interdire au contrevenant :
>
> a) de se trouver dans un parc public ou une zone publique où l'on peut se baigner s'il y a des personnes âgées de moins de seize ans ou s'il est raisonnable de s'attendre à ce qu'il y en ait, une garderie, un terrain d'école, un terrain de jeu ou un centre communautaire;
>
> b) de chercher, d'accepter ou de garder un emploi — rémunéré ou non — ou un travail bénévole qui le placerait en relation de confiance ou d'autorité vis-à-vis de personnes âgées de moins de seize ans;
> c) d'utiliser un ordinateur au sens du paragraphe 342.1(2) dans le but de communiquer avec une personne âgée de moins de seize ans.

[10] Après que l'appelant eut commis les infractions, mais avant la détermination de sa peine, by the Safe Streets and Communities Act, S.C. 2012, c. 1, s. 16(1), which came into force on August 9, 2012. Section 161(1)(a) and (b) remained unchanged. But the Act modified s. 161(1)(c) to include prohibiting all contact with young persons, no matter the means, and introduced a new Internet prohibition through s. 161(1)(d). These amendments had the effect of expanding the scope of the community supervision measures a sentencing judge can impose on sexual offenders. Section 161(1)(c) and (d) now provide that a sentencing judge can prohibit an offender from:

> (c) having any contact — including communicating by any means — with a person who is under the age of 16 years, unless the offender does so under the supervision of a person whom the court considers appropriate; or
> (d) using the Internet or other digital network, unless the offender does so in accordance with conditions set by the court.

[11] After the 2012 amendments came into force, the appellant was sentenced to nine years' imprisonment. By virtue of the appellant's convictions and the age of the victim, the sentencing judge was required to consider whether to impose a prohibition order under s. 161(1). The question arose as to whether the 2012 amendments could operate retrospectively such that they could be imposed on the appellant.

III. Decisions Below

A. British Columbia Provincial Court — Klinger Prov. Ct. J.

[12] The sentencing judge found that an order under s. 161 would be appropriate because "there is a serious risk to the safety of children under the age of 16 after [the appellant] is released". However, on the basis of the test for punishment set out by this Court in R. v. Rodgers, 2006 SCC 15, [2006] 1 S.C.R. 554, at para. 63, he concluded that an order under the new s. 161(1)(c) and (d) constitutes punishment within the meaning of s. 11(i) of the Charter, such that the provisions cannot be applied le par. 161(1) a été modifié par la Loi sur la sécurité des rues et des communautés, L.C. 2012, c. 1, par. 16(1), entrée en vigueur le 9 août 2012. Les alinéas 161(1)a) et b) sont demeurés inchangés. Par contre, l'al. 161(1)c) interdisait désormais tout contact avec de jeunes personnes, peu importe le moyen, et un nouvel alinéa — 161(1)d) — interdisait l'utilisation d'Internet. Ces modifications ont eu pour effet d'accroître la portée des mesures de surveillance dans la collectivité auxquelles le juge qui détermine la peine pouvait soumettre un délinquant sexuel. Les alinéas 161(1)c) et d) prévoient aujourd'hui que ce juge peut interdire au contrevenant :

> c) d'avoir des contacts — notamment communiquer par quelque moyen que ce soit — avec une personne âgée de moins de seize ans, à moins de le faire sous la supervision d'une personne que le tribunal estime convenir en l'occurrence;
> d) d'utiliser Internet ou tout autre réseau numérique, à moins de le faire en conformité avec les conditions imposées par le tribunal.

[11] Après l'entrée en vigueur des modifications de 2012, l'appelant a été condamné à neuf ans d'emprisonnement. Étant donné les déclarations de culpabilité et l'âge de la victime, le juge était tenu de se demander s'il y avait lieu de prononcer une interdiction fondée sur le par. 161(1). La question s'est alors posée de savoir si les dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 pouvaient s'appliquer rétrospectivement de sorte que l'appelant y soit assujetti.

III. Décisions des juridictions inférieures

A. Cour provinciale de la Colombie-Britannique (le juge Klinger)

[12] Le juge qui détermine la peine conclut qu'une ordonnance fondée sur l'art. 161 est indiquée, car [TRADUCTION] « la sécurité des enfants âgés de moins de seize ans sera exposée à un risque sérieux une fois [l'appelant] libéré ». Compte tenu du critère établi par la Cour en la matière dans R. c. Rodgers, 2006 CSC 15, [2006] 1 R.C.S. 554, par. 63, il estime toutefois qu'une ordonnance fondée sur les nouveaux al. 161(1)c) et d) constitue une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte, de sorte que les retrospectively. Since no formal constitutional challenge was brought and the sentencing judge merely used s. 11(i) as a tool of statutory interpretation, no consideration was given to s. 1 of the Charter.

[13] In the result, the sentencing judge imposed a prohibition order under s. 161 for a period of seven years, but limited the prohibited activities to those described in the version of s. 161(1) that existed when the appellant committed the offences.

B. British Columbia Court of Appeal — 2014 BCCA 382, 316 C.C.C. (3d) 540

[14] On the Crown appeal, the appellant filed a formal constitutional challenge to the retrospective operation of the 2012 amendments. The Court of Appeal split over whether a violation of s. 11(i) had been established. Writing for the majority, Newbury J.A. concluded that the 2012 amendments were enacted to protect the public, rather than to punish offenders; therefore, they do not qualify as punishment within the meaning of s. 11(i). Newbury J.A. allowed the appeal and imposed the conditions in s. 161(1)(c) and (d) retrospectively on the appellant for a period of seven years.

[15] Groberman J.A., dissenting in part, concluded that the retrospective application of the 2012 amendments infringes s. 11(i). Applying Rodgers, Groberman J.A. concluded that s. 161 orders are consequences of conviction, imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing, and thus qualify as "punishment".

[16] Because the majority found that s. 11(i) was not engaged, the parties and the Court of Appeal did not address s. 1 of the Charter.

dispositions ne peuvent s'appliquer rétrospectivement. Vu l'absence de contestation constitutionnelle formelle et le fait qu'il ne recourt à l'al. 11*i*) qu'aux fins d'interprétation législative, le juge omet de considérer l'application de l'article premier de la Charte.

[13] Le juge interdit donc sur le fondement de l'art. 161, pour une période de sept ans, les seules activités mentionnées dans la version du par. 161(1) qui était en vigueur lorsque l'appelant a commis les infractions.

B. Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique — 2014 BCCA 382, 316 C.C.C. (3d) 540

[14] Dans le cadre de l'appel du ministère public, l'appelant a contesté formellement la constitutionnalité de l'application rétrospective des dispositions issues des modifications de 2012. La Cour d'appel est partagée quant à savoir si l'atteinte au droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) est établie ou non. Au nom des juges majoritaires, la juge Newbury conclut que les nouvelles interdictions issues des modifications de 2012 visent à protéger le public, non à punir les contrevenants, de sorte qu'elles ne peuvent être considérées comme une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*). Elle accueille l'appel et soumet l'appelant aux interdictions prévues aux al. 161(1)c) et d), rétrospectivement, pour une période de sept ans.

[15] Dissident en partie, le juge Groberman opine que l'application rétrospective des dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 contrevient à l'al. 11*i*). Il s'appuie sur l'arrêt Rodgers pour conclure que les ordonnances fondées sur l'art. 161 sont une conséquence de la déclaration de culpabilité, que les interdictions qu'elles prévoient sont conformes à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine et qu'il s'agit donc d'une « peine ».

[16] Vu la conclusion des juges majoritaires selon laquelle le droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) n'est pas en jeu, ni les parties ni la Cour d'appel ne se sont exprimées sur l'application de l'article premier de la Charte.

IV. Issues

[17] This case raises two constitutional questions:

(1) Does the retrospective operation of s. 161(c) and (d) of the Criminal Code limit s. 11(i) of the Charter?

(2) If so, is the limitation a reasonable one prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society under s. 1 of the Charter?

V. Analysis

[18] As a preliminary matter, I observe that although there is a presumption against the retrospective application of legislation that affects substantive rights (R. v. Dineley, 2012 SCC 58, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 272, at para. 10), the parties do not dispute the Court of Appeal's finding that the presumption has been rebutted in this case because Parliament intended the 2012 amendments to operate retrospectively. I agree.

[19] This appeal thus turns on whether such retrospective application complies with constitutional standards.

A. Do the 2012 Amendments Constitute Punishment Such That Their Retrospective Operation Limits Section 11(i) of the Charter?

(1) The Purpose of Section 11(i) of the Charter and the Interests It Protects [20] Section 11 of the Charter protects the legal rights of accused persons when they are charged with an offence. Section 11 encompasses "crucial fundamental rights" (R. v. Wigglesworth, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 541, per Wilson J., at p. 558), including the right to be tried within a reasonable time (s. 11(b)); the right to be presumed innocent (s. 11(d)); and the right against double jeopardy or punishment (s. 11(h)).

IV. Questions en litige

[17] Le dossier soulève deux questions constitutionnelles :

(1) L'application rétrospective des al. 161(1)c) et d) du Code criminel restreint-elle le droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte?

(2) Dans l'affirmative, s'agit-il d'une restriction apportée par une règle de droit dans des limites raisonnables et dont la justification peut se démontrer dans une société libre et démocratique au regard de l'article premier de la Charte?

V. Analyse

[18] Je remarque au préalable que, bien qu'il existe une présomption à l'encontre de l'application rétrospective d'une disposition législative qui porte atteinte à un droit substantiel (R. c. Dineley, 2012 CSC 58, [2012] 3 R.C.S. 272, par. 10), les parties ne contestent pas la conclusion de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle la présomption est réfutée en l'espèce, le législateur ayant voulu que les dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 s'appliquent de manière rétrospective. Je suis d'accord.

[19] L'issue du pourvoi tient donc à ce que cette application rétrospective est conforme ou non aux normes constitutionnelles.

A. Les dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 infligent-elles une peine, de sorte que leur application rétrospective restreigne le droit garanti par l'al. 11i) de la Charte?

(1) L'objet de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte et les droits que celui-ci garantit

[21] Section 11(i) is another such right:

> 11. Any person charged with an offence has the right
>
> . . .
> (i) if found guilty of the offence and if the punishment for the offence has been varied between the time of commission and the time of sentencing, to the benefit of the lesser punishment.

[22] Along with s. 11(g) — which protects an accused's right "not to be found guilty on account of any act or omission unless, at the time of the act or omission, it constituted an offence" — s. 11(i) constitutionally enshrines the fundamental notion that criminal laws should generally not operate retrospectively.

[23] This constitutional aversion to retrospective criminal laws is in part motivated by the desire to safeguard the rule of law. As Lord Diplock put it, "acceptance of the rule of law as a constitutional principle requires that a citizen, before committing himself to any course of action, should be able to know in advance what are the legal consequences that will flow from it" (Black-Clawson International Ltd. v. Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg A.G., [1975] A.C. 591 (H.L.), at p. 638). One author expressed the rule of law implications of retrospective laws in these terms:

> According to the ideal of the rule of law, the law must be such that those subject to it can reliably be guided by it, either to avoid violating it or to build the legal consequences of having violated it into their thinking about what future actions may be open to them. People must be able to find out what the law is and to factor it into their practical deliberations. The law must avoid taking people by surprise, ambushing them, putting them into conflict with its requirements in such a way as to defeat their expectations and frustrate their plans.
> (J. Gardner, "Introduction", in H. L. A. Hart, Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law (2nd ed. 2008), xiii, at p. xxxvi)

[21] L'alinéa 11*i*) protège un autre de ces droits très importants :

> 11. Tout inculpé a le droit :
>
> . . .
> i) de bénéficier de la peine la moins sévère, lorsque la peine qui sanctionne l'infraction dont il est déclaré coupable est modifiée entre le moment de la perpétration de l'infraction et celui de la sentence.

[23] Cette aversion de la Constitution pour les dispositions pénales d'application rétrospective tient en partie à la volonté de garantir la primauté du droit. Comme le dit lord Diplock, [TRADUCTION] « l'acceptation de la primauté du droit en tant que principe constitutionnel exige qu'un citoyen, avant d'adopter une ligne de conduite, puisse connaître à l'avance les conséquences qui en découleront sur le plan juridique » (Black-Clawson International Ltd. c. Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg A.G., [1975] A.C. 591 (H.L.), p. 638). Un auteur formule comme suit les répercussions d'une disposition d'application rétrospective sur la primauté du droit :

> (J. Gardner, « Introduction », dans H. L. A. Hart, Punishment and Responsibility : Essays in the Philosophy of Law (2e éd. 2008), xiii, p. xxxvi)

[24] Retrospective laws threaten the rule of law in another way, by undercutting the integrity of laws currently in effect, "since it puts them under the threat of retrospective change" (L. L. Fuller, The Morality of Law (rev. ed. 1969), at p. 39).

[25] Relatedly, retrospective laws implicate fairness. "It is unfair to establish rules, invite people to rely on them, then change them in mid-stream, especially if the change results in negative consequences" (R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (6th ed. 2014), at p. 754). For example, an accused who declines to consider a plea and is prepared to take the risk of going to trial should not be subsequently ambushed by an increase in the minimum or maximum penalty for the offence. A retrospective law such as this could not only cause unfairness in specific cases, but could also undermine public confidence in the criminal justice system. Instead, fairness in criminal punishment requires rules that are clear and certain. As McLachlin J. wrote in R. v. Kelly, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 170:

> It is a fundamental proposition of the criminal law that the law be certain and definitive. This is essential, given the fact that what is at stake is the potential deprivation of a person of his or her liberty and his or her subjection to the sanction and opprobrium of criminal conviction. This principle has been enshrined in the common law for centuries, encapsulated in the maxim nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege — there must be no crime or punishment except in accordance with law which is fixed and certain. [p. 203]

[26] Clearly, the concerns with retrospective laws are particularly potent in proceedings that are criminal, quasi-criminal, or in which a "true penal consequence" is at stake — the context to which s. 11 applies (Wigglesworth, at p. 559).

[27] In sum, s. 11(i) is rooted in values fundamental to our legal system, including respect for the rule

[24] La disposition d'application rétrospective compromet aussi la primauté du droit en compromettant l'intégrité des dispositions actuellement en vigueur [TRADUCTION] « parce qu'elle expose ces dernières au risque d'une modification rétrospective » (L. L. Fuller, The Morality of Law (éd. rév. 1969), p. 39).

[25] Dans le même ordre d'idées, la disposition d'application rétrospective met en cause l'équité. [TRADUCTION] « Il est injuste de fixer des règles, d'inviter les gens à s'y fier puis de les modifier en cours de route, surtout lorsqu'il en résulte des conséquences négatives » (R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (6e éd. 2014), p. 754). Par exemple, l'accusé qui refuse d'inscrire un plaidoyer de culpabilité et qui est disposé à courir le risque de subir un procès ne devrait pas ensuite se trouver pris au piège par l'accroissement de la peine minimale ou maximale dont est passible l'auteur de l'infraction. Un tel effet rétrospectif pourrait non seulement causer une injustice dans certains cas, mais aussi miner la confiance du public dans le système de justice criminelle. L'équité de la sanction pénale commande plutôt que les règles soient claires et certaines. Comme l'écrit la juge McLachlin dans R. c. Kelly, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 170 :

> C'est un concept fondamental du droit pénal que les règles de droit doivent être précises et définitives. C'est là un concept essentiel puisqu'une personne risque d'être privée de sa liberté et de subir la sanction et l'opprobre que jette une déclaration de culpabilité criminelle. Ce principe est inscrit dans la common law depuis des siècles, et formulé dans la maxime nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege — il ne saurait exister de crimes ou de sanctions sauf en conformité avec des règles de droit bien établies et précises. [p. 203]

[27] Bref, l'al. 11*i*) prend appui sur des valeurs fondamentales de notre système juridique, y compris of law and ensuring fairness in criminal proceedings.

(2) The Framework for Defining Punishment in Section 11(i) of the Charter

[28] In Rodgers, this Court developed a two-part test for determining whether a consequence amounts to "punishment" under s. 11(i): (1) the measure must be a consequence of a conviction that "forms part of the arsenal of sanctions to which an accused may be liable in respect of a particular offence"; and (2) it must be "imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing" (para. 63).

[29] In the course of articulating this test, Charron J. observed that a "liberal and purposive approach" must be taken to defining punishment (para. 61), but also cautioned that "punishment" does not "encompas[s] every potential consequence of being convicted of a criminal offence" (para. 63). For example, if a consequence advances a legitimate non-punitive state interest, such as solving future crimes, it will likely not constitute punishment, even if it indirectly furthers a sentencing objective like deterrence (Rodgers, at para. 64). Applying this test, Charron J. concluded that post-conviction DNA databank orders do not constitute punishment because they are imposed to assist in the investigation of future crimes, not in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing. The fact that a DNA profile may deter offenders is merely a "residual benefit" (para. 64, quoting R. v. Murrins, 2002 NSCA 12, 201 N.S.R. (2d) 288 (C.A.), at para. 102).

[30] While the first branch of the s. 11(i) test for punishment (consequence of conviction) has proven to be relatively straightforward, the second branch (imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing) has given rise to two key ambiguities. First, do laws that are primarily aimed at protecting the public necessarily fail to satisfy the second branch of the Rodgers test? Second, what le respect de la primauté du droit et la garantie de l'équité des procédures criminelles.

(2) Le cadre dans lequel définir la peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte

[28] Dans Rodgers, la Cour dégage un critère à deux volets pour décider si une conséquence équivaut ou non à une « peine » au sens de l'al. 11*i*) : (1) la mesure doit être une conséquence de la déclaration de culpabilité et faire partie des « sanctions dont est passible un accusé pour une infraction donnée » et (2) elle doit être « conforme à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine » (par. 63).

[29] Tout en formulant ce critère, la juge Charron fait remarquer que « l'interprétation libérale et téléologique » s'impose pour définir la peine (par. 61), mais elle fait aussi une mise en garde : « . . . la "peine" [n'englobe pas] toute conséquence pouvant découler du fait d'être déclaré coupable d'une infraction criminelle » (par. 63). Par exemple, lorsqu'une conséquence sert un intérêt non punitif et légitime de l'État, comme la résolution de crimes ultérieurs, elle ne constitue vraisemblablement pas une peine même si, indirectement, elle est conforme à un objectif de la détermination de la peine, telle la dissuasion (Rodgers, par. 64). Au vu de ce critère, la juge Charron conclut que l'autorisation de prélever un échantillon d'ADN qui fait suite à la déclaration de culpabilité ne constitue pas une peine, car elle intervient pour faciliter la tenue d'enquêtes sur de futurs crimes, non pour se conformer à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine. La possibilité que l'existence d'un profil d'identification génétique décourage la récidive ne représente qu'un [TRADUCTION] « avantage secondaire » (par. 64, citant R. c. Murrins, 2002 NSCA 12, 201 N.S.R. (2d) 288 (C.A.), par. 102).

[30] Bien que l'application du premier volet du critère qui permet d'assimiler une mesure à une peine pour les besoins de l'al. 11*i*) (être la conséquence d'une déclaration de culpabilité) se révèle relativement simple, celle de son deuxième volet (la conformité à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine) soulève deux ambiguïtés fondamentales. Premièrement, la disposition qui vise role does the impact a sanction can have on an offender play in the analysis? I address each question in turn.

(a) Do Laws Primarily Aimed at Public Protection Necessarily Fail to Satisfy the Second Branch of the Rodgers Test?

[31] In this case, the Court of Appeal interpreted Rodgers as indicating that sanctions principally aimed at public protection necessarily fall outside the ambit of punishment. The Crown echoes this position before this Court. As I will explain, this position overreaches: while not all measures imposed to protect the public constitute punishment, public protection is at the core of the purpose and principles of sentencing. Public protection is therefore an insufficient litmus test for defining punishment.

[32] The purpose and principles of sentencing have been the subject of extensive jurisprudence and are reflected, at least in part, in ss. 718 et seq. of the Criminal Code: see R. v. Lacasse, 2015 SCC 64, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 1089, at para. 1; see also R. v. Ipeelee, 2012 SCC 13, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 433, at para. 35. Section 718 provides that the "fundamental purpose of sentencing is to protect society" and to contribute "to respect for the law and the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society". This overarching purpose is accomplished by "imposing just sanctions" (s. 718) that reflect one or more of the traditional sentencing objectives: denunciation, deterrence, separation of offenders from society, rehabilitation, reparation, and promoting a sense of responsibility in offenders. Sections 718.1 and 718.2 go on to list a number of sentencing principles, including the fundamental principle of proportionality, that guide sentencing judges in crafting a fit sentence.

principalement la protection du public omet-elle nécessairement de satisfaire au second volet du critère de l'arrêt Rodgers? Deuxièmement, quel rôle joue dans l'analyse l'incidence de la sanction sur le contrevenant? J'examine successivement ces questions ci-après.

a) La disposition qui vise principalement la protection du public omet-elle nécessairement de satisfaire au second volet du critère de l'arrêt Rodgers?

[31] En l'espèce, la Cour d'appel conclut de Rodgers que la sanction dont la vocation principale est de protéger le public n'est forcément pas une peine. Le ministère public en convient devant notre Cour. Comme je l'expliquerai, c'est aller trop loin. Même si toute mesure imposée pour protéger le public ne constitue pas une peine, la protection du public est au cœur de l'objectif et des principes de la détermination de la peine. La protection du public n'est donc pas une considération suffisante pour décider qu'une sanction constitue ou non une peine.

[32] L'objectif et les principes de la détermination de la peine font l'objet d'une jurisprudence abondante et se retrouvent, du moins en partie, aux art. 718 et suiv. du Code criminel (voir R. c. Lacasse, 2015 CSC 64, [2015] 3 R.C.S. 1089, par. 1; voir également R. c. Ipeelee, 2012 CSC 13, [2012] 1 R.C.S. 433, par. 35). L'article 718 dispose que le « prononcé des peines a pour objectif essentiel de protéger la société et de contribuer [. . .] au respect de la loi et au maintien d'une société juste, paisible et sûre ». Cet objectif général est atteint par « l'infliction de sanctions justes » (art. 718) qui tiennent compte d'un ou de plusieurs des objectifs traditionnels de la détermination de la peine, à savoir la dénonciation, la dissuasion, l'isolement des délinquants du reste de la société, la réinsertion sociale, la réparation et le fait de susciter la conscience de leurs responsabilités chez les délinquants. Les articles 718.1 et 718.2 énoncent en outre un certain nombre de principes de la détermination de la peine, y compris le principe fondamental de la proportionnalité, lequel guide le tribunal dans la détermination d'une peine juste.

[33] It is clear from the plain language of s. 718 that public protection is part of the very essence of the purpose and principles governing the sentencing process, a point emphasized by this Court in R. v. Lyons, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 309, per La Forest J., at p. 329: ". . . the fundamental purpose of the criminal law generally, and of sentencing in particular, [is] the protection of society". It is therefore difficult to distinguish between sanctions intended to protect the public and sanctions intended to punish offenders. Doherty J.A. highlighted this difficulty in the recent case of R. v. Hooyer, 2016 ONCA 44, 129 O.R. (3d) 81. Although his comments were made in the context of defining the common law presumption against retrospectivity, they are apposite here:

> The distinction between sanctions intended to protect the public and those intended to punish offenders is difficult to make in the context of sentencing for criminal offences. Many criminal sanctions are designed to both protect the public and punish the accused. In fact, some sanctions protect the public by punishing the accused. The objectives of public protection and punishment often cannot realistically be separated and treated as individual and competing purposes in the sentencing context. [para. 42]

For these reasons, sanctions intended to advance public safety do not constitute a broad exception to the protection s. 11(i) affords and may qualify as punishment.

[34] To be clear, while measures imposed at sentencing for the purpose of protecting the public may constitute punishment under s. 11(i), a public-protection purpose is not, on its own, determinative. To satisfy the second branch of the Rodgers test, a consequence of conviction must be imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing. As discussed, the purpose of sentencing is to "protect society" or advance "respect for the law and the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society" (s. 718 of the Criminal Code) by fulfilling one or more of the traditional sentencing objectives (s. 718(a) through (f)) in accordance with the

[33] Suivant le sens ordinaire des termes employés à l'art. 718, la protection du public relève nettement de l'essence même de l'objectif et des principes qui régissent le processus de détermination de la peine, ce que souligne la Cour dans R. c. Lyons, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 309, le juge La Forest, p. 329 : « . . . l'objet fondamental du droit criminel en général et de l'imposition des peines en particulier [est] la protection de la société ». Il est par conséquent difficile de distinguer la sanction qui vise à protéger le public de celle dont le but est de punir le contrevenant. Le juge Doherty signale la difficulté dans le récent arrêt R. c. Hooyer, 2016 ONCA 44, 129 O.R. (3d) 81. Ses remarques sont formulées dans le contexte de la définition de la présomption de non-rétrospectivité en common law, mais elles demeurent pertinentes en l'espèce :

> [TRADUCTION] Il est difficile de distinguer entre la sanction qui vise à protéger le public et celle dont le but est de punir le contrevenant lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer la peine à infliger à l'auteur d'une infraction criminelle. De nombreuses sanctions criminelles sont conçues à la fois pour protéger le public et pour punir l'accusé. En fait, certaines protègent le public en punissant l'accusé. Souvent, on ne peut pas vraiment dissocier l'objectif de protéger le public et celui de punir, ni les considérer comme des objectifs individuels et concurrents dans le contexte de la détermination de la peine. [par. 42]

C'est pourquoi la sanction qui vise à promouvoir la sécurité du public ne bénéficie pas d'une exception générale à la protection qu'offre l'al. 11*i*) et elle peut être considérée comme une peine.

[34] Précisons que, lors de la détermination de la peine, une mesure prise pour protéger le public peut constituer une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*), mais que l'objectif de la protection du public n'est pas décisif en soi. Pour satisfaire au second volet du critère de l'arrêt Rodgers, la conséquence de la déclaration de culpabilité doit être conforme à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine. Rappelons que la détermination de la peine vise à « protéger la société » ou à promouvoir le « respect de la loi et [le] maintien d'une société juste, paisible et sûre » (art. 718 du Code criminel) grâce à la réalisation de l'un ou de plusieurs des objectifs traditionnels principles of sentencing reflected in ss. 718.1 and 718.2.

(b) What Role Does the Impact of a Sanction Play in the Analysis?

[35] Citing R. v. Cross, 2006 NSCA 30, 138 C.R.R. (2d) 163, at paras. 45-46, the Crown submits that the impact of a sanction on an offender is only relevant if it is out of proportion to the sanction's legislative purpose. That is, "if the impact of the sanction aligns with its legislative purpose and is not of such magnitude that it reveals, instead, a punitive intent, it is not 'punishment'" (Cross, at para. 45).

[36] As I shall explain, I conclude that the impact of a sanction has broader significance. While a sanction's impact was to some extent implicit in the Rodgers analysis, in my view, the s. 11(i) test for punishment must embody a clearer, more meaningful consideration of the impact a sanction can have on an offender. This is important for a variety of reasons.

[37] First, it accords with "the liberal and purposive approach" that must be taken in interpreting Charter rights, including s. 11(i) (Rodgers, at para. 61). The purposes of s. 11(i), which are centred on the rule of law and fairness in criminal proceedings, are compromised if the right is incapable of protecting offenders from the retrospective imposition of sanctions that have a significant impact on their liberty or security — regardless of the sanction's objective. As the interveners the David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights, the Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario), the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association, and the Association des avocats de la défense de Montréal all submit, fairness and predictability in punishment are enhanced when there is a pragmatic consideration of the impact of an impugned sanction.

énumérés aux al. 718a) à f), et ce, conformément aux principes de détermination de la peine qui se retrouvent aux art. 718.1 et 718.2.

b) Quel rôle joue dans l'analyse l'incidence de la sanction sur le contrevenant?

[35] Prenant appui sur l'arrêt R. c. Cross, 2006 NSCA 30, 138 C.R.R. (2d) 163, par. 45-46, le ministère public fait valoir que l'incidence de la sanction sur le contrevenant n'est à considérer que lorsqu'elle est sans commune mesure avec l'objectif législatif qui sous-tend la sanction. Autrement dit, [TRADUCTION] « lorsque l'incidence de la sanction est dans le droit fil de l'objectif législatif et n'est pas considérable au point de révéler plutôt l'intention de punir, il ne s'agit pas d'une "peine" » (Cross, par. 45).

[36] Comme je l'explique plus loin, j'estime que l'incidence de la sanction revêt une importance plus grande. Elle est jusqu'à un certain point prise tacitement en compte dans l'arrêt Rodgers et dans l'analyse que la Cour y effectue mais, à mon sens, le critère qui permet d'assimiler une mesure à une peine pour les besoins de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte doit englober une prise en compte plus claire et plus soutenue de l'incidence de la sanction sur le contrevenant. Cela importe pour diverses raisons.

[37] Premièrement, une telle démarche est compatible avec « l'interprétation libérale et téléologique » qui s'impose à l'égard des droits garantis par la Charte, y compris à l'al. 11*i*) (Rodgers, par. 61). Les objectifs de l'al. 11*i*), qui sont axés sur la primauté du droit et l'équité dans les procédures criminelles, sont compromis si le droit garanti ne peut protéger le contrevenant contre l'application rétrospective d'une sanction ayant une grande incidence sur sa liberté et sa sécurité, indépendamment de l'objectif de la sanction. Comme le soutiennent les intervenants David Asper Centre for Constitutional Rights, Criminal Lawyers' Association (Ontario), Association des libertés civiles de la Colombie-Britannique et Association des avocats de la défense de Montréal, le caractère équitable de la peine et la prévisibilité de son infliction s'accroissent lorsque l'incidence de la sanction en cause est prise en compte avec pragmatisme.

[38] A "liberal and purposive approach" to punishment is appropriate because s. 11(i) is engaged only within a narrow sphere. As mentioned, in Wigglesworth, this Court held that s. 11 of the Charter applies only to proceedings that are criminal or quasi-criminal, or, regardless of the nature of the proceeding, if a "true penal consequence" such as imprisonment is at stake (p. 559). The Court in Wigglesworth gave s. 11 a narrow ambit so that "[t]he content of [the s. 11] rights [does not] suffer from a lack of predictability or a lack of clarity because of a universal application of the section" (p. 558). Although the "true penal consequence" test sets an indisputably high bar, it was developed to determine whether a person is nonetheless "charged with an offence" even if he or she is the subject of proceedings outside the criminal context. Within the criminal law context, the concerns motivating a narrow construction of "penal consequences" or "punishment" largely fall away.

[39] Second, a consideration of the impact of a sanction is consistent with this Court's jurisprudence. Since the early days of the Charter, this Court has always looked to both purposes and effects when considering the constitutionality of laws: see R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 331. And in the recent decision of Canada (Attorney General) v. Whaling, 2014 SCC 20, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 392, this Court adopted "a functional rather than a formalistic perspective" (para. 52), observing that, "[i]t is the retrospective frustration of an expectation of liberty that constitutes punishment" (para. 60). The Court went on to conclude that the elimination of accelerated parole review violated s. 11(h) as it had a sufficiently significant impact on "an offender's settled expectation of liberty" (para. 60). In doing so, the Court focused on the impact the retrospective law had on the offender, rather than the purpose animating the law: see H. Stewart, "Punitive in Effect: Reflections on Canada v. Whaling" (2015), 71 S.C.L.R. (2d) 263, at p. 269. Although Whaling was concerned with the definition of punishment in the context of s. 11(h) of the Charter, [38] Une « interprétation libérale et téléologique » est indiquée à l'égard de la peine car l'al. 11*i*) ne s'applique que dans un contexte bien délimité. Rappelons que, dans Wigglesworth, la Cour statue que l'art. 11 de la Charte s'applique seulement dans le cadre de procédures criminelles ou quasi criminelles, ou bien, quelle que soit la nature de l'instance, lorsqu'une « véritable conséquence pénale » est en jeu (p. 559). Elle ajoute que l'art. 11 a une portée étroite, de sorte que « [l]e contenu [des droits qu'il confère] ne devrait pas connaître un manque de prévisibilité ou de clarté en raison d'une application universelle de l'article » (p. 558). Même si le critère de la « véritable conséquence pénale » établit un seuil indéniablement élevé, il a été conçu pour permettre au tribunal de décider si une personne est un « inculpé » même si elle fait l'objet d'une procédure autre que criminelle. En matière criminelle, ce qui justifie une interprétation étroite de la « conséquence pénale » ou de la « peine » disparaît pour l'essentiel.

[39] Deuxièmement, la prise en compte de l'incidence de la sanction est compatible avec la jurisprudence de la Cour. Depuis les premiers jours de l'application de la Charte, la Cour s'est toujours penchée tant sur les objectifs que sur les effets d'une règle de droit pour se prononcer sur sa constitutionnalité (voir R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 R.C.S. 295, p. 331). Et, dans le récent arrêt Canada (Procureur général) c. Whaling, 2014 CSC 20, [2014] 1 R.C.S. 392, la Cour adopte « [un] plan, sinon formel, du moins fonctionnel » (par. 52) et fait alors observer que « [l]a peine se cristallise par l'effet rétrospectif de l'atteinte aux attentes légitimes de liberté » (par. 60). Elle conclut que la suppression de la procédure d'examen expéditif (en matière de libération conditionnelle) contrevient à l'al. 11*h*) puisqu'elle a une incidence suffisamment importante sur « l'attente légitime en matière de liberté » du contrevenant (par. 60). La Cour s'attache alors principalement à l'incidence de la loi d'application rétrospective sur le contrevenant, plutôt qu'à son objectif sous-jacent (voir H. Stewart, « Punitive in Effect : Reflections on Canada v. Whaling » harmony between s. 11(i) and (h) is desirable as fairness in punishment underlies both provisions.

[40] Third, an approach that accounts for a sanction's impact will assist in identifying the "lesser punishment" to which an accused is entitled. The punishment with the less severe impact on the liberty or security of an offender will be deemed to be the "lesser punishment" for the purposes of s. 11(i). A definition of punishment that focuses heavily on the objective of the sanction obscures this inquiry.

[41] Thus, I would restate the test for punishment as follows in order to carve out a clearer and more meaningful role for the consideration of the impact of a sanction: a measure constitutes punishment if (1) it is a consequence of conviction that forms part of the arsenal of sanctions to which an accused may be liable in respect of a particular offence, and either (2) it is imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing, or (3) it has a significant impact on an offender's liberty or security interests.[1]

[42] As this Court wrote in Cunningham v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 143: "The Charter does not protect against insignificant or 'trivial' limitations of rights . . . . The [state action] must be significant enough to warrant constitutional protection" (p. 151). That is why, if a consequence of conviction is not imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing, it must have a significant impact on an offender's constitutionally protected liberty or security interests before it will qualify as punishment for the purposes of s. 11(i). To satisfy this requirement, a consequence of conviction must significantly constrain a person's ability to engage

[1] In articulating this test, I do not decide whether s. 11(i) would be infringed in circumstances akin to those in Whaling, in which accelerated parole review was retrospectively eliminated, thereby impacting the length of incarceration that was imposed as a sanction consequent to conviction.

(2015), 71 S.C.L.R. (2d) 263, p. 269). Bien que Whaling porte sur la définition de la peine pour les besoins de l'al. 11*h*) de la Charte, il convient d'harmoniser l'application des al. 11*i*) et h) puisque le caractère équitable de la peine sous-tend les deux dispositions.

[40] Troisièmement, une approche qui tient compte de l'incidence de la sanction est utile pour déterminer la « peine la moins sévère » susceptible d'être infligée à l'accusé. La peine dont l'incidence est la moins grande sur la liberté ou la sécurité du contrevenant devient la « peine la moins sévère » pour l'application de l'al. 11*i*). Définir la peine en s'attachant lourdement à l'objectif de la sanction nuit à la démarche.

[42] Dans l'arrêt Cunningham c. Canada, [1993] 2 R.C.S. 143, la Cour affirme que « [l]a Charte n'assure pas une protection contre les restrictions insignifiantes ou "négligeables" [. . .] La [mesure de l'État] doit être suffisamment importante pour justifier une protection constitutionnelle » (p. 151). C'est pourquoi lorsqu'une conséquence de la déclaration de culpabilité n'est pas conforme à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine, elle doit avoir une grande incidence sur le droit constitutionnel du contrevenant à la liberté ou à la sécurité pour constituer une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*). Pour satisfaire à cette exigence, la conséquence de la in otherwise lawful conduct or impose significant burdens not imposed on other members of the public. Again, Doherty J.A.'s comments in Hooyer are helpful: ". . . a prohibition that significantly limits the lawful activities in which an accused can engage, where an accused can go, or with whom an accused can communicate or associate, would sufficiently impair the liberty and security of the accused to warrant characterizing the prohibition as punishment" (para. 45).

[43] Having reformulated the s. 11(i) test for punishment, I now turn to the sanctions at issue in this appeal. I first discuss s. 161 of the Criminal Code in more detail before applying the test for punishment to the 2012 amendments.

(3) History and Operation of Section 161 of the Criminal Code

[44] The legislative history, judicial interpretation, and design of s. 161 all confirm that the section has an overarching protective function: to shield children from sexual violence.

[45] Section 161 was enacted in 1993 in response to the decision in R. v. Heywood (1992), 20 B.C.A.C. 166, in which the British Columbia Court of Appeal struck down under s. 7 of the Charter the offence of loitering: see An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Young Offenders Act, S.C. 1993, c. 45, s. 1. After 1993, s. 161 continued to evolve and, in 2012, the impugned amendments were introduced through the Safe Streets and Communities Act. The protective function of s. 161 generally, and the 2012 amendments specifically, was repeatedly emphasized throughout the legislative debates. For example, at the Bill's third reading, the Minister of Justice stated that the proposed amendments are "an important step forward in the protection of children in this country" (House of Commons Debates, vol. 145, No. 144, 3rd Sess., 40th Parl., March 11, 2011, at p. 8967).

déclaration de culpabilité doit restreindre sensiblement la faculté qu'a une personne de se livrer à une activité par ailleurs licite ou soumettre une personne à des contraintes substantielles auxquelles les autres citoyens ne sont pas soumis. Les propos du juge Doherty dans Hooyer valent encore une fois d'être cités : [TRADUCTION] « . . . l'interdiction qui restreint sensiblement l'activité licite à laquelle peut se livrer l'accusé, ses allées et venues, les personnes avec lesquelles il peut communiquer ou qu'il peut fréquenter, porte suffisamment atteinte à la liberté et la sécurité de l'accusé pour que l'on puisse l'assimiler à une peine » (par. 45).

[43] Après la reformulation du critère qui permet d'assimiler une mesure à une peine pour les besoins de l'al. 11*i*), je passe aux sanctions visées par le pourvoi. J'examine d'abord plus en détail l'art. 161 du Code criminel, puis j'applique le critère aux dispositions issues des modifications de 2012.

(3) Historique et application de l'art. 161 du Code criminel

[44] Son historique législatif et son interprétation judiciaire, ainsi que la manière dont il est conçu, confirment que l'art. 161 a une fonction protectrice prépondérante, à savoir protéger les enfants contre la violence sexuelle.

[45] L'article 161 a vu le jour en 1993 pour donner suite à l'arrêt R. c. Heywood (1992), 20 B.C.A.C. 166, dans lequel la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique avait invalidé l'infraction de flânerie par application de l'art. 7 de la Charte (voir la Loi modifiant le Code criminel et la Loi sur les jeunes contrevenants, L.C. 1993, c. 45, art. 1). La disposition a par la suite évolué et, en 2012, les modifications visées en l'espèce ont été apportées par la Loi sur la sécurité des rues et des communautés. Tout au long des débats législatifs, on a maintes fois souligné la fonction protectrice de l'art. 161 en général et des dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 en particulier. Par exemple, lors de la troisième lecture du projet de loi, le ministre de la Justice a déclaré que les modifications proposées « fai[saient] beaucoup pour protéger nos enfants » (Débats de la Chambre des communes, vol. 145, nº 144, 3e sess., 40e lég., 11 mars 2011, p. 8967).

[46] The jurisprudence interpreting and applying s. 161 confirms the provision's protective purpose: see, e.g., R. v. Heywood, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 761, at p. 803; R. v. A. (R.K.), 2006 ABCA 82, 208 C.C.C. (3d) 74, at para. 20; R. v. Perron, 2009 ONCA 498, 244 C.C.C. (3d) 369, at para. 13.

[47] As well, the design of s. 161 is consistent with its purpose of protecting children from sexual violence. Section 161 orders are discretionary and "subject to the conditions or exemptions that the court directs" (s. 161(1)). They can therefore be carefully tailored to the circumstances of a particular offender. The discretionary and flexible nature of s. 161 demonstrates that it was designed to empower courts to craft tailored orders to address the nature and degree of risk that a sexual offender poses to children once released into the community. Failure to comply with the order can lead to a term of imprisonment of up to four years (s. 161(4)).

[48] Further, I agree with the line of cases holding that s. 161 orders can be imposed only when there is an evidentiary basis upon which to conclude that the particular offender poses a risk to children and the judge is satisfied that the specific terms of the order are a reasonable attempt to minimize the risk: see A. (R.K.), at para. 32; see also R. v. R.R.B., 2013 BCCA 224, 338 B.C.A.C. 106, at paras. 32-34. These orders are not available as a matter of course. In addition, the content of the order must carefully respond to an offender's specific circumstances.[2]

[46] Les décisions dans lesquelles les tribunaux ont interprété et appliqué l'art. 161 confirment la vocation protectrice de la disposition (voir p. ex. R. c. Heywood, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 761, p. 803; R. c. A. (R.K.), 2006 ABCA 82, 208 C.C.C. (3d) 74, par. 20; R. c. Perron, 2009 ONCA 498, 244 C.C.C. (3d) 369, par. 13).

[47] De même, la manière dont est conçu l'art. 161 se concilie avec son objectif de protéger les enfants contre la violence sexuelle. L'ordonnance est rendue sur le fondement d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire et elle s'applique « sous réserve des conditions ou exemptions [que le tribunal] indique » (par. 161(1)). Elle peut être soigneusement adaptée à la situation du contrevenant. Le caractère discrétionnaire et souple du pouvoir conféré à l'art. 161 montre que le législateur a voulu permettre au tribunal de concevoir une ordonnance adaptée qui tient compte de la nature et de l'importance du risque que représente pour les enfants le délinquant sexuel libéré et rendu à la collectivité. L'inobservation de l'ordonnance peut entraîner un emprisonnement maximal de quatre ans (par. 161(4)).

[48] En outre, je m'inscris dans le courant jurisprudentiel selon lequel l'ordonnance fondée sur l'art. 161 ne peut être rendue que lorsque la preuve permet de conclure que le contrevenant représente un risque pour les enfants et que le juge est convaincu que les conditions dont elle est assortie visent raisonnablement à réduire ce risque (voir A. (R.K.), par. 32; voir également R. c. R.R.B., 2013 BCCA 224, 338 B.C.A.C. 106, par. 32-34). Il ne s'agit pas d'une ordonnance rendue automatiquement. De plus, elle doit être soigneusement adaptée à la situation particulière du contrevenant[2].

[2] For example, the order imposed by McArthur J. in R. v. Levin, 2015 ONCJ 290, at para. 113 (CanLII), illustrates how the Internet prohibition in s. 161(1)(d) can be crafted to fulfill the protective goals of the legislation while enhancing the offender's rehabilitation process. See also the order imposed in R. v. Schledermann, 2014 ONSC 674, at para. 13 (CanLII).

[2] Par exemple, l'ordonnance de la juge McArthur dans R. c. Levin, 2015 ONCJ 290, par. 113 (CanLII), montre comment l'interdiction d'utiliser Internet prévue à l'al. 161(1)d) peut être rédigée pour atteindre les objectifs de protection de la loi tout en favorisant la réadaptation du contrevenant. Voir également l'ordonnance en cause dans R. c. Schledermann, 2014 ONSC 674, par. 13 (CanLII).

(4) Application of the Test for Punishment to the 2012 Amendments to Section 161 of the Criminal Code

[49] Applying the reformulated test, I conclude that the 2012 amendments constitute punishment.

[50] First, the 2012 amendments form part of the arsenal of sanctions to which an accused may be liable in respect of a particular offence. Section 161(1) directs sentencing judges to consider whether to exercise their discretion to impose the community supervision measures once an offender is convicted of an enumerated sexual offence involving a person under the age of 16. Section 161 orders are therefore a consequence of conviction, a fact that the Crown does not dispute.

[51] Second, the sanctions contained in the 2012 amendments are imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing and can have a significant impact on an offender's Charter-protected interests — although, to be clear, both are not required to satisfy the test.

[52] As to the objective, the 2012 amendments are intended to protect children by separating offenders from society, assisting in rehabilitation, and deterring sexual violence, sentencing goals that all find expression in s. 718 of the Criminal Code. In addition, the discretionary and flexible process through which s. 161 orders are imposed aligns with the principles of sentencing articulated in ss. 718.1 and 718.2. As noted above, the fact that such orders are imposed to protect children, on its own, is not determinative.

[53] These prohibitions are to be distinguished from DNA orders, which have been found not to constitute punishment under s. 11(i): see Rodgers, at para. 65. As discussed, the objective of DNA orders

(4) Application du critère qui permet d'assimiler une mesure à une peine aux dispositions qui sont issues des modifications apportées en 2012 à l'art. 161 du Code criminel

[49] Au vu du critère reformulé, je conclus que les nouvelles interdictions issues des modifications de 2012 constituent une peine.

[50] Premièrement, elles font partie des sanctions dont est passible un accusé pour une infraction donnée. Le paragraphe 161(1) exige du juge qui détermine la peine qu'il se demande s'il convient ou non d'exercer le pouvoir discrétionnaire qui lui permet de soumettre à des mesures de surveillance dans la collectivité le contrevenant qui est déclaré coupable d'une infraction sexuelle énumérée à l'égard d'une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans. L'ordonnance fondée sur l'art. 161 est donc une conséquence de la déclaration de culpabilité, et le ministère public ne le conteste pas.

[52] En ce qui a trait à l'objectif, les dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 sont censées protéger les enfants en isolant le contrevenant du reste de la société, en favorisant la réinsertion sociale et en décourageant la violence sexuelle, des objectifs de la détermination de la peine qui figurent tous à l'art. 718 du Code criminel. De plus, le processus discrétionnaire et souple à l'issue duquel est rendue l'ordonnance prévue à l'art. 161 respecte les principes de détermination de la peine énoncés aux art. 718.1 et 718.2. Je le répète, le fait qu'une telle ordonnance est rendue pour protéger les enfants n'est pas décisif en soi.

[53] Il y a lieu de distinguer l'ordonnance portant interdiction de celle qui autorise le prélèvement d'un échantillon d'ADN, cette dernière n'étant pas assimilée à une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*) (voir is primarily to facilitate the investigation of future crimes, rather than to achieve deterrence, denunciation, separation, or rehabilitation in connection with a past offence: see Rodgers, at para. 64.

[54] Turning to the impact of the amendments, both s. 161(1)(c) and (d) can have a significant impact on the liberty and security of offenders — potentially for the rest of their lives. This Court has recognized that living in the community under restrictions can attract a considerable degree of stigma (R. v. Proulx, 2000 SCC 5, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 61, at para. 105). Further, a prohibition under s. 161(1)(c) on having any contact with persons under the age of 16 could potentially curtail the types of employment an offender can pursue, and an offender's ability to interact with people (including adults in the company of children) in public and private spaces. And depriving an offender under s. 161(1)(d) of access to the Internet is tantamount to severing that person from an increasingly indispensable component of everyday life:

> The Internet has become a hub for every kind of human activity, from education to recreation to commerce. It is no longer merely a window to the world. For a growing number of people, the Internet is their world — a place where one can do nearly everything one needs or wants to do. The Web provides virtual opportunities for people to shop, meet new people, converse with friends and family, transact business, network and find jobs, bank, read the newspaper, watch movies, and attend classes. For many Canadians, membership in online communities is an integral component of citizenship and personhood. In my view, retrospectively excluding offenders from these virtual communal Rodgers, par. 65). Rappelons que l'objectif de l'ordonnance qui autorise le prélèvement d'un échantillon d'ADN est principalement de faciliter l'enquête relative à de futurs crimes, plutôt que de dissuader, de dénoncer, d'isoler ou de réinsérer socialement en lien avec une infraction antérieure (voir Rodgers, par. 64).

[54] En ce qui concerne l'incidence des modifications, les al. 161(1)c) et d) peuvent tous deux avoir une grande incidence sur la liberté et la sécurité du contrevenant, peut-être même pour le reste de ses jours. La Cour reconnaît que le fait de vivre dans la collectivité en étant soumis à des conditions strictes peut engendrer une stigmatisation non négligeable (R. c. Proulx, 2000 CSC 5, [2000] 1 R.C.S. 61, par. 105). En outre, l'interdiction fondée sur l'al. 161(1)c) d'avoir des contacts avec une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans est susceptible de réduire les domaines d'emploi qui s'offrent au contrevenant et la possibilité qu'il a d'interagir avec autrui (y compris les adultes accompagnés d'enfants) dans les lieux publics et privés. Empêcher le contrevenant d'avoir accès à Internet sur le fondement de l'al. 161(1)d) équivaut à le tenir à l'écart d'un élément de plus en plus essentiel à la vie quotidienne :

> [TRADUCTION] Internet est désormais au centre de l'activité humaine dans tous les domaines, qu'il s'agisse de l'éducation ou du commerce, voire des loisirs. Ce n'est plus une simple fenêtre sur le monde. Pour un nombre croissant de personnes, Internet est leur monde, un endroit où l'on peut faire presque tout ce que l'on a besoin de faire ou que l'on souhaite faire. La toile offre la possibilité virtuelle de magasiner, de faire des rencontres, d'échanger avec les amis et la famille, de mener ses activités, de réseauter et de trouver un emploi, d'effectuer des opérations bancaires, de lire le journal, de regarder des films et de suivre des cours. Pour de nombreux Canadiens, l'appartenance à des communautés en ligne fait partie intégrante de la citoyenneté et de l'identité individuelle. À mon avis, l'exclusion d'un contrevenant de tels espaces spaces is a substantial consequence that implicates the fairness and rule of law concerns underlying the s. 11(i) right.

[55] The significant impact the 2012 amendments can have on the liberty and security of offenders is another way in which these sanctions are distinguishable from DNA orders. I agree with Doherty J.A. that "a sentencing provision requiring an accused to provide a DNA sample upon conviction . . . does not meaningfully impair the accused's liberty or security of the person and would not be regarded as punishment" (Hooyer, at para. 45).

[56] I also note that the text of s. 161(1) ("in addition to any other punishment" or "en plus de toute autre peine"), while certainly not determinative, is nonetheless informative. As Groberman J.A. observed in dissent at the Court of Appeal, "Parliament itself appears to have considered that the sanctions set out in s. 161(1) come within the ordinary meaning of the word 'punishment'" (para. 78) or "peine".[3]

[57] In sum, the prohibitions found in the 2012 amendments to s. 161(1) constitute punishment for the purposes of s. 11(i) of the Charter. They are a consequence of conviction, imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing, and they can have a significant impact on the liberty and security of offenders. Clearly, the 2012 amendments constitute greater punishment than the previous prohibitions: under the new s. 161(1)(c), a judge can prohibit all contact with children, no matter the means (not just contact involving a computer system); and under the new s. 161(1)(d), a judge can prohibit an offender from using the Internet or communs virtuels par l'application rétrospective de la nouvelle disposition constitue une conséquence importante qui met en cause l'équité des procédures criminelles et la primauté du droit, deux notions qui sous-tendent l'al. 11*i*).

[55] La grande incidence des modifications de 2012 sur le droit à la liberté et à la sécurité du contrevenant offre un autre moyen de distinguer les nouvelles sanctions de l'autorisation de prélever un échantillon d'ADN. Je conviens avec le juge Doherty que [TRADUCTION] « la disposition sur la peine qui exige de l'accusé qu'il fournisse un échantillon d'ADN une fois déclaré coupable [. . .] ne porte pas sensiblement atteinte au droit à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne et [qu']on ne saurait voir dans son application l'infliction d'une peine » (Hooyer, par. 45).

[56] Je remarque aussi que le libellé du par. 161(1) (« en plus de toute autre peine » ou, en anglais, « in addition to any other punishment ») est instructif même s'il n'est assurément pas décisif. Comme le fait observer le juge dissident Groberman de la Cour d'appel, [TRADUCTION] « le législateur semble lui-même considérer que chacune des sanctions énoncées au par. 161(1) constitue une "peine" (ou, en anglais, "punishment") au sens ordinaire du mot » (par. 78)[3].

[57] En résumé, les interdictions issues des modifications apportées au par. 161(1) en 2012 constituent une peine pour l'application de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte. Elles sont une conséquence de la déclaration de culpabilité, elles sont conformes à l'objectif et aux principes de la détermination de la peine et elles peuvent avoir une grande incidence sur le droit à la liberté et à la sécurité du contrevenant. De toute évidence, elles emportent l'infliction d'une peine plus importante que les interdictions antérieures : le nouvel al. 161(1)c) permet au juge d'interdire tout contact avec un enfant, quel que soit le moyen utilisé (pas seulement l'ordinateur), et le nouvel al. 161(1)d) confère au juge le pouvoir d'interdire au contrevenant d'utiliser Internet ou tout autre réseau numérique à quelque fin (pas seulement pour entrer en contact avec des enfants). Par conséquent, l'application rétrospective des dispositions qui prévoient ces interdictions restreint le droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) puisqu'elle empêche l'appelant de faire l'objet des mesures de surveillance dans la collectivité moins restrictives qui figuraient dans la version antérieure de l'art. 161, c'est-à-dire de la « peine la moins sévère ».

[3] The French text of s. 11(i) reads as follows: "Tout inculpé a le droit . . . i) de bénéficier de la peine la moins sévère, lorsque la peine qui sanctionne l'infraction dont il est déclaré coupable est modifiée entre le moment de la perpétration de l'infraction et celui de la sentence."

[3] Voici le libellé anglais de l'al. 11*i*) : « Any person charged with an offence has the right [. . .] i) if found guilty of the offence and if the punishment for the offence has been varied between the time of commission and the time of sentencing, to the benefit of the lesser punishment. » other digital network for any purpose (not just for the purpose of contacting children). Accordingly, the retrospective operation of these provisions limits the s. 11(i) right as it deprives the appellant of the benefit of the less restrictive community supervision measures captured in the previous version of s. 161 — that is, the "lesser punishment".

B. Is the Limitation of Section 11(i) Justified Under Section 1 of the Charter?

B. La restriction du droit garanti par l'al. 11i) se justifie-t-elle au regard de l'article premier de la Charte?

[58] Section 1 of the Charter provides as follows:

[58] L'article premier de la Charte est libellé comme suit :

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

1. La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés. Ils ne peuvent être restreints que par une règle de droit, dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

To establish that the limitation on the appellant's s. 11(i) right is reasonable and demonstrably justified, the government must show that the 2012 amendments have a sufficiently important objective "and that the means chosen are proportional to that object[ive]" (Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 331, at para. 94). A law is proportionate if (1) there is a rational connection between the means adopted and the objective; (2) it is minimally impairing in that there are no alternative means that may achieve the same objective with a lesser degree of rights limitation; and (3) there is proportionality between the deleterious and salutary effects of the law (R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103; Carter, at para. 94). The proportionality inquiry is a normative and contextual one, which requires courts to examine the broader picture by "balanc[ing] the interests of society with those of individuals and groups" (Oakes, at p. 139).

Pour établir que la restriction du droit de l'appelant garanti par l'al. 11*i*) est raisonnable et que sa justification peut se démontrer, l'État doit montrer que les modifications de 2012 ont un objectif suffisamment important « et que les moyens choisis sont proportionnels à cet obje[ctif] » (Carter c. Canada (Procureur général), 2015 CSC 5, [2015] 1 R.C.S. 331, par. 94). Une règle de droit est proportionnée à son objectif lorsque (1) le moyen retenu est rationnellement lié à cet objectif, (2) qu'elle est minimalement attentatoire en ce qu'il n'existe aucun autre moyen d'atteindre le même objectif en restreignant moins le droit en cause et (3) qu'il y a proportionnalité entre ses effets préjudiciables et ses effets bénéfiques (R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103; Carter, par. 94). L'examen de la proportionnalité se veut à la fois normatif et contextuel et exige du tribunal qu'il considère le tableau tout entier en « soupes[ant] les intérêts de la société et ceux de particuliers et de groupes » (Oakes, p. 139).

[59] Unfortunately, s. 1 was not dealt with in the courts below. This means we do not have the benefit of a full record, including expert testimony. But the parties urged us to consider s. 1 on the record before us. This Court therefore deals with this issue, on consent, as a court of first instance.

[60] The Crown adduced fresh evidence attached to two affidavits, consisting of statistics and social science articles relating to the issue of the recidivism of sexual offenders. The appellant did not oppose the admission of this evidence and I am satisfied it would be appropriate to receive it. Accordingly, in assessing whether the Crown has discharged its justificatory burden, I will consider the Crown's fresh evidence as "supplemented by common sense and inferential reasoning", in addition to the jurisprudence and legislative debates proffered by the parties (R. v. Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 45, at para. 78).

(1) Do the 2012 Amendments Have a Sufficiently Important Objective?

[61] A law that limits a constitutional right must do so in pursuit of a sufficiently important objective that is consistent with the values of a free and democratic society. This examination is a threshold requirement that is undertaken without considering the scope of the right infringement, the means employed, or the relationship between the positive and negative effects of the law.

[62] The appellant correctly submits that the relevant objective is that of the infringing measure: see Toronto Star Newspapers Ltd. v. Canada, 2010 SCC 21, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 721, at para. 20. Here, the infringing measure is the retrospective operation of the impugned law. However, the more general purpose behind the enactment of the 2012 amendments informs the specific rationale for applying the amendments retrospectively.

[60] Le ministère public a produit une preuve nouvelle jointe en annexe à deux affidavits. Il s'agit de statistiques et d'articles relevant des sciences sociales et portant sur la récidive en matière d'infractions sexuelles. L'appelant ne s'est pas opposé à l'admission de ces éléments de preuve, et je suis convaincue qu'il convient de les recevoir. Par conséquent, pour décider si le ministère public s'est acquitté de son obligation de justification, j'examinerai la preuve nouvelle de l'intimée en la « complét[ant] par le bon sens et le raisonnement par déduction », ce à quoi s'ajouteront la jurisprudence et le compte rendu des débats législatifs soumis par les parties (R. c. Sharpe, 2001 CSC 2, [2001] 1 R.C.S. 45, par. 78).

(1) Les dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 ont-elles un objectif suffisamment important?

[62] L'appelant soutient à bon droit que l'objectif à considérer est celui de la mesure attentatoire (voir Toronto Star Newspapers Ltd. c. Canada, 2010 CSC 21, [2010] 1 R.C.S. 721, par. 20). En l'espèce, la mesure attentatoire réside dans l'application rétrospective de la règle de droit en cause. Toutefois, l'objectif général des dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 joue dans la raison d'être particulière de leur application rétrospective.

[63] The appellant argues that the objective of the retrospective operation of the 2012 amendments is to increase the punishment imposed on offenders who committed their offences prior to 2012 so as to more effectively further the purpose and principles of sentencing. In my view, this articulation of the law's purpose is not sufficiently precise and is essentially a description of the means the legislature has chosen to achieve its purpose: see Carter, at para. 76; see also R. v. Moriarity, 2015 SCC 55, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 485, at para. 28.

[64] As discussed above, the legislative history, judicial interpretation, and design of s. 161 all confirm that the overarching goal of the section is to protect children from sexual violence perpetrated by recidivists. And there is ample evidence in the legislative record surrounding the enactment of the new s. 161(1)(c) and (d) to show that enhancing child protection motivated the impugned amendments as well. To highlight but one example, at the debate accompanying the second reading of the Bill, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice said the amendments "see[k] to prevent . . . child sex offenders from having the opportunity to facilitate their offending. Finding access to a child or the opportunity to be alone with a child is a key for many child sex offenders" (House of Commons Debates, vol. 145, No. 110, 3rd Sess., 40th Parl., December 3, 2010, at p. 6787).

[64] Rappelons-le, l'historique législatif de l'art. 161, son interprétation judiciaire et la manière dont il est conçu confirment que l'objectif prépondérant de l'article est de protéger les enfants contre la violence sexuelle aux mains de récidivistes. Le dossier législatif des nouveaux al. 161(1)c) et d) renferme maints indices selon lesquels l'accroissement de la protection des enfants motivait tout autant les modifications en cause. Un seul exemple suffit à le montrer. Lors du débat en deuxième lecture, le secrétaire parlementaire du ministre de la Justice a dit que les modifications « vis[aient] [. . .] à ce que les personnes susceptibles de commettre une infraction sexuelle [. . .] ne puissent pas faciliter la perpétration de l'infraction. L'occasion d'être seul avec un enfant ou l'accès à un enfant est déterminant pour bon nombre de personnes qui commettent des infractions d'ordre sexuel contre un enfant » (Débats de la Chambre des communes, vol. 145, nº 110, 3e sess., 40e lég., 3 décembre 2010, p. 6787).

[66] Obviously, this objective is sufficiently important to warrant further scrutiny. As Laskin J.A. wrote in R. v. Budreo (2000), 46 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.), "Children are among the most vulnerable groups in our society. The sexual abuse of young children is a serious societal problem, a statement that needs no elaboration" (para. 37). Providing enhanced protection to children from becoming victims of sexual offences is vital in a free and democratic society.

(2) Are the Means Adopted Proportional to the Law's Objective?

[67] In assessing the proportionality of a law, a degree of deference is required. As this Court recently wrote in Carter:

> At this stage of the analysis, the courts must accord the legislature a measure of deference. Proportionality does not require perfection: Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 467, at para. 78. Section 1 only requires that the limits be "reasonable". [para. 97]

(a) Rational Connection

[68] At this first step of the proportionality inquiry, the government must demonstrate that the means used by the limiting law are rationally connected to the purpose the law was designed to achieve. "To establish a rational connection, the government need only show that there is a causal connection between the infringement and the benefit sought 'on the basis of reason or logic'" (Carter, at para. 99, citing RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 153).

[69] As the appellant concedes, there is clearly a rational connection between providing enhanced protection to children from the risks of sexual violence presented by offenders who committed their offences before the 2012 amendments came into force (the objective) and retrospectively giving

[66] De toute évidence, cet objectif est suffisamment important pour justifier la poursuite de l'examen. Comme l'écrit le juge Laskin dans R. c. Budreo (2000), 46 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.), [TRADUCTION] « [l]es enfants font partie des groupes les plus vulnérables de notre société. La violence sexuelle dont sont victimes de jeunes enfants constitue un sérieux problème social, point n'est besoin de le démontrer » (par. 37). Offrir aux enfants une protection accrue afin qu'ils ne soient pas victimes d'infractions sexuelles est vital dans une société libre et démocratique.

(2) Le moyen retenu par le législateur est-il proportionné à l'objectif de la règle de droit?

[67] Une certaine déférence s'impose lorsqu'il s'agit d'apprécier la proportionnalité d'une règle de droit. Comme l'écrit la Cour dans le récent arrêt Carter :

> À ce stade de l'analyse, les tribunaux doivent faire preuve d'une certaine déférence à l'endroit du législateur. La proportionnalité ne nécessite pas la perfection : Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) c. Whatcott, 2013 CSC 11, [2013] 1 R.C.S. 467, par. 78. L'article premier exige seulement que les limites soient « raisonnables ». [par. 97]

a) Lien rationnel

[68] À cette première étape de l'examen de la proportionnalité, l'État doit démontrer que le législateur restreint le droit d'une manière qui a un lien rationnel avec l'objectif de la règle de droit. « Pour prouver l'existence d'un lien rationnel, le gouvernement n'a qu'à démontrer l'existence d'un lien causal, "fondé sur la raison ou la logique", entre la violation et l'avantage recherché » (Carter, par. 99, citant RJR-MacDonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 R.C.S. 199, par. 153).

[69] Comme le concède l'appelant, il existe manifestement un lien rationnel entre la protection accrue des enfants contre le risque de violence sexuelle que représente le délinquant dont les actes criminels sont antérieurs à l'entrée en vigueur des dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 sentencing judges the discretionary power to limit those offenders who pose a continuing risk to children in contacting children in person or online, and in engaging with online child pornography (the means chosen). Although the Crown's fresh evidence, which I discuss below, assists in solidifying this causal link, at this stage, I am satisfied that reason and logic suffice to establish that Parliament proceeded rationally in opting to give s. 161(1)(c) and (d) retrospective effect in order to better protect children from recidivism risks posed by offenders who committed their offences before the 2012 amendments came into force.

(b) Minimal Impairment

[70] The question at this second stage is whether the 2012 amendments are minimally impairing, in the sense that "the limit on the right is reasonably tailored to the objective" (Carter, at para. 102). It is only when there are alternative, less harmful means of achieving the government's objective "in a real and substantial manner" that a law should fail the minimal impairment test (Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 567, at para. 55).

[71] I am satisfied that the retrospective operation of the prohibitions contained in the 2012 amendments is minimally impairing of s. 11(i).

[72] The amendments were enacted within the context of a highly discretionary provision that is tailored to its objective. Prohibitions listed in s. 161(1) are to be imposed only when a judge is satisfied that the specific offender poses a continued risk to children upon his release into the community and that the specific terms of the order are a reasonable attempt to minimize the risk. The law is therefore not "drafted in a way that unnecessarily catches (l'objectif) et l'octroi rétrospectif au tribunal qui détermine la peine d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire lui permettant de soumettre à des contraintes le contrevenant qui représente toujours un risque pour les enfants du fait qu'il peut communiquer en personne ou en ligne avec eux et accéder à de la pornographie juvénile en ligne (le moyen choisi). Bien que la preuve nouvelle du ministère public — sur laquelle je reviens plus loin — étoffe ce lien causal, je suis convaincue à ce stade que la raison et la logique suffisent pour établir que le législateur a agi de manière rationnelle en conférant aux al. 161(1)c) et d) un effet rétrospectif afin de mieux protéger les enfants contre le risque de récidive chez le délinquant sexuel dont les actes criminels sont antérieurs à l'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles dispositions en 2012.

b) Atteinte minimale

[70] La question à trancher à cette deuxième étape est celle de savoir si les nouvelles dispositions portent atteinte le moins possible au droit constitutionnel, c'est-à-dire si « la restriction du droit est raisonnablement adaptée à l'objectif » (Carter, par. 102). Ce n'est que lorsqu'il existe d'autres moyens moins préjudiciables de réaliser l'objectif de l'État « de façon réelle et substantielle » qu'une loi ne satisfait pas à l'exigence de l'atteinte minimale (Alberta c. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 CSC 37, [2009] 2 R.C.S. 567, par. 55).

[71] Je suis convaincue que l'application rétrospective des interdictions issues des modifications de 2012 porte atteinte le moins possible à l'al. 11*i*).

[72] Les modifications ont été apportées à une disposition qui confère un pouvoir hautement discrétionnaire et qui est adaptée à son objectif. Les interdictions du par. 161(1) ne doivent être prononcées que si le tribunal est convaincu que le contrevenant exposera toujours les enfants à un risque une fois libéré et rendu à la collectivité et que les conditions dont est assortie l'ordonnance visent raisonnablement à réduire le risque. La disposition [conduct] that has little or nothing to do with the prevention of harm to children" (Sharpe, at para. 95). In other words, the retrospective use of s. 161(1)(c) and (d) is available only when a judge is satisfied that the prohibitions will advance the enhanced child-protection goal of the amendments. No risk, no retrospective order.

[73] Further, s. 161(1) permits a sentencing judge to impose any conditions or exemptions that correspond to the circumstances of a particular offender. Section 161(1)(c) provides that offenders may have contact with persons under the age of 16 if "the offender does so under the supervision of a person whom the court considers appropriate". Similarly, s. 161(1)(d) permits offenders to use the Internet if "the offender does so in accordance with conditions set by the court". Finally, the prohibition order can be limited in duration (s. 161(2)) and reviewed periodically to ensure it continues to correspond to an offender's circumstances (s. 161(3)).

[74] Despite the highly discretionary and tailored nature of s. 161, the appellant argues that the impugned amendments are not minimally impairing because the Crown has failed to demonstrate that a purely prospective application of the amendments would undermine its objective.[4] Although I will discuss the potential gaps in the evidentiary record more fully below when I weigh the deleterious and salutary effects of the law, I would not give effect to this submission at the minimal impairment stage, for a few reasons.

n'est donc pas « rédigée de manière à englober inutilement [une conduite] qui n'a que peu ou [qui n'a] rien à voir avec la prévention du préjudice causé aux enfants » (Sharpe, par. 95). En d'autres mots, le recours rétrospectif aux nouveaux al. 161(1)c) et d) peut seulement intervenir lorsque le tribunal est convaincu que les interdictions favoriseront l'objectif des modifications, à savoir la protection accrue des enfants. Pas de risque, pas d'application rétrospective.

[73] En outre, le par. 161(1) permet au tribunal qui détermine la peine de prévoir toute condition ou exemption que commande la situation du contrevenant. L'alinéa 161(1)c) dispose que le contrevenant peut communiquer avec une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans s'il le fait « sous la supervision d'une personne que le tribunal estime convenir en l'occurrence ». Dans la même veine, l'al. 161(1)d) permet au contrevenant d'utiliser Internet s'il le fait « en conformité avec les conditions imposées par le tribunal ». Enfin, l'interdiction peut avoir une durée limitée (par. 161(2)) et être révisée périodiquement pour s'assurer qu'elle est toujours adaptée à la situation du contrevenant (par. 161(3)).

[74] L'appelant fait valoir que même si l'art. 161 confère un pouvoir hautement discrétionnaire et est adapté à son objectif, les dispositions en cause ne portent pas atteinte le moins possible au droit garanti, car le ministère public n'a pas démontré que si elles ne s'appliquaient que prospectivement la réalisation de leur objectif serait compromise[4]. Je reviendrai plus en détail sur les lacunes possibles du dossier de preuve lorsque je soupèserai les effets préjudiciables et les effets bénéfiques de la règle de droit, mais je ne retiens pas l'argument au regard du volet de l'atteinte minimale, et ce, pour plusieurs raisons.

[4] It was not argued that other prohibition regimes in the Criminal Code (such as those found in ss. 810, 810.1, or 810.2) could have achieved the government's objective in a real and substantial manner.

[4] Nul n'a fait valoir que d'autres régimes d'interdiction du Code criminel (dont ceux correspondant aux art. 810, 810.1 et 810.2) auraient pu permettre à l'État d'atteindre son objectif de façon réelle et substantielle.

[75] It is widely accepted (and the record confirms) that a non-trivial percentage of sex offenders will reoffend. If the amendments operated only prospectively, a sentencing judge would be unable to impose the prohibitions in s. 161(1)(c) and (d) on offenders who committed their crimes before 2012 even if the judge were satisfied that the prohibitions were required to minimize the risk to a child that a sex offender will recidivate. I therefore accept that a purely prospective application of the amendments would have prevented Parliament from fully realizing its objective of enhancing the protection s. 161 affords to children from offenders who committed their offences before the coming into force of the 2012 amendments. Further, accepting the appellant's argument would fail to accord sufficient deference, at this stage of the analysis, to the government's choice of legislative means. And questions pertaining to the extent of the efficacy of the retrospective operation of the 2012 amendments are best left to the next step of the analysis: proportionality of effects.

[76] In sum, given the discretionary and tailored nature of s. 161 and the fact that a purely prospective operation of the amendments would have compromised Parliament's full objective, I conclude that the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) and (d) impairs the s. 11(i) right as little as reasonably possible.[5] The more difficult issue is whether the benefits achieved from imposing the 2012 amendments retrospectively outweigh the deleterious effects.

[75] On reconnaît généralement (et le dossier confirme) qu'un pourcentage non négligeable de délinquants sexuels récidive. Si les nouvelles dispositions ne s'appliquaient que prospectivement, le tribunal qui détermine la peine ne pourrait soumettre aux interdictions prévues par les nouveaux al. 161(1)c) et d) le contrevenant dont les actes criminels sont antérieurs à 2012 *même s'*il était convaincu qu'elles sont nécessaires à la réduction du risque qu'un enfant soit victime de la récidive d'un délinquant sexuel. Par conséquent, je conviens qu'une application strictement prospective n'aurait pas permis au législateur de réaliser pleinement son objectif d'accroître la protection que l'art. 161 offre aux enfants contre un délinquant dont les actes criminels sont antérieurs à l'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles dispositions en 2012. En outre, faire droit à la prétention de l'appelant reviendrait à déférer insuffisamment, à ce stade de l'analyse, à la décision de l'État d'opter pour une mesure législative plutôt qu'une autre. Il vaut mieux reporter l'examen des questions liées au degré d'efficacité de l'application rétrospective à l'étape suivante de l'analyse, celle de la proportionnalité des effets.

[5] It should be obvious from the above analysis that, had Parliament adopted a less tailored and discretionary regime, the 2012 amendments may very well have failed the minimal impairment test. It is accordingly unclear how my articulation of the purpose of the impugned amendments has rendered the minimal impairment analysis "redundant", as my colleague Brown J. alleges (para. 138). On the contrary, the minimal impairment test remains an important part of assessing whether Parliament has discharged its burden under s. 1.

[5] Il devrait apparaître clairement de l'analyse qui précède que si le législateur avait opté pour un régime moins adapté et de nature moins discrétionnaire, les dispositions issues des modifications de 2012 auraient fort bien pu ne pas satisfaire au critère de l'atteinte minimale. Je m'explique donc mal comment ma formulation de l'objectif des modifications en cause a pu rendre « superfl[u] » l'examen de l'atteinte minimale comme le prétend mon collègue le juge Brown (par. 138). Au contraire, ce critère demeure un rouage important de la démarche qui consiste à se demander si le législateur s'est acquitté de son obligation pour les besoins de l'article premier.

(c) Proportionality of Effects

[77] At this final stage of the proportionality analysis, the Court must "weig[h] the impact of the law on protected rights against the beneficial effect of the law in terms of the greater public good" (Carter, at para. 122).[6] This final stage is an important one because it performs a fundamentally distinct role. As a majority of this Court observed in Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 877:

> The focus of the first and second steps of the proportionality analysis is not the relationship between the measures and the Charter right in question, but rather the relationship between the ends of the legislation and the means employed. . . . The third stage of the proportionality analysis provides an opportunity to assess, in light of the practical and contextual details which are elucidated in the first and second stages, whether the benefits which accrue from the limitation are proportional to its deleterious effects as measured by the values underlying the Charter. [para. 125]

[78] It is for this reason that Aharon Barak, former President of the Supreme Court of Israel, has described this final step as "the very heart of proportionality" ("Proportional Effect: The Israeli Experience" (2007), 57 U.T.L.J. 369, at p. 380). And in Hutterian Brethren, Abella J. wrote: ". . . most of the heavy conceptual lifting and balancing ought to be done at the final step — proportionality. Proportionality is, after all, what s. 1 is about" (para. 149).

[79] I agree. While the minimal impairment test has come to dominate much of the s. 1 discourse in Canada, this final step permits courts to address the essence of the proportionality enquiry at the

[6] In Oakes, this final stage of the proportionality analysis was initially conceived as a comparison between the deleterious effects of the limiting measure and the law's objective. However, in Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835, Lamer C.J. reformulated the test to account for the "proportionality between the deleterious and the salutary effects of the measur[e]" because characterizing the final step "as being concerned solely with the balance between the objective and the deleterious effects of a measure rests on too narrow a conception of proportionality" (p. 889 (emphasis deleted)).

c) Proportionnalité des effets

[77] À cette dernière étape de l'examen de la proportionnalité, la Cour doit « mettre en balance l'incidence de la loi sur les droits protégés et l'effet bénéfique de la loi au plan de l'intérêt supérieur du public » (Carter, par. 122)[6]. Il s'agit d'une étape importante, car son rôle est fondamentalement distinct. Comme le font observer les juges majoritaires de la Cour dans Thomson Newspapers Co. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1998] 1 R.C.S. 877 :

> Les première et deuxième étapes de l'analyse de la proportionnalité ne portent pas sur le rapport entre les mesures et le droit en question garanti par la Charte, mais plutôt sur le rapport entre les objectifs de la loi et les moyens employés. [. . .] La troisième étape de l'analyse de la proportionnalité donne l'occasion d'apprécier, à la lumière des détails d'ordre pratique et contextuel qui ont été dégagés aux première et deuxième étapes, si les avantages découlant de la limitation sont proportionnels aux effets préjudiciables, mesurés au regard des valeurs consacrées par la Charte. [par. 125]

[78] C'est la raison pour laquelle l'ancien président de la Cour suprême d'Israël, Aharon Barak, voit dans cette dernière étape [TRADUCTION] « le cœur même de la proportionnalité » (« Proportional Effect : The Israeli Experience » (2007), 57 U.T.L.J. 369, p. 380). Et, dans l'arrêt Hutterian Brethren, la juge Abella écrit que « la majeure partie de l'analyse conceptuelle doit être faite à l'étape finale — celle de la proportionnalité. Après tout, c'est de la proportionnalité dont il est censé être question à l'article premier » (par. 149).

[79] Je suis d'accord. Bien que, de nos jours, au Canada, l'atteinte minimale occupe la place la plus grande dans le discours sur l'article premier, le tribunal peut, à cette dernière étape, se pencher sur heart of s. 1.[7] It is only at this final stage that courts can transcend the law's purpose and engage in a robust examination of the law's impact on Canada's free and democratic society "in direct and explicit terms" (J. Cameron, "The Past, Present, and Future of Expressive Freedom Under the Charter" (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 1, at p. 66). In other words, this final step allows courts to stand back to determine on a normative basis whether a rights infringement is justified in a free and democratic society. Although this examination entails difficult value judgments, it is preferable to make these judgments explicit, as doing so enhances the transparency and intelligibility of the ultimate decision. Further, as mentioned, proceeding to this final stage permits appropriate deference to Parliament's choice of means, as well as its full legislative objective.

[80] In this case, there are important differences between the effects of the two impugned amendments. I will therefore consider the two provisions separately.

(i) Balancing the Deleterious and Salutary Effects of the Retrospective Operation of Section 161(1)(c) of the Criminal Code

[81] The deleterious effects flowing from the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) are substantial. At the individual level, in depriving offenders of the benefit of the lesser punishment, s. 161(1)(c) prevents the appellant and other offenders from freely participating in society following their release into the community. Before the new s. 161(1)(c) was introduced, outside the digital realm, judges could prohibit offenders only from attending public parks, public swimming pools, daycare centres, l'essence de l'examen de la proportionnalité qui est au cœur de l'application de l'article premier[7]. Ce n'est qu'à la dernière étape que le tribunal peut transcender l'objectif de la règle de droit et se livrer à un examen rigoureux de l'incidence de la règle de droit sur la société libre et démocratique canadienne [TRADUCTION] « d'une manière directe et explicite » (J. Cameron, « The Past, Present, and Future of Expressive Freedom Under the Charter » (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 1, p. 66). Autrement dit, cette dernière étape permet au tribunal de prendre du recul pour décider, sous l'angle normatif, si l'atteinte au droit est justifiée dans une société libre et démocratique. Même si l'examen suppose des jugements de valeur difficiles, il vaut mieux faire en sorte que ces jugements soient explicites de manière à accroître la transparence et l'intelligibilité de la décision ultime. En outre, je le rappelle, cette dernière étape donne au tribunal l'occasion de faire preuve de la déférence qui s'impose envers le législateur quant au moyen retenu et à l'objectif global poursuivi.

[80] En l'espèce, il existe des différences importantes entre les effets des deux dispositions issues des modifications. Je les examine donc séparément.

(i) Mise en balance des effets préjudiciables et des effets bénéfiques de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) du Code criminel [81] Les effets préjudiciables de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) sont importants. À l'échelle individuelle, en privant l'appelant de son droit de bénéficier de la peine la moins sévère, l'alinéa l'empêche — ainsi que d'autres contrevenants — de participer librement à la société une fois libéré et rendu à la collectivité. Avant l'adoption du nouvel al. 161(1)c), le tribunal pouvait seulement, à l'extérieur du domaine numérique, interdire au contrevenant de fréquenter un parc public, une piscine, une schoolgrounds, playgrounds, and community centres, or from seeking employment or volunteer opportunities involving children. The new s. 161(1)(c) potentially goes much further and prohibits "any contact — including communicating by any means — with a person who is under the age of 16 years" in a public or private space. For example, offenders might be prohibited from conversing with younger members of their family, or from freely moving about certain private and public spaces where children are present. This expanded prohibition, relative to the more limited prohibitions that existed previously, constitutes a substantial intrusion on the liberty and security of certain offenders.

garderie, le terrain d'une école, un terrain de jeu ou un centre communautaire, ou de rechercher un emploi ou d'offrir ses services comme bénévole dans un domaine lié aux enfants. Le nouvel al. 161(1)c) pourrait permettre au tribunal d'aller beaucoup plus loin et de lui interdire d'avoir « des contacts — notamment communiquer par quelque moyen que ce soit — avec une personne âgée de moins de seize ans » dans un lieu public ou privé. Par exemple, le tribunal pourrait interdire au contrevenant de parler avec les jeunes membres de sa famille ou de se trouver dans un endroit privé ou public où il y a des enfants. Par rapport aux interdictions de portée plus restreinte qui existaient auparavant, il s'agit d'un empiétement substantiel sur le droit à la liberté et à la sécurité de certains contrevenants.

[82] The deleterious effects experienced by specific offenders translate into broader societal harms. By impacting people like the appellant with a punishment of which they had no notice, the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) undermines fairness in criminal proceedings and compromises the rule of law. These are core tenets of our justice system.

[82] Les effets préjudiciables subis par les contrevenants individuels se traduisent par un préjudice plus large infligé à la société. En condamnant un contrevenant comme l'appelant à une peine dont il ne se savait pas passible, l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) compromet l'équité des procédures criminelles et la primauté du droit, deux préceptes fondamentaux de notre système de justice.

[83] The adverse impact the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) has on fairness and the rule of law is particularly acute because, in broadening the scope of prohibited conduct, Parliament does not appear to have been responding to an emerging threat, or an evolving social context. Unfortunately, sexual offences against children have persisted for centuries. Setting aside for the moment the use of technology to contact young people, which is captured by s. 161(1)(d), why was additional protection required in 2012? In terms of sexual offences resulting from physical proximity, on this record, there appears to have been little change in the nature and degree of risk facing children since the last time s. 161(1) was amended. The dearth of a compelling temporal justification for imposing s. 161(1)(c) retrospectively enhances the damage the provision does to fairness and the rule of law, and thus undermines public confidence in the criminal justice system.

[84] The Crown submits that the benefit of retrospectively applying s. 161(1)(c) is that more children will be protected from sexual violence. In advancing this claim, the Crown chiefly relies on social science articles and statistics relating to recidivism of sexual offenders in order to clarify the risk children face when sexual offenders are released into the community.

[85] The Crown's social science articles endeavour to quantify rates of recidivism of sexual offenders. One article pegged the recidivism rates for "child molesters" at 13% 5 years following the commission of the offence, 18% after 10 years, and 23% after 15 years.[8] The authors found that the recidivism rate for sexual offenders who victimize extra familial young boys (35% after 15 years) is significantly higher than the average recidivism rate for all sexual offenders (24% after 15 years) (p. 8). These recidivism rates were confirmed by another article adduced by the Crown, which asserts that "[s]exual interest in children was a significant predictor of sexual recidivism".[9] That is, "[t]hose individuals with identifiable interests in deviant sexual activities were among those most likely to continue sexual offending. The evidence was strongest for sexual interest in children" (p. 15). The authors further observed that these figures "should be considered to underestimate the real recidivism rates" par. 161(1). L'inexistence d'une justification d'ordre temporel convaincante de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) accroît l'atteinte à l'équité des procédures criminelles et à la primauté du droit et mine par conséquent la confiance du public dans le système de justice criminelle.

[84] Le ministère public soutient que l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) permet de protéger plus d'enfants contre la violence sexuelle. Il invoque principalement à l'appui de sa prétention des articles et des statistiques relevant des sciences sociales et portant sur la récidive sexuelle afin de préciser le risque que courent les enfants lorsqu'un délinquant sexuel est libéré et rendu à la collectivité.

[85] Les auteurs des articles en question tentent de déterminer le taux de récidive en matière d'infractions sexuelles. Dans le cas des « agresseurs d'enfants », l'un d'eux fixe ce taux à 13 p. 100 cinq ans après la perpétration de l'infraction, à 18 p. 100 dix ans après et à 23 p. 100 quinze ans après[8]. Les auteurs concluent que le taux de récidive des délinquants sexuels qui s'en prennent à de jeunes garçons qui ne font pas partie de leur famille (35 p. 100 quinze ans après l'infraction) est de beaucoup supérieur à la moyenne pour l'ensemble des délinquants sexuels (24 p. 100 quinze ans après) (p. 10). Un autre article confirme ces données, et son auteur ajoute que « [l'existence chez ces délinquants d']intérêts sexuels à l'égard des enfants constitu[e] un prédicateur significatif de la récidive sexuelle »[9]. Autrement dit, « [l]es délinquants qui manifest[ent] des intérêts identifiables à l'égard d'activités sexuelles déviantes [sont] parmi les plus susceptibles de continuer à commettre des because sexual crimes are significantly underreported (p. 8).

[86] These recidivism rates are significant. I accept that a non-trivial number of sexual offenders commit further sexual crimes after being released into the community. And the odds of this occurring appear to increase in the context of sexual offences against children. This is the harm the 2012 amendments are aimed at mitigating.

[87] The Crown also seeks to demonstrate the beneficial effects of making these enhanced prohibitions available retrospectively through statistics relating to the number of offenders potentially impacted by the 2012 amendments. Since the amendments came into force and as of May 14, 2015, 157 s. 161 orders have been imposed in British Columbia on offenders who committed their offences prior to August 9, 2012. And as of that same date there were 239 accused persons in British Columbia charged with offences captured by s. 161 that were committed prior to the coming into force of the 2012 amendments. On a national scale, these numbers would clearly be much higher. These statistics suggest that if the 2012 amendments cannot operate retrospectively, sentencing judges will be unable to consider imposing the enhanced prohibitions found in s. 161(1)(c) and (d) on many hundreds of sex offenders across the nation.

[88] I accept that the Crown's fresh evidence assists in identifying recidivism rates and the number of offenders who stand to be impacted by the retrospective operation of the 2012 amendments. Real risks to children are certainly present. And I accept that a provision prohibiting contact between sexual offenders and children will, to some extent, assist in mitigating these risks.

infractions sexuelles. La preuve [est] particulièrement solide pour l'intérêt sexuel à l'égard des enfants » (p. 18). Les auteurs font aussi observer que ces chiffres « doivent être considérés comme une sous-estimation des taux de récidive réels », étant donné que les crimes sexuels sont nettement sous-signalés (p. 10).

[86] Ces taux de récidive sont élevés. Je conviens qu'un nombre non négligeable de délinquants sexuels commettent d'autres crimes sexuels après leur libération et leur retour dans la collectivité. Et le risque de récidive sexuelle semble augmenter lorsque leurs victimes sont des enfants. Tel est le préjudice que les modifications de 2012 visaient à réduire.

[87] Le ministère public cherche aussi à démontrer les effets bénéfiques de l'application rétrospective des interdictions de portée accrue au moyen de statistiques sur le nombre de contrevenants susceptibles d'être touchés par les modifications de 2012. Entre l'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles dispositions et le 14 mai 2015, 157 ordonnances ont été rendues en Colombie-Britannique sur le fondement de l'art. 161 à l'endroit de contrevenants dont les actes criminels étaient antérieurs au 9 août 2012. En date du 14 mai 2015 et dans la même province, 239 personnes avaient été accusées d'infractions visées à l'art. 161 et commises avant l'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles dispositions. À l'échelle nationale, les chiffres sont assurément beaucoup plus élevés. Ces statistiques donnent à penser que si les nouvelles dispositions ne peuvent être appliquées rétrospectivement, les juges qui déterminent la peine ne pourront envisager de soumettre des centaines de délinquants sexuels partout au pays aux nouvelles interdictions prévues aux al. 161(1)c) et d).

[88] Je conviens que la preuve nouvelle du ministère public contribue à l'établissement des taux de récidive ainsi que du nombre de contrevenants susceptibles d'être touchés par l'application rétrospective des dispositions issues des modifications de 2012. Il existe assurément un risque réel pour les enfants. Je reconnais également qu'une disposition interdisant au délinquant sexuel d'avoir des contacts avec des enfants contribuera jusqu'à un certain point à réduire ce risque.

[89] However, the appellant correctly points out that the Crown has failed to lead much, if any, evidence to establish the degree of enhanced protection s. 161(1)(c) provides in comparison to the previous version of the prohibition. It is therefore unclear what effect the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) would have on the recidivism rates identified by the Crown. And there is no evidence demonstrating that the risks s. 161(1)(c) are directed at have changed quantitatively or qualitatively, such that the fundamental fairness and rule of law concerns would be mitigated. Even in the passages of the legislative record that the Crown put before this Court, it is striking that there was almost no discussion of why the amendments to s. 161(1)(c) were required to better protect children.

[90] Put simply, the precise benefits of the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) remain unclear. It can be difficult to prove a negative, which is why reason and logic are important complements to tangible evidence. And, to some extent, these evidentiary difficulties may be unavoidable. After all:

> Public policy is often based on approximations and extrapolations from the available evidence, inferences from comparative data, and, on occasion, even educated guesses. Absent a large-scale policy experiment, this is all the evidence that is likely to be available. Justice La Forest offered an observation in McKinney which rings true: "[d]ecisions on such matters must inevitably be the product of a mix of conjecture, fragmentary knowledge, general experience and knowledge of the needs, aspirations and resources of society".

[89] Or, l'appelant souligne à juste titre que le ministère public n'a présenté que peu d'éléments ou n'en a pas présenté du tout pour établir le degré de protection accrue offert par le nouvel al. 161(1)c) comparativement au libellé antérieur de l'interdiction. L'effet de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) sur les taux de récidive avancés par le ministère public demeure donc indéterminé. Et aucune preuve ne démontre que le risque auquel cet alinéa est censé s'attaquer a changé sur les plans quantitatif ou qualitatif de manière à atténuer les craintes liées à l'équité fondamentale et à la primauté du droit. Même les extraits du dossier législatif déposés devant la Cour par le ministère public montrent de manière frappante que l'opportunité de modifier l'al. 161(1)c) afin de mieux protéger les enfants n'a pratiquement fait l'objet d'aucun débat.

[90] Dit simplement, les effets bénéfiques précis de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) demeurent indéterminés. Il peut se révéler difficile de prouver l'inexistence de quelque chose. C'est pourquoi la raison et la logique constituent des compléments importants à la preuve matérielle. Et jusqu'à un certain point, ces difficultés de preuve peuvent être inéluctables. Après tout :

> [TRADUCTION] Les politiques gouvernementales sont souvent élaborées à partir d'approximations et d'extrapolations découlant de la preuve disponible, d'inférences tirées de données comparatives et même, à l'occasion, d'hypothèses émises en connaissance de cause. En l'absence de recherches politiques de grande envergure, cette preuve est vraisemblablement la seule dont on peut disposer. Dans McKinney, le juge La Forest a fait une observation très juste : « [d]ans ces domaines, les décisions découlent inévitablement de la combinaison d'hypothèses, de connaissances fragmentaires, de l'expérience générale et de la connaissance des besoins, des aspirations et des ressources de la société ».

[91] Nonetheless, s. 1 mandates that the limitation on the right be demonstrably justified. As Dickson C.J. wrote in Oakes, this is a "stringent standard of justification" (p. 136). The retrospective operation of the impugned measure adversely impacts the liberty and security of offenders (relative to the previous version of s. 161), and, importantly, the fairness of criminal proceedings and the rule of law. Although this adverse impact will be experienced only when a judge concludes it is necessary to alleviate the risk the offender poses to children, it remains the case that the deleterious effects of the impugned measure are significant and tangible.

[92] In comparison, the benefits society stands to gain are marginal and speculative. While the Crown's evidence regarding recidivism of sexual offenders begins to paint the picture (particularly since it shows that sex offenders who victimize children are more likely to reoffend), the rendering remains largely incomplete. In particular, the Crown has provided no temporal justification for the retrospective limitation, nor much evidence to establish the degree of enhanced protection s. 161(1)(c) provides. For example, the record suggests that many sexual assaults committed against children are perpetrated by family members or acquaintances. But surely this reality did not just recently come to Parliament's attention. In the context of a s. 11(i) infringement, one expects the Crown to better explain why retrospective penal laws were required.

[93] Temporal considerations are relevant in this content because, at its root, s. 11(i) is about the timing of changes to penal laws. In this case, it is not Parliament's decision to increase the punishment for sexual offenders that has, by itself, triggered Charter scrutiny — rather, it is Parliament's decision to reach back in time to impose these enhanced [91] Néanmoins, l'article premier exige que la justification de la restriction du droit puisse se démontrer. Comme le dit le juge en chef Dickson dans Oakes, il s'agit d'une « norme sévère en matière de justification » (p. 136). L'application rétrospective de la mesure en cause a une incidence préjudiciable sur le droit à la liberté et à la sécurité du contrevenant (comparativement au libellé antérieur de l'art. 161) et, fait important, sur l'équité des procédures criminelles et la primauté du droit. Certes, cette incidence préjudiciable n'existe que lorsqu'un juge conclut à la nécessité d'atténuer le risque que le contrevenant représente pour les enfants, mais il demeure que les effets préjudiciables de la mesure en cause sont importants et tangibles.

[92] En comparaison, les effets bénéfiques éventuels pour la société sont négligeables et hypothétiques. Bien que la preuve du ministère public concernant la récidive chez les délinquants sexuels esquisse le tableau de la situation (surtout en montrant que les délinquants sexuels qui s'en prennent à des enfants sont plus susceptibles de récidiver que les autres délinquants sexuels), le tableau demeure largement incomplet. En particulier, le ministère public n'a pas fait valoir l'existence d'une justification d'ordre temporel de la restriction rétrospective du droit et a avancé bien peu d'éléments pour établir le degré de protection accrue offert par l'al. 161(1)c). À titre d'exemple, le dossier indique que de nombreuses agressions sexuelles d'enfants sont perpétrées par des membres de la famille ou par des connaissances. Or, le législateur ne vient assurément pas tout juste de l'apprendre. Face à une allégation d'atteinte au droit que garantit l'al. 11*i*), on s'attendrait à ce que le ministère public en fasse davantage pour convaincre le tribunal de la nécessité qu'une disposition pénale s'applique rétrospectivement.

[93] Les considérations d'ordre temporel importent dans ce contexte, car l'al. 11*i*) s'intéresse foncièrement au moment où intervient la modification d'une disposition à caractère punitif. Dans la présente affaire, ce qui porte atteinte au droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*), ce n'est pas le choix du législateur d'accroître la peine infligée au délinquant sexuel prohibitions on offenders who had no notice of them that offends s. 11(i). Thus, temporal factors that may help explain Parliament's rationale for circumventing a basic tenet of our criminal law are relevant to the s. 11(i) inquiry. When it comes to s. 11(i), timing can be everything.

et qui est à l'origine de l'examen au regard de la Charte, mais plutôt sa décision de remonter dans le temps pour rendre le contrevenant passible, sans que ce dernier ne l'ait su au moment de perpétrer l'infraction, de nouvelles interdictions dont la portée est accrue. Dès lors, les considérations d'ordre temporel qui sont susceptibles d'expliquer la décision du législateur de contourner un précepte fondamental du droit criminel sont pertinentes dans le cadre de l'examen que commande l'al. 11*i*). S'agissant de cette disposition de la Charte, la situation dans le temps peut primer toute autre considération.

[94] Evidence related to the risks of recidivism is generally insufficient, on its own, to discharge the Crown's justificatory burden. To hold otherwise would be to potentially eviscerate the s. 11(i) right for the simple reason that retrospectively increasing punishment in order to curtail the risk of recidivism is a rationale that could apply to a broad range of crimes.

[94] La preuve liée au risque de récidive est généralement insuffisante à elle seule pour permettre au ministère public de s'acquitter de son obligation de justification. Conclure le contraire pourrait vider de sa substance le droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) pour la simple raison que l'accroissement rétrospectif de la peine dans le but de réduire le risque de récidive relève d'une logique susceptible de s'appliquer à une grande variété de crimes.

[95] It may be tempting to conclude that mitigating the risk of sexual violence to even one child is worth the costs. However, there can be no broad exception to the protection of s. 11(i) whenever the victim is a child. Such an approach ascribes almost no value to the right. Section 11(i) protects fundamental interests that can be overridden only in demonstrably compelling circumstances. In my view, the Crown has failed to show that the largely speculative salutary effects of the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) outweigh its tangible and substantial drawbacks.

[95] On pourrait être tenté de conclure que la réduction du risque qu'un seul enfant soit victime de violence sexuelle en vaut le coût. Toutefois, il ne saurait y avoir d'exception générale à la protection de l'al. 11*i*) chaque fois que la victime est un enfant, sinon le droit protégé serait presque dénué de toute valeur. L'alinéa 11*i*) protège des droits fondamentaux qu'on ne peut écarter que dans des circonstances dont le caractère impérieux peut être démontré. À mon avis, le ministère public n'a pas établi que les effets bénéfiques largement conjecturaux de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) l'emportent sur ses inconvénients tangibles et substantiels.

[96] The retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) therefore cannot be justified under s. 1. As a result, s. 161(1)(c) applies only prospectively — that is, only to offenders who committed their offences after the 2012 amendments came into force (s. 52(1), Constitution Act, 1982).

[96] L'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) ne saurait donc pas se justifier au regard de l'article premier. En conséquence, l'alinéa ne s'applique que prospectivement, c'est-à-dire seulement au contrevenant qui a commis l'infraction après l'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles dispositions en 2012 (par. 52(1) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982).

[97] I note that there are other prohibition orders under the Criminal Code that may assist the Crown

[97] Je constate que le Code criminel — notamment aux art. 810, 810.1 et 810.2 — prévoit d'autres to some extent in filling the gap left by the lack of any retrospective application of s. 161(1)(c), such as those that can be imposed pursuant to ss. 810, 810.1, and 810.2. However, I make no further comment on those provisions since they were not meaningfully raised or argued by any of the parties before us.

(ii) Balancing the Deleterious and Salutary Effects of the Retrospective Operation of Section 161(1)(d) of the Criminal Code

[98] The deleterious effects resulting from the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d) are also significant. A complete ban on "using the Internet or other digital network" — an indispensable tool of modern life and an avenue of democratic participation — is more intrusive than the previous ban on "using a computer system . . . for the purpose of communicating" with young people. This constitutes a significant deprivation of liberty. Therefore, the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d) can erect massive barriers to an offender's full participation in society, which may result in substantial consequences both socially and economically.

[99] As with the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c), the imposition of punishment without notice translates into broader societal harms, including compromising the fairness of criminal proceedings and challenging the rule of law. Clarity and predictability are central to the proper functioning of the criminal justice system, and are at the core of s. 11(i)'s purpose. Respect for the law and public confidence in the administration of justice are threatened when laws are changed retrospectively, without notice.

[100] Turning to the salutary effects, the Crown's evidence relating to the risk of harm from recidivism of sexual offenders, discussed above, applies equally here; however, when it comes to s. 161(1)(d), ordonnances portant interdiction grâce auxquelles le ministère public pourrait, dans une certaine mesure, combler le vide occasionné par l'application non rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c). Je m'abstiens cependant de toute remarque supplémentaire sur ces dispositions puisque leur application n'a pas été soulevée ou plaidée devant nous par l'une ou l'autre des parties.

(ii) Mise en balance des effets préjudiciables et des effets bénéfiques de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d) du Code criminel

[99] Comme pour l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c), l'infliction d'une peine dont le contrevenant ne pouvait se savoir passible cause un préjudice général à la société, notamment en compromettant l'équité des procédures criminelles et en remettant en question la primauté du droit. La clarté et la prévisibilité sont essentielles au bon fonctionnement du système de justice criminelle et elles sont au cœur de la raison d'être de l'al. 11*i*). Le respect de la loi et la confiance du public dans l'administration de la justice sont mis en péril lorsqu'une règle de droit est modifiée rétrospectivement sans que l'intéressé n'ait pu connaître la nouvelle version au moment de commettre l'acte criminel.

[100] En ce qui concerne les effets bénéfiques, la preuve susmentionnée offerte par le ministère public sur le risque de préjudice lié à la récidive propre aux délinquants sexuels vaut également pour this evidence is buttressed by other important considerations.

[101] As I shall explain, in brief, the record before this Court demonstrates that s. 161(1)(d) is directed at grave, emerging harms precipitated by a rapidly evolving social and technological context. This evolving context has changed both the degree and nature of the risk of sexual violence facing young persons. As a result, the previous iteration of s. 161 became insufficient to respond to the modern risks children face. By closing this legislative gap and mitigating these new risks, the benefits of the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d) are significant and fairly concrete.

[102] The rate of technological change over the past decade has fundamentally altered the social context in which sexual crimes can occur. Social media websites (like Facebook and Twitter), dating applications (like Tinder), and photo-sharing services (like Instagram and Snapchat) were all founded after 2002, the last time prior to the 2012 amendments that substantial revisions to s. 161(1) were made. These new online services have given young people — who are often early adopters of new technologies — unprecedented access to digital communities. At the same time, sexual offenders have been given unprecedented access to potential victims and avenues to facilitate sexual offending.

[103] The legislative record before this Court speaks to this rapid evolution and shows that, in enacting s. 161(1)(d) and giving it retrospective effect, Parliament was attempting to keep pace with technological changes that have substantially altered the degree and nature of the risks facing children. For example, at the second reading of the Bill, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice said, "An increasing number of child sex offenders also use the Internet and other new technologies to facilitate the grooming of victims or to commit other child sex offences" (p. 6787). At a Committee debate, the Acting l'al. 161(1)d), mais d'autres considérations d'importance viennent l'étayer.

[101] En bref, comme je l'explique plus loin, il appert du dossier de la Cour que l'al. 161(1)d) s'attaque aux nouveaux préjudices graves dont l'infliction est précipitée par l'évolution rapide du contexte sociotechnologique. Ce contexte en constante évolution a modifié tant le degré que la nature du risque de violence sexuelle auquel sont exposées les jeunes personnes. Par conséquent, la version antérieure de l'art. 161 ne permettait plus de contrer le risque que courent les enfants de nos jours. Du fait qu'elle comble cette lacune législative et réduit les risques nouveaux, l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d) comporte des effets bénéfiques importants assez concrets.

[102] La vitesse à laquelle la technologie a évolué au cours de la dernière décennie a fondamentalement modifié le contexte social dans lequel peuvent survenir les crimes sexuels. Les médias sociaux (comme Facebook et Twitter), les applications de rencontres (comme Tinder), de même que les services de partage de photos (comme Instagram et Snapchat) ont tous vu le jour après 2002, soit l'année où le par. 161(1) avait été modifié la fois précédente. Ces nouveaux services en ligne ont donné aux jeunes — qui sont souvent les premiers à adopter les nouvelles technologies — un accès sans précédent aux communautés numériques. Parallèlement, les délinquants sexuels ont obtenu un accès inédit à des victimes potentielles et à des moyens qui facilitent la commission d'infractions sexuelles.

[103] Le dossier législatif dont dispose la Cour fait état de cette évolution rapide et montre que, par l'édiction de l'al. 161(1)d) et son application rétrospective, le législateur entendait se mettre au diapason de la technologie dont l'évolution avait substantiellement modifié le degré et la nature du risque auquel étaient exposés les enfants. Par exemple, lors de la deuxième lecture du projet de loi, le secrétaire parlementaire du ministre de la Justice a dit : « De plus en plus de délinquants sexuels dont les victimes sont des enfants utilisent aussi Internet et les nouvelles technologies pour

General Counsel, Criminal Law Policy Section, Department of Justice testified:

> . . . what Bill C-54 recognizes is that offenders use the Internet computer systems for all sorts of reasons. Yes, they use it to communicate directly with a young person, and we catch that already, but they use it also to offend, in their offending pattern, whether it's to access child pornography, for example . . . .
>
> So the idea with Bill C-54 is to require a court to turn its mind to this each time it is sentencing a person who is convicted of one of these child sex offences and to consider whether in that instance, with the offender before them, given the nature of the offending pattern and the conduct before the court, there should be a restriction on that individual's access to the Internet or other technology that would otherwise facilitate his or her reoffending.

(Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights, Evidence, No. 50, 3rd Sess., 40th Parl., February 28, 2011, at p. 4)

[104] As well, a Statistics Canada Director (who was testifying before the Committee) said, "What we can say based on those data is that the number of charges of child luring via the Internet is increasing" (Evidence, No. 49, 3rd Sess., 40th Parl., February 16, 2011, at p. 7). The legislative record contains other similar passages.

[105] In addition to this testimony concerning the evolving risks children face, others testified that controlling an offender's access to the Internet is an effective means of curbing these risks. For example, during other Committee debates, the Executive Director of BOOST Child Abuse Prevention and Intervention testified that "[t]he emerging research connecting online offences to hands-on sexual offences emphasizes the importance of the court's ability . . . to permit the offender use of the Internet faciliter la "préparation" des victimes ou pour commettre d'autres infractions de nature sexuelle à l'endroit d'un enfant » (p. 6787). Lors du débat en comité, l'avocate générale intérimaire, Section de la politique en matière de droit pénal du ministère de la Justice, a témoigné :

> . . . ce que le projet de loi C-54 reconnaît, c'est que les délinquants peuvent utiliser des ordinateurs reliés à Internet à toutes sortes de fins. Oui, ils les utilisent pour communiquer directement avec une jeune personne — et la loi couvre déjà cet aspect —, mais aussi pour commettre d'autres délits, selon leur comportement délinquant, qu'il s'agisse par exemple d'accéder à de la pornographie infantile . . .
> Donc, l'idée, avec ce projet de loi C-54, est d'obliger un tribunal à en tenir compte chaque fois qu'il impose une peine à une personne reconnue coupable d'une de ces infractions de nature sexuelle à l'égard d'enfants, et à examiner si, en l'espèce, compte tenu du délinquant qu'il a devant lui, de la nature de son comportement criminel ou de sa conduite devant le tribunal, il y a lieu de restreindre l'accès de cette personne à Internet ou à d'autres technologies qui pourraient autrement faciliter une récidive de sa part.

(Comité permanent de la justice et des droits de la personne, Témoignages, nº 50, 3e sess., 40e lég., 28 février 2011, p. 4)

[104] Par ailleurs, une directrice de Statistique Canada appelée à témoigner devant le comité a déclaré : « Ce que nous pouvons dire, sur la base de ces données, est que le nombre d'accusations de leurre d'enfants par Internet est en hausse » (Témoignages, nº 49, 3e sess., 40e lég., 16 février 2011, p. 7). D'autres passages du dossier législatif vont dans le même sens.

[105] Outre ces témoignages sur l'évolution du risque auquel sont exposés les enfants, d'autres ont porté sur le fait que contrôler l'accès d'un contrevenant à Internet constitue un moyen efficace de réduire ce risque. Par exemple, à une autre séance du comité, la directrice générale de BOOST Child Abuse Prevention and Intervention a déclaré que « [l]es nouvelles recherches qui établissent un lien entre les cyberprédateurs et les infractions réelles font état de l'importance que les tribunaux interdisent à un only when supervised" (Evidence, No. 46, 3rd Sess., 40th Parl., February 7, 2011, at p. 6).[10]

[106] The Crown's social science literature also addresses the unique role the Internet plays in facilitating sexual crimes against children. For example:

The number of detected online sex offenders has drastically increased since the early 2000s . . . .

. . . Indeed, the rates of online sexual crimes, and child pornography offences in particular, have increased substantially with the increasing use of the internet . . . .

. . . Specifically, the ease of access to online child pornography may contribute to a new group of offenders who succumb to temptations that they would have otherwise controlled.

(K. M. Babchishin, R. K. Hanson and H. VanZuylen, "Online Child Pornography Offenders are Different: A Meta-analysis of the Characteristics of Online and Offline Sex Offenders Against Children" (2015), 44 Arch. Sex. Behav. 45, at p. 46)

délinquant [. . .] d'utiliser Internet à moins d'être supervisé » (Témoignages, nº 46, 3e sess., 40e lég., 7 février 2011, p. 6)[10].

[106] La documentation de sciences sociales produite par l'intimée fait également état du rôle unique d'Internet dans la facilitation de la commission d'infractions sexuelles contre des enfants. Par exemple :

[TRADUCTION] La détection de délinquants sexuels en ligne a radicalement augmenté depuis le début des années 2000 . . .

. . . En fait, le taux de criminalité sexuelle en ligne, la pornographie juvénile en particulier, a substantiellement augmenté du fait du recours accru à Internet . . .

. . . Plus particulièrement, la facilité d'accès à la pornographie juvénile en ligne peut contribuer à l'émergence d'un nouveau type de contrevenant qui succombe à une tentation à laquelle il aurait résisté autrement.

(K. M. Babchishin, R. K. Hanson et H. VanZuylen, « Online Child Pornography Offenders are Different : A Meta-analysis of the Characteristics of Online and Offline Sex Offenders Against Children » (2015), 44 Arch. Sex. Behav. 45, p. 46)

[10] Another individual, who had been involved with police training, testified as follows:

> In 2010, I completed a pan-Canadian research project that examined the exponential increase of crimes of exploitation committed on or facilitated by the Internet against children in Canada and globally. Accessing images of child abuse — somewhat understated by the use of the term "child pornography" — child luring, trafficking, and travelling for the purpose of sexual offending are crimes increasingly facilitated by modern, ubiquitous technologies, especially the Internet, around the globe. . . .
>
> . . .
>
> . . . To prevent the ever-increasing numbers of crime, offenders must be disconnected from social networking sites through which they lurk and stalk.

(Evidence, No. 44, 3rd Sess., 40th Parl., January 31, 2011, at pp. 5-6)

[10] Une autre personne qui avait participé à la formation de policiers a offert le témoignage suivant :

> En 2010, j'ai mené un projet de recherche pancanadien qui consistait à examiner la hausse exponentielle des crimes d'exploitation commis sur Internet, ou grâce à Internet, contre des enfants au Canada et ailleurs. Accéder à des images d'enfants exploités sexuellement — sous-évaluées en quelque sorte par l'utilisation du terme « pornographie juvénile » — leurrer des enfants, faire la traite des enfants et voyager dans le but de les agresser sexuellement sont des crimes de plus en plus faciles à commettre en raison des technologies modernes et omniprésentes partout sur la planète, surtout Internet. . .
> . . .
>
> . . . Pour empêcher l'augmentation constante du nombre de crimes, on doit débrancher les agresseurs qui rôdent sur Internet et qui suivent des enfants.

(Témoignages, nº 44, 3e sess., 40e lég., 31 janvier 2011, p. 5-6)

[107] New and qualitatively different opportunities to harm young people exist. The Internet is a portal to accessing and distributing child pornography, a crime that itself victimizes children. As this Court observed in Sharpe:

> . . . possession of child pornography contributes to the market for child pornography, a market which in turn drives production involving the exploitation of children. Possession of child pornography may facilitate the seduction and grooming of victims and may break down inhibitions or incite potential offences. [para. 28]

Further, the Internet can be used to contact other adults for the purposes of planning and facilitating criminal behaviour — pursuits not captured by the previous version of s. 161.[11]

[108] What emerges from the Crown's materials is that the proliferation of new technologies has altered the nature and degree of risk facing children, which, in turn, created a legislative gap in s. 161. The previous iteration of s. 161 — which allowed sentencing judges to prohibit offenders only from using computer systems to contact children directly — was incapable of precluding sexual offenders from participating in other kinds of harmful behaviour. And, as the record and common sense suggest, monitoring an offender's use of the Internet can limit an offender's opportunities to offend and prevent this harmful behaviour.

[109] This unique social and technological context leads me to the conclusion that the benefits occasioned by retrospectively imposing the Internet

[107] De nouvelles avenues intrinsèquement différentes s'offrent pour s'en prendre aux jeunes. Internet est un portail qui permet d'accéder à la pornographie juvénile et d'en faire la distribution, un crime dont sont en soi victimes les enfants. Comme le fait observer la Cour dans l'arrêt Sharpe :

> . . . la possession de pornographie juvénile contribue au marché de cette forme de pornographie, lequel marché stimule à son tour la production qui implique l'exploitation d'enfants. La possession de pornographie juvénile peut faciliter la séduction et l'initiation des victimes, vaincre leurs inhibitions et inciter à la perpétration éventuelle d'infractions. [par. 28]

En outre, Internet peut permettre à un adulte de communiquer avec un autre pour planifier et faciliter un comportement criminel, ce que n'envisageait pas la version antérieure de l'art. 161[11].

[108] Il appert donc des documents déposés par le ministère public que la prolifération des technologies nouvelles a modifié la nature et le degré du risque auquel sont exposés les enfants, d'où la lacune législative de l'art. 161. La précédente mouture de cet article qui permettait au juge appelé à déterminer la peine d'interdire seulement au contrevenant d'utiliser un système informatique pour communiquer directement avec un enfant n'était pas de nature à empêcher un délinquant sexuel de se livrer à d'autres activités préjudiciables. Et, comme le donnent à penser le dossier et le sens commun, surveiller l'utilisation d'Internet par un contrevenant peut restreindre les possibilités qui s'offrent à ce dernier de commettre une infraction et peut prévenir un tel comportement préjudiciable.

[109] Ce contexte sociotechnologique unique m'amène à conclure que les effets bénéfiques de l'application rétrospective de l'interdiction d'utiliser prohibition contained in s. 161(1)(d) are greater and more certain than those stemming from s. 161(1)(c).

[11] In one disturbing case summarized by an expert witness who testified before the parliamentary committee studying the Bill, two adults were chatting with each other in an online forum to set up an 'exchange' of children (Evidence, No. 46, at p. 5, testimony of Lianna McDonald).

[11] Dans une affaire troublante résumée par un témoin expert devant le comité parlementaire étudiant le projet de loi, deux adultes clavardaient l'un avec l'autre dans un forum en ligne pour organiser un « échange » d'enfants (Témoignages, nº 46, p. 5, Lianna McDonald).

[110] The fact that Parliament enacted s. 161(1)(d) as a means of closing a legislative gap created by rapid social and technological change does not just enhance the salutary effects of the law: it mitigates the provision's deleterious effects, too. From the perspective of public confidence in the criminal justice system, the retrospective operation of a law that was enacted to respond to a swiftly changing social context and emerging threats seems less unfair and less inconsistent with the rule of law than the retrospective operation of a law that was not enacted for a compelling temporal reason. As Professor C. Sampford writes in his book, Retrospectivity and the Rule of Law (2006), "Retrospective laws which close 'loopholes' and 'unexpected interpretations and consequences' reinforce the guidance of primary laws" and can therefore advance the fairness of the legal system as a whole (p. 81).

[111] Thus, while fairness and the rule of law are compromised by laws that retrospectively undermine a citizen's liberty and security, these broader societal harms are mitigated by Parliament's compelling temporal justification for giving s. 161(1)(d) retrospective effect.

[112] I now must balance the deleterious and salutary effects of the law. As discussed, s. 161(1)(d) constitutes a significant impact on an offender's liberty and security. The impugned measure also has negative ramifications for society as a whole. Fairness and the rule of law are compromised by laws that retrospectively undermine a citizen's liberty and security, although these broader societal harms are less acute given the context in which the government legislated. In addition, the adverse impact the provision has on offenders will be experienced Internet prévue à l'al. 161(1)d) sont plus grands et plus certains que ceux de l'application rétrospective de la nouvelle interdiction prévue à l'al. 161(1)c).

[110] Le fait que le législateur a édicté l'al. 161(1)d) afin de combler la lacune législative résultant de l'évolution rapide de la société et de la technologie ne fait pas qu'accroître les effets bénéfiques de la règle de droit, mais atténue également ses effets préjudiciables. En ce qui concerne la confiance du public dans le système de justice criminelle, l'application rétrospective d'une règle de droit visant à adapter la loi à un contexte social qui évolue rapidement et à des menaces nouvelles paraît moins contraire à l'équité des procédures criminelles et à la primauté du droit que l'application rétrospective d'une règle de droit qui n'a pas été édictée pour une raison d'ordre temporel convaincante. Comme l'écrit le Professeur C. Sampford dans son ouvrage intitulé Retrospectivity and the Rule of Law (2006), [TRADUCTION] « la disposition d'application rétrospective qui comble une "lacune" et remédie à "une interprétation ou une conséquence inattendues" renforce le message de la loi principale » et peut donc favoriser l'équité du système juridique dans son ensemble (p. 81).

[111] Par conséquent, bien que l'équité des procédures criminelles et la primauté du droit soient compromises par une disposition qui porte rétrospectivement atteinte au droit à la liberté et à la sécurité d'un citoyen, ce préjudice général causé à la société est atténué par l'existence de la justification d'ordre temporel convaincante invoquée par le législateur pour donner un effet rétrospectif à l'al. 161(1)d).

[112] Je dois maintenant soupeser les effets préjudiciables de la règle de droit et ses effets bénéfiques. Je le répète, l'al. 161(1)d) a une grande incidence sur le droit à la liberté et à la sécurité du contrevenant. La mesure considérée a aussi des répercussions défavorables sur l'ensemble de la société. L'équité des procédures criminelles et la primauté du droit sont compromises par une disposition qui porte atteinte rétrospectivement au droit à la liberté et à la sécurité d'un citoyen, même si ce préjudice social général est moins grave en raison only when there is good reason: in circumstances where a judge finds that doing so will mitigate the risk an offender poses to children.

[113] As for the salutary effects, the record demonstrates that the Internet is increasingly being used to sexually offend against young people and that sex offenders who target children are more likely to reoffend. This is not simply about changing technology or general risks associated with recidivism, broad factors that can relate to many offences. Rather, the nature and degree of the risks facing some of the most vulnerable members of our society have changed drastically since 2002, the last time s. 161(1) was substantially amended. Technology and the proliferation of social media cyber communities have increased the degree of risk facing young persons. This has created new triggers, and new avenues for offenders to pursue in committing further offences. The previous prohibition was insufficient to address these evolving risks. But the enhanced prohibition in s. 161(1)(d) can restrict the viability of these routes. While it remains difficult to quantify the precise benefits the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d) may create, it seems to me that the salutary effects associated with s. 161(1)(d) are quite tangible and compelling.

[114] On balance, in my view, Parliament was justified in giving s. 161(1)(d) retrospective effect in the unique context within which it was legislating. A variety of factors support this conclusion. The harms at stake (sexual offending against young people) are particularly powerful. The statutory regime is highly tailored and discretionary. An Internet prohibition, while invasive, is not among the most onerous punishments, such as increased incarceration. And, significantly, the rapidly evolving technological and social context surrounding the enactment of s. 161(1)(d) has created new and emerging risks that make the law's salutary effects more concrete du contexte dans lequel le gouvernement légifère. De plus, l'effet préjudiciable de la disposition sur le contrevenant ne se manifeste que lorsque son application est fondée, soit dans le cas où le juge conclut que, s'il applique la disposition, le risque auquel le contrevenant expose les enfants sera atténué.

[113] En ce qui concerne les effets bénéfiques, le dossier indique qu'Internet est de plus en plus utilisé pour commettre des infractions sexuelles contre des jeunes et que les délinquants sexuels qui s'en prennent à des enfants sont plus susceptibles de récidiver que les autres délinquants sexuels. L'évolution de la technologie ou les risques généraux liés à la récidive — des facteurs au large spectre susceptibles d'être associés à de nombreuses infractions — ne sont pas seuls en cause. En fait, la nature et le degré du risque auquel s'exposent certains des membres les plus vulnérables de notre société ont radicalement changé depuis 2002, l'année de la modification précédente du par. 161(1). La technologie et la prolifération des cybercollectivités de médias sociaux ont accru le degré du risque auquel sont exposés les jeunes personnes, de sorte que de nouvelles incitations et de nouvelles avenues amènent le contrevenant à persister dans son comportement criminel. L'interdiction antérieure n'était plus adaptée à l'évolution du risque, alors que la nouvelle — correspondant à l'al. 161(1)d) et dont la portée est accrue — peut réduire la viabilité de ces avenues. Bien qu'il demeure difficile de quantifier les effets bénéfiques précis de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d), ses effets bénéfiques me paraissent tout à fait tangibles et convaincants.

[114] Tout bien considéré, j'estime que le législateur était justifié, vu le contexte unique dans lequel il intervenait, de conférer à l'al. 161(1)d) un effet rétrospectif. Diverses considérations appuient ma conclusion. Les préjudices en jeu (les infractions sexuelles commises à l'endroit de jeunes personnes) sont particulièrement convaincants. Le régime législatif a une portée très bien circonscrite et confère un pouvoir discrétionnaire. L'interdiction d'utiliser Internet, même si elle est attentatoire, ne fait pas partie des sanctions les plus lourdes, telle la peine d'emprisonnement accrue. Et surtout, l'évolution rapide de la technologie et le contexte — while mitigating the adverse impact the law has on fairness and the rule of law. Although any one of these factors may have been insufficient in isolation, taken together, they create a compelling case. The benefits of the law outweigh its deleterious effects.

VI. Disposition

[115] I find that the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) of the Criminal Code limits the right protected by s. 11(i) of the Charter and that this limit is not justified under s. 1. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal with respect to s. 161(1)(c). As a result, the provision does not apply retrospectively to offenders who committed their offences prior to the coming into force of the 2012 amendments.

[116] I also find that the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d) of the Criminal Code limits the s. 11(i) right. However, I conclude that this is a reasonable constitutional compromise under s. 1. I would therefore dismiss the appeal with respect to s. 161(1)(d).

The following are the reasons delivered by

[117] Abella J. (dissenting in part) — I agree with Justice Karakatsanis that both ss. 161(1)(c) and 161(1)(d) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, violate s. 11(i) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and that s. 161(1)(c) cannot be justified under s. 1. With great respect, however, I do not share the view that s. 161(1)(d) is justified.

[118] From 2008 to 2011, when K.R.J. committed the offences for which he was eventually convicted, s. 161(1) of the Criminal Code stated:

social de l'adoption de l'al. 161(1)d) ont fait naître des risques nouveaux qui rendent plus tangibles les effets bénéfiques de la règle de droit tout en atténuant son incidence préjudiciable sur l'équité des procédures criminelles et la primauté du droit. Aucune de ces considérations prise isolément n'est suffisante mais, ensemble, elles justifient la mesure contestée. Les effets bénéfiques de la règle de droit l'emportent sur ses effets préjudiciables.

VI. Dispositif

[115] Je conclus que l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) du Code criminel restreint le droit protégé par l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte et que cette restriction ne se justifie pas par application de l'article premier. Par conséquent, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi en ce qui a trait à l'al. 161(1)c). La disposition ne s'applique donc pas rétrospectivement au contrevenant dont les actes criminels sont antérieurs à l'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles dispositions en 2012.

[116] Je conclus également que l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d) du Code criminel restreint le droit protégé par l'al. 11*i*). Toutefois, cette restriction constitue une atteinte constitutionnelle raisonnable au regard de l'article premier. Je suis donc d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi en ce qui a trait à l'al. 161(1)d).

Version française des motifs rendus par

[117] La juge Abella (dissidente en partie) — Je conviens avec la juge Karakatsanis que les al. 161(1)c) et d) du Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-46, contreviennent tous deux à l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, et que l'al. 161(1)c) ne peut être justifié au regard de l'article premier. Soit dit en tout respect, je ne partage toutefois pas son point de vue selon lequel l'al. 161(1)d) est justifié.

[118] De 2008 à 2011, période pendant laquelle K.R.J. a commis les infractions dont il a par la suite été reconnu coupable, le par. 161(1) du Code criminel était libellé comme suit :

161. (1) When an offender is convicted . . . of an offence referred to in subsection (1.1) in respect of a person who is under the age of 16 years, the court that sentences the offender . . . in addition to any other punishment that may be imposed for that offence . . . shall consider making and may make, subject to the conditions or exemptions that the court directs, an order prohibiting the offender from

(a) attending a public park or public swimming area where persons under the age of 16 years are present or can reasonably be expected to be present, or a day-care centre, schoolground, playground or community centre;

(b) seeking, obtaining or continuing any employment, whether or not the employment is remunerated, or becoming or being a volunteer in a capacity, that involves being in a position of trust or authority towards persons under the age of 16 years; or

(c) using a computer system within the meaning of subsection 342.1(2) for the purpose of communicating with a person under the age of 16 years.

[119] Under this scheme, K.R.J. could be subjected to geographic, work-related, and "virtual" restrictions. He could be prohibited from attending a wide variety of venues such as pools and schools, and from using a computer for the purpose of communicating with anyone under 16 years of age. He would still, however, have been entitled to engage in online activities with adults.

[120] By the time K.R.J. was sentenced, Parliament amended the provision. While s. 161(1)(a) and (b) were left unchanged, s. 161(1)(c) was amended and s. 161(1)(d) was added, giving sentencing judges authority to prohibit offenders from:

(c) having any contact — including communicating by any means — with a person who is under the age of 16 years, unless the offender does so under the supervision of a person whom the court considers appropriate; or

(d) using the Internet or other digital network, unless the offender does so in accordance with conditions set by the court.

161. (1) Dans le cas où un contrevenant est déclaré coupable [. . .] d'une infraction mentionnée au paragraphe (1.1) à l'égard d'une personne âgée de moins de seize ans, le tribunal qui lui inflige une peine [. . .], en plus de toute autre peine [. . .] applicabl[e] en l'espèce, sous réserve des conditions ou exemptions qu'il indique, peut interdire au contrevenant :

a) de se trouver dans un parc public ou une zone publique où l'on peut se baigner s'il y a des personnes âgées de moins de seize ans ou s'il est raisonnable de s'attendre à ce qu'il y en ait, une garderie, un terrain d'école, un terrain de jeu ou un centre communautaire;

b) de chercher, d'accepter ou de garder un emploi — rémunéré ou non — ou un travail bénévole qui le placerait en relation de confiance ou d'autorité vis-à-vis de personnes âgées de moins de seize ans;

c) d'utiliser un ordinateur au sens du paragraphe 342.1(2) dans le but de communiquer avec une personne âgée de moins de seize ans.

[119] Suivant ce régime, K.R.J. pouvait être soumis à des restrictions d'ordre géographique, professionnel et « virtuel ». Il pouvait lui être interdit de se trouver dans une multitude de lieux, telle une piscine ou une école, et d'utiliser un ordinateur dans le but de communiquer avec une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans, auquel cas il lui demeurait toutefois possible de participer à des activités en ligne avec des adultes.

[120] Avant la détermination de la peine de K.R.J., le législateur a modifié la disposition en cause. Les alinéas 161(1)a) et b) sont demeurés inchangés, mais l'al. 161(1)c) a été modifié et l'al. 161(1)d) s'est ajouté, de sorte que le juge appelé à déterminer la peine pouvait désormais interdire au contrevenant :

c) d'avoir des contacts — notamment communiquer par quelque moyen que ce soit — avec une personne âgée de moins de seize ans, à moins de le faire sous la supervision d'une personne que le tribunal estime convenir en l'occurrence;

d) d'utiliser Internet ou tout autre réseau numérique, à moins de le faire en conformité avec les conditions imposées par le tribunal.

[121] The amendments expanded the restrictions K.R.J. could be placed under. Rather than being banned from certain venues, s. 161(1)(c) could be used to prohibit him from attending any place where children are present. And rather than being prohibited from using the internet for the purpose of communicating with children, s. 161(1)(d) could be used to prohibit him from using the internet for any purpose.

[122] I agree with the majority that these potential restrictions would significantly affect K.R.J.'s liberty and security interests, and would, as a result, constitute punishment under s. 11(i) of the Charter, which states:

> 11. Any person charged with an offence has the right
> . . .
> (i) if found guilty of the offence and if the punishment for the offence has been varied between the time of commission and the time of sentencing, to the benefit of the lesser punishment.

[123] The wording in this provision is unequivocal. As noted by Prof. Don Stuart, the intention behind this text is "crystal clear": Charter Justice in Canadian Criminal Law (6th ed. 2014), at p. 523.

[124] In my view, the absolutist language used by the drafters of the Charter in s. 11 must colour the s. 1 analysis by demanding the most stringent of justifications. That was the approach taken by this Court in Canada (Attorney General) v. Whaling, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 392. The issue was the retrospective repeal of the accelerated parole review under s. 11(h) of the Charter, which protects individuals from being punished twice for the same offence. Because the Crown had failed to adduce "compelling evidence" demonstrating that its objectives would be "significantly undermined" unless the repeal was applied on a retrospective as well as prospective basis, this Court concluded that the infringement was not justified under s. 1.

[121] Les modifications ont élargi les restrictions auxquelles pouvait être assujetti K.R.J. L'alinéa 161(1)c) permettait de lui interdire de se trouver, non plus dans certains lieux, mais à tout endroit où il y a des enfants et l'al. 161(1)d), d'utiliser Internet, non pas dans le but de communiquer avec des enfants, mais à quelque fin que ce soit.

[122] Je conviens avec les juges majoritaires que ces interdictions potentielles restreindraient sensiblement le droit de K.R.J. à la liberté et à la sécurité et constituent donc une peine au sens de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte, dont voici le libellé :

> 11. Tout inculpé a le droit :
>
> . . .
> i) de bénéficier de la peine la moins sévère, lorsque la peine qui sanctionne l'infraction dont il est déclaré coupable est modifiée entre le moment de la perpétration de l'infraction et celui de la sentence.

[123] Le libellé de la disposition est sans équivoque. Comme le fait observer le professeur Don Stuart, l'intention sous-jacente est [TRADUCTION] « claire comme du cristal » (Charter Justice in Canadian Criminal Law (6e éd. 2014), p. 523).

[124] À mon avis, la formulation absolue employée à l'art. 11 par les rédacteurs de la Charte doit influer sur l'analyse que commande l'article premier par l'exigence de la justification la plus stricte. Telle est l'approche de la Cour dans Canada (Procureur général) c. Whaling, [2014] 1 R.C.S. 392. Dans cette affaire, la suppression rétrospective d'une procédure d'examen expéditif (en matière de libération conditionnelle) était contestée sur le fondement de l'al. 11*h*) de la Charte, lequel garantit qu'une personne ne sera pas punie deux fois pour la même infraction. Le ministère public ne l'ayant pas « convaincu[e] » que ses objectifs seraient « considérablement compromis » si la suppression n'était pas appliquée de manières rétrospective et prospective, la Cour conclut que l'atteinte n'est pas justifiée au regard de l'article premier.

[125] The repeal of the accelerated parole review was subsequently also found to be unconstitutional by the British Columbia Court of Appeal, but from the perspective of s. 11(i), the provision at issue in this appeal. In Liang v. Canada (Attorney General) (2014), 311 C.C.C. (3d) 159, the British Columbia Court of Appeal concluded that the Crown's concern that it could take years to phase out the program if it could not be applied retrospectively, did not justify overriding the right:

. . . the Charter specifically requires that if punishment has changed between offence commission and sentencing, the offender is entitled to the lesser punishment. . . . [T]he fact the offender will receive a lesser punishment, and perhaps one that does not meet the objectives of the present sentencing regime, is exactly what s. 11(i) contemplates. . . .

. . . to meet the burden under s. 1 in this case, something more must be asserted than that the objective of the increased punishment is important, and therefore those who are constitutionally entitled to the lesser punishment must forego their rights. [Emphasis added; paras. 59 and 61.]

[126] Both Whaling and Liang are clear that s. 11 imposes a singularly onerous evidentiary burden on the Crown to justify a violation under s. 1. To apply a lesser burden transforms s. 11(i) from being practically an air-tight right into a porous one. In this case, that means that the Crown has the highest possible evidentiary burden, namely, to demonstrate through "compelling evidence" that the previous provisions so "significantly undermined" the government's objectives, that the retrospective application of greater punishment was justified.

[127] As the majority notes, the Crown's evidentiary record consisted largely of statistics about s. 161(1) orders in British Columbia, and studies on recidivism rates pertaining to sexual offenders in [125] La suppression de la procédure d'examen expéditif a par la suite été jugée inconstitutionnelle par la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique, mais en fonction de l'al. 11*i*), soit la disposition en cause dans le présent pourvoi. Dans Liang c. Canada (Attorney General) (2014), 311 C.C.C. (3d) 159, cette même cour conclut que la crainte du ministère public qu'il puisse falloir des années pour mettre fin progressivement au programme si sa suppression ne pouvait s'appliquer rétrospectivement ne justifiait pas que l'on bafoue le droit en question :

[TRADUCTION] . . . la Charte exige expressément, lorsque la peine est modifiée entre la perpétration de l'infraction et la sentence, que le contrevenant bénéficie de la peine la moins sévère. [. . .] [Q]ue le contrevenant bénéficie de la peine la moins sévère et, peut-être, d'une peine non conforme aux objectifs du régime actuel de détermination de la peine, telle est précisément la raison d'être de l'al. 11i). . .

. . . satisfaire au fardeau de preuve qu'impose en l'espèce l'article premier exige davantage que l'affirmation selon laquelle l'objectif de l'accroissement de la peine est important, de sorte que les personnes auxquelles la Constitution garantit le droit à la peine la moins sévère doivent y renoncer. [Je souligne; par. 59 et 61.]

[126] Les arrêts Whaling et Liang indiquent tous deux clairement que l'art. 11 impose au ministère public un fardeau de preuve particulièrement strict pour justifier l'atteinte au regard de l'article premier. S'il en allait autrement, la protection du droit garanti à l'al. 11*i*) ne serait plus pour ainsi dire étanche, mais deviendrait poreuse. Dès lors, en l'espèce, le ministère public a le fardeau de preuve le plus strict qui soit, de sorte qu'il doit « convainc[re] » le tribunal que l'application des dispositions antérieures aurait si « considérablement compromis » les objectifs de l'État que l'application rétrospective d'une peine plus sévère était justifiée.

[127] Comme le signalent les juges majoritaires, le dossier de preuve du ministère public est constitué en grande partie de statistiques sur les ordonnances rendues en Colombie-Britannique en application du general, including two that suggested a link between recidivism and online activities. The Crown also argued that the language shift from "computer system" to "Internet and digital network" in s. 161(1)(d) was designed to reflect advancements in technology. I agree with the majority that this evidence is insufficient to justify s. 161(1)(c) because "the Crown has failed to lead much, if any, evidence to establish the degree of enhanced protection . . . in comparison to the previous version of the prohibition" such that "the precise benefits of the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) remain unclear": paras. 89-90 (emphasis in original).

[128] But unlike my colleagues, I find that this same reasoning is fatal to s. 161(1)(d). Far from offering compelling evidence, the Crown offered no evidence in the context of s. 161(1)(d) to show that the former provisions so significantly undermined its objectives, that the retroactive application of greater restrictions was justified. If all that is needed to justify a breach of s. 11(i) is the suggestion of a possible reduction in recidivism rates, whether based on changes in technology or otherwise, the state could, in theory, justify the retrospective application of more stringent punishments so routinely that s. 11(i) is written out of the Charter.

[129] In fact, there was no evidence about how the retrospective application of s. 161(1)(d) was expected to, or would, reduce recidivism rates any more than those under the former s. 161(1)(c) "computer" restrictions. I see no reason to bridge the significant empirical gaps in the evidence with inferences, particularly in the context of s. 11.

[130] I would therefore allow the appeal in connection with both ss. 161(1)(c) and 161(1)(d).

par. 161(1) et d'études sur les taux de récidive chez les délinquants sexuels en général, dont deux indiquent un lien entre la récidive et l'activité en ligne. Le ministère public fait également valoir que le renvoi, à l'al. 161d), non plus à un « ordinateur » mais à « Internet [et au] réseau numérique » vise à emboîter le pas aux progrès technologiques. Je conviens avec les juges majoritaires que cette preuve est insuffisante pour justifier l'al. 161(1)c), car « le ministère public n'a présenté que peu d'éléments ou n'en a pas présenté du tout pour établir le degré de protection accrue offert [. . .] comparativement au libellé antérieur de l'interdiction », de telle sorte que « les effets bénéfiques précis de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) demeurent indéterminés » (par. 89-90 (en italique dans l'original)).

[128] Mais, contrairement à mes collègues, j'estime que le même raisonnement porte un coup fatal à l'al. 161(1)d). Loin d'offrir une preuve de nature à convaincre, l'État n'a produit à l'appui de l'al. 161(1)d) aucun élément selon lequel les dispositions antérieures compromettaient si considérablement ses objectifs que l'application rétrospective d'interdictions de plus grande portée était justifiée. Si, pour justifier la restriction du droit garanti à l'al. 11*i*), il suffit d'invoquer la réduction possible des taux de récidive, de pair avec l'évolution technologique ou toute autre considération, l'État pourrait en théorie justifier dans tous les cas l'application rétrospective de peines accrues, au point de réduire à néant l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte.

[130] Je serais donc d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi en ce qui concerne les al. 161(1)c) et d).

The following are the reasons delivered by

BROWN J. (dissenting in part) —

I. Introduction

[131] As my colleague Karakatsanis J. aptly notes for the majority, sexual offences against children have "persisted for centuries" (para. 83). Their legacy is toxic. They are notorious for their devastating impact, often ruining the lives of their victims, and of those whose lives intersect with those victims as they move into adulthood. Trauma from childhood sexual abuse may reverberate for generations, creating pernicious cycles of abuse.

[132] My colleague recounts how, in response to this persistent grave misconduct and its consequent social harms, Parliament amended s. 161(1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, in 2012, augmenting the conditions which a sentencing judge may, in his or her discretion, impose upon an offender convicted of designated sexual offences, where the sentencing judge considers such conditions appropriate to prevent the offender from committing sexual offences against children in the future. Specifically, the sentencing judge's discretion was expanded from prohibiting offenders from "using a computer system . . . for the purpose of communicating with a person under the age of 16 years" to the following:

(c) having any contact — including communicating by any means — with a person who is under the age of 16 years, unless the offender does so under the supervision of a person whom the court considers appropriate; or

Version française des motifs rendus par

LE JUGE BROWN (dissident en partie) —

I. Introduction

[131] Comme le fait remarquer à juste titre ma collègue la juge Karakatsanis au nom des juges majoritaires, les enfants sont victimes d'infractions sexuelles « depuis des siècles » (par. 83). Il s'agit d'un héritage toxique. Nul ne conteste les effets dévastateurs de ces actes qui ruinent souvent la vie des victimes et celle des personnes qui côtoient les victimes une fois qu'elles sont devenues adultes. Le traumatisme de la violence sexuelle subie pendant l'enfance peut se répercuter sur plusieurs générations et enclencher des cycles de violence pernicieux.

[132] Ma collègue fait état de la manière dont le législateur, pour contrer ces actes graves et persistants et les problèmes sociaux qui en découlent, a modifié en 2012 le par. 161(1) du Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-46, en accroissant la portée des interdictions que le juge qui détermine la peine peut, dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire, prononcer à l'endroit de la personne déclarée coupable d'une infraction sexuelle énumérée lorsqu'il estime que l'une ou l'autre de ces interdictions s'impose pour empêcher le contrevenant de récidiver et de s'en prendre à nouveau sexuellement à des enfants. Plus particulièrement, le pouvoir discrétionnaire qui permettait au juge d'interdire au contrevenant « d'utiliser un ordinateur [. . .] dans le but de communiquer avec une personne âgée de moins de seize ans » s'est accru de manière à lui permettre d'interdire ce qui suit au contrevenant :

c) d'avoir des contacts — notamment communiquer par quelque moyen que ce soit — avec une personne âgée de moins de seize ans, à moins de le faire sous la supervision d'une personne que le tribunal estime convenir en l'occurrence;

(d) using the Internet or other digital network, unless the offender does so in accordance with conditions set by the court.

Significantly, these amendments apply to all offenders being sentenced for a designated offence, irrespective of when the offender committed that offence.

[133] I agree with Karakatsanis J. that these conditions constitute "punishment" within the meaning of s. 11(i) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and I endorse the test by which she makes that determination. I also agree that their retrospective application infringes s. 11(i). My point of departure is at the s. 1 stage of the analysis. Whereas my colleague concludes that the Crown has met its burden of justifying its infringement of s. 11(i) only in respect of the conditions relating to Internet use contained in s. 161(1)(d), in my view the Crown has also done so in respect of the conditions imposable under s. 161(1)(c) relating to contact with children. I would therefore uphold both conditions, dismiss the appeal, and affirm the s. 161 order made by the Court of Appeal.

II. Section 1

[134] It is worth bearing in mind that s. 11(i) of the Charter deals with the retrospective application of laws which are punitive in nature. At issue under s. 11(i), then, is not the punishment itself, but rather the means by which it is imposed. In my view, this means-based quality of the s. 11(i) protection affects the analysis to be applied under s. 1, since the Oakes analysis considers the proportionality between a legislative objective and the Charter-infringing effects resulting from its pursuit, not the choice of means that, by itself, constitutes a Charter infringement. The s. 1 analysis should be sensitive to this, in keeping with Dickson C.J.'s direction in Oakes: ". . . the nature of the proportionality test will vary depending on the circumstances" (R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, at p. 139). The Oakes

d) d'utiliser Internet ou tout autre réseau numérique, à moins de le faire en conformité avec les conditions imposées par le tribunal.

Il importe de signaler que ces nouvelles dispositions s'appliquent à toute personne qui se voit infliger une peine pour avoir commis, peu importe le moment, une infraction énumérée.

[133] Je conviens avec la juge Karakatsanis que chacune de ces interdictions constitue une « peine » au sens de l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, et je fais mien le critère qu'elle applique pour arriver à cette conclusion. Je conviens également que l'application rétrospective des dispositions qui les prévoient contrevient à l'al. 11*i*). C'est à l'étape de l'analyse au regard de l'article premier que je diffère d'opinion. Alors que ma collègue conclut que le ministère public s'est acquitté de son obligation de justifier l'atteinte au droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*) seulement en ce qui concerne l'interdiction d'utiliser Internet prévue à l'al. 161(1)d), j'estime qu'il s'en est également acquitté quant à l'interdiction prévue à l'al. 161(1)c), à savoir celle d'avoir des contacts avec des enfants. En conséquence, je serais d'avis de confirmer la validité des deux interdictions, de rejeter le pourvoi et de confirmer l'ordonnance de la Cour d'appel fondée sur l'art. 161.

II. Article premier

[134] Il faut se rappeler que l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte vise l'application rétrospective d'une disposition à caractère punitif. Ce n'est donc pas la peine comme telle qui est en cause pour les besoins de son application, mais plutôt le moyen par lequel elle est infligée. J'estime que cette caractéristique de la protection de l'al. 11*i*) fondée sur le moyen entre en jeu dans l'analyse que commande l'article premier, étant donné que, dans l'arrêt Oakes, la Cour se penche sur la proportionnalité de l'objectif législatif et des effets attentatoires à la Charte qui découlent des mesures prises pour l'atteindre, et non sur le choix du moyen qui équivaut en soi à une atteinte constitutionnelle. L'analyse au regard de l'article premier doit en tenir compte pour se conformer aux directives du juge en chef Dickson dans ce même arrêt : « . . . la nature test is not, and should not be treated as, a technical inquiry, as it is "dangerously misleading to conceive of s. 1 as a rigid and technical provision": R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697, at p. 735, per Dickson C.J. As La Forest J. (dissenting, but not on this point) stated in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199:

> In Oakes, this Court established a set of principles, or guidelines, intended to serve as a framework for making this determination. However, these guidelines should not be interpreted as a substitute for s. 1 itself. It is implicit in the wording of s. 1 that the courts must, in every application of that provision, strike a delicate balance between individual rights and community needs. Such a balance cannot be achieved in the abstract, with reference solely to a formalistic "test" uniformly applicable in all circumstances. The s. 1 inquiry is an unavoidably normative inquiry, requiring the courts to take into account both the nature of the infringed right and the specific values and principles upon which the state seeks to justify the infringement. [Emphasis added; para. 62.]

[135] In other words, a technical and inflexible application of the Oakes test risks reducing what ought to be a rich, contextual inquiry under s. 1 into a form of "mechanical jurisprudence", where "[c]onceptions are fixed", "[t]he premises are no longer to be examined", and "[p]rinciples cease to have importance": R. Pound, "Mechanical Jurisprudence" (1908), 8 Colum. L. Rev. 605, at p. 612. The moral nuances inherent in the question of justifiable limits on fundamental rights cannot be reduced to "technical questions of weight and balance": G. C. N. Webber, The Negotiable Constitution: On the Limitation of Rights (2009), at p. 104. Yet, and despite its statements to the contrary, the majority in this case has in my respectful view done precisely that. Its rigid and acontextual application of Oakes and its subsequent jurisprudence causes it to lose sight of the broader context and overall goal sought by Parliament. It reads the purpose of du critère de proportionnalité pourra varier selon les circonstances » (R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103, p. 139). L'application du critère de l'arrêt Oakes ne se veut pas formaliste, et elle ne devrait pas être tenue pour telle, puisqu'« on s'induit dangereusement en erreur si l'on voit dans l'article premier une disposition rigide et empreinte de formalisme » (R. c. Keegstra, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 697, p. 735 (le juge en chef Dickson)). Voici ce que dit le juge La Forest (dissident, mais non sur ce point) dans l'arrêt RJR-MacDonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 R.C.S. 199 :

> Dans l'arrêt Oakes, notre Cour a établi une série de principes ou directives destinés à servir de cadre analytique à cette fin. Toutefois, ces directives ne devraient pas être interprétées comme si elles remplaçaient l'article premier. Le libellé de l'article premier indique implicitement que les tribunaux doivent, chaque fois qu'ils l'appliquent, établir un équilibre délicat entre les droits individuels et les besoins de la collectivité. Un tel équilibre ne peut être établi dans l'abstrait, à partir seulement d'un « critère » formaliste qui s'appliquerait de façon uniforme dans toutes les circonstances. L'examen fondé sur l'article premier est un examen inévitablement normatif qui exige des tribunaux qu'ils tiennent compte de la nature du droit violé ainsi que des valeurs et des principes spécifiques à partir desquels le ministère public tente de justifier la violation. [Je souligne; par. 62.]

[135] En d'autres termes, l'application formaliste et rigide du critère de l'arrêt Oakes risque de réduire ce qui devrait constituer un examen contextuel étoffé au regard de l'article premier à une sorte de [TRADUCTION] « processus décisionnel mécanique » où les « notions sont figées », où « l'examen des postulats n'est plus nécessaire » et où « les principes n'ont plus d'importance » (R. Pound, « Mechanical Jurisprudence » (1908), 8 Colum. L. Rev. 605, p. 612). On ne saurait ramener les nuances morales inhérentes au caractère justifiable de la restriction d'un droit fondamental à une [TRADUCTION] « entreprise formaliste de pondération et de mise en balance » (G. C. N. Webber, The Negotiable Constitution : On the Limitation of Rights (2009), p. 104). Or, soit dit en tout respect, c'est précisément ce que font selon moi les juges majoritaires en l'espèce, même s'ils affirment le contraire. En appliquant l'arrêt Oakes et les décisions rendues dans sa foulée avec rigidité

the legislation in an excessively narrow fashion, which results in an application of the Oakes test in a way that is ill-suited to deal with punitive laws which apply retrospectively. It holds Parliament to an exacting standard of proof, thereby denying Parliament the room necessary to perform its legislative policy-development role when addressing a chronic social problem. And it also insists on direct evidence of anticipated benefits which, given that chronic nature of the harm, is likely impossible to obtain.

et sans tenir compte du contexte, ils perdent de vue le tableau général et l'objectif global du législateur. Ils interprètent trop étroitement l'objet de la disposition législative, de sorte qu'ils appliquent le critère de l'arrêt Oakes d'une manière qui ne convient pas dans le cas d'une disposition à caractère punitif qui s'applique rétrospectivement. Ils soumettent le législateur à une norme de preuve très stricte et lui refusent ainsi la marge de manœuvre dont il a besoin pour s'acquitter de sa fonction de mise en œuvre de politiques en matière législative lorsqu'il s'agit de s'attaquer à un problème social chronique. Ils exigent en outre une preuve directe des effets bénéfiques escomptés, mais étant donné la nature chronique du problème, il est impossible de produire une telle preuve.

[136] The insight of Dickson C.J. and La Forest J. in our jurisprudence is that the s. 1 analysis must account for the broader picture. The issue is not, as La Forest J. put it, whether a particular "formalistic 'test'" has been satisfied. The "unavoidably normative inquiry" must remain focussed on the broader picture: has the state demonstrated that the impugned law prescribes a reasonable limit, demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society? To be clear, I do not suggest that Oakes is incorrect. Rather, I echo Dickson C.J.'s and La Forest J.'s warnings about its rigid, acontextual application. We should not lose the proportionality forest for the Oakes trees.

[136] Les nuances apportées par le juge en chef Dickson et le juge La Forest veulent que l'analyse au regard de l'article premier tienne compte du tableau général. Comme l'indique le juge La Forest, il ne s'agit pas de savoir si le « "critère" formaliste » précis est rempli. L'« examen inévitablement normatif » doit s'attacher au tableau général : l'État a-t-il établi que la règle de droit contestée emporte une restriction raisonnable dont la justification peut se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique? Bien évidemment, je ne laisse pas entendre que la Cour a fait erreur dans l'arrêt Oakes. Je rappelle plutôt la mise en garde du juge en chef Dickson et du juge La Forest contre l'application rigide et non contextuelle. Il ne faut pas perdre de vue la forêt de la proportionnalité derrière l'arbre d'Oakes.

A. Objective of the Measure

A. Objectif de la mesure

[137] The means-based quality of s. 11(i)'s protection should therefore inform the characterization of the objective anchoring the s. 1 proportionality analysis. The majority says that the relevant objective for the purpose of a proportionality analysis is that of the Charter-infringing measure — which, in this case, is the retrospective operation of the amendments to s. 161(1). I agree, but only to a point. The relevant objective for this purpose is indeed the objective of the measure. However, as I will explain, the measure to be considered here comprises the amendments as a whole, and not merely their retrospectivity.

[137] La caractéristique de la protection de l'al. 11*i*) fondée sur le moyen devrait donc jouer dans la détermination de l'objectif en fonction duquel il convient d'effectuer l'examen de la proportionnalité dans le cadre de l'analyse au regard de l'article premier. Les juges majoritaires affirment que l'objectif à considérer est celui de la mesure attentatoire, soit, en l'occurrence, l'application rétrospective des dispositions issues des modifications apportées au par. 161(1). J'en conviens, mais seulement jusqu'à un certain point. L'objectif à considérer est

[138] Considering retrospectivity in isolation from the broader provision of which it forms a part skews the Oakes analysis by making several of its elements largely redundant. If, as the majority says, Parliament's objective was to "better protect children from the risks posed by offenders like the appellant" (para. 65) — i.e., offenders who committed a designated offence before, but were sentenced after, the amendments came into force and who pose a risk to reoffend sexually against children — then the application of such orders to offenders like the appellant is obviously rationally connected to this objective. And, there would be no possible less-impairing means of achieving this objective: simply put, the only way Parliament can apply the protective aspect of s. 161(1) orders to such offenders retrospectively is to apply s. 161(1) orders to such offenders retrospectively. Indeed, under the majority's approach, the minimal impairment inquiry becomes otiose. Of course, were such orders to be applied retrospectively as to offenders unlike the appellant (i.e., those who do not pose a risk to reoffend sexually against children), the rational connection and minimal impairment steps would then have some work to do under the Oakes analysis. By narrowly construing Parliament's purpose as the majority has, however, considerations of the rational connection and minimal impairment elements of the proportionality analysis are limited to determining whether the Charter-infringing measure captures the individuals which it targets, not whether the measure is rationally connected to the objective and minimally impairing of the Charter rights of those who legitimately fall within its ambit.

effectivement celui de la mesure, mais comme je l'explique plus loin, la mesure à examiner en l'espèce s'entend des modifications dans leur totalité, et non seulement de l'application rétrospective des dispositions qui en sont issues.

[138] L'examen de la rétrospectivité sans égard à la disposition dans laquelle elle s'inscrit fausse l'analyse préconisée dans l'arrêt Oakes en rendant en grande partie superflus plusieurs des éléments de celle-ci. Si, comme le soutiennent les juges majoritaires, le législateur a voulu « mieux protéger les enfants contre le risque que présente un contrevenant [. . .] comme l'appelant » (par. 65), c'est-à-dire un contrevenant qui a commis une infraction énumérée avant l'entrée en vigueur des modifications, mais qui a été condamné après celle-ci, et qui présente le risque de s'en prendre à nouveau sexuellement à des enfants, l'application d'une ordonnance fondée sur l'art. 161 à un contrevenant comme l'appelant a manifestement un lien rationnel avec cet objectif. Qui plus est, aucun autre moyen moins attentatoire ne permettrait d'atteindre cet objectif : en somme, le législateur ne peut faire en sorte que la vocation protectrice d'une telle ordonnance s'applique rétrospectivement à un tel contrevenant autrement qu'en prévoyant l'application rétrospective de l'ordonnance à un tel contrevenant. Suivant l'approche restrictive des juges majoritaires, l'examen du caractère minimal de l'atteinte devient en effet inutile. Évidemment, si une telle ordonnance s'appliquait à un contrevenant différent de l'appelant (c.-à-d. qui ne présenterait pas le risque de s'en prendre à nouveau sexuellement à des enfants), les volets du lien rationnel et de l'atteinte minimale joueraient leur rôle jusqu'à un certain point dans l'analyse établie par l'arrêt Oakes. L'interprétation étroite de l'intention du législateur à laquelle se livrent les juges majoritaires fait en sorte que l'examen du lien rationnel et de l'atteinte minimale que comporte l'analyse de la proportionnalité se limite à se demander si la mesure attentatoire atteint les personnes qu'elle vise, à l'exclusion de la question de savoir si la mesure a un lien rationnel avec l'objectif et si l'atteinte aux droits que la Charte garantit aux personnes auxquelles la mesure s'applique légitimement est minimale.

[139] A broader examination of Parliament's purpose is therefore necessary in order to anchor a useful proportionality analysis. The measure that gave rise to the Charter infringement, and which should anchor the proportionality analysis, comprises the amendments to s. 161 as a whole. And, as to that measure, I agree with the majority's characterization of its objective as being to "enhance the protection s. 161 affords to children against the risk of harm posed by convicted sexual offenders" (para. 65). The retrospective application of these amendments is rationally connected to that protective purpose, since the risk an offender poses to reoffend sexually against children is not affected by whether the offence occurred before or after the measure's enactment. And, given Parliament's objective of enhancing the protections that s. 161 affords to children, there is no less-impairing alternate measure that would allow for s. 161(1)'s protections to be realized in respect of an offender who committed his or her offence before the amendments came into force and who poses a risk to reoffend.

B. Balancing Salutary and Deleterious Effects

[140] I agree with the majority that the final stage of the s. 1 analysis allows courts to "transcend the law's purpose and engage in a robust examination of the law's impact on Canada's free and democratic society" (para. 79). But a robust examination of this impact takes us only so far because, after all, the impact of a provision on a free and democratic society is hardly a measurable thing. The question we are trying to answer is whether "the deleterious effects are out of proportion to the public good achieved by the infringing measure": Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 567, at para. 78. Neither criterion is amenable to demonstrative proof. The final proportionality analysis is tied to the practical impacts and benefits of the law, but what is ultimately being weighed is much more abstract and philosophical: the detriment to Charter-protected rights against the public benefit sought. We must therefore be careful to avoid insisting upon too strict an evidentiary burden.

[139] Pour se prononcer utilement sur la proportionnalité, il faut donc rechercher plus largement l'intention du législateur. La mesure attentatoire qui doit être soumise à l'examen consiste dans la totalité des modifications apportées à l'art. 161. Je conviens avec les juges majoritaires que l'objectif de cette mesure est « d'accroître la protection qu'offre aux enfants l'art. 161 contre le risque de préjudice que représentent les personnes déclarées coupables d'infractions sexuelles » (par. 65). L'application rétrospective des dispositions issues des modifications a un lien rationnel avec cette vocation protectrice, car le risque que le contrevenant s'en prenne à nouveau sexuellement à des enfants n'a rien à voir avec le fait que l'infraction a été commise avant ou après l'adoption de la mesure. Et vu l'objectif du législateur d'accroître la protection qu'offre aux enfants l'art. 161, aucune autre mesure moins attentatoire ne ferait jouer la protection offerte par l'art. 161 dans le cas du contrevenant qui a commis l'acte criminel avant l'entrée en vigueur des modifications et qui présente un risque de récidive.

B. Mise en balance des effets bénéfiques et des effets préjudiciables

[141] With these general comments in mind, I turn to the majority's proportionality analysis. It suffers, in my respectful view, from several flaws. First, it imposes an evidentiary burden on the state that is impossible to satisfy, especially in the murky area of recidivism risks and criminal law policy. Second, it overstates the deleterious effects of s. 161(1)(c) while understating its salutary effects. Further, the majority's reasons for upholding the retrospective application of s. 161(1)(d) are, in principle, equally applicable to the retrospective application of s. 161(1)(c). In other words, if the majority's reasoning on s. 161(1)(d) is accepted, then the retrospective application of s. 161(1)(c) must also be a proportionate limit on the appellant's s. 11(i) right.

(1) The Evidentiary Burden

[142] The majority stresses — almost to a determinative extent — shortcomings it sees in the Crown's social science evidence, concluding that while it sufficiently demonstrates that the sought-after "degree of enhanced protection" for children will be achieved by the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d), "the rendering remains largely incomplete" in respect of s. 161(1)(c) (para. 92).

[143] This reasoning is troubling in several respects. First, it departs significantly from this Court's approach to social science evidence and the evidentiary burden borne by the state under s. 1. Social science evidence used to establish legislative facts should ordinarily be adduced through expert witnesses in order to allow its truth to be tested: Public School Boards' Assn. of Alberta v. Alberta (Attorney General), 2000 SCC 2, [2000] 1 la mise en balance est somme toute de nature beaucoup plus abstraite et philosophique : l'effet préjudiciable sur le droit garanti par la Charte comparé à l'effet bénéfique recherché pour la société. Nous devons donc nous garder d'imposer un fardeau de preuve trop strict.

[141] Au vu de ces remarques générales, je passe à l'examen de la proportionnalité par les juges majoritaires, lequel, à mon humble avis, comporte plusieurs lacunes. Premièrement, les juges majoritaires imposent à l'État un fardeau de preuve dont il ne pourra jamais s'acquitter, en particulier pour ce qui concerne le monde nébuleux des risques de récidive et des politiques en matière de droit criminel. Deuxièmement, ils exagèrent les effets préjudiciables de l'al. 161(1)c) tout en sous-estimant ses effets bénéfiques. En outre, les raisons qu'ils invoquent pour valider l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d) valent en principe tout autant pour l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c). En d'autres mots, si on fait droit à leur raisonnement concernant l'al. 161(1)d), l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) doit équivaloir elle aussi à une restriction proportionnée du droit que l'al. 11*i*) garantit à l'appelant.

(1) Le fardeau de preuve

[143] Ce raisonnement est déroutant sous plusieurs rapports. Premièrement, il rompt sensiblement avec l'approche de la Cour à l'égard de la preuve relevant des sciences sociales et du fardeau de preuve que l'article premier impose à l'État. La preuve relevant des sciences sociales censée établir un fait législatif doit normalement être présentée par un témoin expert de façon à permettre la contestation de sa véracité (Public School Boards' Assn. of

S.C.R. 44, at paras. 4-5, per Binnie J. This social science evidence, however, was adduced through a "Brandeis brief", and is untested by the ordinary truth-seeking processes of a trial. Considerable care should therefore be taken in examining this evidence and drawing inferences — whether favourable or adverse from the state's standpoint — from it: M. v. H., [1999] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 296, per Bastarache J., writing separate but concurring reasons.

[144] Further, given the complex social context in which Parliament often develops policy — of which the prevention of recidivism in cases of sexual offences against children is clearly an instance — it will sometimes be difficult, if not impossible, for the state to provide reliable and direct evidence of the benefit its measures will achieve. Recidivism rates are derived from statistical extrapolation, psychology, and other elements of social science, which will not always translate easily into proof to the standard of demonstrable justification. As this Court has recognized, "social claims are not always amenable to proof by empirical evidence": Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 3, at para. 144. As a result, "public policy is often made on the basis of incomplete knowledge": S. Choudhry, "So What Is the Real Legacy of Oakes? Two Decades of Proportionality Analysis under the Canadian Charter's Section 1" (2006), 34 S.C.L.R. (2d) 501, at p. 524. The proportionality analysis should therefore be sensitive to policy-makers' need for a measure of latitude to consider and try previously untried alternatives, particularly when confronting persistent and complex public policy concerns.

[145] This is not to say that these evidentiary difficulties compel acceptance of the Crown's claims. This Court has held that a rigorous s. 1 analysis may also be accomplished by employing "logic [and] reason" in assessing justifiable limits on Charter Alberta c. Alberta (Procureur général), 2000 CSC 2, [2000] 1 R.C.S. 44, par. 4-5, le juge Binnie). Or, dans la présente affaire, la preuve relevant des sciences sociales a été présentée au moyen d'un « mémoire de Brandeis » et sa véracité n'a pas été contestée dans le cadre du processus habituel de recherche de la vérité qu'est le procès. Une grande prudence est donc de mise lorsqu'il s'agit de considérer une telle preuve et d'en tirer des inférences, qu'elles soient favorables ou non à la thèse de l'État (M. c. H., [1999] 2 R.C.S. 3, par. 296 (le juge Bastarache, motifs concordants)).

[144] Par ailleurs, compte tenu du contexte social complexe dans lequel les politiques du législateur voient souvent le jour — et dont un exemple manifeste est la prévention de la récidive en matière d'infractions sexuelles contre des enfants —, il sera parfois difficile, voire impossible, pour l'État d'avancer une preuve fiable et directe des effets bénéfiques d'une mesure. Les taux de récidive sont établis à partir d'extrapolations statistiques, de données psychologiques et d'autres éléments relevant des sciences sociales qui ne pourront pas toujours se transformer d'emblée en éléments de preuve susceptibles de satisfaire à la norme de la justification démontrable. La Cour reconnaît que « [l]es revendications de nature [. . .] sociale ne se prêtent pas toujours à une preuve empirique » (Association de la police montée de l'Ontario c. Canada (Procureur général), 2015 CSC 1, [2015] 1 R.C.S. 3, par. 144). Il s'ensuit que [TRADUCTION] « les politiques publiques voient souvent le jour à partir de données incomplètes » (S. Choudhry, « So What Is the Real Legacy of Oakes? Two Decades of Proportionality Analysis under the Canadian Charter's Section 1 » (2006), 34 S.C.L.R. (2d) 501, p. 524). L'examen de la proportionnalité devrait donc tenir compte de la nécessité qu'un décideur jouisse d'une certaine latitude pour envisager une solution inédite et la mettre à l'essai, surtout lorsqu'il s'attaque à un problème d'intérêt public à la fois persistant et complexe.

[145] Pour autant, de telles difficultés au chapitre de la preuve n'obligent pas le tribunal à faire droit aux prétentions du ministère public. La Cour a statué qu'on pouvait aussi se livrer à une analyse rigoureuse au regard de l'article premier en recourant rights: Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 827, at para. 78; see also R. v. Butler, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 452, at p. 503-4, per Sopinka J.; Keegstra, at p. 776, per Dickson C.J.; Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 877, at para. 107, per Bastarache J.; R. v. Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 45, at paras. 85-94, per McLachlin C.J.; R. v. Bryan, 2007 SCC 12, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 527, at para. 20, per Bastarache J., and paras. 100-103, per Abella J., dissenting. By applying this approach here (instead of demanding empiricism where none can exist), the salutary effects of s. 161(1)(c) become clear, as does the true scope of its deleterious effects.

« à la logique [et] à la raison » pour décider si la restriction d'un droit garanti par la Charte est justifiable ou non (Harper c. Canada (Procureur général), 2004 CSC 33, [2004] 1 R.C.S. 827, par. 78; voir également R. c. Butler, [1992] 1 R.C.S. 452, p. 503-504 (le juge Sopinka); Keegstra, p. 776 (le juge en chef Dickson); Thomson Newspapers Co. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1998] 1 R.C.S. 877, par. 107 (le juge Bastarache); R. c. Sharpe, 2001 CSC 2, [2001] 1 R.C.S. 45, par. 85-94 (la juge en chef McLachlin); R. c. Bryan, 2007 CSC 12, [2007] 1 R.C.S. 527, par. 20 (le juge Bastarache) et par. 100-103 (la juge Abella, dissidente)). Si la Cour appliquait cette démarche en l'espèce (au lieu d'exiger une preuve empirique alors qu'il n'en existe aucune), les effets bénéfiques de l'al. 161(1)c) apparaîtraient clairement, et l'étendue véritable de ses effets préjudiciables aussi.

(2) Salutary and Deleterious Effects of Section 161(1)(c)

(2) Les effets bénéfiques de l'al. 161(1)c) et ses effets préjudiciables

[146] The majority says that the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) creates serious deleterious effects at an individual and societal level. At an individual level, it views s. 161(1)(c) as going much further in its potential restrictions of an offender's liberty than did its predecessor, since it "prohibits any contact — including communicating by any means — with a person who is under the age of 16 years" (para. 81 (emphasis in original)). It warns that this provision could have the effect of prohibiting offenders from conversing with younger members of his or her family, or that it could prohibit offenders from "freely moving about certain private and public spaces where children are present" (para. 81). At a societal level, the majority says that the retrospective operation of a punitive law "undermines fairness in criminal proceedings and compromises the rule of law" (para. 82) (although this can, of course, be said of any measure which infringes s. 11(i)).

[146] Les juges majoritaires estiment que l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) a de sérieux effets préjudiciables sur les plans individuel et social. Sur le plan individuel, ils sont d'avis que l'al. 161(1)c) va beaucoup plus loin que la disposition qu'il remplace dans la restriction éventuelle du droit du contrevenant à la liberté en ce qu'il « interdi[t] d'avoir des contacts — notamment communiquer par quelque moyen que ce soit — avec une personne âgée de moins de seize ans » dans un lieu public ou privé (par. 81 (souligné dans l'original)). Ils préviennent que la disposition pourrait interdire au contrevenant de parler avec les jeunes membres de sa famille ou « de se trouver dans un endroit privé ou public où il y a des enfants » (par. 81). Sur le plan social, ils font valoir que l'application rétrospective d'une disposition à caractère punitif « compromet l'équité des procédures criminelles et la primauté du droit » (par. 82) (bien que l'on puisse évidemment dire la même chose de toute mesure qui contrevient à l'al. 11*i*)).

[147] The general restriction on liberty or security of the person which results from retrospectively applied punishment is not, however, relevant to the inquiry under s. 11(i) of the Charter. What is relevant when assessing the deleterious impact upon the offender of a retrospectively applied punitive law is the degree by which it increases punishment relative to the original law. For example, a retrospective increase in a mandatory minimum term of incarceration from one year to 14 years would have a greater deleterious impact on offenders and on the rule of law than would a retrospective increase in a fine from $100 to $101. But, again, this is because of the relative differences in the degree of increased punishment wrought by such measures, and not because of the general restrictions on liberty or security of the person that they impose. Again, s. 11(i) is not concerned with the nature of the punishment, but with its retrospective increase.

[147] La restriction générale du droit à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne qui découle d'une peine appliquée rétrospectivement n'a cependant pas à être considérée dans l'analyse que commande

[148] Further, the majority's conclusion regarding the deleterious impact upon the offender's liberty interests is, in my view, overstated.

[149] It is useful to return to the text of s. 161(1)(c):

161 (1) . . . the court that sentences the offender . . . shall consider making and may make, subject to the conditions or exemptions that the court directs, an order prohibiting the offender from

(c) having any contact — including communicating by any means — with a person who is under the age of 16 years, unless the offender does so under the supervision of a person whom the court considers appropriate . . . .

[150] Section 161(1)(c) contains two crucial qualifications which circumscribe its deleterious impact upon an offender's liberty interest. First, the matter is left to the sentencing judge's discretion, both as to whether to impose conditions ("shall consider making and may make"), and as to the tailoring of the conditions themselves ("subject to the conditions or exemptions that the court directs"). Second, a s. 161(1)(c) order — even when imposed without l'al. 11*i*) de la Charte. Ce qui doit être pris en compte pour apprécier l'effet préjudiciable sur le contrevenant d'une disposition à caractère punitif appliquée rétrospectivement c'est le degré d'accroissement de la peine par rapport à la disposition antérieure. À titre d'exemple, l'accroissement rétrospectif qui ferait passer une peine d'emprisonnement minimale obligatoire d'un an à 14 ans aurait un effet préjudiciable plus grand sur le contrevenant et sur la primauté du droit que l'accroissement rétrospectif qui ferait passer une amende de 100 $ à 101 $. Or, je le répète, il en est ainsi en raison des différents degrés d'accroissement de la peine qui correspondent à ces mesures, et non de la restriction générale du droit à la liberté ou à la sécurité de la personne qui découle de celles-ci. Rappelons que l'analyse au regard de l'al. 11*i*) ne s'intéresse pas à la nature de la peine, mais bien à son accroissement rétrospectif.

[148] Par ailleurs, la conclusion des juges majoritaires concernant l'effet préjudiciable sur le droit à la liberté du contrevenant est à mon sens exagérée.

[149] Considérons à nouveau le texte de l'al. 161(1)c) :

161 (1) . . . le tribunal qui [. . .] inflige une peine [au contrevenant] [. . .], sous réserve des conditions ou exemptions qu'il indique, peut interdire au contrevenant

c) d'avoir des contacts — notamment communiquer par quelque moyen que ce soit — avec une personne âgée de moins de seize ans, à moins de le faire sous la supervision d'une personne que le tribunal estime convenir en l'occurrence.

[150] L'alinéa 161(1)c) renferme deux éléments cruciaux qui circonscrivent son effet préjudiciable sur le droit à la liberté du contrevenant. D'abord, le juge se voit conférer un pouvoir discrétionnaire lui permettant à la fois de prononcer une interdiction (« peut interdire au contrevenant ») et d'adapter celle-ci (« sous réserve des conditions ou exemptions qu'il indique »). Ensuite, l'interdiction prononcée sur le fondement de l'al. 161(1)c) — other conditions or exemptions — still contains the internal qualification that the prohibition of contact with a person under the age of 16 years only applies to such contact which occurs without the "supervision of a person whom the court considers appropriate".

[151] In other words, an offender who seeks to interact with, for example, younger members of his or her family, may do so either by seeking an exemption or under the supervision of a person the court considers appropriate. Similarly — and assuming that, as the majority suggests, freely moving about in a public space where children are present is sufficient to constitute "contact" or to risk "contact" (a suggestion to which I return below) — were an offender to provide a legitimate reason for being in a public space where children are present, that offender may obtain an exemption for that particular place, or may be in that place under the supervision of a person the court considers appropriate. In determining whether such exemptions are appropriate, the sentencing court must of course consider the danger the offender poses to re-offend sexually against children. But the point is that s. 161(1)(c) gives a sentencing judge the tools to ensure that the offender's liberty is not restricted more than is necessary to mitigate that offender's risk.

[152] As to the meaning of "contact", the majority's assessment of the deleterious effects of s. 161(1)(c)'s retrospective application largely rests on an overly expansive interpretation of the meaning of "contact" in s. 161(1)(c). More to the point, the majority's suggestion that merely "moving about" in a public space where children are present constitutes or risks "contact" represents a strained interpretation of the scope of the restriction on contact, and is directly at odds with the well-established principle that the criminal law's prohibitions on conduct should be construed strictly: R. v. McIntosh, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 686, at paras. 38-39, per Lamer C.J. To the extent, therefore, that the meaning of "contact" is ambiguous, it "must be interpreted in assortie ou non de conditions ou d'exemptions — renferme toujours un élément intrinsèque qui fait en sorte que l'interdiction d'avoir des contacts avec une personne âgée de moins de 16 ans ne vaut que pour les contacts qui ont lieu sans la « supervision d'une personne que le tribunal estime convenir en l'occurrence ».

[151] Autrement dit, le contrevenant qui souhaite interagir avec, par exemple, un jeune membre de sa famille peut le faire moyennant une exemption ou sous la supervision d'une personne que le tribunal estime convenir en l'occurrence. De même — et à supposer, comme le laissent entendre les juges majoritaires, que le fait de se trouver dans un lieu privé ou public où il y des enfants suffise pour qu'il y ait « contacts » ou risque de « contacts » (ce sur quoi je reviendrai) —, le contrevenant qui avancerait un motif légitime de se trouver dans un lieu public où il y a des enfants pourrait obtenir une exemption pour ce lieu en particulier ou pourrait s'y trouver sous la supervision d'une personne que le tribunal estime convenir en l'occurrence. Pour décider de l'opportunité d'une telle exemption, le juge qui détermine la peine doit bien sûr tenir compte du risque que le contrevenant récidive et s'en prenne à nouveau sexuellement à des enfants. L'alinéa 161(1)c) lui offre donc des avenues pour faire en sorte que le droit à la liberté du contrevenant ne soit pas restreint plus qu'il ne le faut pour atténuer le risque qu'il représente.

[152] En ce qui a trait au sens du mot « contacts » employé à l'al. 161(1)c), l'appréciation par les juges majoritaires des effets préjudiciables de l'application rétrospective de l'alinéa repose en grande partie sur une interprétation indûment libérale de ce mot. Plus précisément, leur affirmation selon laquelle le simple fait de « se trouver » dans un lieu public où il y a des enfants équivaut à « avoir des contacts » ou présente un risque d'« avoir des contacts » revient à forcer l'interprétation de la portée de l'interdiction des contacts et va directement à l'encontre du principe bien établi en droit criminel voulant que l'interdiction d'une conduite doive être interprétée restrictivement (R. c. McIntosh, [1995] 1 R.C.S. 686, par. 38-39, le juge en chef Lamer).

the manner most favourable to accused persons": McIntosh, at para. 39.

[153] While overstating the deleterious effects of s. 161(1)(c)'s retrospective operation, the majority also understates its salutary effects. The risk that some offenders pose to reoffend sexually against children simply cannot be mitigated by the original version of s. 161(1). The appellant presents an example of this. Having committed several designated offences against his infant daughter, he was found by the sentencing judge to pose a "substantial" risk to reoffend sexually against children. While s. 161(1)(a) would have allowed the sentencing judge to restrict the offender's presence in specified public places such as public parks and public swimming areas in which children are present or could reasonably be expected to be present, the sentencing judge could not tailor a s. 161(1) order to restrict the appellant's ability to interact with children in private. But this is, of course, precisely where the appellant and other similar offenders pose the greatest risk to children. The evidence before Parliament showed that (1) of the children of the age of five years and less who were the victims of sexual offences in 2009, approximately 60% of boys and 70% of girls were victimized by family members; and (2) most victims under the age of 16 were victimized by family members or acquaintances. Far from "speculative" (para. 95), then, the salutary effects of s. 161(1)(c)'s retrospective operation seem manifest. It restricts an offender whose offences predate the amendments to s. 161(1)(c) from having unsupervised access to children, both in private and in public, where the sentencing judge determines that such a condition is necessary to address a risk that the offender will commit further sexual offences against children.

Dès lors, dans la mesure où le mot « contacts» n'a pas un sens clair, il « faut [l']interpréter [. . .] de la façon qui favorisera le plus l'accusé » (McIntosh, par. 39).

[153] S'ils exagèrent les effets préjudiciables de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c), les juges majoritaires sous-estiment ses effets bénéfiques. Le risque que certains contrevenants récidivent et s'en prennent à nouveau sexuellement à des enfants ne peut tout simplement pas être réduit en appliquant la version antérieure du par. 161(1). L'appelant en est un bon exemple. Comme il avait perpétré plusieurs infractions énumérées à l'encontre de sa propre fillette, le juge a estimé qu'il existait un risque [TRADUCTION] « important » qu'il récidive et s'en prenne à nouveau sexuellement à des enfants. L'alinéa 161(1)a) aurait certes permis au juge de lui interdire de se rendre dans certains lieux publics, tel un parc ou un lieu de baignade fréquenté par des enfants ou dont on peut raisonnablement s'attendre à ce qu'il soit fréquenté par des enfants, mais il n'aurait pu adapter l'interdiction fondée sur le par. 161(1) de manière à l'empêcher d'interagir avec des enfants dans un lieu privé. Or, c'est précisément là où l'appelant et d'autres délinquants du même acabit présentent le risque le plus grand pour les enfants. Selon la preuve dont disposait le législateur, (1) parmi les enfants de cinq ans et moins qui ont été victimes d'infractions sexuelles en 2009, environ 60 p. 100 des garçons et 70 p. 100 des filles l'ont été aux mains de membres de leur famille et (2) la plupart des victimes de moins de 16 ans ont subi leur triste sort aux mains de membres de leur famille ou de connaissances. Ainsi, loin d'être « conjecturaux » (par. 95), les effets bénéfiques de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) paraissent manifestes. Cette dernière empêche le contrevenant dont les actes criminels sont antérieurs à la modification de l'al. 161(1)c) d'avoir accès sans supervision à des enfants, que ce soit dans un lieu privé ou public, lorsque le juge qui détermine la peine estime qu'une interdiction en ce sens est nécessaire pour contrer le risque que le contrevenant commette à nouveau des infractions sexuelles contre des enfants.

[154] The majority's consideration of the deleterious effects of the retrospective operation of this provision also views as significant the "dearth of a compelling temporal justification" for s. 161(1)(c)'s retrospective operation, in the sense that "there appears to have been little change in the nature and degree of risk facing children since the last time s. 161(1) was amended" (para. 83). But with respect, and even assuming this concern could fairly be characterized as "temporal" in nature, this is not the sort of temporal concern that s. 11(i) engages, being the retrospective application of punishment. The majority, is, in substance, questioning whether Parliament's objective — which the majority has already found to have met the "pressing and substantial" objective requirement of Oakes — was pressing and substantial. Further, even if this "temporal justification" were an appropriate consideration at this stage of the analysis, it should not be virtually determinative when assessing the deleterious impact of a retrospective punishment. Bearing in mind that the record indicates that Parliament was responding to what it believed to be a grave social harm — which harm the majority acknowledges as persistent — it is worth recalling this Court's statement in Keegstra (at p. 776, per Dickson C.J.) that it is "well accepted that Parliament can use the criminal law to prevent the risk of serious harms". It does not matter whether that risk has remained constant or increased, or whether it is longstanding or emerging. This Court has never, for example, required the Crown to advance a compelling "temporal" justification to uphold Charter-infringing impaired driving legislation by showing that the persistent social harm of impaired driving has taken a turn for the worse: see, e.g., R. v. Orbanski, 2005 SCC 37, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 3; R. v. St-Onge Lamoureux, 2012 SCC 57, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 187 (upholding the presumption of identity in s. 258(1)(d.1) of the Criminal Code). Parliament should be entitled, within constitutional limits, to innovate in finding a solution to chronic harms, irrespective of whether the incidence of such harms has remained stable, increased, or even declined.

[154] Dans leur examen des effets préjudiciables, les juges majoritaires tiennent également pour importante « [l]'inexistence d'une justification d'ordre temporel convaincante » de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) en ce sens que « la nature et le degré du risque auquel sont exposés les enfants semblaient avoir peu changé depuis la modification précédente du par. 161(1) » (par. 83). Mais, soit dit en tout respect, à supposer même que cette préoccupation puisse être « d'ordre temporel », il ne s'agit pas du genre de préoccupation « d'ordre temporel » qui intéresse l'al. 11*i*), à savoir l'application rétrospective d'une peine. Les juges majoritaires remettent essentiellement en cause l'objectif du législateur, dont ils estiment pourtant qu'il est « urgent et réel » suivant le critère de l'arrêt Oakes. En outre, même s'il convenait à ce stade de l'analyse de se pencher sur l'existence d'une « justification d'ordre temporel », cette considération ne devrait pas être déterminante, pour ainsi dire, dans l'appréciation de l'effet préjudiciable d'une peine d'application rétrospective. Gardant présent à l'esprit que, selon le dossier, le législateur s'attaquait à ce qui constituait selon lui un grave préjudice social — un préjudice que les juges majoritaires tiennent pour persistant —, il vaut la peine de rappeler les propos de la Cour dans l'arrêt Keegstra (p. 776, le juge en chef Dickson) selon lesquels il est « généralement reconnu que le Parlement peut se servir du droit criminel pour prévenir le risque de préjudices graves ». Peu importe que le risque soit demeuré constant ou se soit accru, ou qu'il existe de longue date ou depuis peu. Par exemple, la Cour n'a jamais exigé, pour valider une disposition sur la conduite en état d'ébriété qui contrevenait à la Charte, que le ministère public établisse l'existence d'une justification « d'ordre temporel » convaincante et démontre l'aggravation du préjudice persistant causé par la conduite en état d'ébriété (voir p. ex. R. c. Orbanski, 2005 CSC 37, [2005] 2 R.C.S. 3; R. c. St-Onge Lamoureux, 2012 CSC 57, [2012] 3 R.C.S. 187 (confirmant la présomption d'identité prévue à l'al. 258(1)d.1) du Code criminel). Le législateur devrait pouvoir, à l'intérieur des limites fixées par la Constitution, faire preuve d'innovation dans la recherche d'une solution à un préjudice chronique, peu importe que l'incidence de ce préjudice soit demeurée stable, ait augmenté ou ait même diminué.

[155] To be clear, nobody doubts that s. 11(i) deals with temporal considerations, because, as the majority says, it is "about the timing of changes to penal laws" (para. 93 (emphasis in original)). But the "temporal" concern identified by the majority speaks more (if not exclusively) to the pressing and substantial nature of Parliament's objective than it does to the deleterious effects of retrospective punishment on the rule of law (e.g. para. 93: ". . . temporal factors that may help explain Parliament's rationale . . ."). All retrospective changes to the law derogate from the rule of law, irrespective of Parliament's reasons for enacting them. All retrospective punishment is imposed without fair warning, denying a person "the opportunity to know what is expected of her and to decide what to do in light of that knowledge": D. Lyons, Ethics and the rule of law (1984), at p. 75. In every such case, and even where the majority's concern about whether there has been "change in the nature and degree of risk" (para. 83) is assuaged, the rule of law is harmed: see L. L. Fuller, The Morality of Law (rev. ed. 1969), at pp. 53-54; C. Sampford, Retrospectivity and the Rule of Law (2006), at p. 81. The relevance of this concern driving the majority's assessment of the deleterious impacts on the rule of law in this case is therefore far from evident.

[155] Précisons que nul ne doute que les considérations d'ordre temporel importent pour les besoins de l'al. 11*i*) puisque, comme le disent les juges majoritaires, celui-ci « s'intéresse [. . .] au moment où intervient la modification d'une disposition à caractère punitif » (par. 93 (en italique dans l'original)). Or, cette préoccupation que relèvent mes collègues a plus (sinon seulement) à voir avec la nature urgente et réelle de l'objectif du législateur qu'avec les effets préjudiciables d'une peine d'application rétrospective sur la primauté du droit (p. ex. au par. 93 : « . . . les considérations d'ordre temporel qui sont susceptibles d'expliquer la décision du législateur . . . »). Toute modification apportée rétrospectivement à une règle de droit porte atteinte à la primauté du droit, quelle que soit la motivation du législateur. Toute peine d'application rétrospective est infligée sans que le contrevenant n'ait pu vraiment savoir qu'il en était passible et a privé ce dernier de [TRADUCTION] « la possibilité de savoir ce qu'on attendait de lui et d'agir en conséquence » (D. Lyons, Ethics and the rule of law (1984), p. 75). Chaque fois alors, même lorsque les juges majoritaires se soucient moins de savoir si « la nature et le degré du risque [ont] changé » (par. 83), la primauté du droit est compromise (voir L. L. Fuller, The Morality of Law (éd. rév. 1969), p. 53-54; C. Sampford, Retrospectivity and the Rule of Law (2006), p. 81). La pertinence de cette préoccupation qui sous-tend l'appréciation, par les juges majoritaires, des effets préjudiciables de la mesure sur la primauté du droit en l'espèce est donc loin d'aller de soi.

(3) Inconsistent Treatment of Paragraphs (c) and (d)

(3) Analyse différente des al. c) et d)

[156] I also observe that, apart from the matter of "temporal" justifications which I have just addressed, all the reasons identified by the majority in support of its conclusion that the limit imposed on the appellant's s. 11(i) right by the retrospective application of s. 161(1)(d) is justified are equally applicable to the retrospective application of s. 161(1)(c).

[156] Outre la question de l'existence d'une justification « d'ordre temporel », examinée précédemment, je remarque aussi que toutes les raisons invoquées par les juges majoritaires à l'appui de leur conclusion selon laquelle est justifiée la restriction du droit que l'al. 11*i*) garantit à l'appelant, du fait de l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d), valent également pour l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c).

[157] In this regard, the majority observes in respect of s. 161(1)(d) that the harms at stake are

[157] Les juges majoritaires signalent que, pour ce qui concerne l'al. 161(1)d), les préjudices en jeu

"particularly powerful"; that the statutory regime "is highly tailored and discretionary"; and that the Internet prohibition is "not among the most onerous punishments, such as increased incarceration" (para. 114). But each of these reasons support the conclusion that the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) is justified as well. Section 161(1)(c) addresses precisely the same "particularly powerful" concern as does s. 161(1)(d), being sexual offences against children. The condition in s. 161(1)(c), as I have explained, is also "highly tailored and discretionary", since it is imposed only where the sentencing judge deems it necessary, and also since it is subject to such exemptions as the sentencing judge sees fit to allow. And the punishment imposed by s. 161(1)(c) is "not among the most onerous punishments, such as increased incarceration", since it prohibits an offender only from having unsupervised contact with a child. It therefore follows that, if the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(d) is a proportional and justified limit on an offender's s. 11(i) right, the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) must be as well.

(4) The Proper Balancing

sont « particulièrement convaincants », le régime législatif « a une portée très bien circonscrite et confère un pouvoir discrétionnaire » et l'interdiction d'utiliser Internet « ne fait pas partie des sanctions les plus lourdes, telle la peine d'emprisonnement accrue » (par. 114). Pourtant, chacune de ces raisons appuie la conclusion selon laquelle l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) est elle aussi justifiée. L'alinéa 161(1)c) s'attaque précisément au même préjudice « particulièrement convaincant » que l'al. 161(1)d), à savoir les infractions sexuelles contre les enfants. Comme je l'explique précédemment, l'interdiction que prévoit l'al. 161(1)c) est elle aussi « très bien circonscrite et [relève du] pouvoir discrétionnaire », puisqu'elle n'est prononcée que lorsque le juge qui détermine la peine conclut qu'elle est nécessaire et, également, qu'elle fait l'objet de toute exemption que le juge indique. Et la peine infligée par l'al. 161(1)c) « ne fait pas partie des sanctions les plus lourdes, telle la peine d'emprisonnement accrue », car elle interdit seulement au contrevenant d'avoir des contacts non supervisés avec un enfant. Dès lors, si l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)d) constitue une restriction proportionnée et justifiée du droit que l'al. 11*i*) garantit au contrevenant, il doit en aller de même pour l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c).

(4) La mise en balance qui s'impose

[158] Je reconnais que l'application rétrospective des dispositions issues des modifications apportées au par. 161(1) entraîne un accroissement relatif de la peine qui n'est pas négligeable. L'interdiction que l'al. 161(1)c) fait au contrevenant d'avoir des contacts non supervisés avec un enfant, peu importe le lieu, est plus restrictive que celle qui pouvait résulter de l'application de la disposition antérieure. Et l'interdiction d'utiliser Internet prévue à l'al. 161(1)d) a une bien plus grande portée que celle d'utiliser un ordinateur que prévoyait la disposition antérieure. Je reconnais également que, comme n'importe quelle atteinte au droit garanti par l'al. 11*i*), l'application rétrospective de chacune des dispositions a un effet préjudiciable sur la primauté du droit et sur l'équité du système de justice criminelle, chacune d'elle emportant l'infliction éventuelle d'une peine accrue dont l'intéressé ne se savait pas passible.

[159] As for salutary effects, the evidence before Parliament and before this Court shows that a significant number of offenders convicted of designated sexual offences pose a risk to reoffend sexually against children. It also shows that most child victims are known to sexual offenders — they are not strangers taken from a public place, the victims of random chance. And it shows that Internet-based offending is rapidly increasing, which could realistically result in contact-based offences being committed against a child. Finally, it shows that the previous version of s. 161(1) could not address either of these issues — unsupervised contact with a child whether the child is known to the offender or not, and unsupervised access to the Internet for offenders who are likely to use the Internet to facilitate sexual offending.

[159] Quant aux effets bénéfiques, il appert de la preuve dont disposait le législateur et qui figure au dossier de la Cour qu'un nombre élevé d'auteurs d'infractions sexuelles énumérées sont susceptibles de récidiver et de s'en prendre à nouveau sexuellement à des enfants. Elle montre par ailleurs que la plupart des jeunes victimes sont connues des délinquants sexuels, qu'elles ne sont pas choisies au hasard dans un lieu public. Elle nous apprend en outre que la criminalité liée à Internet s'accroît rapidement, ce qui pourrait effectivement mener à la perpétration d'infractions liées aux contacts. Enfin, selon la preuve, la version antérieure du par. 161(1) ne pouvait réprimer aucun de ces actes, soit les contacts non supervisés avec des enfants, connus ou non du contrevenant, et l'accès non supervisé à Internet par un contrevenant susceptible d'utiliser la toile pour faciliter la commission d'une infraction sexuelle.

[160] La mise en balance de ces effets préjudiciables et de ces effets bénéfiques à l'étape de l'examen de la proportionnalité que comporte l'analyse au regard de l'article premier suppose, comme le reconnaissent les juges majoritaires, « des jugements de valeur difficiles » (par. 79). Il ne s'agit jamais d'un [TRADUCTION] « calcul utilitaire objectif » (New Jersey c. T.L.O., 469 U.S. 325 (1985), p. 369, le juge Brennan, dissident en partie). Malgré les prétentions qui vont dans le sens contraire (voir D. M. Beatty, The Ultimate Rule of Law (2004), p. 166-169; A. Barak, « Proportionality and Principled Balancing » (2010), 4 L. & Ethics Hum. Rts. 1 (résumé)), l'examen de la proportionnalité ne comporte pas de véritable calcul objectif, car le tribunal doit soupeser des choses non mesurables, en l'occurrence l'effet préjudiciable sur le délinquant sexuel et sur la primauté du droit par rapport à l'effet bénéfique possible de la protection des enfants contre les délinquants sexuels.

[161] Despite the impossibility of weighing incommensurables objectively, a reviewing court must nevertheless come to a reasoned conclusion. In my view, the salutary effects pursued are worth the cost in rights limitation: the harms sought to be addressed are grave, persistent, and worthy of Parliament's efforts in the criminal law realm. The provisions are sufficiently tailored so that no offenders' s. 11(i) rights will be unduly limited — it is only those offenders who pose a risk to reoffend against children who will be subject to a s. 161(1) order, and it is only those offenders who pose a risk to reoffend either through unsupervised access to children or unsupervised use of the Internet who will be retrospectively subject to the impugned provisions. Neither of the impugned provisions works a drastic increase in the punishment imposed. On balance, the potential salutary effect of the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) and s. 161(1)(d) of better protecting children from all sexual offenders who pose a risk to reoffend sexually against them, regardless of when the offender committed a designated offence, outweighs the modest impact on fairness and the rule of law.

III. Conclusion

[162] In my view, the retrospective operation of s. 161(1)(c) is a justified infringement on the appellant's s. 11(i) right. I would therefore dismiss the appeal and affirm the s. 161(1) order imposed by the majority of the Court of Appeal.

relevant du droit criminel. La portée des dispositions est suffisamment circonscrite pour que les droits du contrevenant garantis par l'al. 11*i*) ne soient pas indûment restreints. Ce ne sont en effet que les contrevenants susceptibles de récidiver et de s'en prendre à nouveau à des enfants qui font l'objet d'une interdiction fondée sur le par. 161(1) et ce ne sont que les contrevenants susceptibles de récidiver soit par l'accès non supervisé à des enfants, soit par l'utilisation non supervisée d'Internet qui feront l'objet de l'application rétrospective des dispositions en cause. Ni l'une ni l'autre de ces dernières n'emportent un accroissement draconien de la peine infligée. Tout bien considéré, l'effet bénéfique potentiel de l'application rétrospective des al. 161(1)c) et d) qui réside dans la protection accrue des enfants contre tous les délinquants sexuels susceptibles de récidiver et de s'en prendre à nouveau à eux, peu importe le moment où le contrevenant a commis l'acte criminel, prime l'effet modéré qui en résulte sur l'équité des procédures criminelles et sur la primauté du droit.

III. Conclusion

[162] À mon sens, l'application rétrospective de l'al. 161(1)c) constitue une atteinte justifiée au droit que l'al. 11*i*) garantit à l'appelant. Je serais donc d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi et de confirmer l'ordonnance des juges majoritaires de la Cour d'appel fondée sur le par. 161(1).

by ss. 2(b) and 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The impugned section prohibits the broadcasting, publication or dissemination of opinion survey results during the final three days of a federal election campaign. The Ontario Court (General Division) denied the appellants' application, holding that s. 322.1 did not violate a citizen's right to vote and that, although the section infringed freedom of expression, it was justified under s. 1 of the Charter. The Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment.

Held (Lamer C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé and Gonthier JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed.

Per Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, Major and Bastarache JJ.: Section 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act, which applies only to "new" poll results, infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter. The publication of opinion survey results is an activity that conveys meaning and therefore falls within the ambit of s. 2(b). By prohibiting the broadcasting, publication or dissemination of opinion survey results during the final three days of an election campaign, s. 322.1 restricts freedom of expression.

Section 322.1 is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. All the steps of a s. 1 analysis must be undertaken with a close attention to context. Characterizing the context of the impugned provision is important in order to determine the type of proof which a court can demand of the legislator to justify its measures under s. 1. In the course of a contextual approach under s. 1, the vulnerability of the group which the legislator seeks to protect, that group's own subjective fears or apprehension of harm, the inability to measure scientifically a particular harm, and the efficaciousness of a remedy, are all factors which the court must take into account in assessing whether a limit has been demonstrably justified according to the civil standard of proof. Another factor to be considered is the nature of the activity which is infringed. The degree of constitutional protection may vary depending on the nature of the expression at issue. Here, the speech infringed is political information. Opinion surveys regarding political candidates or electoral issues are part of the political process and, thus, at the core of expression guaranteed by the Charter. The de vote garantis respectivement par l'al. 2*b*) et l'art. 3 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. L'article contesté interdit d'annoncer, de publier ou de diffuser les résultats de sondages sur les intentions de vote durant les trois derniers jours des campagnes électorales. La Cour de l'Ontario (Division générale) a refusé la requête des appelantes et statué que l'art. 322.1 ne violait pas le droit de vote des citoyens et que, même si cette disposition portait atteinte à la liberté d'expression, elle était justifiée au sens de l'article premier de la Charte. La Cour d'appel a confirmé cette décision.

Arrêt (le juge en chef Lamer et les juges L'Heureux-Dubé et Gonthier sont dissidents): Le pourvoi est accueilli.

Les juges Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, Major et Bastarache: L'article 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada, qui s'applique uniquement aux résultats de «nouveaux» sondages, porte atteinte à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte. La publication des résultats de sondages est une activité qui transmet un message et qui, par conséquent, entre dans le champ d'application de l'al. 2*b*). En interdisant d'annoncer, de publier ou de diffuser les résultats de sondages sur les intentions de vote au cours des trois derniers jours des campagnes électorales, l'art. 322.1 limite la liberté d'expression.

L'article 322.1 n'est pas justifié au sens de l'article premier de la Charte. Toutes les étapes de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier doivent être réalisées en accordant une grande attention au contexte. Il importe de qualifier le contexte de la disposition contestée pour déterminer le type de preuve que le tribunal peut demander au législateur d'apporter pour justifier ses mesures au regard de l'article premier. Dans l'application de l'approche contextuelle à l'article premier, la vulnérabilité du groupe que le législateur cherche à protéger, les craintes subjectives ou la crainte de préjudice entretenue par ce groupe, ainsi que l'incapacité de mesurer scientifiquement le préjudice particulier en cause ou l'efficacité d'une réparation sont autant de facteurs que le tribunal doit prendre en considération lorsqu'il décide si une restriction est justifiée suivant la norme de preuve applicable en matière civile. Un autre facteur qui doit être pris en considération est la nature de l'activité à laquelle il est porté atteinte. Le degré de protection constitutionnelle peut varier selon la nature de la forme d'expression en cause. Dans le présent cas, le discours visé par l'atteinte est l'information politique. Les sondages concernant les candidats ou les enjeux électoraux font partie du processus politique et sont, de ce fait, au cœur de la liberté d'expression garantie par la Charte. La nature de la forme d'expression en litige tend à indiquer nature of the expression at issue suggests that a deferential approach is inappropriate in this case.

While the objective of providing a period of rest and reflection for voters prior to going to the polls is not a pressing and substantial objective, the objective of guarding against the possible influence of inaccurate polls late in the election campaign by allowing for a period of criticism and scrutiny immediately prior to election day is of sufficient importance to meet the first step of the s. 1 analysis. The purpose of this particular limitation on expression is to ensure that information which the evidence indicates has an important influence on the choice of at least some voters is presented according to the standards of accuracy which polls are normally expected to attain. To the extent that the votes of some might be distorted as a result of polls being presented in a misleading fashion, such a distortion is clearly a matter which the government may legitimately be concerned to remedy.

The three-day blackout period on the publication of polls will serve, to some degree, the purpose of preventing the use of inaccurate polls by voters by giving critics the opportunity to assess the methodological information made available by the pollster and to question the validity of the poll on that basis. To that extent, the ban is rationally connected to the purpose of the legislation. However, since s. 322.1 does not require the publication of methodological information, the most that could be achieved by the blackout period, if an opinion survey is released without such information, is that the validity of a poll could be undermined by pointing out the failure of the pollster to publish the methodology of the poll.

Section 322.1 does not minimally impair freedom of expression. The section is a very crude instrument in serving the government's purpose. The social science evidence did not establish that Canadian voters are a vulnerable group relative to pollsters and the media who publish polls. The presumption should be that the Canadian voter is a rational actor who can learn from experience and make independent judgments about the value of particular sources of electoral information. While some voters clearly do consider polls to be of some value in making their electoral decision, no evidence has been adduced that voters have suffered from any misapprehensions regarding the accuracy of any single poll. Voters are constantly exposed to opinion poll results throughout the election and a single inaccurate poll result is likely to be spotted and discounted appro-qu'une approche empreinte de retenue est inappropriée en l'espèce.

Alors que l'objectif qui consiste à donner aux électeurs une période de répit et de réflexion avant le scrutin n'est pas urgent et réel, l'objectif qui consiste à prévenir contre l'influence possible de sondages inexacts publiés tard dans les campagnes électorales par l'instauration d'une période de critique et d'examen immédiatement avant le jour du scrutin est suffisamment important pour satisfaire à la première étape de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier. L'objectif de cette restriction de la liberté d'expression est de faire en sorte que des données qui, selon la preuve, ont une influence importante sur la décision d'au moins certains électeurs soient présentées avec le niveau d'exactitude qu'on attend normalement des sondages. Dans la mesure où la décision de certains électeurs pourrait être faussée par suite de résultats de sondages présentés d'une manière trompeuse, il est alors manifestement légitime pour le gouvernement d'être préoccupé par cette situation et de vouloir y remédier.

L'embargo de trois jours sur les sondages permet, dans une certaine mesure, de réaliser l'objectif qui consiste à empêcher l'utilisation de sondages inexacts par les électeurs, en donnant aux critiques la possibilité d'évaluer l'information fournie par le sondeur sur la méthodologie qu'il a utilisée et de mettre en doute la validité du sondage sur ce plan. Dans cette mesure, l'interdiction a un lien rationnel avec l'objet de la loi. Toutefois, comme l'art. 322.1 n'exige pas la publication de renseignements méthodologiques, l'embargo permettrait tout au plus d'attaquer la validité d'un sondage en signalant l'omission du sondeur de publier des renseignements sur la méthodologie utilisée pour effectuer le sondage.

L'article 322.1 ne porte pas atteinte le moins possible à la liberté d'expression. Cette disposition est un instrument très grossier pour réaliser l'objectif du gouvernement. La preuve fondée sur les sciences sociales n'a pas établi que les électeurs canadiens forment un groupe vulnérable par rapport aux sondeurs et aux médias qui publient les sondages. On doit présumer que l'électeur canadien est un être rationnel, capable de tirer des leçons de son expérience et de juger de façon indépendante de la valeur de certaines sources d'information électorale. Bien que certains électeurs estiment que les sondages peuvent éclairer leur décision, il n'a été présenté aucun élément de preuve établissant que les électeurs ont été victimes de méprise quant à l'exactitude d'un sondage. Les électeurs sont constamment bombardés de sondages pendant toute la campagne, et il est priately. This is not an appropriate case for the government to respond to the paucity of evidence by relying on the "reasoned apprehension of harm" test. First, the claims of widespread or significant harm based on a logical inference derived from surrounding factors are not compelling in the context of factors which, as in this case, refute such logical inferences. Second, the government is not dealing with a vulnerable group which is in danger of manipulation or abuse by the pollsters or the media because of an essential opposition of interests, or because of the nature of the speech itself. Nor is there a shared understanding amongst Canadians that a single inaccurate poll will mislead them to any undue extent.

Where the contextual factors indicate that the government has not established that the harm which it is seeking to prevent is widespread or significant, a deferential approach to the particular means chosen by the legislature to implement the legislative purpose is not warranted. In this case, s. 322.1 is not narrowly tailored to its objective. The ban is overbroad because it prohibits in the final three days of an election campaign the publication and use by voters of all those polls which would meet the usual standards of accuracy. The ban is also underbroad because it may not adequately disabuse voters of an erroneous impression left by a poll which did not disclose its methodology to critics or the public. The obvious alternative was a mandatory disclosure of methodological information without a publication ban. Although such a provision would still leave the door open to inaccurate poll results published immediately prior to the election having some impact, that possibility would be significantly reduced both by virtue of the reader's initial access to those methodological data, and by the opportunity for rapid response by parties whose interests are prejudiced by the inaccurate poll. The failure to address or explain the reason for not adopting a significantly less intrusive measure which appears as effective as that actually adopted weighs heavily against the justifiability of s. 322.1. Finally, the experience of the international community is inconclusive.

The doubtful benefits of the ban are outweighed by its deleterious effects. The impact of s. 322.1 on freedom of probable qu'un sondage aux résultats inexacts sera repéré et écarté comme il se doit. Il ne s'agit pas d'un cas où le gouvernement peut obvier au manque de preuve en invoquant le critère de «l'appréhension raisonnée de préjudice». Premièrement, les prétentions relatives à l'existence d'un préjudice répandu ou important, qui sont fondées sur des inférences logiques tirées de facteurs contextuels, ne sont pas convaincantes en présence de facteurs réfutant ces inférences, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce. Deuxièmement, le gouvernement n'est pas concerné par un groupe vulnérable, qui risque d'être victime de manipulation ou d'abus de la part des sondeurs ou des médias en raison d'un choc fondamental d'intérêts ou de la nature du discours en cause. Il n'existe pas non plus, au sein de la population canadienne, une perception commune voulant qu'un seul sondage inexact puisse tromper les Canadiens dans une mesure indue.

Lorsque les facteurs contextuels indiquent que le gouvernement n'a pas établi que le préjudice qu'il cherche à prévenir est répandu ou important, une approche empreinte de retenue vis-à-vis des moyens particuliers choisis par le législateur pour réaliser un objectif législatif n'est pas justifiée. En l'espèce, l'art. 322.1 n'a pas été conçu strictement en vue de la réalisation de son objectif. L'interdiction est trop générale en ce qu'elle a pour effet d'interdire, durant les trois derniers jours des campagnes électorales, la publication et l'utilisation par les électeurs de tous les sondages qui respectent les normes habituelles d'exactitude. Par ailleurs, l'interdiction est trop limitée parce qu'il est possible qu'elle ne dissipe pas suffisamment chez les électeurs l'impression erronée laissée par un sondage dont la méthodologie n'a pas été communiquée aux critiques ou au public. La solution de rechange évidente était la communication obligatoire des données méthodologiques sans interdiction de publication. Bien qu'une telle disposition laisse encore subsister la possibilité que la publication des résultats d'un sondage inexact immédiatement avant le jour du scrutin ait quelque influence, cette possibilité serait considérablement amoindrie du fait que les électeurs auraient accès à ces données méthodologiques et que les partis auxquels ce sondage serait préjudiciable auraient la possibilité de répliquer rapidement. L'omission d'exposer ou d'expliquer la raison pour laquelle on a écarté une mesure beaucoup moins attentatoire, qui semble aussi efficace que celle effectivement prise, milite fortement contre la reconnaissance du caractère justifiable de l'art. 322.1. Finalement, l'expérience au niveau international n'est pas concluante.

Les effets préjudiciables de l'interdiction l'emportent sur ses avantages douteux. L'effet de l'art. 322.1 sur la expression is profound. The section imposes a complete ban on political information at a crucial time in the electoral process. The ban interferes with the rights of voters who want access to the most timely polling information available, and with the rights of the media and pollsters who want to provide it. Although it is conceivable that some indeterminate number of voters might be unable to spot an inaccurate poll result and might rely to a significant degree on the error, thus perverting their electoral choice, the government cannot take the most uninformed and naive voter as the standard by which constitutionality is assessed. A measure which decides that information which is desired and can be rationally and properly assessed by the vast majority of the voting electorate should be withheld because of a concern that a very few voters might be so confounded that they would cast their vote for a candidate whom they would not have otherwise preferred cannot be accepted. Given the state of the evidence adduced on this issue, the postulated harm will seldom occur. The benefits of the ban are, therefore, marginal. The deleterious effects, however, are substantial. The ban sends the general message that the media can be constrained by government not to publish factual information. As well, the ban interferes with the media's reporting function with respect to the election. Further, by denying access to electoral information which some voters may consider useful, the ban interferes not only with their freedom of expression, but also with their perception of the freeness and validity of their vote. In sum, the very serious invasion of the freedom of expression of all Canadians is not outweighed by the speculative and marginal benefits postulated by the government.

liberté d'expression est profond. La disposition impose une interdiction complète visant de l'information politique à un moment crucial du processus électoral. Cette interdiction porte atteinte, d'une part, aux droits des électeurs qui veulent avoir accès à l'information la plus à-propos disponible en matière de sondage, et, d'autre part, aux droits des médias et des sondeurs qui désirent fournir cette information. Même s'il est concevable qu'un nombre indéterminé d'électeurs pourraient être incapables de déceler des résultats de sondage inexacts et pourraient, dans une mesure importante, s'appuyer sur l'erreur, ce qui fausserait leur choix électoral, le gouvernement ne peut pas faire de l'électeur le moins informé et le plus naïf la norme au regard de laquelle la constitutionnalité est appréciée. On ne peut accepter une mesure disposant que des renseignements qui sont désirés et qui peuvent être évalués rationnellement et adéquatement par la vaste majorité des électeurs ne peuvent être communiqués parce qu'on craint qu'un très petit nombre d'entre eux pourraient être à ce point décontenancés par ces renseignements qu'ils voteraient pour un candidat qu'ils n'auraient pas appuyé autrement. Compte tenu de la preuve présentée sur cette question, le préjudice qui a été posé en postulat ne se produit que rarement. Les avantages de l'interdiction sont par conséquent minimes. Les effets préjudiciables sont toutefois considérables. L'interdiction transmet le message général que les médias peuvent être empêchés par le gouvernement de publier de l'information factuelle. De plus, elle entrave le rôle de communicateurs de l'information des médias en période électorale. En outre, en niant l'accès à une information électorale que certains électeurs peuvent considérer utile, l'interdiction porte non seulement atteinte à leur liberté d'expression, mais également à leur perception que leur vote est libre et valide. En résumé, l'atteinte très grave à la liberté d'expression de tous les Canadiens n'est pas écartée par les avantages hypothétiques minimes avancés par le gouvernement.

In light of the conclusion that s. 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act is an unjustified limit on free expression, it is unnecessary to determine whether the section constitutes an infringement of the right to vote protected by s. 3 of the Charter.

Compte tenu de la conclusion selon laquelle l'art. 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada constitue une limite injustifiée de la liberté d'expression, il est inutile de décider si cette disposition entraîne une violation du droit de vote garanti par l'art. 3 de la Charte.

Per Lamer C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé and Gonthier JJ. (dissenting): Section 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act does not infringe s. 3 of the Charter. A restriction on information would constitute an infringement of the right to vote under s. 3 only if it undermines the guarantee of effective representation. In the instant case, the

Le juge en chef Lamer et les juges L'Heureux-Dubé et Gonthier (dissidents): L'article 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada ne viole pas l'art. 3 de la Charte. Pour qu'il y ait violation du droit de vote prévu à l'art. 3, la limitation de l'information doit compromettre la garantie d'une représentation effective. En l'espèce, la courte short blackout period has no such effect. On the contrary, such a period assists effective representation.

While s. 322.1 limits freedom of expression within the meaning of s. 2(b) of the Charter, it constitutes a reasonable limit demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society under s. 1 of the Charter. The objective of preventing the potentially distorting effect of public opinion survey results that are released late in an election campaign when there is no longer a sufficient opportunity to respond is a sufficiently important objective which meets the first step of the s. 1 analysis. Opinion polls on election issues influence voters' decisions and it is important that the information the polls convey not be misleading or inaccurate. By providing for timely publication of poll results to allow scrutiny and criticism, s. 322.1 improves information to the public during election campaigns, enhances the electoral process and strikes a balance between the right to vote and freedom of expression. The social science studies which composed much of the evidence show that there exists a long-standing concern about the publication of opinion survey results during election campaigns in Canada, including the problems associated with the undue influence, late publication and accuracy of polls. In enacting s. 322.1, Parliament has responded to that concern. The Charter should not become an impediment to social and democratic progress and be made to serve substantial commercial interests in publishing opinion poll results, by defeating a reasonable attempt by Parliament to allay potential distortion of voter choice. Several studies and reports in the last 30 years on the publication of opinion survey results during election campaigns in Canada, as well as bills in the House of Commons, and legislation in other democratic countries, support Parliament's reasonable finding that the concern at bar was serious.

The second step of the s. 1 analysis — the proportionality test — is also met. First, the rational connection in this case is self-evident. Opinion polls significantly influence voter choice and electoral campaigns. It follows that the publication of inaccurate, though authoritative, opinion survey results that go uncorrected may well lead to voters making misinformed decisions. Logically, there is a reasoned apprehension that voters will période d'interdiction en litige n'a pas cet effet. Au contraire, une telle interdiction favorise la représentation effective.

Bien que l'art. 322.1 restreigne la liberté d'expression garantie à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte, il constitue une limite raisonnable dont la justification peut se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique au sens de l'article premier de la Charte. L'objectif qui consiste à prévenir l'effet déformant susceptible de découler de la publication de résultats de sondages tard dans les campagnes électorales, lorsqu'il ne reste plus assez de temps pour y répondre, constitue un objectif suffisamment important pour satisfaire au premier volet de l'analyse selon l'article premier. Les sondages sur des enjeux électoraux influencent les décisions des électeurs et il est important que l'information qu'ils communiquent ne soit pas erronée ou trompeuse. En pourvoyant à la publication de leurs résultats en temps utile, pour que l'on en fasse l'examen et la critique, l'art. 322.1 améliore la qualité de l'information dont dispose le public pendant les campagnes électorales, renforce le processus électoral et concilie le droit de vote et la liberté d'expression. Il ressort de la preuve présentée, composée en grande partie d'études réalisées dans le domaine des sciences sociales, que la publication des sondages d'opinion pendant les campagnes électorales constitue une préoccupation de longue date au Canada, notamment en ce qui concerne les problèmes liés à l'influence indue des sondages, à leur publication tard dans les campagnes électorales et à leur exactitude. En adoptant l'art. 322.1, le Parlement a réagi à cette préoccupation. La Charte ne doit pas devenir un obstacle au progrès social et démocratique et être mise au service de puissants intérêts commerciaux désireux de publier des résultats de sondages, en faisant échouer une tentative raisonnable du Parlement de prévenir la dénaturation potentielle du choix exprimé par les électeurs. Plusieurs rapports et études sur la publication de résultats de sondages d'opinion pendant les campagnes électorales au Canada réalisés au cours des 30 dernières années, ainsi que les projets de loi déposés devant la Chambre des communes et les mesures législatives en vigueur dans d'autres pays démocratiques appuient la conclusion raisonnable du Parlement qu'il y avait là motif sérieux d'inquiétude.

La deuxième étape de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier — le critère de la proportionnalité — est également respecté. Premièrement, en l'espèce, le lien rationnel est évident. Les sondages d'opinion influencent de façon importante le choix des électeurs et les campagnes électorales. Il s'ensuit que la publication de résultats de sondages qui, quoiqu'ils fassent autorité, sont inexacts et ne sont pas rectifiés, peut fort bien amener les élec-be deprived of the full exercise of their franchise. Its importance is measured by the significant influence of polls on voters and the prevalence of misleading polls. Ensuring that polls that cannot be adequately, publicly and independently evaluated as to their correctness because of insufficient time are not published clearly addresses this problem.

Second, s. 322.1 passes the minimal impairment analysis. Section 322.1 constitutes a genuine mediation between the rights of voters to receive information in a timely fashion, and the right of pollsters and publishers freely to provide the information they want. Not only does the legislation protect the rights of voters but it does so by serving one of the very purposes of freedom of expression — informing while allowing for political debate and discussion — and by striking a balance between two basic aspects of voters' right to information — the availability of accessible, unrestricted information and the timely availability of factual information that may be misleading so as to allow for scrutiny and criticism. In matching means to ends and asking whether rights are impaired as little as possible, a legislature mediating between the claims of competing groups is forced to strike a balance without the benefit of absolute certainty concerning how that balance is best struck. This Court should not second-guess the wisdom of a legislature in its endeavour to draw the line between competing credible evidence, once it has been established, on the civil standard of proof, that Parliament's objective was pressing and substantial. At this stage, the question is whether there is a reasonable basis, on the evidence tendered, for concluding that a blackout on all opinion polls during the last weekend of an election campaign and during election day impairs freedom of expression as little as possible given the government's pressing and substantial objective. Parliament is not bound to find the least intrusive nor the best means. This would be too high a standard for our elected representatives to meet. Here, although one can conceive of alternatives to the impugned measure, there is simply no equally effective alternative to the current short-term blackout for achieving the legislative objective. Based upon the current legislation and the reports and studies available, Parliament reasonably determined that a 72-hour period was necessary to allow meaningful scrutiny of poll results during an election campaign. The 72-hour blackout period is very shortlived and only affects one mode of expression which is not a primary source of information concerning relevant political facts. It teurs à prendre des décisions mal éclairées. Logiquement, il existe une appréhension raisonnée que certains électeurs soient privés de la possibilité d'exercer pleinement leur droit de vote. L'importance de cette appréhension se mesure à l'influence des sondages sur les électeurs et à la fréquence des sondages trompeurs. Le fait d'interdire la publication de sondages dont l'exactitude ne peut, par manque de temps, être évaluée de manière adéquate, publique et indépendante, vise clairement à résoudre ce problème.

Deuxièmement, l'art. 322.1 est jugé acceptable au terme de l'analyse de l'atteinte minimale. L'article 322.1 constitue un véritable compromis entre le droit des électeurs d'obtenir de l'information en temps utile et celui des sondeurs et des diffuseurs de fournir librement l'information de leur choix. Non seulement cette mesure législative protège-t-elle les droits des électeurs, mais elle le fait en servant l'un des objectifs mêmes de la liberté d'expression — celui d'informer le public tout en permettant la discussion et les débats politiques — et en établissant un équilibre entre deux aspects fondamentaux du droit des électeurs à l'information — la disponibilité d'une information accessible et abondante, et l'accès en temps utile à l'information factuelle qui est susceptible d'être trompeuse, de manière à en permettre l'examen minutieux et la critique. En comparant la fin et les moyens et en se demandant s'il a été porté atteinte le moins possible aux droits en cause, le législateur qui est appelé à arbitrer les revendications de groupes concurrents est obligé de trouver le point d'équilibre sans certitude absolue quant à la réponse optimale. Notre Cour ne devrait pas mettre en doute la sagesse du législateur dans ses efforts pour faire la part des choses à même les éléments de preuve contradictoires mais par ailleurs crédibles, une fois qu'il a été établi, suivant la norme de preuve applicable en matière civile, que l'objectif du législateur est urgent et réel. À ce stade, la question est de savoir s'il existe, à la lumière de la preuve présentée, un fondement raisonnable permettant de conclure que l'imposition d'un embargo visant tous les sondages d'opinion durant la fin de semaine précédant le jour du scrutin et le jour du scrutin lui-même porte atteinte le moins possible à la liberté d'expression compte tenu de l'objectif urgent et réel poursuivi par le gouvernement. Le législateur n'est pas tenu de trouver le moyen le moins attentatoire ni encore le meilleur moyen. Il s'agirait d'une norme trop élevée pour nos élus. En l'espèce, bien qu'on puisse concevoir des solutions autres que la disposition contestée, il n'existe tout simplement pas de solution de rechange aussi efficace que le court embargo en vigueur actuellement pour réaliser l'objectif visé par la loi. Se fondant sur la législation qui existait ainsi que mainly constitutes information as to the effect of relevant political information on potential voters. The scope of s. 322.1 prohibits polls of all kinds regardless of their scientific nature or quality because there is no clear cut line between reliable poll results and misleading poll results. Section 322.1 does not apply, however, to the discussion of previously released poll results. The legislation prohibits broadcasting, publication and dissemination and these expressions refer only to the initial release of poll results. Finally, both the motions judge and the Court of Appeal held that inaccurate polls at the end of an election campaign constitute a reasonable concern. Everyone is vulnerable to misinformation which cannot be verified. Our democracy, and its electoral process, finds its strength in the vote of each and every citizen. Each citizen, no matter how politically knowledgeable one may be, has his or her own reasons to vote for a particular candidate and the value of any of these reasons should not be undermined by misinformation. When Parliament identifies one matter of concern, it has no absolute duty to identify and regulate each and every factor. The government does not have to show that this concern is more serious or is causing more harm to the electoral process or to individual voters than any other potentially misleading information. There is no such standard under the Charter.

Third, the salutary effects of s. 322.1 concerning both the right to vote and freedom of expression outweigh its deleterious effects. The salutary effect of s. 322.1 is to promote the right of voters not to be misled in the exercise of their right to vote. Section 322.1, however, deprives some voters, who rely on polls to make their decision, of late campaign opinion poll results. This deleterious effect is quite limited when one considers the delay between conducting the poll and ultimately publishing its results. As to the effects of the measure on freedom of expression, s. 322.1 has a positive impact, promoting debate and truth in political discussion since it gives voters the opportunity to be informed about the existence of misleading factual information. Although s. 322.1 precludes the media from publishing polls on sur les rapports et études disponibles, le Parlement a décidé qu'une période de 72 heures était nécessaire pour permettre un examen utile de l'ensemble des résultats de sondages dévoilés durant une campagne électorale. L'embargo de 72 heures est très court et ne touche qu'un seul mode d'expression qui n'est pas une source primaire d'information sur les faits politiques pertinents. Il constitue principalement une source d'information sur l'effet de renseignements politiques pertinents sur les électeurs. La portée de l'art. 322.1 interdit la publication de tous les types de sondages, indépendamment de leur nature ou qualité scientifiques parce qu'il n'existe pas de ligne de démarcation nette entre les résultats de sondages fiables et les résultats trompeurs. L'article 322.1 n'interdit cependant pas l'analyse des résultats de sondages déjà publiés. La disposition en cause interdit l'annonce, la publication et la diffusion des résultats de sondages et ces expressions ne visent que la communication initiale des résultats de sondages. Enfin, tant le juge des requêtes que la Cour d'appel ont décidé que la publication de sondages inexacts en fin de campagne électorale constituait une préoccupation raisonnable. Chacun est vulnérable à une mauvaise information qui ne peut être vérifiée. Notre démocratie — et son processus électoral — tire sa force du vote de chacun des citoyens. Chaque citoyen, quel que soit son degré de connaissance de la politique, a ses raisons bien à lui de voter pour un candidat donné, et la valeur de ces raisons ne doit pas être amoindrie par une mauvaise information. Lorsqu'il décèle un sujet de préoccupation, le Parlement n'a pas l'obligation absolue de relever et de réglementer chacun des facteurs en cause. Le gouvernement n'a pas à établir que cette préoccupation est plus sérieuse ou cause davantage préjudice au processus électoral ou aux électeurs que toute autre information susceptible d'induire en erreur. Il n'existe aucune norme de la sorte dans l'application de la Charte.

Troisièmement, les effets bénéfiques qu'a l'art. 322.1 à la fois sur le droit de vote et sur la liberté d'expression l'emportent sur ses effets préjudiciables. L'effet bénéfique de l'art. 322.1 est qu'il favorise le droit des électeurs de ne pas être induits en erreur lorsqu'ils exercent leur droit de vote. L'article 322.1 prive toutefois des électeurs qui se fondent sur les sondages pour prendre leur décision des résultats de certains sondages d'opinion effectués tard dans les campagnes électorales. Cet effet préjudiciable est très limité, si l'on tient compte du délai entre la réalisation du sondage et la publication de ses résultats. Pour ce qui est des effets de la mesure sur la liberté d'expression, l'art. 322.1 a un effet positif. Il favorise l'échange des idées et l'émergence de la vérité dans les discussions politiques puisqu'il permet aux électeurs d'être informés de l'existence de renseignements factuels trompeurs. Bien que l'art. 322.1 empêche les médias de publier des résultats de sondages pendant le dernier week-end de la campagne électorale ainsi que le jour du scrutin, en raison de sa très courte durée et de l'absence de solutions de rechange satisfaisantes permettant d'adapter la mesure à l'objectif de la loi, cette interdiction porte atteinte de façon minimale à la liberté d'expression.

I. Introduction and Historical Background

2 In recent political history, polls have had a substantial impact on the strategies of candidates and the policies of governments. They have become a permanent feature of Canadian politics. It is said that polls tend to reduce the level of political discourse to the lowest common denominator: principles are sacrificed for percentage points (C. C. J. Feasby, "Public Opinion Poll Restrictions, Elections, and the Charter" (1997), 55(2) U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 241, at p. 244). They tend to preempt the discussion of issues and short-circuit the democratic process:

> Conversation, as theorists from Tarde to Habermas have argued, is fundamental to the construction of a democratic public sphere, and polls do not seem to generate interpersonal communication. In a way, polls make many political discussions superfluous, since they give the illusion that the public has already spoken in a definitive manner. [Emphasis in original.]
> (S. Herbst, Numbered Voices: How Opinion Polling Has Shaped American Politics (1993), at p. 166.)

To the extent that media coverage of election campaigns focuses more on polling results, it focuses less on the merits of the candidates and their positions and tends to distract voters' attention from substantive issues pertaining to the good government of the country. The reliance on polls has become so pervasive that some commentators voie donc à son résumé des décisions dont appel et à sa formulation des questions en litige. Bien que je souscrive à son interprétation de l'art. 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada, L.R.C. (1985), ch. E-2, ainsi qu'à son opinion sur la portée de l'art. 3 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et à sa conclusion qu'il y a atteinte à la liberté d'expression garantie à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte, je ne suis pas d'accord avec sa décision et ses motifs en ce qui concerne la justification de l'atteinte. À mon avis, l'atteinte est justifiée au sens de l'article premier de la Charte.

I. Introduction et contexte historique

Au cours de l'histoire politique récente, les sondages ont eu une incidence considérable sur les stratégies des candidats et sur les politiques gouvernementales. Ils sont devenus une caractéristique permanente de la vie politique canadienne. On affirme que les sondages tendent à réduire le discours politique au plus petit dénominateur commun: des principes sont sacrifiés en échange de quelques points de pourcentage (C. C. J. Feasby, «Public Opinion Poll Restrictions, Elections, and the Charter» (1997), 55(2) U.T. Fac. L. Rev. 241, à la p. 244). Les sondages tendent à remplacer le débat des enjeux et à court-circuiter le processus démocratique:

> [TRADUCTION] La conversation, ont prétendu de nombreux théoriciens, de Tarde à Habermas, est essentielle à l'édification d'un espace public démocratique. Or, les sondages ne semblent pas susciter la communication entre les individus. En un sens, les sondages rendent de nombreuses discussions politiques superflues, puisqu'ils donnent l'impression que le public s'est déjà irrévocablement prononcé de façon définitive. [En italique dans l'original.]
> (S. Herbst, Numbered Voices: How Opinion Polling Has Shaped American Politics (1993), à la p. 166.)

Dans la mesure où la couverture des campagnes électorales par les médias accorde plus d'attention aux résultats des sondages, elle s'attache moins aux mérites des candidats et à leurs positions respectives et elle a tendance à détourner l'attention des électeurs des questions de fond touchant le bon gouvernement du pays. Le recours aux sondages a characterize election campaigns as "horse races" (S. Ansolabehere and S. Iyengar, "Of Horseshoes and Horse Races: Experimental Studies of the Impact of Poll Results on Electoral Behavior", Political Communication, vol. 11, No. 4, 1994, 413-430). The following quotation strikingly illustrates the developing situation:

> The 1980s is a decade in which media polling has become an epidemic; in which polling has become not just a political tool, an early-warning guidance system, but an occasional substitute for policy itself; in which democracy itself was undermined by the pervasive influence of polls and pollsters who, for all practical purposes, replaced elected representatives, including cabinet ministers, and traditional political strategists as the major determinants of political action. On the strength of their computer printouts, pollsters came to be viewed as sainted public oracles, supposedly capable not only of probing our innermost thoughts and feelings, but of predicting our future actions as well.
>
> Polls have become a perplexing reality in the political process; still a legitimate, albeit imperfect, measure of public attitudes, they are afforded an unhealthy level of credence in the affairs of state by political players and the public alike.

(C. Hoy, Margin of Error: Pollsters and the Manipulation of Canadian Politics (1989), at pp. 39-40.)

The problem becomes more acute when some voters consciously use survey results to make decisions, despite the fact that some polls may be inaccurately conducted, misrepresented by the media or misunderstood by the public. The accuracy of opinion poll results may be deceptive and the credibility owed to them exaggerated. The closer the polling day, the less time there is to assess, scrutinize, and possibly correct polls. While the "horse race" turn that election campaigns take is unfortunate, voters have the right to choose the information that they want to rely on in deciding how to vote. If a voter wants to vote strategically, he may pris des proportions à ce point endémiques que certains commentateurs qualifient les campagnes électorales de véritables «courses de chevaux» (S. Ansolabehere et S. Iyengar, «Of Horseshoes and Horse Races: Experimental Studies of the Impact of Poll Results on Electoral Behavior», Political Communication, vol. 11, nº 4, 1994, 413-430). Voici un extrait qui illustre de manière saisissante l'évolution de la situation:

> [TRADUCTION] Au cours des années 1980, la pratique du sondage d'opinion par les médias a pris des allures d'épidémie. Le sondage est devenu non seulement un outil politique, un système de guidage avancé, mais aussi, à l'occasion, un véritable succédané de politiques. La démocratie elle-même a été sapée par l'influence omniprésente des sondages et des sondeurs d'opinion qui, à toutes fins utiles, ont remplacé les représentants du peuple, y compris les ministres et les stratèges politiques habituels, en tant que principaux déterminants de l'action politique. Sur la foi de leurs imprimés d'ordinateur, on en est venu à considérer les sondeurs d'opinion comme des devins, des oracles, censément capables non seulement de découvrir nos pensées et sentiments les plus profonds, mais également de prédire nos actions.
>
> Les sondages sont devenus une réalité embarrassante du processus politique. Même s'ils constituent un instrument de mesure légitime, quoiqu'imparfait, des attitudes du public, les acteurs politiques, tout comme le public d'ailleurs, leur accordent, dans les affaires de l'État, un degré malsain de crédibilité.

(C. Hoy, Margin of Error: Pollsters and the Manipulation of Canadian Politics (1989), aux pp. 39 et 40.)

Le problème s'aggrave lorsque des électeurs se fondent sciemment sur les résultats des sondages pour prendre leurs décisions, malgré la possibilité que certains sondages aient été effectués de façon incorrecte, mal présentés par les médias ou encore mal compris par le public. Il est possible que l'exactitude des résultats des sondages d'opinion soit illusoire et que la crédibilité qu'on leur accorde soit exagérée. Plus le jour du scrutin approche, moins on a de temps pour évaluer, examiner attentivement et possiblement rectifier les résultats des sondages. Bien que l'allure de «courses de chevaux» que prennent les campagnes élecrely on poll results to make his decision. However, he will not be well served by an inaccurate or misleading poll. The expression he tries to convey through his vote could be unsubstantiated or misinformed.

3 It should be noted that overall results may not reveal the actual impact of opinion polls on individual voters. For instance, the choice of a voter who wants to support the leading candidate may be cancelled out by the vote of someone who wants to support the trailing candidate, while both were misled by the same poll. Our democracy, and its electoral process, finds its strength in the vote of each and every citizen. Our Charter provides that each citizen has the right to vote. One should not find solace in the thought that two mistakenly cast votes may perchance cancel each other out.

4 To quote the finding of Somers J., the motions judge below, "[t]he effect of polling has been a long-standing concern amongst those involved in the study of elections and with those who actively partake in the elections themselves" ((1995), 24 O.R. (3d) 109, at p. 121). In 1966, a government-appointed Committee on Election Expenses — the Barbeau Committee — in the course of its work on the limitation of election expenses, identified opinion polls as an area of concern. In its report, at p. 51, the Committee recommended that the publication of opinion surveys be completely banned throughout election campaigns as it considered "their uncontrolled use for public purposes improper". The Government recognized that this was an issue of some concern in its White Paper on Election Law Reform in 1986. The White Paper pointed out that up to that time, more than 20 private members' bills had been introduced in the House of Commons with the purpose of either prohibiting the publication of opinion surveys or controlling the methodology of such surveys published during campaigns. Although none of these torales soit déplorable, les électeurs ont néanmoins le droit de se fonder sur l'information de leur choix lorsqu'ils décident pour qui voter. L'électeur qui désire voter de façon stratégique peut s'appuyer sur les résultats des sondages pour arrêter sa décision. Cependant, il ne sera pas bien servi par un sondage inexact ou trompeur. En effet, le message qu'il désire communiquer par son vote pourrait bien être non fondé ou mal éclairé.

Il convient de souligner qu'il est possible que les résultats globaux ne révèlent pas l'influence réelle des sondages d'opinion sur chaque électeur. Par exemple, il se peut que le vote d'un électeur désireux d'appuyer le candidat en avance soit annulé par le vote d'un autre électeur voulant donner son appui au candidat en difficulté, et que ces deux personnes aient été induites en erreur par le même sondage. La force de notre démocratie — et de son processus électoral — repose sur le vote de chaque citoyen. Aux termes de notre Charte, tout citoyen a le droit de vote. Personne ne devrait tirer réconfort de l'idée que deux votes accordés par erreur puissent par chance s'annuler l'un l'autre.

Voici la conclusion du juge Somers, qui a statué sur la requête en première instance: [TRADUCTION] «[l]'effet des sondages est une préoccupation de longue date des personnes qui étudient les élections et de celles qui y participent activement» ((1995), 24 O.R. (3d) 109, à la p. 121). En 1966, le Comité des dépenses électorales — le Comité Barbeau — qui avait été créé par le gouvernement de l'époque a dit, dans le cadre de ses travaux sur l'imposition d'un plafond en matière de dépenses électorales, que les sondages d'opinion étaient une source de préoccupation. Dans son rapport, à la p. 54, le Comité a recommandé l'interdiction complète de la publication de sondages d'opinion durant les campagnes électorales, car il estimait qu'«il ne conv[enait] pas d'y recourir d'une façon abusive à des fins de propagande publique». En 1986, dans son Livre blanc sur la réforme de la loi électorale, le gouvernement a reconnu que cette question soulevait effectivement certaines inquiétudes. On soulignait, dans le Livre blanc, que plus de 20 projets de loi émanant de députés avaient été déposés à la Chambre des communes et propobills were passed, they were reflective of the public concern over this issue, since the sponsors of the bills represented different regions of the country, as well as the various political parties which have been represented in the House of Commons over the past 30 years. The Government argued that certain precautions should be taken to protect the public against abuses in this area. In so doing, it recommended that methodological information be included in the publication or broadcast of opinion surveys during an election campaign.

saient soit d'interdire la publication de sondages soit de surveiller la méthodologie des sondages publiés en cours de campagne. Bien qu'aucun de ces projets de loi n'ait été adopté, ils reflétaient néanmoins les préoccupations du public à l'égard de cette question, puisque les parrains de ces propositions provenaient de différentes régions du pays et appartenaient à l'un ou l'autre des divers partis politiques qui ont été représentés à la Chambre des communes au cours des 30 dernières années. Le gouvernement a affirmé que certaines précautions devaient être prises pour protéger le public contre les abus dans ce domaine. À cette occasion, il a recommandé que la publication ou la diffusion de résultats de sondages d'opinion pendant les campagnes électorales soit accompagnée de renseignements sur la méthodologie utilisée.

By an Order in Council dated November 15, 1989, a Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing, chaired by Mr. Pierre Lortie (the "Lortie Commission"), was appointed to inquire into and report on the appropriate principles and process that should govern the election of members of the House of Commons and the financing of political parties and of candidates' campaigns. It held hearings across Canada and considered the issue of opinion surveys in some depth. During the hearings, at least 90 briefs were submitted regarding the influence of public opinion surveys. Seventy percent of these briefs favoured government regulation of such polls during elections.

5 Le 15 novembre 1989, un décret créait la Commission royale sur la réforme électorale et le financement des partis (la «Commission Lortie»). Présidée par M. Pierre Lortie, cette commission était chargée d'enquêter et de faire rapport sur les principes et les procédures qui devraient régir l'élection des députés à la Chambre des communes et le financement des partis politiques et des campagnes électorales. Elle a tenu des audiences dans les diverses régions du Canada et fait un examen approfondi de la question des sondages. Au moins 90 mémoires traitant de l'influence des sondages ont été déposés au cour de ces audiences. Soixante-dix pour cent de ces mémoires étaient en faveur de la réglementation par le gouvernement des sondages effectués pendant les campagnes électorales.

The Commission retained Professor Guy Lachapelle, Associate Professor in the Department of Political Science at Concordia University, to research and study this issue. His research study, entitled Polls and the Media in Canadian Elections: Taking the Pulse ("Lachapelle Study"), was published in 1991. Somers J. found the Lachapelle Study, "because of its breadth and thoroughness to be the most credible evidence put before the court" (p. 116). Among other things, Lachapelle surveyed the briefs filed with the Commission concerning opinion polls. At para. 8 of his affidavit filed in the instant case (Case on Appeal, at pp. 92 et seq.), Professor Lachapelle stated:

6 La Commission a confié à M. Guy Lachapelle, professeur agrégé du département de Science politique de l'Université Concordia, la tâche d'étudier cette question. Son rapport de recherche, intitulé Les sondages et les médias lors des élections au Canada: le pouls de l'opinion («Étude Lachapelle»), a été publié en 1991. Le juge Somers a estimé que l'Étude Lachapelle était, [TRADUCTION] «en raison de son envergure et de son exhaustivité, l'élément de preuve le plus crédible présenté à la cour» (p. 116). Entre autres choses, le professeur Lachapelle a étudié les mémoires concernant les

> The basic argument of most of these briefs was that polls have undue influence on elections, especially as a potential influence on voters. However, no definitive conclusion about the actual impact of public opinion surveys could be drawn from these briefs. [Emphasis added.]

Professor Lachapelle admitted that the actual impact of public opinion surveys was, and continues to be, a matter of controversy even among researchers. He went on to say:

> Therefore, the academic literature is highly divided on the impact of public opinion surveys during and outside election periods. Further, this literature cannot demonstrate that polls do, in fact, have a major impact on the outcome of elections. Even the concept of strategic voting cannot be scientifically proven. However, we cannot reject or ignore the hypothesis that an impact does exist, and has consequences for voting behaviour. [Emphasis added.]

(Lachapelle's affidavit, at para. 21.)

The foregoing debate appears centered on the effect of polls on the outcome of elections. Of greater import in the case at bar is the effect of polls on individual voters. The Lortie Commission Final Report (Reforming Electoral Democracy (1991), vol. 1) found, at p. 455, that "the publication of opinion polls during election campaigns is controversial". However, it reached the conclusion that "[n]otwithstanding the frequent assertion of pollsters that their data have minimal influence on voters, recent research provides strong support for the proposition that published opinion polls can significantly influence campaigns and voters" (p. 457). It also found that "[r]ecent Canadian research supports the conclusion that published campaign opinion polls create the conditions for a 'politics of expectations' that includes both strategic voting and bandwagon effects" (p. 458). "In short, the argument that published polls do not sondages qui ont été présentés à la Commission. Au paragraphe 8 de son affidavit déposé en l'espèce (dossier, aux pp. 92 et suiv.), le professeur Lachapelle dit ceci:

> [TRADUCTION] L'argument fondamental avancé dans la plupart de ces mémoires est que les sondages exercent une influence indue sur les élections, particulièrement en tant que source potentielle d'influence sur les électeurs. Cependant, aucune conclusion définitive quant à l'incidence réelle des sondages d'opinion n'a pu être tirée de ces mémoires. [Je souligne.]

Le professeur Lachapelle admet que l'incidence réelle des sondages d'opinion fait toujours l'objet d'une controverse, même parmi les chercheurs. Il poursuit ainsi:

(Affidavit de Lachapelle, au par. 21.)

Ce débat paraît donc s'attacher à l'effet des sondages sur l'issue des élections. Or, en l'espèce, c'est l'incidence des sondages sur le comportement de chaque électeur qui importe davantage. Dans son Rapport final (Pour une démocratie électorale renouvelée (1991), vol. 1), la Commission Lortie conclut, à la p. 473, que «la publication de sondages en cours de campagne est un sujet controversé». Toutefois, elle arrive à la conclusion que, «[b]ien que les maisons de sondage ne cessent de répéter que leurs données affectent peu le vote, des recherches récentes tendent à prouver le contraire» (p. 475). Elle conclut également que «[d]es recherches canadiennes récentes confirment que les sondages publiés en cours de campagne créent les conditions d'un "jeu des attentes", qui englobe tant le vote stratégique que l'effet d'entraînement» (p. 476). «Bref, il est impossible de soutenir que la publication des sondages n'influence pas le choix influence voter choice or affect the conduct of campaigns is simply untenable" (p. 458). At para. 18 of his affidavit, Professor Lachapelle mentioned that research on the 1988 federal election shows that the behaviour of some voters is guided partly, but not solely, by the published and broadcast results of public opinion surveys.

In his study, Professor Lachapelle mentioned several potential effects of opinion polls on voters at election time:

the bandwagon effect (electors rally to support the candidate leading in the polls);

the underdog effect (electors rally to support the candidate trailing in the polls);

the demotivating effect (electors abstain from voting out of certainty that their candidate will win);

the motivating effect (electors vote because the polls alert them to the fact that an election is going on);

the strategic effect (electors decide how to vote on the basis of the relative popularity of the parties according to the polls); and the free-will effect (electors vote to prove the polls wrong).

(Lachapelle Study, supra, at pp. 13-14.)

The bandwagon effect is the best documented result of exposure to poll news. Studies found that, while the bandwagon effect may occur in response to any poll, elections provide the most fertile ground for the growth of poll-driven opinion. It is said that the bandwagon effect was observed in British and American elections, and in Quebec during the 1988 federal election (I. McAllister and D. T. Studlar, "Bandwagon, Underdog, or Projection? Opinion Polls and Electoral Choice in Britain, 1979-1987", Journal of Politics, vol. 53, No. 3, August 1991, 720-41, at p. 736; Ansolabehere and Iyengar, supra, at p. 427; R. Johnston et al., Letting the People Decide: Dynamics of a Canadian Election (1992), at p. 200).

des électeurs et électrices ou la conduite des campagnes» (p. 476). Au paragraphe 18 de son affidavit, le professeur Lachapelle mentionne qu'il ressort de l'étude de la campagne électorale fédérale de 1988 que le comportement de certains électeurs est inspiré en partie, mais pas exclusivement, par la publication et la diffusion des résultats de sondages d'opinion.

Dans son étude, le professeur Lachapelle énumère plusieurs effets potentiels des sondages d'opinion sur les électeurs le jour du scrutin: 7 le ralliement au vainqueur («bandwagon»); le ralliement au candidat en difficulté («underdog);

l'effet démobilisateur (on s'abstient par certitude de gagner); . . .

l'effet mobilisateur (les sondages incitent à aller voter — ils informent le citoyen qu'il y a une élection); le vote stratégique (l'électeur décide pour qui voter en fonction de la popularité des partis); et le libre arbitre (on vote pour faire mentir les sondages).

(Étude Lachapelle, op. cit., aux pp. 15 et 16.)

Le ralliement au vainqueur est l'effet le mieux documenté de la mise en contact du public avec les résultats des sondages. Des études ont permis de constater que, quoique l'effet qui précède puisse se produire par suite de n'importe quel sondage, les élections constituent le terrain le plus fertile au développement d'une opinion déterminée par les sondages. On affirme que cet effet a été observé lors de campagnes électorales en Grande-Bretagne et aux États-Unis, ainsi qu'au Québec durant la campagne électorale fédérale de 1988 (I. McAllister et D. T. Studlar, «Bandwagon, Underdog, or Projection? Opinion Polls and Electoral Choice in Britain, 1979-1987», Journal of Politics, vol. 53, nº 3, août 1991, 720 à 741, à la p. 736; Ansolabehere et Iyengar, loc. cit., à la p. 427; R. Johnston et autres, Letting the People Decide: Dynamics of a Canadian Election (1992), à la p. 200).

8 In the course of his work, Lachapelle studied the brief of the Quebec Federation of Professional Journalists to the Lortie Commission. In its brief, the Federation conceded that a 48-hour blackout prohibiting all publication or broadcast of opinion polls before the vote would be an acceptable compromise and would respect every individual's right to have time to reply (Lachapelle Study, supra, at p. 27).

9 At the end of his study, Lachapelle concluded that "there are significant shortcomings in the media treatment of polls" (Lachapelle Study, at p. 154). He listed several factors which could seriously impact on the accuracy and reliability of opinion poll results:

1. The Order and Wording of Questions Asked: For instance, according to Claire Hoy's statement in 1989 (Hoy, supra), Angus Reid differs from the other polling organizations in that it asks which of the three leaders is the most popular before asking which of the parties the respondent supports. In addition, Reid asks the question on voting intentions at the end of the questionnaire, whereas Environics, for example, asks it at the beginning (Lachapelle Study, at pp. 90 and 95);

2. The Different Methods of Distribution of the Undecided Voters: In the 1988 federal election, no polling organization made a distinction between respondents who intended to refrain from voting, intended to spoil their ballot, did not know how they were going to vote, or refused to answer, although the first two instances are hardly cases of indecision; they express a clear opinion. The treatment of undecided respondents varies considerably and may actually misrepresent reality (Lachapelle Study, at pp. 95-96);

3. Data-Collection Methods: During the 1988 federal election campaign, the polling organization Gallup Inc. conducted its surveys both by tele-

Dans le cours de ses travaux, le professeur Lachapelle a étudié le mémoire présenté par la Fédération professionnelle des journalistes du Québec à la Commission Lortie. Dans son mémoire, la Fédération reconnaît qu'une période de restriction totale de 48 heures interdisant toute publication ou diffusion de sondages d'opinion avant la tenue du scrutin peut constituer un compromis acceptable qui respecte le droit de réplique de tout citoyen (Étude Lachapelle, op. cit., à la p. 29).

À la fin de son étude, le professeur Lachapelle conclut que «des déficiences importantes [ont été] relevées dans le traitement médiatique des sondages» (Étude Lachapelle, à la p. 178). Il énumère plusieurs facteurs susceptibles d'influer sérieusement sur l'exactitude et la fiabilité des résultats de sondages d'opinion:

1. L'ordre et le libellé des questions: Par exemple, suivant les propos formulés par Claire Hoy en 1989 (Hoy, op. cit.), la maison Angus Reid diffère des autres organisations de sondage en ce qu'elle demande d'abord lequel des trois chefs est le plus populaire avant de demander lequel des partis le répondant appuie. De plus, chez Angus Reid on pose la question sur les intentions de vote à la fin du questionnaire, alors que chez Environics, par exemple, cette question est posée au début (Étude Lachapelle, à la p. 105);

2. Les différentes méthodes de répartition des indécis: Durant la campagne électorale fédérale de 1988, aucune organisation de sondage n'a fait de distinction entre les répondants qui disaient avoir l'intention de s'abstenir, avoir l'intention de voter ou d'annuler leur vote, ne pas savoir pour qui ils allaient voter, ou encore qui refusaient de répondre. Dans les deux premiers cas, on peut difficilement parler d'indécis, puisque ces répondants exprimaient une opinion claire. Le traitement des indécis varie considérablement et peut, dans les faits, fausser la réalité (Étude Lachapelle, aux pp. 110 et 111);

3. Les méthodes de cueillette: Durant la campagne électorale fédérale de 1988, la maison de sondage Gallup Inc. a mené des enquêtes télépho-

phone and in face-to-face interviews, separately or together. This poses numerous problems, especially when the results are presented together without comparing telephone results with those obtained through personal interviews (Lachapelle Study, at p. 97). It is difficult for the elector to grasp all the methodological nuances of sampling (Lachapelle Study, at p. 117). The reader requires a certain attentiveness to recognize that Gallup's methodology varied from one poll to the next, although the press reports contain the information (Lachapelle Study, at p. 116);

4. Margin of Error: The margin of error for a particular question may be higher than the average margin because not all the interviewees respond to all the questions. This is not expressly mentioned in the polls (Lachapelle Study, at p. 104);

5. Timeframe for the Interviews: For a cross-Canada survey, some organizations take up to seven days to interview their respondents, which may reduce the accuracy and reliability of the "snapshot" (Lachapelle Study, at pp. 113-15 and 116);

The last poll of the 1988 campaign, broadcast two days before election day, did not mention the dates of the interviews. As the study put it: "How could even moderately perspicacious citizens be expected to react and exercise their right of rejoinder? Given the amount of time left, this right was rendered ineffective." (Lachapelle Study, at p. 116.)

Predicting regional voting intentions from a cross-Canada survey is also subject to considerable risk, though it became widespread in recent elections. The validity of certain local polls can also be questioned when the interview periods extend over niques et des entrevues en personne, tantôt séparément tantôt simultanément. Cette façon de faire pose de nombreuses difficultés, surtout lorsque les résultats sont présentés de manière globale dans le rapport, sans comparer les résultats téléphoniques avec ceux des entrevues menées en personne (Étude Lachapelle, aux pp. 111 et 112). Il est difficile pour les électeurs de saisir les nuances qui existent entre les méthodes d'échantillonnage (Étude Lachapelle, à la p. 133). Bien que l'information de presse contienne ces renseignements, il faut tout de même une certaine dose d'attention de la part du lecteur pour bien saisir que la méthodologie de Gallup a varié d'un sondage à l'autre (Étude Lachapelle, à la p. 133);

4. La marge d'erreur: La marge d'erreur à l'égard d'une question donnée peut être supérieure à la marge moyenne, étant donné que toutes les personnes interrogées ne répondent pas forcément à toutes les questions. Ce fait n'est pas expressément mentionné dans les sondages (Étude Lachapelle, aux pp. 119 et 120);

5. La période des entrevues: Pour ce qui est des sondages pancanadiens, certaines organisations prennent jusqu'à sept jours pour effectuer les entrevues, situation qui est susceptible de réduire l'exactitude et la fiabilité de l'«image éclair» (Étude Lachapelle, aux pp. 129 à 133);

Dans le cas du dernier sondage de la campagne de 1988, diffusé deux jours avant le jour du scrutin, aucune mention n'était faite des dates des entrevues. Comme on le dit dans l'étude: «[C]omment des citoyens auraient-ils pu réagir et exercer leur droit de réplique dans de telles conditions? Ce droit, compte tenu du temps limité mis à leur disposition, devient dès lors tout à fait caduc.» (Étude Lachapelle, aux pp. 129 et 133.)

10 La prédiction, à partir d'un sondage pancanadien, des intentions de vote à l'échelle régionale comporte également des risques considérables, bien que cela soit devenu une pratique répandue au cours des récentes élections. On peut également s'interroger sur la validité de certains sondages locaux, dans le cadre desquels les entrevues se sont several weeks if not months (Lachapelle Study, at p. 145).

11 In spite of their serious impact on the reliability of polls, these factors, just to name a few, are often overlooked by the public when considering poll results but are carefully taken into account by analysts.

12 On the basis of his analysis of the domestic and international context, Professor Lachapelle made the following recommendations to the Lortie Commission:

(a) that the media be legally required to publish specific technical information regarding public opinion surveys;

(b) that there be a blackout on publication of public opinion surveys by all print and electronic media during the final three days of an election campaign, in order to permit candidates adequate time to respond to controversial or misleading public opinion surveys before election day; and

(c) that a polling commission be established to ensure publication of complete methodological information, confidentiality of data, and public access to high quality information.

(Lachapelle's affidavit, at para. 11.)

13 In its own Final Report, at p. 457, the Lortie Commission made this striking statement:

Although the industry in general has become highly professional since public polling was introduced in Canada in 1941, the incidence of technically deficient and poorly reported polls is still substantial. In recent elections, there have been instances of misleading polls, some because of technical errors and others because of partisan misrepresentation. There have even been allegations of fraudulent polls, where the data were said to have been fabricated to counter a poll showing the opposition in the lead. Such "bogus" polls and the more common misrepresented poll have been released to the media in many democracies. (Cantril 1991, 67; Worcester 1991, 199; Hoy 1989, 189-202) It is the willingness échelonnées sur plusieurs semaines, voire plusieurs mois (Étude Lachapelle, à la p. 167).

Malgré l'incidence importante qu'ils ont sur la fiabilité des sondages, ces facteurs, pour ne nommer que ceux-là, sont souvent négligés par le public dans l'examen des résultats des sondages, mais en revanche ils sont soigneusement pris en compte par les analystes.

À la lumière de son analyse des contextes canadien et international, le professeur Lachapelle a recommandé à la Commission Lortie:

a) que les médias soient tenus par la loi de publier des renseignements techniques particuliers concernant les sondages d'opinion;

b) qu'il soit interdit à tous les médias, tant écrits qu'électroniques, de publier des sondages d'opinion pendant les trois derniers jours des campagnes électorales, afin d'accorder aux candidats suffisamment de temps pour répliquer aux sondages d'opinion controversés ou trompeurs avant le jour du scrutin;

c) que soit établie une commission des sondages chargée de veiller à ce que des renseignements méthodologiques complets soient publiés, à ce que la confidentialité des données recueillies soit respectée et à ce que le public ait accès à une information de grande qualité.

(Affidavit du professeur Lachapelle, au par. 11.)

Dans son Rapport final, à la p. 475, la Commission Lortie fait cette étonnante affirmation:

Bien que l'industrie du sondage en général ait atteint un haut niveau de professionnalisme depuis l'apparition des sondages d'opinion au Canada en 1941, le nombre d'enquêtes techniquement déficientes et mal présentées demeure important. Certains sondages publiés à l'occasion d'élections récentes étaient entachés d'erreurs techniques, et d'autres étaient présentés de façon partiale. On a même signalé des sondages carrément frauduleux, dont les données auraient été fabriquées de toutes pièces pour contrer un sondage plaçant l'adversaire en tête. Les médias de maints pays démocratiques ont publié de tels sondages «bidon» et, de façon plus courante, des sondages présentés de manière trompeuse (Cantril 1991, 67;

of the media to report such polls that makes them significant and troublesome. [Emphasis added.]

Regarding opinion poll regulation, the Lortie Commission recommended that there be, at the end of the election campaign, a 48-hour blackout period on publication of public opinion poll results. It also suggested technical information be provided as recommended by Lachapelle, but not the establishment of a polling commission.

An all-party Special Committee of the House of Commons on Electoral Reform considered the Lortie Commission's Final Report. In its third report to the House of Commons, the Special Committee recommended a 72-hour prohibition period on publication of opinion survey results prior to the closing of the polls, but made no recommendation as to methodology information. The Special Committee's recommendation of a 72-hour publication ban was incorporated into Bill C-114, An Act to amend the Canada Elections Act. Bill C-114 was adopted, without division, in the House of Commons on May 6, 1993: S.C. 1993, c. 19.

The Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs examined the legislation. Professor Peter Aucoin, Director of Research for the Lortie Commission, was a witness before the Senate Committee. He stressed the importance of polls during elections and submitted two arguments to support the proposed 72-hour ban:

While I support this particular proposal [the 72-hour blackout period], people must understand its purpose. The purpose is not, as has been said even in the Senate, to give voters a rest or breather from a flood of public opinion polls published just prior to election day. In fact, voters find that polls are useful information to them. They have a right to those polls. In terms of the Worcester 1991, 199; Hoy 1989, 189-202). En fait, ces «sondages» posent un problème dans la mesure où les médias sont prêts à les diffuser. [Je souligne.]

En ce qui concerne la réglementation des sondages d'opinion, la Commission Lortie recommande l'instauration, à la fin de la campagne électorale, d'un embargo de 48 heures sur la publication des résultats de sondages d'opinion. Elle suggère également que soient communiqués des renseignements techniques, comme l'avait recommandé le professeur Lachapelle. Elle ne propose toutefois pas la création d'une commission des sondages.

14 Un Comité spécial multipartite de la Chambre des communes sur la réforme électorale a examiné le Rapport final de la Commission Lortie. Dans son troisième rapport à la Chambre des communes, le Comité spécial a recommandé qu'il soit interdit de publier les résultats de sondages d'opinion pendant une période de 72 heures avant la fermeture des bureaux du scrutin, mais n'a fait aucune recommandation sur l'information concernant la méthodologie utilisée. La recommandation du Comité spécial d'interdire la publication des résultats de sondages pendant une période de 72 heures a été incorporée au Projet de loi C-114 intitulé, Loi modifiant la Loi électorale du Canada. Le Projet de loi C-114 a été adopté sans opposition par la Chambre des communes le 6 mai 1993: L.C. 1993, ch. 19.

15 Le Comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles a examiné la loi. Le professeur Peter Aucoin, directeur de la recherche pour la Commission Lortie, a témoigné devant ce comité. Il a souligné l'importance des sondages pendant les campagnes électorales et présenté deux arguments en faveur de l'interdiction de 72 heures proposée:

[TRADUCTION] Je suis certes en faveur de cette proposition [l'embargo de 72 heures], mais il faut que les gens comprennent bien l'objectif. Il ne s'agit pas, malgré ce qui a été dit même au Sénat, de laisser un répit aux électeurs et de leur épargner une masse d'informations tirée des sondages d'opinion publique juste avant le jour de l'élection. En réalité, les électeurs ont l'occasion de constater que les sondages leur fournissent des renseignements utiles. Ils y ont droit. Dans les campagnes electoral contest as we know it, the more polls the better.

The issue here is twofold. Public opinion polls purport to be scientific and are reported as such by the press. There is a question of the accuracy of public opinion polls in reading public opinion. There is clearly some need for regulation, given that particular assumption.

[P]arties and candidates need access to the polls and this requires some time. In particular, it means they have to be able to respond to the poll. They cannot do that if the poll is published either on election day or the day before an election. Therefore, the ban of 72 hours is to ensure that polls cannot be published after a point in time where candidates and parties cannot respond. It has nothing to do with giving voters a breather. [Emphasis added.]

(Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Proceedings, Issue No. 41, May 6, 1993, at pp. 41:14-41:15.)

Professor Aucoin also added the following as he responded to a comment from Senator Jean-Claude Rivest:

Senator Rivest: [TRANSLATION] . . . I do not see how you can say that a poll is an important event but it must absolutely be checked in order to ensure that there are no bogus polls, no "hamburger polls", as you explained. In this regard, in the last 72 hours there is a host of other election information and other statements that are not banned during this period and that cannot be verified before voting day.

Mr. Aucoin: [Text] I think the issue here is that the polls themselves in our culture and in our practice have a claim to scientific validity, notwithstanding the fact that they do have their limitations. In that context, to the degree that one makes a difference between published polls and just any other comments made by those participating in the election campaign, candidates and parties are at a disadvantage if there is an authenticity associated with the very concept of poll. Therefore, it has that character where one must be able to verify whether the poll exists and whether it is a credible poll. It is for those practical reasons that you would limit them.

électorales telles que nous les connaissons, plus il y a de sondages, mieux c'est.

La question est double. Les sondages d'opinion publique se veulent scientifiques et la presse les présente comme tels. Il y a le problème de la fidélité de la représentation que donnent les sondages de l'opinion publique. Il est clair qu'une certaine forme de réglementation est nécessaire dans cette situation.

Il est donc nécessaire [. . .] que les partis et les candidats puissent avoir accès aux sondages, et pour cela il faut du temps. Cela signifie, en particulier, qu'ils doivent avoir la possibilité de réagir face au sondage. Ils ne peuvent pas le faire si le sondage est rendu public le jour ou la veille de l'élection. L'interdiction qui couvre une période de 72 heures vise donc à s'assurer que l'on ne publiera pas des sondages à compter du moment où les candidats et les partis ne sont plus en mesure d'y répondre. Cela n'a rien à voir avec la volonté d'accorder un répit aux électeurs. [Je souligne.]

(Comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles, Procédures, fascicule nº 41, 6 mai 1993, aux pp. 41:14 et 41:15.)

En outre, le professeur Aucoin a ajouté ce qui suit, en réponse à une remarque du sénateur Jean-Claude Rivest:

Le sénateur Rivest: [Texte] . . . Je ne vois pas en quoi on peut dire qu'un sondage est un fait important mais doit être vérifié absolument pour qu'il n'y ait pas des sondages bidons ou des sondages «hamburger», comme vous l'avez expliqué. À ce compte-là, dans les derniers 72 heures, il y a une foule d'autres faits électoraux, d'autres déclarations qui ne sont pas interdites dans cette période et qui ne peuvent être vérifiés parce que le jour du scrutin arrive.

M. Aucoin: [TRADUCTION] Le problème ici, à mon avis, c'est que les sondages prétendent à l'exactitude scientifique dans notre culture et compte tenu de notre pratique, en dépit du fait qu'ils ont leurs limites. De ce point de vue, et dans la mesure où l'on fait la différence entre les sondages publiés et les simples commentaires faits par les participants à la compagne électorale, les candidats et les partis sont placés dans une position d'infériorité si le concept même de sondage a un air d'authenticité. La nature du phénomène fait donc que l'on doit pouvoir vérifier dans quelle mesure le sondage a bien existé et s'il est crédible. C'est pour ces raisons que je suis d'accord pour les limiter.

If all polls were only done by certain kinds of organizations using certain kinds of standards, there would not be that problem. [Emphasis added.]

(Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, supra, at pp. 41:17-41:18.)

The following incident serves to illustrate the usefulness of a ban on the publication of opinion poll results in the last 72 hours of an election campaign. In the midst of the 1993 federal election, the Globe and Mail made an error in its publication of the results of an Angus Reid poll (Globe and Mail, October 8, 1993). The Globe and Mail does not have a Sunday edition. If the erroneous article had been published on the last day of the campaign or on the Saturday prior to voting day, it would have been practically impossible for the pollster to convey the correct information, and for the newspaper to correct its report, before polling day. There would not have been an adequate opportunity to criticize and correct the inaccurate information before election day. The error was certainly not intentional, still it could have had far-reaching consequences, had it occurred in the last hours of an election campaign (Lachapelle's affidavit, at paras. 30-34).

The appellants themselves acknowledge that opinion polls on election issues influence voters' decisions: "[i]f voters paid no attention to polls there would be no point in suppressing them" (Appellants' Factum, at para. 35). The very fact that voters pay attention to opinion surveys and rely on them as objective, non-partisan information makes it important that the information they convey not be misleading or inaccurate. The impugned provision responds to this need by requiring that election polls be published in sufficient time to allow for timely scrutiny and criticism.

I agree with my colleague that there are various activities subject to restriction during a federal

Si tous les sondages n'étaient effectués que par certains organismes ayant recours à certaines normes, le problème ne se poserait pas. [Je souligne.]

(Comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles, op. cit., aux pp. 41:17 et 41:18.)

16 L'incident suivant permet d'illustrer l'utilité d'interdire la publication des résultats de sondages d'opinion pendant les 72 dernières heures d'une campagne électorale. À l'occasion de la campagne électorale fédérale de 1993, le Globe and Mail a fait une erreur lorsqu'il a publié les résultats d'un sondage effectué par la maison Angus Reid (Globe and Mail, 8 octobre 1993). Le Globe and Mail ne paraît pas le dimanche. Si l'article erroné était paru la dernière journée de la campagne ou encore le samedi précédant le jour du scrutin, il aurait été concrètement impossible pour la maison de sondage de corriger l'information et pour le journal de rectifier son article avant le jour du scrutin. Il n'aurait pas été vraiment possible de critiquer et corriger l'information erronée avant le jour du scrutin. L'erreur n'était certes pas intentionnelle, mais elle aurait tout de même pu être lourde de conséquences si elle était survenue dans les dernières heures de la campagne (Affidavit du professeur Lachapelle, aux par. 30 à 34).

17 Les appelantes elles-mêmes ont reconnu que les sondages sur des enjeux électoraux influencent les décisions des électeurs: [TRADUCTION] «[s]i les électeurs ne prêtaient pas attention aux sondages, il ne servirait à rien de les supprimer» (mémoire des appelantes, au par. 35). Le fait même que les électeurs prêtent attention aux sondages d'opinion et s'y réfèrent en tant que source d'information objective et non partisane fait en sorte qu'il est important que l'information qu'ils communiquent ne soit pas erronée ou trompeuse. La disposition contestée tient compte de ce besoin, en exigeant que les sondages électoraux soient publiés de manière à accorder un délai suffisant pour permettre que l'on en fasse, en temps utile, l'examen et la critique.

18 Je suis d'accord avec mon collègue que diverses activités font l'objet de restrictions pendant les election, that it is inappropriate to pronounce generally as to the scope or constitutional validity of these provisions, and that each type of restriction must be considered in its own context since each restriction is adopted to address a particular set of circumstances. However, these restrictions, including s. 322.1, stem from the same concerns. They are strong evidence that elections constitute, in our society, a unique event which calls for special treatment in order to promote voter autonomy and rational choice. Modern Canadian electoral law has sought to curb the excesses, enhance the democratic process and enable the voter to make a rational choice. Implicit to its regulations are the notions of integrity and fairness. As was aptly stated by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Re C.F.R.B. and Attorney-General for Canada, [1973] 3 O.R. 819, at p. 826:

> Central to the whole democratic process is the election of legislative bodies by the vote of electors who by their ballots have expressed their choice, through a process, evolved over the years, designed to remove or at least reduce the possibility of the electors' choice being unduly influenced by pressures put upon them.

Because of their claim to scientific validity, unscrutinized polls may have an influence that they do not actually deserve and may distort the electoral process.

campagnes électorales fédérales, qu'il ne convient pas de se prononcer globalement sur la portée ou la validité constitutionnelle de ces dispositions et que chaque restriction doit être examinée suivant le contexte qui lui est propre, car chacune vise une situation particulière. Cependant, ces restrictions, y compris celle prévue à l'art. 322.1, découlent des mêmes préoccupations. Elles constituent de solides indications que, dans notre société, les élections sont des événements exceptionnels qui commandent la prise de mesures spéciales, propres à favoriser l'autonomie des électeurs et la prise de décisions rationnelles. Le droit électoral en vigueur au Canada vise à réfréner les abus, à renforcer le processus démocratique et à permettre aux électeurs de faire des choix rationnels. Le régime qu'il instaure s'inspire de notions d'intégrité et d'équité. Comme l'a dit avec justesse la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario dans Re C.F.R.B. and Attorney-General for Canada, [1973] 3 O.R. 819, à la p. 826:

> [TRADUCTION] L'élection de corps législatifs par des électeurs, qui ont exprimé leur choix par leur bulletin de vote, est au cœur de tout le processus démocratique. Ce processus, qui a été établi au fil des ans, vise à éliminer ou, à tout le moins, à réduire la possibilité qu'on influence indûment le choix des électeurs en faisant pression sur eux.

Comme les sondages prétendent à la validité scientifique, il est possible que des sondages soustraits à la critique aient une influence dont ils ne sont pas dignes dans les faits et qu'ils faussent le processus électoral.

II. Analysis

II. L'analyse

A. The Right to Vote (Section 3 of the Charter)

A. Le droit de vote (art. 3 de la Charte)

19 I agree with my colleague that a restriction on information would constitute an infringement of the right to vote under s. 3 of the Charter only if it undermines the guarantee of effective representation (Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158, at p. 183, McLachlin J.). In the instant case, I believe that the short blackout period has no such effect. On the contrary, such a period assists effective representation. A strategic voter cannot cast a significant vote if the information required to exercise that vote can-

Je suis d'accord avec mon collègue que, pour qu'il y ait violation du droit de vote prévu à l'art. 3 de la Charte, la limitation de l'information doit compromettre la garantie d'une représentation effective (Renvoi relatif aux circonscriptions électorales provinciales (Sask.), [1991] 2 R.C.S. 158, à la p. 183, le juge McLachlin). En l'espèce, j'estime que la courte période d'interdiction en litige n'a pas cet effet. Au contraire, une telle interdiction favorise la représentation effective. L'exercice du vote stratégique n'est pas possible si l'information not be discussed and scrutinized in order to assess its real value. It follows that poll results which cannot be assessed in a timely manner may actually deprive voters of the effective exercise of their franchise. Therefore, there is no infringement of the right to vote under s. 3 of the Charter.

requise à cette fin ne peut être discutée et examinée minutieusement pour en évaluer la valeur réelle. Il s'ensuit que des résultats de sondages qui ne peuvent être évalués en temps utile peuvent, dans les faits, empêcher les électeurs d'exercer effectivement leur droit de vote. Par conséquent, il n'y a pas violation du droit de vote prévu à l'art. 3 de la Charte.

B. Freedom of Expression (Section 2(b) of the Charter)

B. La liberté d'expression (al. 2b) de la Charte)

It is not in dispute, and I agree with my colleague, that s. 322.1 infringes freedom of expression within the meaning of s. 2(b) of the Charter (R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697). The issue then is whether this infringement constitutes, under s. 1 of the Charter, a reasonable limit demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. I am in agreement with my colleague that this section serves a pressing and substantial objective, but must respectfully disagree with his conclusion that the section fails to minimally impair freedom of expression or is disproportionate in its effect. His conclusion rests on reasoning belied by the evidence and denies Parliament a choice of reasonable alternatives, holding it to a standard of perfection of uncertain reach. In the result, his reasons lead to the lifting of all restrictions as to the timing of the publication of opinion polls.

20 Il n'est pas contesté — et je souscris à l'opinion de mon collègue sur ce point — que l'art. 322.1 porte atteinte à la liberté d'expression garantie à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte (R. c. Keegstra, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 697). La question en litige consiste donc à déterminer si cette atteinte constitue, au sens de l'article premier de la Charte, une limite raisonnable dont la justification peut se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique. Je conviens avec mon collègue que cette disposition sert un objectif urgent et réel, mais je dois respectueusement exprimer mon désaccord avec sa conclusion que la disposition porte une atteinte plus que minimale à la liberté d'expression ou a un effet disproportionné. Sa conclusion repose sur un raisonnement qui ne trouve pas appui dans la preuve en plus de nier au législateur le choix de solutions de rechange raisonnables, assujettissant ce dernier à une norme de perfection dont l'atteinte est incertaine. En bout de ligne, ses motifs ont pour effet de lever toute restriction quant au moment de publication de sondages.

Justification Under Section 1 of the Charter

La justification conformément à l'article premier de la Charte

1. Preliminary Note: Evidence and Standard of Proof

1. Remarques préliminaires: Preuve et norme de preuve

In the course of the s. 1 analysis, the standard of proof to be used is proof on a balance of probabilities (R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, at p. 137). As was stated in Libman v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 569, at para. 39, scientific evidence is not required to meet the standard. Also McLachlin J., in writing for the majority in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 21 La norme de preuve applicable dans le cadre de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier est la prépondérance des probabilités (R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103, à la p. 137). Comme il a été dit dans l'arrêt Libman c. Québec (Procureur général), [1997] 3 R.C.S. 569, au par. 39, il n'est pas nécessaire de faire une preuve scientifique pour satisfaire à cette norme. En outre, Madame le juge

[1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 137, expressed the unanimous view of the Court:

> Discharge of the civil standard does not require scientific demonstration; the balance of probabilities may be established by the application of common sense to what is known, even though what is known may be deficient from a scientific point of view. . . . [Emphasis added.]

To paraphrase the Court's findings in Libman, supra, at para. 39, election campaigns, just as referendum campaigns, fall within the realm of social science, which does not lend itself to precise evidence.

2. Legislative Objective

22 In the material before the Court, reference is made to three suggested legislative objectives: first, to reduce the "undue influence" of all polls in general; second, to provide for a rest period so as to allow electors time to reflect before polling day; and third, to prevent the potentially distorting effect of public opinion survey results that are released late in an election campaign leaving insufficient time to assess their validity. This latter objective is the only one that the respondent advanced before this Court. Although my analysis will focus on this particular objective, the first two objectives may not be without merit. However, they need not be considered here. As I mentioned earlier, opinion polls have reshaped Canadian elections. It is now a fact that election campaigns take on an aura of "horse races", and that discussion of issues that concern Canadians tends to be preempted. Voters are of course completely free to choose the information upon which they want to make their decision. For instance, strategic voters, who may want to vote for their second-choice candidate in order to avoid the election of a leading candidate, rely on polls. Thus, while suppressing

McLachlin, écrivant pour la majorité dans RJR-MacDonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 R.C.S. 199, au par. 137, a exprimé le point de vue unanime de la Cour sur ce point:

> Pour satisfaire à la norme de preuve en matière civile, on n'a pas à faire une démonstration scientifique; la prépondérance des probabilités s'établit par l'application du bon sens à ce qui est connu, même si ce qui est connu peut comporter des lacunes du point de vue scientifique . . . [Je souligne.]

Pour paraphraser les conclusions de notre Cour dans l'arrêt Libman, précité, au par. 39, les campagnes électorales, tout comme les campagnes référendaires, participent du domaine des sciences sociales et ce domaine ne se prête pas à une preuve exacte.

2. L'objectif législatif

La preuve dont dispose notre Cour fait état de trois objectifs législatifs: premièrement, réduire l'«influence indue» de tous les sondages en général; deuxièmement, accorder une période de répit aux électeurs avant le jour du scrutin; troisièmement, prévenir l'effet déformant possible suite à la publication de résultats de sondages au terme d'une campagne électorale, alors qu'il ne reste plus assez de temps pour évaluer leur validité. Ce dernier objectif est le seul invoqué par l'intimé devant notre Cour. Le fait que mon analyse porte principalement sur cet objectif ne veut pas dire que les deux autres sont dénués de fondement. Cependant, il n'est pas nécessaire de les examiner en l'espèce. Comme je l'ai mentionné plus tôt, les sondages d'opinion ont transformé les campagnes électorales au Canada. Le fait est que les campagnes électorales ont maintenant des allures de «courses de chevaux» et que la discussion des questions qui préoccupent les Canadiens tend à être écartée. Il va de soi que les électeurs sont entièrement libres de choisir l'information sur laquelle ils désirent fonder leur décision. Par exemple, les électeurs qui peuvent, par stratégie, désirer voter pour le candidat qui constitue leur deuxième choix, afin d'éviter l'élection du candidat en avance, se fient aux sondages. Par conséquent, alors qu'on ne saurait supprimer les sondages pour la seule raison qu'ils peuvent être polls simply because they may be used by voters is not permissible, regulating polls may be.

(a) Criteria

The Court must first assess the objective of the infringing legislative measure, as distinguished from the means chosen to implement it. The question is whether the concern which prompted the enactment of the impugned legislation is pressing and substantial and whether the purpose of the legislation is one of sufficient importance (Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, at p. 987, Dickson C.J. and Lamer J. (as he then was) and Wilson J.). The distinction between "objective" and "means" is important since at this stage, the Court must ensure that the said objective is consistent with the principles integral to a free and democratic society, pressing and substantial, and directed to the realisation of collective goals of fundamental importance (Oakes, supra, at p. 138).

In Oakes, supra, at p. 136, Dickson C.J. stated that in determining whether Charter rights and freedoms should be limited,

> [t]he Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society. The underlying values and principles of a free and democratic society are the genesis of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter and the ultimate standard against which a limit on a right or freedom must be shown, despite its effect, to be reasonable and demonstrably justified. [Emphasis added.]

As La Forest J. put it in Ross v. New Brunswick School District No. 15, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 825, at para. 77, ultimately, any attempt to determine whether the impugned limit is a justifiable infringement of the freedom of expression must involve a weighing of the essential principles of a utilisés par les électeurs, il est possible que leur réglementation soit admise.

a) Les critères

La Cour doit d'abord évaluer l'objectif de la mesure législative attentatoire, par opposition aux moyens choisis pour l'appliquer. La question est de savoir si la préoccupation qui a incité à l'adoption de la loi contestée est urgente et réelle, et si l'objet de la loi est suffisamment important (Irwin Toy Ltd. c. Québec (Procureur général), [1989] 1 R.C.S. 927, à la p. 987, le juge en chef Dickson et les juges Lamer (maintenant Juge en chef) et Wilson). La distinction entre l'«objectif» et les «moyens» est importante étant donné que, à cette étape, la Cour doit s'assurer qu'il s'agit d'un objectif urgent et réel, conforme aux principes qui constituent l'essence même d'une société libre et démocratique et visant la réalisation d'objectifs collectifs d'une importance fondamentale (Oakes, précité, à la p. 138). 23

Dans Oakes, précité, à la p. 136, le juge en chef Dickson a affirmé que, pour déterminer si les droits et libertés garantis par la Charte doivent être restreints, 24

> [l]es tribunaux doivent être guidés par des valeurs et des principes essentiels à une société libre et démocratique, lesquels comprennent, selon moi, le respect de la dignité inhérente de l'être humain, la promotion de la justice et de l'égalité sociales, l'acceptation d'une grande diversité de croyances, le respect de chaque culture et de chaque groupe et la foi dans les institutions sociales et politiques qui favorisent la participation des particuliers et des groupes dans la société. Les valeurs et les principes sous-jacents d'une société libre et démocratique sont à l'origine des droits et libertés garantis par la Charte et constituent la norme fondamentale en fonction de laquelle on doit établir qu'une restriction d'un droit ou d'une liberté constitue, malgré son effet, une limite raisonnable dont la justification peut se démontrer. [Je souligne.]

Comme l'a dit le juge La Forest dans Ross c. Conseil scolaire du district nº 15 du Nouveau-Brunswick, [1996] 1 R.C.S. 825, au par. 77, en dernière analyse, toute tentative en vue de déterminer si la limite contestée constitue une atteinte justifiable à la liberté d'expression doit comporter une évalua-free and democratic society. The enhancement of the electoral process, through the provision of quality, timely information, serves one of these fundamental principles, i.e., good participation and faith of individuals in the most important political institution of all — the electoral process.

(b) Purposes of Freedom of Expression: Access to Information

25 As to the purposes underlying freedom of expression, La Forest J. in Ross, at para. 59, and McLachlin J. in R. v. Zundel, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 731, at p. 752, noted that s. 2(b) of the Charter aims at permitting free expression "to the end of promoting truth, political or social participation, and self-fulfilment". Following these purposes, freedom of expression should not be considered as an end per se. The promotion of an informed vote over a misinformed vote meets the three purposes and truly serves the core values of the freedom of expression in a free and democratic society: by allowing timely discussion of all published poll results, s. 322.1 aims at fostering truth; by keeping open the possibility of timely debate as to the validity of poll results, it promotes active political and social participation, rather than condone passiveness as to poll results; by allowing for full scrutiny of the information carried by poll results late in the election campaign, it promotes voters' self-fulfilment by ensuring that the intention voters really want to convey in casting their vote is actually expressed.

26 The quest for better information gives more meaning to voter participation in the electoral process. The very fact that some voters base their decision on opinion survey polls may justify the means taken to promote voters' right to good information. This is consistent with the findings of this Court that one of the objectives underlying freedom of expression is the ability of voters to make informed choices (Libman, supra, at para.

tion des principes essentiels d'une société libre et démocratique. La valorisation du processus électoral grâce à une information de qualité, disponible en temps utile, sert l'un de ces principes fondamentaux, c.-à-d. la participation utile des citoyens à l'institution politique la plus importante qui soit — le processus électoral — et leur foi dans ce processus.

b) Les objectifs de la liberté d'expression: l'accès à l'information En ce qui concerne les objectifs qui sous-tendent la liberté d'expression, le juge La Forest dans Ross, précité, au par. 59, et le juge McLachlin dans R. c. Zundel, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 731, à la p. 752, ont souligné que l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte vise à permettre la liberté d'expression «dans le but de promouvoir la vérité, la participation politique ou sociale et l'accomplissement de soi». Selon ces objectifs, la liberté d'expression ne devrait pas être considérée comme une fin en soi. Le fait de favoriser le vote éclairé pour éliminer le vote «à l'aveuglette» est compatible avec ces trois objectifs et sert vraiment les valeurs fondamentales de la liberté d'expression dans une société libre et démocratique: en permettant la discussion, en temps utile, de tous les résultats de sondages publiés, l'art. 322.1 vise à faire ressortir la vérité; en rendant possible la tenue, en temps utile, d'un débat sur la validité des résultats des sondages, il favorise la participation active des citoyens à la vie politique et sociale, au lieu d'encourager la passivité face aux résultats des sondages; en permettant un examen valable de l'information fournie par les résultats des sondages communiqués tard dans les campagnes électorales, il favorise l'épanouissement individuel des électeurs en faisant en sorte que leur vote soit l'expression véritable de leurs intentions.

La recherche d'une meilleure information donne davantage de sens à la participation des électeurs au processus électoral. Le fait même que certains électeurs fondent leur décision sur les sondages d'opinion peut justifier les moyens utilisés pour appuyer le droit des électeurs à une bonne information. Cela est compatible avec la conclusion de notre Cour qu'un des objectifs qui sous-tendent la liberté d'expression est la possibilité pour les élec-54; Ford v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 712, at p. 767).

As a matter of fact, in 1979, the committee on polling of the Regroupement québécois des sciences sociales suggested ways to improve the use of polls by journalists and to encourage increased accessibility to poll results broadcast during referendum campaigns. Quebec academics were concerned that with so many polls being conducted the public would not be able to distinguish between "good" and "poor" polls in the heat of the moment and that certain minimum standards of polling would lose out to partisan considerations. One of the committee's recommendations was that publication and broadcast of opinion polls during the week prior to the election be prohibited. Public discussion on published surveys, however, would still be allowed (Lachapelle Study, supra, at pp. 40-41). The foregoing recommendations were analysed by the Commission des droits de la personne du Québec in the light of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, R.S.Q., c. C-12. As Lachapelle noted at pp. 45-46:

> According to the human rights commission of Quebec, three basic corollaries affect the public's right to be fully informed, and these must be respected in the context of an election or referendum campaign:
> 1. the availability of accessible, unrestricted information;
> 2. access to plentiful, diversified information; and
> 3. access to accurate, high-quality information, which implicitly guarantees the freedom to criticize that information.

As to the appropriateness of a blackout period, Lachapelle mentioned that the Commission des droits de la personne du Québec expressed reservations and urged public debate on the issue, but decided against taking a position. According to Lachapelle, "[t]he reasons for the commission's indecision were that although such a prohibition would interfere with freedom of expression, it might also encourage public debate and afford voters de faire des choix éclairés (Libman, précité, au par. 54; Ford c. Québec (Procureur général), [1988] 2 R.C.S. 712, à la p. 767).

27 De fait, en 1979, le comité des sondages du Regroupement québécois des sciences sociales a proposé des moyens en vue d'améliorer le traitement journalistique des sondages d'opinion et de favoriser une plus grande accessibilité aux résultats de sondages diffusés lors de campagnes référendaires. Les universitaires québécois craignaient que, dans l'effervescence du moment, l'avalanche des sondages ne permette pas au public de distinguer les «bons» des «mauvais» sondages, et que certaines normes minimales de production ne soient pas respectées au profit de considérations partisanes. Une des recommandations du Comité a été que la publication et la diffusion de tout sondage d'opinion soient interdites pendant la semaine précédant le jour du scrutin. La discussion publique des sondages publiés serait cependant permise (Étude Lachapelle, op. cit., aux pp. 45 et 46). Ces recommandations ont été étudiées par la Commission des droits de la personne du Québec à la lumière de la Charte des droits et libertés de la personne du Québec, L.R.Q., ch. C-12. Comme l'a souligné le professeur Lachapelle, à la p. 53:

> Selon la Commission des droits de la personne du Québec, trois corollaires fondamentaux touchant directement le droit du public à une information pleine et entière doivent être respectés dans le contexte précis d'une campagne électorale ou référendaire:
> 1. l'accès à une information libre et sans entrave;
> 2. l'accès à une information abondante et diversifiée;
> 3. l'accès à une information rigoureuse et de qualité, qui permet implicitement l'exercice d'une critique libre sur cette information.

Relativement à l'opportunité d'une période d'embargo, le professeur Lachapelle a mentionné que la Commission des droits de la personne du Québec avait exprimé quelques réticences, au point où elle a décidé de ne pas prendre position et de réclamer un débat public sur la question. Au dire du professeur Lachapelle, «[t]out en reconnaissant que cette interdiction allait à l'encontre de la liberté d'expression, la Commission des droits de la personne ers a better opportunity to consider the real issues at stake. The commission also emphasized that in a system with no restrictions, it would be impossible to correct any erroneous information published or broadcast during the final hours of a campaign. In short, this proposal would restrict the right to information, as defined in the commission's first two principles [corollaries], in order to promote the third." (Lachapelle Study, at p. 46.)

du Québec a par contre admis qu'elle pouvait également favoriser la discussion publique et déclencher chez les électeurs et électrices une réflexion plus poussée sur les enjeux véritables. La commission a également souligné le fait que dans un régime sans interdits, il est impossible, à la toute fin d'une campagne électorale, d'apporter les correctifs nécessaires à la suite de la diffusion ou de la publication d'information erronée. En somme, cette proposition a pour caractéristique de restreindre le droit à l'information défini dans les deux premiers corollaires au profit de l'exercice du troisième.» (Étude Lachapelle, aux pp. 53 et 54.)

28 The position of the appellants and the intervener Canadian Civil Liberties Association regarding free expression in democracy is couched on the rationale that truth emerges through vigorous debate and more publication of polls. My colleague adopts this view, at para. 108:

La thèse des appelantes et de l'intervenante l'Association canadienne des libertés civiles en ce qui concerne la place de la liberté d'expression dans une démocratie est fondée sur le raisonnement que la vérité émerge d'un débat vigoureux des enjeux et de la publication du plus grand nombre possible de sondages. Mon collègue adopte ce point de vue, au par. 108:

> But an opinion poll does not appear in a vacuum. Rather, it is published chronologically after a series of other polls which have been measuring public opinion throughout the election. In all likelihood, other polls conducted by other polling organizations will appear in other media outlets during the three days prior to election day. . . . The more polls which appear during this period, the less likely that voters will base their decisions on the inaccurate poll.

> Mais un sondage n'est pas fait dans l'abstrait. Au contraire, il est publié chronologiquement, dans une série de sondages mesurant l'opinion publique durant une campagne électorale. Selon toute vraisemblance, d'autres sondages effectués par d'autres maisons seront diffusés par d'autres médias au cours des trois derniers jours précédant le scrutin. [. . .] Plus il y a de sondages durant cette période, moins grand est le risque que les électeurs basent leur décision sur le sondage inexact.

This philosophical underpinning was expressed by McIntyre J., speaking for the majority, in RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573, where he wrote at p. 583:

Ce fondement philosophique a été décrit par le juge McIntyre qui s'exprimait pour la majorité dans l'arrêt SDGMR c. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 R.C.S. 573, où il écrit ceci, à la p. 583:

> The importance of freedom of expression has been recognized since early times: see John Milton, Areopagitica; A Speech for the Liberty of Unlicenc'd Printing, to the Parliament of England (1644), and as well John Stuart Mill, "On Liberty" in On Liberty and considerations on Representative Government (Oxford 1946), at p. 14:
> > If all mankind minus one were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would be no more justified in silencing that one person, than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind.

> La reconnaissance de l'importance de la liberté d'expression ne date pas d'hier: voir John Milton, Areopagitica; A Speech for the Liberty of Unlicenc'd Printing, to the Parliament of England (1644), et John Stuart Mill, «On Liberty» dans On Liberty and considerations on Representative Government (Oxford 1946), à la p. 14:
> > [TRADUCTION] Si tous les hommes sauf un étaient du même avis et qu'une seule personne fût d'avis contraire, il ne serait pas justifié que l'ensemble des hommes bâillonnent ce seul individu, pas plus qu'il ne serait justifié que ce dernier, s'il en avait le pouvoir, bâillonne tous les autres hommes.

And, after stating that "All silencing of discussion is an assumption of infallibility", he said, at p. 16:

> Yet it is as evident in itself, as any amount of argument can make it, that ages are no more infallible than individuals; every age having held many opinions which subsequent ages have deemed not only false but absurd; and it is as certain that many opinions now general will be rejected by future ages, as it is that many, once general, are rejected by the present.

Nothing in the vast literature on this subject reduces the importance of Mill's words. The principle of freedom of speech and expression has been firmly accepted as a necessary feature of modern democracy.

According to this rationale, if there are distorting effects, these should be dealt with through corrective response of civil society (e.g., the media, political parties, private individuals, etc.), not through coercive action by the state. There is a serious problem with relying unreservedly on this rationale when it comes to elections. To say that truth most reliably emerges by means of correction through more polls is to assume an ongoing debate. In elections, the debate ends with the vote. A multiplicity of potentially inaccurate polls, none of which are in time to permit debate, fosters confusion and offers little protection to the public. Errors and misinformation may be corrected after the election, but the value of the correction is lost. Elections suggest that a special remedy may be in order: namely, a requirement that information be timely so as to avoid the harm occurring in the first place.

(c) Purpose of Section 322.1

The purpose of s. 322.1 is to improve information to the public during election campaigns. Its primary objective is positive rather than negative. Section 322.1 does not purport to suppress an evil per se, such as obscenity in R. v. Butler, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 452, or hate propaganda in Keegstra, supra.

Puis, après avoir dit que [TRADUCTION] «Tout acte ayant pour effet de supprimer la discussion suppose l'infaillibilité de son auteur», il a ajouté à la p. 16:

> [TRADUCTION] Il est toutefois évident d'une évidence qui se passe de démonstration qu'une époque n'est pas plus infaillible que des individus, car chaque époque a été caractérisée par un grand nombre d'opinions qui, à des époques subséquentes, ont été considérées non seulement comme fausses mais comme absurdes; et il est tout autant certain que beaucoup d'opinions maintenant généralement acceptées seront un jour rejetées de la même manière que le sont à présent un bon nombre d'opinions jadis courantes.

L'importance des propos de Mill n'est nullement diminuée par l'abondante documentation qui traite de ce sujet. Le principe de la liberté de parole et d'expression a été accepté sans réserve comme une caractéristique nécessaire de la démocratie moderne.

Suivant ce raisonnement, s'il y a effet déformant, il appartient aux moyens disponibles dans le milieu de la contrer (par exemple les médias, les partis politiques, de simples particuliers) et non à l'État de le faire par mesures correctives. Toutefois, l'application sans réserve de ce raisonnement aux élections soulève un problème sérieux. Affirmer que la vérité émerge de l'effet correcteur de la publication de sondages supplémentaires, c'est présumer l'existence d'un débat qui se continue. Or, dans les campagnes électorales, le débat prend fin le jour du scrutin. Une multiplicité de sondages potentiellement inexacts, dont aucun ne serait publié en temps utile pour qu'il puisse être débattu, engendre la confusion et offre peu de protection au public. Il est possible, après l'élection, de corriger des erreurs et de rectifier une mauvaise information, mais de telles mesures n'ont plus d'utilité. Dans le cas des élections, une mesure spéciale semble s'imposer, soit l'obligation de communiquer l'information en temps utile, de manière à prévenir le mal.

c) L'objet de l'art. 322.1

29 L'article 322.1 a pour objet d'améliorer la qualité de l'information dont dispose le public pendant les campagnes électorales. Son principal objectif est de nature positive plutôt que prohibitive. L'article 322.1 ne vise pas à éliminer un mal proprement dit, telle l'obscénité dans R. c. Butler, [1992]

It aims at balancing and enhancing Charter rights, namely the informed exercise of the right to vote and a fundamental purpose of freedom of expression, i.e., informed participation in the electoral process. If one wants to identify a harm in the instant case, it would be a lack of enhancement of the electoral process through timely information. Section 322.1 aims at improving the search for truth, by providing for the timeliness of the publication of poll results, so as to allow discussion, not simply proscribing polls. It in no way dictates or deals with the content of expression.

30 The Charter should not become an impediment to social and democratic progress. It should not be made to serve substantial commercial interests in publishing opinion poll results, by defeating a reasonable attempt by Parliament to allay potential distortion of voter choice.

31 Parliament adopted s. 322.1 without expressed opposition, following lengthy, extensive, in-depth studies and consideration over several decades, in response to a long-standing concern. Being themselves the very objects of elections, members of Parliament were in the best position to assess the effects of polls in electoral campaigns and their impact on individual voters. In the proceedings, it has not been suggested that members of Parliament had any interest other than to foster the integrity of the electoral process by avoiding voters being misled on facts through denial of an opportunity for scrutiny and discussion.

(d) Evidence

32 Social science studies composed much of the evidence submitted before the motions judge. In that respect, Somers J. rightly stated, at p. 142:

1 R.C.S. 452, ou la propagande haineuse dans Keegstra, précité. Il tend plutôt à concilier et à renforcer des droits garantis par la Charte, savoir l'exercice éclairé du droit de vote ainsi qu'un aspect fondamental de la liberté d'expression, c.-à-d. la participation éclairée au processus électoral. Si on tient à identifier un mal en l'espèce, il s'agit de l'affaiblissement du processus électoral par l'absence de communication de l'information en temps utile. L'article 322.1 n'a pas pour but l'interdiction des sondages mais il vise plutôt à favoriser la recherche de la vérité en pourvoyant à la publication de leurs résultats en temps utile, pour qu'ils puissent être discutés. En aucune façon concerne-t-il ou dicte-t-il le contenu de cette forme d'expression.

La Charte ne doit pas devenir un obstacle au progrès social et démocratique. Elle ne doit pas être mise au service de puissants intérêts commerciaux désireux de publier des résultats de sondages, en faisant échouer une tentative raisonnable du Parlement de prévenir la dénaturation potentielle du choix exprimé par les électeurs.

En réponse à une préoccupation de longue date, le Parlement a adopté sans opposition l'art. 322.1, au terme de dizaines d'années de réflexion et d'études longues et approfondies. Étant les principaux acteurs du processus électoral, les députés étaient les personnes les mieux placées pour évaluer les effets des sondages pendant les campagnes électorales ainsi que leur influence sur les électeurs. Personne n'a prétendu, au cours des présentes procédures, que les députés étaient motivés par quelque autre intérêt que celui de renforcer l'intégrité du processus électoral en évitant que les électeurs soient induits en erreur sur des faits parce qu'on leur refuse la possibilité de bien les examiner et d'en discuter.

d) La preuve

Une grande partie de la preuve présentée au juge des requêtes était composée d'études réalisées dans le domaine des sciences sociales. À cet égard, le juge Somers a, avec raison, affirmé ce qui suit, à la p. 142:

[I]t would be a mistake to look only at social science evidence in assessing whether the objective is pressing and substantial. . . . Of course, social science data are ready evidence of the importance of different problems, but it is not the only evidence courts should consider, nor should it be given decisive weight or considered requisite to government action. Thus, even if social science evidence is found to be inconclusive, it is still possible to ground a pressing objective on evidence of extended public debate of an issue or by looking at the actions of other democracies. On this application, it is clear from the number of times a concern about polling was raised by the public and in reports stemming from public consultation, that many considered this to be a pressing issue. . . . In a democracy, it is to be expected that representatives will react to such a debate, either through private members bills or government legislation; it might be an institutional failure if they did not. [Emphasis added.]

[TRADUCTION] [C]e serait une erreur que d'examiner seulement la preuve fondée sur les sciences sociales pour évaluer si l'objectif est urgent et réel. [. . .] Bien entendu, les données produites par les sciences sociales sont des éléments de preuve disponibles sur l'importance de divers problèmes, mais il ne s'agit pas des seuls éléments de preuve que les tribunaux doivent examiner et il ne faut pas non plus leur accorder un poids décisif ni les considérer comme un préalable à l'action gouvernementale. En conséquence, même si la preuve fondée sur les sciences sociales est jugée non concluante, il demeure possible d'étayer l'existence d'un objectif urgent en prouvant qu'une question fait l'objet d'un large débat public ou en examinant les mesures prises dans d'autres démocraties. Dans le cadre de la présente requête, il ressort clairement du nombre de fois que des préoccupations concernant les sondages ont été soulevées par le public et dans des rapports issus de consultations publiques que de nombreuses personnes estiment qu'il s'agit d'une question urgente. [. . .] Dans une démocratie, on s'attend à ce que les élus réagissent à un tel débat, soit par le dépôt par des députés de projets de loi, soit par des mesures législatives sur initiative du gouvernement; le défaut d'agir des élus pourrait bien constituer un manquement institutionnel. [Je souligne.]

As outlined earlier in these reasons, Somers J. had ample material to support his position that, taken as a whole, the evidence "serves to buttress the respondent's contention that the unregulated distribution of poll results is not without its potential problems" (p. 121). It must be pointed out that the Court of Appeal unanimously accepted Somers J.'s observations and findings of facts regarding his s. 1 analysis (see (1996), 30 O.R. (3d) 350, at pp. 359-60). The evidence shows that there exists a long-standing concern about the publication of opinion survey results during election campaigns in Canada. In the last 30 years at least, several reports have studied and discussed this issue in depth.

33 Comme je l'ai souligné, le juge Somers disposait amplement d'éléments au soutien de sa conclusion que la preuve, prise globalement, [TRADUCTION] «étaye la prétention de l'intimé que la distribution non réglementée des résultats de sondages n'est pas sans problèmes potentiels» (p. 121). Il convient de souligner que la Cour d'appel a unanimement accepté les observations et les conclusions de fait du juge Somers en ce qui concerne son analyse selon l'article premier (voir (1996), 30 O.R. (3d) 350, aux pp. 359 et 360). Il ressort de la preuve que la publication des sondages d'opinion pendant les campagnes électorales constitue une préoccupation de longue date au Canada. Au cours des 30 dernières années tout au moins, plusieurs rapports ont examiné et analysé la question en profondeur.

In the instant case, at p. 143, Somers J. rightly found that it is reasonable to presume that polls can harm the electoral process. I rely here on the following evidence:

34 En l'espèce, le juge Somers a à juste titre conclu, à la p. 143,

[TRADUCTION] [qu'i]l est raisonnable de présumer que les sondages peuvent porter atteinte au processus électoral. Je me fonde à cet égard sur les éléments de preuve suivants:

(1) the sheer prevalence of polling results (22 national polls reported during the 1988 election, mentioned in some 30 per cent of television coverage);

(2) awareness of poll results amongst 70 to 80 per cent of the public;

(3) methodological information necessary of critical evaluation is very frequently absent from reporting;

(4) the lack of a corrective response time when polls are published close to election day.

In reaching these conclusions, Somers J. makes specific reference to several findings of the Lortie Commission. Referring to its finding, at p. 457 of its Final Report, that "recent research provides strong support for the proposition that published opinion polls can significantly influence campaigns and voters", he commented (at p. 118) that "[t]he Commission based this conclusion on the fact that '[o]ur research demonstrates that polls did have measurable effects on the conduct of election campaigns and the choice voters make' (p. 456)."

35 As he stated, at p. 119:

. . . the evidence presented dealt not only with the effect of polls on voters, but also with problems associated with the undue influence, late publication and accuracy of polls. The evidence pointed to a general worry about the "undue influence" of opinion polls on the election process. This influence is said to flow from two related factors. The first is that the polls are presented as scientific and authoritative. The second is that despite this presentation, the public is often not given the information needed to gauge a poll's true accuracy. [Emphasis added.]

This is further explained in the Lortie Commission Final Report (p. 455 quoted at p. 119 of the judgment):

Because they are presented as "scientific", published opinion polls raise issues of public confidence in the integrity of the electoral process. Notwithstanding their

1) le simple fait de l'omniprésence des sondages (22 sondages nationaux ont été recensés pendant la campagne électorale de 1988 et mentionnés dans 30 pour 100 des reportages télévisés);

2) la connaissance, par 70 à 80 pour 100 du public, des résultats des sondages;

3) l'absence très fréquente, dans les reportages, de l'information nécessaire sur la méthodologie utilisée pour faire une appréciation critique des sondages;

4) l'absence d'un délai de rectification lorsque les sondages sont publiés peu de temps avant le jour du scrutin.

À l'appui de ses conclusions, le juge Somers réfère expressément à plusieurs constatations de la Commission Lortie. Se référant à la conclusion suivante, qui figure à la p. 475 du Rapport final de la Commission Lortie: «Bien que les maisons de sondage ne cessent de répéter que leurs données affectent peu le vote, des recherches récentes tendent à prouver le contraire», le juge Somers fait le commentaire qui suit (à la p. 118): [TRADUCTION] «[l]a Commission a fondé cette conclusion sur le fait qu'il ressortait de ses recherches que "les sondages ont effectivement une influence mesurable sur la conduite des campagnes électorales et sur les choix de l'électorat" (pp. 473 et 474).»

Comme dit le juge Somers, à la p. 119:

[TRADUCTION] . . . la preuve présentée portait non seulement sur l'effet des sondages sur les électeurs, mais également sur des problèmes liés à l'influence indue des sondages, à leur publication tard dans les campagnes électorales et à leur exactitude. La preuve a révélé l'existence d'une inquiétude généralisée à l'égard de l'«influence indue» des sondages d'opinion sur le processus électoral. Cette influence découlerait, affirme-t-on, de deux facteurs connexes. Le premier est le fait que les sondages sont présentés comme ayant un caractère scientifique et faisant autorité. Le deuxième est que, malgré qu'ils soient présentés ainsi, il arrive souvent qu'on ne fournisse pas au public l'information nécessaire pour évaluer leur exactitude. [Je souligne.]

Des explications supplémentaires sont données dans le Rapport final de la Commission Lortie (à la p. 473, et citées à la p. 119 du jugement):

Parce qu'ils sont présentés comme «scientifiques», les sondages d'opinion diffusés par les médias suscitent des inquiétudes quant à la confiance du public dans l'inclaims to scientific validity and accuracy in representing the views of all potential voters, opinion polls are susceptible to many forms of error and misrepresentation. The apparent precision of the data they report fails to reflect the fact that they are estimates of the distribution of opinion at a given time. Yet their apparent authority gives them considerable influence over the conduct of campaigns and the choices made by voters. [Emphasis added.]

Somers J. also found, at p. 142, that the international review of legislation regarding publication of opinion poll results during elections was "strong evidence of a pressing objective". At least six European Union countries have some form of polling blackout, ranging in duration from five days in Spain to the entire length of the election in Portugal. French regulations prohibit publication during the last week before a round of voting for presidential, legislative, or European elections. In Belgium, the prohibition lasts 30 days. Greece, Brazil, South Africa, South Korea, Japan, and Australia enacted legislation to regulate or ban the publication of poll results. The Lachapelle Study, supra, concluded its international survey, at p. 68, by asserting that:

A review of the legislation of various countries reveals that governments tend toward outright banning of polls near the end of election campaigns rather than requiring the publication of a specifications sheet. Only France has chosen both options. However, every law is imperfect and can only partially regulate as multifaceted a practice as polling. [Emphasis added.]

The fact that so many democratic, industrialized nations have passed legislation in this particular area is further evidence of the importance of the problem. Extensive polling is a relatively recent phenomenon. That some countries have not responded does not detract from the fact that many have. To make the response of others to political or tégrité du processus électoral. En dépit de la précision scientifique revendiquée par leurs auteurs, les sondages sont sujets à maintes erreurs et distorsions. La précision apparente de leurs données occulte le fait qu'ils ne sont jamais qu'une estimation de la distribution de l'opinion à un moment donné. Leur apparence de rigueur leur confère néanmoins une influence considérable sur la conduite des campagnes et l'issue des scrutins. [Je souligne.]

Le juge Somers conclut également, à la p. 142, que l'examen des dispositions législatives en vigueur dans d'autres pays relativement à la publication des résultats de sondages d'opinion pendant les campagnes électorales apportait [TRADUCTION] «une preuve solide de l'existence d'un objectif urgent». Au moins six pays membres de l'Union européenne interdisent, dans une plus ou moins large mesure, la publication des sondages pendant les campagnes électorales. La durée de cette interdiction va de cinq jours en Espagne à toute la durée de la campagne électorale au Portugal. En France, il est interdit de publier des sondages pendant la semaine qui précède un tour de scrutin dans le cadre des élections présidentielles, législatives ou européennes. En Belgique, la durée de l'interdiction est de 30 jours. En outre, des mesures législatives réglementant ou interdisant la publication de sondages ont été adoptées en Grèce, au Brésil, en Afrique du Sud, en Corée du Sud, au Japon et en Australie. L'Étude Lachapelle, op. cit., a conclu son survol de la situation à l'échelle internationale, en affirmant ce qui suit, à la p. 79:

Il ressort de ce survol de la législation de divers pays que les gouvernements ont davantage tendance à interdire carrément les sondages vers la fin des campagnes électorales plutôt que d'exiger la publication d'une fiche technique, seule la France ayant choisi ces deux options. Toutefois, toute législation demeure en soi imparfaite et ne peut que partiellement réglementer une pratique, telle celle des sondages, ayant de multiples facettes. [Je souligne.]

Le fait qu'autant de nations industrialisées de tradition démocratique aient adopté des mesures législatives en la matière est une preuve supplémentaire de l'importance du problème. La prolifération des sondages est un phénomène relativement récent. Le fait que certains pays n'ont pas réagi à ce phénomène n'enlève rien au fait que de nomsocial concerns a pre-requisite to legislation would transform the Charter into a sword against social progress and stultify government action.

37 In their factum, the appellants refer to a decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal, Canada (Attorney General) v. Somerville, [1996] 8 W.W.R. 199, to support the view that Parliament's objective as to the impugned legislation is not permissible under the Charter. In Somerville, the Court of Appeal held that certain provisions of the Canada Elections Act which, among other things, limited third party advertising expenses during a federal election campaign to a maximum of $1,000 per individual, were contrary to freedom of expression under the Charter. Conrad J.A., Harradence J.A. concurring, stated, at pp. 228 and 231, that:

> The Attorney General argues that unrestricted third party advertising could distort the political process.
> . . .
> This legislation bans input. This is a case where the objective of the legislation is not trying to balance expenditures of outside groups, the press and parties. Rather, one is led to conclude that the very aim or purpose of this legislation is to ensure that third parties cannot be heard in any effective way and that political parties are entitled to preferential protection. Its objective strikes at the core of these fundamental rights and freedoms, and is arguably legislation which has as its very purpose the restriction of these rights and freedoms, which can never be justified. [Emphasis added by the appellants.]

In Libman, supra, at para. 56, the Somerville decision was unanimously criticized inasmuch as this Court declared "that the objective of Quebec's referendum legislation [of promoting fairness in a democratic process through a certain equality of resources] is highly laudable, as is that of the Canada Elections Act". In Libman, the system set breux autres l'ont fait. Ériger la prise de mesures par d'autres pays à l'égard de problèmes politiques ou sociaux en préalable à l'adoption de mesures législatives en la matière aurait pour effet de faire de la Charte une arme contre le progrès social et d'étouffer l'action gouvernementale.

Dans leur mémoire, les appelantes se sont référées à l'arrêt Canada (Attorney General) c. Somerville, [1996] 8 W.W.R. 199, de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta au soutien de leur prétention que l'objectif que vise le Parlement par la disposition législative contestée n'est pas autorisé par la Charte. Dans cet arrêt, la Cour d'appel a conclu que certaines dispositions de la Loi électorale du Canada ayant notamment pour effet de limiter à 1 000 $ par personne les frais de publicité que peuvent engager des tiers lors des campagnes électorales fédérales étaient incompatibles avec la liberté d'expression garantie par la Charte. Le juge Conrad a déclaré ceci, avec l'appui du juge Harradence, aux pp. 228 et 231:

> . . .
> La mesure législative en cause interdit à des personnes de s'exprimer. Dans la présente affaire, l'objectif de la mesure législative n'est pas d'établir un équilibre entre les dépenses engagées par des groupes extérieurs, la presse et les parties. On est plutôt amené à conclure que le but ou l'objet même de cette mesure est de faire en sorte que les tiers ne puissent se faire entendre de manière efficace et que certains partis politiques jouissent d'une protection préférentielle. Son objectif touche au cœur même de ces libertés et droits fondamentaux, et il est possible de soutenir qu'il s'agit d'une mesure législative qui a pour objet la restriction de ces droits et libertés, restriction qui ne peut jamais être justifiée. [Soulignement et italiques ajoutés par les appelantes.]

Dans l'arrêt Libman, précité, au par. 56, l'arrêt Somerville a été unanimement critiqué dans la mesure où notre Cour a déclaré que «l'objectif de la loi référendaire québécoise [qui consiste à favoriser l'équité du processus démocratique en visant à égaliser les ressources disponibles] est fort louable, au même titre que l'objectif de la Loi électo- up by the referendum legislation restricted independent spending, thus freedom of expression, in order "to preserve a balance in the promotion of the options and favour an informed and truly free exercise of the right to vote" (para. 54 (emphasis added)). The instant case aims at this very objective.

Considering that the legislative objective of s. 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act is consistent with and indeed enhances the objectives underlying freedom of expression, among them the ability of voters to make informed choices and the promotion of political and social participation, that Parliament's concern is clearly pressing and substantial, in that it is directed to the realisation of the important collective goal of safeguarding the integrity of the electoral process (Harvey v. New Brunswick (Attorney General), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 876, at para. 38), I conclude that the objective of preventing the potentially distorting effect of public opinion survey results that are released late in an election campaign when there is no longer a sufficient opportunity to respond is a sufficiently important objective which meets the first step of the analysis under s. 1 of the Charter.

3. Proportionality Test

(a) Rational Connection

Parliament has chosen to ban the publication, dissemination and broadcast of poll results from midnight on Friday before polling day through the end of polling day. "The essence of rational connection is a causal relationship between the objective of the law and the measures enacted by the law. This is often a difficult matter to establish by evidence, and the Supreme Court of Canada has not always insisted on direct proof of the causal relationship." (P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), vol. 2, at p. 35-29.) In RJR-MacDonald, supra, the Court unanimously agreed that a causal relationship between advertising and tobacco product consumption could be rale du Canada». Dans Libman, le régime établi par la loi référendaire limitait les sommes que les particuliers pouvaient engager et, de ce fait, portait atteinte à la liberté d'expression de ces derniers «pour préserver l'équilibre dans la diffusion des options et favoriser un exercice éclairé et véritablement libre du droit de vote» (par. 54 (je souligne)). L'objectif visé en l'espèce est exactement le même.

38 Étant donné que l'objectif visé par l'art. 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada est compatible avec les objectifs qui sous-tendent la liberté d'expression, notamment la capacité des électeurs de faire des choix éclairés et l'encouragement de la participation des citoyens à la vie politique et sociale et de fait les favorise, et que la préoccupation du législateur est clairement urgente et réelle, en ce qu'elle tend à la réalisation d'un but collectif important — savoir la sauvegarde de l'intégrité du processus électoral (Harvey c. Nouveau Brunswick (Procureur général), [1996] 2 R.C.S. 876, au par. 38), je conclus que l'objectif qui consiste à prévenir l'effet déformant susceptible de découler de la publication de résultats de sondages tard dans les campagnes électorales, lorsqu'il ne reste plus assez de temps pour y répondre, constitue un objectif suffisamment important pour satisfaire au premier volet de l'analyse selon l'article premier de la Charte.

3. Le critère de la proportionnalité

a) Le lien rationnel

39 Le Parlement a choisi d'interdire la publication, l'annonce et la diffusion de résultats de sondages entre minuit le vendredi qui précède le jour du scrutin et la fermeture des bureaux de scrutin. [TRADUCTION] «L'essence du lien rationnel est l'existence d'un lien de causalité entre l'objectif de la règle de droit et les mesures édictées par celle-ci. Ce lien de causalité est souvent difficile à établir en preuve, et la Cour suprême du Canada n'a pas toujours insisté pour qu'on en fasse la preuve directe». (P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (éd. à feuilles mobiles), vol. 2, à la p. 35-29.) Dans l'arrêt RJR-MacDonald, précité, la Cour a accepté à l'unanimité qu'un lien de causalité based either on common sense, reason, or logic (La Forest J., at para. 86; McLachlin J., at paras. 156-58; and Iacobucci J., at para. 184), even though the evidence may be admittedly inconclusive. In Butler, supra, Sopinka J. found, at p. 502, that it was "reasonable to presume" that there is a causal relationship between obscenity and harm to society. Similarly, in Ross, supra, La Forest J., writing for the Court, held, at para. 101, that it was "reasonable to anticipate" that there is a causal link between anti-Semitic activity by school teachers outside school and discriminatory attitudes within school.

entre la publicité et la consommation de produits du tabac pouvait être fondé sur le bon sens, la raison ou la logique (le juge La Forest, au par. 86; le juge McLachlin, aux par. 156 à 158; et le juge Iacobucci, au par. 184), même si la preuve peut, reconnaît-on, être non concluante. Dans Butler, précité, le juge Sopinka a conclu, à la p. 502, qu'il est «raisonnable de supposer» qu'il existe un lien de causalité entre l'obscénité et le préjudice causé à la société. De même, dans Ross, précité, le juge La Forest, s'exprimant au nom de la Cour, a conclu, au par. 101, qu'il était «raisonnable de s'attendre» à ce qu'il existe un lien de causalité entre les activités antisémites d'enseignants à l'extérieur des écoles et les attitudes discriminatoires qui avaient cours à l'intérieur de celles-ci.

40 In the instant case, the rational connection is self-evident. Opinion polls significantly influence voter choice and electoral campaigns. It follows that the publication of inaccurate, though authoritative, opinion survey results that go uncorrected may well lead to voters making misinformed decisions. Logically, there is a reasoned apprehension that voters will be deprived of the full exercise of their franchise. Its importance is measured by the significant influence of polls on voters and the prevalence of misleading polls. Ensuring that polls that cannot be adequately, publicly and independently evaluated as to their correctness because of insufficient time are not published clearly addresses this problem. Voters are free to cast their ballot as they see fit; however, the democratic process cares about each voter and should not tolerate the fact that, in the pooling booth, some voters would express themselves on the basis of misleading, or potentially misleading, information that is de facto immunized from scrutiny and criticism.

En l'espèce, le lien rationnel est évident. Les sondages d'opinion influencent de façon importante le choix des électeurs et les campagnes électorales. Il s'ensuit que la publication de résultats de sondages qui, quoiqu'ils fassent autorité, sont inexacts et ne sont pas rectifiés, peut fort bien amener les électeurs à prendre des décisions mal éclairées. Logiquement, il existe une appréhension raisonnée que certains électeurs soient privés de la possibilité d'exercer pleinement leur droit de vote. L'importance de cette appréhension se mesure à l'influence des sondages sur les électeurs et à la fréquence des sondages trompeurs. Or, le fait d'interdire la publication de sondages dont l'exactitude ne peut, par manque de temps, être évaluée de manière adéquate, publique et indépendante, vise clairement à résoudre ce problème. Les électeurs sont libres de voter comme ils l'entendent. Cependant, le processus démocratique implique chaque électeur et ne devrait pas tolérer le fait que, dans l'isoloir, certains électeurs expriment leur choix sur la foi de renseignements trompeurs ou potentiellement trompeurs, renseignements qui sont de facto à l'abri de tout examen ou critique.

(b) Minimal Impairment

b) L'atteinte minimale

41 In my view, there is no doubt that s. 322.1 constitutes a genuine mediation between the rights of voters to receive information in a timely fashion, and the right of pollsters and publishers freely to provide the information they want. Not only does the legislation protect the rights of voters but it does so by serving one of the very purposes of freedom of expression, that is informing while allowing for political debate and discussion. As mentioned earlier, the provision also strikes a balance between two basic aspects of voters' right to information, that are, on the one hand, the availability of accessible, unrestricted, plentiful, diversified information and, on the other, the timely availability of factual information that may be misleading so as to allow for scrutiny and criticism.

À mon avis, il ne fait aucun doute que l'art. 322.1 constitue un véritable compromis entre le droit des électeurs d'obtenir de l'information en temps utile et celui des sondeurs et des diffuseurs de fournir librement l'information de leur choix.

Non seulement cette mesure législative protège-t-elle les droits des électeurs, mais elle le fait en servant l'un des objectifs mêmes de la liberté d'expression, celui d'informer le public tout en permettant la discussion et les débats politiques. Comme je l'ai déjà dit, cette disposition établit également un équilibre entre deux aspects fondamentaux du droit des électeurs à l'information: d'une part, la disponibilité d'une information accessible, abondante, diversifiée et non assortie de restrictions; d'autre part, l'accès en temps utile à l'information factuelle qui est susceptible d'être trompeuse, de manière à en permettre l'examen minutieux et la critique.

In matching means to ends and asking whether rights are impaired as little as possible, a legislature mediating between the claims of competing groups will be forced to strike a balance without the benefit of absolute certainty concerning how that balance is best struck (Irwin Toy, supra, at p. 993). As the majority also held in Irwin Toy, at p. 999: "This Court will not, in the name of minimal impairment, take a restrictive approach to social science evidence and require legislatures to choose the least ambitious means to protect vulnerable groups." I share the respondent's view that this Court should not second-guess the wisdom of Parliament in its endeavour to draw the line between competing credible evidence, once it has been established, on the civil standard of proof, that Parliament's objective was pressing and substantial:

42 En comparant la fin et les moyens et en se demandant s'il a été porté atteinte le moins possible aux droits en cause, le législateur qui est appelé à arbitrer les revendications de groupes concurrents sera obligé de trouver le point d'équilibre sans certitude absolue quant à la réponse optimale (Irwin Toy, précité, à la p. 993). Comme ont également conclu les juges de la majorité dans cet arrêt, à la p. 999: «Cette Cour n'adoptera pas une interprétation restrictive de la preuve en matière de sciences humaines, au nom du principe de l'atteinte minimale, et n'obligera pas les législatures à choisir les moyens les moins ambitieux pour protéger des groupes vulnérables.» Je suis d'avis comme l'intimé que notre Cour ne devrait pas mettre en doute la sagesse du Parlement dans ses efforts pour faire la part des choses à même les éléments de preuve contradictoires mais par ailleurs crédibles, une fois qu'il a été établi, suivant la norme de preuve applicable en matière civile, que l'objectif du législateur est urgent et réel:

> When striking a balance between the claims of competing groups, the choice of means, like the choice of ends, frequently will require an assessment of conflicting scientific evidence and differing justified demands on scarce resources. Democratic institutions are meant to let us all share in the responsibility for these difficult choices. Thus, as courts review the results of legislature's deliberations, particularly with respect to the protection of vulnerable groups, they must be mindful of the legislature's representative function.
> (Irwin Toy, at p. 993.)

> Pour trouver le point d'équilibre entre des groupes concurrents, le choix des moyens, comme celui des fins, exige souvent l'évaluation de preuves scientifiques contradictoires et de demandes légitimes mais contraires quant à la répartition de ressources limitées. Les institutions démocratiques visent à ce que nous partagions tous la responsabilité de ces choix difficiles. Ainsi, lorsque les tribunaux sont appelés à contrôler les résultats des délibérations du législateur, surtout en matière de protection de groupes vulnérables, ils doivent garder à l'esprit la fonction représentative du pouvoir législatif.
> (Irwin Toy, à la p. 993.)

43 At this stage, the question is whether there is a reasonable basis, on the evidence tendered, for concluding that a blackout on all opinion polls during the last weekend of an election campaign and during election day impaired freedom of expression as little as possible given the government's pressing and substantial objective (Irwin Toy, at p. 994). Parliament is not bound to find the least intrusive nor the best means. This would be too high a standard for our elected representatives to meet. In RJR-MacDonald, supra, at para. 160, McLachlin J. stated:

> [T]he government must show that the measures at issue impair the right of free expression as little as reasonably possible in order to achieve the legislative objective. The impairment must be "minimal", that is, the law must be carefully tailored so that rights are impaired no more than necessary. The tailoring process seldom admits of perfection and the courts must accord some leeway to the legislator. If the law falls within a range of reasonable alternatives, the courts will not find it overbroad merely because they can conceive of an alternative which might better tailor objective to infringement. . . . [Emphasis added.]

(See also Harvey v. New Brunswick (Attorney General), supra, at para. 47, per La Forest J.)

In Keegstra, supra, Dickson C.J. also noted at pp. 784-85:

> In assessing the proportionality of a legislative enactment to a valid governmental objective, however, s. 1 should not operate in every instance so as to force the government to rely upon only the mode of intervention least intrusive of a Charter right or freedom. It may be that a number of courses of action are available in the furtherance of a pressing and substantial objective, each imposing a varying degree of restriction upon a right or freedom. In such circumstances, the government may legitimately employ a more restrictive measure, either alone or as part of a larger programme of action, if that measure is not redundant, furthering the objective in ways that alternative responses could not, and is in all

À ce stade-ci la question est de savoir s'il existe, à la lumière de la preuve présentée, un fondement raisonnable permettant de conclure que l'imposition d'un embargo visant tous les sondages d'opinion durant la fin de semaine précédant le jour du scrutin et le jour du scrutin lui-même porte atteinte le moins possible à la liberté d'expression compte tenu de l'objectif urgent et réel poursuivi par le gouvernement (Irwin Toy, à la p. 994). Le législateur n'est pas tenu de trouver le moyen le moins attentatoire ni encore le meilleur moyen. Il s'agirait d'une norme trop élevée pour nos élus. Dans RJR-MacDonald, précité, au par. 160, le juge McLachlin déclare ceci:

> [L]e gouvernement doit établir que les mesures en cause restreignent le droit à la liberté d'expression aussi peu que cela est raisonnablement possible aux fins de la réalisation de l'objectif législatif. La restriction doit être «minimale», c'est-à-dire que la loi doit être soigneusement adaptée de façon à ce que l'atteinte aux droits ne dépasse pas ce qui est nécessaire. Le processus d'adaptation est rarement parfait et les tribunaux doivent accorder une certaine latitude au législateur. Si la loi se situe à l'intérieur d'une gamme de mesures raisonnables, les tribunaux ne concluront pas qu'elle a une portée trop générale simplement parce qu'ils peuvent envisager une solution de rechange qui pourrait être mieux adaptée à l'objectif de la violation . . . [Je souligne.]

Dans Keegstra, précité, le juge en chef Dickson dit aussi, aux pp. 784 et 785:

> Dans l'appréciation de la proportionnalité d'une disposition législative avec un objectif gouvernemental valable, toutefois, l'article premier ne doit pas jouer dans tous les cas de manière à contraindre le gouvernement à n'intervenir que de la manière qui porte le moins possible atteinte à un droit ou à une liberté garantis par la Charte. Il se peut en effet qu'il y ait plusieurs moyens d'atteindre un objectif urgent et réel, dont chacun impose un degré plus ou moins grand de restriction à un droit ou à une liberté. Dans ces circonstances, le gouvernement peut légitimement recourir à une mesure plus restrictive, soit isolément soit dans le cadre d'un plan d'action plus étendu, pourvu que cette mesure ne fasse pas double emploi, qu'elle permette de réaliser l'objectif de façons qui seraient impossibles par le biais d'autres mesures, et qu'elle soit à tous autres égards proportion-other respects proportionate to a valid s. 1 aim. [Emphasis added.]

One can conceive of alternatives to the impugned measure. In RJR-MacDonald, supra, at para. 160, McLachlin J. stated: "if the government fails to explain why a significantly less intrusive and equally effective measure was not chosen, the law may fail" (emphasis added). I conclude that these alternative measures cannot pretend to equally serve the objective of preventing the potentially distorting effect of public opinion survey results that are released late in an election campaign when there is no longer a sufficient opportunity to respond, and be as effective when compared to the measure at issue.

One of the suggested alternatives is mandatory publication of methodological information. Since poll results would be allowed to be published up until the last minute of the election campaign, it supposes that voters can, looking at that methodological information, decide for themselves if the poll was properly conducted and ascertain whether the results are reliable. Absent sufficient time for public discussion of the poll results, it is unlikely that this alternative would be of real assistance as voters may lack the requisite knowledge to properly assess the results. The publication of methodological information is useful when analysts and political parties have sufficient time to evaluate its validity.

The second proposed solution is to create a punishment for publishing false poll results. Once again, the proposal suffers from serious shortcomings. Firstly, the prohibition is unlikely to prevent voters from being misled. Despite successful prosecution, the damage to voters would already have been done. Secondly, even if one were to assume that such a prohibition, coupled with severe sanctions, would serve as a deterrent, it would only aim at intentional deception. Consequently erroneous polls whose results will not have been considered née à un objectif légitime aux fins de l'article premier. [Je souligne.]

44 On peut concevoir des solutions autres que la mesure contestée. Dans RJR-MacDonald, précité, au par. 160, le juge McLachlin déclare que «si le gouvernement omet d'expliquer pourquoi il n'a pas choisi une mesure beaucoup moins attentatoire et tout aussi efficace, la loi peut être déclarée non valide» (je souligne). J'arrive à la conclusion qu'aucune de ces solutions de rechange ne saurait prétendre servir aussi bien l'objectif visé, savoir éviter l'effet potentiellement déformant de résultats de sondages publiés tard dans la campagne électorale, alors qu'il ne reste plus assez de temps pour y répliquer, et être aussi efficace que la mesure en litige.

45 L'une des solutions de rechange proposées est la publication obligatoire d'information sur la méthodologie utilisée. Comme la publication de résultats de sondages serait autorisée jusqu'à la toute fin de la campagne électorale, les électeurs seraient en mesure, à partir de cette information, de décider par eux-mêmes si un sondage a été établi convenablement et de déterminer si ses résultats sont fiables. En l'absence d'une période qui soit suffisamment longue pour permettre la discussion publique des résultats des sondages, il est peu probable que cette solution soit vraiment utile, car il est possible que les électeurs n'aient pas les connaissances requises pour évaluer convenablement ces résultats. La publication d'information méthodologique est utile lorsque analystes et partis politiques ont suffisamment de temps pour évaluer sa validité.

46 La deuxième solution proposée est de pénaliser la publication de faux résultats de sondages. Cette proposition présente elle aussi de sérieuses lacunes. Premièrement, l'interdiction n'empêcherait vraisemblablement pas les électeurs d'être induits en erreur. Même si des poursuites étaient intentées avec succès, le tort aurait déjà été causé. Deuxièmement, même dans l'hypothèse qu'une telle interdiction, assortie de peines sévères, aurait un effet dissuasif, elle ne viserait que les cas de tromperie intentionnelle. En conséquence, des son-due to lack of time will still mislead voters and remain unpunished.

47 In summary, there is simply no equally effective alternative to the current short-term blackout for achieving the legislative objective.

48 What is then the scope of s. 322.1? It is claimed that s. 322.1 is overbroad in that it prohibits polls of all kinds regardless of their scientific nature or quality. I agree with the Court of Appeal's finding that the provision prohibits all opinion surveys, regardless of how informal they may be, "hamburger polls" included. The expression "hamburger polls" describes what is sometimes used as a marketing device during elections where goods are matched to political candidates or parties. The sales of each item are then claimed to reflect public sentiment. As amusing as it may sound, the expression "hamburger polls" tends to suggest a clear cut line between reliable poll results and misleading poll results. There is no such clear demarcation. To limit the ban to polls that are acceptable to the scientific community leaves out polls that, some voters may wrongly be led to believe, are representative or based on scientific methodology, and complicates enforcement of the provision. On the other hand, the information conveyed by "hamburger polls" is of such questionable nature that any infringement of Charter rights is minimal, at best.

49 I add that, considering the main legislative objective, I share my colleague's view that the impugned legislation does not apply to the discussion of previously released poll results. After stating two purposes for s. 322.1, namely to provide voters with a rest period and to guard them against dages erronés, dont les résultats n'auraient pas été examinés faute de temps, continueraient d'induire en erreur les électeurs, et leur publication resterait impunie.

En résumé, il n'existe tout simplement pas de solution de rechange aussi efficace que le court embargo en vigueur actuellement pour réaliser l'objectif visé par la loi.

Quelle est donc alors la portée de l'art. 322.1? On prétend que l'art. 322.1 a une portée trop large en ce qu'il interdit la publication de tous les types de sondages, indépendamment de leur nature ou qualité scientifiques. Je souscris à la conclusion de la Cour d'appel que la disposition visée interdit tous les sondages d'opinion, si informels qu'ils soient, y compris les [TRADUCTION] «votes au hamburger» («hamburger polls»). Cette expression désigne un truc de marketing parfois utilisé lors de campagnes électorales et au moyen duquel on vend des biens de consommation en les associant à des partis politiques ou à des candidats. Le nombre d'articles de chaque type ainsi vendus est ensuite présenté comme le reflet de l'opinion publique. Aussi amusante qu'elle puisse paraître, l'expression «votes au hamburger» tend à indiquer l'existence d'une ligne de démarcation nette entre les résultats de sondages fiables et les résultats trompeurs. Or, une telle ligne de démarcation n'existe pas. Le fait de limiter l'application de l'interdiction aux sondages jugés acceptables par la communauté scientifique a pour effet de permettre la publication de sondages que certains électeurs pourraient à tort considérer comme représentatifs ou fondés sur une méthodologie scientifique, en plus de rendre plus difficile la mise en œuvre de la mesure. Par ailleurs, l'information communiquée par les «votes au hamburger» est à ce point douteuse que toute atteinte à des droits garantis par la Charte est minimale, tout au plus.

J'ajoute que, compte tenu du principal objectif de la mesure législative en cause, je suis d'avis comme mon collègue que la disposition contestée n'interdit pas l'analyse des résultats de sondages déjà publiés. Après avoir fait état de deux objectifs sous-tendant l'art. 322.1, c'est-à-dire le fait d'acan inaccurate poll which occurs late in the campaign, my colleague writes, at para. 99:

> Accepting these as the two objectives of s. 322.1, it is my view that any ambiguity in the words of the section should be interpreted in accordance with those purposes, rather than to frustrate them. I conclude, therefore, that Somers J. was correct in interpreting the prohibition in s. 322.1 as applying only to "new" poll results, i.e. results that are undisclosed as of midnight on the Friday before election day. Far from preventing old poll results from being mentioned, the very raison d'être of the section is that those old poll results should be aired and discussed in the media so that their accuracy can be fully determined in public debate.

The legislation prohibits broadcast, publication and dissemination. Ejusdem generis, these expressions refer only to the initial release of poll results. In comparison, French and Belgian regulations more clearly ban the publication, broadcast and commentary of the surveys.

The impugned limitation minimizes the risks of publication and dissemination of misleading poll results on or just before the crucial moment of the polling day, by allowing just enough time (72 hours approximately), from Friday prior to election day to the closing of polling stations on election day, to collect any undisclosed methodological information, assess poll results, discuss the assessment, criticize the analyses, and disseminate the results of the discussions throughout the electorate. This period is very shortlived, especially for the analysis of a cross-Canada opinion poll and the airing of the analysis, having regard to the time allotted for voting and the restriction on broadcasting and advertising on polling day and the day preceding.

The Lachapelle Study suggested 72 hours, while the Lortie Commission recommended 48. Profescorder aux électeurs une période de répit et de les protéger contre la publication, tard dans les campagnes électorales, de sondages inexacts, mon collègue écrit ceci au par. 99:

> Acceptant qu'il s'agit là des deux objectifs de l'art. 322.1, je suis d'avis que toute ambiguïté des mots employés dans cette disposition doit être dissipée de manière à favoriser et non à contrecarrer la réalisation de ces objectifs. En conséquence, je conclus que le juge Somers a eu raison de considérer que l'interdiction prévue à l'art. 322.1 s'applique uniquement aux résultats de «nouveaux» sondages, c'est-à-dire aux résultats qui n'ont pas encore été communiqués à minuit le vendredi qui précède le jour du scrutin. Loin d'empêcher que l'on fasse état des résultats de sondages déjà publiés, la raison d'être même de cet article est la diffusion et la discussion de ces sondages dans les médias de sorte que leur exactitude puisse être débattue pleinement en public.

La disposition en cause interdit l'annonce, la publication et la diffusion des résultats de sondages. Or, suivant la règle ejusdem generis, ces expressions ne visent que la communication initiale des résultats de sondages. Par comparaison, en France et en Belgique, la réglementation applicable interdit plus clairement la publication, l'annonce et le commentaire de sondages.

50 La restriction contestée réduit au minimum les risques de publication et de diffusion de résultats de sondages trompeurs au moment décisif, soit le jour du scrutin, ou tout juste avant celui-ci, en accordant tout juste assez de temps (environ 72 heures) — soit du vendredi précédant le jour du scrutin jusqu'à la fermeture des bureaux de scrutin le jour de l'élection — pour recueillir toute information méthodologique non divulguée, évaluer les résultats des sondages, discuter cette évaluation, critiquer les analyses et communiquer les résultats des discussions à l'électorat. Ce délai est très court, surtout pour faire l'analyse d'un sondage pancanadien et la diffuser, compte tenu du temps consacré au vote et des restrictions en matière de radiodiffusion et de publicité applicables le jour du scrutin et le jour qui le précède.

51 L'Étude Lachapelle proposait une période de 72 heures, alors que la Commission Lortie recomman-sor Lachapelle submitted, at p. 157 of his study, that:

> The 72-hour blackout suggested here would put print and broadcast journalists on the same footing and would respond to a long-standing grievance among broadcast journalists that they face more restrictions than their print colleagues. The legislator could envisage eliminating the 48-hour rule entirely, but such a route might jeopardize a relative consensus on the need to limit all partisan information at the end of a campaign. A supplementary 24 hours would enable citizens to exercise their moral right to reply, which would encourage public discussion, especially when it is a matter of deciding who will govern us for the next few years. Broadcasters and citizens should, therefore, draw dividends from this measure.

The 48-hour rule mentioned by Professor Lachapelle refers to s. 213(1) of the Canada Elections Act which provides that:

> 213. (1) Any person is guilty of an offence who, for the purpose of promoting or opposing a particular registered party or the election of a particular candidate, directly or indirectly,
>
> (a) . . . the one day immediately preceding polling day or on polling day, advertises on the facilities of any broadcasting undertaking; or
> (b) procures for publication or acquiesces in the publication, . . . on the one day preceding polling day or on polling day of an advertisement in a periodical publication.

In Irwin Toy, supra, at issue was the determination of the upper age limit for the protection of children from advertising. This Court held that the legislature was not obliged to confine itself solely to protecting the most clearly vulnerable group. It was only required to exercise reasonable judgment in specifying the vulnerable group. The Court quoted Dickson C.J. in R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 713, at pp. 781-82:

> I might add that I do not believe there is any magic in the number seven as distinct from, say, five, ten, or fifteen employees as the cut-off point for eligibility for the dait une période de 48 heures. Le professeur Lachapelle écrit, à la p. 181 de son étude:

> Une période de restriction totale de soixante-douze heures ne fera que corriger une situation législative anormale qui place les radiodiffuseurs et les diffuseurs dans des catégories différentes, et répondre aux historiques demandes des journalistes des médias électroniques qui affirment être davantage réglementés que leurs collègues de la presse écrite. Le législateur pourrait envisager d'éliminer complètement la règle du quarante-huit heures, mais une telle avenue pourrait remettre en cause un certain consensus sur la nécessité de limiter l'information partisane en fin de campagne. Une période de vingt-quatre heures supplémentaires permettrait aux citoyens et citoyennes d'exercer un droit de réplique qui ne peut que favoriser la discussion publique, surtout lorsqu'il s'agit de décider qui gouvernera le pays pour les prochaines années. Diffuseurs et citoyens devraient donc retirer les dividendes de cette mesure.

La règle des 48 heures mentionnée par le professeur Lachapelle est celle prévue au par. 213(1) de la Loi électorale du Canada, qui se lit:

> 213. (1) Est coupable d'une infraction quiconque, dans le but de favoriser ou de contrecarrer, directement ou indirectement, un parti enregistré en particulier ou l'élection d'un candidat en particulier:
>
> a) soit, [. . .] la veille du scrutin ou le jour du scrutin, fait de la publicité en utilisant les installations d'une entreprise de radiodiffusion;
> b) soit, fait obtenir [. . .], la veille du scrutin ou le jour du scrutin, la publication d'une annonce dans une publication périodique, ou y consent.

Dans l'arrêt Irwin Toy, précité, la question en litige était de déterminer jusqu'à quel âge les enfants devaient être protégés contre la publicité. Notre Cour a conclu que le législateur n'était pas tenu de se contenter de protéger uniquement le groupe le plus manifestement vulnérable. Il était seulement tenu d'exercer de façon raisonnable son jugement dans la définition du groupe vulnérable. La Cour a cité les propos du juge en chef Dickson dans R. c. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 R.C.S. 713, aux pp. 781 et 782:

> J'ajouterais que je ne vois rien de magique dans le choix du chiffre sept plutôt que, disons, cinq, dix ou quinze employés comme étant le nombre limite pour exemption. In balancing the interests of retail employees to a holiday in common with their family and friends against the s. 2(a) interests of those affected the Legislature engaged in the process envisaged by s. 1 of the Charter. A "reasonable limit" is one which, having regard to the principles enunciated in Oakes, it was reasonable for the legislature to impose. The courts are not called upon to substitute judicial opinions for legislative ones as to the place at which to draw a precise line. [Emphasis added.]

Based upon the current legislation, the reports and the studies available, Parliament reasonably determined, as it was entitled to do, that a 72-hour period was necessary to allow meaningful scrutiny of poll results during an election campaign.

Furthermore, the limitation period only affects one mode of expression: opinion poll results respecting how electors will vote at an election or respecting an election issue that would permit the identification of a political party or candidate. This mode of expression is not a primary source of information concerning relevant political facts. It mainly constitutes information as to the effect of relevant political information on potential voters. Candidates and political parties, through the media, are still allowed to disseminate their program across the electorate and to carry on their campaign, within the other limits prescribed by the Canada Elections Act, which are not currently at issue.

Many elements of information can factor into influencing voters: statistics, financial information, speeches, news, etc. When Parliament identifies one matter of concern, it has no absolute duty to identify and regulate each and every factor. It is entitled to determine the urgency of addressing a particular problem and the appropriate means of doing so. As La Forest J. put it for the majority in McKinney v. University of Guelph, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 229, at pp. 317-18:

être admissible à l'exemption. En évaluant les intérêts qu'ont les salariés du commerce de détail à bénéficier d'un jour commun de congé avec leurs familles et leurs amis par rapport aux droits que possèdent les personnes touchées en vertu de l'al. 2*a*), le législateur s'est engagé dans le processus envisagé par l'article premier de la Charte. Une «limite raisonnable» est une limite qui, compte tenu des principes énoncés dans l'arrêt Oakes, pouvait être raisonnablement imposée par le législateur. Les tribunaux ne sont pas appelés à substituer des opinions judiciaires à celles du législateur quant à l'endroit où tracer une ligne de démarcation. [Je souligne.]

Se fondant sur la législation qui existait ainsi que sur les rapports et études disponibles, le Parlement a décidé, comme il avait le droit de le faire, qu'une période de 72 heures était nécessaire pour permettre un examen utile de l'ensemble des résultats de sondages dévoilés durant une campagne électorale.

52 En outre, la période d'interdiction ne touche qu'un seul mode d'expression: les résultats de sondages d'opinion sur les intentions de vote des électeurs ou sur une question électorale qui permettrait d'identifier un parti politique ou un candidat. Ce mode d'expression n'est pas une source primaire d'information sur les faits politiques pertinents. Il constitue principalement une source d'information sur l'effet de renseignements politiques pertinents sur les électeurs. Les candidats et les partis politiques, par l'entremise des médias, continuent d'être autorisés à diffuser leur programme parmi l'électorat et à poursuivre leur campagne, dans le respect des autres limites prévues par la Loi électorale du Canada, lesquelles ne sont pas en cause dans le présent pourvoi.

53 Bon nombre d'éléments d'information peuvent contribuer à influencer les électeurs: notamment les statistiques, l'information financière, les discours et les nouvelles. Lorsqu'il décèle un sujet de préoccupation, le Parlement n'a pas l'obligation absolue de relever et de réglementer chacun des facteurs en cause. Il a le droit de décider s'il est urgent de s'attaquer à un problème particulier et de choisir les moyens appropriés de le faire. Comme l'a dit le juge La Forest, au nom de la majorité, dans McKinney c. Université de Guelph, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 229, aux pp. 317 et 318:

In looking at this type of issue, it is important to remember that a Legislature should not be obliged to deal with all aspects of a problem at once. It must surely be permitted to take incremental measures. . . . This Court has had occasion to advert to possibilities of this kind. In R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd. [[1986] 2 S.C.R. 713], Dickson C.J., there dealing with the regulation of business and industry, had this to say, at p. 772:

> I might add that in regulating industry or business it is open to the legislature to restrict its legislative reforms to sectors in which there appear to be particularly urgent concerns or to constituencies that seem especially needy. In this context, I agree with the opinion expressed by the United States Supreme Court in Williamson v. Lee Optical of Oklahoma, 348 U.S. 483 (1955), at p. 489:
> > Evils in the same field may be of different dimensions and proportions, requiring different remedies. Or so the legislature may think. . . . Or the reform may take one step at a time, addressing itself to the phase of the problem which seems most acute to the legislative mind. . . . The legislature may select one phase of one field and apply a remedy there, neglecting the others. [Emphasis added.]

Dans l'examen de ce genre de questions, il est important de se rappeler qu'un législateur ne peut être tenu de traiter tous les aspects d'un problème à la fois. Il doit certainement pouvoir adopter des mesures progressives. [. . .] Notre Cour a eu l'occasion de discuter de possibilités de ce genre. Dans l'arrêt R. c. Edwards Books and Art Ltd. [[1986] 2 R.C.S. 713], le juge en chef Dickson, traitant de la réglementation du commerce et de l'industrie, dit, à la p. 772:

> Je pourrais ajouter qu'en réglementant une industrie ou un commerce, il est loisible au législateur de limiter sa réforme législative à des secteurs où il semble y avoir des préoccupations particulièrement urgentes ou à des catégories où cela semble particulièrement nécessaire. À cet égard, je partage l'opinion exprimée par la Cour suprême des États-Unis dans l'arrêt Williamson v. Lee Optical of Oklahoma, 348 U.S. 483 (1955), à la p. 489:
> > [TRADUCTION] Les maux que l'on trouve dans un même domaine peuvent avoir des dimensions et des proportions différentes, et exiger des redressements différents. Du moins, le législateur peut le croire . . . Ou la réforme peut se faire étape par étape, en ne s'attaquant qu'à la phase du problème que le législateur estime la plus critique . . . Le législateur peut sélectionner une phase dans un domaine et y apporter un redressement, tout en négligeant les autres. [Je souligne.]

Both the motions judge and the Court of Appeal held that inaccurate polls at the end of an election campaign constitute a reasonable concern. The respondent has not to show that this concern is more serious or is causing more harm to the electoral process or to individual voters than any other potentially misleading information. There is no such standard under the Charter. Holding so would have the effect of transforming the Charter into an impediment to social progress. As Somers J. found, studies and reports, as well as bills in the House of Commons, and legislation in other democratic countries support Parliament's reasonable finding that the concern at bar was serious.

Tant le juge des requêtes que la Cour d'appel ont décidé que la publication de sondages inexacts en fin de campagne électorale constituait une préoccupation raisonnable. L'intimé n'a pas à établir que cette préoccupation est plus sérieuse ou cause davantage préjudice au processus électoral ou aux électeurs que toute autre information susceptible d'induire en erreur. Il n'existe aucune norme de la sorte dans l'application de la Charte. Conclure ainsi aurait pour effet de faire de la Charte un obstacle au progrès social. Comme a conclu le juge Somers, plusieurs études et rapports, ainsi que les projets de loi déposés devant la Chambre des communes et les mesures législatives en vigueur dans d'autres pays démocratiques appuient la conclusion raisonnable du Parlement qu'il y avait là motif sérieux d'inquiétude.

Mon collègue affirme, aux par. 112 et 113, que:

In this case, however, the social science evidence did not establish that the Canadian voter is a vulnerable group relative to pollsters and the media who publish polls. The presumption in this Court should be that the Canadian voter is a rational actor who can learn from experience and make independent judgments about the value of particular sources of electoral information. . . . However, no evidence has been presented before this Court that voters have suffered from any misapprehensions regarding the accuracy of any single poll. Indeed, the fact that polls conducted contemporaneously yield differing results, or that poll results can fluctuate dramatically over time, suggests that voters have experience with the shortcomings of some polls. . . . Voters are constantly exposed to opinion poll results throughout the election and a single inaccurate poll result is likely to be spotted and discounted appropriately.

. . . What I have said in the previous paragraph suggests, as a matter of logic, that there is reason to believe that, notwithstanding the scientific "aura" of polls, the Canadian voter is likely to be aware of a seriously inaccurate poll. Indeed, the more serious the inaccuracy, the more likely the awareness of the error. [Emphasis added.]

With respect, I must differ for two reasons. While voters may be credited with some knowledge of the reliability of poll results generally, surely it is legitimate for Parliament to provide them with an opportunity of distinguishing "poor" from "good" polls. As I mentioned earlier, it is concern as to the prevalence of the publication of "poor" polls which has prompted the legislation. An opportunity to analyse, discuss and criticize published poll results is required in all cases, be it by any individual voter or more likely by analysts and others, in sufficient time for a public airing of diverse opinions. In addition, while my colleague acknowledges the pressing and substantial legislative objective and its rational connection to the impugned measure, he apparently finds the evidence submitted by the government insufficiently specific and conclusive to justify the impairment. The effect of potentially inaccurate opinion poll results must be measured having regard to the effect of opinion poll results generally. Reasoning based on the belief that voters will show discerne-

En l'espèce, toutefois, la preuve fondée sur les sciences sociales n'a pas établi que les électeurs canadiens forment un groupe vulnérable par rapport aux sondeurs et aux médias qui publient les sondages. Notre Cour doit présumer que l'électeur canadien est un être rationnel, capable de tirer des leçons de son expérience et de juger de façon indépendante de la valeur de certaines sources d'information électorale. [. . .] Toutefois, il n'a été présenté à la Cour aucun élément de preuve établissant que les électeurs ont été victimes de méprise quant à l'exactitude d'un sondage. En effet, le fait que des sondages effectués simultanément produisent des résultats différents ou que les résultats des sondages peuvent fluctuer radicalement dans le temps permet de supposer que les électeurs connaissent les imperfections des sondages. [. . .] Les électeurs sont constamment bombardés de sondages pendant toute la campagne, et il est probable qu'un sondage aux résultats inexacts sera repéré et écarté comme il se doit.

. . . Les observations que j'ai formulées au paragraphe précédent suggèrent, d'un point de vue logique, qu'il y a des raisons de croire que, malgré l'«aura» de caractère scientifique des sondages, il est probable que les électeurs canadiens se rendent compte que les résultats d'un sondage sont sérieusement inexacts. À vrai dire, plus l'inexactitude est grande, plus il y a de chances que les électeurs en soient conscients. [Je souligne.]

Avec égards, je dois exprimer mon désaccord et ce pour deux raisons. Même si on peut reconnaître aux électeurs certaines connaissances sur la fiabilité des résultats de sondages, de façon générale, il est bien sûr légitime pour le Parlement de leur donner la possibilité de distinguer les «bons» sondages des «mauvais». Comme je l'ai dit précédemment, c'est l'inquiétude découlant de la publication fréquente de «mauvais» sondages qui a incité à l'adoption de la disposition législative en cause. Dans tous les cas, il faut que les électeurs ou plus vraisemblablement les analystes et d'autres personnes intéressées aient la possibilité d'analyser, de discuter et de critiquer les résultats des sondages, et qu'ils disposent à cette fin d'un délai suffisant pour que les divers points de vue puissent être rendus publics. En outre, bien que mon collègue reconnaisse l'existence de l'objectif urgent et réel et son lien rationnel avec la mesure contestée, il juge apparemment la preuve soumise par le gouvernement insuffisamment précise et concluante pour justifier l'atteinte. L'effet de résultats de son-ment in their reliance on polls and that only some voters are influenced does not belie nor answer the fact that the influence of polls both on the choice of voters and on the conduct of electoral campaigns is significant.

dage potentiellement inexacts doit être mesuré en tenant compte de l'effet des résultats des sondages en général. Le fait de raisonner que les électeurs vont, croit-on, faire montre de discernement avant de se fier aux sondages, et que seulement certains électeurs sont influencés par les sondages ne contredit ni ne réfute le fait que les sondages ont une influence importante sur le choix des électeurs et sur le déroulement des campagnes électorales.

55 My colleague also asserts, at para. 117:

> The Canadian voter is not a historically vulnerable or disadvantaged group. Nor, as has been explained above, is the autonomy or dignity of any single group under attack from, or even facing the contrary interests of, another potentially more powerful group. Nor can it be said that there is a shared understanding amongst Canadians that a single inaccurate poll will mislead Canadians to an extent which . . . is "undue". I am, therefore, unable to accept that the harm which the government is seeking to prevent affects a large number of voters, or that such possible distortions are significant to the conduct of an election, without more specific and conclusive evidence to that effect. [Emphasis added.]

Mon collègue affirme également ce qui suit, au par. 117:

> Les électeurs canadiens ne constituent pas, historiquement, un groupe vulnérable ou défavorisé. Pas plus d'ailleurs, comme il a été expliqué précédemment, que l'autonomie ou la dignité de quelque groupe que ce soit n'est attaquée par un autre groupe potentiellement plus puissant, ni même confrontée aux intérêts opposés d'un tel groupe. En outre, il est impossible d'affirmer qu'il existe, au sein de la population canadienne, une perception commune voulant qu'un seul sondage inexact puisse tromper les Canadiens dans une mesure qui [. . .] est «indue». Je ne puis donc accepter que le préjudice que le gouvernement cherche à prévenir affecte un grand nombre d'électeurs ou que de telles déformations potentielles de la réalité ont une influence importante sur le déroulement des élections, sans disposer de preuves plus précises et concluantes à cet effet. [Je souligne.]

56 With respect, everyone is vulnerable to misinformation which cannot be verified. As I have pointed out, a multiplicity of potentially inaccurate polls offers little protection to the public. Our democracy, and its electoral process, finds its strength in the vote of each and every citizen. Each citizen, no matter how politically knowledgeable one may be, has his or her own reasons to vote for a particular candidate and the value of any of these reasons should not be undermined by misinformation.

Avec égards, chacun est vulnérable à une mauvaise information qui ne peut être vérifiée. Comme je l'ai souligné, une multiplicité de sondages potentiellement inexacts offre peu de protection au public. Notre démocratie — et son processus électoral — tire sa force du vote de chacun des citoyens. Chaque citoyen, quel que soit son degré de connaissance de la politique, a ses raisons bien à lui de voter pour un candidat donné, et la valeur de ces raisons ne doit pas être amoindrie par une mauvaise information.

57 The findings of the Lortie Commission in its Final Report (at p. 457) bear repeating:

> Although the industry in general has become highly professional since public polling was introduced in Canada in 1941, the incidence of technically deficient and poorly reported polls is still substantial. In recent

Il vaut de répéter les conclusions suivantes formulées par la Commission Lortie dans son Rapport final (à la p. 475):

> Bien que l'industrie du sondage en général ait atteint un haut niveau de professionnalisme depuis l'apparition des sondages d'opinion au Canada en 1941, le nombre d'enquêtes techniquement déficientes et mal présentées elections, there have been instances of misleading polls, some because of technical errors and others because of partisan misrepresentation. There have even been allegations of fraudulent polls, where the data were said to have been fabricated to counter a poll showing the opposition in the lead. Such "bogus" polls and the more common misrepresented poll have been released to the media in many democracies. (Cantril 1991, 67; Worcester 1991, 199; Hoy 1989, 189-202) It is the willingness of the media to report such polls that makes them significant and troublesome. [Emphasis added.]

In other words, opinion poll results have a significant influence. They are subject to error, misrepresentation and open to manipulation. Elections, by their very nature, are a battleground for diverging interests, each striving for the favour of electors. Polls are one instrument in the armoury of the contestants. The intense conflicts of interest in an election are an inducement to manipulation. Parliament, acting on the conclusions of extensive studies and research after consideration over many years and in response to a broad public concern with the benefit of the background experience of its own members, has chosen to enact a modest measure of protection of voters against factual misinformation.

(c) Proportionate Effects

In Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835, at p. 889, Lamer C.J. rephrased the third part of the Oakes test of proportionality:

> . . . there must be a proportionality between the deleterious effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the rights or freedoms in question and the objective, and there must be a proportionality between the deleterious and the salutary effects of the measures. [Emphasis in original.]

The salutary effect of s. 322.1 is to promote the right of voters not to be misled in the exercise of their right to vote. At the end of an election campaign, opinion poll results have the potential to irreparably mislead voters, particularly strategic demeure important. Certains sondages publiés à l'occasion d'élections récentes étaient entachés d'erreurs techniques, et d'autres étaient présentés de façon partiale. On a même signalé des sondages carrément frauduleux, dont les données auraient été fabriquées de toutes pièces pour contrer un sondage plaçant l'adversaire en tête. Les médias de maints pays démocratiques ont publié de tels sondages «bidon» et, de façon plus courante, des sondages présentés de manière trompeuse (Cantril 1991, 67; Worcester 1991, 199; Hoy 1989, 189-202). En fait, ces «sondages» posent un problème dans la mesure où les médias sont prêts à les diffuser. [Je souligne.]

58 En d'autres mots, les résultats des sondages d'opinion ont une influence importante. Ils peuvent être l'objet d'erreurs, de fausses représentations ou de manipulation. De par leur nature même, les élections sont le champ de bataille où s'affrontent des intérêts divergents, qui luttent pour s'attirer la faveur des électeurs. Les sondages sont un instrument dans l'arsenal des concurrents. Les intenses chocs d'intérêts qui se produisent durant une élection sont autant d'incitations à la manipulation. Au terme de nombreuses années de réflexion, le Parlement, répondant à une préoccupation largement répandue dans le public, donnant suite aux conclusions de longues études et recherches et profitant de l'expérience en la matière de ses propres membres, a choisi d'édicter une mesure modeste, qui vise à protéger les électeurs contre la mauvaise information factuelle.

c) La proportionnalité des effets

59 Dans Dagenais c. Société Radio-Canada, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 835, à la p. 889, le juge en chef Lamer a reformulé la troisième étape du volet de la proportionnalité du critère établi dans l'arrêt Oakes:

> . . . il doit y avoir proportionnalité entre les effets préjudiciables des mesures restreignant un droit ou une liberté et l'objectif, et il doit y avoir proportionnalité entre les effets préjudiciables des mesures et leurs effets bénéfiques. [Souligné dans l'original.]

60 L'effet bénéfique de l'art. 322.1 est qu'il favorise le droit des électeurs de ne pas être induits en erreur lorsqu'ils exercent leur droit de vote. Les résultats de sondages d'opinion diffusés en fin de campagne électorale peuvent induire les électeurs voters, because of the purportedly scientific, reliable nature of most opinion poll results. The deleterious effect of the measure is that s. 322.1 deprives some voters, who rely on polls to make their decision, of some late campaign opinion poll results. This deleterious effect is quite limited, when one considers the delay between conducting the poll and ultimately publishing its results. In fact, what is prohibited is the publication of results of polls conducted at best three days or more before polling day, as against polls conducted five or more days before polling day. And as we can see from Table 1.11 of the Lachapelle Study, supra, at pp. 113-15, a polling organization could take up to seven days to interview their respondents for a cross-Canada survey. This tends to detract from both the accuracy and the timeliness of the "snapshot". As I pointed out earlier, a strategic voter cannot cast a significant vote if the information required to exercise that vote is not discussed and scrutinized in order to assess its real value. Poll results which cannot be assessed in a timely manner may actually deprive voters of the effective exercise of their franchise.

en erreur de façon irrémédiable, particulièrement ceux qui votent de manière stratégique, étant donné que la plupart des sondages se veulent scientifiques et fiables. L'effet préjudiciable de l'art. 322.1 est qu'il prive des électeurs qui se fondent sur les sondages pour prendre leur décision des résultats de certains sondages d'opinion effectués tard dans les campagnes électorales. Or, cet effet préjudiciable est très limité, si l'on tient compte du délai entre la réalisation du sondage et la publication de ses résultats. En fait, ce qui est interdit c'est la publication des résultats de sondages effectués au mieux trois ou quatre jours avant la date du scrutin, par opposition à la publication de résultats de sondages effectués au moins cinq jours avant l'élection. Comme nous pouvons le constater à la lecture du Tableau 1.11 qui figure aux pp. 130 à 132 de l'Étude Lachapelle, op. cit., une maison de sondage met parfois jusqu'à sept jours pour faire les entrevues avec les répondants dans le cadre d'un sondage pancanadien. Ce fait tend à réduire l'exactitude et à l'à-propos de «l'image éclair». Comme je l'ai déjà souligné, la personne qui désire voter stratégiquement ne peut pas le faire de façon utile si l'information requise à cette fin n'est pas examinée minutieusement et discutée afin d'en évaluer la valeur réelle. Les résultats de sondages qui ne peuvent être évalués en temps utile peuvent, dans les faits, avoir pour effet d'empêcher les électeurs d'exercer leur droit de vote de façon effective.

61 As to the effects of the measure on freedom of expression, on the one hand, s. 322.1 precludes the media from publishing polls on the last weekend of the election campaign and on polling day. This ban causes minimal impairment to freedom of expression because of its very short duration and because of the lack of satisfactory alternatives available to tailor the measure to the legislative objective. On the other hand, s. 322.1 has a positive impact on freedom of expression. It promotes debate and truth in political discussion since it gives voters the opportunity to be informed about the existence of misleading factual information. The salutary effects of the measure concerning both the right to vote and freedom of expression

Pour ce qui est des effets de la mesure sur la liberté d'expression, d'une part, l'art. 322.1 empêche les médias de publier des résultats de sondages pendant le dernier week-end de la campagne électorale ainsi que le jour du scrutin. En raison de sa très courte durée et de l'absence de solutions de rechange permettant d'adapter la mesure à l'objectif de la loi, cette interdiction porte atteinte de façon minimale à la liberté d'expression. D'autre part, l'art. 322.1 a un effet positif sur la liberté d'expression. En effet, il favorise l'échange des idées et l'émergence de la vérité dans les discussions politiques puisqu'il permet aux électeurs d'être informés de l'existence de renseignements factuels trompeurs. Les effets bénéfiques qu'a la thus outweigh the deleterious effects caused by the impugned provision.

III. Conclusion

I therefore find that s. 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act does not infringe the right to vote as guaranteed under s. 3 of the Charter and that, while it restricts freedom of expression within the meaning of s. 2(b) of the Charter, it constitutes a reasonable limit demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society under s. 1 of the Charter and hence does not violate the Charter.

IV. Disposition

For the above reasons, I would answer the constitutional questions posed by Lamer C.J. as follows:

1. Does s. 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E-2, as amended, infringe s. 2(b) and/or s. 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Answer: Section 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act does not infringe s. 3 of the Charter but infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter.

2. If s. 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act infringes s. 2(b) and/or s. 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is s. 322.1 a reasonable limit prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society for the purposes of s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Answer: The infringement of s. 2(b) of the Charter by s. 322.1 is a reasonable limit prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society for the purposes of s. 1 of the Charter.

I would therefore dismiss the appeal with costs throughout.

disposition contestée à la fois sur le droit de vote et sur la liberté d'expression l'emportent donc sur ses effets préjudiciables.

III. La conclusion

62 Je conclus donc que l'art. 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada ne porte pas atteinte au droit de vote garanti par l'art. 3 de la Charte et que, même s'il restreint la liberté d'expression garantie à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte, il constitue une limite raisonnable dont la justification peut se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique au sens de l'article premier de la Charte, et que, de ce fait, il ne viole pas celle-ci.

IV. Le dispositif

63 Pour les motifs qui précèdent, je suis d'avis de répondre de la façon suivante aux questions constitutionnelles énoncées par le juge en chef Lamer:

1. L'article 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada, L.R.C. (1985), ch. E-2, et ses modifications, contrevient-il à l'al. 2*b*) ou à l'art. 3 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, ou aux deux à la fois?

Réponse: L'article 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada ne porte pas atteinte à l'art. 3 de la Charte, mais contrevient à l'al. 2*b*) de ce texte.

2. Si l'article 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada contrevient à l'al. 2*b*) ou à l'art. 3 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, ou aux deux à la fois, constitue-t-il une limite raisonnable prescrite par une règle de droit, dont la justification peut se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique, aux fins de l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Réponse: L'atteinte à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte par l'art. 322.1 est une limite raisonnable prescrite par une règle de droit, dont la justification peut se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique, aux fins de l'article premier de la Charte.

64 Je suis donc d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi avec dépens devant toutes les cours.

The judgment of Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, Major and Bastarache JJ. was delivered by 65 BASTARACHE J. — This appeal concerns the constitutional validity of s. 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E-2, which prohibits the broadcasting, publication, or dissemination of opinion survey results in the final days of a federal election campaign. More specifically, the provision is challenged in light of freedom of expression and the right to vote as protected by ss. 2(b) and 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I. Factual Background

66 The appellants Thomson Newspapers Company Limited and Southam Inc. brought an application under rule 14.05(3)(g.1) of the Ontario Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, for the following relief:

> (a) a declaration that s. 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act is of no force and effect in that it violates ss. 2(b) and 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and is not justified under s. 1; and
> (b) a declaration directing that no proceedings may be brought under s. 322.1 pursuant to s. 126 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, or any other statute or law.

67 On May 15, 1995, Somers J. of the Ontario Court (General Division) denied the appellants' application on the basis that the impugned provision, although violating freedom of expression, was nonetheless justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Somers J. found no violation of the right to vote. On August 19, 1996, the Ontario Court of Appeal (Catzman, Carthy and Charron JJ.A.) dismissed the appeal and agreed with Somers J. that the right to vote had not been violated and the infringement of freedom of expression was justified.

Version française du jugement des juges Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, Major et Bastarache rendu par LE JUGE BASTARACHE — Le présent pourvoi porte sur la constitutionnalité de l'art. 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada, L.R.C. (1985), ch. E-2, qui interdit d'annoncer, de publier ou de diffuser les résultats de sondages sur les intentions de vote au cours des derniers jours des campagnes électorales fédérales. Plus précisément, la disposition est contestée sur le fondement de la liberté d'expression et du droit de vote protégés respectivement par l'al. 2*b*) et l'art. 3 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés.

I. Les faits

Les appelantes Thomson Newspapers Company Limited et Southam Inc. ont présenté, en application de l'al. 14.05(3)g.1) des Règles de procédure civile de l'Ontario, R.R.O. 1990, Règl. 194, une requête sollicitant les mesures de redressement suivantes:

> a) une déclaration portant que l'art. 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada est inopérant parce qu'il viole l'al. 2*b*) et l'art. 3 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et qu'il n'est pas justifié au sens de l'article premier;
> b) une déclaration portant qu'aucune procédure pour contravention à l'art. 322.1 ne peut être engagée sur le fondement de l'art. 126 du Code criminel, L.R.C. (1985), ch. C-46, ou de toute autre loi ou règle de droit.

Le 15 mai 1995, le juge Somers de la Cour de l'Ontario (Division générale) a rejeté la requête des appelantes pour le motif que, même si la disposition contestée portait atteinte à la liberté d'expression, elle était néanmoins justifiée au sens de l'article premier de la Charte. Il a conclu à l'absence de violation du droit de vote. Le 19 août 1996, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario (les juges Catzman, Carthy et Charron) a rejeté l'appel et statué, à l'instar du juge Somers, que le droit de vote n'avait pas été violé et que l'atteinte à la liberté d'expression était justifiée.

III. Judicial History

A. Ontario Court (General Division) (1995), 24 O.R. (3d) 109

69 In the course of a survey of the social science evidence concerning the nature of opinion polls, Somers J. found that they have a recognized impact on the electoral choice of individual voters. Although the precise extent of this impact was difficult to characterize, he also found that there was widespread concern amongst experts, the public and participants in the electoral process about the effect of opinion polls. This concern related to the influence of polls generally, as well as to the potential influence of inaccurate polls published late in an election campaign. Somers J. observed that there was disagreement in the evidence about the overall effect of polls on elections and that no consensus existed in favour of the ban imposed by s. 322.1. He considered the polling ban to be part of a wider package of restrictions in the Canada Elections Act whose general purpose was to ensure fair elections.

70 With respect to the scope of s. 322.1, Somers J. concluded that the polling ban does not cover internal communications between clients and pollsters, but is directed at the dissemination of poll results to the electorate. He also excluded from the scope of s. 322.1 "hamburger polls", namely marketing ploys used to sell consumer goods which are matched with political parties or candidates. In Somers J.'s view, these polls are clearly not statistical representations of opinion in general, and therefore, do not qualify as "opinion surveys". Finally, Somers J. considered whether s. 322.1 prohibits discussion of all poll results including results that were published prior to the commencement of the ban. He concluded, at p. 132, that it d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement maximal de deux ans.

III. L'historique des procédures

A. Cour de l'Ontario (Division générale) (1995), 24 O.R. (3d) 109

Au cours de l'examen de la preuve fondée sur les sciences sociales concernant la nature des sondages d'opinion, le juge Somers a conclu que ceux-ci ont un effet reconnu sur les choix électoraux des individus. Même si l'étendue précise de cet effet était difficile à quantifier, il a également conclu à l'existence d'une préoccupation répandue au sein des experts, du public en général et des participants au processus électoral quant à l'effet des sondages d'opinion. Cette préoccupation concernait l'influence des sondages de façon générale ainsi que l'influence potentielle de sondages inexacts publiés tard dans les campagnes électorales. Le juge Somers a souligné que la preuve révélait l'existence d'un désaccord relativement à l'effet général des sondages sur les élections, et qu'il ne se dégageait aucun consensus en faveur de l'interdiction prévue à l'art. 322.1. Il a estimé que les restrictions touchant les sondages font partie d'un ensemble plus vaste de restrictions établies par la Loi électorale du Canada et dont l'objectif général est d'assurer l'équité du processus électoral.

Au sujet du champ d'application de l'art. 322.1, le juge Somers a conclu que l'interdiction frappant la publication des résultats des sondages ne vise pas les communications internes entre clients et sondeurs, mais plutôt la diffusion à l'électorat des résultats de ces sondages. Il a également exclu du champ d'application de l'art. 322.1 les [TRADUCTION] «votes au hamburger» («hamburger polls»), c'est-à-dire des trucs de marketing qui sont utilisés pour vendre des biens de consommation en les associant à des partis politiques ou à des candidats. De l'avis du juge Somers, ces enquêtes ne donnent manifestement pas une représentation statistique de l'opinion des électeurs en général et, de ce fait, ne peuvent pas être assimilées à des «sondages». Enfin, le juge Somers s'est demandé si l'art. 322.1 interdit l'analyse des résultats de tous les sondages, would be absurd to prohibit discussion of these earlier polls:

> One of the purposes of the legislation is to provide a response time to those who consider themselves victims of misleading polls. One of the most effective ways of responding is to refer to previous polls and show how the new poll is inconsistent with or less accurate than earlier polls. If such discussion of earlier polls is barred then the right to full response contemplated by Parliament is seriously weakened.

On the constitutional issues, Somers J. found, as the respondent conceded, that s. 322.1 infringed s. 2(b) of the Charter. Moreover, with regard to the type of expression at stake, Somers J. stated, at p. 135, that "even if polling is not, properly speaking, the political or partisan expression that is deemed most deserving of protection, it is by its very subject matter close to the core of s. 2(b)". The right to vote contained in s. 3 of the Charter was found not to have been infringed. Somers J. wrote, at p. 137:

> While the right to information gives substance to the right to vote, it remains ancillary to it. This means that under s. 3, the constitutional question is not directly whether the "right to information" was breached but whether a restriction placed on information has diminished or undermined the right to vote in a genuine election.

On the facts of this case, Somers J. concluded that the 72-hour polling ban was sufficiently short that it did not vitiate or truly undermine strategic voting based on poll results.

Somers J. found that s. 322.1 is a justifiable limit on freedom of expression under s. 1 of the Charter. He observed, at p. 142, that "even if y compris ceux publiés avant le début de la période d'interdiction. Concluant, à la p. 132, qu'il serait absurde d'interdire l'analyse de sondages déjà réalisés, il a dit ceci:

> [TRADUCTION] L'un des objectifs de la loi est d'accorder un temps de réplique aux personnes qui s'estiment victimes de sondages trompeurs. L'un des moyens de réplique les plus efficaces est de faire état de sondages antérieurs et de montrer en quoi le nouveau sondage est incompatible avec les précédents ou moins précis qu'eux. Si l'analyse des sondages antérieurs est interdite, alors le droit de réplique envisagé par le législateur est sérieusement affaibli.

71 En ce qui concerne les questions constitutionnelles, le juge Somers a statué — tout comme a concédé l'intimé — que l'art. 322.1 portait atteinte à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte. En outre, pour ce qui est du type d'expression en cause, le juge Somers a déclaré, à la p. 135 que, [TRADUCTION] «même si le sondage n'est pas, à strictement parler, la forme d'expression politique ou partisane considérée la plus digne de protection, cette activité est néanmoins, de par son objet même, étroitement rattachée aux valeurs fondamentales protégées à l'al. 2*b*)». Il a été jugé que le droit de vote prévu à l'art. 3 de la Charte n'avait pas été violé. Le juge Somers a dit ce qui suit, à la p. 137:

> [TRADUCTION] Même si le droit à l'information donne corps au droit de vote, il lui demeure néanmoins accessoire. Cela signifie que la question constitutionnelle que soulève l'art. 3 ne consiste pas directement à se demander si le «droit à l'information» a été violé, mais plutôt si la restriction de l'information a eu pour effet de limiter ou de compromettre le droit de voter dans une élection honnête.

À la lumière des faits de l'espèce, le juge Somers a conclu que la période de 72 heures pendant laquelle il est interdit de publier les résultats des sondages n'est pas assez longue pour gêner ou véritablement compromettre l'exercice du vote stratégique sur la foi des résultats en question.

72 Le juge Somers a statué que l'art. 322.1 est une limite justifiable apportée à la liberté d'expression au sens de l'article premier de la Charte. Il a sou-social science evidence is found to be inconclusive, it is still possible to ground a pressing objective on evidence of extended public debate of an issue or by looking at the actions of other democracies". The widespread concern about the effects of polls and the presence of polling bans in other democratic countries was, in Somers J.'s view, strong evidence of a pressing objective. A rational connection between the publication of polls and harm to the electoral process was also found. Parliament was said to have a "reasoned apprehension of harm" in the present case, following the test applied in R. v. Butler, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 452. In Somers J.'s opinion, this apprehension of harm was based on: (a) the sheer prevalence of poll results; (b) the public's awareness of poll results; (c) the failure to publish methodological information along with poll results; and (d) the potentially undue impact of polls published late in an election campaign. Further, Somers J. found that s. 322.1 minimally impairs freedom of expression and that alternative means — such as the mandatory publication of methodological information or measures designed to deter false polls — would be less effective. He added that these alternative measures would fail to adequately further one of Parliament's objectives: to give the voter a period of rest and reflection prior to the vote. Finally, Somers J. indicated that the present case is similar to the situation in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, where Parliament had to balance the claims of competing groups and evaluate uncertain social science evidence. In Somers J.'s view, Parliament should be accorded a wide margin of flexibility in legislating in this area. The application was therefore dismissed with costs.

ligné, à la p. 142, que [TRADUCTION] «même si la preuve fondée sur les sciences sociales est jugée non concluante, il demeure possible d'étayer l'existence d'un objectif urgent en prouvant qu'une question fait l'objet d'un large débat public ou en examinant les mesures prises dans d'autres démocraties». L'existence d'une préoccupation répandue en ce qui concerne les effets des sondages ainsi que les interdictions de publication frappant ceux-ci dans d'autres pays démocratiques constituait, de l'avis du juge Somers, une preuve solide de l'existence d'un objectif urgent. Il a aussi conclu à l'existence d'un lien rationnel entre la publication des sondages et un préjudice causé au processus électoral. Il a affirmé que le législateur fédéral avait, dans le présent cas, une «appréhension raisonnée du préjudice», suivant le critère appliqué dans R. c. Butler, [1992] 1 R.C.S. 452. De l'avis du juge Somers, cette appréhension se fondait sur les éléments suivants: a) le simple fait de l'omniprésence des sondages; b) la connaissance par le public des résultats de ces sondages; c) l'omission de publier avec les sondages de l'information sur la méthodologie utilisée; d) l'effet potentiellement indu de la publication de sondages tard dans les campagnes électorales. En outre, le juge Somers a conclu que l'art. 322.1 constitue une atteinte minimale à la liberté d'expression et que les solutions de rechange proposées — par exemple la publication obligatoire de données sur la méthodologie utilisée ou des mesures visant à dissuader la publication de faux sondages — seraient moins efficaces. Il a précisé que ces solutions de rechange ne permettraient pas de favoriser adéquatement un des objectifs poursuivis par le législateur, savoir celui d'accorder aux électeurs une période de répit et de réflexion avant la tenue du scrutin. Enfin, le juge Somers a indiqué que le présent cas était assimilable à la situation en cause dans l'affaire Irwin Toy Ltd. c. Québec (Procureur général), [1989] 1 R.C.S. 927, où le législateur devait soupeser les droits de groupes ayant des intérêts opposés et évaluer des éléments de preuve incertains fondés sur les sciences sociales. Le juge Somers a dit être d'avis qu'il faut accorder au législateur une grande marge de manœuvre afin de légiférer sur ce domaine. La requête a donc été rejetée avec dépens.

B. Ontario Court of Appeal (1996), 30 O.R. (3d) 350

The Court of Appeal disagreed with Somers J. regarding the ambit of s. 322.1. It held that the phrase "opinion surveys" should be read broadly to include not only scientific surveys, but also phone-in or mail-in polls, and even less scientific methods of gathering information, such as exit and "hamburger" polls. The Court of Appeal also disagreed with Somers J.'s conclusion that the prohibition in s. 322.1 is limited to new survey results. In the Court of Appeal's view, s. 322.1 applies to publication or discussion of all opinion survey results, whether in the public domain prior to the commencement of the ban or not. There was agreement, however, with Somers J.'s view that internal or private communications are not caught by s. 322.1.

On the constitutional issues, the Court of Appeal was in substantial agreement with the analysis of Somers J. As to the character of the harm addressed by the publication ban, the Court of Appeal described the purpose somewhat more narrowly, at p. 353:

There is, however, no empirical evidence as to the extent or nature of the influence of opinion polls upon the voter, nor can it be said with certainty that the impact of opinion polls is undue. The real concern is that when opinion surveys are published as bare results, without methodological information, they have the potential to be deceiving, and even with such information they may require a response to explain their true significance.

The court found, at p. 359:

It is surely a substantial and pressing objective to respond to widespread perceptions that opinion surveys can be distorting and that response time is needed to avoid that danger, all in aid of creating a level playing

B. Cour d'appel de l'Ontario (1997), 30 O.R. (3d) 350

73 La Cour d'appel a exprimé son désaccord avec le juge Somers relativement au champ d'application de l'art. 322.1. Elle a statué qu'il faut interpréter de manière large l'expression «sondages» et considérer qu'elle vise non seulement les sondages scientifiques, mais aussi les sondages téléphoniques ou postaux, et même les méthodes de cueillette d'information encore moins scientifiques, tels les sondages effectués à la sortie des bureaux de scrutin et les «votes au hamburger». La Cour d'appel a également exprimé son désaccord avec la conclusion du juge Somers selon laquelle l'interdiction prévue à l'art. 322.1 se limite aux résultats de nouveaux sondages. De l'avis de la Cour d'appel, cette disposition s'applique aux résultats de tous les sondages, qu'ils soient ou non dans le domaine public avant l'entrée en vigueur de l'interdiction. Elle a toutefois souscrit à l'opinion du juge Somers que les communications internes ou privées échappent à l'application de l'art. 322.1.

74 Pour ce qui est des questions constitutionnelles, la Cour d'appel a été d'accord dans l'ensemble avec l'analyse du juge Somers. Quant à la nature du préjudice visé par l'interdiction de publication, la Cour d'appel a décrit l'objet de cette mesure de façon relativement plus étroite, à la p. 353:

[TRADUCTION] Il n'existe cependant aucune preuve empirique concernant l'étendue ou la nature de l'influence qu'exercent sur les électeurs les sondages d'opinion, et il n'est pas non plus possible d'affirmer avec certitude que ces sondages ont un effet indu. La véritable inquiétude est le fait que, lorsque les sondages publiés ne font état que des résultats bruts, sans aucune donnée sur la méthodologie utilisée, ils peuvent induire en erreur, et que même lorsque de telles données sont fournies, une réplique peut être nécessaire pour expliquer leur sens véritable.

75 La Cour d'appel a tiré la conclusion suivante, à la p. 359:

[TRADUCTION] Constitue certes un objectif urgent et réel le fait de tenir compte de la perception répandue que les sondages d'opinion peuvent déformer la réalité et qu'un temps de réplique est nécessaire pour parer à ce danger, field at that critical point in the electoral process when the candidates are about to be selected.

76 The Court of Appeal also agreed with Somers J. that the ban on opinion survey results does not violate the right to vote under s. 3 of the Charter. The court held, at p. 358:

> We accept that, as a general principle, the right to cast an informed ballot carries with it the right to information necessary to permit electors to vote rationally and in an informed manner. . . . The right to cast an informed ballot does not, in our view, elevate the provision of a snapshot of the mood of the electorate at a particular time to the level of a constitutional entitlement during the last three days of an election campaign.

77 The Court of Appeal found the infringement of the freedom of expression to be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. The court stated, at p. 360:

> There was serious controversy on a social scientific subject as to the effect of polls upon the electorate, combined with the manifest fact that the publication of bare results does not tell the whole story and thus may well be misleading. This constitutes a reasonable apprehension of harm and the rational connection is then further exhibited by directing the legislation to the final three days of the election.

Even the broader interpretation of s. 322.1 favoured by the Court of Appeal was found to pass the minimal impairment analysis. In the result, the appeal was dismissed with costs.

IV. Issues

78 The following constitutional questions were stated by the Chief Justice on March 27, 1997:

1. Does s. 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E-2, as amended, infringe s. 2(b) and/or s. 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

2. If s. 322.1 of the Canada Elections Act infringes s. 2(b) and/or s. 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is s. 322.1 a reasonable limit pre-tout cela afin de favoriser l'égalité des chances à cette étape cruciale du processus électoral où on est sur le point de choisir parmi les divers candidats.

La Cour d'appel a également convenu avec le juge Somers que l'interdiction frappant les résultats de sondages ne viole pas le droit de vote conféré par l'art. 3 de la Charte. Elle a statué ainsi, à la p. 358:

> [TRADUCTION] Nous acceptons, en tant que principe général, que le droit des électeurs de voter de façon éclairée emporte celui d'obtenir l'information nécessaire pour leur permettre de le faire de manière rationnelle et éclairée. [. . .] Selon nous, le droit de voter de façon éclairée n'a pas pour effet d'ériger en garantie constitutionnelle la fourniture, au cours des trois derniers jours d'une campagne électorale, d'une image ponctuelle de l'humeur de l'électorat à un moment particulier.

La Cour d'appel a conclu que la violation de la liberté d'expression était justifiée au sens de l'article premier de la Charte. Elle a déclaré ce qui suit, à la p. 360:

> [TRADUCTION] Il existait une sérieuse controverse sur un sujet touchant les sciences sociales, soit l'effet des sondages sur l'électorat, conjuguée au fait manifeste que la publication de données brutes ne brosse pas un tableau complet de la situation et peut donc fort bien induire en erreur. Cela constitue une appréhension raisonnable de préjudice, et l'existence d'un lien rationnel ressort en outre du fait que la disposition vise les trois derniers jours de la campagne électorale.

Même l'interprétation plus large de l'art. 322.1 favorisée par la Cour d'appel a été jugée acceptable suivant l'analyse de l'atteinte minimale. En conséquence l'appel a été rejeté avec dépens.

IV. Les questions en litige

Les questions constitutionnelles suivantes ont été énoncées par le Juge en chef le 27 mars 1997:

1. L'article 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada, L.R.C. (1985), ch. E-2, et ses modifications, contrevient-il à l'al. 2*b*) ou à l'art. 3 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, ou aux deux à la fois?

2. Si l'article 322.1 de la Loi électorale du Canada contrevient à l'al. 2*b*) ou à l'art. 3 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, ou aux deux à la fois, scribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society for the purposes of s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

constitue-t-il une limite raisonnable prescrite par une règle de droit, dont la justification peut se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique, aux fins de l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

V. The Right to Vote

I find it necessary, at the outset of my analysis on the right to vote, to distinguish between the two Charter rights at issue in the present case. It is significant, for instance, that s. 3 of the Charter, which guarantees the citizen's right to vote, is not subject to override under s. 33 of the Charter. This means that a statutory provision which violates s. 3, and is not saved by s. 1, cannot be insulated from Charter review by Parliament or a provincial legislature. By contrast, s. 2(b) of the Charter, which protects free expression, is subject to override under s. 33. Even though the override power is rarely invoked, the fact that s. 3 is immune from such power clearly places it at the heart of our constitutional democracy.

V. Le droit de vote

79 J'estime nécessaire, en commençant l'analyse du droit de vote, d'établir une distinction entre les deux droits garantis par la Charte qui sont en jeu dans le présent cas. Par exemple, il est significatif que l'art. 3 de la Charte, qui garantit le droit de vote des citoyens, ne puisse faire l'objet d'une dérogation fondée sur l'art. 33 de la Charte. Il s'ensuit que ni le Parlement ni les législatures provinciales ne peuvent soustraire à un examen fondé sur la Charte une disposition législative qui viole l'art. 3 et dont la validité n'est pas sauvegardée par l'article premier. À l'opposé, il est possible, en vertu de l'art. 33, de déroger à l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte, qui garantit la liberté d'expression. Même si ce pouvoir de dérogation est rarement invoqué, le fait que l'art. 3 soit soustrait à son application fait clairement de cette disposition un des éléments centraux de notre démocratie constitutionnelle.

Moreover, in cases where freedom of expression and the right to vote may overlap or come into conflict, it is necessary to find an appropriate balance between both sets of rights. Support for this conclusion may be found in Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835. In that decision, this Court considered the balance to be achieved between the right to a fair trial and freedom of expression, in the context of publication bans. Lamer C.J. wrote for the majority, at p. 877:

80 Qui plus est, dans les cas où il y a soit chevauchement de la liberté d'expression et du droit de vote soit conflit entre ces droits, il est nécessaire d'établir un équilibre approprié entre ces deux catégories de droits. Cette conclusion trouve appui dans Dagenais c. Société Radio-Canada, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 835. Dans cet arrêt, notre Cour s'est interrogée, dans le contexte d'interdictions de publication, sur l'équilibre qui doit être établi entre le droit à un procès équitable et la liberté d'expression. Le juge en chef Lamer a dit ceci, au nom de la majorité, à la p. 877:

A hierarchical approach to rights, which places some over others, must be avoided, both when interpreting the Charter and when developing the common law. When the protected rights of two individuals come into conflict, as can occur in the case of publication bans, Charter principles require a balance to be achieved that fully respects the importance of both sets of rights.

Il faut se garder d'adopter une conception hiérarchique qui donne préséance à certains droits au détriment d'autres droits, tant dans l'interprétation de la Charte que dans l'élaboration de la common law. Lorsque les droits de deux individus sont en conflit, comme cela peut se produire dans le cas d'une interdiction de publication, les principes de la Charte commandent un équilibre qui respecte pleinement l'importance des deux catégories de droits.

In my view, these comments are equally applicable where the right to vote overlaps with the right to free expression. Each right is distinct and must be given effect.

81 It is noteworthy, as well, that the scope of s. 2(b), unlike the scope of s. 3, has been well canvassed by this Court. Most recently, the broad interpretation of the scope of s. 2(b) was affirmed in Libman v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 569. There, the Court wrote, at para. 31: "Unless the expression is communicated in a manner that excludes the protection, such as violence, the Court recognizes that any activity or communication that conveys or attempts to convey meaning is covered by the guarantee of s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter".

82 Turning to s. 3, this Court has only dealt with the scope of the right to vote in limited contexts, namely electoral boundaries, the disqualification of inmates from voting, and voting in a referendum; see Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158; Sauvé v. Canada (Attorney General), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 438; and Haig v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995. This Court has not addressed the scope of s. 3 in the context of access to information during an election. In my view, it is not necessary to decide on the informational content of s. 3 in the context of this case. The purpose of s. 3 was stated clearly by McLachlin J. in Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), supra, at p. 183, as the "right to 'effective representation'"; see also Haig, supra, at p. 1031. Accordingly, to constitute an infringement of the right to vote, a restriction on information would have to undermine the guarantee of effective representation.

83 This position accords with the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights and the European Commission of Human Rights. Article 3 of the First Protocol to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundа-

À mon avis, ces observations sont également applicables en cas de chevauchement du droit de vote et du droit à la liberté d'expression. Chacun de ces droits est un droit distinct et il faut lui donner effet.

De plus, il convient de signaler que le champ d'application de l'al. 2*b*), contrairement à celui de l'art. 3, a été examiné de manière approfondie par notre Cour. Tout récemment, l'interprétation large du champ d'application de l'al. 2*b*) a été confirmée dans Libman c. Québec (Procureur général), [1997] 3 R.C.S. 569. Notre Cour y a dit ceci, au par. 31: «À moins que l'expression ne soit communiquée d'une manière qui exclut la protection, telle la violence, la Cour reconnaît que toute activité ou communication qui transmet ou tente de transmettre un message est comprise dans la garantie de l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte canadienne».

En ce qui concerne l'art. 3, la Cour ne s'est penchée sur la portée du droit de vote que dans des contextes limités, c'est-à-dire les circonscriptions électorales, l'inhabilité des détenus à voter et l'exercice du droit de vote dans le cadre d'un référendum; voir Renvoi relatif aux circonscriptions électorales provinciales (Sask.), [1991] 2 R.C.S. 158; Sauvé c. Canada (Procureur général), [1993] 2 R.C.S. 438; et Haig c. Canada, [1993] 2 R.C.S. 995. Notre Cour n'a pas été appelée à examiner le champ d'application de l'art. 3 dans le contexte de l'accès à l'information pendant une campagne électorale. À mon avis, il n'est pas nécessaire, dans le cadre du présent pourvoi, de statuer sur l'aspect informationnel de l'art. 3. Dans le Renvoi relatif aux circonscriptions électorales provinciales (Sask.), précité, à la p. 183, le juge McLachlin a clairement énoncé l'objet de cette disposition comme étant le «droit à une "représentation effective"»; voir également l'arrêt Haig, précité, à la p. 1031. Par conséquent, pour qu'il y ait violation du droit de vote, la limitation de l'information doit compromettre la garantie d'une représentation effective.

Ce point de vue est compatible avec la jurisprudence de la Cour européenne des droits de l'homme et celle de la Commission européenne des droits de l'homme. Aux termes de l'art. 3 du Premier protocole à la Convention de sauvegarde mental Freedoms, March 20, 1952, Europ. T.S. No. 9, provides that parties to the Convention "undertake to hold free elections at reasonable intervals by secret ballot, under conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature". The European Court has held that this provision guarantees the right to vote; see Eur. Court H.R., Mathieu-Mohin and Clerfayt case, judgment of 2 March 1987, Series A No. 113. However, neither the European Court nor the European Commission has equated the right to vote with a right to information per se. Rather, in Mathieu-Mohin and Clerfayt, supra, the European Court equated the right to vote with the right to participate in the electoral process. This same principle was applied by the European Commission in Bowman v. United Kingdom (1996), 22 E.H.R.R. C.D. 13. In that case, the Commission considered legislation that restricted "single-issue" campaigning by individuals other than the electoral candidates. The applicant, who had been charged for distributing leaflets outlining the views of three electoral candidates on abortion, complained that her right to free expression had been violated. The Commission agreed and held that there was an unjustified violation of freedom of expression. With regard to the applicant's right to vote, the Commission wrote, at p. CD18:

> The Commission has had regard to whether the expression of opinion or information on "single issues" addressed by individuals or groups with strongly-held views may operate in particular constituencies so as to "distort" election results. It has previously considered in the context of Article 3 of the First Protocol . . . that one of the legitimate objectives of national electoral systems is to channel currents of thought so as to promote the emergence of a sufficiently clear and coherent political will. . . . The Government has not, however, produced any argument to the effect that "single issue" campaigning of the kind illustrated in the applicant's case would distract voters from the political platforms which are the basis of national party campaigns to such a degree as would hinder the electoral process. [Emphasis added.]

des droits de l'homme et des libertés fondamentales, 20 mars 1952, S.T. Europ. nº 9, les parties à la Convention «s'engagent à organiser, à des intervalles raisonnables, des élections libres au scrutin secret, dans les conditions qui assurent la libre expression de l'opinion du peuple sur le choix du corps législatif». La Cour européenne a statué que cette disposition garantissait le droit de vote; voir Cour eur. D.H., affaire Mathieu-Mohin et Clerfayt, arrêt du 2 mars 1987, série A nº 113. Cependant, ni la Cour européenne ni la Commission européenne n'ont assimilé le droit de vote au droit à l'information en soi. Au contraire, dans l'affaire Mathieu-Mohin et Clerfayt, précitée, la Cour européenne a assimilé le droit de vote au droit de participer au processus électoral. Le même principe a été appliqué par la Commission européenne dans la décision Bowman c. United Kingdom (1996), 22 E.H.R.R. C.D. 13. Dans cette affaire, la Commission a examiné une mesure législative qui limitait le droit des individus qui n'étaient pas candidats aux élections de faire campagne sur une «question unique». La demanderesse, qui avait été accusée d'avoir distribué des feuillets exposant la position de trois candidats sur la question de l'avortement, a prétendu que son droit à la liberté d'expression avait été violé. La Commission lui a donné raison et a conclu qu'il y avait eu atteinte injustifiée à la liberté d'expression. Voici ce qu'elle a dit au sujet du droit de vote de la demanderesse, à la p. CD18:

> [TRADUCTION] La Commission s'est demandé si le fait que des particuliers ou des groupes aux idées bien arrêtées expriment une opinion ou donnent de l'information sur une «question unique» peut avoir pour effet de «fausser» le résultat du scrutin dans certaines circonscriptions. La Commission a déjà jugé, dans le contexte de l'article 3 du Premier protocole, [. . .] qu'un des objectifs légitimes d'un système électoral national est de canaliser les courants de pensée de façon à promouvoir l'émergence d'une volonté politique suffisamment claire et cohérente [. . .] Le gouvernement n'a cependant pas présenté d'arguments établissant que le fait de faire campagne sur une «question unique», campagne du genre de celle menée par la demanderesse, est de nature à distraire les électeurs des programmes électoraux sur lesquels sont fondées les campagnes des partis nationaux au point d'entraver le processus électoral. [Je souligne.]

84 In the present instance, it was argued that the partial ban on election polls hinders the electoral process because some of the voters are deprived of information relevant to the exercise of their right to vote. The Court of Appeal considered, at p. 358, that s. 3 only guarantees access to information "necessary to permit electors to vote rationally and in an informed manner", and that poll results did not fall into that category. My conclusion that s. 322.1 is an unjustified limit on free expression makes it unnecessary to deal with this issue. I prefer to leave the issue aside mostly because the evidence with regard to the relationship between the kind of information banned and the integrity of the election process is too sparse.

Dans la présente affaire, on a prétendu que l'interdiction partielle de publier les résultats de sondages sur les intentions de vote constitue une entrave au processus électoral, car certains électeurs sont privés d'information pertinente à l'exercice de leur droit de vote. La Cour d'appel a conclu, à la p. 358, que l'art. 3 ne garantit l'accès qu'à l'information [TRADUCTION] «nécessaire pour [. . .] permettre [aux électeurs] de [voter] d'une manière rationnelle et éclairée» et que cette information n'inclut pas les résultats des sondages. Ma conclusion selon laquelle l'art. 322.1 constitue une limite injustifiée de la liberté d'expression rend inutile l'examen de cette question. Je préfère la laisser de côté, principalement parce que la preuve relative au lien existant entre le type d'information visé par l'interdiction et l'intégrité du processus électoral est trop limitée.

VI. Freedom of Expression

VI. La liberté d'expression

A. Section 2(b) of the Charter

A. L'alinéa 2b) de la Charte

85 Before this Court, the respondent conceded, as it did in the courts below, that there was a prima facie infringement of freedom of expression. This concession was well-founded. Section 322.1 clearly infringes on the guarantee in s. 2(b) of the Charter, in accordance with the test set out in Irwin Toy, supra. First, there can be no doubt that the publication of polling information, and more specifically opinion survey results, is an activity that conveys meaning and, therefore, falls within the ambit of s. 2(b). Second, s. 322.1 restricts freedom of expression by prohibiting the broadcasting, publication or dissemination of opinion survey results during the final three days of an election campaign. The freedom of expression is clearly infringed by this ban.

L'intimé a reconnu, tant devant notre Cour que devant les juridictions inférieures, qu'il y avait atteinte prima facie à la liberté d'expression. Cette concession était bien fondée. En effet, l'art. 322.1 porte manifestement atteinte à la garantie prévue par l'al. 2*b*) de la Charte, selon le critère dégagé dans l'arrêt Irwin Toy, précité. Premièrement, il ne fait aucun doute que la publication d'information touchant les sondages, et plus précisément les résultats de ceux-ci, est une activité qui transmet un message et qui, par conséquent, entre dans le champ d'application de l'al. 2*b*). Deuxièmement, l'art. 322.1 limite la liberté d'expression en interdisant d'annoncer, de publier ou de diffuser les résultats de sondages sur les intentions de vote au cours des trois derniers jours de la campagne électorale. La liberté d'expression est nettement violée par cette interdiction

86 Before turning to the justification analysis under s. 1 of the Charter, I pause to note that, in addition to polling, there are various other activities subject to restriction during a federal election. These restrictions, as set out in the Canada Elections Act, include limits on spending and controls on advertising. In my view, it is impossible to make any

Avant de passer à l'analyse de la justification conformément à l'article premier de la Charte, je tiens à signaler que, outre les sondages, diverses autres activités font l'objet de restrictions au cours des campagnes électorales fédérales. Ces restrictions, prévues par la Loi électorale du Canada, sont notamment les limites visant les dépenses et generalizations regarding the scope or constitutional validity of these provisions. Each type of restriction, including s. 322.1, must be considered in its own context. Although Somers J. noted that the partial ban on polling is part of a larger package of restrictions, there is no justification for finding that all restrictions must be considered globally. Each restriction is adopted to address a particular set of circumstances and it is in that light that each one must be analysed.

les mesures de contrôle visant la publicité. Il est selon moi impossible de généraliser en ce qui concerne le champ d'application ou la validité constitutionnelle de ces dispositions. Chaque restriction, y compris celle prévue à l'art. 322.1, doit être examinée suivant le contexte qui lui est propre. Même si le juge Somers a souligné que l'interdiction partielle visant les sondages s'inscrit dans un ensemble plus vaste de restrictions, rien ne justifie de conclure que toutes les restrictions doivent être considérées globalement. Chacune vise une situation particulière et c'est sous cet éclairage qu'elle doit être analysée.

B. Justification Under Section 1 of the Charter

B. La justification conformément à l'article premier de la Charte

1. Contextual Factors

1. Les facteurs contextuels

The analysis under s. 1 of the Charter must be undertaken with a close attention to context. This is inevitable as the test devised in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, requires a court to establish the objective of the impugned provision, which can only be accomplished by canvassing the nature of the social problem which it addresses. Similarly, the proportionality of the means used to fulfil the pressing and substantial objective can only be evaluated through a close attention to detail and factual setting. In essence, context is the indispensable handmaiden to the proper characterization of the objective of the impugned provision, to determining whether that objective is justified, and to weighing whether the means used are sufficiently closely related to the valid objective so as to justify an infringement of a Charter right.

87 L'analyse fondée sur l'article premier doit être réalisée en accordant une grande attention au contexte. Cette démarche est incontournable car le critère élaboré dans R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103, exige du tribunal qu'il dégage l'objectif de la disposition contestée, ce qu'il ne peut faire que par un examen approfondi de la nature du problème social en cause. De même, la proportionnalité des moyens utilisés pour réaliser l'objectif urgent et réel visé ne peut être évaluée qu'en s'attachant étroitement au détail et au contexte factuel. Essentiellement, le contexte est l'indispensable support qui permet de bien qualifier l'objectif de la disposition attaquée, de décider si cet objectif est justifié et d'apprécier si les moyens utilisés ont un lien suffisant avec l'objectif valide pour justifier une atteinte à un droit garanti par la Charte.

Characterizing the context of the impugned provision is also important in order to determine the type of proof which a court can demand of the legislator to justify its measures under s. 1. This question is suitably addressed at the outset because it affects the entirety of the s. 1 analysis, and because of the nature of the evidence in this case. In discussing whether a ban on advertising aimed at children minimally impaired the freedom of 88 Il importe également de qualifier le contexte de la disposition contestée pour déterminer le type de preuve que le tribunal peut demander au législateur d'apporter pour justifier ses mesures au regard de l'article premier. Il convient de régler cette question dès le départ, d'une part parce qu'elle a une incidence sur l'ensemble de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier, et, d'autre part, en raison de la nature de la preuve dans le cas qui nous occupe. Examinant la question de savoir si l'interdiction visant la publicité destinée aux enfants portait le moins possible atteinte à la liberté d'expression, le expression, Dickson C.J. and Lamer and Wilson JJ. observed in Irwin Toy, supra, at pp. 993-94:

> When striking a balance between the claims of competing groups, the choice of means, like the choice of ends, frequently will require an assessment of conflicting scientific evidence and differing justified demands on scarce resources. . . . Thus, as courts review the results of the legislature's deliberations, particularly with respect to the protection of vulnerable groups, they must be mindful of the legislature's representative function. . . .
>
> In other cases, however, rather than mediating between different groups, the government is best characterized as the singular antagonist of the individual whose right has been infringed. . . .
>
> In the instant case, the Court is called upon to assess competing social science evidence respecting the appropriate means for addressing the problem of children's advertising. The question is whether the government had a reasonable basis, on the evidence tendered, for concluding that the ban on all advertising directed at children impaired freedom of expression as little as possible given the government's pressing and substantial objective. [Emphasis added.]

In Butler, supra, Sopinka J. found the social science evidence relating pornography to violence or other harms directed at women by men to be inconclusive. Nonetheless, he found that there was a rational connection between the impugned provision and the measures adopted by the legislature (at pp. 502 and 504):

> While a direct link between obscenity and harm to society may be difficult, if not impossible, to establish, it is reasonable to presume that exposure to images bears a causal relationship to changes in attitudes and beliefs.
> . . .
>
> I am in agreement with . . . the view that Parliament was entitled to have a "reasoned apprehension of harm" resulting from the desensitization of individuals exposed to materials which depict violence, cruelty, and dehumanization in sexual relations. [Emphasis added.]

juge en chef Dickson a fait les observations suivantes dans Irwin Toy, précité, aux pp. 993 et 994:

> Pour trouver le point d'équilibre entre des groupes concurrents, le choix des moyens, comme celui des fins, exige souvent l'évaluation de preuves scientifiques contradictoires et de demandes légitimes mais contraires quant à la répartition de ressources limitées. [. . .] Ainsi, lorsque les tribunaux sont appelés à contrôler les résultats des délibérations du législateur, surtout en matière de protection de groupes vulnérables, ils doivent garder à l'esprit la fonction représentative du pouvoir législatif . . .
>
> Il arrive parfois qu'au lieu d'arbitrer entre des groupes différents, le gouvernement devienne plutôt ce qu'on pourrait appeler l'adversaire singulier de l'individu dont le droit a été violé . . .
> En l'espèce, la Cour est appelée à évaluer des preuves contradictoires, qui relèvent des sciences humaines, quant aux moyens appropriés de faire face au problème de la publicité destinée aux enfants. La question est de savoir si le gouvernement était raisonnablement fondé, compte tenu de la preuve offerte, à conclure qu'interdire toute publicité destinée aux enfants portait le moins possible atteinte à la liberté d'expression étant donné l'objectif urgent et réel que visait le gouvernement. [Je souligne.]

Dans Butler, précité, le juge Sopinka a déclaré non concluante la preuve fondée sur les sciences sociales qui faisait un lien entre la pornographie et la violence et d'autres torts faits aux femmes par les hommes. Néanmoins, il a conclu à l'existence d'un lien rationnel entre la disposition attaquée et les mesures adoptées par le législateur (aux pp. 502 et 504):

> Bien qu'il puisse être difficile, voire impossible, d'établir l'existence d'un lien direct entre l'obscénité et le préjudice causé à la société, il est raisonnable de supposer qu'il existe un lien causal entre le fait d'être exposé à des images et les changements d'attitude et de croyance.
> . . .
> Je suis d'accord avec [. . .] [l']avis que le Parlement avait le droit d'avoir [TRADUCTION] «une appréhension raisonnée du préjudice» résultant de la désensibilisation des personnes exposées à du matériel représentant des relations sexuelles dans un contexte de violence, de cruauté et de déshumanisation. [Je souligne.]

In RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, McLachlin J. addressed more explicitly the relationship between the standard of proof required under s. 1 and the nature of the problem which Parliament was seeking to remedy. That case involved the application of s. 2(b) to certain restraints on tobacco advertising and promotion which had been adopted by Parliament. After noting that the distinction described in Irwin Toy between the government as social mediator and the government as singular antagonist "may not always be easy to apply", she observed, at para. 135:

> This said, I accept that the situation which the law is attempting to redress may affect the degree of deference which the court should accord to Parliament's choice. The difficulty of devising legislative solutions to social problems which may be only incompletely understood may also affect the degree of deference that the courts accord to Parliament or the Legislature.

She emphasized, however, that this does not diminish the usual standard of proof required under s. 1, simply that that standard might be satisfied in different ways depending on the nature of the legislative objective (at para. 137):

> As the s. 1 jurisprudence has established, the civil standard of proof on a balance of probabilities at all stages of the proportionality analysis is more appropriate: Oakes, supra, at p. 137; Irwin Toy, supra, at p. 992. . . . Discharge of the civil standard does not require scientific demonstration; the balance of probabilities may be established by the application of common sense to what is known, even though what is known may be deficient from a scientific point of view: see Snell v. Farrell, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 311. [Emphasis added.]

McLachlin J. applied this test under the rational connection stage of the proportionality analysis based on the following characterization (at para. 154):

> Where, however, legislation is directed at changing human behaviour, as in the case of the Tobacco Products Control Act, the causal relationship may not be sci-

Dans RJR-MacDonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 R.C.S. 199, le juge McLachlin a traité plus explicitement du rapport entre la norme de preuve applicable dans le cadre de l'article premier et la nature du problème que le législateur cherchait à régler. L'affaire concernait l'application de l'al. 2*b*) à certaines restrictions adoptées par le Parlement en matière de publicité et de promotion des produits du tabac. Après avoir souligné que la distinction faite dans l'arrêt Irwin Toy entre le rôle du gouvernement en tant qu'arbitre dans la société et celui d'adversaire singulier «pourrai[t] ne pas être toujours facil[e] d'application», elle a fait observer ceci, au par. 135:

> Cela dit, je reconnais que le problème auquel la loi tente de remédier risque d'avoir une incidence sur le degré de respect dont le tribunal devrait faire preuve à l'égard du choix du Parlement. De même, la difficulté de concevoir des solutions législatives à des problèmes sociaux qui pourraient bien n'être que partiellement compris peut aussi avoir une incidence sur le degré de respect dont les tribunaux feront preuve envers le législateur fédéral ou provincial.

Elle a toutefois souligné que cela n'avait pas pour effet d'abaisser la norme de preuve appliquée habituellement dans le cadre de l'article premier, mais tout simplement d'indiquer qu'il est possible d'y satisfaire par des moyens différents compte tenu de la nature de l'objectif visé par la loi (au par. 137):

> Comme l'établit la jurisprudence relative à l'article premier, la norme de preuve qui convient, à toutes les étapes de l'analyse de la proportionnalité, est celle qui s'applique en matière civile, c'est-à-dire la preuve selon la prépondérance des probabilités: Oakes, précité, à la p. 137; Irwin Toy, précité, à la p. 992. [. . .] Pour satisfaire à la norme de preuve en matière civile, on n'a pas à faire une démonstration scientifique; la prépondérance des probabilités s'établit par application du bon sens à ce qui est connu, même si ce qui est connu peut comporter des lacunes du point de vue scientifique: voir l'arrêt Snell c. Farrell, [1990] 2 R.C.S. 311. [Je souligne.]

Le juge McLachlin a appliqué ce critère à l'étape de l'examen du lien rationnel, dans le cadre de l'analyse de la proportionnalité, en s'appuyant sur la qualification suivante (au par. 154):

> Par contre, dans les cas où une loi vise une modification du comportement humain, comme dans le cas de la Loi réglementant les produits du tabac, le lien causal pourentifically measurable. In such cases, this Court has been prepared to find a causal connection between the infringement and benefit sought on the basis of reason or logic, without insisting on direct proof of a relationship between the infringing measure and the legislative objective: R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697, at pp. 768 and 777; R. v. Butler, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 452, at p. 503. [Emphasis added.]

rait bien ne pas être mesurable du point de vue scientifique. Dans ces cas, notre Cour s'est montrée disposée à reconnaître l'existence d'un lien causal entre la violation et l'avantage recherché sur le fondement de la raison ou de la logique, sans insister sur la nécessité d'une preuve directe de lien entre la mesure attentatoire et l'objectif législatif: R. c. Keegstra, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 697, aux pp. 768 et 777; R. c. Butler, [1992] 1 R.C.S. 452, à la p. 503. [Je souligne.]
