JOYAL, C.J.Q.B.

I. INTRODUCTION

[1] This application raises significant constitutional issues in respect of government imposed public health restrictions in the context of the COVID-19 global pandemic.

[2] On March 20, 2020, the Manitoba government ("Manitoba") declared a province-wide 'state of emergency' under The Emergency Measures Act, C.C.S.M. c. E80. It did so in order to protect the health and safety of all Manitobans and reduce the spread of COVID 19. From March 2020 and well into the early summer months of 2021, pursuant to the authority delegated to him under s. 67 of The Public Health Act, C.C.S.M. c. P210, Manitoba's Chief Public Health Officer Dr. Brent Roussin ("CPHO") and his subdelegate, Dr. Jazz Atwal, issued successive Public Health Orders ("PHOs") which significantly affected the constitutional rights and freedoms to assemble and worship. The Minister of Health, Seniors and Active Living Cameron Friesen (as he then was), approved the PHOs.

[3] In implementing those PHOs to address the crisis that is the COVID-19 pandemic, has Manitoba and its public health officials limited fundamental rights and freedoms in a constitutionally defensible manner? Can those PHOs be properly challenged on administrative law grounds and on the basis of Canada's constitutional division of powers (paramountcy)? Those are the principal questions that arise on this application and those are the issues with which this Court must grapple.

II. OVERVIEW

A. THE PUBLIC HEALTH CRISIS

[4] Since March 2020, Manitoba along with the rest of the world has been battling COVID-19, the worst global pandemic in over a century. As of May 2021, COVID-19 had infected over 120 million people and killed more than 2.5 million people worldwide. Most of the deaths have occurred in persons over age 60 or those with underlying health conditions. However, COVID-19 has also caused serious illness requiring hospitalization and admission to intensive care units ("ICUs") across a wide spectrum of ages. For some, COVID-19 has had prolonged health implications, though this phenomenon is not yet well understood. While new vaccines have been developed, much uncertainty remains due to the manifestation of variants of concern that are more infectious and virulent.

[5] SARS-CoV-2, the new human virus that causes COVID-19, is highly communicable. Without public health interventions, it is reasonable to believe that the virus will grow exponentially. Such a rapid transmission of COVID-19 through the community would overwhelm the healthcare system leading to many more deaths and serious illness than has been experienced thus far. Such developments can be seen elsewhere in the world. Accordingly, to stop widespread exponential growth, public health officials all over the world have purposefully taken measures to "flatten the curve" of the pandemic. Since SARS-CoV-2 spreads through contact, one important and effective public health measure to contain the disease is to limit gatherings, especially prolonged contact indoors.

B. THE APPLICATION

[6] The applicants challenge by way of application, the constitutionality of specific sections of Manitoba's Emergency Public Health Orders made on November 21, 2020, December 22, 2020, and January 8, 2021 (the "impugned PHOs"). They also challenge subsequent orders of a substantially similar or identical nature, including the order dated April 8, 2021, which were in effect at the time of the hearing of the application in May 2021. The applicants contend that the identified and specific sections of the impugned PHOs and the restrictions on public gatherings, gatherings in private residences and the temporary closure of places of worship, all infringe ss. 2(a), 2(b), 2(c), 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ("Charter"). They have also as already mentioned, challenged the impugned PHOs on administrative law grounds and under the division of powers (paramountcy).

[7] Specifically, the applicants request that this Court determine and declare that Manitoba's Emergency Public Health Orders, which prohibit and/or restrict religious, private in-home and public outdoor gatherings, violate their ss. 2(a), 2(b), 2(c), 7 and 15 Charter rights and that those violations cannot be saved under s. 1 of the Charter. In the alternative, the applicants request a determination and declaration that the PHOs are ultra vires s. 3 of The Public Health Act. In the further alternative, the applicants request that this Court find that the PHOs, which prohibit and restrict religious gatherings, are inoperative because they conflict with s. 176 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

C. THE DEFENCE OF THE PHOS

[8] The respondents (Manitoba) concede that the restrictions on gathering had the effect of limiting the freedoms of religion, expression and peaceful assembly under s. 2 of the Charter. Despite Manitoba's concession respecting s. 2, they do not concede the alleged breaches of ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. Manitoba submits that given their (Manitoba's) concessions respecting the breaches under s. 2, it is not necessary to address or decide the ss. 7 and 15 issues and that this Court's determinations respecting any Charter issue should be confined to those related to Manitoba's s. 1 defence. As it relates to Manitoba's concession that s. 2 of the Charter has been infringed, they (Manitoba) contend that the limits on any s. 2 rights are constitutionally defensible in that they are reasonable, proportionate and justified in order to address a serious public health emergency: a global pandemic with grave, sometimes deadly consequences.

D. THE APPLICANTS

[9] The applicants in this case include both churches and individual applicants. The churches are: Gateway Bible Baptist Church; Pembina Valley Baptist Church; Redeeming Grace Bible Church; Grace Covenant Church; Slavic Baptist Church; Christian Church of Morden; and, Bible Baptist Church. The individual applicants are: Thomas Rempel; Tobias Tissen; and, Ross MacKay. Thomas Rempel is a deacon at Redeeming Grace Bible Church. Tobias Tissen is a minister at the Church of God. Ross MacKay is a Manitoba resident who attended a "Hugs Over Masks" rally in Steinbach, Manitoba, on November 14, 2020. MacKay did so in order to voice his concerns about what he views as violations of Manitoban's human rights flowing from the COVID-19 lockdowns. Following his attendance at that rally, MacKay received a fine in the amount of $1,296.

E. THE INTERVENER

[10] It should be noted that following a contested motion, intervener status was granted to The Association for Reformed Political Action (ARPA) Canada on the basis of the applicable and governing legal test[1]. ARPA Canada is a not-for-profit, non-partisan organization which describes itself as "serving" at the intersection of government (including the courts) and Canada's reformed Christian community — a distinct minority religious group in Canada.

[11] ARPA Canada submits that it directs its mission to reform churches in Canada who primarily attend 175 reformed congregations across Canada. ARPA Canada has had a long-standing commitment to public engagement in issues of freedom of religion and religious discrimination in Canada.

[12] Pursuant to the narrow terms of their intervention, counsel for ARPA Canada provided the Court with both written and oral submissions. They did not participate in the examination of witnesses.

[13] As undertaken, counsel for ARPA Canada did indeed provide submissions that augmented rather than merely duplicated the submissions of the other religious parties. In that regard, amongst other things, counsel for ARPA Canada addressed what it described as arguments in connection to the importance of institutional pluralism in a free and democratic society and the need for its acknowledgment and protection. Such institutional pluralism necessarily contemplates the ongoing existence and functioning of faith-based institutions which in various ways, may play an important and legitimate role in enhancing the many aspects of a person's and a community's health.

[14] Where relevant and applicable to my determinations, I have considered and taken into account the thoughtful and distinct aspects of ARPA Canada's submissions.

F. THE NATURE OF THIS APPLICATION AND HEARING

[15] This case proceeded by way of application and involved the filing of numerous affidavits many of which were accompanied by expert reports garnered and adduced by the respective parties. As part of this application, various cross-examinations took place in open court in connection to a number of the affidavits that were filed. That viva voce testimony and "on the record" cross-examination was conducted in respect of specific and selected affiant witnesses, including a number of the experts. This took place over several days.

[16] It should be noted that these reasons (in relation to the applicants' challenge to the constitutionality of the specific sections of the PHOs and their administrative law and division of powers arguments) are being released concurrently with this Court's reasons respecting separate and distinct arguments made by the same applicants in relation to an earlier application. In that earlier application, the applicants challenged Manitoba's authority to delegate to Manitoba's CPHO and his sub-delegate, powers that resulted in the issuance of successive PHOs, which the applicants contend dramatically alter the lives of Manitobans, including what they say have been broad infringements of their constitutional rights and freedoms. For the reasons provided in that concurrently released judgment, the applicants' challenge was dismissed. (See Gateway Bible Baptist Church et al. v. Manitoba et al., 2021 MBQB 218.)

G. THE SCOPE OF THE COURT'S FOCUS, EXAMINATION AND DETERMINATIONS ON THIS APPLICATION

[17] It is not an exaggeration to say that the global pandemic has challenged governments the world over, including all Canadian governments and their connected public health agents and agencies at both the federal and provincial levels. In a federal state like Canada, in the context of a mercilessly persistent pandemic, it is to the provincial governments that a particularly heavy day-to-day burden and responsibility falls as they attempt — in sometimes very distinct and divergent ways — to achieve, in exceptional circumstances, the requisite balance between public health protection and the restriction of fundamental freedoms in a manner that is both reasonable and legally justifiable.

[18] Manitoba, like all other provincial governments, has been criticized in different quarters for alternately having done too little too late, or for having moved too quickly to "reopen" or to loosen various restrictions that had been put in place. Conversely, Manitoba has also been criticized for having gone too far with some of the restrictions imposed, restrictions which some critics say are incongruous and inconsistent in nature given the objectives of the PHOs and given where Manitoba has chosen to draw (or not draw) certain other lines as part of its response to the pandemic.

[19] Whatever the nature and variety of the criticism, in the years and perhaps months to come, with the luxury of hindsight and new evolving scientific clarity, a needed post-mortem may indeed be conducted respecting the speed and nature of Manitoba's response to the unprecedented public health threat that COVID-19 continues to represent. With such a post-mortem, the criticisms may become even more focussed and perhaps, understandings may be more common and nuanced respecting what was both good and bad in the different aspects of Manitoba's response. Leaving aside what I stipulate in the next few paragraphs is the appropriately more narrow and constrained nature of this Court's focus, given the still ongoing, fluid and threatening nature of the pandemic, not only is any such "post-mortem" outside the jurisdictional sphere and expertise of this Court, it is also definitionally premature. Accordingly, this case and these reasons are not intended and should be not read as a substitute for any such eventual post-mortem. Neither should these reasons be read as either a validation or a second guessing of Manitoba's policy choices and the adequacy or efficacy of its public health measures put in place to contain COVID-19. Instead, my still important, but more limited task is to evaluate whether the impugned restrictions on the identified fundamental freedoms are constitutionally defensible and whether they are legally impugnable on administrative law grounds and on the basis of the applicants' division of powers argument.

[20] In carrying out my analysis in respect of the constitutional and administrative law issues that I set out below at paragraph 23 and in underscoring the point made in the previous paragraph, I am mindful that this case is not a public inquiry into the national and provincial responses to the pandemic. This is instead, a legal challenge to specific portions of the identified PHOs. In that connection, this Court should not have to be reminded that like any court case, this case is defined by the pleadings. Put simply, as this is not a public inquiry, this case is not and should not be a probe or questioning of every aspect of Manitoba's handling of the pandemic nor a challenge to every public health order or restriction. To repeat, while such a broader public assessment may very well come in due course, this Court's focus must be on the constitutionality of the identified portions of the orders in question. Unless relevant to the specific constitutional determinations I must make, this Court must take care to not conflate that constitutional assessment with an undue judicial focus on the wisdom of Manitoba's broader policy choices as it relates to what may have been the inadequacies or adequacies of the particular timing, scope and nature of the public health restrictions. Although the evaluative line and relevant parameters can be sometimes difficult to discern in the context of an adjudication of a Charter challenge, as Justice Binnie colourfully commented, a court case "should not resemble a voyage on the Flying Dutchman with a crew condemned to roam the seas interminably with no set destination and no end in sight".[2]

[21] While this Court on this application was the recipient of a large amount of evidence, the relevance of that evidence must be tested by reference to what is in issue and it is the amended notice of application and the now well-established constitutional tests that define what is in issue. In respect of their notice of application, the applicants have not challenged every PHO made during the pandemic or even all aspects of a single PHO. For example, there is no challenge to any quarantine or self-isolation order made under The Public Health Act (Self-Isolation and Contact Tracing Orders and Self-Isolation Order for Persons Entering Manitoba). The amended notice of application is confined to particular sections of the three impugned PHOs made on November 21, 2020, December 22, 2020 and January 8, 2021 (and any subsequent order of a substantial or identical nature) and Manitoba has responded accordingly. Specifically, the applicants challenge the orders in effect from November 22, 2020 until January 22, 2021, in relation to:

- Gatherings at private residences: Order 1(1);
- Public gatherings: Order 2(1); and
- Places of worship: Orders 15(1) and (3) in the November 21, 2020 PHO, which became Orders 16(1) and (3) in the December 22, 2020 and January 8, 2021 PHOs.

[22] Just as the relevance of the evidence is in large part rooted in the pleadings, so too is the relevant time frame. The COVID-19 pandemic is fluid and evolving. The situation in the spring of 2020 was markedly different from the summer of 2020, or from the fall of 2020 when the impugned PHOs were made, and from the circumstances existing today. Public health measures have necessarily and frequently varied in order to respond to the prevailing conditions of the COVID-19 pandemic. Manitoba's evidence and arguments are focussed on justifying the impugned PHOs in the relevant period from November 22, 2020 until January 22, 2021.

III. ISSUES

[23] Based on the initial pleadings filed by the applicants, this application raises the following issues:

Charter Issues*:

1. Did the restrictions on private gatherings, public gatherings or places of worship imposed in Orders 1(1), 2(1), 15(1) and 15(3) of the Public Health Order dated November 21, 2020, as subsequently amended on December 22, 2020 and January 8, 2021, limit rights under ss. 2(a), 2(b) or 2(c) of the Charter?

2. Did the restriction on religious services at places of worship or the restriction on gatherings at private homes in the impugned PHOs interfere with the right to liberty or security of the person contrary to the principles of fundamental justice pursuant to s. 7 of the Charter?

3. Did the closure of places of worship in the impugned PHOs discriminate on the basis of religion contrary to s. 15 of the Charter?

4. If there are any violations conceded or determined in relation to ss. 2(a), 2(b), 2(c) and ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter, can the restrictions in the impugned PHOs be justified as reasonable limits under s. 1 of the Charter?

Administrative Law Issue*:

5. Were the impugned PHOs ultra vires because they failed to restrict rights or freedoms no greater than was reasonably necessary to respond to the COVID-19 public health emergency as required by s. 3 of The Public Health Act?

Division of Powers of Issue*:

6. Were the impugned PHOs relating to places of worship inoperative under the doctrine of paramountcy because it conflicted with s. 176 of the Criminal Code?

[24] Respecting the above questions in issue, for the reasons that follow, I have come to the following determinations:

a) Based on the position taken by Manitoba resulting in its appropriate concession, I have determined that the impugned PHOs do indeed limit and restrict the applicants' rights and freedoms as found in ss. 2(a), 2(b), and 2(c) of the Charter.

b) In the circumstances of this case, it is necessary and just to address and decide the applicants' challenge respecting what they say were the alleged infringements to their ss. 7 and 15 rights under the Charter. Having so considered the merits of the applicants' position in respect of those alleged breaches, I have nonetheless determined that the impugned PHOs did not infringe the applicants' Charter rights under ss. 7 and 15.

c) Insofar as Manitoba has conceded and I have found infringements of ss. 2(a), 2(b), and 2(c) under the Charter, I have also determined that the restrictions in the impugned PHOs are constitutionally justifiable as reasonable limits under s. 1 of the Charter.

d) Respecting the applicants' administrative law ground of review, I have determined that the impugned PHOs were not ultra vires (in any administrative law sense) and they met the requirements of s. 3 of The Public Health Act insofar as they restricted rights and freedoms no greater than was reasonably necessary in response to the COVID-19 public health emergency.

e) Respecting the applicants' division of powers ground, I have determined that the impugned PHOs do not conflict with the operation nor do they frustrate the purpose s. 176 of the Criminal Code and accordingly, they are not inoperative under the doctrine of paramountcy.

IV. LEGAL FRAMEWORK

[25] Given the positions taken by the parties on this application, I set out below for early reference, the following relevant provisions under the Charter, The Public Health Act and the Criminal Code.

[26] Sections 1, 2(a), 2(b), 2(c), 7 and 15 of the Charter provides as follows:

> Rights and freedoms in Canada
> 1 The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society
>
> Fundamental freedoms
>
> 2 Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
>
> (a) freedom of conscience and religion;
> (b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;
> (c) freedom of peaceful assembly.
>
> . . .
>
> Life, liberty and security of person
>
> . . .
>
> Equality before and under law and equal protection and benefit of law
> 15(1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

[27] Section 3 of The Public Health Act provides as follows:

> Limit on restricting rights and freedoms
> 3 If the exercise of a power under this Act restricts rights or freedoms, the restriction must be no greater than is reasonably necessary, in the circumstances, to respond to a health hazard, a communicable disease, a public health emergency or any other threat to public health.

[28] Section 176 of the Criminal Code provides as follows:

> Obstructing or violence to or arrest of officiating clergyman
>
> 176(1) Every person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term of not more than two years or is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction who
> (a) by threats or force, unlawfully obstructs or prevents or endeavours to obstruct or prevent an officiant from celebrating a religious or spiritual service or performing any other function in connection with their calling, or
> (b) knowing that an officiant is about to perform, is on their way to perform or is returning from the performance of any of the duties or functions mentioned in paragraph (a)
> (i) assaults or offers any violence to them, or
> (ii) arrests them on a civil process, or under the pretence of executing a civil process.
>
> Disturbing religious worship or certain meetings
>
> Idem
> (3) Every one who, at or near a meeting referred to in subsection (2), wilfully does anything that disturbs the order or solemnity of the meeting is guilty of an offence punishable on a summary conviction.

[29] A more full discussion of these specific sections (along with the governing jurisprudence and the applicable legal tests) will be set out in the analysis section of this judgment.

V. STANDARDS OF REVIEW

[30] The issues in this case set out at paragraph 23 are all subject to different standards of review.

[31] Any review in respect of whether Manitoba has infringed any of the substantive Charter rights found under ss. 2, 7 and 15, is a review subject to a standard of correctness. However, if and where, as in the present case, a Charter right has been restricted, the standard of review respecting the justificatory framework (s. 1) may then become somewhat more complex. Where a Charter right has been infringed or restricted, the justificatory framework to be applied will depend upon the source of the breach. The salient question in that regard will be whether the source of the breach is connected to an administrative decision or statutory instrument.

[32] The issue to be determined by the Court as it relates to the standard of review in this case (concerning the justificatory framework on any Charter violations) is rooted in whether the CPHO's orders should be reviewed as delegated administrative decisions, or rather, more like statutory instruments. This question was addressed by Abella J. in Doré v. Barreau du Québec, 2012 SCC 12. In that case, she noted a distinction between the analytical approach to be taken when reviewing the constitutionality of a law as compared to when reviewing an administrative decision that is said to violate the rights of particular individuals in a more administrative context. Where a court is reviewing the constitutionality of a law, the Oakes test is to apply (see R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103). Where a court is reviewing an administrative decision that is said to violate the rights of particular individuals, the question is whether that decision reflects a proportionate balancing between the Charter rights and the objective of the measure. In the context of that review, the standard of review is reasonableness. It should be noted however, that if the administrative decision relates to whether an enabling statute violates the Charter, the standard of review is correctness.

[33] In the present case, are the Charter infringing orders to be reviewed as delegated administrative decisions or more like statutory instruments?

[34] In Beaudoin v. British Columbia, 2021 BCSC 512, at paragraphs 120, 124 and 212-221, Hinkson C.J. had occasion to apply the Doré framework to a review of the British Columbia chief public health officer's orders which orders prima facie violated s. 2 of the Charter. Chief Justice Hinkson determined that the public health orders were more akin to an administrative decision under delegated authority than a law of general application. In that context, he determined that the chief provincial health officer was entitled to deference especially in the areas of science and medicine relating to COVID-19 and accordingly, the appropriate standard of review was reasonableness. Taking a different approach in the context of a similar challenge, the court in Taylor v. Newfoundland and Labrador, 2020 NLSC 125, determined the case before it to be a Charter challenge to public health orders of general application issued by the province's chief medical officer of health. The court chose to apply the s. 1 Oakes test. In that instance, the orders at issue restricted travel into the province to prevent the spread of COVID-19.

[35] When I examine the background to the PHOs in the Manitoba context, I note that flowing from s. 67 of The Public Health Act, Manitoba's CPHO exercises delegated authority to issue PHOs with the approval of the minister. Different types of orders are contemplated under s. 67, some more specific and some more broad. In other words, some orders may apply to specific persons or places. For example, the CPHO may give directions to a particular healthcare organization to manage the threat or order a particular place to close. Some orders conversely, may be more broad where for example, the CPHO may restrict all public gatherings.

[36] When I examine the nature of the challenged PHOs in this case and the nature of their application, I am in agreement with Manitoba's suggestion that the impugned PHOs relating to gatherings and places of worship are, in essence, akin to legislative instruments of general application rather than an administrative decision that affects only particular individuals (see Springs of Living Water Centre Inc. v. The Government of Manitoba, 2020 MBQB 185, at paragraphs 50-51). Given the nature of these orders, the restrictions on the Charter rights seem more appropriately reviewable under the justificatory framework of the s. 1 Oakes test rather than under the Doré framework. So while any restrictions on Charter rights found in this case will be reviewed and by necessity, justified under the s. 1 Oakes test, I, like Manitoba, acknowledge that the standard of review for these public health orders is not entirely clear or certain. It remains a reasonable argument that the impugned PHOs could also be properly reviewed as an administrative decision of delegated authority attracting the reasonableness review as set out under Doré.

[37] Having now stipulated the reference point for review of possible justification of any Charter breaches in the present case (a review based on the Oakes test rather than the Doré framework), I will once again note my agreement with Manitoba by saying that in the unique and particular circumstances of this case, little turns on the distinction between the Doré proportionality analysis and a formal application of the Oakes test under s. 1. As the Supreme Court of Canada has noted, the Doré proportionality analysis finds "analytical harmony" with and "works the same justificatory muscles" as the Oakes test (see Loyola High School v. Quebec (A.G.), 2015 SCC 12, at paragraph 40). Also, I note that under either framework, considerable deference is contemplated vis-à-vis the decision maker. Underscoring the point, Abella J. noted in Doré at paragraph 57 that both frameworks "contemplate giving a 'margin of appreciation', or deference, to administrative and legislative bodies" when balancing Charter rights and broader objectives. In this connection, I note that Chief Justice Hinkson in Beaudoin specifically observed that deference was particularly appropriate when a court is addressing complex areas of science and medicine in relation to COVID-19, which he quite reasonably acknowledged, courts are not well suited to resolve. I will return later in this judgment (at paragraphs 280-83) to the complex and nuanced subject of "deference" respecting the assessment of what may be reasonable and justified limits where governmental decision making infringe upon fundamental constitutional freedoms.

[38] If as I noted above, the standard of review when using the s. 1 justificatory framework (for Charter breaches) remains less clear, the standard of review respecting the administrative law and the division of powers issues are more certain.

[39] The administrative law question respecting the compliance of the impugned PHOs in relation to s. 3 of The Public Health Act is reviewable on a standard of reasonableness (see Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65).

[40] The questions surrounding the paramountcy issue is properly characterized as a constitutional question relating to the division of powers, which accordingly, requires a review on a standard of correctness (Vavilov, at paragraph 55).

VI. THE EVIDENCE ADDUCED

[41] As noted, the evidence received on this application came by way of a voluminous number of affidavits (and in many cases, via the attached reports and associated documents) and by way of in-court cross-examination of many of those affiants, particularly those who provided expert opinion evidence. While occasional objections were made respecting the scope and/or relevance of some of the opinion evidence, the respective parties did not directly challenge the qualifications and expertise of the many learned witnesses who provided their opinion, both in their affidavits and later, viva voce. Many, if not most of the affiants and/or witnesses, had impressive medical, nursing and/or academic backgrounds in areas related and relevant to public health generally, and in some cases, virology and immunology more specifically. Despite the absence of any direct challenge to the qualifications and expertise of the party's respective expert witnesses, given the issues and the governing legal tests, the cogency, persuasiveness and the weight to be given much of that expert evidence was nonetheless called into question by both parties, directly and indirectly, in cross-examination and in oral and written argument.

[42] The following individuals provided an affidavit(s) on behalf of the applicants:

- Christopher Lowe - sworn December 30, 2020 and March 25, 2021 – pastor at Gateway Bible Baptist Church
- Thomas Rempel - affirmed January 7 and March 26, 2021 – deacon at Redeeming Grace Bible Church
- Riley Toews - affirmed January 5 and March 24, 2021 – pastor at Grace Covenant Church
- Tobias Tissen - affirmed January 5 and March 26, 2021 – minister at The Church of God
- Ross MacKay - affirmed January 4 and April 1, 2021 – self-employed resident of Winnipeg, Manitoba, who attended the Hugs Over Masks rally in Steinbach, Manitoba on November 14, 2020
- Dr. Jay Bhattacharya - sworn January 5 and March 31, 2021 - a world-renowned epidemiologist, medical doctor, PhD in economics, and full professor at Stanford University
- Dr. Thomas Warren - sworn March 30, 2021 – infectious diseases specialist and medical microbiologist currently practicing in Oakville, Milton, and Georgetown, Ontario
- Dr. Joel Kettner - sworn April 1, 2021 – associate professor in the Department of Community Health Sciences at the College of Medicine, University of Manitoba. Former chief medical officer of health and chief public health officer for Manitoba (1999-2012), regional medical officer of health in urban, rural and northern parts of Manitoba (1990-1999), and clinical work in general practice, emergency urgent care medicine
- David Hersey - sworn April 20, 2021 – senior paralegal at the Justice Centre for Constitutional Freedoms in Calgary, Alberta

[43] The following individuals provided an affidavit(s) on behalf of Manitoba:

- Dr. Jared Manley Peter Bullard – affirmed March 5 and April 29, 2021 – associate professor and section head of infectious diseases in the Department of Pediatrics & Child Health and Medical Microbiology at the University of Manitoba; associate medical director of Cadham Provincial Laboratory
- Dr. Carla Loeppky – affirmed March 4 and April 30, 2021 – PhD in Community Health Sciences; director and lead epidemiologist in the Epidemiology and Surveillance Unit in the Department of Health, Seniors and Active Living with the Government of Manitoba; assistant professor in the Department of Community Health Services, Max Rady College of Medicine, University of Manitoba

- Dr. Jason Kindrachuk – affirmed March 2 and April 29, 2021 – PhD in biochemistry; assistant professor and Canada research chair in emerging viruses in the Department of Medical Microbiology & Infection at the University of Manitoba. Currently seconded as part of a 12-month research partnership agreement at the Vaccine and Infectious Disease Organization at the University of Saskatchewan leading and facilitating national COVID-19 research response efforts

- Szilveszter Jozsef Komlodi – affirmed March 5, 2021 – assistant deputy minister of Fiscal Management and Capital Planning with the Treasury Board Secretariat of the Government of Manitoba

- Lanette Siragusa – affirmed March 5 and April 30, 2021 – provincial lead health service integration and quality, and chief nursing officer with Shared Health Manitoba and assistant professor with the College of Nursing, University of Manitoba

- Dr. Brent Roussin – affirmed March 8 and April 30, 2021 - Manitoba's chief public health officer

- Dr. James Blanchard – affirmed April 20, 2021 – professor in the Department of Community Health Sciences, University of Manitoba; Canada research chair in Epidemiology and Global Public Health; and executive director of the Institute for Global Public Health, University of Manitoba

[44] Of the above identified list of affiants for both the applicants and Manitoba, the following were subject to in-court cross-examination:

- Tobias Tissen

- Dr. Jay Bhattacharya

- Lanette Siragusa

- Dr. Jason Kindrachuk

- Dr. Carla Loeppky

- Dr. James Blanchard

- Dr. Brent Roussin
- Dr. Jared Manley Peter Bullard
- Dr. Thomas Andrew Warren
- Dr. Joel Kettner

[45] The evidence set out by Manitoba in the affidavits (identified at paragraph 43) provides much of the relevant background and context to the impugned PHOs and the related administrative and constitutional issues. That evidence includes the foundational basis — scientific and otherwise — for Manitoba's decisions and line drawing in relation to the restrictions imposed in the accompanying and impugned PHOs. Conversely, the evidence produced by the applicants (identified at paragraph 42) includes contrary scientific expert opinion, which contrary evidence, calls into question some of the science inextricably tied to and relied upon by Dr. Roussin in his decisions to issue the impugned PHOs.

[46] In the section that follows, I set out the submissions of the parties respecting the evidence adduced. The submissions largely represent the positions of the parties as it relates to the evidentiary foundation for their respective positions, legal and factual. Although most of the evidence adduced has a more obvious relevance to the Charter issues, the evidence in this case is also pertinent to and constitutes a backdrop for the administrative law issue and to a considerably lesser extent, to the somewhat more purely legal question regarding the division of powers. The submissions reflect both the oral and written presentation by the parties to the Court and they include specific reference to the evidence.

VII. SUBMISSIONS OF THE PARTIES RESPECTING THE EVIDENCE ADDUCED

[47] The evidence adduced by both parties in this case was voluminous and often complex. To fairly represent their positions on the evidence presented, I set out below as fully as possible, the submissions made to the Court.

[48] The adjudication on this application (taking place as it does in the midst of a pandemic) represents one of the first cases in Canada where the constitutional challenge to the public health restrictions is accompanied by full and corresponding evidence challenging and attacking the science upon which the government in question (in this case Manitoba) relies. As such, it behooves this Court to ensure that while obviously summarized, as complete an account as possible of the evidence and the related positions of the parties is outlined. In this way, while my related and relevant legal determinations will be seen to dispose of the constitutional issues before me, they will also be seen as a purposeful consideration but ultimately, a clear rejection of much of what the applicants submit as their foundational challenge to the science upon which Manitoba has relied and acted.

[49] As part of the presentation below setting out the submissions of the parties respecting the evidence on this application (both in affidavit and in cross-examination), I will where necessary and relevant (specifically in reference to the cross-examinations), provide my own assessment and evaluation of the evidence. I will do so in terms of its weight, cogency and persuasiveness in relation to the positions advanced by the parties and in relation to the relevant determinations I must make to decide this case, which determinations are made and further explained later in this judgment in the analysis section. Those determinations should be assumed to be a product of a complete review of the available and in some cases, differing scientific evidence.

[50] Having observed, listened to and re-examined the totality of the evidence (and the submissions of the parties in respect of that evidence) it is my view that this is not a case where stark, zero-sum determinative findings of credibility need or will be made to rationalize divergent positions based on differing views and interpretations of what some say is the evolving scientific information. In other words, where, for example, the applicants' experts' evidence challenges Manitoba's experts on their interpretation of the science, absent a clear determination that the science that Manitoba's experts rely upon is wrong (a determination which I most definitely do not make), the determinative and salient question is not which experts do I completely accept or reject based on credibility or otherwise. Rather, to the extent differences in the expert evidence exists, the real question in the context of the issues that have been pled — particularly in relation to Manitoba's s. 1 defence — is whether there is nonetheless, a sufficiently sound and credible evidentiary basis (even in light of any opposing evidence) for Manitoba's claim that the limitations and restrictions placed on certain fundamental freedoms represent valid policy approaches which are reasonably justified and constitutionally defensible in Canada's free and democratic society. Put differently, after a review of any contrary scientific evidence and challenge, does there nonetheless remain a credible evidentiary record that supports Manitoba's position that any restrictions on the identified fundamental freedoms are rationally connected, minimally impairing and reasonable and proportionate public health policy choices vis-à-vis what are acknowledged and conceded to be, Manitoba's pressing and substantial public health objectives?

A. SUBMISSION OF MANITOBA RESPECTING THE AFFIDAVIT EVIDENCE ADDUCED

[51] Given some of Manitoba's concessions respecting its infringement of s. 2 of the Charter and the resulting onus it bears under s. 1 to show that the infringements are justified in a free and democratic society, I will for the sake of coherence and clarity commence with the submissions made by Manitoba.

[52] To the extent the evidence does indeed support or establish what is set out below, Manitoba submits that if and where Charter infringements have occurred in the present case, they are infringements that are constitutionally defensible. In other words, Manitoba contends that the evidence reveals that there is a rational connection between the public health objectives and the impugned provisions and that the impugned restrictions minimally impair any Charter rights they infringe. No less important is Manitoba's position that the evidence demonstrates that any of the deleterious effects of the restrictions are far outweighed by the salutary benefits resulting from them.

(i) SARS-CoV-2 and the COVID-19 Pandemic

[53] On January 30, 2020, the World Health Organization declared the COVID-19 pandemic a Public Health Emergency of International Concern. COVID-19 is a disease caused by a novel coronavirus called SARS-CoV-2. The first case was identified in Wuhan, China, in December 2019 but soon spread all over the world. As of early March, there were 114 million cases and more than 2.5 million deaths. The numbers continued to climb. The first known case of the virus in Manitoba was on March 12, 2020.[3] As of early February 2021 there have been over 30,000 cases in Manitoba and more than 2,500 serious cases including hospitalizations or deaths.[4]

[54] COVID-19 is highly communicable and contagious. The virus spreads from person to person through respiratory droplets and aerosols (smaller droplets) that are expelled when a person breathes, talks, coughs, sneezes, sings or shouts. It is primarily transmitted when the virus comes into contact with another person's nose, mouth or eyes. It may also be spread when a person touches another person (e.g., handshake) or touches a surface containing the virus and then transfers it to their mucous membrane.[5]

[55] Scientific studies have demonstrated that SARS-CoV-2 can be transmitted by persons who are asymptomatic (those who never develop symptoms) and especially those who are pre-symptomatic (those who do not yet display symptoms but will develop them). There is strong scientific evidence that transmission of SARS-CoV-2 primarily occurs from a few days before symptom onset until about five days after.[6] While healthy children (at least prior to the increasingly dangerous virulent variants) tend to experience less severe disease, they can transmit the virus. There is evidence that older children and teenagers can spread the virus as efficiently as adults.[7]

[7] Roussin, para. 26; Kindrachuk, Exhibit B, p. 10

[56] Since the virus is typically spread through respiratory droplets, gatherings involving prolonged close contact are of particular concern. According to Health Canada guidelines, a high-risk exposure (close contact) includes anyone who has shared an indoor space with a positive case for a prolonged period (15 minutes over a 24-hour period). Certain locations and activities pose a greater risk. Most transmission occurs in indoor settings, especially with poor ventilation. Singing, talking loudly or breathing heavily can also increase the risk of transmission. This explains why gathering in places such as fitness classes, theatres, restaurants, places of worship and choir practice are identified as of particular concern. Multiple super-spreader events have been linked to close contacts including at places of worship.[8] In Manitoba, Epidemiology and Surveillance identified a number of clusters or outbreaks in relation to faith-based gatherings or funerals in many regions of the province, which is consistent with data from other jurisdictions and the scientific literature.[9] For the same reason, private residences have been identified as a significant source of transmission.[10]

[57] COVID-19 entails a range of clinical symptoms. The most common symptoms include fever, cough, fatigue, shortness of breath, loss of appetite, loss of smell and taste. The disease can vary widely in seriousness. Some people remain asymptomatic. Others experience relatively mild symptoms or feel very ill but recover fully. But for some, COVID-19 is very serious leading to hospitalization, ICU admission or death. Older adults (over age 60) and people of any age with a variety of underlying medical conditions are at greater risk of experiencing severe disease and outcomes. Among others, these underlying comorbidities include heart disease, lung disease, hypertension, diabetes, kidney disease, liver disease, obesity, along with other immunocompromised individuals (e.g., persons with cancer or undergoing chemotherapy).[11]

[58] In Manitoba, data current to February 8, 2021 shows that 8.1 per cent of all COVID-19 cases are very severe, resulting in hospitalization or death. While a large majority of deaths have occurred in people over age 60, fatalities are not limited to that category. Moreover, approximately one third of hospitalizations in Manitoba and 44 per cent of ICU admissions have been in persons under the age of 60.[12] Indigenous people in Manitoba are also more vulnerable to COVID-19. For example, a disproportionate number of COVID-19 cases (31 per cent) have been First Nations persons, more than half of which have been off reserve. Among First Nation individuals, the median age is 51 for hospitalizations and 57 for ICU admissions.

[59] For a certain segment of the population, COVID-19 has resulted in persistent long-term symptoms (sometimes serious), such as difficulty breathing. These "long hauler" cases are not limited to an older demographic. In one journal, it was estimated that 10 per cent of people infected with COVID-19 experienced prolonged symptoms. An Italian study suggested 44 per cent of recovered COVID-19 patients reported a worsened quality of life. However, further study is needed and it remains too early to draw any firm conclusions about the long-term effects.[13]

[13] Roussin, para. 36; Kindrachuk, p. 15

[60] SARS-CoV-2, like all viruses, changes as it replicates. Many of these mutations are of little clinical significance. However, the more the virus is allowed to spread, the greater the opportunity for variants of concern to develop. These variants may exhibit increased transmissibility or disease severity. They may also impact the efficacy of vaccines or therapeutic treatments. As of the spring of 2021, three variants of concern have been identified, which are present in Manitoba.[14]

[61] SARS-CoV-2 is a new human virus. While far more is known about the virus today than at the beginning of the pandemic in early 2020, much uncertainty remains. The state of scientific knowledge continues to evolve rapidly and many studies continue around the world to shed light on difficult questions such as whether immunity is lasting after exposure or vaccination, the impact on children, variants of concern, potential long-term effects of COVID-19, the efficacy of non-pharmaceutical interventions, among many others. Studies are likely to continue long after the pandemic ends. Despite the uncertainty, public health decisions must be made quickly, in real time and under rapidly changing epidemiological situations as the pandemic unfolds. These decisions are based on the best available scientific evidence at the time.[15]

(ii) Manitoba's Pandemic Response

[62] The office of the chief public health officer along with the Department of Health and Seniors Care play a leading role in Manitoba's response to the COVID-19 pandemic. They work closely with many specialists in a variety of health disciplines. In February

2020, Manitoba established an Incident Command structure to manage the pandemic response. It is co-chaired by Chief Public Health Officer Dr. Brent Roussin and Chief Nursing Officer Lanette Siragusa of Shared Health Manitoba. In addition to the Incident Command, Manitoba has established a Testing Task Force to oversee testing initiatives, the Centralized COVID Cases and Contact Team to operate contact tracing and the Vaccine Task Force to plan and conduct vaccinations.[16]

[63] Notably, Dr. Roussin and his team continually review new scientific evidence as it emerges from around the world. He notes that officials in Manitoba work collaboratively with their counterparts and experts from across Canada and internationally to share knowledge, experience and best practices. The fight against COVID-19 has been the subject of extensive interjurisdictional coordination and efforts. The CPHO's office regularly participates in meetings of federal-provincial-territorial special advisory and technical advisory committees to coordinate the response and share the most up-to-date information about COVID-19. Weekly meetings are held among the chief medical officers of health from every Canadian jurisdiction. Canada's Chief Public Health Officer Dr. Tam, is also in regular contact with her international counterparts to keep abreast of evolving scientific knowledge and best practices.[17]

[64] When it comes to public health decision making, a wide variety of experts regularly share information upon which the CPHO can rely. This includes public health experts, epidemiologists, basic scientists such as virologists and immunologists, laboratory experts, acute care specialists and other health care professionals, policy analysts, the

Department of Health and Seniors Care and elected officials.[18] Dr. Roussin also brings to bear his expertise in Public Health and Preventive Medicine, a medical specialty concerned with the health of populations.

[65] In addition to meeting the requirements of The Public Health Act, the CPHO follows the principles underlying sound and ethical public health decision making, namely: effectiveness, proportionality, necessity, least infringement and public justification. These principles have also been summarized as: (1) the harm principle; (2) least restrictive or coercive means; and, (3) reciprocity (public assistance for citizens who comply with their duties) and transparency (e.g., engaging with affected stakeholders).[19]

(iii) Public Health Orders are Progressive and Responsive to the Course of the Pandemic

[66] As Dr. Roussin explains, since March 2020, Manitoba has implemented a variety of measures in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, which are generally consistent with measures seen across Canada and the rest of the world. The public health consensus is that limiting the number and duration of contacts is necessary to prevent the exponential spread of SARS-CoV-2 and keep it within manageable limits. If the number of serious COVID-19 cases overwhelms our healthcare system, this will result in greater morbidity and death including for non-COVID-19 patients. Hence the need to "flatten the curve". The precise scope and extent of measures are informed by the circumstances of the pandemic, epidemiological evidence and a variety of key indicators such as the rate of growth, increases in serious outcomes (hospitalizations, ICU admissions and deaths), the extent of community transmission, clusters, test positivity rates, capacity for testing and contact tracing and of critical importance, the strain on the healthcare system.[20]

[67] The public health orders are not static. Public health officials have continually monitored the fluid and evolving pandemic and have, they say, modified the public health measures progressively to ensure they are responsive to prevailing epidemiological evidence and proportionate.

[68] The early response to the pandemic in the spring of 2020 was characterized by limited knowledge and tremendous uncertainty. Public health officials had witnessed what had happened in places like Italy and New York. Starting in March 2020, indoor and outdoor gatherings, including places of worship, were limited to 50 people. Retail establishments remained open with physical distancing, but theatres and gyms were closed. Restaurants and hospitality premises were limited to the lesser of 50 people or 50 per cent capacity. Gathering limits were reduced to 10 on March 30. Starting April 1, business not listed in a schedule were closed except for online, pick up and delivery. Restaurants were restricted to delivery and take out. At no time did the PHOs place any restrictions on the delivery of health care. Fortunately, Manitoba was spared widespread community transmission and did not experience a large number of cases during the first wave of the pandemic in the spring of 2020.[21]

[69] Beginning May 22, 2020, the gathering restrictions were relaxed to allow 25 people indoors and 50 people outdoors, including places of worship. This reflected the growing understanding that the risk of transmission was greater in indoor settings. As the summer

progressed, restrictions were gradually and progressively eased. By June 21, gathering sizes generally increased to 50 people indoors or 100 people outdoors. Many businesses opened to 75 per cent capacity subject to physical distancing requirements. By July 24, businesses could generally fully reopen at full capacity with physical distancing, unless otherwise specified in the orders. Religious services were permitted up to 500 persons or 30 per cent capacity. These restrictions continued essentially in this form until the fall. While life certainly did not return completely to normal, despite the ever-present spectre of COVID-19, the temporarily improving circumstances were accompanied by a significant relaxation of public health restrictions and more freedom to gather.[22]

(iv) Fall 2020 - The "Circuit Break"

[70] Things changed dramatically when the second wave hit in the fall of 2020. Particularly after Thanksgiving, the virus began to spread rapidly throughout the community in an uncontrolled manner. The Capital Region was placed under Level Red (Critical) restrictions by the end of October and ten days later, on November 12, the entire province followed suit. The rising number of serious COVID-19 cases was threatening to overwhelm the capacity of our hospitals and ICUs to cope. Manitoba's healthcare system was said to be on the precipice. Unless urgent action was taken to regain control of the virus and significantly reduce the number of hospitalizations and ICU admissions, Manitoba was on the verge of exceeding the ability to deliver urgent care for patients, whether for COVID-19 or otherwise. Swift and decisive action was seen as essential. The impugned PHOs were intended as a "circuit break" to flatten the curve and avoid even greater loss of life or serious illness than was already being experienced.[23]

[71] The CPHO's assessment was based on a variety of key indicators, current epidemiological evidence and modelling presented to him on October 15 and again on November 10, 2020. This evidence included the following:

i) Manitoba was experiencing exponential growth of the virus. New cases were doubling every two weeks.[24] Cases escalated shortly after Thanksgiving (October 12). During the week of October 19-24, Manitoba had 1,038 new cases of COVID-19, close to the higher end of the projected range in the model. There was a significant spike of 480 new cases in one day on October 30. The case numbers were expected to continue rising, leading to greater hospitalizations and death.[25]

ii) Manitoba had the highest per capita rate of active COVID-19 cases in the country.[26]

iii) The test positivity rate had soared to over 10.5 per cent provincially.[27]

iv) Community spread had started to occur rampantly in all regions of the province.[28]

v) The dramatic rise in COVID-19 cases put the effectiveness of the contact tracing program in jeopardy.[29] This is a key public health tool used to prevent the spread of a virus.

vi) Cases in young adults (aged 20-39) and seniors (aged 60 and older) were increasing very quickly. The latter group being at highest risk of severe outcomes. The impact on older and vulnerable populations was very concerning. First Nations had a test positivity rate of over 12 per cent and a disproportionate number of COVID-19 cases.[30]

vii) COVID-19 related deaths and hospitalizations were rapidly escalating. Epidemiological data shows that 7 per cent of people diagnosed with COVID-19 required hospitalization and 1.3 per cent will require ICU care.[31] When active cases of COVID-19 surge, the system can expect hospitalizations to rise about 10 days later.[32] viii) The healthcare system was under tremendous strain. Elective surgeries were delayed because there was a need to redeploy medical staff to critical care, medicine and personal care homes to handle COVID-19 cases. This was exacerbated by the fact some hospital staff were also exposed to the virus.[33]

ix) Modelling presented on November 10 showed that Manitoba was tracking along the worst-case scenario in terms of number of cases. Case numbers were expected to rise to 400-1,000 new cases each day by December 2020. Deaths were also expected to rise sharply, potentially doubling to 219 on December 10 with an estimated range of up to 597 deaths on that date. In fact, as of December 10, Manitoba experienced 478 deaths, at the higher end of the projected range.[34]

x) Modelling projected that without intervention, the rapid rise in infections could soon overwhelm our acute care system. COVID-19 patients were projected to require Manitoba's total capacity to provide ICU care by November 23 and would require 100 per cent of Manitoba's capacity to staff clinical hospital beds by mid-December 2020, leaving no room for other patients. The model was based on a maximum ability to provide ICU care for 124 patients. Manitoba's pre-COVID ICU capacity was 72 patients so the system was already under significant strain. On November 17, there were discussions about developing a triage policy to determine who would receive care in the event critical care resources were depleted. Surgical wards were transitioned into COVID-19 Medicine Units and staff were redeployed to create additional ICU capacity.[35]

xi) There was concern that the rise in COVID-19 numbers would coincide with the Christmas holiday season when many hospital staff had planned vacation. Most staff were not able to pick up extra shifts to fill scheduling gaps due to stress and exhaustion.[36]

xii) Numerous protocols and precautions had been implemented to protect vulnerable populations in congregate living settings such as personal care homes and on First Nations communities. These measures worked well in the spring and summer but unfortunately, despite these efforts, outbreaks had occurred in these high-risk settings.[37] xiii) Nine clusters associated with faith-based gatherings, including choir practice and funerals, were identified to have occurred in the fall of 2020.[38]

[72] As a result of added the burden of COVID-19, on December 10-11, 2020, Manitoba reached a peak of 388 hospitalizations and 129 patients in ICU.[39] Therefore, at its peak, COVID-19 resulted in significantly more patients who required ICU care than the system would normally handle (79 per cent more than the usual 72 patients).

[73] Dr. Roussin and public health officials took into account the unintended effects of the restrictions such as adverse economic or mental health impacts but in light of the gravity of the situation, believed these were the minimum measures necessary to protect public health.[40]

[74] After the restrictions were put in place, COVID-19 numbers began to decline, consistent with what the modelling predicted.[41] The Level Red public health measures implemented during the fall of 2020 along with the public's cooperation and compliance with those PHOs changed the trajectory of COVID-19 cases and eased the burden on acute care resources. Manitobans flattened the curve and avoided a disastrous situation.[42]

(v) The Impugned Public Health Orders

[75] November 12, 2020 was the first day of the province-wide "Circuit Break" PHO. At that time, places of worship had to close to in-person religious services. Gatherings were limited to five persons. Starting November 20, 2020, persons were also no longer allowed to gather in private residences subject to certain exceptions, including for health care, personal care and educational instruction or tutoring.[43]

[76] The applicants challenge specific orders from three PHOs that were in effect during three different time periods:

(i) Orders 1(1), 2(1), 15(1) and 15(3) of the November 21, 2020 PHO, in effect from November 22 until December 11, 2020.

(ii) Orders 1(1), 2(1), 16(1) and 16(3) of the December 22, 2020 PHO, in effect from December 23, 2020 to January 8, 2021.[44]

(iii) Orders 1(1), 2(1), 16(1) and 16(3) of the January 8, 2020 PHO, in effect from January 8 to January 22, 2021.

[44] The applicants do not challenge the PHO in effect from December 11 to December 22, however, there was no material difference from the orders that followed on December 22, 2020 or January 8, 2021

[77] Order 1 in each of these impugned PHOs dealt with restrictions on gatherings at private residences. The November 21 PHO provided:

> 1(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), a person who resides in a private residence must not permit a person who does not normally reside in that residence to enter or remain in the residence.
> 1(2) Subsection (1) does not prevent a person from entering the private residence of another person for any of the following purposes:
> (a) to provide health care, personal care or housekeeping services;
>
> (b) for a visit between a child and a parent or guardian who does not normally reside with that child;
> (c) to receive or provide child care;
>
> (d) to provide tutoring or other educational instruction;
>
> (e) to perform construction, renovations, repairs or maintenance;
>
> (f) to deliver items;
>
> (g) to provide real estate or moving services;
>
> (h) to respond to an emergency.
>
> 1(3) A person who resides on their own may
>
> (a) have one other person with whom they regularly interact attend at their private residence; and
> (b) attend at the private residence of one person with whom they regularly interact.

[78] Order 1 of the December 22, 2020 and January 8, 2021 impugned PHOs were substantially the same. Exceptions were added in subsection 1(2) for a landlord to enter a rented premises and for the purpose of moving residences. Subsection 1(3) was renumbered as 1(4). A new subsection 1(3) added an exception allowing persons to attend at a home-based business that was permitted to open under the PHO. A new subsection 1(5) allowed university and college students to live at the private residence of another person in the community where the university or college is located.

[79] Order 2 in each of the impugned PHOs limited public gatherings to five people, except as otherwise permitted. The November 21 PHO provided:

>
> 2(1) Except as otherwise permitted by these Orders, all persons are prohibited from assembling in a gathering of more than five persons at any indoor or outdoor public place or in the common areas of a multi-unit residence.
> 2(2) This Order does not apply to a facility where health care or social services are provided or any part of a facility that is used by a public or private school for instructional purposes.
> 2(3) For certainty, more than five persons may attend a business or facility that is allowed to open under these Orders if the operator of the business or facility has implemented the applicable public health protection measures set out in these Orders.

[80] Order 2 remained substantially the same in the December 22, 2020 and January 8, 2021 PHOs. The one difference was that these two subsequent PHOs included the following exception for organized outdoor gatherings in cars, which had been put in place beginning on December 11, 2020:

> 2(2) This Order does not apply to an organized outdoor gathering or event which persons attend in a motor vehicle if
> (a) all persons stay in their motor vehicle at all times while at the site of the gathering or event;
>
> (b) persons in a motor vehicle do not interact with any person not in their motor vehicle while at the site of the gathering or event; and
> (c) all persons in a motor vehicle reside in the same residence or receive caregiving services from another person in the motor vehicle.

[81] Order 15 in the November 21, 2020 PHO limited gatherings at places of worship. It provided:

>
> 15(1) Except as permitted by subsections (3) and (4), churches, mosques, synagogues, temples and other places of worship must be closed to the public while these Orders are in effect.
> 15(2) Despite subsection (1), religious leaders may conduct services at places of worship so that those services may be made available to the public over the Internet or through other remote means.
> 15(3) A funeral, wedding, baptism or similar religious ceremony may take place at a place of worship provided that no more than five persons, other than the officiant, attend the ceremony.
> 15(4) This Order does not prevent the premises of a place of worship from being used by a public or private school or for the delivery of health care, child care or social services.

[82] Order 15 was renumbered as Order 16 in the December 22 and January 8 PHOs. The restrictions on places of worship remained substantially unchanged except that as of December 11, the following provision was added to allow places of worship to hold an outdoor religious service in vehicles, in accordance with subsection 2(2) discussed above:

> 16(4) This Order does not prevent a church, mosque, synagogue, temple or other place of worship from conducting an outdoor religious service that complies with the requirements of subsection 2(2).

[83] Starting on January 22, 2021, restrictions in impugned PHOs started to ease in light of improving indicators coming out of the Circuit Break, except in northern Manitoba and remote communities. First, outdoor gatherings were relaxed somewhat at private residences. The limit on funerals was expanded to 10 persons. On January 28, up to two persons could visit a private residence. As of February 12, the same PHO applied province wide. Ten persons were now permitted at weddings and funerals. Places of worship could hold in-person services with up to 50 people or 10 per cent of usual capacity.[45] At the time of this hearing, a private residence could allow either two visitors or create a bubble with persons from another residence. Outdoor gatherings had been expanded up to 10 persons on private property or 25 persons on public property. Regular in-person religious services could have up to 100 people or 25 per cent of usual capacity.[46]

B. SUBMISSION OF THE APPLICANTS RESPECTING THE AFFIDAVIT EVIDENCE ADDUCED

[84] In addition to and separate from their positions on the other identified questions in issue, the applicants have adduced evidence which they submit demonstrates that Manitoba has not met the requisite onus so as to establish that the restrictions in the impugned provisions of the public health orders are constitutionally justified pursuant to the governing test in connection to s. 1 of the Charter. The applicants submit that the totality of the evidence (which obviously includes their own experts and their cross-examination of Manitoba's experts) reveals that there is no rational connection between the public health objectives and the impugned provisions. Neither say the applicants is there persuasive evidence to support Manitoba's position that the impugned restrictions minimally impair the Charter rights they infringe. Further, the applicants insist that the deleterious effects of the restrictions are severe and they outweigh any salutary effects resulting from them.

[85] As part of their overall position as advanced in their own evidence and in their cross-examination of the various Manitoba experts, the applicants make certain key assertions. The applicants contend that:

- the modelling data that Manitoba used to justify the orders is flawed and unreliable;
- Manitoba failed or refused to estimate the potential years of life saved by these orders and weigh the results of those conclusions against the loss of life and profound damage resulting from the orders;
- Manitoba failed or refused to consider the opinions of between 45,000 and 50,000 medical doctors and scientists who authored and signed the Great Barrington Declaration advocating against "locking down" societies (the Great Barrington Declaration recommended taking more focussed and special precautions to protect the elderly in immunocompromised populations);
- Manitoba failed to conduct a risk assessment prior to enacting the orders and as a result, failed to account for significant harms to the public. The applicants argue that Manitoba failed or refused to correct course when they say certain legal, social and economic devastation of the orders became apparent. It is the position of the applicants that the lockdowns have caused deaths and other harms from suicide, domestic abuse, increased drug use, mental illness, delayed diagnosis and cancelled surgeries and other harms to society;

- Manitoba failed or refused to complete a cost-benefit analysis of what the applicants call "the lockdown" of the Manitoba population through the impugned orders and that Manitoba similarly failed over the progression of time, to conduct the necessary review of the disproportionate damage the orders have cost to society generally.

[86] While the applicants have argued that there are multiple factors which ought to lead this Court to the conclusion that Manitoba has not met their s. 1 onus, a fundamental part of their argument relates to what they say is the inadequacy or inconclusiveness of any supporting scientific evidence which the applicants have challenged and which they say is inextricably connected to Dr. Roussin's decisions to issue the impugned PHOs.

[87] In challenging Manitoba's scientific evidence with their own affidavit evidence and in the cross-examinations they conducted of Manitoba's expert witnesses, the applicants take aim at what they suggest is Manitoba's inadequate appreciation, misunderstanding and misuse of such factors as:

- the morbidity danger of COVID-19;
- the asymptomatic transmission of COVID-19;
- the RT–PCR testing, infectiousness and Cycle thresholds;
- herd immunity;
- the likelihood of any spread of COVID-19 outdoors;
- the ability to control the spread of COVID-19 in religious settings; and
- variants of concern.

(i) Mortality Danger of COVID-19

[89] Dr. Jay Bhattacharya, a world-renowned epidemiologist, medical doctor, PhD in economics, and full professor at Stanford University, identified in his January 5, 2021 expert report that for a majority of the population, including the vast majority of children and young adults, COVID-19 poses less of a mortality risk than the seasonal influenza. According to a meta-analysis by Dr. John Ioannidis, the median infection survival rate from COVID-19 is 99.77 per cent. For COVID-19 patients under 70, the meta-analysis finds an infection survival rate of 99.95 per cent.[47]

[90] Dr. Bhattacharya wrote that a study of COVID-19 in Geneva published in the prestigious journal The Lancet provided a detailed breakdown of the infection survival rate: 99.9984 per cent for patients 5 to 9 years old; 99.99968 per cent for patients 10 to 19 years old; 99.991 per cent for patients 20 to 49 years old; 99.86 per cent for patients 50 to 64 years old; and 94.6 per cent for patients above 65 years old.[48]

[91] Manitoba's affiants do not dispute that COVID-19 poses the greatest risk of death to older people.

(ii) Asymptomatic Transmission of COVID-19

[92] In his January 5, 2021 affidavit, Dr. Bhattacharya identified two recent, significant peer-reviewed studies which found that asymptomatic spread of COVID-19 is significantly lower than symptomatic spread. Specifically, one of the studies, a meta-analysis of 54 studies in the Journal of American Medical Association Network Open, confirmed that within households where none of the safeguards that restaurants are required to apply are typically applied, symptomatic patients passed on the disease to household members in 18 per cent of instances, while asymptomatic patients passed on the disease to household members in 0.7 per cent of instances.[49]

[93] Dr. Bhattacharya also cited another study of 10 million residents of Wuhan, China, who were tested for the presence of the virus. Only 300 cases of COVID-19 were found and all were symptomatic. Contact tracing identified 1,174 close contacts of these patients, and none of them tested positive for the virus.

[94] Dr. Bhattacharya concluded, based on his review of the medical literature, that asymptomatic individuals are on an order of magnitude less likely to infect others than symptomatic individuals, even in intimate settings such as households where people do not typically wear masks or socially distance. He concluded that the spread of COVID-19 in less intimate settings by asymptomatic individuals, such as in places of worship, is less likely than in households.

[95] Dr. Jason Kindrachuk, an infectious diseases specialist and assistant professor at the University of Manitoba, also discussed asymptomatic transmission. He concluded that while SARS-CoV-2 transmission is likely lower from individuals with asymptomatic infections as compared to symptomatic cases, those in the "pre-symptomatic" phase of disease appear to be able to transmit the virus similarly to symptomatic individuals.[50]

[50] Kindrachuk, Exhibit B, pp. 9-10

[96] Dr. Bhattacharya had not previously addressed "pre-symptomatic transmission" of the disease in his January 5, 2021 expert report. In his responding affidavit, Dr. Bhattacharya attempted to address Dr. Kindrachuk's evidence by explaining that in his previously cited JAMA Netw Open meta-analysis study, the authors concluded that household transmission of the disease from asymptomatic and "pre-symptomatic" patients occurred 0.7 per cent of the time. He also revealed that many of Dr. Kindrachuk's studies were taken into consideration in the larger meta-analysis from JAMA Netw Open, which ultimately determined the vanishingly low rate of asymptomatic and pre-symptomatic transmission.[51]

(iii) RT-PCR Testing, Infectiousness, and Cycle Thresholds

[97] Dr. Bhattacharya explains in his January 5, 2021 report that the RT-PCR test for the SARS-CoV-2 virus is at the heart of the testing system adopted by Canada. He explains that the test amplifies the virus, if present, by a process of repeatedly doubling the concentration of viral genetic material. If the viral load is small, many doublings are required before it is possible to detect the virus. He explains that labs decide in advance how many doublings of the genetic material they will require before deciding that a sample is negative for the presence of the virus. This threshold or "cycle time" determines the rate at which a positive test result will be returned when the original sample does not include viral concentrations in sufficient amount to be infectious.

[98] Dr. Bhattacharya's evidence suggests that a higher-cycle threshold increases the false positive rate of the PCR test because even if a non-infectious viral load is present in the sample obtained from the patient, a large number of permitted doublings could amplify whatever minute or fragmentary viral segment is present such that the test result is positive. A positive test result obtained in this fashion does not mean that such an individual is infectious or contagious. On the contrary says Dr. Bhattacharya, as an individual who tests "positive" using a high-cycle threshold is exceedingly unlikely, or even impossible, to be a transmission risk at all.

[99] Dr. Bhattacharya asserts that the PCR test is not the gold standard for determining whether a patient is infectious. He says that from an epidemiological point of view, infectivity measurement is more important than a measurement of whether the virus is present, since it is possible for a patient to have non-viable viral fragments present, a positive PCR test, and yet not be infectious. He cites a study published in the European Journal of Clinical Microbiology & Infectious Diseases, which determined that culture positivity of the virus decreased progressively by Ct values to reach 12 per cent at a Ct of 33. That means only 12 per cent of the samples spun at a Ct of 33 had a positive culture. Further, no culture was able to be obtained from samples with a Ct of greater than 34. Dr. Bhattacharya also cited a study published in top epidemiological journal Eurosurveillance, which found that if 27 cycles are needed for a positive test, the false positive rate is 34 per cent; if 32 cycles are needed for a positive test, the false positive rate is 92 per cent; if more than 40 cycles are needed for a positive test, the false positive rate is nearly 100 per cent.[52]

[100] Dr. Bhattacharya noted that the WHO published an Information Notice on December 8, 2020 warning users of PCR tests and that it had received user feedback on an elevated risk for false SARS-CoV-2 results when testing specimens using PCR test.[53]

[101] The applicants acknowledge the evidence of Dr. Jared Bullard, a microbiologist employed by Manitoba who works in the Cadham Provincial Lab ("CPL") where all of the PCR tests are analyzed for COVID-19. Dr. Bullard provided an affidavit on behalf of Manitoba wherein he explained how PCR tests work and explained his practice with those tests in the lab. He admitted that the CPL uses a total of 40 cycles of amplification. He explained that specificity is the proportion of people who do not have COVID-19 that the test will call negative, and that poor specificity results in false positives. He further explains that the specificity of the PCR test is greater than 99.9 per cent — i.e., less than 1 in 1,000 will have a false positive result.[54]

[102] He stated that SARS-CoV-2 is detectable by RT-PCR for up to three months.[55]

[103] Dr. Bullard referred to his own study which found that samples with a Ct value of 25 or greater did not grow SARS-CoV-2 in cell culture, and another study published in the Clinical Infectious Diseases Journal (also referred to in Dr. Bhattacharya's January 5, 2021 expert report) which found that for SARS-CoV-2 in cell culture, 70 per cent had a positive culture at a Ct of 25, 20 per cent had a positive culture at a Ct of 30, and less than 3 per cent had a positive culture at a Ct of 35. Dr. Bullard asserted that if an individual tests positive, he has the SARS-CoV-2 pathogen and has been diagnosed with COVID-19.[56] He concluded, however, that no single SARS-CoV-2 PCR Ct value in isolation can be used to determine infectiousness of a case and must be interpreted in the overall clinical context.[57]

[104] Dr. Bullard's expert report revealed that in December 2020, out of 5,825 positive PCR results in Manitoba, 18 per cent had a Ct of 25-30, 18 per cent had a Ct of 30-36, and 7 per cent had a Ct of 36-40.[58]

[105] In response, Dr. Thomas Warren, an infectious disease specialist and medical microbiologist and adjunct professor at McMaster University, agreed with Dr. Bullard that a positive PCR test represents the identification of SARS-CoV-2 virus fragments. Dr. Warren clarified however that a positive PCR test result did not necessarily indicate that the entire virus is present or that the patient has COVID-19. He responded to Dr. Bullard's assertion that a PCR has a specificity of greater than 99.9 per cent, and stated that while a positive test means there is a 99.9 per cent likelihood that the person has or recently had the SARS-CoV-2 virus in their body, it does not mean that the person is infectious or that they have COVID-19 disease (symptoms). In this regard, Dr. Warren concluded that the presence of SARS-CoV-2 virus as detected by PCR is necessary but not sufficient to indicate either infectiousness or COVID-19 disease properly defined.[59]

[106] In response to Dr. Bullard, Dr. Bhattacharya analyzed the December 2020 lab data and found that 25 per cent (1,456) of the 5,825 people that Manitoba considered a

[59] Affidavit of Dr. Thomas Warren [Warren], Exhibit B, pp. 3, 5-6

"positive" case in December 2020 had Ct values that strongly suggested they were not infectious.[60]

[107] Both Dr. Bhattacharya and Dr. Warren in response to Dr. Bullard referred to the second warning from the WHO on January 20, 2021 where it gave guidance on PCR testing which states: "health care providers must consider any result in combination with timing of sampling, specimen type, assay specifics, clinical observations, patient history, confirmed status of any contacts, and epidemiological information." Further, the WHO guidance advises: "the probability that a person who has a positive result (SARS-CoV-2 detected) is truly infected with SARS-CoV-2 decreases as prevalence decreases, irrespective of the claimed specificity."[61]

(iv) Herd Immunity

[108] Dr. Bhattacharya writes that the science strongly suggests that recovery from SARS-CoV-2 infection will provide lasting protection against reinfection, either complete immunity or protection that makes a severe reinfection extremely unlikely. He writes that herd immunity, a scientifically proven phenomenon, occurs when enough people have immunity so that most infected people cannot find new uninfected people to infect, leading to the end of the pandemic.[62] He suggests a strategy of "focused protection" to better protect the elderly while allowing the rest of society to live their lives.[63] This approach of "focused protection" has been endorsed by over 50,000 scientists, physicians and other medical professionals and is set out by Dr. Bhattacharya (its co-author) in the Great Barrington Declaration.

[109] Dr. Kindrachuk disagrees with Dr. Bhattacharya's approach and cites the example of Manaus Brazil, which he states was devastated by the first wave of the pandemic with 4.5-fold excess mortality. He cited a seroprevalence study which found that 76 per cent of the Manaus population was infected with SARS-CoV-2 and had antibodies by October 2020, but virus transmission continued anyway with a devastating surge of SARS-CoV-2 infections by mid-January 2021. He concluded that the data from Brazil provides supportive evidence that a herd immunity approach through natural infections could have devastating impacts on public health.[64]

[110] In reply, Dr. Bhattacharya points out that the Manaus Brazil example is based on a single, flawed, seroprevalence study conducted in Manaus in mid-2020. He states that the 76 per cent estimate was not based on a random survey, but on blood donors, who are a very select group of people in the developing world. He illustrates that the seroprevalence among the blood donors was 52 per cent, which was adjusted upwards based on questionable mathematical modelling of waning antibodies. He also states that it is impossible to conclude that lockdowns in a single location are a good strategy to control the epidemic.[65]

[65] Bhattacharya 2, Exhibit A, p. 18

(v) Spread of COVID-19 Outdoors

[111] The applicants insist in their submissions that Manitoba has not provided any scientific evidence that COVID-19 transmits easily outdoors or that being outdoors amongst other people is a risk to the Manitoba population.

(vi) COVID-19 Spread in Religious Settings

[112] Dr. Bhattacharya asserts that places of worship can safely hold indoor worship services, with minimal effect on the spread of COVID-19 disease, by following guidelines recommended by the CDC. Such guidelines include recommendations to protect staff who are at higher risk for severe illness, engaging in handwashing, mask wearing when social distancing is difficult, social distancing, disinfecting the worship space before and after each service, minimizing food sharing, encouraging symptomatic congregants to stay home, and posted signs about COVID-19 disease.[66]

[113] He referred to medical studies which revealed that church attendance provides psychological benefits for attendees, especially for adolescents. He also referred to medical studies which showed the psychological benefits provided by communal singing in the process of worship which is shown to foster a sense of belonging and connectedness that is crucially important with measurable effects on mental health.[67]

[114] Dr. Roussin's reasoning for closing places of worship in November 2020 is that activities at those places are comparable to theatres, concert halls, or indoor sporting events, and involve prolonged contact between persons, which could include hugging, handshaking, choirs, singing, and sharing items.[68]

[115] In Dr. Carla Loeppky's affidavit, she refers to clusters associated with attendance at faith-based events between August 2020 - February 2021. She also includes a chart which is called "Potential Acquisition Settings are Diverse" in which it is identified that in the one-month period of September 1, 2020 – October 2, 2020, 3.2 per cent of cases were potentially acquired at faith-based settings.[69]

(vii) Variants of Concern

[116] Dr. Kindrachuk and Dr. Roussin[70] first raised the issue of "Variants of Concern" (VOC) in their affidavits. (I note by way of judicial notice that since the hearing of this matter, public and scientific concern for VOCs have become even more acute.) Dr. Kindrachuk states in his affidavit that variant B.1.1.7 has increased transmissibility ranging from 30 - 70 per cent over circulating non-VOCs and has been associated with increased risk of severe and fatal disease in hospitalized patients. He recommends decreased community transmission to reduce the potential for additional emergence of VOCs. [71]

[117] In response, Dr. Bhattacharya explained that VOCs do not escape immunity provided by previous infections or by the COVID-19 vaccines. He states that the presence of VOCs pose little additional risk of hospital overcrowding or excess mortality, and that such predictions are based on faulty modelling. He cites Florida as an example of a jurisdiction where UK variant B.1.1.7 is widespread but cases have dropped sharply. He explains that vaccines have decoupled the growth in COVID-19 cases from COVID-19 mortality. While cases in Canada have gone up in March 2021, deaths have continued to fall.[72] Finally, Dr. Bhattacharya points out that if restrictive public health measures did not work to protect Canadians from the less infectious COVID-19, there is little reason to expect that they would work to suppress VOCs.[73]

[118] Having examined in the two previous sections the submissions and positions of Manitoba and the applicants respecting the initial and responding affidavit evidence that was adduced, I now turn to the cross-examination that was conducted by both parties of some of the selected affiants. I then proceed to provide the Court's assessment of all of the evidence, including that which was heard in any of the cross-examinations.

VIII. THE CROSS-EXAMINATIONS ON THE AFFIDAVITS

[119] As earlier noted, the applicants' challenge to what Manitoba contends is the supporting scientific evidence for the impugned PHOs continued in their (the applicants) cross-examinations of the selected Manitoba affiants. So too did Manitoba in its own cross-examination of the selected applicants' affiants continue with its defence of a scientific evidentiary foundation, which (in the context of its response to an unprecedented pandemic) Manitoba maintains constitutes a sound and compelling basis for the public health policy choices and restrictions contained in the impugned PHOs.

[73] Bhattacharya 2, Exhibit A, p. 10

[120] With the above in mind, the Court paid close attention to all of the cross-examinations conducted. I present below only a selected sampling of some of the segments of the cross-examinations that the respective parties deemed particularly relevant and which they wished to highlight for the Court's consideration.

A. THE APPLICANTS' CROSS-EXAMINATION OF SELECTED MANITOBA AFFIANTS

(i) Dr. Brent Roussin

[121] Although all of Manitoba's witnesses came under scrutiny in the course of the applicants' cross-examinations, the cross-examination of Dr. Roussin represented a particularly significant part of the applicants' challenge to Manitoba's position. The applicants highlighted a number of points from Dr. Roussin's cross-examination. These points included the following:

- That there are no social scientists or economists on his public health team;
- That he acknowledged that the most common transmission of the virus appears to be from infectious droplets or aerosols discharged from an infected person by exhaling, coughing, talking loudly, or similar activities;
- Asymptomatic spread is not a significant driver of infection and spread of the virus;
- Variants of Concern are not what caused Dr. Roussin to implement the public health orders;
- For most infected people, the symptoms they experience will be mild, of short duration, largely benign, and followed by a full recovery and complete return to normal health;
- 91.9 per cent of all cases of COVID-19 in Manitoba did not have a severe outcome, hospitalization or death;
- The 8.1 per cent of cases suffering a severe outcome are primarily over the age of 60, with significant comorbidities and amongst the Indigenous community;

- Manitoba has known the cohorts most at risk of severe outcomes since the beginning of the pandemic;
- There is a distinction between the SARS-CoV-2 virus, and the disease COVID-19 (meaning symptoms or pathological effects from infection by the virus);
- PCR tests identify the presence of SARS-CoV-2 virus RNA fragments;
- A positive PCR test for the presence of SARS-CoV-2 virus fragments is considered a case of COVID-19 disease in Manitoba;
- A positive PCR test indicates the person would have been exposed to the virus potentially 100 days earlier;
- Public health does not know if a positive PCR test is infectious or infected with the virus;
- Public health is aware that the test could have detected only dead viral fragments in the person's nose;
- Public health is not provided with Ct values and has not mandated reporting of Ct values;
- Dr. Roussin acknowledges that Ct value is inversely correlated with infectiousness of the sample tested;
- Dr. Roussin is aware of the research conducted by Dr. Bullard and Dr. Loeppky, which found low probability of infectiousness in positive PCR tests even at cycle thresholds lower than 25;
- Dr. Roussin is also aware that studies indicated only 28.9 per cent and 31 per cent of the positive PCR tests sampled were likely infectious;
- Manitoba will cycle tests up to 40 cycles to find a positive result;
- The public is not told if a positive case is infectious and public health is not told if the positive case has the disease COVID-19;
- It is not generally explained that a positive case may not be able to infect anyone else or that it may be a case of an old exposure going back some 100 days;
- Dr. Roussin acknowledges that the number of positive cases is one of the most important factors in deciding to implement the public health orders;
- The public health measures have generally not stopped community transmission of the virus;

- While the knowledge of the virus has evolved, the public health response has not;
- Both COVID-19 and influenza have a one- to three-day pre-symptomatic period;
- Dr. Roussin acknowledges that some jurisdictions did not implement public health measures like the ones implemented in Manitoba (see Sweden for example);
- Cases peaked on November 12, 2020, and trended downward after that and hospitalizations peaked on December 10 and 11, 2020;
- There were 3,084 clinical beds in Manitoba as of November 30 and 173 ICU beds in Manitoba as of November 30, 2020;
- There were 129 patients in the ICU both COVID and non-COVID;
- The change to permit churches in cars did not result from a change in the science;
- The only study conducted on harms resulting from the public health orders was the November 1, 2020 document found at Exhibit "D" to the affidavit of Dr. Loeppky; and
- Manitoba has not produced any data about the rate of transmission of the virus in settings other than churches with which to compare the relative risk in different settings.

[122] In addition to the above points extracted on cross-examination, additional detail and nuance were provided by Dr. Roussin touching upon the above and other matters.

[123] As part of his decision-making framework and team, he noted that an "Incident Command" structure (in which he and Lanette Siragusa lead) was created in February 2020. It flowed from an existing respiratory virus steering committee which they co-chaired in 2019. Manitoba had initiated an emergency response plan within the Incident Command structure before cases of COVID-19 arrived in Manitoba. Dr. Roussin had also started participating in a special advisory committee with federal, provincial, and territorial chief public health officers in mid-January 2020.

[124] Dr. Roussin explained his approach as one meant to identify the most vulnerable people for severe outcomes and reduce overall transmission. Strategies included surveillance, case identification, contact identification and public health measures. The general goal was to minimize morbidity/mortality while also minimizing social disruption. While he did acknowledge that it was known that older people, primarily over 60, were the most vulnerable, it was also known that a significant portion of the population has underlying conditions that make them more vulnerable (lung disease, heart disease, diabetes, obesity and the immunocompromised).

[125] Although the current variant of concern was not a driver of the impugned PHOs, the fact that it was known that mutations occur in this type of virus was certainly a factor in Manitoba's response. In other words, unchecked transmission increases risk, which could then lead to more virulent VOCs.

[126] In the course of his being questioned extensively on case definitions, on the subject of what constitutes a case, on the subject of the PCR test and whether some persons with positive PCR tests are not likely to have been infectious at the time of the test, Dr. Roussin also responded by noting as follows:

> — The case definition is created at a national level — at the advisory committee. It is very consistent across the country, which accordingly, permits comparison;
> — The use of the total positive PCR tests per day (adjusted to remove duplicate tests) is for surveillance purposes. That is, it gives them a good picture of the "disease burden" in society;

— Leading up to the circuit break in November, he was accurately able to predict that hospital admissions would equal 7 per cent of the daily reported case numbers in 10 to 14 days. ICU admissions would equal 1.4 per cent;

— If the number of cases/positive tests is doubling in a certain time period, it will identify a trend and provide a very accurate picture of the spread of the virus;

— At a population level, with 1,000 tests per day, the PCR tool is very important;

— At the individual level, you need clinical assessment; direction for individuals to self-isolate depends on an overall assessment — positive cases are only directed to self-isolate if they cannot rule out infectiousness; and — There is very little asymptomatic testing that occurs in Manitoba. Most asymptomatic testing is done of persons who have had significant exposure to a positive case.

[127] Dr. Roussin explained in his testimony about how he had an obvious concern for how the uncontrolled spread of the virus would have a significant impact on hospitals. In this regard, the impact would not just be the direct impact of COVID-19, but also the indirect impact flowing from a flood of cases into the hospital where non-COVID-19 patients would be affected as well. Indeed, this is what Dr. Roussin noted was happening in November and December when many surgeries had to be postponed, which in turn, has an effect on morbidity and mortality.

[128] Dr. Roussin's evidence was clear in saying that he did consider collateral harms that might flow from the PHOs. In that regard, he considered addiction, domestic abuse, and received reports from specialty leads in psychiatry and psychology in the health system. They reported back to him that the benefits of the measures still outweigh the harms. In short, Dr. Roussin was clear that he was engaged consistently with clinical leads and specialists and was always considering the unintended consequences of the PHOs. He recognized that the restrictive PHOs can disproportionately impact communities, but he also recognized the much greater and disproportionate effect that widespread transmission could have on the vulnerable.

[129] On the subject of modelling, Dr. Roussin noted that he works with a team of modelers who are experts and highly specialized. They work at a national level with other modelers to provide the best information possible.

[130] Dr. Roussin provided evidence that in the late spring and early summer of 2020, ministers and MLAs led a widespread consultation with members of the faith community. This engagement and consultation included surveys and discussion after which, the feedback was brought back to public health. These consultations created a guidance document.

[131] When cross-examined about the restrictions with respect to places of worship, he provided a wide range of information respecting what was considered, balanced and attempted given the urgent public health objectives. In that context, he provided important information with respect to the assessment of risk and how the assessment of risk was in part based on how the virus transmits in a particular type of setting.

[132] Respecting the Great Barrington Declaration and the concepts of natural or herd immunity and focused protection, Dr. Roussin observed that much is still unknown in respect of the duration of immunity from infection in the context of COVID-19. This is especially so in relation to the variants of concern. Dr. Roussin emphasized vaccination as the preferred method of immunization, which has the benefit of not subjecting the entire population to illness. As it relates to targeted protection, Dr. Roussin provided testimony and explanation with respect to Manitoba's approach.

[133] In reviewing Dr. Roussin's testimony and cross-examination, I can say that I found that he gave straightforward and credible evidence that assisted in augmenting and refining aspects of his affidavits. Even when he was forcefully challenged and required to address certain and occasional inconsistencies or incongruities in approach or method based on what was either incomplete, evolving or the sometimes imperfect science, Dr. Roussin provided clarifying background and explanations for his decisions and concerns, all of which were clearly rooted in his challenging duty performed pursuant to s. 3 of The Public Health Act. It is a duty, which following his testimony, I find he performed reasonably in attempting to respond to a public health emergency with measures that, however difficult, restricted freedoms no greater than necessary. Leaving aside whether Dr. Roussin and Manitoba generally can be justifiably criticized for having taken some of their decisions too slowly and late (criticisms voiced by critics asserting a very different perspective than that of the applicants), the decisions and the accompanying balancing when they finally did take place, were nonetheless clearly based on prima facie current and reliable scientific information and knowledge gathered from Canada and around the world. The sources would have also included peer-reviewed articles, recommendations from the WHO and from the lessons learned from the experiences in other jurisdictions.

[134] In the end, Dr. Roussin presented as a dedicated chief public health officer, who as I will repeat later, relied on all of the evidence available, including the scientific evidence, which despite its evolving and still incomplete nature, I find to be reliable. In doing so, Dr. Roussin drew reasonable inferences and applied common sense.

Lanette Siragusa, Dr. Jason Kindrachuk, Dr. Carla Loeppky, Dr. James Blanchard, and Dr. Jared Bullard

[135] In addition to Dr. Roussin, also subject to cross-examination by the applicants were the above noted Manitoba affiants. While all of these affiants provided important information in their affidavits and in their subsequent cross-examination testimony, their cross-examinations were not on my assessment, as determinative as the cross-examination conducted of Dr. Roussin. Accordingly, while I have fully considered and taken into account their affidavits and the challenges brought to them by the applicants (as highlighted in the oral and written submissions made by the applicants), I propose to deal with my account of their cross-examinations in a more summary fashion.

(ii) Lanette Siragusa

[136] Lanette Siragusa is the provincial lead health service integration and quality chief nursing officer. With Dr. Roussin, she is a principal participant in the Incident Command structure for COVID-19. She explained that her focus is on the clinical side of the province's health system response (and not the public health response). That focus includes all users of the health system, COVID-19 patients and all other patients.

[137] Ms Siragusa was challenged by the applicants with respect to the concerns in numbers and with respect to the degree to which the healthcare system was truly being overwhelmed. In cross-examination, she acknowledged that her team anticipated and planned for 173 ICU beds. Questions were raised with respect to the identified shortage and what were in fact the available beds vis-à-vis the number of patients in the ICU. In respect of ICU capacity, Ms Siragusa explained that the reported numbers reflected both general ICU and cardiac ICU capacity (which is 14). She noted that this would not normally be an encroachment on cardiac ICU, but in the circumstances, it might have been necessary to encroach depending on the exigencies and priorities. As it relates to the report that medicine beds could be increased by more than 600 beds by November 30, 2020, she did not confirm that staffing was actually in place, but that a plan was in place. Equipment and supplies had been purchased, but it was still left to determine the needs of the patients.

[138] In the context of the pressures on the healthcare system, Ms Siragusa noted that with COVID-19 and the outbreaks, hundreds of staff were off sick. She also explained that even if there were 173 critical care spaces, in her view, the 129 patients represented a system that was at full capacity. Given the shortages of staff, nurses who had never worked in critical care were now being added. Even at 129 patients, Ms Siragusa noted that the staff and the physicians felt exhausted physically, mentally, and spiritually. In other words, the fact that 173 ICU spaces were identified did not necessarily mean that the person power was in place to do what needed to be done in the way it needed to be done. In short, the circumstances in mid-December 2020, were quite dire.

[139] Although Ms Siragusa noted that cancellation of surgeries were required, it was not the public health orders that gave rise to those cancellations. Cancellations were decided by medical clinical experts based on what was happening in the hospitals. The purpose was to provide for greater capacity to respond to COVID-19. In some circumstances, COVID-19 outbreaks occurred in hospitals. In those instances, staff became infected and had to be isolated, which also contributed to the need to cancel surgeries.

[140] In the end, Ms Siragusa seemed to suggest that throughout the second wave, despite the incredible pressures, the system did not break. It was able to address the increase in usage from COVID-19 patients despite the challenges. She acknowledged that sacrifices were made to elective surgeries and that there would be repercussions from that. Nonetheless, in dealing with both COVID-19 cases and non-COVID-19 related patients, Ms Siragusa allowed that while the service that was provided was not always the "gold standard" it was the best that could be done in the circumstances.

(iii) Dr. Jason Kindrachuk

[141] In his cross-examination, Dr. Kindrachuk agreed with the WHO definition of "herd immunity" suggesting that it is the indirect protection from an infectious disease that happens when a population is immune through vaccination or immunity developed through previous infection. In this context, he acknowledged "in theory" it could be achievable through infection and if and when it occurs, it can slow or stop further spread of the virus in the community. Nonetheless, Dr. Kindrachuk insisted that it is challenging to determine when herd immunity will be reached, or if it can be reached. He noted that the Manaus Brazil study does not suggest that herd immunity is impossible, but it does suggest that there are challenges to trying to determine if and when herd immunity might be reached. He insisted that so far, herd immunity has not been proven for sustained immunity from natural infection.

[142] Dr. Kindrachuk maintained that vaccinations are the best means to achieve herd immunity. It is faster and safer than herd immunity through natural exposure. He noted that one important question relates to whether with natural immunity, such immunity is sustained for a long enough period of time to be able to reach a sustained herd immunity threshold.

[143] When questioned about other measures, he acknowledged that masks, physical distancing and handwashing are useful in preventing COVID-19 transmission as is proper ventilation for indoor spaces.

[144] Dr. Kindrachuk noted that because of the variants of concern, there is now an increased burden of disease on younger ages. They now are more vulnerable than they had been even in early 2020. Nonetheless, it was Dr. Kindrachuk's view at the time of his testimony (at the application hearing), that within a few months, vaccines and restrictions when used together, could turn the tide of the epidemic.

(iv) Dr. Carla Loeppky

[145] Dr. Carla Loeppky is the director and lead epidemiologist in the Epidemiology and Surveillance Unit with the Department of Health, Seniors and Active Living. Epidemiology information provides further evidence for the decision makers in respect of public health orders. Such reports were provided to Dr. Roussin, cabinet ministers and the health incident command group.

[146] In her cross-examination, Dr. Loeppky was challenged in respect of the lab reports that her department receives. In that regard, she acknowledged that they do not get information on symptom onset, nothing about pre-existing conditions, nothing about immune response, nothing about the amount of virus in the sample, and nothing in respect of symptom to time to onset. Similarly, when Dr. Loeppky's department gets a positive test result, it has no idea of how infectious the positive patient is. Indeed, once a positive test is sent to Dr. Loeppky's department, it is a case of COVID-19.

[147] She acknowledges that a clinical evaluation is not provided along with the positive PCR results. Dr. Loeppky's department reports all data to public health, but she acknowledges that report summaries to the media do not report how many test positive results are infectious. Despite that fact, it is Dr. Loeppky's view that the information they provide to the general public strikes a balance with providing important details on a daily basis. She does not think that adding information about infectiousness would be beneficial.

[148] When questioned about clusters of the virus, Dr. Loeppky explained that by definition, a cluster implies transmission. In those instances, one looks for symptomatic people linked by person, place and time — linkages, groupings, dynamics. This would not include positive people whose infectious period had ended months ago. As it relates to clusters in churches, Dr. Loeppky acknowledged that they cannot be certain that persons picked up their infection at church. In a cluster, there is an assumption that others got infected by the index case, although that cannot be certain. In reality, in every cluster, there will be an index case that got the infection from elsewhere and brought it to the location of the cluster.

[149] As it relates to the use of models, Dr. Loeppky acknowledged that models can be a very useful tool to help guide decision making. In the context of the current pandemic,

Dr. Loeppky noted a close correlation between models and what in fact happened in "real life".

(v) Dr. James Blanchard

[150] Dr. James Blanchard was cross-examined as someone who has experience in practicing medicine for two years in northern Manitoba, was a provincial epidemiologist in the 1990s and is currently assisting several countries (India, Pakistan and some African countries) in their COVID-19 response. While one of Manitoba's affiants, he is not currently advising Manitoba in respect of its COVID-19 response or strategy.

[151] In his cross-examination, he acknowledged that COVID-19 has many similarities to the flu, but that there are nonetheless, very important differences. These differences are what is important in understanding the epidemic's potential and control measures.

[152] Certain parts of Dr. Blanchard's evidence were juxtaposed with that of Dr. Kettner, one of the applicants' affiants. The evidence of Dr. Kettner suggests a response to COVID-19 that would be based on local epidemiological analysis and calculations. Dr. Blanchard disagrees with this approach and believes that a rapid and effective response should not be based predominately on what you discover locally. In that regard, Dr. Blanchard takes the position that it is possible to set policies based on what is learned elsewhere in the world and about how the virus behaves elsewhere. He notes that local calculation is not necessary. While it is necessary to understand the local context (for the purposes of the required rapid response), one nonetheless needs to use evidence acquired from elsewhere with respect to issues of transmissibility, fatality, etc.

Dr. Blanchard noted that it can often take too long to do a local analysis and that local information may not be as robust.

[153] It was the evidence of Dr. Kettner that the risk of acquiring the virus in church was low based on numbers of church-based clusters. However, Dr. Blanchard points out that such an opinion ignores the fact that cases were already low in Manitoba during that period when churches were open. Dr. Blanchard maintains that the virus can nonetheless spread in church settings. He also notes that Dr. Kettner appears to have examined the Manitoba experience without considering the potential for transmission if the virus became more widespread. It is in this context that Dr. Blanchard notes that it becomes useful to examine the situation elsewhere by which it is possible to observe what would happen and has already happened if the virus was widespread.

[154] Dr. Blanchard also noted in his evidence that vaccines are a major factor in protecting the vulnerable. He is not of the view that natural immunity protects the vulnerable and indeed points out the obvious, that the vulnerable would have to get sick first.

[155] Dr. Blanchard agrees that we do have to assess the impacts of policy and that public health measures can indeed have negative effects. Still, when a global examination is taken of the current pandemic, it is possible to see what has happened where there has been little control of the pandemic and how the results can often lead to chaos in healthcare systems and accompanying huge economic disruption. This chaos and disruption he points out are usually caused by the severity of the COVID-19 wave and not the public health measures.

[156] Importantly, Dr. Blanchard noted that on the subject of variants, Manitoba was correct to restrict gatherings because of the potential danger of the virus mutate. This concern is well-founded and arose early on because of what happened with similar viruses: SARS and MERS. Both of those viruses had high-fatality rates and there is a concern that the COVID-19 virus could similarly mutate to lead to even greater fatality rates and greater infectiousness.

[157] Dr. Blanchard noted that part of his concern with "focused protection" is that the increased number of actual cases needed to get to herd immunity would accentuate the risk of more mutations along with a much higher level of mortality and morbidity. To permit this to happen according to Dr. Blanchard, particularly before vaccines are distributed and properly in place, would be reckless public health policy.

[158] Dr. Blanchard maintained in cross-examination that transmission is slowed by public health policy and that a strategy to flatten the curve (reduce transmission) can effectively delay naturally-acquired immunity because the plan would be to provide immunity by vaccine instead of by infection (which involves getting sick). It is interesting to note that on the subject of immunity, it was Dr. Blanchard's position that assuming that 70 per cent infection is needed for herd immunity by natural infection, there would be a resulting 12,000 more deaths in Manitoba. In this connection, Dr. Kettner did not consider the impact on morbidity and mortality or the fact that if the policy of herd immunity through natural infection is followed, it would inevitably lead to many more fatalities.

[159] Dr. Blanchard raised serious questions about the impracticality of successfully implementing the approach advocated in the Great Barrington Declaration.

[160] As it relates to public health orders and the accompanying restrictions on churches, Dr. Blanchard views Dr. Kettner's approach as unwise policy. According to Dr. Blanchard, the purpose of restricting indoor gathering is to prevent transmission at a population level. That does not mean treating all indoor gatherings equally. While PHOs ought to be equally applied to similar settings, it is necessary for officials to look at how that application may function in terms of an impact on the epidemic more generally and on society. There is a difference between equitable impacts and equality in terms of how measures are applied. Coherence is important and that will involve balancing various considerations and impacts in respect of differing social and economic activities. It is important says Dr. Blanchard that policies are coherent and balanced in order to get the public to comply with the constraints.

(vi) Dr. Jared Bullard

[161] In his cross-examination, Dr. Jared Bullard confirmed that he provided advice in respect of Manitoba's public health response to COVID-19.

[162] He acknowledged that PCR tests do not look for the whole virus, but rather parts or fragments of the nucleic acid particular to SARS-CoV-2. He also noted that PCR tests do not detect replicative virus or infective virus and that PCR tests can pick up viral fragments in the back of the nose going back 100 days after the exposure to the virus. He also opined that PCR tests can pick up viral fragments in the back of the nose up to 60 to 90 days after infection by the virus. Also, it is possible for fragments of SARS-CoV-2 to be detected in the nose with a positive PCR test in a person who was never actually infected by the virus.

[163] He confirmed that Manitoba uses PCR test platforms that employ 40 and 45 cycles. The Ct value inversely correlates with the amount of genetic material in the sample tested. The higher the Ct value, the lesser amount of genetic material in the sample. The lower the Ct value, the higher the amount of genetic material in sample. Dr. Bullard pointed out that it is increasingly clear that there is a correlation between Ct value and the infectiousness of a PCR positive sample. Dr. Bullard noted that studies have found that amongst other variables considered, Ct value was significant in predicting infectiousness.

[164] As with Dr. Roussin, when I consider the affidavit evidence of Ms Siragusa, Dr. Kindrachuk, Dr. Loeppky, Dr. Blanchard, and Dr. Bullard (along with their roles described and opinions offered), they all provide credible and reliable assertive foundational evidence for Manitoba's position on its s. 1 defence. When I consider as well that evidence in light of the respective cross-examinations on their affidavits and the sometimes direct and indirect challenges made to the medical and scientific information used by those individual affiants and Manitoba more generally, there is no new or convincing basis that would cause me to conclude that either those affiants or Manitoba did not have the requisite medical and scientific basis upon which to rely for their opinions or in some cases, their actions. More specifically, following their cross-examinations, there is nothing that would persuasively suggest (as the applicants in this case have) that deaths from COVID-19 are not real, that positive PCR cases of COVID-19 are not real, that Manitoba's modelling projections were proven incorrect and/or that in making the difficult decisions required of them, these public health officials failed to properly balance collateral effects.

B. MANITOBA'S CROSS-EXAMINATION OF SELECTED APPLICANT AFFIANTS

(i) Dr. Jay Bhattacharya

[165] As in the case of Dr. Roussin's cross-examination as conducted by the applicants, Dr. Bhattacharya's cross-examination as conducted by Manitoba represented a significant part of Manitoba's defence of its own position (and a response to the applicants' challenge) respecting the medical and scientific evidentiary foundation upon which Manitoba relies.

[166] Dr. Bhattacharya testified as an expert in health economics. He researches and writes primarily in the field of health outcomes related to various financial parameters in the United States, including Medicare, private insurance coverage, physician spending, the Affordable Care Act, NIH funding and the ownership of facilities. Prior to COVID-19, he had done limited work in respect of anything dealing with viruses and much of what he did was connected to economics. He acknowledged in the course of his cross-examination that his knowledge of immunology is based on his studies in medical school and the articles he has since read.

[167] When asked whether COVID-19 poses a risk to health, Dr. Bhattacharya acknowledged that for a segment of the population, COVID-19 may pose a significant risk of death. He also acknowledged that studies throughout the world have demonstrated that actual infections are much higher than known infections since many people may choose not to get tested or do not recognize the need to be tested. Dr. Bhattacharya accepts that irrespective of the infection/fatality rate, COVID-19 has resulted in a very large number of deaths, including over 3 million worldwide, approaching 600,000 in the United States and as of the earlier part of 2021, 24,000 in Canada.

[168] On the subject of the spread of COVID-19 by individuals who do not display symptoms, Dr. Bhattacharya admitted that an important part of his opinion rests on the proposition that asymptomatic transmission of the virus is very rare. Indeed, it would appear that Dr. Bhattacharya did not distinguish between asymptomatic transmission and pre-symptomatic transmission, instead characterizing both concepts as "asymptomatic transmission". It was Dr. Bhattacharya's position in his second report that the "clear implication of this scientific fact is that many intrusive lockdown policies … could be replaced with less intrusive symptom checking requirements, with little or no detriment to infection control outcomes". Despite being confronted in the course of his cross-examination with commentary from the literature that one would have expected would precipitate more nuance in Dr. Bhattacharya's position, Dr. Bhattacharya continued to insist that asymptomatic transmission, including pre-symptomatic transmission, had an upper limit of 0.7 per cent secondary attack rate.

[169] Dr. Bhattacharya discussed non-pharmaceutical interventions in both his reports and noted that "lockdowns" delay infections into the future rather than preventing them from occurring altogether. He did agree that they can be used to reduce the peak number of infections and also agreed that delaying infections until vaccines can be made and made widely available was an approach that could be followed.

[170] When asked about the harms of "lockdowns" Dr. Bhattacharya acknowledged that the PHOs do not directly cause falling vaccination rates, declines in cardiac care, or declines in cancer screening or elective surgeries.

[171] Dr. Bhattacharya had earlier in one of his reports asserted that social isolation had contributed to a large rise in dementia related deaths. When confronted with the entirety of an article that he cited in his report, Dr. Bhattacharya acknowledged that there were in fact several reasons given for the increase in such deaths.

[172] Dr. Bhattacharya had opined in his reports that because of the social isolation relating to the lockdowns and restrictions, deaths due to suicide would increase. He did acknowledge when confronted with Canadian suicide statistics, that there was a drop in suicides in 2020.

[173] When asked in cross-examination about the reality that in Manitoba, even during the restrictions, persons could always go outside to socialize, walk, exercise, etc., with other persons, he noted that to the extent that those activities were not restricted, Manitoba may not have imposed a true "lockdown".

[174] Again, when speaking to the issue of harms during the lockdown, Dr. Bhattacharya acknowledged that provincial and federal economic policies designed to support workers and any legislation permitting persons to not work if they have particular vulnerabilities, would indeed act to assist in the protection of workers.

[175] On the subject of COVID-19 restrictions in children, Dr. Bhattacharya had earlier noted in his first report, various harms caused by school closures. Dr. Bhattacharya had apparently not taken into account in his analysis, Manitoba's decision to keep schools open, a decision with which Dr. Bhattacharya indicated he agreed.

[176] Respecting recommendations around religious services and any related restrictions, Dr. Bhattacharya acknowledged in cross-examination that he had failed to note that the WHO has stated that if and where necessary, religious exercises should be conducted remotely and virtually wherever possible.

[177] On the subject of the Great Barrington Declaration, he acknowledged that there are significant disagreements about the policies flowing from the Great Barrington Declaration. He acknowledges that many scientists around the world do not accept his approach and indeed, feel that it is not appropriate. More specifically and in respect of the concept of "focused protection", Dr. Bhattacharya acknowledges that many of Manitoba's measures are consistent with the concept including the following:

- limiting visitors to PCHs and hospitals;
- limiting staff to work in one PCH;
- limiting the contact with different staff residents;
- PPE for staff;
- protecting the Indigenous population;
- workplace safety laws;
- amendments to employment laws to allow persons to stay home when sick;
- use of human rights laws to protect vulnerable employees;
- telehealth for vulnerable persons; and
- prioritizing health care workers, residents of PCHs and elderly for vaccinations.

[178] In response to questions concerning the Great Barrington Declaration and about which measures and how they might be reasonably implemented by government, Dr. Bhattacharya noted that it would be for government to determine how to best implement the principles of the declaration as it was not his role to do so.

[179] Dr. Bhattacharya acknowledged that lockdowns could be used as a last resort and suggested that a jurisdiction could build more hospitals before considering a lockdown. In this regard, he did however acknowledge that hospital capacity is not just a question of space, but also staffing.

[180] Respecting PCR tests, Dr. Bhattacharya noted that the PCR test was never designed to measure infectiousness and that a single PCR test is but a snapshot in time.

[181] I have reviewed carefully the testimony and cross-examination of Dr. Bhattacharya given the importance of his evidence to the position being advanced by the applicants. In considering Dr. Bhattacharya's evidence, the Court must acknowledge without hesitation his undisputed and strong academic credentials as a professor at one of the world's leading universities. Despite those obvious credentials and general qualifications, questions can be and were raised respecting the weight that should attach to some of his opinions and views on the specific topics of immunology and virus spread. On these topics — in the absence of a more consistent and more specialized long-term academic focus and a more obviously rooted practical and clinical experience — some of Dr. Bhattacharya's opinions and views can be justifiably challenged.

[182] Leaving aside the precise nature and depth of Dr. Bhattacharya's practical experience and specific academic focus, it is nonetheless clear that notwithstanding the support that was mobilized for the Great Barrington Declaration, many of Dr. Bhattacharya's opinions and prescriptions on the subject of the preferred and most effective public health responses to the pandemic, are opinions and prescriptions that fall outside the mainstream consensus that has congealed amongst most medical and scientific experts and governments the world over. I address more specifically the serious and relevant questions surrounding the Great Barrington Declaration later in this judgment at paragraphs 306-15.

[183] While Dr. Bhattacharya's contrary and in some cases contrarian views are decidedly not a disqualification from an important role in what has to be a continuing and rigorous scientific conversation and method, the views of Dr. Bhattacharya need be seen as views and opinions that are not supported by most of the scientific and medical community currently advising on and formulating the ongoing public health responses to a pandemic that continues to threaten too much of the world's population.

[184] So although Dr. Bhattacharya's opinions have obviously been carefully considered by the Court as part of the applicants' evidentiary foundation generally and as part of the applicants' challenge to the science relied upon by Manitoba more specifically, there was in the end, little in the evidence of Dr. Bhattacharya (or the cumulative evidence of all of the applicants' witnesses) that would cause me to seriously doubt the science upon which Manitoba is relying. Similarly, there is little in Dr. Bhattacharya's evidence that would cause me to doubt as to whether Manitoba has established what it must establish in order to discharge its onus on its s. 1 defence (of the impugned orders) on a balance of probabilities.

(ii) Dr. Thomas Warren

[185] Dr. Warren in an infectious diseases specialist and medical microbiologist, and a physician in Ontario. Amongst other things, he works in a lab that does PCR tests for COVID-19.

[186] Dr. Warren testified that he is seeing the strain on the hospital system such that his own hospital often takes patients from the bigger hospitals in surrounding areas.

[187] Dr. Warren acknowledges that while the research is clear that transmission by asymptomatic patients does occur, it is less likely. He acknowledged that it is difficult to differentiate asymptomatic from pre-symptomatic cases in studies and he further acknowledged that the issue of pre-symptomatic transmission is still an open question and that evidence regarding the impact of pre-symptomatic transmission is not conclusive.

[188] Dr. Warren testified that the PCR test is "a point in time test" that identifies virus by replicating genes, which may be whole virus or fragments. PCR test yields a semi-quantitative figure called Ct, which represents the number of doublings done through replications before a result is obtained. It was his evidence that if he had a patient with a positive test he would follow the government regulations and isolate a patient newly diagnosed with COVID-19, regardless of what the Ct value indicated.

[189] Dr. Warren also testified that when SARS-CoV-2 enters the body, it replicates in a portion of the population, but not in every person.

[190] Dr. Warren also observed that the SARS-CoV-2 virus can enter the nose and not actually infect the person due to prior existing immunity or because it was a small amount that entered the nose. It is possible in that scenario that the virus could be picked up on a PCR test even though the person was not actually infected with SARS-CoV-2.

(iii) Dr. Joel Kettner

[191] Dr. Kettner is the former CPHO for Manitoba at which time he managed the flu pandemic every year and was also present during the H1N1 virus. Dr. Kettner noted that it was important to stay atop and keep track of trends in case positivity rates, and monitor hospital admissions and the number of people who are succumbing from a particular disease. From his perspective, Dr. Kettner observed that he would want to know much more about the deaths in question and whether COVID-19 played a role. In the context of the H1N1 epidemic, Dr. Kettner explained that he wanted to know how other factors may have resulted in persons coming to the ICU. He explained that this requires a complex surveillance system to look at the reported deaths. He did acknowledge however, that he himself did not get this sort of information when he managed the H1N1 epidemic as they did not have sufficient surveillance capacity at that time. In that connection, he suggested that there is currently more information and technology available, which would be helpful for the surveillance he identified.

[192] Dr. Kettner accepted that it would be unusual for public health officials to look into individual information in order to get the information they need on a population basis. He recognizes that there is indeed a lot of information available from a variety of locations, such as ER, death reports, hospitals, etc.

[193] Dr. Kettner accepted that pandemics are difficult on the public and agreed that COVID-19 is causing a lot of deaths and a lot of people are required to go to hospital. In the case of his experience with SARS, he noted that it was a serious problem and involved a lot of work in public health notwithstanding that Manitoba never had a case.

(iv) Tobias Tissen

[194] As Manitoba has submitted, Mr. Tissen's testimony and cross-examination establishes that where government does no more than simply make a request for voluntary compliance with public health recommendations, such a simple request is usually not sufficient to ensure the necessary compliance in respect of what is an extraordinary global public health pandemic.

[195] Somewhat defiantly, Mr. Tissen testified in cross-examination that his church has done no more during the pandemic than what it has always done: ask congregants who feel sick to stay at home. A video was played during the course of his cross-examination, which demonstrated that during the pandemic, there has indeed been an overt and apparently defiant resistance to the government's public health messaging. During the video that was played in open court, it was possible to see the church service that was held. Despite the fact that the church service was taking place when the church premises were required to be closed, the images on the video revealed very high numbers (at least 100 or more people) where no physical distancing was taking place, no masks were being used and vocalization and singing dominated much of the service.

[196] As Manitoba has suggested, there are obvious limits to the effectiveness of voluntary requests for compliance.

IX. THE COURT'S ASSESSMENT OF ALL OF THE EVIDENCE FOLLOWING THE CROSS-EXAMINATIONS

[197] Given my findings and determinations clearly set out in the analysis section of this judgment (commencing at paragraph 203), in presenting the above highlights of the cross-examinations, I have commented upon the witnesses' evidence and the challenge to their evidence selectively and only where obviously necessary to understand and support the basis for my findings and determinations made in the context of my legal analysis. As has already been noted and will be further explained later in my analysis, in most instances, where differences in the expert evidence exists, those differences and the evidence underlying those differences do not sufficiently persuade me that the supporting evidence that Manitoba invokes for its position is, in the final analysis, lacking in reliability, credibility or cogency such so as to compromise its s. 1 defence. Indeed, on an "all things considered" assessment of the evidence, I have no difficulty concluding that even where Manitoba's response to the various waves of the pandemic could be properly criticized in hindsight as too slow and not sufficiently broad, the restrictions that were eventually imposed represent public health policy choices rooted in a comparatively well-accepted public health consensus. As Dr. Roussin noted, the impugned restrictions were generally consistent with measures seen across most of Canada and the rest of the world.

[198] I appreciate that specific aspects of Manitoba's evidentiary foundation can be parsed and challenged based on what in some cases may be alternative readings or interpretations of the evolving science. That said, in the face of Manitoba's otherwise reliable and credible expert witnesses (an assessment which the cross-examinations did not change), absent a more persuasive and conclusive evidentiary challenge to Manitoba's witnesses and their evidence, the evidence of the applicants and their challenge on cross-examination represent at best, a contrary if not contrarian scientific point of view. While that view and challenge may be deserving of rigorous consideration in the ongoing scientific conversation, as it was presented in this case in the affidavits and on cross-examination, it did not demonstrate or satisfy me that Manitoba has failed to discharge its onus in the context of the s. 1 justificatory framework. Manitoba's position and its supporting expert evidence represent an appropriately "all things considered" reasonable basis for the decisions that it took respecting the restrictions that were ultimately imposed — decisions which I find on the evidence, were made on the basis of credible science.

[199] In different ways, depending upon their role, position or expertise, all of Manitoba's experts have persuasively conveyed and supported the essence of Manitoba's position in this case. It is a position that acknowledges that pandemics are indeed extremely difficult on a population. It is a position that also convincingly contends that COVID-19 has caused serious illness and death, particularly in older adults, but also, in vulnerable populations of all ages. Based on s. 67 of The Public Health Act, the CPHO has been delegated the onerous and formidable task of implementing measures (with the approval of the minister) to prevent or lessen the danger to public health posed by COVID-19. By necessity, these measures will include that which will prevent exponential growth of the virus from overwhelming our limited health care resources, while trying to minimize the hardship and disruption that these restrictions impose on our day-to-day lives. As all the relevant witnesses have acknowledged, it is an awesome challenge to find the requisite balance. Despite some of the contrary evidence and cross-examination, the search for and calibration of that balance is not necessarily amenable to a sterile quantitative metric.

[200] When I consider the cross-examination of Manitoba's experts as conducted by the applicants, I certainly note and accept those points where valid and reasonable disagreement can be stipulated as it relates to what might still be some of the evolving science. That said, in the absence of convincing evidence of any obvious or definitively faulty science being applied by Manitoba (and in this case, I have seen none), Manitoba's own evidence convinces me that it is on solid ground in its s. 1 defence of measures and restrictions, which I repeat, represent the public health consensus and approach followed across most of Canada and the world.

[201] As it relates to the specific measures taken and the public health choices made, my consideration and assessment of the cross-examination of the witnesses on both sides (but particularly the challenge to those Manitoba experts) has been conducted mindful of Manitoba's solid reliance on what I find is credible science and also, mindful of what Manitoba has consistently argued as part of its theory. In that regard, it cannot be forgotten that in the fall of 2020, at the height of the second wave, COVID-19 cases were running rampant. Deaths and serious cases requiring hospitalization and intensive care were escalating rapidly and projected to continue rising. The healthcare system was under tremendous strain. As Manitoba had noted, "we were nearing the cliff edge". In light of these serious circumstances, Manitoba and its witnesses have credibly and persuasively asserted and I accept, that decisive action was essential to regain control over the spread of the virus in order to save lives, minimize serious illness and relieve the intense burden on Manitoba's healthcare system. Those witnesses who testified on behalf of Manitoba and who were in a position to exercise the necessary authority, made it clear that they did not believe that they "could afford to get it wrong".

[202] While I will provide my detailed legal analysis and explain my application of the governing law (and the related legal tests) in the next section of this judgment, I wish to be clear about my findings respecting the convincing factual foundation presented by Manitoba. In that connection, I say that notwithstanding some of the thought provoking testimony of some of the applicants' experts, I am persuaded by the evidence of Manitoba's experts and I find that the credible science that they invoked and relied upon, provides a convincing basis for concluding that the circuit-break measures, including those in the impugned PHOs, were necessary, reasonable and justified.

X. ANALYSIS

[203] In the analysis that follows, I propose to address and explain my determinations with respect to the three categories of issues that present in this case: the Charter issues, the administrative law issue, and the division of powers issue.

A. CHARTER ISSUES

Issue #1: Did the restrictions on private gatherings, public gatherings or places of worship imposed in Orders 1(1), 2(1), 15(1) and 15(3) of the Public Health Order dated November 21, 2020, as subsequently amended on December 22, 2020 and January 8, 2021, limit rights under ss. 2(a), 2(b) or 2(c) of the Charter?

Section 2(a) of the Charter

[204] Section 2(a) of the Charter reads as follows:

> Fundamental Freedoms
> Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
> (a) freedom of conscience and religion.

[205] Freedom of religion under the Charter contemplates the right to entertain religious beliefs, to declare those beliefs openly and without fear of hindrance or reprisal and to manifest religious belief by worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination. Section 2(a) is engaged when an impugned law or state conduct interferes with the ability to act in accordance with a sincerely-held religious belief or practice, in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial. Freedom of religion includes the ability of religious adherence to come together and create cohesive communities of belief and practice (see R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at 336 (paragraph 94); Law Society of British Columbia v. Trinity Western University, 2018 SCC 32, at paragraphs 62-64).

[206] Manitoba concedes and I find that the restriction on in-person religious gatherings as found in the impugned PHOs is a prima facie limit on freedom of religion that must be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

Section 2(b) of the Charter

[207] Section 2(b) of the Charter reads as follows:

> Fundamental Freedoms
> Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
> . . .

[208] Freedom of expression protects all nonviolent activities that convey or attempt to communicate meaning. A law or government action that has the purpose or effect of interfering with such activity is a prima facie interference with freedom of expression. Section 2(b) protects listeners as well as speakers (see Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927, at 968-72; Beaudoin, at paragraphs 169-70).

[209] Although Manitoba notes that the restrictions on religious gatherings that flow from the impugned PHOs do not have the purpose of restricting expression, Manitoba does concede that they have that effect. Manitoba similarly concedes that the restriction on the size of public gatherings could have the effect of limiting the applicant MacKay's freedom of expression. Manitoba notes that while MacKay was entirely free to protest the COVID-19 measures and convey any message at a protest rally, the size of those groupings was limited (see Beaudoin, at paragraph 169).

[210] To confirm, Manitoba concedes and I find that there is as argued a prima facie interference with freedom of expression that must be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

Section 2(c) of the Charter

[211] Section 2(c) of the Charter reads as follows:

> Fundamental Freedoms
> Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
>
> . . .

[213] The jurisprudence confirms that the freedom of assembly and association are by definition, collective and public in nature. Section 2(c) guarantees access to and the use of public spaces, including parks, squares, sidewalks and buildings subject to reasonable regulations governing the use of those places and having regard to public health and safety (see Hussain v. Toronto (City), 2016 ONSC 3504, at paragraphs 38 and 44). As the freedom of assembly can often be integral to freedom of expression, issues surrounding peaceful assembly are often subsumed under the freedom of expression and the infringement can be often resolved under s. 2(b) (see British Columbia Teachers' Federation v. British Columbia Public School Employees' Assn., 2009 BCCA 39, at paragraph 39). Again, to the extent that the impugned PHOs place limits on expression by prohibiting public gatherings to protest or comment on important matters of public interest, Manitoba concedes that there is a prima facie limit on free assembly. Manitoba is less willing to concede the applicants' claim that restricting gatherings in places of worship violates freedom of assembly by preventing church services, bible studies and prayer meetings. It is Manitoba's position that this is arguably better addressed directly under the freedom of religion. I agree.

[214] Despite the above qualification, Manitoba does concede and I so find that the prima facie limits the PHOs place on the freedom of religion, expression and assembly, require justification under s. 1 of the Charter.

[215] With Manitoba's concessions and my findings that the impugned PHOs prima facie limit aspects of the freedom of religion under s. 2(a), freedom of expression under s. 2(b), and freedom of peaceful assembly under s. 2(c) of the Charter, further analysis will have to be conducted with respect to these breaches pursuant to the Oakes test and the justificatory framework found under s. 1 of the Charter. Prior to proceeding with that analysis, I will now address what the applicants contend are the two other alleged Charter breaches respecting ss. 7 and 15.

[216] As noted, the applicants raised two other alleged Charter breaches. Those issues were reduced to the following questions:

- Did the restriction on religious services at places of worship or the restriction on gatherings at private homes in the impugned PHOs interfere with the right to liberty or security of the person contrary to the principles of fundamental justice pursuant to s. 7 of the Charter?

- Did the closure of places of worship in the impugned PHOs discriminate on the basis of religion contrary to s. 15 of the Charter?

Preliminary Matter Raised by Manitoba Concerning the Alleged ss. 7 and 15 Breaches

Given Manitoba's concession respecting the violation of s. 2 and given the necessity of its s. 1 defence, should this Court consider and adjudicate the alleged ss. 7 and 15 breaches or as Manitoba suggests, is it unnecessary to do so?

[217] As a preliminary matter, before addressing the applicants' substantive arguments respecting the alleged breaches of ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter as identified above, the Court is required to determine whether to cede to Manitoba's position that in the circumstances of this application, the Court ought not to consider the alleged s. 7 and s. 15 breaches because "it is unnecessary to do so".

[218] It is the position of Manitoba that the impugned PHOs did not violate ss. 7 or 15 of the Charter. However, Manitoba goes further and insists that it is unnecessary for the Court to address or decide the s. 7 and s. 15 issues (and it submits that this Court ought not to do so) because Manitoba has conceded the violations of s. 2 under the Charter and it says that the factual matrix underpinning those other Charter claims (i.e., ss. 7 and 15) is largely indistinguishable from the primary argument centered on the freedoms protected in s. 2. Manitoba contends that "the justification under s. 1 will be identical regardless of the Charter breach alleged".

[219] In addition to the above, Manitoba takes the position that the fact that a case was fully argued is insufficient to warrant deciding difficult Charter issues and laying down guidelines with respect to future cases simply because it might be "helpful" to do so (see Phillips v. Nova Scotia (Commission of Inquiry into the Westray Mine Tragedy), [1995] 2 S.C.R. 97, at paragraph 13). Manitoba emphasises that there are many examples of cases in which the Supreme Court of Canada has declined to determine whether a specific Charter provision was breached, having already found a violation of a different Charter provision. As Manitoba points out, this includes cases where the court declined to address s. 7 or s. 15 because s. 2 or another Charter provision had been violated (see Carter v. Canada (A.G.), 2015 SCC 5, at paragraph 93); Devine v. Quebec (A.G.), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 790, at paragraph 31; R. v. Ladouceur, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1257, at 1278; and, R. v. Taylor, 2014 SCC 50, at paragraph 36).

[220] Manitoba draws an analogy to the judgment in Law Society of British Columbia v. Trinity Western University. In that case, the Law Society of British Columbia refused to accredit the law school because of its religious covenant prohibiting same-sex intimacy. While the case obviously touched freedom of religion, it also had implications for ss. 2(b), 2(d) and 15 of the Charter. In that case, the court determined that the factual matrix underpinning the other Charter claims was largely indistinguishable and the primary argument centered on freedom of religion. In other words, whether the claim was articulated in terms of freedom of religion, expression, association or protection from discrimination, the limit was subject to the same proportionality analysis. Manitoba is insistent that the same analysis applies in the present case.

[221] In urging the Court not to consider or decide ss. 7 or 15 issues, Manitoba points to the fact that the applicants assert that the impugned PHOs interfere with liberty and security of the person by restricting the liberty of religious officials to hold religious services by regulating access to private homes. Manitoba also emphasizes that the applicant Tissen asserts that restricting his ability to worship at church while permitting liquor and grocery stores to remain open, arbitrarily limits his security of the person. Manitoba's submission is that these allegations essentially duplicate the claims under ss. 2(a) and 2(c). Further, Manitoba maintains that as the applicants' claim that limiting home gatherings arbitrarily interferes with liberty and security of a person, the government's justification under s. 1 will be identical. Manitoba says that whether a law limits one or more Charter rights does not change the proportionality analysis under s. 1.

[222] In considering Manitoba's position, I have taken note that in Beaudoin, a case similar to the present case, the government also conceded a violation of s. 2 Charter rights. In Beaudoin, Hinkson C.J. declined to address s. 7.

[223] In summary, as it relates to the applicants' arguments concerning ss. 7 and 15, Manitoba urges this Court to conclude that this case is best analyzed under the rubric of s. 2 of the Charter and more specifically (given Manitoba's concession that s. 2 was breached), the framework of s. 1 which will determine whether the acknowledged limitations are reasonable and justified.

[224] On this preliminary question as to whether or not the Court should address and decide the applicants' ss. 7 and 15 arguments, I have given the position of Manitoba full consideration. I have also noted the applicants' strenuous objection to the position of Manitoba and to the prospect of the Court sidestepping what the applicants submit is still an essential part of its constitutional challenge.

[225] This Court certainly accepts and has affirmed the general proposition that courts should not make unnecessary constitutional pronouncements or "decide issues of constitutional law that are not necessary to the resolution of the matter that is before the court in a given case" (see R. v. Assi, 2021 MBQB 44, at paragraph 13). That said, in the unique circumstances of this case, given the distinct protections that fall within ss. 7 and 15, given the distinct legal tests applicable to each section and given the specifically adduced evidentiary foundation produced through some of the individual applicants, it is not obvious that on this constitutional challenge and in the context of the impugned and unprecedented emergency restrictions attaching to fundamental freedoms, that the Court's proper response is to avoid what are not obviously "unnecessary constitutional pronouncements".

[226] Manitoba in no way concedes any infringements as having taken place respecting ss. 7 and 15. While Manitoba's defiant position following a more full analysis may very well be justifiable on the facts and the applicable law, in a case like the present one however, where the legal analysis — despite the similarities — may still be somewhat different (with possible implications for the s. 1 defence), Manitoba's submission does not convincingly or inexorably lead to the conclusion that the Court's consideration of the alleged ss. 7 and 15 breaches is superfluous or unnecessary for the resolution of the matters before me.

[227] Given the similarities between aspects of some of the factual and legal determinations that would have to be made in a s. 7 analysis with those that have to be made under s. 1, it is not clear that any unfavourable (to Manitoba) factual findings and legal determinations that could be made in a s. 7 analysis might not have a negative impact on Manitoba's s. 1 defence. In that connection, to preempt that possibility, given the specific foundational evidence that has been adduced by the applicants, seems neither fair nor just.

[228] I express as well, my discomfort at preempting the ss. 7 and 15 arguments and determinations simply because Manitoba has necessarily conceded the identified infringements under s. 2. In my view, analytically, it does not follow from such a concession in the unique and particular circumstances of this case that the applicants will get all of the determinations their position deserves in the context of what Manitoba proposes as a sole analysis under the s. 1 justificatory framework.

[229] Having rejected Manitoba's position on this preliminary matter, the Court will accordingly consider and adjudicate the applicants' challenge pursuant to ss. 7 and 15. It should be clear that the Court's reasons for doing so are not only because (as Manitoba has warned against) those issues were fully argued by the applicants or simply because it might be "helpful" to lay down guidelines respecting difficult future Charter issues. Rather, the Court's decision to fully consider the ss. 7 and 15 arguments in this unprecedented constitutional challenge is grounded in the reality that these challenges represent in the present case, distinct questions that have to be properly adjudicated to fully and fairly resolve this case in a manner that best legitimizes the result.

[230] Manitoba has not persuaded me that in the present case, it is inappropriate to consider ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter because "it is unnecessary to do so". Accordingly, I set out below my analysis respecting the issues relating to those alleged breaches.

Issue #2: Did the restriction on religious services at places of worship or the restriction on gatherings at private homes in the impugned PHOs interfere with the right to liberty or security of the person contrary to the principles of fundamental justice pursuant to s. 7 of the Charter?

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[232] To establish a violation of s. 7 of the Charter, the onus is on the claimant to prove that: 1) the law interferes with or deprives them of their right to life, liberty or security of the person; and 2) such deprivation is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[233] As it relates to the liberty interest in s. 7, the applicant Ross MacKay argues that the orders which not only closed all churches and stores (except the limited few that sold "essential" items), but also, prohibited him from having visitors to his home, visiting anyone else at their homes or protesting, were orders whose relevant provisions all infringed his s. 7 right of liberty. Mr. MacKay submits that his movements have been severely curtailed and that these restrictions have had the effect of treating him and all Manitobans as though they were "under house arrest".

[234] In connection with the above restrictions identified by Mr. MacKay, the applicants invoke the Supreme Court of Canada judgment of R. v. Heywood, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 761, at 789 (paragraph 45), where the court held that state prohibitions affecting one's ability to move freely violate liberty and security interests, especially when non-compliance with those prohibitions could result in a jail sentence. In the present case, the applicants contend that the PHOs have completely prohibited the applicants' ability to move freely, and the consequences of violating those PHOs include a fine, imprisonment, or both.

[235] The applicants also rely upon the Supreme Court of Canada's judgment in Carter, at paragraph 62, wherein it was held that the s. 7 right to liberty also protects a sphere of personal autonomy involving "the right to make fundamental personal choices free from state interference" and "inherently private choices" that go to the "core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence". It is the position of the applicants that the prohibitions on gathering at private homes, to protest, or for in-person worship, restrict the right of participants to make personal choices free from state interference.

[236] In making the arguments they make concerning the infringements on the liberty right under s. 7, the applicants forcefully assert that the risk of severe illness or death from the virus for persons under 70 years of age is less than influenza. They insist that in a free society, the PHOs' "oppressive overturning of fundamental rights and freedoms" in such circumstances, particularly in light of the scientific evidence Manitoba relies upon, cannot be justified. Put simply, it is the applicants' position that COVID-19 is not a sufficient threat to most of the populace such that the state can prevent a free people from the exercise of their fundamental right to gather and worship if they choose. The applicants go further and say that the PHOs' restrictions on gathering outdoors, for corporate worship and home worship are nothing short of "tyrannical".

[237] Respecting the alleged breaches to the right to security of the person, the applicants have argued that "security of the person" is generally given a broad interpretation and has both a physical and psychological aspect. In that regard, the applicants submit that the right to security of the person encompasses "a notion of personal autonomy involving . . . control over one's bodily integrity free from state interference" (see Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 519, at paragraph 136). The applicants also emphasize that security of the person is engaged by state interference with an individual's physical or psychological integrity, including any state action that causes physical or serious psychological suffering (see New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46, at paragraph 56).

[238] In the present case, the applicants, Mr. MacKay and Mr. Tissen, provided evidence describing how they have suffered psychologically throughout these lockdowns. For his part, Mr. MacKay described how he has been "devastated" by the resulting stress from the restrictions. Mr. Tissen described a similarly painful mental suffering exacerbated by the fact that as pastor, the restrictions have prevented him from carrying on his biblical duties and from caring for the mental and spiritual health of his congregation who have been prevented from gathering to worship.

[239] The applicants also argue that the above s. 7 rights and the alleged breaches of them involved an interference or deprivation not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. In that regard, they submit that the restrictions were arbitrary, overbroad and grossly disproportionate in connection to their objective.

[240] Concerning arbitrariness, the applicants argue that in the absence of some justification in the medical evidence, the closure of gatherings for worship and the restrictions on outdoor and private indoor gatherings (when gatherings indoors at big box stores, grocery stores, liquor stores, and cannabis stores is permitted) is clearly arbitrary. The applicants insist that no compelling evidence has been provided so as to connect the ban/restrictions to the purpose of preventing the overwhelming of hospitals, reducing COVID-19 spread and reducing mortality. It is the position of the applicants that Manitoba is unable to prove that unlike so many secular activities, religious worshipping presents an unacceptable public health risk such that it must be restricted as it has. The applicants submit that the same argument applies to at-home and outdoor gatherings. Therefore say the applicants, the PHOs are arbitrary.

[241] As it relates to overbreadth, the applicants submit that the stated purpose of the PHOs is to preserve hospital capacity, prevent morbidity and prevent community spread. However say the applicants, by prohibiting in-person worship, outdoor gatherings of more than five people and visitors to private homes, the scope of the PHOs is too wide. The applicants repeat that there is no compelling scientific evidence about the spread of COVID-19 outdoors, or evidence that COVID-19 is more transmissible at a place of worship as opposed to a grocery, big box, liquor, or cannabis store. The applicants maintain that the class of persons to whom these PHOs apply is too wide and that they apply to every Manitoban notwithstanding the fact that the applicants say, the science is clear that for people under the age of 65, there is a 99.97 per cent chance of recovery if and when COVID-19 was to strike.

[242] In arguing overbreadth, the applicants have submitted that the PHOs should be targeted to immunocompromised populations and elderly people who are at the greatest risk of the disease. They say that the science does not support the notion that COVID-19 is transmissible through asymptomatic people. Therefore say the applicants, there is no valid medical or scientific reason to prevent healthy, asymptomatic people from gathering at churches, outdoors or in their homes. According to the applicants, these non-infectious people do not present a risk of spreading COVID-19 to anyone and therefore the PHOs as implemented, are overbroad.

[243] Respecting gross proportionality, the applicants use as the requisite and appropriate reference point, what are in the present case, the objectives of the PHOs, which are to reduce the spread of COVID-19, preserve hospital capacity and reduce morbidity. Given the restrictions on freedoms as contained in the PHOs, the applicants say that the physical and psychological damage done to Manitobans is grossly disproportionate to the potential benefits of the PHOs. While the applicants emphasize their position on the potential "harms" of the PHOs in their s. 1 argument, they also at this stage (in respect of gross disproportionality) cite a University of British Columbia study that highlighted the self-reported increase in suicidal thoughts and increased substance abuse among residents of Manitoba and Saskatchewan in 2020. The applicants reference what they describe as an "explosion in overdoses" in Canada and the overall damage to mental health flowing from forced isolation from family and friends.

[244] It is part of the applicants' theory generally and their position more specifically on gross proportionality that one of the troubling aspects of the PHOs is that the very act of keeping families isolated to their own houses, actually increases the risk of death to elderly family members who have to spend more time with adolescents and younger adults who the applicants suggest might be carrying COVID-19 into the house.

[245] I have considered carefully the applicants' position and arguments respecting s. 7 of the Charter. For the reasons that follow, I have determined that the impugned PHOs do not breach s. 7 of the Charter as alleged by the applicants.

Did the Impugned PHOs Limit Liberty or Security of the Person?

[246] The s. 7 rights to liberty and security of the person were discussed in Carter (at paragraph 64):

> Underlying both of these rights is a concern for the protection of individual autonomy and dignity. Liberty protects "the right to make fundamental personal choices free from state interference": Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, at para. 54. Security of the person encompasses "a notion of personal autonomy involving . . . control over one's bodily integrity free from state interference" (Rodriguez, at pp. 587-88, per Sopinka J., referring to R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30) and it is engaged by state interference with an individual's physical or psychological integrity, including any state action that causes physical or serious psychological suffering (New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), 1999 CanLII 653 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46, at para. 58; Blencoe, at paras. 55-57; Chaoulli, at para. 43, per Deschamps J.; para. 119, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.; and paras. 191 and 200, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.). While liberty and security of the person are distinct interests, for the purpose of this appeal they may be considered together.

[247] It is clear that the right to liberty protects the freedom from physical restraint and the autonomy to make fundamental personal choices. I am in agreement with Manitoba's submission that this does not mean however that a limit on a fundamental freedom protected by s. 2 is sufficient to establish a violation of liberty under s. 7. Manitoba is on solid ground when it argues that these are distinct Charter rights. In this regard, Manitoba relies upon Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, at paragraph 80, wherein the Supreme Court of Canada cautioned that courts must be careful to not conflate liberty or security of the person with dignity, self-worth and emotional well-being. The risk being that s. 7 would then become as Manitoba suggests, all inclusive and that there would be "serious reason to question the independent existence in the Charter of other rights and freedoms such as freedom of religion and conscience or freedom of expression."

[248] Accordingly, if the right to liberty protects the freedom from physical restraint and the autonomy to make fundamental choices, and as explained above, it is necessary to remain mindful of the need to not conflate liberty or security with dignity, self-worth and emotional well-being, it is also instructive to note what must be demonstrated to establish a breach of security of the person. In that regard, in order to establish a breach of security of the person, the claimant must provide evidence of serious psychological harm caused by the state that goes beyond the ordinary stress and anxiety that a person might suffer as a result of state action (see Blencoe, at paragraphs 81–86).

[249] At its core, the applicants in the present case argue that the impugned PHOs restrict the liberty and security of the person in two ways. First, they say that the measures restrict the liberty of religious officials to hold religious services. Second, the applicants say that the restrictions regulate "access to and from homes treating Manitobans as though they are criminals and under house arrest".

[250] Manitoba responds to the first point by readily conceding that religious officials were in fact prohibited from holding religious services in person at a place of worship for a period of 13 weeks. Nonetheless, it is Manitoba's position (a position that I accept) that the restriction on a freedom to engage in religious practice is properly addressed by s. 2(a) rather than s. 7 of the Charter. On the second point, Manitoba correctly insists that at no time were Manitobans treated as criminals under house arrest. Manitoba points out that there has never been an order requiring persons to remain in their homes or to refrain from seeing friends and family in small groups. Although the impugned PHOs did limit gatherings inside homes while these orders were in effect, it was still possible for persons to visit outside of a residence as long as they complied with gathering size limits. While Manitoba acknowledges that no one would question the emotional and psychological benefit of meeting in person compared to a more remote contact, Manitoba also submits (and I agree) that there is no evidence of the kind of serious psychological harm or suffering as set out in Blencoe, at paragraph 80. This is particularly so where, as Manitoba has emphasized, the impugned restrictions were time limited to 13 weeks.

[251] I note as well that the PHOs did not preclude a person from entering another private residence for the purposes of providing health care (which Manitoba emphasizes was not limited to physical care), personal care, tutoring, or other educational instruction or to respond in cases of emergency. Accordingly, a minister from a religious institution was still able to attend to an adherent's home for any of those identified purposes — including one-on-one counselling for a mental health purpose or personal care purpose or, to provide religious education. I further note that there was an exception provided in Orders 15 and 16, which permitted a place of worship to continue to be used for the delivery of health care, child care or social services.

[252] For the reasons provided, the impugned provisions do not limit liberty or security of the person as those rights have been explained in the jurisprudence. To the extent that any of the PHOs interfere with the applicants' activity, that interference is best understood and considered in the context of Manitoba's s. 1 defence resulting from its concession of the s. 2 breaches.

[253] Having made the determination I have that the impugned PHOs do not limit liberty or security of the person as defined in the jurisprudence, my analysis respecting s. 7 could conclude here as the applicants' challenges on this issue cannot now succeed. However, in the event that I am in error in respect of this first determination and in order to provide a complete analysis, I will proceed to consider what would have been the next relevant question in the s. 7 analysis.

Does any Deprivation of s. 7 Comport with the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

[254] It is well established that a law will be contrary to the principles of fundamental justice if the infringement of or interference with the s. 7 rights is arbitrary, overbroad or grossly disproportionate.

[255] For the reasons that follow, I am not persuaded that had any interference with the s. 7 rights occurred, that they were arbitrary, overbroad or grossly disproportionate. Instead, I am of the view that any restrictions with respect to those rights were and are in accord with the principles of fundamental justice.

Are the Impugned PHOs Arbitrary?

[256] A law is arbitrary when there is no rational connection between the limit on the right and the object of the law. An arbitrary law is one that limits rights but is not capable of fulfilling or in any way furthering the objectives of that law (see Carter, at paragraph 85; Canada (A.G.) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, at paragraph 111).

[257] In the present case, it is clear from the evidence that the object of limiting gatherings (either in public places, private residences or places of worship) is to prevent, reduce or eliminate the likelihood of spreading COVID-19 in order to minimize death and serious illness. The evidence as I have accepted it, suggests persuasively that prolonged close contact, especially indoors, transmits SARS-CoV-2. As will be discussed later in the s. 1 analysis, the rational connection between the restrictions on in-person gatherings and their object of decreasing the likely spread of COVID-19 has been set out convincingly by Manitoba. It is not reasonable to suggest that individual rights in this case have been limited arbitrarily.

Are the Impugned PHOs Overbroad?

[258] Overbreadth can be seen as closely related to arbitrariness. A law is overbroad when it targets some conduct that appears to have no relation to its purpose. While an impugned order may not be arbitrary in all of its applications, it may nonetheless be arbitrary in part (see Carter, at paragraph 85; Bedford, at paragraph 12).

[259] In the present case, I find that the restrictions on gathering do not encompass conduct that poses no risk of transmission or has no relation to the object of the orders in question. I accept Manitoba's position that it is impossible to rule out the transmission at gatherings. Based on the evidence, this is so because asymptomatic and pre-symptomatic individuals may unknowingly transmit the virus to unsuspecting persons.

[260] Manitoba is correct when they point out that the applicants appear to have misconstrued the principles of arbitrariness and overbreadth when they compare the impugned PHOs to other orders (for example, those orders dealing with retail businesses). In that regard, arbitrariness and overbreadth focus on the link between the impugned measures and the objective of those measures. For the purposes of s. 7, it is irrelevant to compare the impugned PHOs to other restrictions. The fact that some places of business are allowed to remain open (subject to various restrictions) does not in any way negate the rational connection that exists between the impugned PHOs and their object. Further, the PHOs in question restrict similar types of gatherings whether religious or secular in nature such as movie theatres, plays and/or concerts. Indeed, the secular activities are also protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter. Insofar as retail locations are subject to different restrictions, it is as Manitoba persuasively has argued, owing to the fact that people are not gathering in those locations for a long period of time or in the same way (see also Beaudoin, at paragraphs 228-30).

Are the Impugned Orders Grossly Disproportionate?

[261] No interference with a s. 7 right is permissible where it is grossly disproportionate to the object of the measure. This principle presents (for any party raising gross disproportionality), a very high bar and it applies only in extreme cases where the alleged interference or deprivation is totally out of sync with the objective. In Carter, at paragraph 89 and Bedford, at paragraph 120, it is confirmed that a determination of gross disproportionality requires a measure that is entirely outside the norms accepted in our free and democratic society. The Supreme Court of Canada provided by way of an example the situation where life imprisonment existed as a potential sanction for spitting on the sidewalk.

[262] In the present case, to determine whether any deprivation of a s. 7 right is grossly disproportionate to the object of the measure, the Court is required to consider the significance of the limitation on the s. 7 rights (the gathering at homes, public places and in-person religious services) and determine if the deprivation is so extreme that it is totally out of sync with the critical importance of the public health objective, which is to prevent death, serious illness and the overwhelming of the healthcare system. In my view, the applicants have not satisfied me that the interference with or the deprivation of any s. 7 rights in the present case represents an interference or deprivation that is grossly disproportionate and/or entirely outside the norms accepted in our free and democratic society. I make that determination, mindful of, amongst other things, the following convincing factors that Manitoba has invoked in support of its position:

- Manitoba has never denied, minimized or questioned the importance of gathering — including for faith-based communities for whom communal worship is central to their religious beliefs. Manitoba has also never questioned the importance of physical contact and socializing as part of the human experience in a community;

- In none of the impugned PHOs were religious services prohibited. They could continue to be offered remotely. Manitoba accepts however, that for some, a remote religious service is not an adequate substitute for in-person religious services, which is at the core of their beliefs;

- Since December 11, 2020, religious services could also take place in person, outside in motor vehicles, in accordance with Order 2(2);

- Funerals, weddings, baptisms or similar religious ceremonies could take place subject to a limit of five persons other than the officiant (Order 15(3) or 16(3));

- The impugned PHOs did not prevent a person, including a religious official, from entering a private residence for the purpose of providing mental health or spiritual care such as counselling (Order 1(2)(a)). Counselling and addiction support could also be delivered remotely to individuals or groups;

- Tutoring or other individualized educational instruction was also able to be provided. This was not restricted to secular education. The gathering limits did not prevent a person from entering a private residence to provide religious tutoring or other religious educational instruction (Order 1(2)(d)). Religious education could also be delivered to groups remotely;

- The impugned PHOs did not prevent places of worship from being used by a public or private school (including for religious education) or for the delivery of health care, child care or social services (Order 15 and 16);

- To the extent that one of the applicants raises concerns about summer bible camps, the impugned PHOs did not take effect until November 22. Throughout the summer months until November 12, 2020, the public health orders allowed summer camps as long as each group had up to a maximum of 50 children and that there were no joint activities between different groups. It was only the overnight camps that were prohibited; and

- Places of worship were treated in the same way as similar indoor gatherings involving prolonged close contact, such as movie theatres, plays, concerts, sporting events. As earlier indicated and as Manitoba has conceded, these activities are also protected under s. 2 of the Charter.

[263] Manitoba readily concedes in its submissions that the impact on rights were surely difficult for the citizens of Manitoba — whether they be religious or secular. Nonetheless, they insist and I agree that the nature and significance of that impact is not such that it translates into a determination of gross disproportionality.

[264] Separate from the earlier noted factors that Manitoba submits are germane in assessing the significance of the deprivations in question, Manitoba also argued that the following considerations are relevant in establishing that the restrictions were not disproportionate or totally out of sync with the overwhelming importance of the public health objective animating the impugned orders:

- The CPHO did not impose the stricter restrictions on gatherings and in-person services at places of worship until Manitoba started to experience exponential growth of the virus that put lives at risk and the healthcare system in jeopardy;

- In the fall of 2020, the situation in Manitoba was serious. By November 2020, community spread of the virus was rampant. As of November 10, Manitoba had the highest per capita rate of active COVID-19 cases in Canada. The test positivity rate had soared to over 10.5 per cent provincially suggesting province-wide transmission. Newly reported cases were doubling every two weeks, which also translated into a large increase of severe cases. It was becoming an increasing challenge to conduct contact tracing (see the evidence of witnesses Dr. Brent Roussin and Dr. Carla Loeppky);

- COVID-19 related deaths and hospitalizations were rapidly escalating. Despite significant efforts to redeploy staff to maximize hospital and ICU capacity, acute care capacity was being overwhelmed (see the evidence of witness Lanette Siragusa). Epidemiological modelling projected that Manitoba was on the verge of exceeding its hospital and ICU capacity. Indeed, on November 10, 2020, there were only eight ICU beds left in Manitoba. It was projected that COVID-19 patients would require 100 per cent of Manitoba's ICU beds by November 23 and hospital capacity would be exceeded by mid-December unless action was taken;

- On December 10 - 11, Manitoba hit what was up until that point, its peak of hospitalizations with 129 patients in ICU and 388 hospitalizations due to COVID-19. This exceeded the province's ICU capacity, however, Manitoba did manage to address the situation with additional resources (see the evidence of witness Lanette Siragusa);

- Concerns remained that exceeding hospital and ICU capacity could lead to more preventable deaths and adverse health outcomes for both COVID-19 patients and other patients who may have been unable to access timely care, as was being experienced in other parts of the world where COVID-19 was hitting hard;

- Faith-based gatherings at places of worship involved prolonged contact in an indoor setting, which could be seen to heighten the risk of virus transmission. The gatherings often involved activities such as singing and ceremonial rituals that also heightened the risk of spread. There had already been clusters and outbreaks of COVID-19 at faith-based gatherings in Manitoba, which was consistent with the experience in other jurisdictions in Canada and elsewhere (see the evidence of witnesses Dr. Brent Roussin, Dr. Carla Loeppky and Dr. Jason Kindrachuk. See also Beaudoin, at paragraphs 151-152, 226, 233, and 238 -39);

- Gatherings in homes was also deemed a significant source of transmission due to prolonged contact in close proximity;

- The measures implemented were intended to protect vulnerable groups who are seen as more prone to serious outcomes (death or hospitalization) when infected by COVID-19. This group of persons includes those over the age of 60 and people who may have a variety of underlying conditions — underlying conditions which are not limited to those over 60. It is noted that approximately one-third of the hospitalizations and 44 per cent of COVID-19 patients admitted into ICU have been under the age of 60 (see the evidence of witness Dr. Carla Loeppky). Manitoba notes that as of February 22, 2021, more than 37 per cent of all severe outcomes (hospitalizations, ICU cases and deaths combined) in Manitoba were among persons under the age of 60. Almost 17 per cent of severe cases were amongst persons under the age of 40 (see the evidence of witness Dr. Carla Loeppky);

- First Nations populations were also seeing escalating positivity rates and a disproportionate number of COVID-19 cases. The median age of hospitalizations for First Nations has been 51; and

- The "circuit break" was temporary. As Manitoba has noted, the impugned PHOs were in place for 13 weeks, but they were reassessed at regular, shorter intervals to ensure they remained necessary. Those measures were implemented to regain control over the rapid community spread of the virus and any consequent serious harm. Once the curve was flattened, there was gradual ease of restrictions.

[265] In considering the applicants' arguments with respect to gross disproportionality, I have no hesitation in concluding based on the evidence before me, that the pandemic's presence in Manitoba demanded decisive action in order to reduce the spread of the virus and in order to flatten the curve. Manitoba is not exaggerating when they state that lives were at stake. Indeed, at various points and with appropriate concern, many critics called for a quicker and more expansive response than actually occurred. Separate from whether they were sufficiently timely or adequate, I have no difficulty concluding that any of the restrictions on gatherings and in-person faith services that were eventually implemented, were as Manitoba has argued, temporary and necessary. While the impact of these restrictions on the rights in question should not be indifferently ignored or minimized, such impact was certainly not disproportionate or totally out of sync with the critically important objectives which included preserving the healthcare system, protecting the general public health, and saving the lives of particularly vulnerable persons.

[266] Given my earlier determinations respecting arbitrariness and overbreadth, I have concluded that even had any interference occurred with respect to the s. 7 rights (which I have determined did not occur), such interference was in accord with the principles of fundamental justice.

[267] Accordingly, the applicants' challenge pursuant to s. 7 of the Charter is dismissed.

Issue #3: Did the closure of places of worship in the impugned PHOs discriminate on the basis of religion contrary to s. 15 of the Charter?

[268] Section 15 of the Charter reads as follows:

> Equality before and under law and equal protection and benefit of law
> Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

[269] It is the position of the applicants that the impugned PHOs discriminate on the basis of religion in that they classify liquour, cannabis and big-box retailers as "essential" and therefore allow them to remain open. The applicants contend that the PHOs classify churches and religious gatherings as "non-essential" and for that reason require them to close. Put simply, the applicants submit that it is discriminatory to allow people to assemble in liquor and grocery stores, but not worship at church.

[270] As I explain in the paragraphs that follow, the applicants have inaccurately described Manitoba's use of the adjective "essential" as it relates to churches and religious gatherings just as they have also failed to appreciate that the distinction in question (between what is permitted to remain open and what must remain closed) is not based on religion. Accordingly, I have determined that the impugned PHOs do not discriminate contrary to s. 15 of the Charter.

[271] When a court considers a challenge on the basis of s. 15 of the Charter, it must first ask whether the impugned law, on its face or in its impact, creates a distinction based on enumerated or analogous grounds. If it does, it must be determined whether the law imposes burdens or denies benefits in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating or exacerbating disadvantage (see Kahkewistahaw First Nation v. Taypotat, 2015 SCC 30, paragraphs 18–19).

[272] In considering the position advanced by the applicants in respect of s. 15, I am struck by how the applicants suggest that the descriptions "essential" and "non-essential" are used. In this regard, I agree with Manitoba that the applicants have not accurately described the PHOs. The impugned PHOs do not characterize certain retailers as "essential" nor do they characterize churches or religious gatherings as "non-essential". Nowhere in the impugned PHOs does it imply that places of worship or religious practices are not essential or are of lesser importance than retail establishments. When one examines Order 4 for example, it can be seen that it provides that businesses listed in Schedule A, may open to provide goods and services to the public, subject to capacity limits and other public health measures like physical distancing. Order 5 states that a retail business permitted to remain open may only sell "essential items" listed in Schedule B in person. Any "non-essential items" must be removed from public access inside the store. They go on to note that both "essential items" and "non-essential" items may be sold remotely, online or by phone and made available for delivery or pick up. Pursuant to Order 6, facilities or businesses not listed in Schedule A are required to close for in-store shopping, but may continue to sell those goods remotely. In other words, the adjectives essential and non-essential are not used as the applicants suggest and insofar as the distinction between essential and non-essential items is made, it is made for the purpose of determining which items may be bought in store rather than purchased only remotely.

[273] Insofar as the applicants are accurate in stating that certain retailers (those listed in Schedule A) were permitted to remain open for in-store purchases of "essential items" while places of worship were required to remain closed for in-person services, those closures were not because religious services are viewed as inessential or less important. Rather, those closures were rooted in the government's position as found and supported in the evidence, that the nature of such gatherings pose a heightened risk of transmission (see the evidence of the witness Dr. Brent Roussin).

[274] It is essential to note that the impugned PHOs do not create any distinction based on religious beliefs or the religious or non-religious nature of the location. Any distinction between facilities that could remain open and those required to close was based solely on the level of risk of viral transmission posed by the type of gathering or activity. As Manitoba has argued, retail stores typically involve transient contact between individuals who are only in close proximity for a relatively short duration. Such contact is accurately described as transactional in nature. Places of worship are often gatherings of individuals who are in close contact for prolonged periods of time. Moreover, the nature of religious services will often involve behaviours that carry a higher risk of transmission such as singing, choirs, and the sharing of communal items (see the evidence of the witnesses Tobias Tissen, Riley Toews, Christopher Lowe, and Thomas Rempel). Places of worship have been treated very much like movie theatres, sports facilities, plays, restaurants or other venues that involve prolonged periods of close contact, which by extension, pose a higher risk of viral transmission. While no one would suggest that transmission cannot or does not occur in retail stores for example, the distinction in question is, as Manitoba has insisted, about balancing risk and not about religion.

[275] In summary, it is well to note that the basis of the distinction identified by the applicants for their s. 15 argument is one that is rooted in what the Supreme Court of Canada has said is not a demeaning stereotype, but rather, a neutral and rationally connected policy choice (see Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37 (at paragraph 108):

> Assuming the respondents could show that the regulation creates a distinction on the enumerated ground of religion, it arises not from any demeaning stereotype but from a neutral and rationally defensible policy choice. There is no discrimination within the meaning of Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1989 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143, as explained in Kapp. The Colony members' claim is to the unfettered practice of their religion, not to be free from religious discrimination. The substance of the respondents' s. 15(1) claim has already been dealt with under s. 2(a). There is no breach of s. 15(1).

[276] Given that the distinction(s) in question in this case do not involve distinctions based on religion (religious beliefs or the religious or non religious nature of the location), the applicants' arguments under s. 15 cannot succeed. Accordingly, their s. 15 challenge is dismissed.

Issue #4: Are the violations in relation to ss. 2(a), 2(b) and 2(c) of the Charter, as caused by the impugned PHOs, justified as reasonable limits under s. 1 of the Charter?

[277] For the reasons earlier explained, the Court will be reviewing Manitoba's argument (that the restrictions on the s. 2 rights are justified as reasonable limits under s. 1 of Charter) on the basis of the well-known Oakes test. The Oakes test sets out an analytical and potentially justificatory framework that requires the court to determine whether the defending party has discharged its onus (on a balance of probabilities) to demonstrate the following:

1. That the objective of the measure giving rise to the restriction is pressing and substantial.
2. That the means employed was proportionate to the objective.

[278] The proportionality requirement will be satisfied where: 1) there is a rational connection between the means chosen and the objective; 2) the measure minimally impairs the rights at issue; and 3) there is proportionality between the salutary and deleterious effects of the measure (see Hutterian Brethren, at paragraph 186).

[279] The proportionality inquiry is both normative and contextual. The inquiry requires a court to look at the broader picture in an effort to balance the interests of society with those of individuals in groups (see R. v. K.R.J., 2016 SCC 31, at paragraph 58). In a case like the present, where individual rights compete with the public good and societal interests that are themselves protected by the Charter (because the health and lives of others are at stake), it is more likely that a restriction on rights may be found proportionate to its objective (see Carter, at paragraphs 94-96). The case law has confirmed that the proportionality requirement does not require perfection, but rather, that the limits on the rights in question be reasonable (see R. v. K.R.J., at paragraph 67).

[280] Mindful of the above, where a broader contextual analysis is appropriate, some deference or "a margin of appreciation" may be afforded to governments when a court is determining whether a law is justified under s. 1 of the Charter. This perspective and the resulting margin is particularly important where a case gives rise to complex issues that involve a multitude of overlapping and conflicting interests. In that regard, it was noted by McLachlin C.J. in Hutterian Brethren that the principal responsibility for the making of difficult choices and the drawing of necessary lines falls on the elected legislature and those it appoints to carry out its policies. In that context, she noted that the Charter "does not demand that the limit on the right be perfectly calibrated, judged in hindsight" but rather that it be reasonable and justified. She noted as follows (at paragraph 37):

> If the choice the legislature has made is challenged as unconstitutional, it falls to the courts to determine whether the choice falls within a range of reasonable alternatives. Section 1 of the Charter does not demand that the limit on the right be perfectly calibrated, judged in hindsight, but only that it be "reasonable" and "demonstrably justified". Where a complex regulatory response to a social problem is challenged, courts will generally take a more deferential posture throughout the s. 1 analysis than they will when the impugned measure is a penal statute directly threatening the liberty of the accused. Courts recognize that the issue of identity theft is a social problem that has grown exponentially in terms of cost to the community since photo licences were introduced in Alberta in 1974, as reflected in the government's attempt to tighten the scheme when it discontinued the religious exemption in 2003. The bar of constitutionality must not be set so high that responsible, creative solutions to difficult problems would be threatened.

> A degree of deference is therefore appropriate: Edwards Books, at pp. 781-82, per Dickson C.J., and Canada (Attorney General) v. JTI-Macdonald Corp., 2007 SCC 30, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 610, at para. 43, per McLachlin C.J.

[281] Manitoba reminds the Court in this case that public health officials have been required to respond to a novel and complex pandemic. They have been required to make decisions quickly and in real time, in rapidly changing circumstances and in a climate of scientific uncertainty and evolving knowledge. Given that reality, while courts cannot abdicate their responsibility as protectors of the Constitution, neither should they forgot that the factual underpinnings for managing a pandemic are essentially scientific and involve medical matters that fall outside the institutional expertise of courts. When determining whether any related restriction on rights is constitutionally defensible, the courts should be wary of second guessing those who are managing a pandemic on the basis of their democratic responsibility or their properly delegated authority, particularly when there may be divergent opinions or schools of scientific thought (see Beaudoin, at paragraphs 120-21; Lapointe v. Hôpital Le Gardeur, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 351, at paragraph 31; Taylor v. Newfoundland and Labrador, at paragraphs 457-58; Trest v. British Columbia (Minister of Health), 2020 BCSC 1524, at paragraph 91).

[282] In cases like the present, public decision makers are often called upon to balance the salutary effects of the public health measures against potential negative effects the severity of which, Manitoba has emphasized may be extremely difficult to predict or quantify. Manitoba is well to cite as they do, McLachlin J. (as she then was) in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, where she held that the civil standard of proof under s. 1 does not require "scientific demonstration" or the "standard required by science" (at paragraph 137).

[283] The often complicated and subtle task of a court when fulfilling its role as protector of fundamental freedoms while providing a margin of appreciation to governments attempting to balance complex issues that involve a multitude of overlapping and conflicting interests, was well described and addressed by Burrage J. in Taylor v. Newfoundland and Labrador (at paragraphs 456-64). Although Burrage J. correctly acknowledged that constitutional rights do not disappear in a pandemic, he also stressed the need for the necessary deference when examining COVID-19 public health measures within the justificatory framework of the s. 1 Charter analysis (at paragraphs 456-59, 463-64):

> It is at this point that I digress briefly to consider the role of deference to the CMOH and the institutional capacity of the Court.
> I am mindful of the fact that while travel restriction has legal force, it is in essence a medical decision directed towards protecting the health of those in this province. The qualifications of the CMOH to make this decision are not challenged. Furthermore, in the exercise of her authority the CMOH draws upon specialized resources at her disposal. This team approach is conducive to informed decision making based on the best medical evidence available.
>
> To this I would add that the courts do not have the specialized expertise to second guess the decisions of public health officials.
>
> In the context of the COVID-19 pandemic Chief Justice Roberts of the Supreme Court of the United States, for the majority, had the following to say regarding deference and the role of the judiciary (South Bay United Pentecostal Church et al v. Gavin Newsom, Governor of California, et al., No. 19A1044 (USSC) at p. 2):
> > The precise question of when restrictions on particular social activities should be lifted during the pandemic is a dynamic and fact-intensive matter subject to reasonable disagreement. Our Constitution principally entrusts "[t]he safety and the health of the people" to the politically accountable officials of the States "to guard and protect." Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 38 (1905). When those official "undertake [ ] to act in area fraught with medical and > scientific uncertainties," their latitude "must be especially broad." Marshall v. United States, 414 U.S. 417, 427 (1974). Where those broad limits are not exceeded, they should not be subject to second-guessing by an "unelected federal judiciary," which lacks the background, competence, and expertise to assess public health and is not accountable to the people See Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528, 545 (1985).

> . . .
>
> I accept the Applicant's argument that the pandemic is not a magic wand which can be waved to make constitutional rights disappear and that the decision of the CMOH is not immunized from review.
>
> However, it is not an abdication of the court's responsibility to afford the CMOH an appropriate measure of deference in recognition of (1) the expertise of her office and (2) the sudden emergence of COVID-19 as a novel and deadly disease. It is also not an abdication of responsibility to give due recognition to the fact that the CMOH, and those in support of that office, face a formidable challenge under difficult circumstances.

[284] Despite what is suggested in some of the jurisprudence as the need for deference in certain cases involving a s. 1 analysis, the applicants in this case correctly emphasize that the onus of justification rests with the government. They also emphasize the requirement that any restrictions on fundamental freedoms need be demonstrably justified with a strong and cogent evidentiary foundation. Put simply, in the present case, the applicants submit that strong evidentiary foundation does not exist and that the PHOs are not reasonable or demonstrably justified and that they fail all three parts of the proportionality inquiry. That is, the applicants insist that there is no rational connection between the PHOs' objectives and the PHOs, that the impugned restrictions do not minimally impair the Charter rights they infringe, and that the severely deleterious effect of the impugned restrictions far outweigh any salutary effect resulting from them.

[285] In arguing that there is no rational connection between the PHOs' objectives and PHOs, the applicants submit that Manitoba has not shown a rational connection between the infringement and the benefits sought on the basis of reason or logic (see Hutterian Brethren, at paragraph 48). In this connection, the applicants impugn Dr. Roussin's emphasis and reliance upon positive PCR test results, which the applicants argue are unreliable to determine infectiousness/contagiousness. The applicants also underscore the negligible risk of asymptomatic transmission, the use of unreliable models, the absence of scientific evidence to justify restrictions on outdoor gatherings, poor evidence to show that places of worship needed to be closed/restricted and what the applicants characterize as the failure on the part of Manitoba, to conduct a cost/benefit analysis. In addition to the foregoing, the applicants suggest that given that the PHOs do not bear any rational connection to their objectives — even on the basis of reason and logic — the restrictions in question are unjustifiably arbitrary.

[286] As it relates to their argument that the restrictions do not minimally impair the Charter rights they infringe, the applicants contend that there is insufficient evidence to justify the restrictions placed on religious settings, religious activities, private in-home gatherings, and outdoor gatherings. It is the position of the applicants that Manitoba has failed to explain through cogent and persuasive scientific evidence why a significantly less intrusive and equally effective measure or sets of measures were not chosen to address the pressing and substantial objectives that Manitoba has identified.

[287] The applicants argue that Manitoba has tendered no evidence to indicate that the risks that Dr. Roussin associates with religious activities cannot be mitigated by measures less extreme or drastic than outright prohibiting in-person worship. The applicants say that Manitoba has failed to provide specific evidence that in-home gatherings have resulted in outbreaks of COVID-19 such so as to justify a complete prohibition on the home gatherings that were addressed by the PHOs. The applicants also argue that Manitoba has provided no evidence that restricting outdoor gatherings and protests advances the objective of preventing the transmission of COVID-19.

[288] In making their argument that Manitoba has failed to minimally impair Charter rights, the applicants point to the evidence and the work of their witness Dr. Bhattacharya, the co-author of the Great Barrington Declaration. The position advanced relies upon the premise that it is necessary to build herd immunity in a population by allowing people at low risk of death to live their lives normally while protecting those who are at a higher risk. This approach is called "focused protection" and as Dr. Bhattacharya and the applicants have emphasized, it is an approach which has been endorsed by more than 50,000 scientists, physicians and other medical professionals worldwide. It is the position of the applicants that the "focused protection" approach would have been significantly less intrusive and equally effective. It is an approach which as explained, would have involved the frequent testing of staff and visitors at long-term care homes, minimizing staff rotation, promoting grocery delivery to elderly people at home and having them meet family members outside. For those not vulnerable, it would involve promoting handwashing and staying home while sick, and otherwise encouraging citizens to continue living their lives.

[289] In addition to their contention that the impugned PHOs failed the rational connection and minimal impairment test, the applicants also submit that the PHOs have had egregiously severe and unprecedented deleterious effects without yielding any discernable benefit supported in the evidence. The deleterious effects include, amongst other things, the emotional, psychological and practical impact of limiting and prohibiting what are for many, the sacred religious and spiritual practices of their faith (which the applicants emphasize are compelled by their most deeply held convictions). The negative impact also includes the immense stress, anxiety, despair and depression that comes from unprecedented social isolation. Juxtaposed with these deleterious effects say the applicants, is the reality that "lockdowns don't work". It is the position of the applicants that countries that had a population predisposed to worse COVID-19 infection had worse outcomes irrespective of whatever lockdown policies they implemented. Citing their expert Dr. Bhattacharya, the applicants insist that lockdowns push cases into the future, but they do not prevent them altogether. Further relying upon the research and study of Dr. Bhattacharya, the applicants insist that "in the vast majority of cases, there is no detectible effect of lockdowns on COVID-19 mortality.[74]

[290] Having closely examined all of the arguments raised by the applicants in response to the position of Manitoba and having reviewed the evidentiary foundation before me, I have determined as I explain below, that Manitoba has established that the restrictions placed on s. 2 rights as a result of the impugned PHOs are justified as reasonable limits under s. 1 of the Charter.

[291] As will be apparent from the discussion below, I have undertaken the requisite legal analysis respecting the requirements for proportionality and I have determined, based on the evidence and the governing law, that Manitoba has discharged its onus. I have also determined that this constitutional challenge exemplifies those cases involving complex issues with a multitude of overlapping interests wherein it must be recognized that "the primary responsibility for making the difficult choices involved in public governance", falls on the elected legislatures and/or those to whom policy-making power has been properly delegated.

[292] In the context of this deadly and unprecedented pandemic, I have determined that this is most certainly a case where a margin of appreciation can be afforded to those making decisions quickly and in real time for the benefit of the public good and safety. I say that while recognizing and underscoring that fundamental freedoms do not and ought not to be seen to suddenly disappear in a pandemic and that courts have a specific responsibility to affirm that most obvious of propositions. But just as I recognize that special responsibility of the courts, given the evidence adduced by Manitoba (which I accept as credible and sound), so too must I recognize that the factual underpinnings for managing a pandemic are rooted in mostly scientific and medical matters. Those are matters that fall outside the expertise of courts. Although courts are frequently asked to adjudicate disputes involving aspects of medicine and science, humility and the reliance on credible experts are in such cases, usually required. In other words, where a sufficient evidentiary foundation has been provided in a case like the present, the determination of whether any limits on rights are constitutionally defensible is a determination that should be guided not only by the rigours of the existing legal tests, but as well, by a requisite judicial humility that comes from acknowledging that courts do not have the specialized expertise to casually second guess the decisions of public health officials, which decisions are otherwise supported in the evidence.

(i) THE PRESSING AND SUBSTANTIAL OBJECTIVES OF THE IMPUGNED PHOS

[293] The applicants have not contested the pressing and substantial nature of the objectives of the impugned PHOs. The concession is wise as the objectives are clearly meant to protect public health and more specifically, they are meant to save lives, prevent serious illness and stop the exponential growth of the virus from overwhelming Manitoba's hospitals and acute healthcare system. By any estimation, such objectives in the context of a pandemic are pressing and substantial.

[294] In acknowledging the pressing and substantial objectives of the impugned PHOs, it is well to note the backdrop to those orders that were first implemented in the fall of 2020 when the community transmission of COVID-19 was raging. As was noted in the evidence, cases were doubling every two weeks and deaths were rising fast. Not surprisingly, Manitoba's ICU and hospital capacity was being stretched to the maximum by those suffering from COVID-19. There was indeed an urgent need to immediately address the COVID-19 infections and flatten the curve as Manitoba's hospitals and ICUs were in significant jeopardy of being overrun (see the affidavits of Dr. Brent Roussin, Dr. Carla Loeppky and Lanette Siragusa).

[295] The protection of public health has long been acknowledged as a pressing and substantial objective and currently, in the context of this COVID-19 pandemic, that objective has never been more obvious (see Springs of Living Water Centre Inc. v. The Government of Manitoba; Taylor v. Newfoundland and Labrador, at paragraphs 426, 437; Beaudoin, at paragraphs 224, 228; Toronto International Celebration Church v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2020 ONSC 8027; Ingram v. Alberta (Chief Medical Officer of Health), 2020 ABQB 806).

(ii) THE RATIONAL CONNECTION BETWEEN THE INFRINGING MEASURES AND THE OBJECTIVES

[296] In order to demonstrate a rational connection, a government must show a causal connection between the infringement and the benefit sought on the basis of reason or logic. A government need only show that it is reasonable to suppose that the measure in question may further the objective(s), not that it will absolutely do so. It is not a high threshold. There must however be a rational link between the infringing measure and its goal or object (see Hutterian Brethren, at paragraphs 48, 51).

[297] In the present case, I have no difficulty in concluding, based on logic, reason and a common sensical understanding of the evidence (see amongst others, the evidence of Dr. Brent Roussin, Dr. Jason Kindrachuk, Dr. Carla Loeppky) that the measures taken to limit gatherings, including in places of worship, are rationally connected to the goal of reducing the spread of COVID-19. As the evidence has demonstrated, the virus is spread through respiratory droplets. It is reasonable and logical to conclude as has been suggested, that the risk of transmission is particularly high in gatherings involving close contact for prolonged periods. It is not surprising that outbreaks of COVID-19 have occurred in various gatherings, including in places of worship.

(iii) MINIMAL IMPAIRMENT: THE IMPUGNED PHOS LIMIT THE S. 2 RIGHTS IN A MANNER THAT IS REASONABLY TAILORED TO THE OBJECTIVE

[298] The minimal impairment requirement in a s. 1 analysis requires that the impugned PHOs limit rights in a manner that is reasonably tailored to the objective. If there are alternative, less harmful means of achieving the government's objective "in a real and substantial manner" as compared with the measure or means under challenge, then the law in question will fail the minimal impairment test (see R. v. K.R.J., at paragraph 70). In examining for minimal impairment, the government's decision must be seen to fall within a reasonable range of outcomes. In that sense, the inquiries are highly contextual (see Law Society of British Columbia v. Trinity Western University, at paragraph 81).

[299] In RJR-MacDonald, the Supreme Court of Canada suggested that when considering the minimal impairment aspect of the proportionality requirement, courts may often accord a measure of deference especially where issues are scientific or socially complex and where it may be said that government may be better positioned than courts to choose amongst a wide range of alternatives. The Supreme Court of Canada observed as follows (at paragraph 160):

> . . . The impairment must be "minimal", that is, the law must be carefully tailored so that rights are impaired no more than necessary. The tailoring process seldom admits of perfection and the courts must accord some leeway to the legislator. If the law falls within a range of reasonable alternatives, the courts will not find it overbroad merely because they can conceive of an alternative which might better tailor objective to infringement: . . . On the other hand, if the government fails to explain why a significantly less intrusive and equally effective measure was not chosen, the law may fail.

[300] In attempting to protect the population from the ravages of the pandemic, Manitoba acknowledges that the CPHO must attempt to balance a number of competing interests, including economic, social, mental health, limited acute care resources, and as well, the degree of public acceptance and compliance. These are all complex considerations, which Manitoba has argued and I accept, are not amenable to any easy calculous and they are indeed, the type of considerations that commend some deference to state action taken in response to COVID-19. As the Supreme Court of Canada noted in Irwin Toy Ltd. (at 993-94):

> When striking a balance between the claims of competing groups, the choice of means, like the choice of ends, frequently will require an assessment of conflicting scientific evidence and differing justified demands on scarce resources.

[301] If the inquiry into whether Manitoba's decisions respecting the impugned PHOs fell within a reasonable range of outcomes is indeed (as suggested by the jurisprudence) highly contextual, then it is both necessary and instructive to examine the situation facing the province in and around October to November 2020. The evidence in that regard supports Manitoba's assertion that the situation was dire and that the weeks following Thanksgiving 2020, saw in Manitoba a rapid escalation in cases including a significant spike of 480 new cases on October 30 alone. The Capital Region was put into Level Red indicating uncontained community spread and significant strain on Manitoba's healthcare system. Manitoba points out that 10 days later, on November 12, the entire province was in Level Red. To make the point even more clearly, Manitoba had the highest per capita rate of active cases in the country. COVID-19 infections were growing exponentially with cases doubling every two weeks. Manitoba's witnesses pointed out that the positivity rate had by then soared to 10.5 per cent provincially. It had been noted that Indigenous people (who as was explained, were more vulnerable) were seen as disproportionately affected in terms of number of cases. On top of that, Manitoba was on the verge of losing its ability to contact trace effectively. Hospital and ICU resources according to Manitoba, were under extreme duress and the modelling information provided by Epidemiology and Surveillance projected that in the absence of significant action, within a very short time, the hospitals and ICUs would no longer be able to cope with the influx of new COVID-19 cases (see the affidavits of Dr. Roussin, at paragraphs 100-06; Dr. Carla Loeppky, at paragraphs 16-19, Exhibits E and F; Lanette Siragusa, at paragraphs 15-20).

[302] By December 10, 2020, after the Level Red restrictions were imposed, Manitoba peaked at 129 patients in ICU. Dr. Roussin concluded, based on all the data that was before him, that a temporary circuit break was essential to significantly reduce the number of contacts and regain control of the pandemic. Based on the evidence presented, Manitoba argues and I agree, that Dr. Roussin had a strong basis for determining that in his professional judgment, any lesser restriction would not have sufficed.

[303] In its written submissions to the Court, Manitoba provided a number of reasons in support of its position as to why the impugned PHOs were minimally impairing (see the application brief of the respondents, filed April 12, 2021, at paragraphs 152(a) through 152(j)). For the purpose of completeness and to fully understand and appreciate the context in which Manitoba drew the lines it did and made the decisions which I find fell within a reasonable range of outcomes, I replicate below the entirety of the reasons provided by Manitoba at paragraph 152 to their brief:

> a) Throughout the pandemic, public health officials have continually monitored and reassessed the situation in order to tailor orders to the prevailing circumstances. Orders have been regularly changed, either tightening or relaxing restrictions as warranted approximately every 2 - 4 weeks. For example, after the first wave, the public health restrictions were relaxed. Since July 24, 2020, businesses could generally re-open and gathering sizes were only limited to 50 persons indoors and 100 people outdoors. Places of worship could have up to 500 people or 30% of usual capacity. When the pandemic began to worsen in October 2020, the CPHO did not immediately close things down or eliminate gatherings. He took a focused and measured approach based on the epidemiological data and other indicators available to him. For example, from November 12 to 20, 2020, the limit on religious services was reduced from 500 to 250 people or 20% except in the Capital Regions where it was 100 people or 15%.[75] The history of orders demonstrates they were responsive and progressive. Tighter gathering restrictions were not put into place in the impugned PHOs until the pandemic became critical and more urgent intervention was necessary.
> b) The public health orders applied regionally when possible, so that restrictions could vary with the severity of community transmission. For example, on October 1, 2020 a more restrictive limit on gatherings including in private residences was imposed only in the Capital Region. The limit on religious gatherings also depended on the situation in particular locations.
>
> c) Unlike some other jurisdictions, there was no curfew imposed or a "shelter in place" order that would prevent people from leaving their home other than for limited reasons. It was still possible to gather with family and friends at indoor and outdoor public places, up to the gathering limit of 5 people. Children could also visit parents in a private residence. An exception was also made for people who live on their own to allow one person to visit.
>
> d) The PHOs did not close schools, maximizing learning and also permitting socializing among children.
>
> e) There was an attempt to accommodate religious services. Religious services could still be delivered remotely indoors, or outdoors in vehicles. As well, individual prayer and reflection was permitted. Places of worship could be used for the delivery of health care and social services (Order 15(4)). Religious officials could attend at one's private residence for counselling or educational instruction or tutoring (Order 1(2)). Bible studies could happen online.

f) Funerals, weddings, baptisms or similar religious ceremonies were permitted, subject to a gathering limit of 5 persons (in addition to the officiant).

g) The impugned PHOs were tailored to the nature of the risk. Places involving greater risk due to prolonged contact were subject to greater restrictions. Places of worship and gatherings in the home were treated much like restaurants, movie theatres, plays and concert halls, which had to remain closed during the circuit break. Some retail transactions were allowed in-store because this usually involved shorter, transitory contact between people. Even so, there was an attempt to minimize such transactions. People were only allowed to purchase "essential items" in-store. Otherwise, shopping had to be done remotely for pick up or delivery.

h) Despite the size limit on outdoor gatherings, this did not preclude many other means of expression to protest the PHOs or other important issues. This included petitions, emails, social media and letters to the media or politicians. In fact, the impugned PHOs did not preclude a protest involving many small groups as long as each group of five persons was discrete, sufficiently spread out and did not interact with other groups.

i) By the fall of 2020, it became clear that the previous measures in place up until then proved insufficient to stop the exponential spread of the virus. Despite earliercapacity limits and precautions, there was evidence of clusters associated with faith- based gatherings including one where several individuals carried on services despite being symptomatic.[76] Private home gatherings were another important source of transmission. Modelling suggested that more stringent limits on gatherings coupled with good public compliance were necessary to flatten the curve.

j) The Circuit Break was temporary. It was limited to a 13 week period when the pandemic was at its most dangerous point to date, cases were surging and our health care system was under enormous strain. Once the measures achieved the desired goal of flattening the curve, restrictions were gradually eased.[77] Currently, gatherings are limited to 5 people at indoor public places, 10 persons at an outdoor gathering on private property and 25 persons at outdoor public places. Religious services can holdup to 100 people or 25% of capacity. Weddings and funerals have increased to 25 persons. Private residences may allow up to 2 visitors or can create a "bubble" with another residence.

[304] The above reasons and the accompanying explanations represent "real time" considerations that implicitly or explicitly required the difficult balancing of a plethora of competing interests as the fast-moving pandemic continued to threaten lives and Manitoba's healthcare system. Needless to say, the menacing force and unpredictability of that pandemic did not provide public health officials with the "parlour-room luxury" of prolonged speculative debate nor the comfort of trial and error decision making, let alone the possibility of academic research projects that might confirm whether there existed "significantly less intrusive measures" that might be "equally effective".

[305] It is worth noting that as was hoped and as was predicted by the modelling, the circuit break implemented by Manitoba did indeed have its intended effect and it averted what the evidence suggests may have been a potential disaster. In the face of the applicants' suggestion that Manitoba could have imposed lesser restrictions on gatherings and places of worship (permitting for example, religious services of limited size as long as reasonable safety precautions were employed), Manitoba reminds the Court that such smaller gatherings had been allowed up until the point at which Manitoba was required to respond. As Manitoba realistically observes, it was not at that point possible to monitor hundreds of private places of worship or residences. There was no way to ensure that the precautions identified would always have been followed, properly or at all. As Manitoba consistently has argued, singing and communion are often integral parts of such services and those acts pose a higher risk, which in the dire context in which Manitoba was operating, constituted yet one more risk to the broader threat to public health.

[306] As part of its argument that the PHOs did not minimally impair the rights at issue, the applicants put forward a theory (through the evidence of Dr. Bhattacharya) that arises from the "Great Barrington Declaration". That theory suggests that Manitoba should have focussed its efforts only on protecting those who were vulnerable to death — the elderly and immunocompromised — rather than imposing broad restrictions aimed at slowing community spread. Based on this theory of "focused protection", young people (under 60) should be otherwise free to gather and circulate throughout society. The theory suggests that such an approach would more minimally impair fundamental freedoms and would cause less harm than that associated with "lockdowns" and at the same time, protect those who are truly at risk from COVID-19. The applicants submit that in addition to the other deficiencies in Manitoba's heavy-handed response, without a focused protection approach, Manitoba cannot argue for a favourable finding on minimal impairment.

[307] While I accept that the theory of focused protection emanating from the Great Barrington Declaration is part of what must be the rigorous ongoing and evolving "scientific conversation", it is not an approach that has been adopted or followed by most governments or their public health officials in Canada or elsewhere in the world. I will leave aside the international consensus to the contrary and the separate but very real question as to whether the specific theory arising from the Great Barrington Declaration could ever realistically be a valid and sustainable public health approach. I will nonetheless point out that based on the evidence before me, it is simply not accurate to suggest that Manitoba and Dr. Roussin do not themselves support a version of "focused protection", however different it may be to the approach advocated by the applicants and Dr. Bhattacharya.

[308] As was explained, Manitoba did indeed focus its efforts on protecting vulnerable populations such as those living in personal care homes, congregate settings and First Nations. That said, it is Manitoba's position that such an effort at focused protection is not by itself sufficient.

[309] Manitoba argues that vulnerable people are integrated throughout society and that people over 60 are not confined to personal care homes. Further, severe outcomes (hospitalizations, ICU admissions, and deaths) can also occur in younger populations across a wide spectrum of ages. In other words, people of all ages are more susceptible to hospitalization and death if they have one of the many underlying medical conditions such heart disease, diabetes, kidney disease, high blood pressure, obesity or otherwise immunocompromised. I note from the evidence that in Manitoba, approximately 40 per cent of reported COVID-19 cases had an underlying condition. One-third or more of the serious cases of COVID-19 (resulting in death or hospitalization) occurred in people under the age of 60. Of those patients admitted to ICU, over 42 per cent were under the age of 60 (see the affidavits of Dr. Roussin, paragraphs 163-65; Dr. Carla Loeppky, Exhibit H).

[310] As it relates to Manitoba's Indigenous population, they too are more vulnerable to severe outcomes from COVID-19 owing to a variety of socioeconomic factors and underlying health conditions. As Dr. Roussin noted, First Nations have been disproportionately affected by COVID-19 and more than half of those cases are off reserve.

[311] It seems necessary to acknowledge that the reference point for identifying "the vulnerable" in the applicants' theory of focused protection, excludes many who in Manitoba, according to the evidence, have become infected and potentially infectious. The integration of these more vulnerable persons throughout society makes the applicants' theory based on the stark marker of age (60) seem insufficiently nuanced and unduly simplistic.

[312] When considering the efficacy of "focused protection" as envisioned by the Great Barrington Declaration, that decidedly more laissez-faire approach need be considered in relation to the potential long-term health effects of COVID-19 on those who are fatalistically left to become infected. In this regard, I note as Dr. Kindrachuk asserted in his evidence, that while much more research in this area is needed, there currently does exist troubling evidence of "long-haul symptoms" which persist, even in young people who become infected.

[313] The applicants' theory respecting focused protection (as a more minimally impairing approach) raises for the Court not only concerns about the practical effects flowing from the resigned acceptance of general community spread in the pursuit of an elusive herd immunity, it also raises significant ethical and moral questions connected to the risks of knowingly exposing any citizen, including some of those most vulnerable persons who are less identifiable because of their integration into the general population.

[314] In the context of considering the minimal impairment aspect of the proportionality inquiry, it is necessary to acknowledge and consider Manitoba's own approach to focused protection, which is no less concerned with the protection of the vulnerable. Manitoba's position however, and the position adopted by most other jurisdictions, is that the protection of vulnerable populations cannot occur without also reducing the extent of community transmission overall. It is only through the reduction of community transmission generally, that the rate of SARS-CoV-2 can be slowed in a community and in so doing, assist in the goal of preventing the overwhelming of the healthcare system and its limited resources. In this regard, Manitoba is right to point out that Dr. Bhattacharya's evidence focusses almost exclusively on mortality with virtually no mention of the impact that widespread community transmission has on hospitals and ICUs.

[315] Based on the evidence, I find that Manitoba's approach is appropriately described as multi-faceted in that it focusses on the vulnerable, but at the same time, it focusses on locations and activities that pose the greatest risk for outbreaks and community transmission. In this way, the restrictions imposed are meant to keep the growth of community transmission of the virus within manageable levels so as to enable Manitoba's healthcare system to cope and in order to "flatten the curve".

[316] I have examined carefully the PHOs in question in the context of the evidence adduced. Whether through an approach best described as multi-faceted focussed protection or otherwise, I find that in examining the exponential growth in COVID-19, the uncontrolled community spread and rise in deaths and serious illness, not to mention the impending crisis facing the healthcare system, Dr. Roussin reasonably concluded that a quick and clear response was required. The difficult balancing that Dr. Roussin was required to perform left him to make a decision and tailor measures which I have determined fell within a range of reasonable alternatives. I am far from convinced that in the context in which Dr. Roussin was operating, there was any basis to conclude that "a significantly less intrusive" measure or measures would have been "equally effective" in flattening the curve. The reality of Dr. Roussin's task in carrying out his duty as CPHO, is well reflected in the following excerpt from Public Health Law and Policy in Canada:[78]

> Clearly, in responding to novel public health threats, authorities will often lack scientific facts and must make judgement calls about restricting individual liberties for the sake of protecting the population as a whole. As Laskin C.J.C. observed in Oakes: "It may become necessary to limit rights and freedoms in circumstances where their exercise would be inimical to the realization of collective goals of fundamental importance".

[317] The impugned measures in the PHOs "minimally impair" the rights in issue as contemplated by the jurisprudence. Further, there is no convincing evidence that there existed significantly less intrusive measures that might have been equally as effective in responding to the real time emergency facing Manitoba and its healthcare system.

(iv) THERE IS AN APPROPRIATE PROPORTIONALITY BETWEEN THE BENEFICIAL AND DELETERIOUS EFFECTS OF THE IMPUGNED PHOS

[318] The last stage of the Oakes test as it is applied in the context of the s. 1 justificatory framework, considers the balance between the beneficial and deleterious effects of the limitation.

[319] At paragraph 289 of this judgment, I explained the range of what the applicants called the severely deleterious effects of the impugned restrictions which they say outweigh any salutary effect resulting from them. Apart from pointing to what they say is evidence establishing that lockdowns do not work (therefore there are no salutary effects) they also identify the significant deprivation occurring to those who are prevented from exercising in a communal and collective fashion, their religious rights and freedoms. They also point to the range of mental health problems flowing from unnecessary social isolation and the sharp rise in substance abuse issues. In short, the applicants insist that the deleterious effects of the PHOs far outweigh the salutary effects, which effects they say, have not prevented COVID-19 deaths or reduced stress on the healthcare system. As such, the applicants submit that the restrictions on gatherings are not "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society" and are thus, unconstitutional.

[320] I have considered carefully the balance between the identifiable beneficial and deleterious effects of the limitation. I am persuaded that there exists the requisite proportionality as between the beneficial and deleterious effects such so as to conclude that Manitoba has discharged its onus on this prong of the Oakes test. The evidence in my view unquestionably demonstrates that the salutary effects of the limitation far outweigh those effects that may be characterized as deleterious.

[321] In considering and assessing the applicants' arguments at this third and final stage of the proportionality inquiry, it seems unavoidable but to conclude that much of what the applicants assert respecting the disproportionally negative impact of the limitations, is inextricably tied to their (the applicants) contention that the scientific evidence provides an insufficient justification for the unprecedented action taken by Manitoba. In other words, according to the applicants, the limitations and restrictions on rights based on unconvincing science, do more harm than good given what the applicants say is Manitoba's misplaced and to some extent, unnecessary response.

[322] As earlier noted, amongst other objections, the applicants criticized the impugned PHOs on the basis of the following: that Manitoba had artificially inflated the number of deaths; that the PCR test was a flawed basis for decision making; that Manitoba's modelling was flawed; that Manitoba insufficiently assessed the collateral costs (economic effects and mental health) compared to the benefits; that there was no scientific evidence that the restrictions were necessary or that the virus spreads more easily at places of worship compared to retail outlets; and, that Manitoba ought to have focussed their protective measures only on the elderly and vulnerable and permitted everyone else to gather and circulate freely in society. The foregoing criticisms set up and constitute the basis for an argument whereby the applicants then proceed to insist that Manitoba's response, as exemplified by the restrictions in the PHOs, is based on misapprehension and misunderstanding all of which flows from generally questionable science. Not surprisingly, the applicants then say that the scope and nature of the accompanying measures are unnecessary and of a dubious utility and benefit, particularly given the disproportionate costs associated with the limiting of fundamental freedoms.

[323] The weakness in the applicants' position in making the arguments they do respecting the absence of salutary effects as compared to those they describe as egregiously deleterious, is that having carefully reviewed and assessed the evidentiary foundation in this case, I reject the applicants' criticisms of Manitoba's reliance upon the science Manitoba acknowledges it has in fact relied upon. As I have already suggested and determined, Manitoba has persuaded me that there is nothing obviously flawed or deficient about the scientific evidence it has relied upon. As a consequence, for reasons already touched upon, I accept that Manitoba's response and the accompanying limitations on rights that they imposed, were both necessary and appropriate.

[324] Having determined as I have that the scientific evidence does support Manitoba's extraordinary response and the limitations and restrictions on rights they were required to implement, I can similarly say that the benefit from those limitations and restrictions in what was a dire and urgent situation, was neither disproportionately minimal nor insignificant. Notwithstanding what must be readily acknowledged are the hardships and inconvenience that flow from such limitations on rights, it was those very limitations found in the impugned PHOs, that — according to the evidence I accept — helped realize the pressing and substantial objectives of protecting public health, saving lives and stopping the expediential growth of the virus from overwhelming Manitoba hospitals and its acute healthcare system.

[325] Manitoba argues persuasively that it has long been recognized that the potential to harm one's neighbours provides a reasonable basis for limiting the freedom to manifest one's beliefs, opinions and conscience. In other words, freedom of religion for example, must be exercised with due respect for the rights of others and subject to such limitations as are necessary to protect public safety, order and health, and the fundamental rights and freedoms of others. As Manitoba has insisted, this approach does not repudiate religious freedom, but instead, it facilitates its exercise so as to take the general well-being of others into account (see Syndicat Northcrest v. Amselem, 2004 SCC 47, at paragraph 178). This proposition was also recognized in Multani v. Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, 2006 SCC 6, wherein Charron J. noted as follows (at paragraph 26):

> This Court has clearly recognized that freedom of religion can be limited when a person's freedom to act in accordance with his or her beliefs may cause harm to or interfere with the rights of others (see R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 337, and Syndicat Northcrest v. Amselem, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 551, 2004 SCC 47, at para. 62).

[326] Manitoba acknowledges that the impugned PHOs restrict the ability to worship in person, which Manitoba also acknowledges is of significance to the applicants. Although the orders also limit gatherings to small groups outside of one's private residence, they do not prevent gathering altogether. The PHOs still made it possible to meet with family and friends in small groups. In acknowledging the importance of gathering in person to worship and the deprivation that comes with the limits on gathering size, Manitoba nonetheless asserts persuasively, that in the context of the pandemic, while the identified deprivations are not easy, if they did not occur, the gatherings without limits could put the health and lives of others at risk. It is necessary for the Court when considering the limitations that have been imposed, to also consider the Charter rights of others (the right to life and security) which are also an important part of the consideration in balancing and weighing the effects of the limitation.

[327] Based on the evidence, it is not difficult to conclude that the PHOs do indeed achieve an important societal benefit: protecting the health and safety of others, especially the vulnerable. The present case is one of those cases where the obviously important freedom of religion and other Charter protections are, as Manitoba has contended, outweighed by the greater good of protecting public health by preventing the spread of a highly-contagious virus in the context of an unprecedented global pandemic (see Public Health Law and Policy in Canada, at 27-29; Carter, at paragraph 95).

[328] In addition to the broader societal benefits of the limitations, Manitoba submits that in assessing the proportionality of benefits and effects, it is also critical to remember that the impugned restrictions were of a limited duration. I agree that it is important to note that those restrictions were in effect for only as long as necessary so as to regain control over community transmission and alleviate the intense strain on the hospitals and ICUs.

[329] In underscoring the proportionality and significance of the benefits vis-à-vis the deleterious effects of the limitations, Manitoba maintains that despite the erroneous contentions of the applicants, the evidence suggests that the limitations were indeed required because: deaths from COVID-19 are real; positive PCR cases of COVID-19 are real; Manitoba's modelling projections were proven to be correct; and that in making the difficult and ultimately significant decisions required of them, public health officials properly balanced collateral effects. In my view, as I have already repeated, the evidence does indeed support all of those assertions.

[330] The task of properly balancing collateral effects is difficult because public health officials and government must balance a wide variety of competing rights and interests of all Manitobans. Manitoba concedes that the potential for negative collateral effects of public health restrictions and limitations, such as the impact on mental health or adverse economic consequences, must be taken seriously. That said, Manitoba resists any suggestion that the CPHO failed to take into account the potential negative impacts of the impugned PHOs. In taking that position, Manitoba is on solid ground.

[331] At paragraphs 87 and 175 of his affidavit, Dr. Roussin affirms that collateral efforts were always part of the consideration and analysis for the public health officials. The potential harms were balanced against the benefits and the severity of the pandemic. Although there is no question that in the context of the considerable frustration, sickness, death, and fear, all of which have become to one extent or another, by-products of the pandemic, the restrictions flowing from the PHOs have caused further strain and hardship. Nonetheless, Dr. Roussin has noted that decisions were required to be made quickly and in real time and in the face of much uncertainty. Manitoba emphasizes that both the benefits and the burdens of the public health orders were constantly re-evaluated in a dynamic way as the pandemic progressed.

[332] The evaluation of precise harms caused by public health limitations and restrictions, is a complex subject that will be examined for many years. As Manitoba has argued, there may be general evidence that mental health has deteriorated during the pandemic and that there has been identifiable economic suffering. While that reality ought not to be minimized, it is not possible to attribute the cause of suicide or depression or increases in addiction or overdoses solely or directly to the public health restrictions — let alone the particular impugned PHOs. There is no convincing evidence that the 13-week closure of places of worship and the restrictions placed on public and private gatherings have caused suicides, or some version of irreparable economic harm such so as to require the Court to conclude that any real or potential harms outweigh the need to address the urgency and the seriousness of the public health crisis as it was addressed during the period in question.

[333] In the final analysis, I am of the view that there is persuasive scientific evidence that justifies the restriction on gatherings and the temporary closure of religious services at places of worship. The evidence suggests that Manitoba's PHOs are indeed based on current scientific information and knowledge gathered from Canada and around the world, including from peer reviewed articles, recommendations from the WHO and the Pan-Canadian Public Health Network (PHN) advisory committees, and no less important, from the lessons learned from the experience in other jurisdictions.

[334] It should not be forgotten that decisions respecting the limitations on s. 2 rights were based in part on the shared knowledge, experience and best practices acquired from Manitoba working closely and collaboratively with the provincial and federal counterparts across Canada. This collaboration included public health experts who were epidemiologists, virologists, immunologists, and health care professionals from various other backgrounds. In the end, there is more than enough credible evidence before me to support the proposition that the restrictions on gatherings, including places of worship, were necessary. After those restrictions were put in place, the COVID-19 numbers began to decline, consistent with what the modelling predicted (see the affidavit of Dr. Roussin, at paragraph 87). The Level Red public health measures implemented during the fall of 2020, along with the public's cooperation and compliance with those PHOs, changed the trajectory of COVID-19 cases and improved the situation and burden on acute care resources. Manitobans had indeed flattened the curve and avoided a disastrous situation

[335] When examining the benefits of Manitoba's response in the face of the threat of such a deadly pandemic, it is reasonable and rational to conclude that despite the undeniable hardships caused by the limitations on fundamental freedoms, the salutary benefits far outweigh the deleterious effects. In making that statement, I am mindful that the Supreme Court of Canada has held that a s. 1 justification does not require scientific proof in an empirical sense. In this context, it is extremely difficult and perhaps impossible to empirically prove in advance that the potential economic and social costs of the impugned restrictions outweigh the benefits. Instead, as the Supreme Court of Canada has noted, "it is enough that the justification be convincing, in the sense that it is sufficient to satisfy the reasonable person looking at all the evidence and relevant considerations, that the state is justified in infringing the right at stake to the degree it has." In this sense, the Court looks for and Manitoba has provided, a "rational, reasoned defensibility" (see Sauvé v. Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), 2002 SCC 68, at paragraph 18; Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33, at paragraphs 77-79). Even if and where the evolving scientific evidence and information is not definitive or completely determinative, I accept that Dr. Roussin relied on all of the available evidence, drew reasonable inferences and applied common sense to what was known. To repeat, the decision to temporarily close places of worship and otherwise limit the size of gatherings, was rational, reasoned and defensible in the circumstances of an undeniable public health crisis.

B. ADMINISTRATIVE LAW ISSUE

Issue #5: Were the impugned PHOs ultra vires because they failed to restrict rights or freedoms no greater than was reasonably necessary to respond to the COVID-19 public health emergency as required by s. 3 of The Public Health Act?

[337] Section 3 of The Public Health Act states:

> Limit on restricting rights and freedoms
> If the exercise of a power under this Act restricts rights or freedoms, the restriction must be no greater than is reasonably necessary, in the circumstances, to respond to a health hazard, a communicable disease, a public health emergency or any other threat to public health.

[338] The applicants argue that the impugned PHOs restrict the identified rights and freedoms and that the restrictions are far greater than are reasonably necessary to respond to a public health emergency. As a result, they say the PHOs are ultra vires the act.

[339] The applicants submit that their argument on this administrative law issue is substantially similar to their s. 1 Charter argument and that they would rely on their analysis in respect of that section to argue the PHOs also do not comply with s. 3 of the act.

[340] Given that I have already made many of the relevant and connected determinations in my s. 1 analysis, my disposition of this issue need not be prolonged.

[341] This standard of review in respect of this question is one of reasonableness which need take into account, the due deference required respecting medical and scientific expertise.

[342] As my determinations made in the context of my s. 1 analysis would suggest, I have concluded that Dr. Roussin's assessment that the restrictions contained in the impugned PHOs represented restrictions that were no greater than reasonably necessary (to respond to the public health emergency) was a reasonable assessment. As already explained, the context for Dr. Roussin's decision and assessment was that the situation facing the province in November 2020 was grave and that the existing measures were insufficient to stem the tide of the growth of SARS-CoV-2. The resulting threat of hospitalizations and critical cases was undeniable. The spread of the virus was leading not only to increased deaths, but as well, an enormous pressure and burden on Manitoba's healthcare system.

[343] In that context, Manitoba was on the verge of exceeding its hospital and ICU capacity. In order to address the exponential growth of the virus and the potential disaster for the healthcare system, Dr. Roussin targeted those types of gatherings that posed a high risk of transmission. In acting as he did when he did, Dr. Roussin had little room for error and time was of the essence.

[344] Manitoba's explanation for Dr. Roussin's decisions were earlier explained in my s. 1 analysis, particularly in the context of my determinations with respect to minimal impairment. As will be noted, s. 3 of the act reflects much of the same analysis that need be conducted when considering the minimal impairment aspect of s. 1. Put simply, for the reasons that I provided in determining that the restrictions in question were minimally impairing, I can similarly state that the CPHO acted reasonably in determining that the PHOs met the requirements of s. 3 of the act.

[345] As Manitoba has underscored, just as s. 1 of the Charter does not demand that a limit on rights be perfectly calibrated, neither can the CPHO's application of s. 3 of the act. In examining Dr. Roussin's decisions, I see them as decisions that were within the range of reasonable decisions supported by the scientific and epidemiological evidence. As such, the decisions are entitled to deference as those decisions are in my view, reasonable.

C. Division OF Powers Issue

Issue #6: Were the impugned PHOs relating to places of worship inoperative under the doctrine of paramountcy because it conflicted with s. 176 of the Criminal Code?

[346] Section 176 of the Criminal Code reads as follows:

> Obstructing or violence to or arrest of officiating clergyman
>
> 176(1) Every person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term of not more than two years or is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction who
> (a) by threats or force, unlawfully obstructs or prevents or endeavours to obstruct or prevent an officiant from celebrating a religious or spiritual service or performing any other function in connection with their calling, or
> (i) assaults or offers any violence to them, or
> (ii) arrests them on a civil process, or under the pretence of executing a civil process.

> Disturbing religious worship or certain meetings
>
>
> Idem

[347] The applicants argue that the impugned PHOs, as they pertain to religious services, are in direct contravention of s. 176 of the Criminal Code. Manitoba for its part, contends that the impugned PHOs are intended to protect the population from a serious communicable disease and do not violate or otherwise conflict in any manner with s. 176 of the Criminal Code.

[348] The applicant Tobias Tissen's evidence states that the enforcement of the PHOs has obstructed and diverted persons from entering their place worship and attending religious services, frustrating the purpose of the protections afforded by s. 176. Mr. Tissen submits that while attempting to hold a drive-in church service in November 2020, a police barricade and tow truck were present, obstructing church goers from attending.

[349] It is the position of the applicants that regardless of any stated public health motive, the effect of the PHOs and the enforcement of them, disturbs a person's meeting for religious worship, and goes further still by precluding them from meeting for religious worship altogether, in violation of s. 176 and the fundamental freedoms it is intended to protect.

[350] The applicants submit that even in the event that the PHOs are determined to be validly enacted, the PHOs are incompatible with the federal legislative purpose of s. 176 and must be declared inoperative to the extent of the inconsistency and insofar as any meeting for religious worship is obstructed.

The Doctrine of Paramountcy

[351] The doctrine of paramountcy provides that "where there is an inconsistency between validly enacted but overlapping provincial and federal legislation, the provincial legislation is inoperative to the extent of the inconsistency" (see Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, at paragraph 15). When conducting a paramountcy analysis, the first step is to determine whether the federal and provincial laws are validly enacted. If both laws are validly enacted, the next step requires consideration of whether any overlap between the two laws constitutes a conflict sufficient to render the provincial law inoperative (see Lemare, at paragraph 16).

[352] As the applicants have identified, there are two forms of conflict which the Supreme Court of Canada has described as follows (see Orphan Well Association v. Grant Thornton Ltd., 2019 SCC 5 (at paragraph 65)):

> . . . The first is operational conflict, which arises where compliance with both a valid federal law and a valid provincial law is impossible. Operational conflict arises "where one enactment says 'yes' and the other says 'no', such that 'compliance with one is defiance of the other'" (Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 419, at para. 18, quoting Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161, at p. 191). The second is frustration of purpose, which occurs where the operation of a valid provincial law is incompatible with a federal legislative purpose. The effect of a provincial law may frustrate the purpose of the federal law, even though it does "not entail a direct violation of the federal law's provisions".

[353] In order to establish that provincial legislation frustrates the purpose of a federal enactment, a party "must first establish the purpose of the relevant federal statute, and then prove that the provincial legislation is compatible with this purpose" (see Orphan Well, at paragraph 65; Lemare, at paragraph 26).

[354] The purpose of s. 176 was addressed by the Supreme Court of Canada in Skoke-Graham v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 106, at paragraphs 19-20. In that case, the Supreme Court of Canada was examining what was then s. 172, the identical section and precursor to what is now s. 176. The court noted as follows:

> 19. Subsection 172(3), much like subs. 172(2), is a prohibition which, by means of summary conviction penalty, protects people, who have gathered to pursue any kind of socially beneficial activity, from being purposefully disturbed or interrupted. The subsection is designed to safeguard the rights of groups of people to meet freely and to prevent the breaches of the peace which could result if these types of meetings were disrupted….
> 20. There is no difficulty in concluding that this prohibition, with its consequent penal sanctions, serves the needs of public morality by precluding conduct potentially injurious to the public interest.

[355] In its submissions, Manitoba directly explored the objects of s. 176. In that regard, it can be noted that s. 176 prohibits the criminal conduct of individuals who use threats or force or assault to willfully interfere with religious worship. Under s. 176(1)(a), it is a crime for a person to unlawfully obstruct or prevent officiants from celebrating a religious service by threats or force. Clearly, the impugned PHOs are legislative instruments. As Manitoba has argued, a legislative instrument or order made under a statute cannot be seen to (nor does it in the present case) use threats or force within the meaning of s. 176. Neither was it the intent of the impugned PHOs to obstruct or prevent officiants from performing religious services. Although public gatherings in a place of worship were temporarily closed to limit the spread of COVID-19, Manitoba is well to remind the Court that officiants could continue to attend to perform services and offer them remotely. Even if the impugned PHOs had the effect of preventing officiants from performing in-person religious services at a place of worship, they did not unlawfully do so. Indeed, the PHOs were entirely lawful instruments made under The Public Health Act.

[356] Section 176(1)(b) makes it a crime for a person to assault, be violent towards or arrest a religious officiant, knowing the officiant is about to perform or is returning from performing their religious duties. Clearly this is prescribed criminal conduct by individuals who knowingly interfere with an imminent religious function or one that has been performed. Nowhere in the impugned PHOs is it possible to see an authorization for anyone to assault or use violence against religious officiants. As Manitoba also clarifies, the PHOs did not authorize the arrest of a religious officiant on a civil process to prevent them from carrying out religious functions or because they just completed religious functions or duties. Instead, an officiant is allowed to carry on a religious service and deliver it remotely. In the event of any subsequent ticket that might be issued in relation to a violation of the order against gathering in a place of worship, such a ticket cannot be seen as an attempt to prevent a religious function by violence or assault.

[357] It must be noted that ss. 176(2) and (3) make it a crime for anyone to willfully disturb or interrupt an assembly of persons for religious worship. It is not however, a crime to issue a statutory order of general application intended to prevent prolonged gatherings indoors for a valid public health reason. In that sense, the impugned PHOs do not "wilfully disturb or interrupt" religious assemblies within the meaning of s. 176.

As Manitoba emphasizes, during the "circuit break", the impugned PHOs temporarily closed places of worship to prevent in-person gatherings in order to reduce the spread of a communicable disease. Nevertheless, religious assemblies were still permitted to continue by remote means.

[358] In Skoke-Graham v. The Queen, the Supreme Court of Canada noted that ss. 172(2) and (3) protect people who have gathered from being purposefully disturbed or interrupted. They also noted that to be criminal, it is necessary for the conduct to be disorderly in itself or productive of disorder. As Manitoba as argued, these Criminal Code provisions are not intended to capture peaceful or orderly conduct. Given the above, I am not persuaded that issuing a public health order under The Public Health Act meets the actus reus of a s. 176 Criminal Code offence. With s. 176 of the Criminal Code, it would appear that Parliament was contemplating and addressing a form of disorderly conduct or agitation which interferes with religious worship not the regulation that flows from a public health order.

[359] I am not in agreement with the applicants that the impugned PHOs conflict with the operation or frustrate the purpose of s. 176 of the Criminal Code. As Manitoba has persuasively argued, if the applicants' argument were accepted, it would be impossible to restrict the number of people allowed in a place of worship or for that matter, to close a place of worship due to serious violations of building and fire codes. Such restriction or regulation would according to the logic of the applicants, be necessarily inoperative. Such a reading and application of s. 176, would be absurd.

[360] Accordingly, I have determined that those sections of the impugned PHOs relating to places of worship, are not inoperative under the doctrine of paramountcy.

XI. CONCLUSION

[361] My determinations can be summarized as follows:

a. Based on the position taken by Manitoba resulting in its appropriate concession, I have determined that the impugned PHOs do indeed limit and restrict the applicants' rights and freedoms as found in ss. 2(a), 2(b), and 2(c) of the Charter.

b. In the circumstances of this case, it is necessary and just to address and decide the applicants' challenge respecting what they say were the alleged infringements to their ss. 7 and 15 rights under the Charter. Having so considered the merits of the applicants' position in respect of those alleged breaches, I have nonetheless determined that the impugned PHOs did not infringe the applicants' Charter rights under ss. 7 and 15.

c. Insofar as Manitoba has conceded and I have found that the alleged limitations of ss. 2(a), 2(b), and 2(c) under the Charter, I have also determined that the impugned restrictions in the PHOs are constitutionally justifiable as reasonable limits under s. 1 of the Charter.

d. Respecting the applicants' administrative law ground of review, I have determined that the impugned PHOs were not ultra vires (in any administrative law sense) and they met the requirements of s. 3 of The Public Health Act insofar as they restricted rights and freedoms no greater than was reasonably necessary in response to the COVID-19 public health emergency.

e. Respecting the applicants' division of powers ground, I have determined that the impugned PHOs do not conflict with the operation nor do they frustrate the purpose s. 176 of the Criminal Code and accordingly, they are not inoperative under the doctrine of paramountcy.

[362] In light of the determinations set out above, the application is dismissed.

I. Introduction

[1] Subject to s. 1 thereof, the rights of Canadians are guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms [Charter].

[2] The preamble to the Charter invokes “the supremacy of God and the rule of law” as principles upon which Canada is founded.

[3] The petitioners in this case assert that certain of their Charter rights have been unlawfully infringed and seek declaratory and other relief with respect to certain orders made by the Provincial Health Officer (PHO) Dr. Bonnie Henry that affect the petitioners’ ability to meet in person.

II. The Parties

[4] The petitioner Alain Beaudoin has involved himself in advocacy for both what he sees as his own rights and those of others. He could fairly be called an activist.

[5] The petitioner Brent Smith is the Pastor of the Riverside Calvary Chapel, and the petitioner John Van Muyen is the Chair of the Council of Immanuel Covenant Reformed Church. The other petitioners are churches, whose congregations and adherents believe they have an obligation to meet in person based upon their religious beliefs. As their counsel did, I will refer to these petitioners as “the religious petitioners”.

[6] The respondents are Her Majesty the Queen in Right of the Province of British Columbia, represented by the Attorney General of British Columbia and Dr. Bonnie Henry, the PHO. Under s. 64 of the Public Health Act, S.B.C. 2008, c. 28 [PHA], Dr. Henry is the senior public health official in the province.

[7] The intervenor, the Association for Reformed Political Action Canada, is a non-profit organization representing Reformed Christians. I granted them leave to make limited submissions that augmented, but did not duplicate the submissions of the religious petitioners.

III. Background

[8] We are in the midst of a global pandemic that threatens the health and lives of people throughout the world, including our fellow citizens.

[9] The first diagnosed case of COVID-19 in B.C. was discovered on January 27, 2020. By early March, public health officials understood that the SARS-CoV-2 virus (the "Virus") was the infectious agent causing outbreaks of COVID-19 and that gatherings of people in close contact could cause transmission.

[10] The Virus can be spread by people who do not have symptoms. As long as the reproduction rate (the average number of people to whom an infected person is likely to transmit the Virus) is greater than 1, the Virus will spread exponentially, with the capacity to overwhelm the health system.

[11] Public health monitoring looks for clusters (two or more cases associated with the same location, group or event), since these can evolve into outbreaks wherein transmission becomes sustained.

[12] On March 18, 2020, the Minister of Public Safety issued a declaration of a state of emergency in B.C., which has been extended and consistently kept in place to date. The recitals for Ministerial Order M073, issued under the Emergency Program Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 111*,* state:

> WHEREAS the COVID-19 pandemic poses a significant threat to the health, safety and welfare of the residents of British Columbia, and threatens to disproportionately impact the most vulnerable segments of society;
> AND WHEREAS prompt coordination of action and special regulation of persons or property is required to protect the health, safety and welfare of the residents of British Columbia, and to mitigate the social and economic impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic on residents, businesses, communities, organizations and institutions throughout the Province of British Columbia.
> NOW THEREFORE I declare that a state of emergency exists throughout the whole of the Province of British Columbia.

[13] Dr. Henry is an expert in public health and preventive medicine. Her responsibilities are outlined in the PHA. She is informed by the public health component of B.C.'s health system, which includes the B.C. Centre for Disease Control ("BCCDC") and regional medical health officers.

[14] One of the goals of public health is to prevent and manage outbreaks of disease within the population. Dr. Henry bears the formidable responsibility of making the decisions that are intended to protect us from the COVID-19 pandemic. Against the serious risks that are associated with the pandemic, she is obliged to balance a wide variety of competing rights and interests of British Columbians and visitors to our province.

(a) The Incidence of Transmission of the Virus in Religious Settings

[15] The data from the Fraser Health Region showed that, from March 15, 2020 to January 15, 2021, 7 places of worship were affected by the Virus, with 59 associated COVID-19 cases. Of these cases, 24 were associated with a religious setting in Chilliwack in October 2020, 12 were linked to a religious setting in Burnaby in December 2020, eight were associated with a religious setting in Maple Ridge in November 2020, and six were associated with a religious setting in Langley in November 2020.

[16] The data from the Interior Health Region showed that, from March 15, 2020 to January 15, 2021, 11 places of worship were affected with 20 associated cases. Of these cases, 11 were associated with two religious settings in Kelowna in September and November respectively. The data showed that all of the cases in religious settings in Interior Health occurred between August 2020 and January 2021, with the majority of places of worship being affected in the fall (October and November 2020).

[17] In the Northern Health Region, from March 15, 2020 to January 15, 2021, five religious settings were affected with 40 associated cases. In November 2020 alone, nine cases were associated with staff in a religious setting, and four cases were associated with a different religious setting in Prince George. In addition, the region saw 27 cases associated with one funeral in August and five cases associated with three weddings (held in Surrey, Toronto and Vernon) in October 2020. This region also has a number of recent exposures from funerals that were not included in the numbers above as they are still under investigation.

[18] The data from the Vancouver Coastal Health Region showed that, from September 15, 2020 to January 15, 2021, 25 places of worship were affected with 61 associated cases in the region. Twenty-eight cases and one death were associated with an outbreak at a religious setting in Vancouver in November 2020. It is likely that two index cases from that religious setting sparked a large outbreak at another facility. In addition, five cases were linked to a religious setting in Richmond in November 2020, and three cases were associated with another religious setting in Vancouver in November 2020. Vancouver Coastal Health did not implement a searchable information system until September 2020, so the data on the location of events prior to September is not available to the PHO.

(b) Dr. Henry's Authority

[19] Section 30 of the PHA provides that a health officer can issue an order if they reasonably believe that, inter alia, "a health hazard exists", or "a condition, a thing or an activity presents a significant risk of causing a health hazard".

[20] Section 31 of the PHA in turn provides that a health officer (or the PHO in an emergency) "may order a person to do anything that the health officer reasonably believes is necessary for any of the following purposes… (b) to prevent or stop a health hazard, or mitigate the harm or prevent further harm from a health hazard".

[21] Section 32 of the PHA permits a health officer (or the PHO in an emergency) to make orders in respect of, inter alia, "a place", including that a person not enter a place. Section 39(3) permits an order to be made in respect of classes of persons.

[22] Part 5 of the PHA provides for "Emergency Powers". These powers can be exercised in an emergency. An "emergency" is defined as "a localized event or regional event that meets the conditions set out in section 51(1) or (2), respectively". "Regional event" is in turn defined to mean "an immediate and significant risk to public health throughout a region or the province".

[23] Section 52 of the PHA provides conditions to be met before the Part 5 emergency powers may be exercised. Section 52(2) states:

> (2) Subject to subsection (3), a person must not exercise powers under this Part in respect of a regional event unless the provincial health officer provides notice that the provincial health officer reasonably believes that at least 2 of the following criteria exist:
> (a) the regional event could have a serious impact on public health;
>
> (b) the regional event is unusual or unexpected;
>
> (c) there is a significant risk of the spread of an infectious agent or a hazardous agent;
>
> (d) there is a significant risk of travel or trade restrictions as a result of the regional event.
> (3) If the provincial health officer is not immediately available to give notice under subsection (2), a person may exercise powers under this Part until the provincial health officer becomes available.

[24] Section 67(2) of the PHA permits the PHO to exercise a power or perform a duty of a "health officer" during an emergency.

[25] One of the powers of a health officer that the PHO can exercise in an emergency is the power to issue orders respecting health hazards under Part 4 of the PHA. The term "health hazard" is defined in s. 1 to mean:

> (a) a condition, a thing or an activity that
> (i) endangers, or is likely to endanger, public health, or
>
> (ii) interferes, or is likely to interfere, with the suppression of infectious agents or hazardous agents, or
> (b) a prescribed condition, thing or activity, including a prescribed condition, thing or activity that
>
> (i) is associated with injury or illness, or
> (ii) fails to meet a prescribed standard in relation to health, injury or illness.

[26] Over the course of the past year, Gatherings and Events orders ("G&E Orders") were made by Dr. Henry pursuant to ss. 30, 31, 32 and 39(3) of Part 4 of the PHA.

(c) Dr. Henry's Progressive Orders

[27] Dr. Henry has used her powers under the PHA to restrict public gatherings and events in order to limit the risk of transmission of the Virus. On March 16, 2020, she issued the first G&E Order, prohibiting gatherings in excess of 50 people.

[28] On March 17, 2020, Dr. Henry declared the transmission of the Virus, to be a regional event, as defined by s. 51 of the PHA. In that notice, she indicated that, based on the information reported to her in her capacity as PHO, she believed the criteria in s. 52(2)(a), (b), (c) and (d) of the PHA were met.

[29] The issuance of the Notice of Regional Event triggered Dr. Henry's ability to exercise emergency powers under the Part 5 of the PHA, set out above.

[30] The BCCDC publishes COVID-19 Situation Repot bulletins on a weekly basis. These bulletins provide in-depth information about COVID-19 epidemiology, underscoring data and key trends in the province, including COVID-19 case counts, B.C.'s epidemic curve, test rates and percent positivity, hospitalization rates and deaths, and likely sources of infection.

[31] Dr. Henry and other public health officials have monitored surveillance data respecting the emergence and progression of the Virus in B.C. Reports summarizing that data are made available to the public on the BCCDC's website.

[32] The Situation Report bulletins started showing an increase in COVID-19 cases in September 2020.

[33] By mid-October 2020, diagnosed case numbers began to accelerate rapidly, rising from a seven-day moving average[1] of 130 cases on October 11, 2020 to 420 cases by November 6, 2020. Hospitalizations and admissions to intensive care units, which typically lag the increase in cases, had increased from 77 hospitalizations and

[1] The seven-day moving average represents the average number of cases per day, based on data from several days.

24 people in intensive care on October 11, 2020 to 104 people in hospital and 31 people in intensive care by November 6, 2020.

[34] On October 26, 2020, Dr. Henry stated:

> I'd like to remind everybody about our mass gathering order. That is, refers across the board to gatherings of no more than 50 people. But there are caveats to this order. It requires that every location must have sufficient space that people can maintain safe distancing between everyone. And we know that when these COVID safety plans are followed in settings like restaurants, event spaces, churches, temples, hotels, that we don't see transmission. But too often, over the last few weeks, we've been hearing stories where people are trying to put aside the safety plans, that feel it is okay to have a few additional people, or for people to mix and mingle. And, and unfortunately, we have seen spread in these environments.

[35] In a verbal report of November 7, 2020, Dr. Henry imposed further restrictions on gatherings in the Vancouver Coastal and Fraser Health regions. She provided reasons in the form of a media briefing when announcing the oral order, referring to "dangerously high and rapid increase" of COVID-19 cases and outbreaks in the two prior weeks, demonstrating exponential growth as opposed to what had previously been linear growth in the number of cases.

[36] At the same time, Dr. Henry stated that transmission of the Virus was not occurring in places like restaurants where COVID-19 safety plans were being followed, but the modelling available indicated exponential growth of COVID-19 incidence if social contacts were not reduced from the existing baseline, and that without more restrictive measures, the ability to continue contact tracing could be compromised.

[37] The November 7, 2020 verbal orders were region-specific because the data showed that transmission and serious adverse consequences were particularly substantial in Vancouver Coastal and Fraser regions, and public health systems in those health authorities were being significantly strained to keep up with the volume of cases and consequent large numbers of case contacts that needed follow up through contact tracing to break the chains of transmission.

[38] By November 19, 2020, the weekly COVID-19 Situation Reports showed that the surge of cases continued, with the data showing an average of 690 cases per day and 217 hospitalizations with 59 people in intensive care. That day, Dr. Henry extended the November 7, 2020 measures province-wide. She announced a temporary province-wide ban on all in-person gatherings, including religious services. The temporary ban continues, but does not apply to online religious services, drive-through services, individual meetings with religious leaders or to private prayer or contemplation.

[39] On that day, Dr. Henry explained that increased activity in terms of community transmission, outbreaks and effects on the health care system in every health authority in the province meant we “now need to do more” and to keep our essential services and our essential activities open and operating safely, including schools and workplaces.

[40] Dr. Henry also said that “we need to relieve stress on the health care system. If this does not occur, people with COVID-19 and with other urgent health issues will suffer”. She explained that measures would be reviewed every two weeks, given that that is the incubation period for a clear and notable difference and slowing of transmission, for “balance and control”.

[41] Dr. Henry stated that transactional gatherings were not prohibited, but masks were required. She said the information reported to her was that poorer ventilation and often loud music is where there was higher risk.

[42] Generally, the prohibited activities were narrowed down to those that were felt to be too high-risk, with all others required to adhere to new guidelines. Dr. Henry emphasized the importance of managing the pandemic by “flattening the curve” and keeping the economy functioning and schools open.

[43] In announcing her oral order of November 19, 2020, Dr. Henry stated the following:

> While places of worship are to have no in-person group services for this period of time - I've had the privilege of meeting with a number of faith leaders from around the province - and this is important and they understand we need our faith services more than ever right now but we need them to do them in a way that's safe. With the community transmission that we're seeing and the fact that we have seen transmission in some of our faith-based settings.
>
> We need to suspend those and support each other and find those ways to care for each other remotely.
>
> The exceptions will be those important events - funerals and weddings and ceremonies such as baptisms - which may proceed in a limited way with a maximum of ten people including the officiant.

[44] She also said that:

a) The Province was now facing 538 new cases of COVID-19 in a single day, compared with about 175 cases per day four weeks earlier. The Province was clearly in a "second wave";

b) Provincial hospitals and ICU capacity were "stretched";

c) With higher prevalence, the probability of a young person having severe illness or dying increased, illustrated by the fact that one person in his 30s had died recently from COVID-19;

d) Transmission at social events in communities had spilled over into long term care and hospitals, with British Columbia facing 50 active outbreaks in the health system;

e) Transmission of SARS-CoV-2 was increasing in every health authority;

f) While the health care system was still functioning, without intervention it would be overwhelmed and people with COVID-19 and with other urgent health issues would suffer;

g) There had been transmission in faith-based settings under the existing rules;

h) There had been notable levels of transmission and there were some activities that are higher risk;

i) Hair salons, spas and restaurants were not seeing transmission, except where it was clear rules were not being followed;

j) Transmission in schools had been low, but there had been more exposure events, and there was greater concern about the Lower Mainland;

k) The measures in the Lower Mainland since November 7, 2020 had resulted in a decrease in the number of people infected as a result of attending social gatherings, a category including religious-based events;

l) Rolling averages of daily cases was a particularly important indicator of whether the pandemic was under control, in conjunction with other > indicators. Other important metrics were the percentage of cases that could not be linked to a known case or cluster;

> m) Despite best efforts to comply with the existing rules and despite limits of 50 people, transmission was happening at religious gatherings; and > n) Services that were explicitly under the Gatherings and Event order, where people came together at specific times and it was up to 50 people in a space, depending on how large the space was, that we need those to be suspended for this short period of time, because we have seen that despite our best efforts, we have transmission happening in those events.

[45] On November 28, 2020, the Council of the Immanuel Covenant Reformed Church sent a letter to Premier John Horgan, Health Minister Adrian Dix and Dr. Henry explaining that their religious beliefs required that they gather in-person for worship, and requesting that the restriction on worship services be immediately rescinded. The letter advised that the church would continue to take safety precautions to limit the risk of COVID-19 transmission, stating:

> We will strongly encourage those who are feeling unwell not to attend, maintain social distancing, provide hand sanitizer at the entrance of the building, require masks to be worn at all times except while seated, and require all attendees to leave immediately after the service. We will also practice the Lord's Supper and the offering so that there is no communal touching of plates, cups, or bags.

[46] On November 30, 2020, Rev. Brent Smith sent a similar letter to Premier Horgan, Minister Dix and Dr. Henry requesting that the restriction on worship services be rescinded. In his letter, Rev. Smith agreed to continue to adhere to safety guidelines, including “specific protocols around the maximum number of worshippers at a service, the use of masks, the use of hand sanitizer, social distancing, contact tracing, the distribution of food and drink, and the use of shared items.”

[47] On December 2, 2020, Dr. Henry issued a written G&E Order that repealed and replaced her November 10, 2020 G&E Order and her November 13, 2020 order with respect to COVID-19 regional measures.

[48] The reasons given for the G&E Order issued on December 2, 2020, included:

> a) Social interactions are associated with significant increases in the transmission of SARS-CoV-2. These result from the gathering of people and events, which therefore increase the risk of serious illness from COVID-19;

b) The opening of the schools and seasonal changes increased the risk of transmission of SARS-CoV-2 in the population and the incidence of serious illness from COVID-19;

c) Seasonal and other celebrations had resulted in transmission of SARS-CoV-2;

d) There had been a rapid and accelerating increase in COVID-19 cases in the province; and

e) There was an immediate and urgent need for more drastic ("focused") action to reduce the rate of transmission of COVID-19.

[49] On December 7, 2020, Dr. Henry extended her G&E Order on similar terms to January 7, 2021, stating:

a) While the new case count remained high, and had been increasing steeply, it was beginning to level off, especially in the Fraser Health and Vancouver Coastal Health regions;

b) Measures implemented a month earlier were "starting to have an effect and starting to work";

c) However, many other communities in the province, especially in the Interior and the North, showed increasing rates;

d) SARS-CoV-2 transmits especially through in-person interactions, especially indoors and especially in the colder months of the year;

e) There was not a large number of transmission events in schools;

f) The measures that had been in place for many months for religious gatherings and that were working earlier in 2020, "we are now seeing that those are not enough right now"; and

g) The risk of transmission at outside peaceful demonstrations is less than indoor meetings, even without a mask, but in December, it is more dangerous than it was earlier in the year.

[50] In relation to religious organizations objecting to the December 7, 2020, G&E Order, Dr. Henry stated:

> It is a challenge. I know. There are many faith groups. There are a few faith groups that are continuing to meet and that concerns me. It concerns me because it is a misunderstanding of why we are trying to put restrictions in place. These restrictions are about recognizing there are situations where this virus is spreading rapidly, and we have seen when we come together and congregate indoors, in particular, those are settings where the virus is transmitted, despite our best efforts, despite the measures that we have had in place for several months that were working for many months. We are now seeing that those are not enough right now.

[51] In a further G&E Order dated December 9, 2020, Dr. Henry noted that seasonal and other celebrations and social gatherings in private residences and other places had resulted in the transmission of the Virus and increases in the number of people who developed COVID-19 and became seriously ill.

[52] On December 18, 2020, Dr. Bonnie Henry sent letters to Rev. Brent Smith and Rev. John Koopman. In the letters, she told them they had the option to submit a request for a case-specific variance to the G&E Orders under s. 43 of the PHA. She also encouraged them and their churches to "accept the importance of compliance with this Order and the need to respect the difficult decisions of public health officials."

[53] On December 22, 2020, Rev. Koopman responded to Dr. Henry, informing her that he was aware that many case-specific requests had been made for her to reconsider her G&E Order under s. 43 of the PHA without success. Rev. Koopman urged Dr. Henry to allow in-person worship services, and advised, among other things, that her "offer to consider a request from our church to reconsider our Order sadly rings hollow."

[54] Following G&E Orders on December 9, 15 and 24, 2020 that extended the prohibitions on in-person gatherings, the COVID-19 case rate declined, but remained elevated. It then began to increase again between December 28 and January 4, 2021, at which time the downward trend continued to a seven-day moving average of 449 cases by January 31, 2021.

[55] The January 8, 2021 G&E Order maintained the prohibition on in-person religious services, but permitted drive-in events with more than 50 patrons present as long as those attending only do so in a vehicle, no more than 50 vehicles are present, attendees stay in their vehicles except to use washroom facilities and maintain a distance of two metres from other attendees when outside their vehicles, and that no food or drink is sold. The order also provided exceptions for weddings, baptisms and funerals (to a maximum of 10 people) and permitted private prayer/reflection in religious settings.

[56] On February 5, 2021, a new G&E Order was issued adding the following recitals by Dr. Henry:

> I recognize the societal effects, including the hardships, which the measures which I have and continue to put in place to protect the health of the population have on many aspects of life, and with this in mind continually engage in a process of reconsideration of these measures, based upon the information and evidence available to me, including infection rates, sources of transmission, the presence of clusters and outbreaks, the number of people in hospital and in intensive care, deaths, the emergence of and risks posed by virus variants of concern, vaccine availability, immunization rates, the vulnerability of particular populations and reports from the rest of Canada and other jurisdictions, with a view to balancing the interests of the public, including constitutionally-protected interests, in gatherings and events, against the risk of harm created by gatherings and events;
> I further recognize that constitutionally-protected interests include the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, including specifically freedom of religion and conscience, freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of association. These freedoms, and the other rights protected by the Charter, are not, however, absolute and are subject to reasonable limits, prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. These limits include proportionate, precautionary and evidence-based restrictions to prevent loss of life, serious illness and disruption of our health system and society. When exercising my powers to protect the health of the public from the risks posed by COVID 19, I am aware of my obligation to choose measures that limit the Charter rights and freedoms of British Columbians less intrusively, where this is consistent with public health principles.

[57] A further G&E Order of February 10, 2021 repeated the above recitals, and included the following:

> In consequence, I am not prohibiting outdoor assemblies for the purpose of communicating a position on a matter of public interest or controversy, subject to my expectation that persons organizing or attending such an assembly will take the steps and put in place the measures recommended in the guidelines posted on my website in order to limit the risk of transmission of COVID-19.

[58] On February 12, 2021, Dr. Henry was asked why safety protocols accepted in other circumstances, such as bars, restaurants and health clubs, were not sufficient for regular in-person religious services. She replied that the nature of the interaction, the social interaction within a faith group, was “fundamentally different than some of the transactional relationships we have if we’re going to a store or even an individual working out in a gym, an individual going to a restaurant with your small group of people".

[59] Dr. Henry further explained that:

> … we engaged very early with faith leaders across the province. And they recognize the important role that they play. I just want to reiterate, we know how important - essential - faith services are for people and for communities across BC. And that is why we have been working with faith community leaders since March of last year.
>
> And we stopped all of those types of interactions when we were learning about this virus, and what was happening with this virus, and how it was transmitted, and in what situations it was being transmitted last March. And then when we reopened gatherings, and particularly faith gatherings, we did talk with the community about what were the things that made it safer.
>
>
> We also know that there is a demographic that goes to many faith services that is older and more at risk in some cases. So we needed to take that into account. And we were able to allow and to have active in-person services through most of the summer and into the fall.
>
> As with many other things, as we got into the respiratory [season], we saw the transmissibility of the virus increasing. And what we were seeing was that there was transmission in a number of faith settings despite having those measures in place. So that spoke to us about there was something about those interactions that meant that the measures that we thought were working were no longer good enough to prevent transmission in its highly transmissible state during the winter respiratory season.
> So it was because of that we put in additional measures to stop the in-person services starting at the end of November. It really was because we were seeing, despite people taking their best precautions, we were still seeing transmission. We were seeing people ending up in hospital, and sadly, we had some deaths in particularly older people who were exposed in their faith settings.

[60] On February 12, 2021, Dr. Henry also stated that:

a) At that point, there had been 46 confirmed cases of variants of concern in BC. 29 of the B117 variant originally discovered in the United Kingdom and 17 of the B1351 variant originally discovered in South Africa;

b) It was not yet clear whether these variants have increased transmissibility or cause more severe illness;

c) All but one of the B117 cases were travel related, but a majority of the B1351 cases were locally transmitted;

d) Both in the COVID pandemic and in other outbreaks, the nature of interactions at faith group gatherings is fundamentally different than in transactional relationships at the store or gym or at a restaurant;

e) The demographic of churchgoers skews older than the population in general and is at more risk;

f) In the "respiratory season", as the transmissibility of the virus increased, there was transmission in a number of faith settings despite having measures in place, so that measures previously thought to be good enough no longer were; and

g) Some deaths from COVID-19 were from people exposed in faith settings.

(d) Reconsideration under Section 43 of the PHA

[61] Section 43(1) of the PHA provides, in part, that:

> 43(1) A person affected by an order, or the variance of an order, may request the health officer who issued the order or made the variance to reconsider the order or variance if the person
> (a) has additional relevant information that was not reasonably available to the health officer when the order was issued or varied,
>
> (b) has a proposal that was not presented to the health officer when the order was issued or varied but, if implemented, would
> (i) meet the objective of the order, and
>
> (ii) be suitable as the basis of a written agreement under section 38, or
> (c) requires more time to comply with the order.

[62] Although Dr. Henry has the power under s. 54(1)(h) of the PHA to "not reconsider an order under section 43", she has not exercised that power. Instead, she has encouraged various groups to seek variances under s. 43. Each of her G&E Orders have specifically included reference to the availability of reconsideration.

[63] On January 29, 2021, after filing the petition in this case, counsel for the religious petitioners provided a letter to counsel to for the respondents in the form of a request for reconsideration under s. 43(1) of the PHA. They apparently submitted over 1000 pages of evidence with their application, including reports from two doctors which they now also seek to have admitted on this petition.

[64] On Thursday, February 25, 2021, Dr. Henry provided a response to the religious petitioners' s. 43 application. She advised counsel for the religious petitioners that she was prepared to give a conditional variance to the G&E Order to the religious petitioners allowing outdoor weekly worship services, subject to the adherence to extensive and specific conditions.

[65] Following media reports that certain Jewish Orthodox Synagogues were being permitted to hold regular service in person, counsel for the religious petitioners raised this permission with counsel for the respondents.

[66] The religious petitioners contend that immediately after their counsel advised the respondents that they intended to rely on the exemption granted to the synagogues in argument, the respondents revised the exemption granted to the synagogues, requiring them to again to meet outdoors rather than indoors.

IV. Relief Sought

[67] The religious petitioners assert that their s. 2(a), (b), (c), and (d), s. 7 and s. 15 Charter rights are infringed by Dr. Henry's G&E Orders. They contend that those orders disregard the need for minimal impairment of those Charter rights, and are overbroad, arbitrary and disproportionate.

[68] Dr. Henry's G&E Orders are the principal source of concern to the petitioners. Pursuant to s. 2(1) and (2) of the Judicial Review Procedure Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 241 [JRPA], they seek relief with respect to the orders of November 19, 2020, December 2, 9, 15 and 24, 2020 and such further orders as may be pronounced. In particular, in their written petition they seek the following relief:

> 1. A Declaration pursuant to sections 24(1) and 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, that:
>> a. Ministerial Order No. M416 entitled "Food and Liquor Premises, Gatherings and Events (COVID-19) Order No. 2" issued by the Minister of Public Safety and Solicitor General of BC, dated November 13, 2020, under the authority of sections 10 of the Emergency Program Act, RSBC 1996, c. 111;

b. an order made under section 3 of the Covid 19 Related Measures Act, SBC 2020, c. 8, entitled "Food and Liquor Premises, Gatherings and Events", referred to as item 23.5 in Schedule 2 of that Act;

c. orders made by the Public Health Officer entitled "Gatherings and Events" and made pursuant to Sections 30, 31, 32 and 39(3) Public Health Act, SBC 2008, c. 28, including orders of November 19, 20202, December 2nd, 9th, 15th and 24th, 2020 and such further orders as may be pronounced which prohibit or unduly restrict gatherings for public protests and for worship and/or other religious gatherings including services, festivals, ceremonies, receptions, weddings, funerals, baptisms, celebrations of life and related activities associated with houses of worship and faith communities;

(collectively referred to herein as the "Orders") are of no force and effect as they unjustifiably infringe the rights and freedoms of the Petitioners guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part 1 of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c. 11 (the "Charter"), specifically:

a) Charter section 2(a) (freedom of conscience and religion);

b) Charter section 2(b) (freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression);

c) Charter section 2(c) (freedom of peaceful assembly);

d) Charter section 2(d) (freedom of association);

e) Charter section 7 (life, liberty and security of the person); and

f) Charter section 15(1) (equality rights).

2. In addition or in the alternative, an order under sections 2(2) and 7 of the JRPA in the nature of or certiorari quashing and setting aside the Orders as unreasonable;

3. A Declaration that the Orders be set aside as their scope and effect exceed statutory authority of the respondents to impose and are, therefore ultra vires;

4. Interim and final injunction and/or prohibition pursuant to section 2(2) of the JRPA and Rule 10-4 enjoining the respondents from further enforcement action which prohibit or interfere with the subject activities herein;

5. An order that Violation Tickets numbers AJ19780619, AJ06525763, AJ13323225, AJ13323259, AJ16458508, AH96863545, AJ17179822 and AJ16958269 issued as described herein be dismissed and an order enjoining issuance of further such tickets relating to matters herein.

[69] Of the list of orders challenged in para. 1, Part 1 of their written petition, the petitioners only pursued the G&E Orders issued by Dr. Henry under the PHA during the petition hearing.

V. Impact of the Reconsideration Decision on this Petition

[70] The petitioners have invoked s. 2 of the JRPA as the basis for the relief they seek. That section provides:

> 2(1) An application for judicial review must be brought by way of a petition proceeding.
> (2) On an application for judicial review, the court may grant any relief that the applicant would be entitled to in any one or more of the proceedings for:
>
> (a) relief in the nature of mandamus, prohibition or certiorari;
>
> (b) a declaration or injunction, or both, in relation to the exercise, refusal to exercise, or proposed or purported exercise, of a statutory power.

[71] The JRPA includes the following defined the terms:

> "record of the proceeding" includes the following:
>
> (a) a document by which the proceeding is commenced;
>
>
> (f) the decision of the tribunal and any reasons given by it;
>
> "statutory power" means a power or right conferred by an enactment:
>
> (a) to make a regulation, rule, bylaw or order,
>
> (b) to exercise a statutory power of decision,
> (c) to require a person to do or to refrain from doing an act or thing that, but for that requirement, the person would not be required by law to do or to refrain from doing,

> (d) to do an act or thing that would, but for that power or right, be a breach of a legal right of any person, or
> (e) to make an investigation or inquiry into a person's legal right, power, privilege, immunity, duty or liability…
> "tribunal" means one or more persons, whether or not incorporated and however described, on whom a statutory power of decision is conferred.

[72] Dr. Henry issued the religious petitioners a partial variance to the G&E Orders a few days before the hearing of this petition. In light of this, the respondents raised a preliminary objection that the religious petitioners must amend their petition to challenge Dr. Henry's reconsideration decision, rather than continue to challenge the G&E Orders.

[73] On an application for relief under s. 2 of the JRPA, the basic principle of judicial review is that an applicant must first exhaust all adequate statutory remedies and that review must be of a final decision. Where a party has taken advantage of a reconsideration process, only the reconsideration decision may be judicially reviewed: Yellow Cab Company Ltd. v. Passenger Transportation Board, 2014 BCCA 329 [Yellow Cab] at para. 40; see also Canadian Pacific Ltd. v. Matsqui Indian Band, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 3; and Harelkin v. University of Regina, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 561.

[74] The religious petitioners contend that in contrast to the present matter, none of these cases involved a constitutional challenge to a rule of general application to the entire population, which can be altered at any time by Dr. Henry.

[75] The religious petitioners contend that the respondents' reliance on Yellow Cab is untenable and unconstitutional, and a time-consuming distraction. They contend that s. 43 of the PHA was not intended to prevent constitutional challenges to overbroad public health orders that limit the Charter rights of the population at large, nor could it ever validly have such an effect.

[76] In response to this argument, the respondents say the rule in Yellow Cab—that judicial review must be of the reconsideration decision—is not a discretionary one. They say it applies with equal force when the basis for review is an alleged failure of an administrative decision maker to proportionately balance their statutory mandate with Charter rights, including freedom of religion.

[77] The religious petitioners rely on the comment of Mr. Justice Groberman at para. 44 in Yellow Cab that a tribunal cannot be permitted "through procedural machinations, to oust the inherent, constitutionally-protected supervisory jurisdiction of the superior courts". That comment was made in the context of a discussion of a denial of leave for reconsideration:

> [43] In Auyeung, the applicant contended that the Board had failed to properly consider and apply its own jurisprudence. In denying leave for reconsideration, the Board rejected that assertion. This Court recognized that the Board, in denying leave, had effectively determined that the application was not meritorious. In the result, it held that any judicial review application had to challenge the denial of leave rather than the initial decision.
> [44] Where a denial of leave does not constitute a determination that the request for reconsideration lacks merit, it is my view that the initial administrative decision, and not the denial of leave, will be the appropriate target for judicial review. To hold otherwise would be to allow a tribunal, through procedural machinations, to oust the inherent, constitutionally-protected supervisory jurisdiction of the superior courts. In Jozipovic v. British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Board), 2012 BCCA 174, this Court emphasized that a tribunal cannot, by blocking access to administrative review of a decision, bar the courts from passing on the merits of judicial review.

[78] Read in the context in which it was made, the statement does not support the religious petitioners' assertion that it entitles them to simply ignore the alternate remedy afforded by s. 43 of the PHA.

[79] Moreover, as the religious petitioners have chosen not to amend their petition to seek judicial review of Dr. Henry's reconsideration decision, the main evidence they seek to rely on, namely the affidavits of Dr. Warren and Dr. Kettner, is not admissible on this petition because that evidence was not before Dr. Henry when she made the G&E Orders. I turn to this issue now.

VI. Record of Proceedings

[80] In B.C., with limited exceptions, the evidence on an application for judicial review is confined to the record before the decision maker.

[81] The "record of proceeding" is defined in s. 1 of the JRPA and includes a "document produced in evidence before the tribunal" and "the decision of the tribunal and any reasons given by it".

[82] In Dane Developments Ltd. v. British Columbia (Forests, Lands and Natural Resources Operations), 2015 BCSC 1663*,* Mr. Justice Bracken conveniently summarized three categories of exceptions to the rule that all evidence on judicial review must have been in the record before the decision maker:

> [46] The court adopts a supervisory role on judicial review. Among other things, this means that the reviewing court must conduct the proceedings based on the record that was before the administrative decision maker: Albu v. University of British Columbia, 2015 BCCA 41, at paras. 35-36. Thus, a general rule precludes the receipt of new evidence on a judicial review, subject to certain exceptions respecting materials which tend to facilitate or enhance the court's supervisory task. Those exceptions contemplate evidence which:
> - provides "general background" information which will assist the reviewing court in understanding the issues on the judicial review;
> - brings to the court's attention procedural defects that cannot be found in the evidentiary record of the administrative decision maker; or,
> - identifies or reconstructs the record that was before the administrative decision maker. This includes materials which demonstrate the "complete absence of evidence" before the administrative decision maker with respect to a particular finding.

[83] While these categories provide useful guidance, the court must ultimately take a principled approach in determining whether evidence not before the decision maker is admissible on judicial review: Air Canada v. British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Appeal Tribunal), 2018 BCCA 387 [Air Canada], at para. 38.

[84] Just what constitutes the "record of proceeding" in this case is a matter of dispute between the petitioners and the respondents. The petitioners contend that the impugned G&E Orders are in the nature of subordinate legislation, issued at the discretion of a statutory decision maker, without a hearing, so there is no identifiable record.

[85] It is my view that in the case of a non-adjudicative tribunal such as this, the record of proceedings must of necessity be reconstructed. It is not necessarily "static", but still consists either of general, or uncontroversial background information that will assist me in understanding the issues or information that was before Dr. Henry.

[86] In Twenty Ten Timber Products Ltd. v. British Columbia (Finance), 2018 BCSC 751, the Minister of Finance sought to adduce affidavit evidence concerning the filing of a certificate under the Forest Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 157, Madam Justice Adair reasoned:

> 26 However, the process leading to the filing of the Certificate is not at all similar or comparable to the administrative processes involved in either Sobeys or Stein, both of which involved hearings at which evidence was submitted and a record was created. I agree with the submissions of the Minister that this was not an adjudicative hearing process in any sense, and it was not required to be under the Forest Act. The Affidavit No. 1 of Kristina Jacklin in particular shows what the Ministry knew about Twenty Ten's role in TSL A93113 before the November 16, 2017 letter was sent. In addition, the Minister's affidavits provide additional information to assist the court in understanding the issues on the judicial review.
> 27 In short, the affidavits filed by the Minister in response to the application for judicial review bear on the arguments that the Minister is entitled to make on this judicial review, and are relevant to the grounds raised on judicial review.

[87] In Crowder v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2019 BCSC 1824, amendments to the Supreme Court Civil Rules by the Attorney General, on the advice of a committee constituted by him, were challenged as unconstitutional. There, I accepted that the evidence that may be adduced in support of an application for judicial review of an administrative hearing process is limited to the record that was before the decision maker and that constitutional questions are ideally resolved on the basis of as extensive a factual record as is reasonable.

[88] I found that:

> 42 … as in Twenty Ten Timber and 462284 B.C. Ltd., the process that led to the creation of the impugned Rule was not an adjudicative hearing process and I will therefore adopt the approach taken by Adair J. and rely on the non-hearsay evidence proffered by the petitioners.

[89] The non-hearsay evidence that I admitted in Crowder was limited to what was contained in news releases from the Attorney General's office explaining the rule change. I declined to admit emails from ICBC representatives, newspaper reports of statements by the Attorney General and “sampling” evidence of cases in which expert evidence was relied on.

[90] The respondents contend that the record for this petition is all of the information available to Dr. Henry when she made the impugned G&E Orders. For this, they tendered the evidence of Dr. Brian Emerson, the Acting Deputy Provincial Health Officer.

[91] The respondents assert that Dr. Emerson’s first affidavit provides the general background information and evidence reconstructing what was before Dr. Henry at the time she made the impugned G&E Orders under the PHA. They contend that with respect to their impact on political and religious assembly at issue in this proceeding, the other impugned orders follow on from Dr. Henry’s decisions.

[92] The respondents also assert that from the initial verbal November 7, 2020 G&E Order to date, the restrictions on in-person religious services have been essentially the same through a series of sequential verbal and written orders as follows:

a. Written orders of November 10 and 11, 2020 (written form of November 7 verbal order);
b. Verbal order of November 19, 2020 (broadened the restrictions to apply province-wide, extended them to December 8, 2020, and provided exemptions for weddings, baptisms and funerals to a maximum of 10 people, and private prayer or reflection in religious settings);
c. December 2, 2020 written order (repealed and replaced November 10 written order, no change vis a vis religious services);
d. December 4, 2020 written order (repealed and replaced December 4 written order, no change vis a vis religious services);

e. December 9, 2020 written order (extended restriction on gatherings and events to January 8, 2021);

f. December 15, 2020 (religious service can be provided to a person in their home);

g. December 24, 2020 written order (repealed and replaced December 15 order – no change vis a vis religious gatherings);

h. January 8, 2021 written order (extended restrictions to February 5, 2021, permits drive-in events with up to 50 vehicles); and

i. February 10, 2021 written order (indefinite extension of restrictions).

[93] The respondents further assert that the February 10, 2021 G&E Order is the one currently in effect, and the only order properly before me on this judicial review.

[94] The respondents submit that the restriction of the evidence properly admissible on judicial review is not discretionary. The principle, and the basis for any exceptions, was set out authoritatively by the Court of Appeal in Air Canada at paras. 32-44. In those passages, Mr. Justice Groberman said the following:

> [34] The function of a court on judicial review is supervisory. The court must ensure that a tribunal has operated within legal norms. Courts are, in a very strict sense, reviewing what went on before the tribunal. They are not undertaking a fresh examination of the substantive issues. For that reason, judicial review normally concerns itself only with evidence that was before the tribunal [cites omitted].
>
> [35] It is important, however, to recognize that we cannot use the narrow traditional concept of a "record" as the standard; rather, a court must be allowed to look at the material that was considered by the tribunal, whether or not that material would, historically, have formed part of the tribunal's "record" [cites omitted].
> [39] In determining whether an affidavit is admissible on judicial review, the key question is whether the admission of the evidence is consistent with the limited supervisory jurisdiction of the court…

[95] In addition to the record as put forth by the respondents, the religious petitioners seek to rely on various additional evidence, which I address below.

[96] The petitioners contend that the concept of a formal "record of the proceeding" is inapplicable to this case. They say the primary focus of this proceeding is on a constitutional challenge to what amount to laws—rules of general application—binding on everyone in B.C. Thus, they argue, this review requires a sufficient factual foundation and is required by the Supreme Court of Canada not be addressed in a factual vacuum.

[97] I am unable to accept the petitioners' submission that when a decision is challenged on constitutional grounds, the principle that the evidence on judicial review is limited to the record before the decision maker does not apply. Evidence of constitutional issues that were not contested or that should have been put before the decision maker are not admissible if they were not put forward; see, for example, Actton Transport Ltd. v. British Columbia (Employment Standards), 2010 BCCA 272, where the underlying issue concerned division of powers and the Court of Appeal said that the record before the trial judge should have been confined to the record before the decision maker.

[98] In their oral submissions, the religious petitioners contend that it would be unfair for a person affected by an order not to be able to put in their own evidence if it has not been considered by the health officer.

[99] The respondents point out that s. 43(l)(a) of the PHA provides precisely such opportunity and requires the decision maker to give reasons if the information is not accepted.

[100] If I were to allow the evidence that the religious petitioners wish to rely on in this case, that would permit them to bypass the statutory decision maker and rely upon purportedly expert evidence, without affording deference to Dr. Henry's findings on the face of the record before her.

[101] The evidence of what was before Dr. Henry when she made the G&E Orders should not be conflated with the record that the religious petitioners wish to place before me in this petition hearing. That evidence includes information which can be relied on for determining standing or whether a petitioner has exhausted administrative remedies, but not for whether a decision (here the G&E Orders) is reasonable or compliant with the Charter.

[102] Had the religious petitioners amended their petition to seek judicial review of Dr. Henry's decision to grant them a variance to her G&E Orders, then the "record of proceeding" would include all of the information before Dr. Henry when she made her decision on the variance (but not before her when she issued the G&E Orders). But then the review would be of only her variance decision, not the G&E Orders.

[103] I am prepared to admit into evidence the communications between the religious petitioners and Dr. Henry or other representatives of the provincial government with respect to the impugned G&E Orders up to and including the date of the most recent order prior to the hearing of the petition herein, of February 10, 2021.

[104] As Dr. Emerson's second affidavit was relied upon only with respect to the respondents' injunction application, I will ignore it for the purposes of these reasons for judgment.

[105] The second affidavit of Valerie Christopherson made February 25, 2021, attaches Dr. Henry's variance decision on the religious petitioners' s. 43 application, to show the fact of the decision having been made. It is admissible for that purpose, but is irrelevant to the reasonableness of Dr. Henry's earlier G&E Orders.

[106] The first and third affidavits of Vanessa Lever, made February 2, 2021 and February 26, 2021 attach correspondence between counsel for the petitioners, Mr. Jaffe, and counsel for the respondents, Mr. Morley, regarding the religious petitioners' s. 43 application. That correspondence is also relevant to the respondents' preliminary objection that the petitioners should have sought judicial review of Dr. Henry's s. 43 decision, but is irrelevant to the reasonableness of Dr. Henry's earlier G&E Orders.

[107] At the request of the petitioners, the respondents submitted an affidavit attaching Dr. Henry's s. 43 PHA variance decision that was granted to Rabbi Meir Kaplan. Rabbi Kaplan submitted that request for reconsideration on behalf of Orthodox Jewish congregations, noting that his understanding of Jewish law prohibited the use of electronic devices on the Sabbath. On February 23, 2021, Orthodox congregations in B.C. were granted a limited exemption to gather for the holiday of Purim in-doors, with specific safety conditions, including on the number of attendees. They were subsequently granted an exemption to hold weekly Sabbath services outdoors, with specific safety conditions.

[108] On March 1, 2021, Dr. Henry's advised Rabbi Kaplan that:

> Further to the variance granted I granted to the Orthodox Jewish congregations on February 23 to hold Purim and Sabbath services in-doors, this is to clarify that consistent with your original request, the variance only allowed indoor services for Sabbath of February 27, given that it followed immediately after the Purim gatherings on Thursday and Friday.
> We are noting that virus transmission remains elevated and there are indications of increased viral transmission in some areas of the province. In addition we are seeing increased reports of virus variants of concern (VOCs). Modelling suggests that if these VOCs were to become established or predominant in our province, case counts will rise quickly and significantly. The enclosed presentation from the Public Health Agency of Canada notes that "With spread of VOC, current public health measures will be insufficient, and epidemic resurgence is forecast" (see slide 12) and "In all provinces current controls may not be sufficient to fully control the variants of concern. The early lifting of public health measures could lead to a resurgence of the epidemic, including the community transmission of variants of concern" (slide 16).
>
> Furthermore, with the spring break season nearly upon us we anticipate that there will be additional people travelling, including people coming from other provinces where transmission is higher than in BC, in spite of our recommendation to limit travel to essential reasons. Also, with schools out of session we are concerned that additional socialization will also drive viral transmission to higher levels, potentially increasing hospitalizations, intensive care admissions and deaths.
>
> With respect to the risk of indoor services, the likelihood of transmission of SARS-CoV-2 is greater when people are interacting in communal settings, when people are close to each other, in crowded settings, in indoor settings due to less ventilation than outdoor settings; and when people speak, and especially when they sing, chant or speak at higher than conversational volume. These are all conditions that are exist [sic] when services are held indoors, which make them of particular concern.
> The likelihood of transmission also increases exponentially in a population when a number of people are simultaneously infected in a group setting, and subsequently infect their contacts, who infect their contacts and so on. This can, and has, quickly result in a scenario where local public health resources can be overwhelmed such that they are no longer able to trace all the contacts of such an exposure and require them to self-isolate. If this occurs, community spread can quickly become rampant, leading to increased case > counts and, in time, has the potential to overwhelm our healthcare system as hospitalizations increase. As well, transmission in religious settings have led to introductions of the virus into vulnerable community settings such as long term care homes leading to serious outbreaks with resultant deaths.

> For these reasons I am revising the variance to the order to be clear that weekly Sabbath services at all Jewish Orthodox Synagogues must be held outdoors, according to the following conditions…

[109] In my view, the evidence of the variance granted to Jewish Orthodox synagogues does form part of the record before Dr. Henry. It is part of the monologue she engaged in to explain the G&E Orders. This evidence is relevant to my analysis under s. 1 of the Charter, in particular whether the orders minimally impair the rights in question.

[110] Notwithstanding these conclusions, I will address other additional evidence that the religious petitioners seek to rely upon.

[111] That evidence is from two doctors: Dr. Thomas A. Warren, a specialist in the diagnosis and treatment of infectious diseases, and Dr. Joel Kettner, an expert in public health, preventative medicine and general surgery, and former Chief Public Health Officer for the Province of Manitoba.

[112] Dr. Warren was asked to opine on the risk of transmission of the Virus at in-person worship services in B.C. relative to the transmission risk of other activities permitted under existing provincial health orders in B.C. Those other activities included in-person dining at restaurants and activities such as gyms, schools, public transit, pubs and the retail sector.

[113] Dr. Warren provided a number of estimates of risk, for example the risk of death in older individuals, the number of transmissions from social gatherings, office workplaces, recreational facilities, and religious meeting in the Canadian epidemiologic summary.

[114] Dr. Kettner was asked by the religious petitioners to respond to both of Dr. Emerson's affidavits sworn in these proceedings. He was also asked to provide his opinion as to the transmission risk of the religious petitioners' worship services compared to other activities permitted under Dr. Henry's G&E Orders, including in-person dining at restaurants and pubs, and attendances in the retail sector, at gyms, and on public transportation.

[115] Dr. Kettner offered his opinions on the requirements of public health statutes in Canada, and how the standards and ethics of public health practice should be exercised.

[117] In comparing the risk of worship services compared to other permitted activities, Dr. Kettner extrapolated the frequency of church attendances in B.C. from a 2003 Statistics Canada report. In doing so, he incorrectly understood that one of the rules of the Free Reformed Church of Chilliwack was to exclude people over the age of 65 from attendance. He was also not apparently provided with, or alternatively chose not to comment on the practices of the other two religious petitioner churches.

[118] Dr. Henry did not have the reports of these two doctors available to her when she made the impugned G&E Orders. As I have indicated above, if I allowed the religious petitioners to rely upon this purportedly expert evidence, that would permit them to bypass the statutory decision maker without affording deference to Dr. Henry's findings on the face of the record before her.

VII. Standard of Review

[119] In Trest v. British Columbia (Minister of Health), 2020 BCSC 1524, Mr. Justice Basran dealt with an application by parents of school-aged children who wanted mandatory mask or face-covering policy in classrooms during the pandemic. He wrote:

> [91] On the balance of convenience, in my view, the public interest is best served by continuing to rely on the PHO, her team of experts, and the Minister of Health to guide British Columbia's response to the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic. The evidence before me shows that their guidance, advice, and policies such as the Restart Plan are firmly rooted in current scientific knowledge and best practices. The fact that some of this advice is not universally accepted is insufficient to conclude that the government has clearly chosen the wrong approach in terms of the public interest. The petitioners have not adduced sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption that the Restart Plan serves the public interest. Therefore, they have not discharged their burden to show that the balance of convenience favours the granting of the injunctions they seek.

> Or, as summarized by Brossard J. in Nencioni v. Mailloux, [1988] R.L. 532 (Sup. Ct.), at p. 548:

[122] The petitioners contend that as their proceeding is primarily centered on what is in substance a Charter challenge to Dr. Henry's G&E Orders, as opposed to the judicial review of an administrative decision, no deference is owed to Dr. Henry in determining the constitutionality of her orders. They say that a standard of correctness should be applied.

[123] I am unable to accept this over-simplification. I accept that insofar as the Charter is concerned, Dr. Henry's orders must reflect and incorporate Charter values, but so long as they do, the impugned orders are in areas of science and medicine.

[124] In the areas of science and medicine, Dr. Henry is entitled to deference and the appropriate standard of review of such matters is that of reasonableness.

[125] Even if the opinions of Dr. Warren and Dr. Kettner were admissible, they represent, at best, an alternate view of the risks that have been considered and weighed by Dr. Henry. They do not persuade me that her conclusions and G&E Orders are unreasonable.

[126] I will discuss the standard of review necessary to consider s. 1 of the Charter, below, when I address dispute between the parties as to whether the test set out in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103 [Oakes] or that in Doré v. Bureau du Quebec, 2012 SCC 12 [Doré] should be applied.

VIII. Discussion

[127] The substance of the various G&E Orders in effect from November 7 to date have remained essentially the same in terms of restrictions on in-person gatherings and events, including religious services.

[128] The respondents contend that, in the result, the question for the Court on this judicial review is whether Dr. Henry reasonably balanced the restriction on religious freedom with protection of public health at the time she first imposed the regional restrictions and on an ongoing basis thereafter when extending them, thereby continuing the ban.

[129] Section 2 of the Charter states:

> 2. Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
>
> (a) freedom of conscience and religion;
>
> (b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;
> (c) freedom of peaceful assembly; and
> (d) freedom of association.

[130] Section 7 of the Charter states:

> 7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[131] Section 15 of the Charter states:

> 15.(1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

[132] In the petition response, the respondents conceded that the impugned G&E Orders engage the religious petitioners' rights under ss. 2(a), 2(b), 2(c) and 2(d) of the Charter, but in their oral submissions resiled from the admission with respect to s. 2(d).

[133] The respondents also accept that restrictions on gatherings engage freedom of association under s. 2(d) of the Charter, which, at minimum, would protect the ability of individuals to meet to pursue collective goals.

[134] With respect to s. 7 of the Charter, the respondents do not dispute that there are mental health benefits of in-person religious and other gatherings. They argue, however, that the religious petitioners have not established that their "life", "liberty" or "security of person" interests have been infringed or that this was done contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. They say the right to a written hearing for individual exemptions has been specifically preserved, and say that the kind of serious state-caused psychological harm required to establish a breach of "security of the person" has not been established.

[135] With respect to s. 15 of the Charter, the respondents contend that the religious petitioners have not shown that any of the impugned G&E Orders make a distinction based on an enumerated or analogous ground or that such a distinction creates a disadvantage. They say that gatherings are defined neutrally, and exempted activities such as support groups or counselling are exempted whether delivered in a secular or religious way. Thus, they contend that there is no evidence that the religious petitioners' right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination has been infringed.

[136] The respondents contend that the real issue is whether the impugned G&E Orders are "reasonable limits" on these freedoms under s. 1 of the Charter.

(a) Mr. Beaudoin

[137] Mr. Beaudoin organized public protests against what he contends to be an abuse of government power in the present COVID-19 pandemic by imposing unnecessary and "draconian" restrictions in the name of "safety," contradicting what is permissible in a free and democratic society.

[138] Those protests took place on December 1, 5, and 12, 2020. On December 15, 2020, an RCMP officer issued Mr. Beaudoin violation ticket no. AJ17179822 for contravening the G&E Order that was in place at the time.

[139] Mr. Beaudoin contends that the protests he participated in were peaceful political events that occurred outdoors and prioritized the safety of attendees, including their physical distancing, and involved cooperation with police.

[140] He initially addressed any safety concerns, informing everyone that they should maintain social distance, but gave evidence that trying to comply with the safety plan requirements of Dr. Henry's orders was impossible, as he was unable to control the number of people who attend an outdoor public protest or gather contact information from each of them.

[141] The RCMP required Mr. Beaudoin to record personal information of the protestors attending the protests. He says that the RCMP threatened him with penalties for noncompliance.

[142] Mr. Beaudoin explained it was impossible to collect such information from a large group coming and going in an open area. He also expressed reluctance to divulge particulars about the protestors to the government.

[143] As he had nothing to offer by way of additional relevant information that was not reasonably available to the health officer when the G&E Order was issued or varied, nor any proposal that was not presented to the health officer when the order was issued, Mr. Beaudoin did not apply for a s. 43 PHA exemption to the impugned orders, and thus had no alternate remedy available to him.

[144] In any case, those parts of the G&E Orders that infringed the Charter rights asserted by Mr. Beaudoin no longer form a part of the orders.

[145] In her G&E Order of February 10, 2021, Dr. Henry included the following in the preamble to the order:

> When exercising my powers to protect the health of the public from the risks posed by COVID-19, I am aware of my obligation to choose measures that limit the Charter rights and freedoms of British Columbians less intrusively, where this is consistent with public health principles. In consequence, I am not prohibiting outdoor assemblies for the purpose of communicating a position on a matter of public interest or controversy, subject to my expectation that persons organizing or attending such an assembly will take the steps and put in place the measures recommended in the guidelines posted on my website in order to limit the risk of transmission of COVID-19.

[146] This leaves only Mr. Beaudoin's application for a declaration as to the infringement of his Charter rights between November 7, 2020 and February 10, 2021.

[147] In oral submissions, counsel for the respondents conceded that Dr. Henry's orders made between November 19, 2020 and February 10, 2021, prohibiting outdoor gatherings for public protests were of no force and effect during that time. I therefore make the declaration sought by Mr. Beaudoin that the orders extant between those dates did infringe his s. 2(c) and (d) Charter rights and are of no force and effect.

(b) The Religious Petitioners

[148] A law or other government action engages freedom of religion if it interferes with a practice connected with religion in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial. It is conceded that the restrictions on in-person religious gatherings meet this threshold. The respondents accept that in-person gatherings are a practice connected with religion and that the November 19, 2020 G&E Order in particular interferes in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial with religious practice.

[149] It is apparent that the religious petitioners accept that public health measures against the spread of the Virus are necessary for secular reasons. Indeed, two of the three churches discontinued in-person services before they were under a legal obligation to do so.

[150] However, the religious petitioners allege that Dr. Henry's decisions were motivated by "administrative ease and convenience" and say there is "no evidence" that she considered measures that would have limited religious communities' Charter rights in a less drastic and severe fashion. The religious petitioners say that there is "simply nothing to illustrate" a causal link between restrictions on religious services and a corresponding reduction in COVID-19 transmission. They claim there is "no evidence" that COVID-19 transmission could be expected from worship services adhering to the safety steps prescribed in the October 30, 2020 G&E Order relative to other forms of in-person gathering permitted from November 2020 forward, such as in schools or retail establishments.

[151] The respondents argue that in the fall of 2020, it became clear that the measures so far taken until then were insufficient to avoid an exponential increase in the prevalence of the Virus. They contend that a number of the clusters were linked to religious events, notwithstanding the measures that were in place at that time.

[152] The respondents argue that the epidemiological situation in B.C. changed in Fall 2020 when the number of new cases, hospitalizations and the reproduction rate all climbed. They say there was evidence of cases and clusters associated with social gatherings in homes, bars and restaurants and religious gatherings.

[153] The respondents say that this surge in cases and hospitalizations in the fall of 2020 resulted in the PHO making an oral order imposing region-specific restrictions for the Vancouver Coastal and Fraser Health regions on November 7, 2020.

[154] The religious petitioners have given evidence that gathering in-person for worship provides benefits in addition to the fulfillment of the religious beliefs described above. These benefits include:

i) accommodating members who do not have the means to use technology;

ii) identifying specific needs of vulnerable persons in the church community;

iii) providing physical, mental and emotional care; and

iv) providing comfort and encouragement and reducing loneliness, depression, anxiety, and fear.

[155] The respondents accept that the religious petitioners' practice of in-person worship is fundamental to their religious beliefs.

[156] The religious petitioners have continued to gather for in-person religious services, despite the G&E Orders, and have attempted to exercise various precautions to reduce the risk of transmission of the Virus.

[157] For example, the evidence with respect to services at the Immanuel Covenant Reformed Church is that it has:

a) allowed one of the six 'districts' (groupings of persons in our Church) to meet per service in order to keep the numbers attending below 50 persons;

b) put up official COVID-19 safety signage all around the Church, established hand sanitizing stations and contact tracing lists of attendees, informed their congregation about social distancing and worked to diligently encourage people to stay two meters apart and urged anyone with any symptoms of Illness to stay home until they recovered;

c) cancelled their after-service times of fellowship and coffee, urging people to remain socially distanced and go home soon after the service ended.

d) added an afternoon service on June 7, 2020;

e) marked off rows of chairs designating some for morning use, some for afternoon use, and some "Do Not Use," in order to make sure there were two meters between people at ail times;

f) added an eight-foot high thick transparent vinyl curtain bisecting our sanctuary allowing us to have two groups of 50 persons in those two areas. The divided sanctuary is serviced by separate entrance and exit doors minimizing the chances of contact between the 50 people on one side of the sanctuary and the 50 people on the other side of the sanctuary;

g) established another group of 50 persons who met in our Fellowship Room and a location at a member's nearby shop which allowed another 50 people to meet;

h) had volunteers present detailed plans for this stage of renewing worship services, with proposals for grouping by families and floor plans of how people would sit;

i) Established groups of 50 persons who would become a 'bubble' and would meet together in these spaces, rotating weekly from space to space to allow everyone to have as uniform an experience as possible.

j) closed the nursery;

k) made masks mandatory when entering, moving about in, and exiting the building;

l) urged everyone to leave the service immediately after it ends and to head straight to their vehicles; and

m) arranged seating in order to preserve the 'bubbles' from the worship groupings we had previously been using.

[158] The evidence on behalf of the Free Reformed Church of Chilliwack, B.C. is that it has:

a) hired a professional cleaner to ensure that a complete and thorough cleaning happened as needed;

b) immediately increased the ventilation of their facility by leaving doors open during our services, with the result that no one touches the doors, expect for the one person who is designated to open them at the beginning of each Sunday;

c) Before March 2020, would pass a collection plate through the pews to collect free will offerings but have not done so since;

d) cancelled “coffee time” after morning services encouraged their members to immediately go to their vehicles and home after the services, and many socialize via phone, text or zoom in lieu of this time;

e) Cancelled most Church classes resuming them when they considered it safe to do so;

f) Consistently provided hand sanitizer and masks - and encouraged their use by those attending;

g) regularly reminded the congregation that If they are feeling unwell with even one symptom of COVID-19, they are requested to not come to church for any reason and to stay home until they have recovered;

h) developed procedures whereby the congregation would be notified within hours if someone tested positive for COVID from within our congregation; and > i) often reminded its congregation through letter and verbal reminders of the various protocols that we have in place for their protection.

[159] The Riverside Calvary Church stopped holding in-person gatherings around March 15, 2020 and provided online services for its members and the general public.

[160] This church resumed services on May 31, 2020 with 50 people, holding three services on Sunday mornings at 50 people each. The church members removed chairs from the sanctuary in order to maintain physical distancing, set up hand sanitizer stations throughout the church buildings. Their sanctuary was cleaned and wiped down between each service. Masks were also provided, and they added a reservation link on their website in order for people to reserve a seat. When reservations reached 50, no more were accepted. The evidence before me is that this church's members have committed themselves to meeting and exceeding the prior health guidelines including:

> a) holding three services on Sunday mornings capped at 50 people;
> b) maintaining a reservation link on our website in order for people to reserve a seat and provide contact information;
> c) ensuring seating was spaced out to maintain and exceed physical distancing requirements;
> d) having hand sanitizer stations were set up throughout the Church buildings;
> e) cleaning and wiping down the sanctuary between each service;
> f) ensuring that attendees were provided with clean masks;
> g) having elders direct orderly and socially distanced entry of persons to the sanctuary and also constantly sanitizing the entry door; and > h) keeping services to an hour so as to maintain a timely flow of people in and out of the building.

[161] Notwithstanding these precautions, the churches have been discouraged in various ways from holding in-person services by members of the RCMP. They have been issued at least 11 tickets totalling $34,500 for allegedly contravening the G&E Orders issued by Dr. Henry.

[162] The respondents assert that the Province's publication "COVID-19 Ethical Decision-Making Framework", the "key ethical principles and values" that are asserted to underpin the framework, include a consideration of Charter rights. The principles and values identified in this publication include: Respect, defined as "to whatever extent possible, individual autonomy, individual liberties, and cultural safety must be respected; Least Coercive and Restrictive Means defined as "any infringements on personal rights and freedoms must be carefully considered, and the least restrictive or coercive means must be sought"; Proportionality, defined as "measures implemented, especially restrictive ones, should be proportionate to and commensurate with the level of threat and risk"; and Reasonableness, defined as "meaning that decisions should be rational, non-arbitrary nor based on emotional reactivity and based on the appropriate evidence available at the time".

(i) Section 2(a) of the Charter

[163] In R v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295 [Big M Drug Mart], at para. 94, the Supreme Court of Canada identified the "essence" of freedom of religion as protected by the Charter as encompassing the rights "to entertain such religious beliefs as a person chooses", "to declare religious belief openly without fear of hindrance or reprisal", and "to manifest religious belief by worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination."

[164] It is the third of these features that are engaged on the hearing of the petition.

[165] In Law Society of British Columbia v. Trinity Western University, 2018 SCC 32, [Trinity Western], the majority confirmed both the individual and communal aspects of freedom of religion:

> 64 Although this Court's interpretation of freedom of religion reflects the notion of personal choice and individual autonomy and freedom, religion is about both religious beliefs and religious relationships (Amselem, at para. 40; Loyola, at para. 59, quoting Justice LeBel in Hutterian Brethren, at para. 182). The protection of individual religious rights under s. 2(a) must therefore account for the socially embedded nature of religious belief, as well as the "deep linkages between this belief and its manifestation through communal institutions and traditions" (Loyola, at para. 60). In other words, religious freedom is individual, but also "profoundly communitarian" (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 89). The ability of religious adherents to come together and create cohesive communities of belief and practice is an important aspect of religious freedom under s. 2(a).

[166] The religious petitioners contend that Dr. Henry's G&E Orders are an outright forbidding of all British Columbians from the free exercise of the fundamental right to engage in sacred religious practices in a communal and collective setting.

[167] In my view, this assertion is greatly overstated.

[168] As I have indicated above, without necessarily accepting all of the religious petitioners' s. 2(a) arguments, the respondents concede that those rights have been infringed by Dr. Henry's G&E Orders, and I so find.

(ii) Section 2(b) of the Charter

[169] Freedom of expression is understood in Canadian law as all non-violent activity intended to communicate a meaning. Any law or government action that has the purpose or effect of interfering with such an activity is a prima facie breach of freedom of expression. Although it is usually referred to simply as "freedom of expression", s. 2(b) of the Charter guarantees freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression. While restrictions on gatherings do not have the purpose of restricting communication of meaning, they can have that effect.

[170] Section 2(b) also protects the right to receive expression. It protects listeners as well as speakers: Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Minister of Justice), 2000 SCC 69 at para 41.

[171] The religious petitioners contend that the prohibition of in-person worship services infringes freedom of expression, which they say extends even to physical acts, such as the sacrament of communion, intended to convey a religious meaning of profound significance.

[172] As I have indicated above, without necessarily accepting all of the religious petitioners' s. 2(b) arguments, the respondents concede that those rights have been infringed by Dr. Henry's G&E Orders, and I so find.

(iii) Section 2(c) of the Charter

[173] The right of peaceful assembly is, by definition a group activity incapable of individual performance: Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1, at para 64 [Mounted Police Association].

[174] As I have indicated above, without necessarily accepting all of the religious petitioners' s. 2(c) arguments, the respondents concede that those rights have been infringed by Dr. Henry's G&E Orders, and I so find.

(iv) Section 2(d) of the Charter

[175] In Mounted Police Association, the Supreme Court of Canada considered the guarantee of freedom of association in s. 2(d) of the Charter. The majority stated that freedom of association protects three classes of activities: (1) the right to join with others and form associations; (2) the right to join with others in the pursuit of other constitutional rights; and (3) the right to join with others to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of other groups or entities.

[176] Mounted Police Association involved the exclusion of RCMP members from the federal public service labour relations regime. After reviewing the existing jurisprudence, the majority held:

> 46 In summary, after an initial period of reluctance to embrace the full import of the freedom of association guarantee in the field of labour relations, the jurisprudence has evolved to affirm a generous approach to that guarantee. This approach is centred on the purpose of encouraging the individual's self-fulfillment and the collective realization of human goals, consistent with democratic values, as informed by "the historical origins of the concepts enshrined" in s. 2(d): R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344.

[177] I accept the religious petitioners' submission that infringement of s. 2(d) occurs when the impugned government action constitutes "a substantial interference with freedom of association" in either its purpose or effect, and find that the restrictions on gatherings in the G&E Orders infringes the religious petitioners' right to freedom of association under s. 2(d) of the Charter.

(v) Section 7 of the Charter

[178] There are two stages to an analysis under s. 7. First, the applicant must establish that the impugned governmental act imposes limits on a “life”, “liberty” or “security of the person” interest, such that s. 7 is “engaged”. If the first step is met, the applicant must then establish that this “deprivation” is contrary to the “principles of fundamental justice”: Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72 [Bedford] at para. 57.

[179] The principles of fundamental justice include the principles against arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality. The deprivation of a right will be arbitrary and thus violate s. 7 if it bears no real connection to the law’s purpose (in this case, public health). The deprivation of a right will be overbroad if it goes too far and interferes with some conduct that bears no connection to its objective. Finally, the deprivation of a right will be grossly disproportionate if the seriousness of the deprivation is so totally out of sync with the objective that it cannot be rationally supported: Bedford.

[180] The religious petitioners assert that in Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5 [Carter], the Court determined that the phrase “right to life” might be described as a depreciation in the value of the lived experience. They say that where state action imposes an increased risk of anxiety, loneliness, domestic violence, stress, depression, substance abuse or other factors which could directly or indirectly lead to death, the right to life is engaged.

[181] At the onset of the COVID-19 pandemic in the spring of 2020, the Riverside Calvary Chapel stopped in-person worship services, being unsure of the severity of the risk posed. The church asserts that the stoppage of the services resulted in negative effects on church members from a lack of in-person meetings including extreme loneliness, depression, anxiety, a sense of not belonging, and not receiving in-person prayer.

[182] There is similar evidence of the effects of being unable to attend in-person worship services from the Free Reformed Church of Chilliwack and the Immanuel Covenant Reformed Church.

[183] The respondents accept that in-person meetings afford psychological health benefits to members of religious communities, but say that there is no evidence of the kind of serious psychological harm required by Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, if they are unable to attend in-person meetings.

[184] I agree that the "right to life" protected by s. 7 of the Charter does not extend as far as the religious petitioners suggest. The respondents quite properly point to para. 62 in Carter, where the Court clarified the meaning of the right:

> This Court has most recently invoked the right to life in Chaoulli v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 791, where evidence showed that the lack of timely health care could result in death (paras. 38 and 50, per Deschamps J.; para. 123, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.; and paras. 191 and 200, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.), and in PHS, where the clients of Insite were deprived of potentially lifesaving medical care (para. 91). In each case, the right was only engaged by the threat of death. In short, the case law suggests that the right to life is engaged where the law or state action imposes death or an increased risk of death on a person, either directly or indirectly. Conversely, concerns about autonomy and quality of life have traditionally been treated as liberty and security rights. We see no reason to alter that approach in this case.

[186] Moreover, given the concessions of the respondents and my findings with respect to the religious petitioners' s. 2 Charter rights, I find that it is unnecessary to expand the jurisprudence relating to s. 7 of the Charter, and will make no finding with respect to s. 7. In Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37 [Hutterian Brethren], Chief Justice McLachlin, for the majority, concluded that:

> 105 The s. 15 claim was not considered at any length by the courts below and addressed only summarily by the parties in this Court. In my view, it is weaker than the s. 2(a) claim and can easily be dispensed with. To the extent that the s. 15(1) argument has any merit, many of my reasons for dismissing the s. 2(a) claim apply to it as well.

[187] Likewise, here the religious petitioners focussed their submissions on their s. 2 Charter rights, and addressed their claim pursuant to s. 7 of the Charter in only a summary way.

(vi) Section 15(1) of the Charter

[188] Section 15(1) of the Charter protects the equality rights of, inter alia, religious individuals. Establishing a violation of s. 15(1) requires the claimant to pass the following two-stage analysis:

> (a) Does the impugned law, on its face or in its impact, create a distinction on the basis of an enumerated or analogous ground?
> (b) If it does draw a distinction, does the impugned law fail to respond to the actual capacities and needs of the members of the group and instead impose burdens or deny a benefit in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating their disadvantage?

[189] The religious petitioners and the intervenor assert that the impugned G&E Orders make a distinction between assemblies that are religious in nature, and assemblies whose nature is variously economic (business meetings), athletic (gyms and swimming pools), educational (schools are open for in-person learning), social (restaurant gatherings), mental health oriented (support group meetings), or aesthetic (art gallery viewings, the film industry, bands playing at a restaurant).

[190] The religious petitioners and the intervenor also contend that if the COVID-19 transmission risk in these permitted but regulated activities is similar to the COVID-19 transmission risk in prohibited in-person religious assemblies (while following similar public health precautions such as social distancing, masking, and contact tracing), then they constitute an appropriate comparator group.

[191] There is no evidence before me that the G&E Orders only disadvantage a group of people based on their religious beliefs. The same activities are allowed and restricted for secular and religious people, and whether in a secular or religious setting. The respondents point out that religious schools are as open as secular ones. Funerals can be conducted by any religious or secular community. Unless they are covered by a specific exemption, non-religious people have no more ability to gather than religious ones.

[192] The G&E Orders are also not an absolute prohibition on in-person religious gatherings. The current orders permit multiple forms of in-person religious gatherings:

a) Drive-in services of up to 50 vehicles;

b) Personal prayer or reflection; and

c) In-person baptisms, weddings and funerals with up to 10 people in attendance. (This is a less restrictive limitation than the original November 7th verbal order which limited funerals and weddings to immediate household members only.)

[193] In Hutterian Brethren, the Supreme Court of Canada dealt with the universal photo requirement to obtain a driver's licence in Alberta. Chief Justice McLachlin reasoned that:

> 108 Assuming the respondents could show that the regulation creates a distinction on the enumerated ground of religion, it arises not from any demeaning stereotype but from a neutral and rationally defensible policy choice. There is no discrimination within the meaning of Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143, as explained in Kapp. The Colony members' claim is to the unfettered practice of their religion, not to be free from religious discrimination. The substance of the respondents' s. 15(1) claim has already been dealt with under s. 2(a). There is no breach of s. 15(1).

[194] The respondents contend that the same result should apply in this case, as the impugned G&E Orders are neutrally defined.

[195] In response, the intervenor commented that:

> Whereas the section 15(1) claim in Hutterian Brethren was based on a neutral policy choice concerning security measures, the impugned orders > specifically ban all in-person worship gatherings on the basis of the religious purpose of the assembly, while permitting other non-religious gatherings to continue. This differential effect is imposed by the definition of "event" and the activities exempted from the impugned orders.

[196] The respondents contend that while s. 15 prohibits governments from disadvantaging a group of persons based on their religious beliefs, but should not be utilized to test neutrality among practices or beliefs, because that is addressed by s. 2(a) of the Charter.

[197] As with their s. 7 Charter submissions, the religious petitioners addressed their claim pursuant to s. 15 of the Charter in only a summary way. They focused their submissions on their s. 2 Charter rights. Given the concessions of the respondents and my findings with respect to the Charter rights in s. 2, I find that it is unnecessary to expand the jurisprudence relating to s. 15 of the Charter, and will make no finding with respect to s. 15.

(vii) Section 1 of the Charter

[198] Section 1 of the Charter constrains the ability of legislatures to enact laws that limit rights and freedoms guaranteed in the Charter:

> 1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

[199] Religious bodies have a sphere of independent spiritual authority, at the core of which is the authority to determine their own membership, doctrines, and religious practices, including manner of worship.

[200] The intervenor observed that a church's ability to fulfil its responsibilities and religious duties may be legitimately inconvenienced by laws or regulations of general application, subject to the state's duty under the Charter to accommodate religious freedom under s. 2(a) and avoid adverse effect discrimination under s. 15. The intervenor argues, however, that by the same token, government's ability to fulfill its responsibilities may be legitimately 'inconvenienced' by its obligation to respect religious institutions and practices.

[201] The religious petitioners contend that this is not a case where “the contextual factors favour a deferential approach” in determining whether the infringements on fundamental rights and freedoms “are demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.” They say that the risks and harms at issue are identifiable in the evidence before me, and that the impugned G&E Orders are of general application across the province amounting to subordinate legislation and that their enactment was not subject to debate or public scrutiny.

[202] As the G&E Orders infringe the religious petitioners’ s. 2(a), (b), (c), and (d) Charter rights, I must determine whether those infringements are justified under s. 1 of the Charter. The onus at this stage is on the respondents to prove that the infringements meet the requirements of s. 1.

[204] At para. 101, Chief Justice McLachlin, for the majority, commented that the universal photo requirement addressed a pressing problem and would reduce the risk of identity-related fraud, when compared to a photo requirement that permits exceptions.

[205] At para. 102, McLachlin C.J.C. held, however, that that benefit had to be weighed against its impact on the limit on the Colony’s religious rights. She concluded that as the photo requirement did not deprive members of their ability to live in accordance with their beliefs, its deleterious effects, while not trivial, fell at the less serious end of the scale, and were justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

[206] The parties and the intervenor were unable to agree on the test to be applied in the application of s. 1 of the Charter itself in this case. The religious petitioners and the intervenor say the test established in Oakes should apply, because the G&E Orders are in substance laws of general application. The respondents say the test set out in Doré should apply*,* as it has been explained in Loyola High School v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 12 [Loyola], because the G&E Orders are an administrative decision.

[207] In Oakes, at paras. 69-71, Chief Justice Dickson set out the test to be applied on a s. 1 analysis. First, the objective which the measures responsible for a limit on a Charter right are designed to serve must be sufficiently important to warrant justifying limiting the right. Second, the party invoking s. 1 must establish that the means chosen are reasonable and demonstrably justified. This second requirement involves a form of proportionality test, where the court is required to "balance the interests of society with those of individuals and groups". There are three components to the proportionality inquiry. First, the measures adopted must be rationally connected to the objective. Second, the means chosen must impair as little as possible the right in question. Third, there must be proportionality between the effects of the measures and the objective.

> … Some limits on rights and freedoms protected by the Charter will be more serious than others in terms of the nature of the right or freedom violated, the extent of the violation, and the degree to which the measures which impose the limit trench upon the integral principles of a free and democratic society. Even if an objective is of sufficient importance, and the first two elements of the proportionality test are satisfied, it is still possible that, because of the severity of the deleterious effects of a measure on individuals or groups, the measure will not be justified by the purposes it is intended to serve. The more severe the deleterious effects of a measure, the more important the objective must be if the measure is to be reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

[209] At paras. 66-68, Dickson C.J.C. discussed the onus and standard of proof on a section s. 1 analysis. The onus of proving that a limit on a right of freedom guaranteed by the Charter is reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society rests upon the party seeking to uphold the limitation. The standard of proof is the civil standard, namely proof by a preponderance of probability.

[210] In Christian Medical and Dental Society of Canada v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, 2018 ONSC 579, the Ontario Divisional Court held that the Oakes test applied to the question of whether policies created by the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons that engaged the Charter rights of Ontario doctors were justified under s. 1.

[211] The Oakes test was also recently applied by the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and Labrador in Taylor v. Newfoundland and Labrador, 2020 NLSC 125, in the context of a Charter challenge to orders of general application issued by that province's Chief Medical Officer of Health authorized by that jurisdiction's equivalent to the PHA. The impugned orders restricted entry into the province to prevent transmission of COVID-19.

[212] In Doré, Madam Justice Abella addressed whether the Oakes framework should be used when reviewing an administrative decision that is said to violate Charter rights. Writing for the Court, Abella J. wrote:

> 57 On judicial review, the question becomes whether, in assessing the impact of the relevant Charter protection and given the nature of the decision and the statutory and factual contexts, the decision reflects a proportionate balancing of the Charter protections at play. As LeBel J. noted in Multani, when a court is faced with reviewing an administrative decision that implicates Charter rights, "[t]he issue becomes one of proportionality" (para. 155), and calls for integrating the spirit of s. 1 into judicial review. Though this judicial review is conducted within the administrative framework, there is nonetheless conceptual harmony between a reasonableness review and the Oakes framework, since both contemplate giving a "margin of appreciation", or deference, to administrative and legislative bodies in balancing *Charte*r values against broader objectives.

[213] At para. 37, Abella J. referred to Hutterian Brethren to draw a distinction between the approach to be applied when "reviewing the constitutionality of a law" and that which should be applied when "reviewing an administrative decision that is said to violate the rights of a particular individual". In doing so, Abella J. effectively affirmed the statement of McLachlin C.J.C. in Hutterian Brethren that "[w]here the validity of a law is at stake, the appropriate approach is a [s. 1] Oakes analysis."

[214] In Loyola, writing this time for the majority, Abella J. wrote at para. 3 that "the result in Doré was to eschew a literal s. 1 approach in favour of a robust proportionality analysis consistent with administrative law principles."

[215] In Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65 [Vavilov], the Court confirmed the applicability of the Doré framework when reviewing an administrative decision that is said to limit a Charter right:

> 57 Although the amici questioned the approach to the standard of review set out in Doré v. Barreau du Québec, 2012 SCC 12, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 395, a reconsideration of that approach is not germane to the issues in this appeal. However, it is important to draw a distinction between cases in which it is alleged that the effect of the administrative decision being reviewed is to unjustifiably limit rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (as was the case in Doré) and those in which the issue on review is whether a provision of the decision maker's enabling statute violates the Charter (see, e.g., Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Martin, 2003 SCC 54, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 504, at para. 65). Our jurisprudence holds that an administrative decision maker's interpretation of the latter issue should be reviewed for correctness, and that jurisprudence is not displaced by these reasons.

[216] Under the Doré analysis, the issue is not whether the exercise of administrative discretion that limits a Charter right is correct (i.e., whether the court would come to the same result), but whether it is reasonable (i.e., whether it is within the range of acceptable alternatives once appropriate curial deference is given). An administrative decision will be reasonable if it reflects a proportionate balancing of the Charter right with the objective of the measures that limit the right.

[217] In Loyola, Abella J. explained the "analytical harmony" between the proportionality analyses required by the Oakes and Doré frameworks:

> [40] A Doré proportionality analysis finds analytical harmony with the final stages of the Oakes framework used to assess the reasonableness of a limit on a Charter right under s. 1: minimal impairment and balancing. Both [Oakes] and Doré require that Charter protections are affected as little as reasonably possible in light of the state's particular objectives: see RJR-

> MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 160. As such, Doré's proportionality analysis is a robust one and "works the same justificatory muscles" as the *Oake*s test: Doré, at para. 5.

[218] In this case, I have determined that the G&E Orders are more akin to an administrative decision than a law of general application, and that the Doré test is the appropriate test to apply. Although the G&E Orders are not a classical administrative adjudicative decision, they were made through a delegation of discretionary decision-making authority under the PHA.

[219] In Trinity Western, at para. 36, the Court explained that on a reasonableness review of an administrative decision, a "reviewing court must consider whether there were other reasonable possibilities that would give effect to the Charter protections more fully in light of the objectives [….] If there was an option or avenue reasonably open to the decision maker that would reduce the impact on the protected right while still permitting him or her to sufficiently further the relevant objectives, the decision would not fall within a range of reasonable outcomes [….] the question is whether the administrative decision-maker has furthered his or her statutory mandate in a manner that is proportionate to the resulting limitation on the Charter right."

[220] In Trinity Western, the majority found that the Law Society of British Columbia's decision not to approve the University's proposed law school infringed s. 2(a) of the Charter, but was justified under s. 1 of the Charter. With respect to the infringement, the majority found:

> 75 By interpreting the public interest in a way that precludes the approval of TWU's law school governed by the mandatory Covenant, the LSBC has interfered with TWU's ability to maintain an approved law school as a religious community defined by its own religious practices. The effect is a limitation on the right of TWU's community members to enhance their spiritual development through studying law in an environment defined by their religious beliefs in which members follow certain religious rules of conduct. Accordingly, their religious rights were engaged by the decision.

[221] But, applying the Doré framework, the majority concluded that the Law Society's decision was reasonable as it represented a proportionate balance between the limitation on the religious protections under s. 2(a) of the Charter and the statutory objectives the Law Society sought to pursue:

> 104 Given the significant benefits to the relevant statutory objectives and the minor significance of the limitation on the Charter rights at issue on the facts of this case, and given the absence of any reasonable alternative that would reduce the impact on Charter protections while sufficiently furthering those same objectives, the decision to refuse to approve TWU's proposed law school represents a proportionate balance. In other circumstances, a more serious limitation may be entitled to greater weight in the balance and change the outcome. But that is not this case.
> 105 In our view, the decision made by the LSBC "gives effect, as fully as possible to the Charter protections at stake given the particular statutory mandate" (Loyola, at para. 39). Therefore, the decision amounted to a proportionate balancing and was reasonable.

[222] The religious petitioners concede that public health is a sufficiently important objective that it can justify limits on Charter rights. But they ask this Court to say that the measures Dr. Henry has taken are arbitrary, irrational and disproportionate, and therefore not reasonable limits demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. They say that the Court does not owe deference to Dr. Henry in determining the constitutionality of her orders.

[223] The respondents disagree. They say, and I agree, that the question before this Court is not whether Dr. Henry reached the correct balance, but whether, on the information available to her, she acted within the reasonable range of alternatives. This assessment must be based on the record before Dr. Henry.

[224] Containing the spread of the Virus and the protection of public health is a legitimate objective that can support limits on Charter rights under s. 1. An outbreak of a communicable disease is an example of a crisis in which the state is obliged to take measures that affect the autonomy of individuals and of communities within civil society. The constitutional importance of combating the COVID-19 pandemic has been stated by courts across the country.

[225] The respondents concede that there is no question that restrictions on gatherings to avoid transmission of the Virus limit rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter, as well as personal liberty in a more generic sense. But they contend that protection of the vulnerable from death or severe illness and protection of the healthcare system from being swamped by an out-of-control pandemic is also a matter of constitutional importance.

[226] The intervenor submits that the risks of in-person religious gatherings were "obviously identical risks" to those present in school, gymnasium, support group or restaurant settings. This simplistic analysis fails to account for the key distinguishing factors relied on by Dr. Henry in restricting religious gatherings including the ages of the participants, the intimate setting of religious gatherings, and the presence of communal singing or chanting in religious gatherings (and the religious petitioners' evidence shows that masks do not appear to be used throughout religious services and that singing is not prohibited).

[227] The religious petitioners ask me to find that the measures Dr. Henry has taken are arbitrary, irrational and disproportionate, and therefore not reasonable limits demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

[228] The deprivation of a right is arbitrary if it "bears no connection to" the law's purpose". As the religious petitioners concede that public health is a sufficiently important objective that it can justify limits on Charter rights, I see no basis upon which to find that the impugned G&E Orders are arbitrary in the broad sense.

[229] The fact that some religious activities are restricted and some secular activities are not is not necessarily evidence of arbitrariness. There needs to be a comparison of comparables and a demonstration that there is no rational basis for the distinction. That is not present here.

[230] Overbreadth allows the courts to recognize that a law is rational in some cases, but that it overreaches in its effect in others. The impugned G&E Orders are as broad in scope as one might conceive of. However, they are intended to address a pandemic that affects all of us. In the result, they are, of necessity, and by design, broad enough to affect all British Columbians and those visiting our province. The G&E Orders do not overreach.

[231] Gross disproportionality targets laws that may be rationally connected to their objective, but whose effects are so disproportionate that they cannot be supported. Gross disproportionality applies only in extreme cases where “the seriousness of the deprivation is totally out of sync with the objective of the measure”. In my view, for the reasons I have expressed in the paragraph preceding this one, I find that they are not disproportionate.

[232] The religious petitioners assert that the respondents have failed to demonstrate a disproportionate risk of COVID-19 resulting from the Charter-protected gathering activities at issue in this proceeding, and thus cannot meet the requirements of s. 1 of the Charter.

[233] I disagree. I have set out the series of G&E Orders made by Dr. Henry between November 7, 2020 and February 10, 2021, and the basis upon which they were made. I find that they were based upon a reasonable assessment of the risk of transmission of the Virus during religious and other types of gatherings.

[234] On the record in this case, I find that Dr. Henry turned her mind to the impact of her orders on religious practices and governed herself by the principle of proportionality. She consulted widely with faith leaders and individually asked for the input of the leaders of two of the churches making up the religious petitioners, while affirming the need for respect for the rule of law and public health.

[235] Under Vavilov at para. 101, there are two bases for holding a decision maker’s decisions to be unreasonable. One is a failure of rationality internal to the reasoning process. The second is where the decision is untenable in light of a factual or legal constraint.

[236] A decision has internal rationality if the reviewing court can trace the decision maker’s reasoning without encountering any fatal flaws in its overarching logic, and there is a line of analysis that could reasonably lead the decision maker from the evidence before it to the conclusion at which it arrived: Vavilov at para. 102.

[237] I accept that under either approach to reasonableness, a reasonableness review begins with the reasons of the decision maker and "prioritizes the decision maker's justifications for its decisions". What matters is not whether there are formal reasons but whether the reasoning process underlying the decision is opaque.

[238] I have concluded that Dr. Henry's reasons, both in the preambles to the orders and in the media events, do not exhibit a failure of internal rationality. Gatherings and events are a route of transmission. Whether measures less intrusive than prohibition are effective depends on the prevalence of the Virus in the community and behavioural factors. Dr. Henry responded to evidence of accelerating transmission when she made the orders, and she has explained her reasoning.

[239] I find that in making the impugned G&E Orders, Dr. Henry assessed available scientific evidence to determine COVID-19 risk for gatherings in B.C. including epidemiological data regarding transmission of the Virus associated with religious activities globally, nationally and in B.C., factors leading to elevated transmission risk in religious settings, and COVID-19 epidemiology in B.C.

[240] I also find that in making the impugned G&E Orders Dr. Henry was guided by the principles applicable to public health decision making, and in particular, that public health interventions be proportionate to the threat faced and that measures should not exceed those necessary to address the actual risk. Her orders are limited in duration and constantly revised and reassessed to respond to current scientific evidence and epidemiological conditions in B.C.

[241] Through the pandemic, Dr. Henry has consistently expressed her awareness of the impacts of her orders, of her mandate to protect public health, and of her duty to do so in a way that is proportionate to those impacts, but the religious petitioners assert that she did not account for their Charter rights adequately, or at all.

[242] While she made no specific reference to Charter rights and values prior to her G&E Orders of February 5 and 10, 2021, I am unable to accept that those rights and values were not considered by Dr. Henry from the outset of her G&E Orders in November 2020.

[243] I find that Dr. Henry carefully considered the significant impacts of the impugned G&E Orders on freedom of religion, consulting with the inter-faith community to discuss and understand the impact of restrictions on gatherings and events on their congregations and religious practices.

[244] The dangers that Dr. Henry's G&E Orders were attempting to address were the risk of accelerated transmission of the Virus, protecting the vulnerable, and maintaining the integrity of the healthcare system. Her decision was made in the face of significant uncertainty and required highly specialized medical and scientific expertise. The respondents submit, and I agree, that this is the type of situation that calls for a considerable level of deference in applying the Doré test.

[245] The respondents point to a number of ways in which Dr. Henry's G&E Orders have attempted to minimize impacts on the rights in question. She waited until there was evidence of exponential increase in cases, first in the Vancouver Coastal and Fraser Health regions and then across the province, before tightening restrictions. She has also permitted individual prayer, reflection, and other forms of religious activity at places of worship, and individual meetings with religious leaders. And, perhaps most importantly, where appropriate, Dr. Henry has made exemptions for religious organizations under s. 43 of the PHA.

[246] I find that Dr. Henry's decision fell within a range of reasonable outcomes. There is a reasonable basis to conclude that there were no other reasonable possibilities that would give effect to the s. 2 Charter protections more fully, in light of the objectives of protecting health, and in light of the uncertainty presented by the Virus.

[247] Although the impacts of the G&E Orders on the religious petitioners' rights are significant, the benefits to the objectives of the orders are even more so. In my view, the orders represent a reasonable and proportionate balance.

[248] Thus, the respondents have proven that the limits the G&E Orders place on the religious petitioners' s. 2 Charter rights are justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

IX. Conclusion

[249] Mr. Beaudoin has persuaded me that his s. 2(c) and (d) Charter rights were infringed by the G&E Orders that predated February 10, 2021, and that the infringement of those rights by those orders cannot be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

[250] The religious petitioners have not satisfied me that they are entitled to challenge the G&E Orders on their judicial review under s. 2 of the JRPA. Even if they could do so, the infringement of their s. 2 Charter rights by the impugned G&E Orders is justified under s. 1 of the Charter. This part of their petition is thus dismissed.

X. Remedy for Mr. Beaudoin

[251] Mr. Beaudoin is entitled to a part of the declaration he seeks, pursuant to ss. 24(1) and 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. I declare that orders made by Dr. Henry entitled "Gatherings and Events" pursuant to ss. 30, 31, 32 and 39(3) of the PHA, including the orders of November 19, 2020, December 2, 9, 15 and 24, 2020 are of no force and effect as against Mr. Beaudoin as they unjustifiably infringe his rights and freedoms with respect to public protests pursuant to ss. 2(c) and (d) of the Charter.

[252] The respondents contend that neither they nor I have specific information about the violation ticket issued to Mr. Beaudoin, and that seeking judicial review of that ticket before it has been adjudicated would amount to a collateral attack, as the validity of the ticket does not necessarily depend upon the constitutionality of the impugned orders.

[253] I have therefore reluctantly come to the view that the respondents' submission with respect to the violation ticket issued to Mr. Beaudoin is correct, and that I should not adjudicate on their validity without the factual background that resulted in their issuance.

Respondents' five-year-old daughter suffered a severe cut to her elbow which severed an artery and caused an extensive haemorrhage and blood loss. Her mother bound the arm tightly and took her to a local general hospital. The child was put in the care of the appellant, a general practitioner who was on call at the emergency room. He performed a vein dissection so that fluids could be replaced in the patient's body through an intravenous drip. Realizing, however, that he would be unable to repair the artery, the appellant did not proceed with a blood transfusion but decided to send her to a hospital specializing in paediatric care. He telephoned the paediatric hospital and spoke to a doctor on call in the emergency room, to whom he described the severity of the patient's injury, the treatment administered and the possibility of the child going into shock. He then wrote a transfer order which indicated that the patient was in a state of pre-shock, and dispatched the patient in an ambulance. After she arrived at the paediatric hospital, the child was seized with a massive cardio-respiratory arrest. She suffered a deficiency of oxygen to the brain and sustained irreversible brain damage, resulting in complete and permanent disability. Respondents brought an action against the appellant and the general hospital alleging malpractice. The trial judge found that the appellant had not been negligent and dismissed the action. The Court of Appeal, in a majority judgment, reversed the judgment. The issue before this Court was whether the Court of Appeal erred in overturning the trial judge's findings as regards (1) the appellant's decision to transfer the patient when he did; (2) his decision not to proceed with a blood analysis and transfusion before the transfer; and (3) the information he transmitted to the paediatric hospital regarding the patient's condition at the time of the transfer. In the companion case, Lapointe v. Hôpital Le Gardeur, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 000, this Court dealt with the hospital's appeal.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

An appellate court should not interfere with a trial judge's findings and conclusions of fact in the absence of a manifest error. The privileged position of the trial judge, who has had the benefit of seeing and hearing the witnesses, extends to the testimony of experts as well as ordinary witnesses. Findings of fact based on the credibility of witnesses should not be reversed unless the trial judge made some palpable and overriding error. In this case the trial judge made findings on the credibility of witnesses and gave reasons for his preference of the testimony of some over that of others. He found the appellant, unlike the doctor who first treated the child at the paediatric hospital, to be totally credible, as well as the medical experts who testified for the defence.

Professional liability is governed by the principles of ordinary civil liability. Generally, doctors have an obligation of means, and their conduct must be assessed against the conduct of a prudent and diligent doctor placed in the same circumstances. Medical professionals should not be held liable for mere errors of judgment which are distinguishable from professional fault.

The trial judge concluded that the appellant had exercised proper judgment in deciding to transfer the patient when he did. Sooner or later the child would have had to be sent to the better equipped paediatric hospital. He found that the appellant's decision to transfer the child immediately, without giving her a blood transfusion, was reasonable. The Court of Appeal's reversal of the findings on this point did not stem from a disagreement on the proper standard of liability, nor did the majority find a palpable and overriding error in law or in the trial judge's findings of fact. The appellate court simply disagreed with the lower court's appreciation of the facts and substituted its own opinion.

A majority of the Court of Appeal also concluded that the appellant had failed to convey the necessary information to the second hospital, since his telephone conversation did not alert the doctor on call to the severity of the patient's condition. The trial judge's conclusion that the appellant had acted diligently in the circumstances was based on the evidence, however, and so did not constitute a palpable error. The evidence also confirms that the staff at the paediatric hospital appreciated the incoming patient's medical state. The Court of Appeal was not entitled to substitute its opinion for that of the trial judge in these circumstances.

Summary Facts

Since this case implies in great part a review of disputed facts, I will discuss them in more detail later on. The basic series of events and their tragic consequences, however, are not controversial and can be summarized as follows.

On the afternoon of March 1, 1975, while she was playing at home, the five-year old respondent Nancy Lapointe seriously injured herself. A cut in one of her elbows substantially severed her muscles and nerves and the humeral artery, causing an extensive haemorrhage and blood loss. Her mother, the respondent Gabrielle Imbeault-Lapointe, bound Nancy's arm tightly with a cloth with the help of her brother-in-law, and they drove to Hôpital Le Gardeur, a small general hospital in Repentigny, Quebec. They arrived at the emergency room between 4:15 and 4:20 p.m.

At Le Gardeur, a nurse put a tourniquet on Nancy's arm and brought her to an examining room. She was put in the care of the appellant, Dr. Maurice Chevrette, a general practitioner who was on call at the emergency room that day. After examining the wound, Dr. Chevrette concluded that the first priority was the replacement of fluids in the child's body through an intravenous drip, since she had lost a significant amount of blood. When the two nurses assisting him, Nurse Hannah-Parr and Nurse Richard-Chagnon, were unable to find a place to insert a tube, Dr. Chevrette proceeded to a dissection of the vein. The intravenous drip was eventually put in place and 500 cc. of Rheomacrodex was administered. During the course of this treatment, Nancy was conscious and her vital signs remained normal.

Realizing that he would be unable to repair the artery, Dr. Chevrette phoned Hôpital Sainte-Justine, a paediatrics teaching hospital in Montreal. He spoke to a doctor on call in the emergency room, describing the severity of the patient's injury, the treatment administered at Le Gardeur, and the possibility of the child going into shock. He then wrote a transfer order which indicated the emergency treatment the patient had received, that she had suffered a severe laceration in the right elbow and that she was in a state of pre-shock. Nancy was put into an ambulance at around 5:30 p.m. for the trip to Sainte-Justine about 30 kilometres away, accompanied by her mother and Nurse Parr.

The ambulance ride between Le Gardeur and Sainte-Justine took about twenty-five minutes, during which time Nancy remained conscious and talked to her mother. They arrived at their destination at around 6 p.m., where they were met by the surgeon on call, Dr. Yvan Dion. Nancy was taken to an examining room, where she was transferred from the ambulance stretcher to a hospital stretcher. Dr. Dion proceeded to a series of tests, including X-rays. He removed the elastic tourniquet placed on Nancy's arm at Le Gardeur, examined the wound, and installed an inflatable tourniquet.

At about 6:30 p.m., Nancy's condition began to deteriorate rapidly. Just after she had been taken to the emergency cardiac unit, she was seized with a massive cardio-respiratory arrest. Emergency measures were undertaken, but Nancy suffered a critical cerebral anoxia, or deficiency of oxygen to the brain. She fell into a coma which lasted a few weeks. When she awoke, it became apparent that she had sustained irreversible brain damage, resulting in complete and permanent disability.

The respondents, in their own names and in that of their daughter, took an action against Dr. Chevrette alleging malpractice, and against Hôpital Le Gardeur as his employer (see Lapointe v. Hôpital Le Gardeur, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 000, judgment also released today).

Judgments

Superior Court

During the fourteen-day hearing, the trial judge, Vallerand J. (now of the Court of Appeal) heard a number of witnesses, particularly expert witnesses. He made determinations with respect to the credibility of these witnesses and found the appellant, Dr. Chevrette, as well as experts who testified on his behalf, to be credible. Assessing the whole of the evidence against the standard test of liability for professional negligence, he found that Dr. Chevrette had not been negligent in the discharge of his duty toward his patient Nancy Lapointe. Accordingly, he dismissed the respondents' action in the following terms:

> [TRANSLATION] I therefore find that the defendant Chevrette exercised sound judgment after having competently assessed the situation and that he used all reasonable means at his disposal in caring for his patient. That being so, the inevitable conclusion is that he has discharged any burden of proof thrust upon him by the chain of events in question.

Given this conclusion, Vallerand J. also dismissed the respondents' action against Hôpital Le Gardeur.

Court of Appeal, [1989] R.J.Q. 2619

A majority of four judges in the Court of Appeal, each writing separate reasons, allowed the appeal on the ground that Dr. Chevrette was negligent on the occasion of the transfer of Nancy Lapointe to Hôpital Sainte-Justine. A majority also allowed the appeal against Hôpital Le Gardeur, holding the hospital liable for Dr. Chevrette's negligence. Beauregard J.A., dissenting, would have dismissed the appeal, finding no error in the trial judge's determinations and conclusions of fact in the context of the professional standard of liability to be met by Dr. Chevrette.

Issues and Arguments

The appellant takes issue before us with the Court of Appeal's reversal of the trial judge's findings and conclusions of fact, more particularly as regards the following points:

1. Dr. Chevrette's decision to transfer the patient from Hôpital Le Gardeur to Sainte-Justine at the time he did;

2. Dr. Chevrette's decision not to proceed to a blood analysis and transfusion before the transfer;

3. The information transmitted by Dr. Chevrette to Sainte-Justine with respect to the patient's condition at the time of the transfer.

In the appellant's view, the majority of the Court of Appeal purely and simply substituted its opinion for that of the trial judge since it failed to point out any error on his part.

The respondents maintain that the Court of Appeal was correct in allowing the appeal since, in their view, the trial judge misinterpreted the evidence with respect to the three points mentioned above.

The Role of an Appellate Court

That an appellate court should not interfere with the findings and conclusions of fact of a trial judge, failing a manifest error, is a well-established principle. As Fauteux J. wrote for the Court in Dorval v. Bouvier, [1968] S.C.R. 288, at p. 293:

> [TRANSLATION] Because of the privileged position of the judge who presides at the trial, who sees and hears the parties and witnesses and who assesses their evidence, it is an established principle that his opinion is to be treated with the utmost deference by the appellate court, whose duty is not to retry the case nor to interfere by substituting its assessment of the evidence for that of the trial judge, except in the case of a clear error on the face of the reasons or conclusions of the judgment appealed from.

The privileged position of the trier of fact extends not only to the testimony of ordinary witnesses, but of expert witnesses. In this respect, Spence J. wrote in Joseph Brant Memorial Hospital v. Koziol, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 491, at p. 504:

I am strongly of the view that it is not the function of an appellate court to reconsider that evidence whether it be upon facts or a matter of professional opinion and come to a different conclusion, unless it could be shown that the evidence reasonably could not result in justifying the conclusion made by the trial judge. [Emphasis added.]

This principle of non-intervention also applies where the only issue is the interpretation of the evidence as a whole; see Métivier v. Cadorette, [1977] 1 S.C.R. 371, at p. 382.

While an appellate court may review a trial judge's findings of fact, it is not its function to conduct a trial de novo. Laskin C.J. emphasized this point in Schreiber Brothers Ltd. v. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 S.C.R. 78, at p. 84:

> It would, of course, be open to an appellate court, where credibility of a witness was not in issue, to review findings of fact by a trial judge if they were based on a failure to consider relevant evidence or on a misapprehension of the evidence. An appeal, however, is not a complete rehearing.

If an appellate court interferes with findings of fact, it must be on the basis of errors made by the trial judge. The kinds of error which merit intervention on appeal were identified by Dickson C.J. in Lensen v. Lensen, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 672, at p. 683:

It is a well-established principle that findings of fact made at trial based on the credibility of witnesses are not to be reversed on appeal unless it can be established that the trial judge made some "palpable and overriding error which affected his assessment of the facts"....

More recently, in Laurentide Motels Ltd. v. Beauport (City), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 705, this Court allowed an appeal from the Court of Appeal's reversal of the trial judge's findings of fact. After reviewing the authorities, the Court held at p. 794:

> When a trial judge is assessing facts in terms of the law, what matters is that his conclusions be based on the evidence, that is, consistent with the evidence, and that no evidence essential to the outcome of the case be ignored....
> As regards determination of the facts, which is the sovereign right of the trial judge, an appellate court, and a fortiori a second appellate court, will intervene only when it has been shown that there is a manifest or palpable error by the trial judge. It is now almost axiomatic to say that determining the facts is the province of the trial judge, who has seen and heard the witnesses and is in a position to assess the credibility that the testimony of each should be given.

Obviously, the task of an appellate court will be greatly simplified where the trial judge has carefully explained the reasons for his or her findings and conclusions. As the Court concluded in Laurentide Motels, supra, at p. 799:

> ... an appellate court which has neither seen nor heard the witnesses and as such is unable to assess their movements, glances, hesitations, trembling, blushing, surprise or bravado, is not in a position to substitute its opinion for that of the trial judge, who has the difficult task of separating the wheat from the chaff and looking into hearts and minds of witnesses in an attempt to discover the truth. If it happens that the trial judge neglects to indicate his findings in this respect or does not adequately support them, then it may be that an appellate court has to form its own conclusions. However, that is not the case here, where as we have seen the judge noted his impressions frequently and supported his findings. [Emphasis added.]

In the absence of an identifiable error by the trial judge, a Court of Appeal should not substitute its opinion. In the words of Lamer J. (now Chief Justice) in Beaudoin-Daigneault v. Richard, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 2, at pp. 8-9:

> ... an appellate court should not intervene unless it is certain that its difference of opinion with the trial judge is the result of an error by the latter. As he had the benefit of seeing and hearing the witnesses, such certainty will only be possible if the appellate court can identify the reason for this difference of opinion, in order to be certain that it results from an error and not from his privileged position as the trier of fact. If the appellate court cannot thus identify the critical error it must refrain from intervening, unless of course the finding of fact cannot be attributed to this advantage enjoyed by the trial judge, because nothing could have justified the judge's conclusion whatever he saw or heard; this latter category will be identified by the unreasonableness of the trial judge's finding....

In the case at bar, the appellant urges us to apply these principles since, in his view, the Court of Appeal overstepped its authority in reversing the findings and conclusions of fact of the trial judge. Before turning to the case at bar, however, it is important to set out the legal framework of this case by briefly reviewing the principles governing professional liability.

Professional Liability

The principles which govern professional liability have a long jurisprudential history, but any review of the law must begin with art. 1053 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada and the notion of fault:

> 1053. Every person capable of discerning right from wrong is responsible for the damage caused by his fault to another, whether by positive act, imprudence, neglect or want of skill.

Professional liability imports the principles of ordinary civil liability. Generally, doctors have an obligation of means, and their conduct must be assessed against the conduct of a prudent and diligent doctor placed in the same circumstances. In the words of Professor Paul-André Crépeau in his seminal article entitled "La responsabilité civile du médecin" (1977), 8 R.D.U.S. 25, at pp. 28-29:

> [TRANSLATION] Unless otherwise expressly provided, a physician has, by virtue of a now generally accepted classification, an obligation of means, that is he must, as stated by the Cour de Cassation in the Mercier case in 1936, provide "care which is prudent, attentive, conscientious and, subject to exceptional circumstances, in accordance with what is known by science".
> The assessment of such an obligation is to be carried out not in concreto based on some subjective criterion such as whether the obligee has done his best, but rather in abstracto according to the objective criterion of what a prudent and diligent doctor would have done in similar circumstances.

Elaborating on the notion of fault as it applies to medical professionals, Alain Bernardot and Robert Kouri write in La responsabilité civile médicale (1980), at p. 12:

> [TRANSLATION] Hence the general rule must be the principle of assessment in abstracto. That principle requires that the attitude of a party being sued be evaluated in relation to that which a competent professional would have had at the same time and in the same place. But who is this competent professional?
> He is a prudent and diligent individual placed in the same situation as the party being sued before the courts. Thus, if a physician is being sued, the question is what a prudent and diligent physician would have done.

For a review of the authorities see the recent decision by this Court Roberge v. Bolduc, [1991] 1 S.C.R. 374, at pp. 393 et seq.

Courts in Quebec have consistently applied these principles. In X. v. Mellen, [1957] Que. Q.B. 389, the Quebec Court of Appeal held that doctors have an obligation of means. Similarly, in Hôpital général de la région de l'Amiante Inc. v. Perron, [1979] C.A. 567, Lajoie J.A. wrote at p. 574:

> [TRANSLATION] As a general rule, the obligation of a physician and a hospital toward a patient is not one of result but of means, that is an obligation of prudence and diligence whose violation is not to be assessed subjectively by inquiring whether the author of an act or omission has done his best, but rather according to an objective and abstract criterion under which the court asks what another doctor, another specialist, another nurse of ordinary and reasonable knowledge, competence and skill would have done in circumstances similar to those in which the person whose conduct is to be judged found himself or herself.

See also: Tremblay v. Claveau, [1990] R.R.A. 268 (C.A.), at p. 271; Cloutier v. Hôpital le Centre hospitalier de l'Université Laval (CHUL), [1990] R.J.Q. 717 (C.A.), at p. 721; and Vigneault v. Mathieu, [1991] R.J.Q. 1607 (C.A.), at pp. 1614-15. As the judgment from Hôpital général de la région de l'Amiante indicates, courts should be careful not to rely upon the perfect vision afforded by hindsight. In order to evaluate a particular exercise of judgment fairly, the doctor's limited ability to foresee future events when determining a course of conduct must be borne in mind. Otherwise, the doctor will not be assessed according to the norms of the average doctor of reasonable ability in the same circumstances, but rather will be held accountable for mistakes that are apparent only after the fact.

Both doctrine and case law emphasise that medical professionals should not be held liable for mere errors of judgment which are distinguishable from professional fault. According to Hyde J. in X. v. Mellen, supra, at p. 406:

> The surgeon is, certainly, not to be judged by the result, nor is he to be condemned for a mere error in judgment. That error however must, as Rand J. says in Wilson v. Swanson [[1956] S.C.R. 804, at p. 812], be "distinguished from an act of unskilfulness or carelessness or due to lack of knowledge".

This approach was upheld by this Court in Martel v. Hôtel-Dieu St-Vallier, [1969] S.C.R. 745; see also Cloutier, supra, at p. 721.

Given the number of available methods of treatment from which medical professionals must at times choose, and the distinction between error and fault, a doctor will not be found liable if the diagnosis and treatment given to a patient correspond to those recognized by medical science at the time, even in the face of competing theories. As expressed more eloquently by André Nadeau in "La responsabilité médicale" (1946), 6 R. du B. 153, at p. 155:

> [TRANSLATION] The courts do not have jurisdiction to settle scientific disputes or to choose among divergent opinions of physicians on certain subjects. They may only make a finding of fault where a violation of universally accepted rules of medicine has occurred. The courts should not involve themselves in controversial questions of assessment having to do with diagnosis or the treatment of preference.

Or, as summarized by Brossard J. in Nencioni v. Mailloux, [1985] R.L. 532 (Sup. Ct.), at p. 548:

It is with these parameters in mind that this case must be reviewed and analyzed.

Analysis

Introduction

In the case at bar, the Court of Appeal had the benefit of a lucid, well-reasoned and detailed judgment by the trial judge. Vallerand J. carefully examined the evidence and expressed his views in great detail. More importantly, he made findings on the credibility of witnesses and gave reasons for his preference of some witnesses' testimony over others.

First, the trial judge found the appellant Chevrette totally credible. In accepting the doctor's account of the events which took place at Hôpital Le Gardeur, Vallerand J. wrote:

[TRANSLATION] The fact is that notwithstanding his interest in the case, Dr. Chevrette gave, without ever contradicting himself, testimony which was at once spontaneous, carefully considered and accurate, restrained, balanced and undogmatic, corroborated by auxiliaries whose credibility was equal to his own. This testimony has not been seriously controverted in any way.

He also made it clear that he fully accepted the testimony of Nurse Parr, who travelled in the ambulance with Nancy to Sainte-Justine. He noted:

> [TRANSLATION] What I have said concerning the testimony of Dr. Chevrette applies also to the conduct of Nurse Parr, particularly since, if she had wished to put herself beyond all blame and give her colleague and her employer the benefit of false testimony, she could easily and with virtually no risk of being found out have stated that she uncovered the wound during the journey and observed that there was no haemorrhage. She could likewise have denied the presence of blood on the stretcher.

In contrast, Vallerand J. found Dr. Dion, the doctor who first treated Nancy in the emergency room at Sainte-Justine, not to be a credible witness. With respect to his testimony regarding the alleged inadequacy of the tourniquet applied by Dr. Chevrette, the trial judge wrote:

> [TRANSLATION] The witness Dion is the only one to give evidence with regard to this fundamentally important observation [of blood on the stretcher]. Not the slightest mention was made of it by those -- the ambulance attendant, the resident doctor and the nurses -- who had been busily engaged around the stretcher (the ambulance stretcher and not that of the hospital where it would appear the child was placed upon admission). While it is true that Dr. Dion expressed very dramatically his sentiments to Dr. Taché, the plastic surgeon summoned to repair the wound, that occurred after the heart failure and is thus equally consistent with the truth as with an attempt to deflect possible blame.
> That having been said and given the significance of the blame, which, it will be seen, is in keeping with all other aspects of the case, it becomes essential to determine Dion's credibility as a witness. As to his conduct on the stand, it was, apart from a certain offhandedness not at all out of place within a context of amiable bonhomie, unexceptionable. More disturbing, however, is the discovery, upon examination of the exhibits and the testimony, that the witness Dion just as casually confused his recollection, his assessment and his understanding of the hospital record, relying on his own imagination, and > that on numerous points he is clearly contradicted by the evidence as a whole and, in some instances, by witnesses whose credibility is beyond all doubt.

Vallerand J. also explained why he discounted the evidence of the experts who testified on behalf of the respondents. In his view, their opinions were based on the version of facts related in the discredited testimony of Dr. Dion. He stated:

> [TRANSLATION] If some doctors called by the plaintiffs saw fit to be very critical in this regard only in their assessment of Dr. Chevrette, I believe it is because they had been to a large degree set against him by the statements of their colleague Dr. Dion, which neither they nor the plaintiffs had any reason to disbelieve, and that as professionals they were outraged by what they perceived to have been the conduct of Dr. Chevrette. I am also of the opinion that based on the arrival of a child weltering in its own blood, they believed themselves duty-bound to pass upon all aspects of the case a judgment at once emotional, harsh and absolute. I do not think they should be open to serious criticism for that, their lack of objectivity being explicable in light of the facts as they believed them to be and the seriousness of the events. I must, however, without ascribing to them any bad faith, much less evil intent, be extremely careful in considering opinions and assessments more categorical and absolute than would appear to be warranted by the evidence, which, I might add, I accept.

On the other hand, Vallerand J. emphasised the credibility of the experts who testified in support of the appellant, Doctors Cossette and Laflèche, writing:

> [TRANSLATION] It now remains to examine the analyses of Cossette and Laflèche, the expert witnesses of the defence.
> I have already indicated that the conduct of both on the stand was exemplary in every way. Likewise their competence in the field of vascular medicine is undeniable, particularly that of Dr. Cossette, who has carried out extensive studies of shock. Their testimony is based on the evidence of Dr. Chevrette -- which evidence, as did the judge, they accept totally, both on the objective question of the events themselves and on the subject of his assessment of the situation, indeed on that of his feelings at the time, and it is for that reason all the stronger and more relevant. While it is true that the Court is not bound by expert opinion, in this instance I unhesitatingly endorse all the conclusions > of Doctors Cossette and Laflèche with respect to the professional conduct of the defendant Chevrette. In fact, those are the very inferences which I myself would have drawn from the evidence as a whole by the application of simple ordinary common sense, without the benefit of the opinions or the teaching of the experts.

He noted specifically with respect to Dr. Laflèche's testimony:

> [TRANSLATION] I will not repeat here the demonstration of that point by Dr. Léo Laflèche, whose experience and qualifications in the field are unquestionable and whose testimony, while unsparing of Dr. Dion, revealed a careful examination of the record and a full understanding of the duties of an expert witness, unblemished by unwholesome professional solidarity.

Similarly, in discussing an opinion expressed by Dr. Cossette, he wrote that [TRANSLATION] "the knowledge, level-headedness and objectivity" of this expert were above reproach.

Finally, the trial judge made it clear that he was fully aware of the medical context of the case. For instance, he explained the nature of Nancy Lapointe's injury and cardiac arrest as it was related to him by the experts called to the stand, and the four-step treatment which a serious haemorrhage requires, as well as the danger of shock and the phenomenon of compensation. His reasoning regarding the respondents' specific allegations was equally meticulous. For example, with respect to the claim of massive blood loss in the ambulance due to an insufficient tourniquet (apparently a major focus at trial but not relied on by the Court of Appeal), Vallerand J. carefully reviewed all of the evidence and lack thereof, noting how and why he drew certain inferences and assessing the credibility of various witnesses.

The Court of Appeal could not ignore these findings, nor should we, in discussing the three issues which form the basis of this appeal and to which I now turn.

(a) The transfer to Sainte-Justine

In dealing with the allegation that the appellant Dr. Chevrette was at fault in deciding to transfer the patient to Sainte-Justine when he did, Vallerand J. first concluded that sooner or later Nancy would have had to be sent to the better-equipped paediatric hospital. He wrote:

> [TRANSLATION] All agree that in order to repair the wound a transfer to Sainte-Justine hospital had to be effected by early evening at the latest. Likewise I accept, without denying the capacity of Le Gardeur hospital in this regard, that Sainte-Justine hospital was in all respects much better able to follow the progression of the apprehended shock and to carry out all the tests required for this purpose and, if necessary, to intervene in the case of heart failure.
> A transfer was thus necessary in the medium term for surgical purposes and advisable in the short term in order to control the blood loss. All that remained to be decided was the time. Dr. Chevrette took into account the distance to be covered, the immediate availability of an ambulance, the duration of the journey, the clinical condition of the patient -- which, in the opinion of Dr. Cossette, whose knowledge, level-headedness and objectivity are beyond reproach, appeared less serious than feared by Dr. Chevrette himself -- and the advantages, the disadvantages and the risks of the transfer, and, having done so, saw fit to proceed with it.

The judge then reviewed the parties' arguments. Dr. Chevrette claimed that he had exercised sound medical judgment, and presented expert evidence in support, while the respondents and their experts maintained that the decision to transfer the patient at that time was irresponsible and medically unsound.

Having previously found that respondents' experts had based their assessment of Dr. Chevrette's conduct on the erroneous information supplied by Dr. Dion, Vallerand J. ruled that their opinion with respect to whether Dr. Chevrette had acted properly in the circumstances was not to be retained. As he observed:

> [TRANSLATION] So according to the plaintiffs' expert witnesses, the transfer was ill-advised, while those of the defence opined that the defendant Chevrette had fully and judiciously assessed the situation and exercised his professional judgment while taking all necessary precautions.
> It is well established in the case law that, when confronted with two generally recognized schools of thought, the Court will not interfere with the reasonable choice of one or the other. Only at first blush, however, does the problem here seem to present itself in that light, for the plaintiffs submit that the defendant simply "got rid" of his patient -- an aspersion on the doctor's integrity, and not merely on his competence, which again, apart from the image of the unconscious child weltering in its own blood, was quite inconsistent with the evidence. The plaintiffs forcefully add in passing that whatever the case may be, there can never be any question of transferring a patient before his circulation has been stabilized, an assertion which the plaintiffs' witness Dr. Blanchard, when pressed a bit harder, found himself forced, with the help of an obvious example, to qualify by speaking of an exercise of judgment based on an assessment of the situation. Accepting as I do this qualification by the plaintiffs' expert and accepting the evidence of the defence experts on this point, I find that the advisability of a transfer at a given time is a matter of professional judgment. But by alleging that Dr. Chevrette "got rid" of his patient, thereby failing to assess the situation and to exercise his judgment, the plaintiffs are contributing only very incidentally to the Court's evaluation of Dr. Chevrette's exercise of judgment.

The trial judge then assessed the conduct of Dr. Chevrette in light of the circumstances of the treatment at Hôpital Le Gardeur as revealed by the evidence and, in particular, by the testimony of the medical experts Doctors Cossette and Laflèche.

Based on Dr. Chevrette's testimony and that of his experts, Vallerand J. found that Dr. Chevrette had exercised proper judgment. His conclusions bear repeating:

> [TRANSLATION] I therefore find that the defendant Chevrette exercised sound judgment after having competently assessed the situation and that he used all reasonable means at his disposal in caring for his patient. That being so, the inevitable conclusion is that he has discharged any burden of proof thrust upon him by the chain of events in question.

In the Court of Appeal, Jacques and LeBel JJ.A. overturned the trial judge on this specific point. While LeBel J.A. focused more specifically on the need for a blood transfusion before the transfer, Jacques J.A. wrote categorically at p. 2629:

> [TRANSLATION] The transfer was not absolutely necessary when it was carried out, nor was it one of the risks inherent in the emergency treatment. It was imposed without adequate justification -- the danger of cerebral anoxia -- when there existed no risk of immediate loss of the limb.
> This decision, unjustified in the circumstances, resulted in Nancy's losing any chance of being healed.

Neither Mailhot nor Beauregard JJ.A. agreed with their colleagues on this aspect of the appeal. They were of the view that the appreciation of expert testimony with regard to professional judgment is the province of the trial judge and that Vallerand J. had not erred in this regard (see pp. 2622 and 2645); Monet J.A. is silent on this issue.

In overturning the findings of the trial judge on this point, neither LeBel nor Jacques JJ.A. made any concrete reference to the expert opinions or to any other evidence presented at trial. With respect, in so doing, they purely and simply substituted their opinion for that of the trial judge in the absence of a determination of any palpable error on his part. Moreover, according to my reading of the evidence, there was ample evidence upon which the trial judge could come to the conclusion that Dr. Chevrette's decision to transfer Nancy was justified. By way of example, the medical expert Dr. Cossette testified as follows (at p. 1221, C.O.A.):

> [TRANSLATION]
> Q.Dr. Cossette, do you think in retrospect that the record demonstrates a real justification for Dr. Chevrette's decision to transfer the patient?
>
> A.Yes.
>
> Q.Would you please elaborate?
> A.As I explained this morning, I think that considering the circumstances and the equipment available as well as Dr. Chevrette's experience, he believed that he had done all within his power and that he had no option but to transfer the child to a place where treatment could be continued and, in my view, that was the correct decision in those circumstances.

Doctors Provost, Laflèche and Laberge also testified that an immediate transfer was sound given the particular circumstances facing Dr. Chevrette at the time, testimony examined meticulously by the trial judge. I fail to see how the Court of Appeal could overturn those findings while not pointing out where the trial judge had misinterpreted the evidence.

(b) The blood transfusion

This issue is closely related to the issue of the transfer from Le Gardeur to Hôpital Sainte-Justine. The respondents contend that the Court of Appeal was right in concluding that the transfusion was essential before Nancy was sent to Sainte-Justine, and that the failure of Dr. Chevrette to proceed to such a transfusion constituted a fault on his part.

In his judgment, Vallerand J. referred to the factors which Dr. Chevrette took into consideration in order to assess Nancy's condition and determine the priorities of treatment. He said:

> [TRANSLATION] On the evidence, the gravity of the case as it presented itself to Dr. Chevrette was indicated by the arterial and therefore probably significant haemorrhage together with the child's pallor, and led to fears, without necessarily demonstrating their existence, of the phenomena of compensation, of vasoconstriction and therefore of apprehended shock. On the other hand, all vital signs were positive. It was thus a question of stemming the haemorrhage, of replacing the lost fluids, of giving blood and, finally, of repairing the wound.

After assessing the evidence quoted above as to why a transfer to Sainte-Justine was required, the trial judge continued:

> [TRANSLATION] He nevertheless had to stop the haemorrhage and replace the volume of lost fluids, which he did. Of course, we now know that it took almost an hour to insert the intravenous tube. And it might be thought that if, during that same hour, the necessary tests had been carried out to identify a compatible blood type, the child could have been sent off with blood instead of intravenous solution and the outcome might have been better. But on the evidence, there was no indication that setting up the intravenous drip would be so difficult and that blood ordered on arrival might perhaps be available even before it could be used. It was reasonable to expect that it would not be available until after the patient's departure and would thus be useless unless the patient was held back, which was judged inadvisable.

In sum, Vallerand J. found that Dr. Chevrette's decision to transfer Nancy to Sainte-Justine immediately, without giving her a blood transfusion, was reasonable.

On appeal, Jacques and LeBel JJ.A. focused particularly on Dr. Chevrette's failure to account for the dynamic evolution of the child's condition, especially the risk of sudden shock, and his failure to discover, by asking either Nancy's parents or the nurses on staff, exactly how much blood she had lost. According to Jacques J.A. at p. 2629:

> [TRANSLATION] Dr. Chevrette's conclusion that he "could not assume a transfusion would later be necessary" is inconsistent with his own premises inasmuch as he did not even attempt to evaluate blood loss although he had observed the existence of a pre-shock condition. He was aware of the deceptiveness of the defence and compensation mechanisms in children and of the dynamic, constantly evolving, nature of shock. These medical facts are uncontroverted.
> It is an established fact that setting up a blood transfusion, that is from the moment a blood sample is taken until the patient actually begins receiving blood, takes from 30 to 45 minutes, whether at Le Gardeur or at Sainte-Justine. It is also established that the wound had to be repaired and circulation restored within no more than five to seven hours. It is also clear that mere compensation by means of fluid replacement had but limited value and was no more than a stopgap.
>
> In these circumstances, blood transfusion was of paramount importance and ought to have preceded repairing the wound in the sequence of emergency care.

Similarly, LeBel J.A. held at p. 2638:

> The plaintiffs do not deny that as a preliminary mesure the injection of a solution such as Rheomacrodex helped replenish fluids in the bloodstream. This treatment did nothing, however, to remedy the pre-shock condition. To get the patient out of this state and to prevent the onset of shock or heart or brain trouble, there was ultimately nothing for it but to inject whole blood. That would, of course, have taken more time, perhaps an hour. The dissection of the vein turned out to be difficult and it was necessary to carry out blood typing. However, this sort of intervention, in which the attending physician could have been assisted by the duty surgeon if the difficulties encountered made it necessary, would have enabled Nancy Lapointe's condition to have been more effectively stabilized before her transfer to Sainte-Justine. The additional delay would have provided sufficient time to proceed with the repairing of the limb. The cardiac arrest at Sainte-Justine hospital and its consequences would thereby likely have been avoided.

> [TRANSLATION] ... because of the instability characteristic of the pre-shock state and given that Dr. Chevrette did not really know the extent of blood loss, although he could have guessed it to be considerable from the nature of the wound, he should have immediately carried out a blood analysis in order to determine the patient's blood group in anticipation of a possible blood transfusion.

It is clear that the reversal of the trial judge's findings on this point did not stem from a disagreement on the proper standard of liability, since none of the appellate court judges stated or even implied that Vallerand J. had misapprehended the legal test. Nor is it apparent that the majority found a palpable and overriding error in law or in the trial judge's findings and conclusions of fact. One must conclude, then, that the appellate court simply disagreed with the lower court's appreciation of the facts, and so substituted its own interpretation.

For example, Vallerand J. indicated that, according to the evidence he found credible, Dr. Chevrette could not have foreseen the time it would take to administer intravenous treatment at Le Gardeur, and hence he could not be blamed for not having ordered blood-typing in the interim. Yet LeBel J.A. held that Dr. Chevrette should have proceeded with blood tests once he realized how long the dissection would take, without indicating where the trial judge had made an error in his assessment of the evidence on this point nor why the Court of Appeal should be entitled to accept the evidence of expert witnesses which the trial judge had found not to be credible.

Similarly, Vallerand J. found as a fact that, in the opinion of credible medical experts, the defendant made a reasonable decision with respect to the transfusion. The majority of the Court of Appeal seems to have simply ignored this finding and, without referring to an error or a disregard by the trial judge of the relevant evidence, held that Dr. Chevrette made a completely irresponsible decision when he chose to order an immediate transfer rather than perform a transfusion at Hôpital Le Gardeur.

My own reading of the evidence indicates that, on this particular point, the trial judge neither ignored nor misapprehended the evidence. While the Court of Appeal focused on Dr. Chevrette's failure to ask Nancy's parents how much blood she had lost before arriving at Le Gardeur, the testimony of the experts found credible by Vallerand J. shows that Dr. Chevrette would have been able to estimate the blood loss based on the patient's vital signs and clinical status (see evidence of Dr. Cossette, at p. 1143 C.O.A.). As well, the child's vital signs, well within the normal range, her state of consciousness and the lack of change in her condition from the time she left Le Gardeur to the time she arrived at Sainte-Justine indicate that her condition had stabilized even in the absence of a blood transfusion, vindicating Dr. Chevrette's decision to make the transfer to the better-equipped hospital right away (see testimony of Dr. Laflèche, at p. 1274 C.O.A.; testimony of Dr Cossette, at pp. 1167-68 C.O.A.).

In my view, the Court of Appeal had no grounds upon which to reverse the findings of the trial judge on this point.

(c) The information transmitted to Sainte-Justine

Although the issue of the information given by Dr. Chevrette to the Hôpital Sainte-Justine does not appear to have been central at trial, it became a focal point in the case before the Court of Appeal.

Vallerand J. disposed of this matter in the following terms:

> [TRANSLATION] That brings me to the second criticism: the defendant Chevrette's alleged failure to fulfil his duty to transmit when the patient was transferred all information required to ensure continuity of treatment. This criticism can be quickly disposed of.
> I find, for the preceding reasons, that it was Dr. Chikhany and not Dr. Dion whom Dr. Chevrette informed of his patient's arrival. I likewise find that he then attempted, albeit not without some difficulty, to provide all relevant information and to bring home to his interlocutor the seriousness of the case. The certificate sent with the patient was admittedly succinct. I adopt however without qualification the opinion of Dr. Laflèche that Dr. Chevrette scarcely had time to write out a certificate and that, as far as he was concerned, it seemed infinitely preferable to give the information orally so > that the two physicians could communicate fully, rather than to scribble a few words on a sheet of paper.

> To conclude on the subject of this criticism, I note that, even supposing it to be valid, it could be directed at both interlocutors, since the obligation to request all necessary information was undoubtedly as important as the duty to provide it, once it is accepted, which it is, that Dr. Chevrette announced the arrival of a patient with a serious arterial haemorrhage.

All of the judges on appeal expressed concern on this point, the majority holding that Dr. Chevrette should have made further attempts to alert the staff at Sainte-Justine to the seriousness of the incoming case once he realized that his initial phone call might not have been effective. Monet J.A. emphasized that, given his doubts about the effectiveness of his phone call, Dr. Chevrette should have taken further steps (at p. 2625):

> [TRANSLATION] It is thus apparent that Dr. Chevrette himself believes that he failed to get the message across to his interlocutor, i.e. that it was a case of extreme urgency, almost of life or death. He hung up, frustrated. Though disappointed with the lack of response on the part of his interlocutor, whom he had not succeeded in making aware of the problem, he did nothing. He made no other call to a head of medical services, to a duty surgeon or even to the head nurse. There was nothing in the way of an S.O.S intended for the medical team at Sainte-Justine, which could have been given to the nurse accompanying the child in the ambulance. And yet that certainly was not the time to spare the feelings of an unknown and phlegmatic interlocutor. Indeed, had Sainte-Justine hospital been sued, it could probably have argued that it was justified in believing that the patient's condition had been stabilized at Le Gardeur hospital even though from the perspective of a non-specialist the case appeared serious.
> That, in my opinion, was a violation of the duty of care.

After reviewing the information which Dr. Chevrette could have sent, Mailhot J.A. concluded at p. 2646:

> [TRANSLATION] It can be imagined that in an emergency situation such as Nancy Lapointe's, the summary of relevant facts ought to have accompanied the child, and the transfer document, while terse, did not, in my view, contain the relevant information. Nothing could be further from my intention than to require a long and complex composition, since, according to the experts, the time factor is important in the case of a five-year-old child in a state of pre-shock, who has experienced considerable blood loss and whose physiological defence mechanisms may suddenly fail, but the relevant information should have appeared on the transfer document.
> Furthermore, I do not believe that I am imposing on Dr. Chevrette an obligation which did not exist in 1975. In my view, a physician whose services have been sought and who, in his professional judgment, decides to send his patient to another institution or another professional, must take the necessary steps to ensure that they are provided with the relevant information essential for the continuation of treatment. This obligation is all the more imperative in a case of emergency and where a child of tender years, having suffered considerable blood loss, is in the aforementioned state of pre-shock.
> Thus, with respect for the opinion of the trial judge, I cannot, as he did, summarily dismiss the criticism levelled against Dr. Chevrette that he failed to pass on all the information required to ensure continuity of treatment. [Emphasis in original.]

For his part, LeBel J.A. found a causal connection between Dr. Chevrette's conduct and the eventual deterioration in Nancy's condition (at p. 2638):

> [TRANSLATION] The conduct of the doctors at Sainte-Justine hospital on the patient's arrival at the outpatient clinic indicates clearly that the immediate urgency of Nancy Lapointe's case was not completely understood. A series of tests and checks, most notably X-rays, were carried out prior to treatment. If Dr. Chevrette had ensured, in his oral or written communications or those relayed by the nurse accompanying Nancy Lapointe, that the necessary information had been passed on and understood, a different approach would likely have been taken at Sainte-Justine hospital. Treatment would have been pursued with greater diligence and a greater sense of the real urgency of the patient's case.

Beauregard J.A., however, wrote on this point at p. 2624:

> [TRANSLATION] I am tempted to conclude that Dr. Chevrette was not particularly careful. But, again, even if that is true, I could not find him liable as the evidence does not establish on the balance of probabilities a causal nexus between the fault I ascribe to Dr. Chevrette for the purposes of this discussion and the fact that the child lapsed into a state of shock.
> Was the shock due to the fact that, at Sainte-Justine, the gravity of the case not being known, too much time was taken in treating the child, or did it stem rather from the fact that, at that hospital, even if the seriousness of the case was known, someone negligently allowed the child to lose much blood? We do not have the answer to this two-part question either and, in my view, the appellants ought to have provided that answer.
> Given our ignorance of the actual events, it is extremely dangerous to give judgment against Dr. Chevrette, with all that entails, when, from the steps taken by the medical authorities at Sainte-Justine upon the child's arrival there, one is inclined to conclude that the gravity of the situation was known. There is in fact serious evidence to suggest that at the very time these steps were being taken there was some inopportune fiddling with the tourniquet.

The majority of the Court of Appeal concluded, therefore, that since Dr. Chevrette's professional obligation included conveying the necessary information to the second hospital, he failed because the telephone conversation with Dr. Chikhany did not alert the latter to the severity of Nancy's condition. In particular, they expressed the view that a lengthier note would have been appropriate.

In reversing the holding of the trial judge on this point, one must assume that the court was well aware that Dr. Chevrette's obligation was one of means, since the court did not indicate that it proceeded from a different legal standard. Neither did the court imply that the trial judge had applied the wrong test. If the Court of Appeal found that the trial judge misread the evidence on this point, it did not indicate the evidence upon which it based its findings, nor the evidence the trial judge misapprehended. The Court of Appeal instead focused uniquely on Dr. Chevrette's testimony, in which he related his doubts about his success in alerting Dr. Chikhany sufficiently to the gravity of the incoming case. The trial judge, however, discussed this point in the context of the whole of the evidence, particularly the expert evidence put before him by Dr. Laflèche, to the effect that a telephone call was a more effective means of communication than a lengthy note in the circumstances.

There is no indication that Vallerand J. had anything less than a full grasp of the evidence on this point, including Chevrette's own testimony, nor that he misapprehended such evidence. His conclusion that Dr. Chevrette had acted diligently in the circumstances is not open to criticism since it is based on such evidence which he found credible. Taken in isolation, Dr. Chevrette's frank discussion of his worries might have had some importance. When considered, however, in the context of all the other evidence, and in view of the findings of credibility by the trial judge, that particular testimony is not determinative. In my view, this finding did not constitute a palpable error since the trial judge based his conclusions on the evidence. The Court of Appeal was not entitled to substitute its opinion for that of the trial judge in such circumstances.

On this point, the evidence clearly shows that the staff at Sainte-Justine were sufficiently alerted to Nancy's condition that they knew it was serious, were expecting her and gave her immediate priority of treatment (see the trial judge's finding on this point). As well, the doctor who spoke on the phone with Dr. Chevrette, Dr. Chikhany, was alerted by the call to the severity of the case sufficiently that he wrote on the admission sheet [TRANSLATION] "significant arterial haemorrhage", critical information that did not appear on the transfer note nor that could be discerned from Nancy's condition on arrival at Sainte-Justine (see p. 915 C.O.A.). The transfer note together with the admission sheet and other documents at Sainte-Justine confirm that the staff appreciated the incoming patient's medical state (see exhibits P-2, P-2A and P-1A). The information on exhibit P-2A, for instance, included the time of Nancy's accident, a detail which Mailhot J.A., with respect, mistakenly used as an example of the sort of information which Dr. Chevrette should have communicated, but failed to communicate, to Sainte-Justine. It must be borne in mind that the events at Sainte-Justine following Nancy's arrival were difficult to assess on the evidence given Vallerand J.'s finding that Dr. Dion, the doctor on call at emergency, was not a credible witness. Finally, expert evidence at trial revealed that the information, which the majority of the Court of Appeal reproached Dr. Chevrette for not sending, typically should have been double-checked by the staff at Sainte-Justine after Nancy's arrival (see the testimony of Dr. Provost at pp. 1051-52 C.O.A. and of Dr. Laflèche at p. 1295 C.O.A.).

In my view, there was no ground for the Court of Appeal to reverse the trial judge's findings on this point.

Conclusions

For the above reasons, I must conclude that the Court of Appeal was wrong in reversing the trial judge's findings and conclusions of fact in the absence of a palpable error on the part of the trial judge. Accordingly, the appeal must be allowed, the motion by the respondents to modify the Court of Appeal's conclusions dismissed, the Court of Appeal judgment reversed and the judgment of Vallerand J. at trial restored.

I cannot leave this matter, however, without expressing great sympathy for Nancy's tragic fate as a result of this accident and for the pain and suffering imposed upon her parents since then. Guided by sympathy alone, my task here would have been much easier. As a judge, however, I must uphold the law and sympathy is a poor guide in such matters. Justice according to law is the only guide and justice must work for both parties engaged in litigation, plaintiffs as well as defendants.

It is also deeply regrettable that this case, arising from an accident which occurred in 1975, took so long to come to its final resolution through, I understand, no fault of the respondents nor, for that matter, of the appellant.

Under the circumstances of this case, I would order that the appeal be allowed without costs throughout.

Appellants, all duly qualified medical practitioners, set up a clinic to perform abortions upon women who had not obtained a certificate from a therapeutic abortion committee of an accredited or approved hospital as required by s. 251(4) of the Criminal Code. The doctors had made public statements questioning the wisdom of the abortion laws in Canada and asserting that a woman has an unfettered right to choose whether or not an abortion is appropriate in her individual circumstances. Indictments were preferred against the appellants charging that they had conspired with each other with intent to procure abortions contrary to ss. 423(1)(d) and 251(1) of the Criminal Code.

Counsel for the appellants moved to quash the indictment or to stay the proceedings before pleas were entered on the grounds that s. 251 of the Criminal Code was ultra vires the Parliament of Canada, in that it infringed ss. 2(a), 7 and 12 of the Charter, and was inconsistent with s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. The trial judge dismissed the motion, and the Ontario Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal from that decision. The trial proceeded before a judge sitting with a jury, and the three accused were acquitted. The Crown appealed the acquittal and the appellants filed a cross-appeal. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, set aside the acquittal and ordered a new trial. The Court held that the cross-appeal related to issues already raised in the appeal, and the issues, therefore, were examined as part of the appeal.

The Court stated the following constitutional questions:

1. Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2(a), 7, 12, 15, 27 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

2. If section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada infringes or denies the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2(a), 7, 12, 15, 27 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is s. 251 justified by s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?

peut-elle être justifiée dans une société libre et démocratique?

Droit criminel — Jury — Exposé au jury lui conseillant d'ignorer les règles de droit énoncées par le juge — Erreur de l'avocat.

Les appelants sont tous docteurs en médecine; ensemble, ils ont ouvert une clinique pour pratiquer des avortements sur des femmes qui n'avaient pas obtenu le certificat du comité de l'avortement thérapeutique d'un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé requis par le par. 251(4) du Code criminel. Les médecins ont fait des déclarations publiques dans lesquelles ils ont mis en doute la sagesse de la législation canadienne sur l'avortement et ont affirmé qu'une femme a le droit souverain de décider si un avortement s'impose ou non dans sa situation personnelle. Des actes d'accusation ont été portés contre les appelants les inculpant de complot, les uns avec les autres, avec l'intention de procurer des avortements, infractions prévues à l'al. 423(1)d) et au par. 251(1) du Code criminel.

L'avocat des appelants a demandé l'annulation de l'acte d'accusation ou la suspension des poursuites avant d'inscrire les plaidoyers, pour le motif que l'art. 251 du Code criminel excéderait les pouvoirs du Parlement du Canada, enfreindrait l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7 et 12 de la Charte et entrerait en conflit avec l'al. 1*b*) de la Déclaration canadienne des droits. Le juge de première instance a rejeté la requête et l'appel interjeté à la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a aussi été rejeté. Le procès s'est poursuivi devant juge et jury et les trois accusés ont été acquittés. Le ministère public a interjeté appel de l'acquittement et les appelants ont formé un appel incident. La Cour d'appel a accueilli l'appel, annulé le verdict d'acquittement et ordonné un nouveau procès. La Cour a jugé que l'appel incident se rapportait à des points déjà soulevés dans l'appel principal et on les a donc étudiés dans le cadre de ce dernier.

1. L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada porte-t-il atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7, 12, 15, 27 et 28 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

2. Si l'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada porte atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7, 12, 15, 27 et 28 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, est-il justifié par l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et donc compatible avec la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982?

3. Is section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada ultra vires the Parliament of Canada?

4. Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada violate s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867?

5. Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada unlawfully delegate federal criminal power to provincial Ministers of Health or Therapeutic Abortion Committees, and in doing so, has the Federal Government abdicated its authority in this area?

6. Do sections 605 and 610(3) of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 7, 11(d), 11(f), 11(h) and 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

7. If sections 605 and 610(3) of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 7, 11(d) 11(f), 11(h) and 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, are ss. 605 and 610(3) justified by s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?

Held (McIntyre and La Forest JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the acquittals restored. The first constitutional question should be answered in the affirmative as regards s. 7 and the second in the negative as regards s. 7. The third, fourth and fifth constitutional questions should be answered in the negative. The sixth constitutional question should be answered in the negative with respect to s. 605 of the Criminal Code and should not be answered as regards s. 610(3). The seventh constitutional question should not be answered.

Per Dickson C.J. and Lamer J.: Section 7 of the Charter requires that the courts review the substance of legislation once the legislation has been determined to infringe an individual's right to "life, liberty and security of the person". Those interests may only be impaired if the principles of fundamental justice are respected. It was sufficient here to investigate whether or not the impugned legislative provisions met the procedural standards of fundamental justice and the Court accordingly did not need to tread the fine line between substantive review and the adjudication of public policy.

State interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress, at least in the criminal law context, constitutes a breach of security of the person. Section 251 clearly interferes with a woman's physical and bodily integrity. Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference

3. L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada excède-t-il les pouvoirs du Parlement du Canada?

4. L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada viole-t-il l'art. 96 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867?

5. L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada délègue-t-il illégalement la compétence fédérale en matière criminelle aux ministres de la Santé provinciaux ou aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique et, ce faisant, le gouvernement fédéral a-t-il abdiqué son autorité dans ce domaine?

6. L'article 605 et le par. 610(3) du Code criminel du Canada portent-ils atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'art. 7, les al. 11*d*), 11*f*), 11*h*) et le par. 24(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

7. Si l'article 605 et le par. 610(3) du Code criminel du Canada portent atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'art. 7, les al. 11*d*), 11*f*), 11*h*) et le par. 24(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, sont-ils justifiés par l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et donc compatibles avec la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982?

Arrêt (les juges McIntyre et La Forest sont dissidents): Le pourvoi est accueilli et les acquittements sont rétablis. La première question constitutionnelle reçoit une réponse affirmative en ce qui concerne l'art. 7 et la deuxième question une réponse négative en ce qui concerne l'art. 7. Les troisième, quatrième et cinquième questions reçoivent une réponse négative. La sixième question reçoit une réponse négative en ce qui concerne l'art. 605 du Code criminel et ne reçoit aucune réponse en ce qui concerne le par. 610(3). Il n'est pas nécessaire de répondre à la septième question.

Le juge en chef Dickson et le juge Lamer: L'article 7 de la Charte impose aux tribunaux le devoir d'examiner, au fond, les textes législatifs une fois qu'il a été jugé qu'ils enfreignent le droit de l'individu «à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne». Il ne peut être porté atteinte à ces intérêts que si les principes de justice fondamentale sont respectés. Il suffit en l'espèce d'examiner si les dispositions législatives en cause sont conformes aux normes procédurales de justice fondamentale et il n'est donc pas nécessaire que la Cour touche à l'équilibre fragile entre examen du fond et décision de politiques générales.

L'atteinte que l'État porte à l'intégrité physique et la tension psychologique causée par l'État, du moins dans le contexte du droit criminel, constituent une violation de la sécurité de la personne. L'article 251 constitue clairement une atteinte à l'intégrité physique et émotionnelle d'une femme. Forcer une femme, sous la menace d'une sanction criminelle, à mener le fœtus à terme, à moins qu'elle ne remplisse certains critères indépendants with a woman's body and thus an infringement of security of the person. A second breach of the right to security of the person occurs independently as a result of the delay in obtaining therapeutic abortions caused by the mandatory procedures of s. 251 which results in a higher probability of complications and greater risk. The harm to the psychological integrity of women seeking abortions was also clearly established.

Any infringement of the right to life, liberty and security of the person must comport with the principles of fundamental justice. These principles are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system. One of the basic tenets of our system of criminal justice is that when Parliament creates a defence to a criminal charge, the defence should not be illusory or so difficult to attain as to be practically illusory.

The procedure and restrictions stipulated in s. 251 for access to therapeutic abortions make the defence illusory resulting in a failure to comply with the principles of fundamental justice. A therapeutic abortion may be approved by a "therapeutic abortion committee" of an "accredited or approved hospital". The requirement of s. 251(4) that at least four physicians be available at that hospital to authorize and to perform an abortion in practice makes abortions unavailable in many hospitals. The restrictions attaching to the term "accredited" automatically disqualifies many Canadian hospitals from undertaking therapeutic abortions. The provincial approval of a hospital for the purpose of performing therapeutic abortions further restricts the number of hospitals offering this procedure. Even if a hospital is eligible to create a therapeutic abortion committee, there is no requirement in s. 251 that the hospital need do so. Provincial regulation as well can heavily restrict or even deny the practical availability of the exculpatory provisions of s. 251(4).

The administrative system established in s. 251(4) fails to provide an adequate standard for therapeutic abortion committees which must determine when a therapeutic abortion should, as a matter of law, be granted. The word "health" is vague and no adequate guidelines have been established for therapeutic abortion committees. It is typically impossible for women to know in advance what standard of health will be applied by any given committee.

The argument that women facing difficulties in obtaining abortions at home can simply travel elsewhere would not be especially troubling if those difficulties de ses propres priorités et aspirations, est une ingérence profonde à l'égard de son corps et donc une atteinte à la sécurité de sa personne. Une deuxième violation du droit à la sécurité de la personne se produit indépendamment par suite du retard à obtenir un avortement thérapeutique en raison de la procédure imposée par l'art. 251 qui entraîne une augmentation de la probabilité de complications et accroît les risques. Il a été clairement établi que l'art. 251 porte atteinte à l'intégrité psychologique des femmes voulant un avortement.

Toute atteinte au droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne doit être en accord avec les principes de justice fondamentale. On trouve ces principes dans les préceptes fondamentaux de notre système juridique. L'un des préceptes fondamentaux de notre système de justice criminelle est que, lorsque le Parlement crée une défense à l'égard d'une accusation criminelle, celle-ci ne doit être ni illusoire ni à ce point difficile à faire valoir qu'elle soit pratiquement illusoire.

La procédure et les restrictions établies par l'art. 251 pour avoir droit à un avortement rendent la défense illusoire et reviennent au non-respect des principes de justice fondamentale. Un avortement thérapeutique doit être approuvé par un «comité de l'avortement thérapeutique» d'un hôpital «accrédité ou approuvé». L'obligation du par. 251(4) qu'au moins quatre médecins soient disponibles dans cet hôpital pour autoriser et pratiquer un avortement, signifie en pratique que beaucoup d'hôpitaux ne peuvent pas pratiquer des avortements. Les restrictions découlant du terme «accrédité» interdisent automatiquement à un grand nombre d'hôpitaux canadiens de pratiquer des avortements thérapeutiques. L'accréditation provinciale d'un hôpital aux fins de pratiquer des avortements thérapeutiques restreint encore plus le nombre d'hôpitaux où on peut les pratiquer. Même si un hôpital est autorisé à former un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique, rien dans l'art. 251 ne l'oblige à le faire. La réglementation provinciale peut fortement limiter et même supprimer le recours en pratique aux dispositions disculpatoires du par. 251(4).

Le système administratif établi par le par. 251(4) n'offre pas de norme adéquate à laquelle les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique doivent se référer lorsqu'ils ont à décider si un avortement thérapeutique devrait, en droit, être autorisé. Le terme «santé» est vague et aucunes directives adéquates n'ont été établies pour les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique. Il est, en général, impossible que les femmes sachent à l'avance quelle norme de santé un comité donné appliquera.

L'argument voulant que les femmes qui éprouvent des difficultés à se faire avorter au lieu de leur domicile n'ont qu'à se rendre ailleurs ne serait pas spécialement were not in large measure created by the procedural requirements of s. 251. The evidence established convincingly that it is the law itself which in many ways prevents access to local therapeutic abortion facilities.

Section 251 cannot be saved under s. 1 of the Charter. The objective of s. 251 as a whole, namely to balance the competing interests identified by Parliament, is sufficiently important to pass the first stage of the s. 1 inquiry. The means chosen to advance its legislative objectives, however, are not reasonable or demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. None of the three elements for assessing the proportionality of means to ends is met. Firstly, the procedures and administrative structures created by s. 251 are often unfair and arbitrary. Moreover, these procedures impair s. 7 rights far more than is necessary because they hold out an illusory defence to many women who would prima facie qualify under the exculpatory provisions of s. 251(4). Finally, the effects of the limitation upon the s. 7 rights of many pregnant women are out of proportion to the objective sought to be achieved and may actually defeat the objective of protecting the life and health of women.

Per Beetz and Estey JJ.: Before the advent of the Charter, Parliament recognized, in adopting s. 251(4) of the Criminal Code, that the interest in the life or health of the pregnant woman takes precedence over the interest in prohibiting abortions, including the interest of the state in the protection of the foetus, when "the continuation of the pregnancy of such female person would or would be likely to endanger her life or health". This standard in s. 251(4) became entrenched at least as a minimum when the "right to life, liberty and security of the person" was enshrined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms at s. 7.

"Security of the person" within the meaning of s. 7 of the Charter must include a right of access to medical treatment for a condition representing a danger to life or health without fear of criminal sanction. If an act of Parliament forces a pregnant woman whose life or health is in danger to choose between, on the one hand, the commission of a crime to obtain effective and timely medical treatment and, on the other hand, inadequate treatment or no treatment at all, her right to security of the person has been violated.

gênant si ces difficultés ne résultaient pas dans une large mesure des exigences de procédure de l'art. 251. La preuve établit de façon convaincante que c'est la loi elle-même qui, de bien des manières, empêche de s'adresser aux institutions locales offrant l'avortement thérapeutique.

L'article 251 ne peut être sauvé par l'article premier de la Charte. L'objectif de l'art. 251 dans son ensemble, soit d'équilibrer les intérêts en concurrence identifiés par le Parlement, est suffisamment important pour passer le premier stade de l'examen au regard de l'article premier. Les moyens choisis pour mettre en œuvre ces objectifs législatifs ne sont pas raisonnables et leur justification ne peut se démontrer dans une société libre et démocratique. On ne trouve aucun des trois éléments permettant d'évaluer la proportionnalité des moyens et de la fin. Premièrement, la procédure et les structures administratives instaurées par l'art. 251 sont souvent arbitraires et injustes. En outre, ces procédures portent atteinte aux droits garantis par l'art. 7 au-delà de ce qui est nécessaire, puisqu'elle ne fournit qu'une défense illusoire à nombre de femmes qui, prima facie, pourraient se prévaloir des dispositions disculpatoires du par. 251(4). Enfin, les effets de la limitation des droits garantis par l'art. 7, pour nombre de femmes enceintes, sont disproportionnés par rapport à l'objectif recherché et peuvent effectivement mettre en échec l'objectif de protection de la vie et de la santé des femmes.

Les juges Beetz et Estey: Avant l'avènement de la Charte, le Parlement a reconnu, en adoptant le par. 251(4) du Code criminel, que l'intérêt que représente la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte l'emporte sur celui qu'il y a à interdire les avortements, y compris l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus, lorsque «la continuation de la grossesse de cette personne du sexe féminin mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de cette dernière». Ce critère du par. 251(4) a été consacré, au moins comme minimum, lorsque le «droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne» a été enchâssé dans la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, à l'art. 7.

L'expression «sécurité de la personne», au sens de l'art. 7 de la Charte, doit inclure le droit au traitement médical d'un état dangereux pour la vie ou la santé, sans menace de répression pénale. Si une loi du Parlement force une femme enceinte dont la vie ou la santé est en danger à choisir entre, d'une part, la perpétration d'un crime pour obtenir un traitement médical efficace en temps opportun et, d'autre part, un traitement inadéquat, voire aucun traitement, son droit à la sécurité de sa personne a été violé.

According to the evidence, the procedural requirements of s. 251 of the Criminal Code significantly delay pregnant women's access to medical treatment resulting in an additional danger to their health, thereby depriving them of their right to security of the person. This deprivation does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice. While Parliament is justified in requiring a reliable, independent and medically sound opinion as to the "life or health" of the pregnant woman in order to protect the state interest in the foetus, and while any such statutory mechanism will inevitably result in some delay, certain of the procedural requirements of s. 251 of the Criminal Code are nevertheless manifestly unfair. These requirements are manifestly unfair in that they are unnecessary in respect of Parliament's objectives in establishing the administrative structure and in that they result in additional risks to the health of pregnant women.

The following statutory requirements contribute to the manifest unfairness of the administrative structure imposed by the Criminal Code: (1) the requirement that all therapeutic abortions must take place in an "accredited" or "approved" hospital as defined in s. 251(6); (2) the requirement that the committee come from the accredited or approved hospital in which the abortion is to be performed; (3) the provision that allows hospital boards to increase the number of members of a committee; (4) the requirement that all physicians who practise lawful therapeutic abortions be excluded from the committees.

The primary objective of s. 251 of the Criminal Code is the protection of the foetus. The protection of the life and health of the pregnant woman is an ancillary objective. The primary objective does relate to concerns which are pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society and which, pursuant to s. 1 of the Charter, justify reasonable limits to be put on a woman's right. However, the means chosen in s. 251 are not reasonable and demonstrably justified. The rules unnecessary in respect of the primary and ancillary objectives which they are designed to serve, such as the above-mentioned rules contained in s. 251, cannot be said to be rationally connected to these objectives under s. 1 of the Charter. Consequently, s. 251 does not constitute a reasonable limit to the security of the person.

It is not necessary to answer the question concerning the circumstances in which there is a proportionality between the effects of s. 251 which limit the right of pregnant women to security of the person and the D'après la preuve soumise, les exigences procédurales de l'art. 251 du Code criminel ont pour effet de retarder considérablement l'obtention par les femmes enceintes d'un traitement médical, ce qui cause un danger additionnel pour leur santé et porte atteinte, par le fait même, à leur droit à la sécurité de leur personne. Cette atteinte n'est pas compatible avec les principes de justice fondamentale. Quoique le Parlement soit justifié d'exiger une opinion médicale éclairée, indépendante et fiable relativement à la vie ou à la santé de la femme enceinte pour protéger l'intérêt qu'a l'État à l'égard du fœtus et quoiqu'un tel dispositif législatif entraîne inévitablement des délais, certaines des exigences procédurales de l'art. 251 du Code criminel sont néanmoins nettement injustes. Ces exigences sont nettement injustes en ce sens qu'elles sont inutiles au regard des objectifs poursuivis par le Parlement en établissant la structure administrative et qu'elles entraînent des risques additionnels pour la santé des femmes enceintes.

Les exigences législatives suivantes rendent nettement injuste la structure administrative imposée par le Code criminel: (1) l'obligation que tous les avortements thérapeutiques soient pratiqués dans des hôpitaux «accrédités» ou «approuvés» selon la définition du par. 251(6); (2) l'obligation que le comité provienne de l'hôpital accrédité ou approuvé où l'avortement doit être pratiqué; (3) la disposition qui autorise un conseil d'hôpital à augmenter le nombre de membres d'un comité; (4) l'exclusion du sein de ces comités de tous les médecins qui pratiquent des avortements thérapeutiques licites.

L'objectif premier de l'art. 251 du Code criminel est la protection du fœtus. La protection de la vie et de la santé de la femme enceinte est un objectif secondaire. L'objectif premier, celui de la protection du fœtus, touche effectivement à des questions qui sont urgentes et importantes dans une société libre et démocratique et qui, conformément à l'article premier de la Charte, justifient que des limites raisonnables soient imposées au droit d'une femme. Toutefois, les moyens choisis par l'art. 251 ne sont pas raisonnables et leur justification ne peut être démontrée. On ne peut dire que les règles inutiles aux fins des objectifs premier et secondaire qu'elles sont censées appuyer, comme les règles susmentionnées de l'art. 251, ont un lien rationnel avec ces objectifs aux termes de l'article premier de la Charte. Par conséquent, l'art. 251 ne constitue pas une limite raisonnable à la sécurité de la personne.

Il n'est pas nécessaire de répondre à la question relative aux circonstances dans lesquelles il y a proportionnalité entre les effets de l'art. 251 qui limite le droit des femmes enceintes à la sécurité de leur personne et objective of the protection of the foetus. In any event, the objective of protecting the foetus would not justify the severity of the breach of pregnant women's right to security of the person which would result if the exculpatory provision of s. 251 was completely removed from the Criminal Code. However, it is possible that a future enactment by Parliament that would require a higher degree of danger to health in the latter months of pregnancy, as opposed to the early months, for an abortion to be lawful, could achieve a proportionality which would be acceptable under s. 1 of the Charter.

Given the conclusion that s. 251 contains rules unnecessary to the protection of the foetus, the question as to whether a foetus is included in the word "everyone" in s. 7, so as to have a right to "life, liberty and security of the person" under the Charter, need not be decided.

Section 251 is not colourable provincial legislation in relation to health but rather a proper exercise of Parliament's criminal law power pursuant to s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The section does not offend s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 because the therapeutic abortion committees are not given judicial powers which were exercised by county, district and superior courts at the time of Confederation. These committees exercise a medical judgment on a medical question. Finally, s. 251 does not constitute an unlawful delegation of federal legislative power nor does it represent an abdication of the criminal law power by Parliament.

There is no merit in the argument based on s. 605(1)(a) of the Criminal Code. It is unnecessary to decide whether or not s. 610(3) of the Criminal Code violates ss. 7, 11(d), (f), (h) and 15 of the Charter or whether this Court has the power to award costs on appeals under s. 24(1) of the Charter. Whatever this Court's power to award costs in appeals such as this one, costs should not be awarded in this case.

Per Wilson J.: Section 251 of the Criminal Code, which limits the pregnant woman's access to abortion, violates her right to life, liberty and security of the person within the meaning of s. 7 of the Charter in a way which does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice.

The right to "liberty" contained in s. 7 guarantees to every individual a degree of personal autonomy over important decisions intimately affecting his or her pri-l'objectif de la protection du fœtus. De toute façon, l'objectif de la protection du fœtus ne justifierait pas la gravité de la violation du droit des femmes enceintes à la sécurité de leur personne qui se produirait si la disposition disculpatoire de l'art. 251 était totalement exclue du Code criminel. Toutefois, il est possible qu'une loi éventuelle adoptée par le Parlement qui imposerait que la santé soit plus gravement menacée dans les derniers mois de la grossesse que dans les premiers mois pour qu'un avortement soit licite, pourrait atteindre un degré de proportionnalité acceptable aux termes de l'article premier de la Charte.

Vu la conclusion que l'art. 251 contient des règles inutiles pour la protection du fœtus, il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si un fœtus est visé par le mot «chacun» à l'art. 7 de la Charte de façon à avoir le droit «à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne» en vertu de la Charte.

L'article 251 n'est pas un texte législatif provincial déguisé relatif à la santé, mais il constitue plutôt un exercice valide de la compétence du Parlement en matière de droit criminel conformément au par. 91(27) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867. L'article n'enfreint pas l'art. 96 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 parce qu'il ne donne pas aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique les pouvoirs judiciaires que les cours de comté, de district et supérieures exerçaient au moment de la Confédération. Ces comités portent un jugement médical sur une question médicale. Enfin, l'art. 251 ne constitue pas une délégation illégale d'un pouvoir législatif fédéral et ne représente pas non plus une renonciation du Parlement à son pouvoir en matière de droit criminel.

L'argument fondé sur l'al. 605(1)a) du Code criminel est mal fondé. Il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si le par. 610(3) du Code criminel viole l'art. 7 et les al. 11*d*), f), h) et l'art. 15 de la Charte ni si cette Cour a le pouvoir d'accorder des dépens lors d'un pourvoi en vertu du par. 24(1) de la Charte. Quel que soit le pouvoir de cette Cour d'accorder des dépens dans des pourvois comme celui-ci, aucuns dépens ne devraient être accordés en l'espèce.

Le juge Wilson: L'article 251 du Code criminel, qui limite le recours d'une femme enceinte à l'avortement, viole son droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne au sens de l'art. 7 de la Charte d'une façon qui n'est pas conforme avec les principes de justice fondamentale.

Le droit à la «liberté» énoncé à l'art. 7 garantit à chaque individu une marge d'autonomie personnelle sur les décisions importantes touchant intimement à sa vie vate life. Liberty in a free and democratic society does not require the state to approve such decisions but it does require the state to respect them.

A woman's decision to terminate her pregnancy falls within this class of protected decisions. It is one that will have profound psychological, economic and social consequences for her. It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision; it is a profound social and ethical one as well.

Section 251 of the Criminal Code takes a personal and private decision away from the woman and gives it to a committee which bases its decision on "criteria entirely unrelated to [the pregnant woman's] own priorities and aspirations".

Section 251 also deprives a pregnant woman of her right to security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter. This right protects both the physical and psychological integrity of the individual. Section 251 is more deeply flawed than just subjecting women to considerable emotional stress and unnecessary physical risk. It asserts that the woman's capacity to reproduce is to be subject, not to her own control, but to that of the state. This is a direct interference with the woman's physical "person".

This violation of s. 7 does not accord with either procedural fairness or with the fundamental rights and freedoms laid down elsewhere in the Charter. A deprivation of the s. 7 right which has the effect of infringing a right guaranteed elsewhere in the Charter cannot be in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

The deprivation of the s. 7 right in this case offends freedom of conscience guaranteed in s. 2(a) of the Charter. The decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy is essentially a moral decision and in a free and democratic society the conscience of the individual must be paramount to that of the state. Indeed, s. 2(a) makes it clear that this freedom belongs to each of us individually. "Freedom of conscience and religion" should be broadly construed to extend to conscientiously-held beliefs, whether grounded in religion or in a secular morality and the terms "conscience" and "religion" should not be treated as tautologous if capable of independent, although related, meaning. The state here is endorsing one conscientiously-held view at the expense of another. It is denying freedom of conscience to some, treating them as means to an end, depriving them of their "essential humanity".

privée. La liberté, dans une société libre et démocratique, n'oblige pas l'État à approuver ces décisions, mais elle l'oblige cependant à les respecter.

La décision que prend une femme d'interrompre sa grossesse relève de cette catégorie de décisions protégées. Cette décision aura des conséquences psychologiques, économiques et sociales profondes pour la femme enceinte. C'est une décision qui reflète profondément l'opinion qu'une femme a d'elle-même, ses rapports avec les autres et avec la société en général. Ce n'est pas seulement une décision d'ordre médical; elle est aussi profondément d'ordre social et éthique.

L'article 251 du Code criminel enlève une décision personnelle et privée à la femme pour la confier à un comité qui fonde sa décision sur "des critères totalement sans rapport avec ses [celles de la femme enceinte] propres priorités et aspirations".

L'article 251 prive également une femme enceinte du droit à la «sécurité de sa personne» garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte. Ce droit protège à la fois l'intégrité physique et psychologique de la personne. Le défaut de l'art. 251 est beaucoup plus profond qu'un simple assujettissement des femmes à une tension émotionnelle considérable et à un risque physique inutile. Il affirme que la capacité de reproduction de la femme ne doit pas être soumise à son propre contrôle, mais à celui de l'État. C'est aussi une atteinte directe à sa «personne» physique.

Cette violation du droit conféré par l'art. 7 n'est conforme ni à l'équité dans la procédure ni aux droits et libertés fondamentaux énoncés par ailleurs dans la Charte. Une atteinte au droit conféré par l'art. 7 qui a pour effet d'enfreindre un droit que garantit par ailleurs la Charte ne peut être conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

L'atteinte au droit conféré par l'art. 7 en l'espèce enfreint la liberté de conscience garantie par l'al. 2*a*) de la Charte. La décision d'interrompre ou non une grossesse est essentiellement une décision morale et, dans une société libre et démocratique, la conscience de l'individu doit primer sur celle de l'État. D'ailleurs l'al. 2*a*) dit clairement que cette liberté appartient à chacun de nous pris individuellement. La «liberté de conscience et de religion» devrait être interprétée largement et s'étendre aux croyances dictées par la conscience, qu'elles soient fondées sur la religion ou sur une morale laïque et les termes «conscience» et «religion» ne devraient pas être considérés comme tautologiques quand ils peuvent avoir un sens distinct, quoique relié. L'État épouse en l'espèce une opinion dictée par la conscience des uns aux dépens d'une autre. Il nie la liberté de conscience à certains, en les traitant comme un moyen pour une fin, en les privant de «l'essence de leur humanité».

The primary objective of the impugned legislation is the protection of the foetus. This is a perfectly valid legislative objective. It has other ancillary objectives, such as the protection of the life and health of the pregnant woman and the maintenance of proper medical standards.

The situation respecting a woman's right to control her own person becomes more complex when she becomes pregnant, and some statutory control may be appropriate. Section 1 of the Charter authorizes reasonable limits to be put upon the woman's right having regard to the fact of the developing foetus within her body.

The value to be placed on the foetus as potential life is directly related to the stage of its development during gestation. The undeveloped foetus starts out as a newly fertilized ovum; the fully developed foetus emerges ultimately as an infant. A developmental progression takes place between these two extremes and it has a direct bearing on the value of the foetus as potential life. Accordingly, the foetus should be viewed in differential and developmental terms. This view of the foetus supports a permissive approach to abortion in the early stages where the woman's autonomy would be absolute and a restrictive approach in the later stages where the states's interest in protecting the foetus would justify its prescribing conditions. The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes "compelling" should be left to the informed judgment of the legislature which is in a position to receive submissions on the subject from all the relevant disciplines.

Section 251 of the Criminal Code cannot be saved under s. 1 of the Charter. It takes the decision away from the woman at all stages of her pregnancy and completely denies, as opposed to limits, her right under s. 7. Section 251 cannot meet the proportionality test; it is not sufficiently tailored to the objective; it does not impair the woman's right "as little as possible". Accordingly, even if s. 251 were to be amended to remedy the procedural defects in the legislative scheme, it would still not be constitutionally valid.

The question whether a foetus is covered by the word "everyone" in s. 7 so as to have an independent right to life under that section was not dealt with.

Per McIntyre and La Forest JJ. (dissenting): Save for the provisions of the Criminal Code permitting abortion where the life or health of the woman is at risk, no right of abortion can be found in Canadian law, custom or tradition and the Charter, including s. 7, does not create L'objectif premier de la loi contestée est la protection du fœtus. C'est un objectif législatif parfaitement valide. Elle a d'autres objectifs secondaires, telle la protection de la vie et de la santé de la femme enceinte et le maintien de normes médicales appropriées.

La situation en ce qui a trait au droit d'une femme d'être maîtresse de sa propre personne se complique lorsqu'elle devient enceinte et qu'un certain contrôle de la loi peut être approprié. L'article premier de la Charte permet de fixer des limites raisonnables au droit de la femme compte tenu du fœtus qui se développe dans son corps.

La valeur attribuée au fœtus en tant que vie potentielle est directement reliée au stade de son développement au cours de la grossesse. Le fœtus au stade embryonnaire provient d'un ovule nouvellement fécondé; le fœtus totalement développé devient en définitive un nouveau-né. Le développement progresse entre ces deux extrêmes et il influe directement sur la valeur à attribuer au fœtus en tant que vie potentielle. On devrait donc considérer le fœtus en termes de développement et de phases. Cette conception du fœtus appuie une approche permissive de l'avortement dans les premiers stades de la grossesse, où l'autonomie de la femme serait absolue, et une approche restrictive dans les derniers stades, où l'intérêt qu'a l'État de protéger le fœtus justifierait l'imposition de conditions. Le point précis du développement du fœtus où l'intérêt qu'a l'État de le protéger devient "supérieur" relève du jugement éclairé du législateur, qui est en mesure de recevoir des avis à ce sujet de l'ensemble des disciplines pertinentes.

L'article 251 du Code criminel ne peut être sauvé par l'article premier de la Charte. Il enlève la décision à la femme à tous les stades de la grossesse et nie complètement au lieu de simplement limiter son droit garanti par l'art. 7. L'article 251 ne saurait répondre aux critères de la proportionnalité: il n'est pas suffisamment adapté à l'objectif et ne porte pas «le moins possible» atteinte au droit de la femme. Par conséquent, même si l'art. 251 devait être modifié pour remédier aux vices de procédure de la structure législative, il demeurerait inconstitutionnel.

La question de savoir si le terme «chacun», à l'art. 7, vise aussi le fœtus et lui confère un droit indépendant à la vie en vertu de cet article n'a pas été traitée.

Les juges McIntyre et La Forest (dissidents): À part les dispositions du Code criminel qui autorisent l'avortement lorsque la vie ou la santé de la femme est en danger, il n'existe aucun droit à l'avortement en droit canadien ou selon la coutume ou la tradition canadien-such a right. Section 251 of the Criminal Code accordingly does not violate s. 7 of the Charter.

The power of judicial review of legislation, although given greater scope under the Charter, is not unlimited. The courts must confine themselves to such democratic values as are clearly expressed in the Charter and refrain from imposing or creating rights with no identifiable base in the Charter. The Court is not entitled to define a right in a manner unrelated to the interest that the right in question was meant to protect.

The infringement of a right such as the right to security of the person will occur only when legislation goes beyond interfering with priorities and aspirations and abridges rights included in or protected by the concept. The proposition that women enjoy a constitutional right to have an abortion is devoid of support in either the language, structure or history of the constitutional text, in constitutional tradition, or in the history, traditions or underlying philosophies of our society.

Historically, there has always been a clear recognition of a public interest in the protection of the unborn and there is no evidence or indication of general acceptance of the concept of abortion at will in our society. The interpretive approach to the Charter adopted by this Court affords no support for the entrenchment of a constitutional right of abortion.

As to the asserted right to be free from state interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress, an invasion of the s. 7 right of security of the person, there would have to be more than state-imposed stress or strain. A breach of the right would have to be based upon an infringement of some interest which would be of such nature and such importance as to warrant constitutional protection. This would be limited to cases where the state-action complained of, in addition to imposing stress and strain, also infringed another right, freedom or interest which was deserving of protection under the concept of security of the person. Abortion is not such an interest. Even if a general right to have an abortion could be found under s. 7, the extent to which such right could be said to be infringed by the requirements of s. 251 of the Code was not clearly shown.

A defence created by Parliament could only be said to be illusory or practically so when the defence is not available in the circumstances in which it is held out as nes, et la Charte, y compris l'art. 7, ne crée pas un tel droit. L'article 251 du Code criminel ne viole donc pas l'art. 7 de la Charte.

Le pouvoir d'exercer un contrôle judiciaire sur les lois, qui a pris de l'envergure aux termes de la Charte, n'est pas illimité. Les tribunaux doivent s'en tenir aux valeurs démocratiques qui sont clairement énoncées dans la Charte et s'abstenir d'imposer ou de créer des droits sans fondement identifiable dans la Charte. La Cour ne peut définir un droit d'une façon qui n'a aucun rapport avec l'intérêt que le droit en question est destiné à protéger.

L'atteinte à un droit comme le droit à la sécurité de la personne se produira seulement lorsque la loi va au-delà de l'ingérence dans les priorités et aspirations et restreint des droits compris et protégés par cette notion. La proposition selon laquelle les femmes jouissent d'un droit constitutionnel à l'avortement ne trouve aucun appui dans le texte, la structure ou l'historique du texte constitutionnel ni dans la tradition constitutionnelle ou l'histoire, les traditions et les philosophies sous-jacentes dans notre société.

Historiquement, l'existence d'un intérêt public dans la protection des enfants non encore nés a toujours été clairement reconnue et rien ne prouve ni n'indique que le concept de l'avortement à volonté soit généralement accepté dans notre société. La façon d'interpréter la Charte adoptée par cette Cour ne justifie aucunement l'enchâssement d'un droit constitutionnel à l'avortement.

Pour ce qui de la revendication d'un droit à la protection contre toute atteinte de l'État à l'intégrité physique et contre toute tension psychologique causée par l'État, une atteinte au droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti par l'art. 7 nécessite plus que des tensions ou de l'angoisse causées par l'État. Une violation de ce droit doit dépendre d'une atteinte à un intérêt dont la nature et l'importance justifieraient une protection constitutionnelle. Cette violation se limite aux cas où l'action de l'État dont on se plaint a, en plus d'engendrer des tensions et de l'angoisse, porté également atteinte à un autre droit, à une autre liberté ou à un autre intérêt qui mérite d'être protégé selon le concept de la sécurité de la personne. L'avortement ne constitue pas un tel intérêt. Même s'il était possible de conclure à l'existence d'un droit général à l'avortement en vertu de l'art. 7, on n'a pas démontré clairement la mesure dans laquelle on pourrait dire que les exigences de l'art. 251 du Code peuvent porter atteinte à ce droit.

Un moyen de défense créé par le Parlement n'est illusoire ou pratiquement illusoire que lorsqu'on ne peut pas y recourir dans les circonstances où l'on a dit qu'il being available. The very nature of the test assumes that Parliament is to define the defence and, in so doing, designate the terms upon which it may be available. The allegation of procedural unfairness is not supported by the claim that many women wanting abortions have been unable to get them in Canada because the failure of s. 251(4) to respond to this need. This machinery was considered adequate to deal with the type of abortion Parliament had envisaged. Any inefficiency in the administrative scheme is caused principally by forces external to the statute — the general demand for abortion irrespective of the provisions of s. 251. A court cannot strike down a statutory provision on this basis.

Section 605(1)(a), which gives the Crown a right of appeal against an acquittal in a trial court on any ground involving a question of law alone, does not offend ss. 7, 11(d), (f) and (h) of the Charter. The words of s. 11(h), "if finally acquitted" and "if finally found guilty", must be construed to mean after the appellate procedures have been completed, otherwise there would be no point or meaning in the word "finally".

Section 251 did not infringe the equality rights of women, abridge freedom of religion, or inflict cruel or unusual punishment. The section was not in pith and substance legislation for the protection of health and therefore within provincial competence but rather was validly enacted under the federal criminal law power. There was no merit to the arguments that s. 251 purported to give powers to therapeutic abortion committees exercised by county, district, and superior courts at the time of Confederation or that it delegated powers relating to criminal law to the provinces generally. No evidence supported the defence of necessity.

Per Curiam: In a trial before judge and jury, the judge's role is to state the law and the jury's role is to apply that law to the facts of the case. To encourage a jury to ignore a law it does not like could not only lead to gross inequities but could also irresponsibly disturb the balance of the criminal law system. It was quite simply wrong to say to the jury that if they did not like the law they need not enforce it. Such practice, if commonly adopted, would undermine and place at risk the whole jury system.

était possible de le faire. De par sa nature même, ce critère sous-entend que c'est au Parlement qu'il incombe de définir le moyen de défense et, ce faisant, de préciser les conditions à remplir pour pouvoir l'invoquer. L'allégation de l'inéquité dans la procédure n'est pas justifiée par la prétention qu'un bon nombre de femmes désireuses d'obtenir un avortement n'ont pas pu l'obtenir au Canada parce que le par. 251(4) ne répond pas à ce besoin. Ce mécanisme a été considéré comme suffisant pour traiter le type d'avortement envisagé par le Parlement. L'inefficacité du régime administratif est principalement due à des facteurs étrangers à la loi, savoir la demande générale d'avortements en dépit des dispositions de l'art. 251. Un tribunal ne peut, pour ce motif, invalider une disposition législative.

L'alinéa 605(1)a), qui habilite le ministère public à interjeter appel contre un verdict d'acquittement prononcé en première instance pour tout motif comportant une question de droit seulement n'est pas contraire à l'art. 7 et aux al. 11*d*), f) et h) de la Charte. Les expressions «définitivement acquitté» et «définitivement déclaré coupable» employées à l'al. 11*h*) doivent s'interpréter comme signifiant après que toutes les procédures d'appel sont terminées, sinon le mot «définitivement» serait inutile ou dénué de tout sens.

L'article 251 du Code criminel ne porte pas atteinte aux droits des femmes à l'égalité, ni à la liberté de religion et n'inflige pas non plus une peine cruelle et inusitée. L'article ne vise pas, de par son caractère véritable, la santé, relèvent donc de la compétence provinciale, mais il a été validement adopté en vertu de la compétence fédérale en matière criminelle. Les arguments voulant que l'art. 251 ait pour effet d'investir les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique de pouvoirs exercés, à l'époque de la Confédération, par les cours de comté et de district et les cours supérieures et qu'il délègue aux provinces en général des pouvoirs en matière de droit criminel sont mal fondés. Aucun élément de preuve ne justifie le moyen de défense de nécessité.

La Cour: Au cours d'un procès devant juge et jury, le rôle du juge est d'énoncer les règles de droit, et le rôle du jury de l'appliquer aux faits de l'espèce. Encourager le jury à ignorer une règle de droit qu'il n'aime pas pourrait non seulement entraîner de graves inéquités, mais pourrait aussi perturber de façon irresponsable l'équilibre du système de justice criminelle. Il était absolument erroné de dire au jury que, s'il n'aime pas la règle de droit, il n'a pas besoin de l'appliquer. Une telle pratique, communément adoptée, minerait et mettrait en danger tout le système des procès par jury.

POURVOI contre un arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 353, 22 D.L.R. (4th) 641, 22 C.C.C. (3d) 353, 48 C.R. (3d) 1, 17 C.R.R. 223, qui a infirmé un acquittement prononcé par le juge en chef adjoint Parker de la Haute Cour siégeant avec jury (1984), 47 O.R. (2d) 353, 12 D.L.R. (4th) 502, 14 C.C.C. (3d) 258, 41 C.R. (3d) 193, 11 C.R.R. 116. Le pourvoi est accueilli et les acquittements sont rétablis; les juges McIntyre et La Forest sont dissidents. La première question constitutionnelle reçoit une réponse affirmative en ce qui concerne l'art. 7 et la deuxième question une réponse négative en ce qui concerne l'art. 7. Les troisième, quatrième et cinquième questions reçoivent une réponse négative. La sixième question reçoit une réponse négative en ce qui concerne l'art. 605 du Code criminel et aucune réponse en ce qui concerne l'art. 610(3). Il n'est pas nécessaire de répondre à la septième question.

The judgment of Dickson C.J. and Lamer J. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE—The principal issue raised by this appeal is whether the abortion provisions of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, infringe the "right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice" as formulated in s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The appellants, Dr. Henry Morgentaler, Dr. Leslie Frank Smoling and Dr. Robert Scott, have raised thirteen distinct grounds of appeal. During oral submissions, however, it became apparent that the primary focus of the case was upon the s. 7 argument. It is submitted by the appellants that s. 251 of the Criminal Code contravenes s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and that s. 251 should be struck down. Counsel for the Crown admitted during the course of her submissions that s. 7 of the Charter was indeed "the key" to the entire appeal. As for the remaining grounds of appeal, only a few brief comments are necessary. First of all, I agree with the disposition made by the Court of Appeal of the non-Charter issues, many of which have already been adequately dealt with in earlier cases by this Court. I am also of the view that the arguments concerning the alleged invalidity of s. 605 under ss. 7 and 11 of the Charter are unfounded. In view of my resolution of the s. 7 issue, it will not be necessary for me to address the appellants' other Charter arguments and I expressly refrain from commenting upon their merits.

During argument before this Court, counsel for the Crown emphasized repeatedly that it is not the role of the judiciary in Canada to evaluate the wisdom of legislation enacted by our democratically elected representatives, or to second-guess difficult policy choices that confront all governments. In Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616, at p. 671, [hereinafter "Morgentaler (1975)"] I stressed that the Court had "not been called upon to decide, or even to enter, the loud and continuous public debate on abortion." Eleven years later, the controversy persists, and it remains

LE JUGE EN CHEF—Ce pourvoi vise principalement à déterminer si les dispositions du Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, chap. C-34, sur l'avortement enfreignent le «droit [de chacun] à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne», vu qu'«il ne peut être porté atteinte à ce droit qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale», selon la formulation de l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. Les appelants, le Dr Henry Morgentaler, le Dr Leslie Frank Smoling et le Dr Robert Scott, font valoir treize moyens distincts de pourvoi. Au cours des plaidoiries cependant, il est devenu apparent que le litige portait surtout sur l'argument tiré de l'art. 7. Les appelants soutiennent que l'art. 251 du Code criminel, contrevient à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et qu'il doit être invalidé. Le substitut du procureur général a reconnu, au cours de sa plaidoirie, que l'art. 7 de la Charte était bel et bien «la clé» de tout le pourvoi. Quant aux moyens d'appel restant, il me suffit de faire un bref commentaire. Premièrement, je suis d'accord avec les solutions apportées par la Cour d'appel aux questions en litige ne relevant pas de la Charte dont plusieurs ont déjà fait l'objet de décisions de cette Cour. Je suis également d'avis que les arguments relatifs à la prétendue invalidité de l'art. 605 en vertu des art. 7 et 11 de la Charte sont mal fondés. Vu la solution que j'apporte à la question soulevée par l'art. 7, il ne me sera pas nécessaire de statuer sur les autres arguments des appelants relatifs à la Charte et je m'abstiens donc expressément de me prononcer sur leur fondement.

Au cours des plaidoiries devant nous, le substitut du procureur général a rappelé à plusieurs reprises que le pouvoir judiciaire au Canada n'a pas comme rôle d'évaluer la sagesse des lois édictées par nos députés élus démocratiquement, ni de réinterpréter les choix difficiles de politique auxquels tous les gouvernements sont confrontés. Dans l'arrêt Morgentaler c. La Reine, [1976] 1 R.C.S. 616, à la p. 671, [ci-après l'arrêt «Morgentaler (1975)»] j'ai souligné que la Cour "n'est pas appelée à trancher, ni même à aborder, le débat public animé et constant sur l'avortement". Onze true that this Court cannot presume to resolve all of the competing claims advanced in vigorous and healthy public debate. Courts and legislators in other democratic societies have reached completely contradictory decisions when asked to weigh the competing values relevant to the abortion question. See, e.g., Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Paton v. United Kingdom (1980), 3 E.H.R.R. (European Court of Human Rights); The Abortion Decision of the Federal Constitutional Court — First Senate — of the Federal Republic of Germany, February 25, 1975, translated and reprinted in (1976), 9 John Marshall J. Prac. and Proc. 605; and the Abortion Act, 1967, 1967, c. 87 (U.K.)

But since 1975, and the first Morgentaler decision, the Court has been given added responsibilities. I stated in Morgentaler (1975), at p. 671, that:

> The values we must accept for the purposes of this appeal are those expressed by Parliament which holds the view that the desire of a woman to be relieved of her pregnancy is not, of itself, justification for performing an abortion.

Although no doubt it is still fair to say that courts are not the appropriate forum for articulating complex and controversial programmes of public policy, Canadian courts are now charged with the crucial obligation of ensuring that the legislative initiatives pursued by our Parliament and legislatures conform to the democratic values expressed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. As Justice McIntyre states in his reasons for judgment, at p. 138, "the task of the Court in this case is not to solve nor seek to solve what might be called the abortion issue, but simply to measure the content of s. 251 against the Charter." It is in this latter sense that the current Morgentaler appeal differs from the one we heard a decade ago.

I

ans plus tard, la controverse fait toujours rage et il est tout aussi vrai que la Cour ne saurait prétendre concilier toutes les allégations contradictoires avancées dans le vigoureux et sain débat public ainsi suscité. Tant les tribunaux que les législateurs, dans d'autres sociétés démocratiques, sont arrivés à des décisions entièrement contradictoires lorsqu'il leur a été demandé de soupeser les valeurs que la question de l'avortement oppose. Voir, p. ex., l'arrêt Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); l'arrêt Paton c. Royaume-Uni (1980), 3 E.H.R.R. (Cour européenne des droits de l'homme); The Abortion Decision of the Federal Constitutional Court — First Senate — of the Federal Republic of Germany, 25 février 1975, traduit en anglais et réédité dans (1976), 9 John Marshall J. Prac. and Proc. 605; et l'Abortion Act, 1967, 1967, chap. 87 (R.-U.)

Mais depuis 1975, et le premier arrêt Morgentaler, la Cour s'est vue confier des responsabilités additionnelles. Je disais dans l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975), à la p. 671:

> Les valeurs que nous devons accepter aux fins du pourvoi sont celles qu'a proclamées le Parlement, qui s'en tient à l'opinion que le désir d'une femme d'être soulagée de sa grossesse ne justifie pas en soi l'avortement.

Quoiqu'on puisse toujours sans aucun doute affirmer que les tribunaux ne sont pas le lieu où doivent s'élaborer les politiques générales complexes et controversées, les tribunaux canadiens se voient néanmoins confier aujourd'hui l'obligation cruciale de veiller à ce que les initiatives législatives de notre Parlement et de nos législatures se conforment aux valeurs démocratiques qu'exprime la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. Comme le dit le juge McIntyre dans ses motifs, à la p. 138 "notre tâche en l'espèce consiste non pas à résoudre ni à tenter de résoudre ce qu'on pourrait appeler la question de l'avortement, mais simplement à examiner le contenu de l'art. 251 en fonction de la Charte." C'est en ce dernier sens que le présent pourvoi diffère de celui dont nous étions saisis voici une décennie.

La Cour a formulé les questions constitutionnelles suivantes:

1. Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2(a), 7, 12, 15, 27 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
2. If section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada infringes or denies the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2(a), 7, 12, 15, 27 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is s. 251 justified by s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?
3. Is section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada ultra vires the Parliament of Canada?
4. Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada violate s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867?
5. Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada unlawfully delegate federal criminal power to provincial Ministers of Health or Therapeutic Abortion Committees, and in doing so, has the Federal Government abdicated its authority in this area?
6. Do sections 605 and 610(3) of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 7, 11(d), 11(f), 11(h) and 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
7. If sections 605 and 610(3) of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 7, 11(d) 11(f), 11(h) and 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, are ss. 605 and 610(3) justified by s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?

The Attorney General of Canada intervened to support the respondent Crown.

Relevant Statutory and Constitutional Provisions

Criminal Code

251. (1) Every one who, with intent to procure the miscarriage of a female person, whether or not she is pregnant, uses any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

(2) Every female person who, being pregnant, with intent to procure her own miscarriage, uses any means or permits any means to be used for the purpose of carrying out her intention is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

(3) In this section, "means" includes

1. L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada porte-t-il atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7, 12, 15, 27 et 28 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?
2. Si l'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada porte atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7, 12, 15, 27 et 28 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, est-il justifié par l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et donc compatible avec la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982?
3. L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada excède-t-il les pouvoirs du Parlement du Canada?
4. L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada viole-t-il l'art. 96 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867?
5. L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada délègue-t-il illégalement la compétence fédérale en matière criminelle aux ministres de la Santé provinciaux ou aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique et, ce faisant, le gouvernement fédéral a-t-il abdiqué son autorité dans ce domaine?
6. L'article 605 et le par. 610(3) du Code criminel du Canada portent-ils atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'art. 7, les al. 11*d*), 11*f*), 11*h*) et le par. 24(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?
7. Si l'article 605 et le par. 610(3) du Code criminel du Canada portent atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'art. 7, les al. 11*d*), 11*f*), 11*h*) et le par. 24(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, sont-ils justifiés par l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et donc compatibles avec la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982?

Les dispositions législatives et constitutionnelles pertinentes

Code criminel

251. (1) Est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible de l'emprisonnement à perpétuité, quiconque, avec l'intention de procurer l'avortement d'une personne du sexe féminin, qu'elle soit enceinte ou non, emploie quelque moyen pour réaliser son intention.

(2) Est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement de deux ans, toute personne du sexe féminin qui, étant enceinte, avec l'intention d'obtenir son propre avortement, emploie, ou permet que soit employé quelque moyen pour réaliser son intention.

(3) Au présent article, l'expression «moyen» comprend

(a) the administration of a drug or other noxious thing,

(b) the use of an instrument, and

(c) manipulation of any kind.

(4) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply to

(a) a qualified medical practitioner, other than a member of a therapeutic abortion committee for any hospital, who in good faith uses in an accredited or approved hospital any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention to procure the miscarriage of a female person, or

if, before the use of those means, the therapeutic abortion committee for that accredited or approved hospital, by a majority of the members of the committee and at a meeting of the committee at which the case of such female person has been reviewed,

(c) has by certificate in writing stated that in its opinion the continuation of the pregnancy of such female person would or would be likely to endanger her life or health, and

(d) has caused a copy of such certificate to be given to the qualified medical practitioner.

(5) The Minister of Health of a province may by order

(a) require a therapeutic abortion committee for any hospital in that province, or any member thereof, to furnish to him a copy of any certificate described in paragraph (4)(c) issued, by that committee, together with such other information relating to the circumstances surrounding the issue of that certificate as he may require, or

(b) require a medical practitioner who, in that province, has procured the miscarriage of any female person named in a certificate described in paragraph (4)(c), to furnish to him a copy of that certificate, together with such other information relating to the procuring of the miscarriage as he may require.

(6) For the purposes of subsections (4) and (5) and this subsection

"accredited hospital" means a hospital accredited by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation

a) l'administration d'une drogue ou autre substance délétère,

b) l'emploi d'un instrument, et

c) toute manipulation.

(4) Les paragraphes (1) et (2) ne s'appliquent pas

a) à un médecin qualifié, autre qu'un membre d'un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de quelque hôpital, qui emploie de bonne foi, dans un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé, quelque moyen pour réaliser son intention de procurer l'avortement d'une personne du sexe féminin, ou

b) à une personne du sexe féminin qui, étant enceinte, permet à un médecin qualifié d'employer, dans un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé, quelque moyen mentionné à l'alinéa a) aux fins de réaliser son intention d'obtenir son propre avortement, si, avant que ces moyens ne soient employés, le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de cet hôpital accrédité ou approuvé, par décision de la majorité des membres du comité et lors d'une réunion du comité au cours de laquelle le cas de cette personne du sexe féminin a été examiné,

c) a déclaré par certificat qu'à son avis la continuation de la grossesse de cette personne du sexe féminin mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de cette dernière, et

d) a fait remettre une copie de ce certificat au médecin qualifié.

(5) Le ministre de la Santé d'une province peut, par ordonnance,

a) requérir un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de quelque hôpital, dans cette province, ou un membre de ce comité, de lui fournir une copie d'un certificat mentionné à l'alinéa (4)c) émis par ce comité, ainsi que les autres renseignements qu'il peut exiger au sujet des circonstances entourant l'émission de ce certificat, ou

b) requérir un médecin qui, dans cette province, a procuré l'avortement d'une personne de sexe féminin nommée dans un certificat mentionné à l'alinéa (4)c), de lui fournir une copie de ce certificat, ainsi que les autres renseignements qu'il peut exiger au sujet de l'obtention de l'avortement.

(6) Aux fins des paragraphes (4) et (5) et du présent paragraphe, «comité de l'avortement thérapeutique" d'un hôpital désigne un comité formé d'au moins trois membres qui sont tous des médecins qualifiés, nommé par le conseil de cet hôpital pour examiner et in which diagnostic services and medical, surgical and obstetrical treatment are provided;

"approved hospital" means a hospital in a province approved for the purposes of this section by the Minister of Health of that province;

"board" means the board of governors, management or directors, or the trustees, commission or other person or group of persons having the control and management of an accredited or approved hospital;

"Minister of Health" means

(a) in the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, the Minister of Health,

(a.1) in the Province of Alberta, the Minister of Hospitals and Medical Care,

(b) in the Province of British Columbia, the Minister of Health Services and Hospital Insurance,

(c) in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan, the Minister of Public Health, and

(d) in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, the Minister of National Health and Welfare;

"qualified medical practitioner" means a person entitled to engage in the practice of medicine under the laws of the province in which the hospital referred to in subsection (4) is situated;

"therapeutic abortion committee" for any hospital means a committee, comprised of not less than three members each of whom is a qualified medical practitioner, appointed by the board of that hospital for the purpose of considering and determining questions relating to terminations of pregnancy within that hospital.

(7) Nothing in subsection (4) shall be construed as making unnecessary the obtaining of any authorization or consent that is or may be required, otherwise than under this Act, before any means are used for the purpose of carrying out an intention to procure the miscarriage of a female person.

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject décider les questions relatives aux arrêts de grossesse dans cet hôpital;

«hôpital accrédité» désigne un hôpital accrédité par le Conseil canadien d'accréditation des hôpitaux, dans lequel sont fournis des services de diagnostic et des traitements médicaux, chirurgicaux et obstétricaux;

«médecin qualifié» désigne une personne qui a le droit d'exercer la médecine en vertu des lois de la province dans laquelle est situé l'hôpital mentionné au paragraphe (4);

«ministre de la Santé» désigne

a) dans la province d'Ontario, de Québec, du Nouveau-Brunswick, du Manitoba, de Terre-Neuve et de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard, le ministre de la Santé;

a.1) dans la province d'Alberta, le ministre de la Santé (hôpitaux et assurance-maladie);

b) dans la province de Colombie-Britannique, le ministre des Services de santé et de l'assurance-hospitalisation,

c) dans les provinces de Nouvelle-Écosse et de Saskatchewan, le ministre de la Santé publique, et,

d) dans le territoire du Yukon et les territoires du Nord-Ouest, le ministre de la Santé nationale et du Bien-être social.

(7) Rien au paragraphe (4) ne doit s'interpréter de manière à faire disparaître la nécessité d'obtenir une autorisation ou un consentement qui est ou peut être requis, autrement qu'en vertu de la présente loi, avant l'emploi de moyens destinés à réaliser une intention de procurer l'avortement d'une personne du sexe féminin.

La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés

1. La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés. Ils ne peuvent only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

être restreints que par une règle de droit, dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

7. Chacun a droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne; il ne peut être porté atteinte à ce droit qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale.

Procedural History

The three appellants are all duly qualified medical practitioners who together set up a clinic in Toronto to perform abortions upon women who had not obtained a certificate from a therapeutic abortion committee of an accredited or approved hospital as required by s. 251(4). The doctors had made public statements questioning the wisdom of the abortion laws in Canada and asserting that a woman has an unfettered right to choose whether or not an abortion is appropriate in her individual circumstances.

Indictments were preferred against the appellants charging that they conspired with each other between November 1982 and July 1983 with intent to procure the miscarriage of female persons, using an induced suction technique to carry out that intent, contrary to s. 423(1)(d) and s. 251(1) of the Criminal Code.

Counsel for the appellants moved to quash the indictment or to stay the proceedings before pleas were entered on the grounds that s. 251 of the Criminal Code was ultra vires the Parliament of Canada, infringed ss. 2(a), 7 and 12 of the Charter, and was inconsistent with s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. The trial judge, Parker A.C.J.H.C., dismissed the motion, and an appeal to the Ontario Court of Appeal was dismissed. The trial proceeded before Parker A.C.J.H.C. and a jury, and the three accused were acquitted. The Crown appealed the acquittal to the Court of

III

La procédure

Les trois appelants sont des médecins dûment qualifiés; ensemble, ils ont ouvert une clinique, à Toronto, pour pratiquer des avortements sur des femmes qui n'avaient pas obtenu le certificat du comité de l'avortement thérapeutique d'un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé requis par le par. 251(4). Les médecins ont fait des déclarations publiques dans lesquelles ils ont mis en doute la sagesse de la législation canadienne sur l'avortement et ont affirmé qu'une femme a le droit souverain de décider si un avortement s'impose ou non dans sa situation personnelle.

Des actes d'accusation en bonne et due forme inculpent les appelants d'avoir comploté, les uns avec les autres, entre novembre 1982 et juillet 1983, avec l'intention de provoquer l'avortement de personnes du sexe féminin, en employant la technique de l'aspiration pour réaliser cette intention, infractions prévues à l'al. 423(1)d) et au par. 251(1) du Code criminel.

L'avocat des appelants a demandé l'annulation de l'acte d'accusation ou la suspension des poursuites avant même d'inscrire les plaidoyers, pour le motif que l'art. 251 du Code criminel excéderait les pouvoirs du Parlement du Canada, enfreindrait l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7 et 12 de la Charte et entrerait en conflit avec l'al. 1*b*) de la Déclaration canadienne des droits. Le juge de première instance, le juge Parker, juge en chef adjoint de la Haute Cour, a rejeté la requête et l'appel interjeté à la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a aussi été rejeté. Le procès s'est poursuivi devant le juge Parker et un

Appeal and the appellants filed a cross-appeal. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, set aside the verdict of acquittal and ordered a new trial. The Court held that the cross-appeal related to issues already raised in the appeal, and the issues were therefore examined as part of the appeal.

IV

Section 7 of the Charter

In his submissions, counsel for the appellants argued that the Court should recognize a very wide ambit for the rights protected under s. 7 of the Charter. Basing his argument largely on American constitutional theories and authorities, Mr. Manning submitted that the right to "life, liberty and security of the person" is a wide-ranging right to control one's own life and to promote one's individual autonomy. The right would therefore include a right to privacy and a right to make unfettered decisions about one's own life.

In my opinion, it is neither necessary nor wise in this appeal to explore the broadest implications of s. 7 as counsel would wish us to do. I prefer to rest my conclusions on a narrower analysis than that put forward on behalf of the appellants. I do not think it would be appropriate to attempt an all-encompassing explication of so important a provision as s. 7 so early in the history of Charter interpretation. The Court should be presented with a wide variety of claims and factual situations before articulating the full range of s. 7 rights. I will therefore limit my comments to some interpretive principles already set down by the Court and to an analysis of only two aspects of s. 7, the right to "security of the person" and "the principles of fundamental justice".

A. Interpreting s. 7

The goal of Charter interpretation is to secure for all people "the full benefit of the Charter's protection": R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344. To attain that goal, this jury et les trois accusés ont été acquittés. Le ministère public a interjeté appel de l'acquittement à la Cour d'appel et les appelants ont formé un appel incident. La Cour d'appel a accueilli l'appel, annulé le verdict d'acquittement et ordonné un nouveau procès. La Cour a jugé que l'appel incident se rapportait à des points déjà soulevés par l'appel principal, qui ont donc été étudiés dans le cadre de ce dernier.

IV

L'article 7 de la Charte

Selon la thèse de l'avocat des appelants, la Cour devrait accorder une portée très large aux droits garantis par l'art. 7 de la Charte. Se fondant largement sur la doctrine et la jurisprudence constitutionnelles américaines, Me Manning a fait valoir que le droit de chacun à «la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne» est un droit très large d'assumer sa destinée et de promouvoir son autonomie individuelle. Ce droit inclurait donc le droit à la vie privée et celui de décider souverainement de tout ce qui touche à sa vie personnelle.

À mon avis, il n'est ni nécessaire ni sage, dans le cadre de ce pourvoi, d'explorer les répercussions les plus larges que pourrait avoir l'art. 7, comme l'avocat le voudrait. Je préfère fonder mes conclusions sur une analyse plus étroite que celle avancée au nom des appelants. Je ne pense pas qu'il soit opportun de tenter d'arriver à une explication exhaustive d'une disposition aussi importante que l'art. 7 si tôt dans l'histoire de l'interprétation de la Charte. La Cour devra être saisie d'un large éventail d'espèces avant de pouvoir brosser un tableau complet des droits visés par l'art. 7. Je limiterai donc mes commentaires à certains principes interprétatifs déjà énoncés par la Cour et à une analyse de seulement deux aspects de l'art. 7, le droit de chacun à «la sécurité de sa personne» et «les principes de justice fondamentale».

A. L'interprétation de l'art. 7

L'interprétation de la Charte doit viser à faire en sorte que tous «bénéficient pleinement de la protection accordée par la Charte»: R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 R.C.S. 295, à la p. 344.

Court has held consistently that the proper technique for the interpretation of Charter provisions is to pursue a "purposive" analysis of the right guaranteed. A right recognized in the Charter is "to be understood, in other words, in the light of the interests it was meant to protect": R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., at p. 344. (See also Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145; and R. v. Therens, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613.)

In Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 177, at p. 204, Justice Wilson emphasized that there are three distinct elements to the s. 7 right, that "life, liberty, and security of the person" are independent interests, each of which must be given independent significance by the Court (p. 205). This interpretation was adopted by a majority of the Court, per Justice Lamer, in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, at p. 500. It is therefore possible to treat only one aspect of the first part of s. 7 before determining whether any infringement of that interest accords with the principles of fundamental justice. (See Singh, Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, and R. v. Jones, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 284.)

With respect to the second part of s. 7, in early academic commentary one of the principal concerns was whether the reference to "principles of fundamental justice" enables the courts to review the substance of legislation. (See, e.g., Whyte, "Fundamental Justice: The Scope and Application of Section 7 of the Charter" (1983), 13 Man. L.J. 455, and Garant, "Fundamental Freedoms and Natural Justice" in W. S. Tarnopolsky and G.-A. Beaudoin, The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: Commentary (1982).) In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, Lamer J. noted at p. 497 that any attempt to draw a sharp line between procedure and substance would be ill-conceived. He suggested further that it would not be beneficial in Canada to allow a debate which is rooted in United States constitutional dilemmas to shape our interpretation of s. 7 (p. 498):

Pour atteindre ce but, il faut recourir, selon la jurisprudence constante de la Cour, à la technique d'interprétation des dispositions de la Charte qui consiste à procéder à une analyse de «l'objet visé» par le droit garanti. Les droits reconnus par la Charte doivent "en d'autres termes . . . s'interpréter en fonction des intérêts qu'ils visent à protéger": l'arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., à la p. 344. (Voir aussi les arrêts Hunter c. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 R.C.S. 145 et R. c. Therens, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 613.)

Dans l'arrêt Singh c. Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 177, à la p. 204, le juge Wilson souligne que le droit conféré par l'art. 7 comporte trois éléments distincts, que «la vie, la liberté et la sécurité de sa personne» sont trois intérêts indépendants auxquels la Cour doit respectivement donner un sens indépendant (à la p. 205). La Cour, à la majorité, a adopté cette interprétation, voir le juge Lamer, dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486, à la p. 500. Il est donc possible de ne traiter qu'un seul aspect du premier volet de l'art. 7 avant de rechercher si une violation de cet intérêt concorde avec les principes de justice fondamentale. (Voir les arrêts Singh, Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B. et R. c. Jones, [1986] 2 R.C.S. 284.)

Quant à la seconde clause de l'art. 7, dans les premières analyses de doctrine, on s'est principalement intéressé à la question de savoir si la référence aux «principes de justice fondamentale» permet aux tribunaux d'examiner le fond de la législation. (Voir, par ex., Whyte, «Fundamental Justice: The Scope and Application of Section 7 of the Charter» (1983), 13 Man. L.J. 455, et Garant, «Libertés fondamentales et justice naturelle» dans W. S. Tarnopolsky et G.-A. Beaudoin, Charte canadienne des droits et libertés (1982).) Dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., le juge Lamer constate, à la p. 497, qu'il serait imprudent de tenter de confiner dans des limites précises la procédure, d'une part, et le fond, de l'autre. Il laisse aussi entendre qu'il n'y aurait pas avantage au Canada à laisser ce débat, dont la source réside dans les dilemmes constitutionnels des États-Unis, façonner notre interprétation de l'art. 7 (à la p. 498):

We would, in my view, do our own Constitution a disservice to simply allow the American debate to define the issue for us, all the while ignoring the truly fundamental structural differences between the two constitutions.

Lamer J. went on to hold that the principles of fundamental justice referred to in s. 7 can relate both to procedure and to substance, depending upon the circumstances presented before the Court.

I have no doubt that s. 7 does impose upon courts the duty to review the substance of legislation once it has been determined that the legislation infringes an individual's right to "life, liberty and security of the person". The section states clearly that those interests may only be impaired if the principles of fundamental justice are respected. Lamer J. emphasized, however, that the courts should avoid "adjudication of the merits of public policy" (p. 499). In the present case, I do not believe that it is necessary for the Court to tread the fine line between substantive review and the adjudication of public policy. As in the Singh case, it will be sufficient to investigate whether or not the impugned legislative provisions meet the procedural standards of fundamental justice. First it is necessary to determine whether s. 251 of the Criminal Code impairs the security of the person.

B. Security of the Person

The law has long recognized that the human body ought to be protected from interference by others. At common law, for example, any medical procedure carried out on a person without that person's consent is an assault. Only in emergency circumstances does the law allow others to make decisions of this nature. Similarly, art. 19 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada provides that "The human person is inviolable" and that "No person may cause harm to the person of another without his consent or without being authorized by law to do so". "Security of the person", in other words, is not a value alien to our legal landscape. With the advent of the Charter, security of the person has been elevated to the status of a constitutional norm. This is not to say that the various forms of

À mon avis, nous rendrions un mauvais service à notre propre Constitution en permettant simplement que le débat américain définisse la question pour nous, tout en ignorant les différences de structure vraiment fondamentales entre les deux constitutions.

Le juge Lamer poursuit en disant que les principes de justice fondamentale mentionnés à l'art. 7 peuvent se rapporter tant à la procédure qu'au fond, selon les faits dont la Cour est saisie.

J'estime sans aucun doute que l'art. 7 impose aux tribunaux le devoir d'examiner, au fond, des textes législatifs une fois qu'il a été jugé qu'ils enfreignent le droit de l'individu à «la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne». L'article dit clairement qu'il ne peut être porté atteinte à ces intérêts que si les principes de justice fondamentale sont respectés. Le juge Lamer souligne néanmoins que les tribunaux devraient éviter «de se prononcer sur le bien-fondé de politiques générales» (à la p. 499). En l'espèce, je ne crois pas qu'il soit nécessaire que la Cour touche à l'équilibre fragile entre examen du fond et décision de politiques générales. Comme dans l'affaire Singh, il suffit de rechercher si oui ou non les dispositions législatives contestées répondent aux normes procédurales de la justice fondamentale. En premier lieu, il est nécessaire de rechercher si l'art. 251 du Code criminel porte atteinte à la sécurité de la personne.

B. La sécurité de la personne

Il est depuis longtemps admis en droit que le corps humain doit être protégé des ingérences de tiers. En common law, par exemple, une intervention médicale effectuée sans le consentement du patient constitue des voies de fait. C'est seulement en cas d'urgence que le droit autorise des tiers à prendre des décisions de cette nature. De même, l'art. 19 du Code civil du Bas-Canada déclare que «la personne humaine est inviolable» et que «Nul ne peut porter atteinte à la personne d'autrui sans son consentement ou sans y être autorisé par la loi». La «sécurité de la personne», en d'autres termes, n'est pas une valeur étrangère à notre régime juridique. Avec l'avènement de la Charte, la sécurité de la personne a été promue au rang de norme constitutionnelle. Cela ne veut pas dire que protection accorded to the human body by the common and civil law occupy a similar status. "Security of the person" must be given content in a manner sensitive to its constitutional position. The above examples are simply illustrative of our respect for individual physical integrity. (See R. Macdonald, "Procedural Due Process in Canadian Constitutional Law", 39 U. Fla. L. Rev. 217 (1987), at p. 248.) Nor is it to say that the state can never impair personal security interests. There may well be valid reasons for interfering with security of the person. It is to say, however, that if the state does interfere with security of the person, the Charter requires such interference to conform with the principles of fundamental justice.

les différentes formes de protection accordées au corps humain par le droit civil et la common law occupent le même rang. Le contenu donné à «la sécurité de la personne» doit être sensible à sa situation constitutionnelle. Les exemples fournis ci-dessus ne sont que des illustrations de notre respect pour l'intégrité physique de chacun. (Voir R. Macdonald, «Procedural Due Process in Canadian Constitutional Law», 39 U. Fla. L. Rev. 217 (1987), à la p. 248.) Cela ne revient pas non plus à dire que l'État ne peut jamais porter atteinte aux intérêts en matière de sécurité personnelle. Il peut fort bien exister des motifs valides d'ingérence à l'égard de la sécurité de la personne. Cela veut cependant dire que si l'État touche effectivement à la sécurité de la personne, la Charte impose que cette ingérence soit conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

The appellants submitted that the "security of the person" protected by the Charter is an explicit right to control one's body and to make fundamental decisions about one's life. The Crown contended that "security of the person" is a more circumscribed interest and that, like all of the elements of s. 7, it at most relates to the concept of physical control, simply protecting the individual's interest in his or her bodily integrity.

Les appelants font valoir que la «sécurité de la personne» protégée par la Charte est un droit qui permet explicitement d'être maître de son propre corps et de prendre des décisions fondamentales au sujet de sa propre vie. Le ministère public soutient que «la sécurité de la personne» est en fait un intérêt plus circonscrit et que, comme tous les autres éléments de l'art. 7, elle est liée, au mieux, à la notion de contrôle physique, protégeant simplement l'intérêt de chacun à assurer son intégrité corporelle.

Canadian courts have already had occasion to address the scope of the interest protected under the rubric of "security of the person". In R. v. Caddedu (1982), 40 O.R. (2d) 128, at p. 139, the Ontario High Court emphasized that the right to security of the person, like each aspect of s. 7, is a basic right, the deprivation of which has severe consequences for an individual. This characterization was approved by this Court in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, at p. 501. The Ontario Court of Appeal has held that the right to life, liberty and security of the person "would appear to relate to one's physical or mental integrity and one's control over these . . . " (R. v. Videoflicks Ltd. (1984), 48 O.R. (2d) 395, at p. 433.)

Les tribunaux canadiens ont déjà eu à statuer sur la portée de l'intérêt que protège la rubrique «la sécurité de sa personne». Dans l'affaire R. v. Caddedu (1982), 40 O.R. (2d) 128, à la p. 139, la Haute Cour de l'Ontario a rappelé que le droit à la sécurité de la personne, comme chacun des volets de l'art. 7, est un droit fondamental qui, lorsqu'on y porte atteinte, a des conséquences graves pour l'individu. La Cour a approuvé cette caractérisation dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., à la p. 501. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a jugé que le droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne [TRADUCTION] «semble se rapporter à l'intégrité physique ou mentale d'une personne et au contrôle qu'elle exerce à cet égard . . .» (R. v. Videoflicks Ltd. (1984), 48 O.R. (2d) 395, à la p. 433.)

That conclusion is consonant with the holding of Lamer J. in Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863. In Mills, Lamer J. was the only judge of this Court to treat the right to security of the person in any detail. Although the right arose in the context of s. 11(b) of the Charter, Lamer J. stressed the close connection between the specific rights in ss. 8 to 14 and the more generally applicable rights expressed in s. 7. Lamer J. held, at pp. 919-20, that even in the specific context of s. 11(b):

> ... security of the person is not restricted to physical integrity; rather, it encompasses protection against "overlong subjection to the vexations and vicissitudes of a pending criminal accusation" ... These include stigmatization of the accused, loss of privacy, stress and anxiety resulting from a multitude of factors, including possible disruption of family, social life and work, legal costs, uncertainty as to the outcome and sanction.

If state-imposed psychological trauma infringes security of the person in the rather circumscribed case of s. 11(b), it should be relevant to the general case of s. 7 where the right is expressed in broader terms. (See Whyte, supra, p. 39).

I note also that the Court has held in other contexts that the psychological effect of state action is relevant in assessing whether or not a Charter right has been infringed. In R. v. Therens, at p. 644, Justice Le Dain held that "The element of psychological compulsion, in the form of a reasonable perception of suspension of freedom of choice, is enough to make the restraint of liberty involuntary" for the purposes of defining "detention" in s. 10 of the Charter. A majority of the Court accepted the conclusions of Le Dain J. on this issue.

It may well be that constitutional protection of the above interests is specific to, and is only triggered by, the invocation of our system of criminal justice. It must not be forgotten, however, that s. 251 of the Code, subject to subs. (4), makes it an indictable offence for a person to procure the Cette conclusion est conforme à celle du juge Lamer dans l'arrêt Mills c. La Reine, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 863. Dans cet arrêt, le juge Lamer est le seul juge de la Cour qui ait approfondi le droit à la sécurité de la personne. Quoique ce droit fût mis en cause dans le cadre de l'al. 11*b*) de la Charte, le juge Lamer a souligné le rapport étroit qu'il y a entre les droits particuliers conférés par les art. 8 à 14 et les droits d'application plus générale que l'on retrouve à l'art. 7. Le juge Lamer a conclu, aux pp. 919 et 920, que même dans le cadre précis de l'al. 11*b*):

> ... [la] sécurité de la personne ne se limite pas à l'intégrité physique; elle englobe aussi celle de protection contre [TRADUCTION] "un assujettissement trop long aux vexations et aux vicissitudes d'une accusation criminelle pendante" ... Celles-ci comprennent la stigmatisation de l'accusé, l'atteinte à la vie privée, la tension et l'angoisse résultant d'une multitude de facteurs, y compris éventuellement les perturbations de la vie familiale, sociale et professionnelle, les frais de justice et l'incertitude face à l'issue et face à la peine.

Si le traumatisme psychologique infligé par l'État porte atteinte à la sécurité de la personne dans le cas plutôt limité de l'al. 11*b*), on doit en tenir compte dans le cadre général de l'art. 7, où ce droit est énoncé en termes plus larges. (Voir Whyte, précité, à la p. 39.)

Je rappelle aussi que la Cour a déjà jugé, dans d'autres contextes, que l'effet psychologique de l'action de l'État a de l'importance lorsqu'on recherche si un droit garanti par la Charte a ou non été enfreint. Dans l'arrêt R. c. Therens, à la p. 644, le juge Le Dain estime que «L'élément de contrainte psychologique, sous forme d'une perception raisonnable qu'on n'a vraiment pas le choix, suffit pour rendre involontaire la privation de liberté" quand il s'agit de définir le terme "détention" à l'art. 10 de la Charte. La Cour, à la majorité, a accepté les conclusions du juge Le Dain sur ce point.

Il est bien possible que la protection constitutionnelle des intérêts susmentionnés soit spécifique au recours à notre système de justice criminelle et seulement déclenchée par ce dernier. On ne doit toutefois pas oublier que l'art. 251 du Code, sous réserve du par. (4), érige en infraction criminelle le miscarriage and provides a maximum sentence of two years in the case of the woman herself, and a maximum sentence of life imprisonment in the case of another person. Like Beetz J., I do not find it necessary to decide how s. 7 would apply in other cases.

The case law leads me to the conclusion that state interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress, at least in the criminal law context, constitute a breach of security of the person. It is not necessary in this case to determine whether the right extends further, to protect either interests central to personal autonomy, such as a right to privacy, or interests unrelated to criminal justice.

I wish to reiterate that finding a violation of security of the person does not end the s. 7 inquiry. Parliament could choose to infringe security of the person if it did so in a manner consistent with the principles of fundamental justice. The present discussion should therefore be seen as a threshold inquiry and the conclusions do not dispose definitively of all the issues relevant to s. 7. With that caution, I have no difficulty in concluding that the encyclopedic factual submissions addressed to us by counsel in the present appeal establish beyond any doubt that s. 251 of the Criminal Code is prima facie a violation of the security of the person of thousands of Canadian women who have made the difficult decision that they do not wish to continue with a pregnancy.

At the most basic, physical and emotional level, every pregnant woman is told by the section that she cannot submit to a generally safe medical procedure that might be of clear benefit to her unless she meets criteria entirely unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations. Not only does the removal of decision-making power threaten women in a physical sense; the indecision of knowing whether an abortion will be granted inflicts emotional stress. Section 251 clearly interferes with a woman's bodily integrity in both a physical and emotional sense. Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless fait pour une personne de procurer un avortement et prévoit une peine maximale de deux ans d'emprisonnement pour la femme elle-même et d'emprisonnement à perpétuité dans le cas d'une autre personne. Comme le juge Beetz, je juge inutile de décider si l'art. 7 devrait s'appliquer dans d'autres cas.

La jurisprudence m'amène à conclure que l'atteinte que l'État porte à l'intégrité corporelle et la tension psychologique grave causée par l'État, du moins dans le contexte du droit criminel, constituent une atteinte à la sécurité de la personne. Il n'est pas nécessaire en l'espèce de se demander si le droit va plus loin et protège les intérêts primordiaux de l'autonomie personnelle, tel le droit à la vie privée ou des intérêts sans lien avec la justice criminelle.

Je réitère que la constatation qu'il y a atteinte à la sécurité de la personne ne met pas fin à la recherche exigée par l'art. 7. Le Parlement peut choisir de porter atteinte à la sécurité de la personne, pourvu qu'il le fasse en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale. Il faut donc considérer la présente analyse comme la première étape de recherche dont les conclusions ne régleront pas définitivement tous les points intéressant l'art. 7. Cela dit, je n'éprouve aucune difficulté à conclure que la somme encyclopédique produite par les avocats en l'espèce établit hors de tout doute que l'art. 251 du Code criminel constitue prima facie une atteinte à la sécurité de la personne de milliers de Canadiennes qui ont eu à prendre la difficile décision de ne pas mener une grossesse à terme.

Au niveau physique et émotionnel le plus fondamental, chaque femme enceinte se fait dire par cet article qu'elle ne peut subir une intervention médicale, généralement sans danger, qui pourrait manifestement être à son avantage, à moins qu'elle ne satisfasse à des critères totalement sans rapport avec ses propres priorités et aspirations. Non seulement en privant les femmes du pouvoir de décision, on les menace physiquement; en outre, l'incertitude qui plane sur le point de savoir si l'avortement sera accordé inflige une tension émotionnelle. L'article 251 porte clairement atteinte à l'intégrité corporelle, tant physique qu'émotionnelle d'une she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person. Section 251, therefore, is required by the Charter to comport with the principles of fundamental justice.

Although this interference with physical and emotional integrity is sufficient in itself to trigger a review of s. 251 against the principles of fundamental justice, the operation of the decision-making mechanism set out in s. 251 creates additional glaring breaches of security of the person. The evidence indicates that s. 251 causes a certain amount of delay for women who are successful in meeting its criteria. In the context of abortion, any unnecessary delay can have profound consequences on the woman's physical and emotional well-being.

More specifically, in 1977, the Report of the Committee on the Operation of the Abortion Law (the Badgley Report) revealed that the average delay between a pregnant woman's first contact with a physician and a subsequent therapeutic abortion was eight weeks (p. 146). Although the situation appears to have improved since 1977, the extent of the improvement is not clear. The intervener, the Attorney General of Canada, submitted that the average delay in Ontario between the first visit to a physician and a therapeutic abortion was now between one and three weeks. Yet the respondent Crown admitted in a supplementary factum filed on November 27, 1986 with the permission of the Court that (p. 3):

> ... the evidence discloses that some women may find it very difficult to obtain an abortion: by necessity, abortion services are limited, since hospitals have budgetary, time, space and staff constraints as well as many medical responsibilities. As a result of these problems a woman may have to apply to several hospitals.

If forced to apply to several different therapeutic abortion committees, there can be no doubt that a woman will experience serious delay in obtaining a femme. Forcer une femme, sous la menace d'une sanction criminelle, à mener un fœtus à terme à moins qu'elle ne satisfasse à des critères sans rapport avec ses propres priorités et aspirations est une ingérence grave à l'égard de son corps et donc une violation de la sécurité de sa personne. La Charte exige donc que l'art. 251 soit conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

Quoique cette atteinte à l'intégrité physique et émotionnelle suffise en soi pour déclencher un examen de l'art. 251 en fonction des principes de justice fondamentale, le fonctionnement du mécanisme décisionnel établi par l'art. 251 crée d'autres violations flagrantes de la sécurité de la personne. La preuve indique que l'art. 251 est cause d'un certain retard pour les femmes qui satisfont à ses critères. Dans le contexte de l'avortement, tout retard inutile peut avoir de profondes répercussions sur le bien-être physique et émotionnel d'une femme.

Pour être plus précis, en 1977, le Rapport du Comité sur l'application des dispositions législatives sur l'avortement (le rapport Badgley) a révélé que le délai moyen entre la première consultation d'un médecin par une femme enceinte et l'avortement thérapeutique subséquent est de huit semaines (à la p. 146). Bien qu'il semble que la situation se soit améliorée depuis 1977, l'ampleur de cette amélioration n'est pas claire. L'intervenant, le procureur général du Canada, fait valoir que le délai moyen en Ontario entre une première visite chez le médecin et l'avortement thérapeutique est maintenant d'une à trois semaines. Pourtant, le ministère public intimé admet, dans un mémoire supplémentaire produit le 27 novembre 1986, avec l'autorisation de la Cour, que (à la p. 3):

Si une femme est forcée de s'adresser à plusieurs comités de l'avortement thérapeutique différents, il ne peut y avoir de doute qu'elle a à faire face à un therapeutic abortion. In her Report on Therapeutic Abortion Services in Ontario (the Powell Report), Dr. Marion Powell emphasized that (p. 7):

> The entire process [of obtaining an abortion] was found to be protracted with women requiring three to seven contacts with health professionals . . . .

Revealing the full extent of this problem, Dr. Augustin Roy, the President of the Corporation professionnelle des médecins du Québec, testified that studies showed that in Quebec the waiting time for a therapeutic abortion in hospital varied between one and six weeks.

These periods of delay may not seem unduly long, but in the case of abortion, the implications of any delay, according to the evidence, are potentially devastating. The first factor to consider is that different medical techniques are employed to perform abortions at different stages of pregnancy. The testimony of expert doctors at trial indicated that in the first twelve weeks of pregnancy, the relatively safe and simple suction dilation and curettage method of abortion is typically used in North America. From the thirteenth to the sixteenth week, the more dangerous dilation and evacuation procedure is performed, although much less often in Canada than in the United States. From the sixteenth week of pregnancy, the instillation method is commonly employed in Canada. This method requires the intra-amniotic introduction of prostaglandin, urea, or a saline solution, which causes a woman to go into labour, giving birth to a foetus which is usually dead, but not invariably so. The uncontroverted evidence showed that each method of abortion progressively increases risks to the woman. (See, e.g., Tyler, et al., "Second Trimester Induced Abortion in the United States", in Garry S. Berger, William Brenner and Louis Keith, eds., Second-Trimester Abortion: Perspectives After a Decade of Experience.) délai considérable pour obtenir un avortement thérapeutique. Dans son Report on Therapeutic Abortion Services in Ontario (le rapport Powell), le Dr Marion Powell souligne (à la p. 7):

> [TRADUCTION] Il est apparu que tout le processus [d'obtention d'un avortement] traîne en longueur, les femmes étant obligées de rencontrer de trois à sept professionnels de la santé . . .

Révélant l'ampleur du problème, le Dr Augustin Roy, président de la Corporation professionnelle des médecins du Québec, a dit dans son témoignage que les études qu'il avait faites montraient qu'au Québec l'attente pour un avortement thérapeutique dans un hôpital variait d'une à six semaines.

Ces délais peuvent ne pas sembler très longs, mais, dans le cas d'un avortement, tout retard, d'après la preuve, peut avoir des conséquences dévastatrices. Le premier facteur dont il faut tenir compte est que différentes techniques médicales sont utilisées pour pratiquer les avortements à différents stades de la grossesse. Le témoignage des médecins au procès, à titre d'experts, a montré que, dans les douze premières semaines de la grossesse, la méthode d'avortement relativement sûre et simple de la dilatation et de l'aspiration, suivies d'un curetage, est normalement utilisée en Amérique du Nord. De la treizième à la seizième semaines, la méthode, plus dangereuse, de la dilatation cervicale et de l'évacuation utérine est pratiquée, moins souvent au Canada qu'aux États-Unis. À partir de la seizième semaine de grossesse, la méthode médicamenteuse est habituellement utilisée au Canada. Elle requiert l'introduction dans le liquide amniotique de prostaglandine, d'urée ou d'une solution saline qui provoque les contractions; la femme accouche d'un fœtus, habituellement mort-né, encore que ce ne soit pas toujours le cas. La preuve non contredite démontre que d'une méthode à l'autre, les risques courus par la femme s'accroissent. (Voir, par ex., Tyler, et al., «Second Trimester Induced Abortion in the United States», in Garry S. Berger, William Brenner and Louis Keith, eds., Second-Trimester Abortion: Perspectives After a Decade of Experience.)

The second consideration is that even within the periods appropriate to each method of abortion, the evidence indicated that the earlier the abortion was performed, the fewer the complications and the lower the risk of mortality. For example, a study emanating from the Centre for Disease Control in Atlanta confirmed that "D & E [dilation and evacuation] procedures performed at 13 to 15 weeks' gestation were nearly 3 times safer than those performed at 16 weeks or later". (Cates and Grimes, "Deaths from Second Trimester Abortion by Dilation and Evacuation: Causes, Prevention, Facilities" (1981), 58 Obstetrics and Gynecology 401, at p. 401. See also the Powell Report, at p. 36.) The Court was advised that because of their perceptions of risk, Canadian doctors often refuse to use the dilation and evacuation procedure from the thirteenth to sixteenth weeks and instead wait until they consider it appropriate to use the instillation technique. Even more revealing were the overall mortality statistics evaluated by Drs. Cates and Grimes. They concluded from their study of the relevant data that:

Anything that contributes to delay in performing abortions increases the complication rates by 15 to 30%, and the chance of dying by 50% for each week of delay.

These statistics indicate clearly that even if the average delay caused by s. 251 per arguendo is of only a couple of weeks' duration, the effects upon any particular woman can be serious and, occasionally, fatal.

It is no doubt true that the overall complication and mortality rates for women who undergo abortions are very low, but the increasing risks caused by delay are so clearly established that I have no difficulty in concluding that the delay in obtaining therapeutic abortions caused by the mandatory procedures of s. 251 is an infringement of the purely physical aspect of the individual's right to security of the person. I should stress that the marked contrast between the relative speed with which abortions can be obtained at the government-sponsored community clinics in Quebec and in hospitals under the s. 251 procedure was estab-

La seconde considération est que, même au cours des périodes où chaque méthode d'avortement peut être employée, la preuve indique que plus l'avortement a lieu tôt, moins il y a de complications et inférieur est le risque de décès. Par exemple, une étude du Centre for Disease Control d'Atlanta a confirmé que [TRADUCTION] «la méthode D & E [dilatation cervicale et évacuation utérine] utilisée de la treizième à la quinzième semaines de grossesse est presque trois fois plus sûre qu'après seize semaines ou plus». (Cates et Grimes, «Deaths from Second Trimester Abortion by Dilation and Evacuation: Causes, Prevention, Facilities» (1981), 58 Obstetrics and Gynecology 401, à la p. 401. Voir aussi le rapport Powell, à la p. 36.) Il a été porté à la connaissance de la Cour qu'à cause des risques possibles les médecins canadiens refusent souvent d'employer la méthode de la dilatation cervicale et de l'évacuation utérine entre la treizième et la seizième semaines, préférant attendre le moment où ils jugeront pouvoir avoir recours à la méthode médicamenteuse. Les statistiques globales de mortalité évaluées par les Dr Cates et Grimes sont encore plus révélatrices. Ils concluent, après une étude des données pertinentes:

[TRADUCTION] Tout retard à pratiquer l'avortement augmente le taux de complication de 15 à 30 % et les probabilités de décès de 50 % par semaine de retard.

Ces statistiques indiquent clairement que même si le retard moyen causé par l'art. 251 n'est, par hypothèse, que de quelque deux semaines, les effets pour une femme donnée peuvent être graves et parfois mortels.

Il est certainement vrai que les taux globaux de complication et de mortalité pour les femmes qui subissent un avortement sont très faibles, mais l'augmentation des risques causés par tout retard est si clairement établie que je n'ai aucune difficulté à conclure que tout retard à obtenir un avortement thérapeutique, en raison de la procédure imposée par l'art. 251, est une atteinte à l'aspect purement physique du droit de chacun à la sécurité de sa personne. Je dois souligner que le contraste marqué entre la relative rapidité avec laquelle des avortements peuvent être obtenus dans les Centres locaux de santé communautaire du lished at trial. The evidence indicated that at the government-sponsored clinics in Quebec, the maximum delay was less than a week. One must conclude, and perhaps underline, that the delay experienced by many women seeking a therapeutic abortion, be it of one, two, four, or six weeks' duration, is caused in large measure by the requirements of s. 251 itself.

The above physical interference caused by the delays created by s. 251, involving a clear risk of damage to the physical well-being of a woman, is sufficient, in my view, to warrant inquiring whether s. 251 comports with the principles of fundamental justice. However, there is yet another infringement of security of the person. It is clear from the evidence that s. 251 harms the psychological integrity of women seeking abortions. A 1985 report of the Canadian Medical Association, discussed in the Powell Report, at p. 15, emphasized that the procedure involved in s. 251, with the concomitant delays, greatly increases the stress levels of patients and that this can lead to more physical complications associated with abortion. A specialist in fertility control, Dr. Henry David, was qualified as an expert witness at trial on the psychological impact upon women of delay in the process of obtaining an abortion. He testified that his own studies had demonstrated that there is increased psychological stress imposed upon women who are forced to wait for abortions, and that this stress is compounded by the uncertainty whether or not a therapeutic abortion committee will actually grant approval.

Perhaps the most powerful testimony regarding the psychological impact upon women caused by the delay inherent in s. 251 procedures was offered at trial by Dr. Jane Hodgson, the Medical Director of the Women's Health Center in Duluth, Minnesota. She was called to testify as to her experiences with Canadian women who had come to the Women's Health Center for abortions. Her testimony was extensive, but the flavour may be gleaned from the following short excerpts:

Québec, subventionnés par le gouvernement, et dans les hôpitaux en vertu de la procédure de l'art. 251 a été établi au procès. D'après la preuve, dans les CLSC du Québec, l'attente maximum est inférieure à une semaine. On doit conclure, et peut-être souligner, que l'attente que doivent subir de nombreuses femmes voulant un avortement thérapeutique, qu'il s'agisse d'une, de deux, de quatre ou de six semaines, est due dans une large mesure aux exigences de l'art. 251 lui-même.

L'ingérence physique exposée ci-dessus, imputable aux délais découlant de l'art. 251 et impliquant un risque clair de préjudice pour le bien-être physique d'une femme, suffit, à mon avis, pour justifier qu'on se demande si l'art. 251 est conforme avec les principes de justice fondamentale. Il y a toutefois une autre violation de la sécurité de la personne. Il ressort de la preuve que l'art. 251 porte atteinte à l'intégrité psychologique des femmes voulant un avortement. Un rapport de 1985 de l'Association médicale canadienne, étudié dans le rapport Powell, à la p. 15, souligne que la procédure qu'implique l'art. 251, avec les délais qui en découlent, accroît de beaucoup le niveau d'angoisse des patientes, ce qui peut accroître le nombre de complications somatiques liées à l'avortement. Un spécialiste en fertilité, le Dr Henry David, a témoigné à titre d'expert au procès au sujet de l'effet psychologique sur les femmes des délais d'obtention d'un avortement. D'après son témoignage, ses propres études ont démontré que la tension psychologique augmente chez les femmes forcées d'attendre pour se faire avorter, d'autant que cette tension est accrue par l'incertitude quant à savoir si un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique donnera ou non son approbation.

Le Dr Jane Hodgson, directrice médicale du Women's Health Center de Duluth, au Minnesota, a sans doute donné, au procès, le témoignage le plus impressionnant au sujet de l'effet psychologique sur les femmes des délais inhérents à la procédure de l'art. 251. Elle avait été assignée afin de faire part de son expérience avec les femmes canadiennes qui se rendent au Women's Health Center pour se faire avorter. Son témoignage est long, mais ces brefs extraits peuvent en transmettre l'idée:

May I add one other thing that I think is very vital, and that is that many of these [Canadian] women come down because they know they will be delayed in getting, first, permission, then delayed in getting a hospital bed, or getting into the hospital, and so they know they will have to have saline [instillation] procedures. And some of them have been through this, and others know what it is about, and they will do almost anything to avoid having a saline procedure.

And of course, that is — I consider that a very cruel type of medical care and will do anything to help them to avoid this type of treatment.

The cost, the time consumed, the medical risks, the mental anguish — all of this is cruelty, in this day and age, because it's [the instillation procedure] an obsolete procedure that is essentially disappearing in the United States.

I have already noted that the instillation procedure requires a woman actually to experience labour and to suffer through the birth of a foetus that is usually but not always dead. Statistics from 1982 indicated that 33.4 per cent of second trimester abortions in Ontario were done by instillation, and the Powell Report revealed, at p. 36, that even in 1986 there persisted a high incidence of second trimester abortions in Ontario. The psychological injury caused by delay in obtaining abortions, much of which must be attributed to the procedures set out in s. 251, constitutes an additional infringement of the right to security of the person.

In its supplementary factum and in oral submissions, the Crown argued that evidence of what could be termed "administrative inefficiency" is not relevant to the evaluation of legislation for the purposes of s. 7 of the Charter. The Crown argued that only evidence regarding the purpose of legislation is relevant. The assumption, of course, is that any impairment to the physical or psychological interests of individuals caused by s. 251 of the Criminal Code does not amount to an infringement of security of the person because the injury is caused by practical difficulties and is not intended by the legislator.

Et, bien entendu, c'est-à-dire [. . .] j'estime qu'il s'agit là d'une thérapeutique des plus cruelles, aussi suis-je prête à tout faire pour les aider à l'éviter.

Le coût, le temps perdu, les risques médicaux, l'angoisse mentale: tout cela c'est de la cruauté, aujourd'hui, à notre époque, parce qu'il s'agit d'une méthode [la méthode médicamenteuse] désuette, à peu près en voie de disparition aux États-Unis.

J'ai déjà dit que la méthode médicamenteuse oblige la femme à subir les contractions et à endurer l'accouchement d'un fœtus généralement mais pas toujours mort-né. Les statistiques de 1982 montrent que, dans 33,4 pour 100 des avortements en Ontario, on a utilisé la méthode médicamenteuse et le rapport Powell révèle, à la p. 36, que, même en 1986, il y avait toujours une haute incidence d'avortements pratiqués au second trimestre en Ontario. Le dommage psychologique causé par le délai d'obtention des avortements, dont une grande part doit être attribuée à la procédure prévue à l'art. 251, constitue une atteinte supplémentaire au droit à la sécurité de la personne.

Dans son mémoire supplémentaire et au cours des plaidoiries, le ministère public a soutenu que les éléments de preuve relatifs à ce qu'on pourrait qualifier de «lenteurs administratives» ne sauraient entrer en ligne de compte dans l'évaluation d'une loi aux fins de l'art. 7 de la Charte. Le ministère public fait valoir que seuls les éléments de preuve portant sur l'objet de la loi sont pertinents. Ceci présume donc que les atteintes aux intérêts physiques ou psychologiques des individus causées par l'art. 251 du Code criminel ne constituent pas une atteinte à la sécurité de la personne, car le dommage résulte de difficultés pratiques et n'est pas l'objectif du législateur.

The submission is faulty on two counts. First, as a practical matter it is not possible in the case of s. 251 to erect a rigid barrier between the purposes of the section and the administrative procedures established to carry those purposes into effect. For example, although it may be true that Parliament did not enact s. 251 intending to create delays in obtaining therapeutic abortions, the evidence demonstrates that the system established by the section for obtaining a therapeutic abortion certificate inevitably does create significant delays. It is not possible to say that delay results only from administrative constraints, such as limited budgets or a lack of qualified persons to sit on therapeutic abortion committees. Delay results from the cumbersome operating requirements of s. 251 itself. (See, by way of analogy, R. v. Therens, per Le Dain J., at p. 645.) Although the mandate given to the courts under the Charter does not, generally speaking, enable the judiciary to provide remedies for administrative inefficiencies, when denial of a right as basic as security of the person is infringed by the procedure and administrative structures created by the law itself, the courts are empowered to act.

Secondly, were it nevertheless possible in this case to dissociate purpose and administration, this Court has already held as a matter of law that purpose is not the only appropriate criterion in evaluating the constitutionality of legislation under the Charter. In R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., at p. 331, the Court stated that:

> . . . both purpose and effect are relevant in determining constitutionality; either an unconstitutional purpose or an unconstitutional effect can invalidate legislation.

Even if the purpose of legislation is unobjectionable, the administrative procedures created by law to bring that purpose into operation may produce unconstitutional effects, and the legislation should then be struck down. It is important to note that, in speaking of the effects of legislation, the Court in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd. was still referring to effects that can invalidate legislation under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and not to individual effects that might lead a court to provide a person-

L'argument est spécieux pour deux raisons. D'abord, en pratique, il n'est pas possible, dans le cas de l'art. 251, d'ériger une cloison étanche entre l'objet recherché par l'article et la procédure administrative établie pour l'atteindre. Par exemple, quoiqu'il puisse être vrai que le législateur n'a pas adopté l'art. 251 dans le but de retarder l'obtention des avortements thérapeutiques, la preuve démontre que le système établi par l'article pour obtenir un certificat d'avortement thérapeutique crée inévitablement des délais importants. Il n'est pas possible de dire que ces retards ne résultent que des contraintes administratives, tels les budgets restreints ou le manque de personnel qualifié apte à siéger aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique. Les délais résultent de la lourdeur du mécanisme prévu à l'art. 251 lui-même. (Voir par analogie l'arrêt R. c. Therens, le juge Le Dain, à la p. 645.) Si le mandat conféré aux tribunaux par la Charte n'autorise pas, généralement parlant, le pouvoir judiciaire à accorder un recours contre les lenteurs administratives, néanmoins, lorsqu'un droit aussi fondamental que la sécurité de la personne est enfreint par la procédure et les structures administratives créées par la loi elle-même, les tribunaux ont le pouvoir d'agir.

En second lieu, même s'il était possible en l'espèce de dissocier objet et administration, la Cour a déjà statué en droit que l'objet n'est pas le seul critère valable d'évaluation de la constitutionnalité d'une loi en fonction de la Charte. Dans l'arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., à la p. 331, la Cour dit:

> . . . l'objet et l'effet d'une loi sont tous les deux importants pour déterminer sa constitutionnalité; un objet inconstitutionnel ou un effet inconstitutionnel peuvent l'un et l'autre rendre une loi invalide.

Même si l'objet d'une loi est inattaquable, la procédure administrative créée par la loi pour la mise en œuvre de cet objet peut produire des effets inconstitutionnels et la loi doit alors être invalidée. Il importe de rappeler qu'en parlant des effets d'une loi, la Cour, dans l'arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., se référait encore aux effets qui peuvent invalider une loi en vertu de l'art. 52 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 et non aux effets individuels, qui pourraient amener un tribunal à accor-al remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter. In the present case, the appellants are complaining of the general effects of s. 251. If section 251 of the Criminal Code does indeed breach s. 7 of the Charter through its general effects, that can be sufficient to invalidate the legislation under s. 52. As an aside, I should note that the appellants have standing to challenge an unconstitutional law if they are liable to conviction for an offence under that law even though the unconstitutional effects aré not directed at the appellants per se: R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., at p. 313. The standing of the appellants was not challenged by the Crown.

In summary, s. 251 is a law which forces women to carry a foetus to term contrary to their own priorities and aspirations and which imposes serious delay causing increased physical and psychological trauma to those women who meet its criteria. It must, therefore, be determined whether that infringement is accomplished in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, thereby saving s. 251 under the second part of s. 7.

C. The Principles of Fundamental Justice

Although the "principles of fundamental justice" referred to in s. 7 have both a substantive and a procedural component (Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, at p. 499), I have already indicated that it is not necessary in this appeal to evaluate the substantive content of s. 251 of the Criminal Code. My discussion will therefore be limited to various aspects of the administrative structure and procedure set down in s. 251 for access to therapeutic abortions.

In outline, s. 251 operates in the following manner. Subsection (1) creates an indictable offence for any person to use any means with the intent "to procure the miscarriage of a female person". Subsection (2) establishes a parallel indictable offence for any pregnant woman to use or to permit any means to be used with the intent "to procure her own miscarriage". The "means" referred to in subss. (1) and (2) are defined in subs. (3) as the administration of a drug or "other noxious thing", the use of an instrument, and der une réparation à une personne en vertu du par. 24(1) de la Charte. En l'espèce, les appelants se plaignent des effets généraux de l'art. 251. Si l'article 251 du Code criminel viole effectivement l'art. 7 de la Charte par suite de ses effets généraux, cela peut suffir à invalider la loi en vertu de l'art. 52. Par ailleurs, je rappellerais que les appelants ont qualité pour contester une loi inconstitutionnelle s'ils risquent d'être déclarés coupables d'une infraction à cette loi, même s'ils n'ont pas directement à pâtir des effets inconstitutionnels: l'arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., à la p. 313. Le ministère public n'a d'ailleurs pas contesté leur qualité pour agir.

En résumé, l'art. 251 est un texte législatif qui oblige des femmes à mener un fœtus à terme à l'encontre de leurs propres priorités et aspirations et qui impose des délais considérables qui accroissent le traumatisme physique et psychologique des femmes qui satisfont à ses critères. Il faut donc déterminer si l'atteinte a eu lieu en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale, ce qui sauverait l'art. 251 en vertu de la seconde partie de l'art. 7.

C. Les principes de justice fondamentale

Bien que les «principes de justice fondamentale» mentionnés à l'art. 7 aient une composante de fond et une composante de procédure (Renvoi: Motor Vehicule Act de la C.-B., à la p. 499), j'ai déjà dit qu'il n'est pas nécessaire en l'espèce de se prononcer sur le fond de l'art. 251 du Code criminel. Mon analyse se limitera donc aux divers aspects de la structure et de la procédure administratives établies par l'art. 251 pour l'obtention des avortements thérapeutiques.

En bref, l'art. 251 fonctionne de la manière suivante. Le paragraphe (1) fait un acte criminel de l'emploi, par qui que ce soit, de quelque moyen avec l'intention «de procurer l'avortement d'une personne du sexe féminin». Le paragraphe (2) prévoit, en parallèle, que se rend coupable d'un acte criminel toute femme enceinte qui emploie ou permet que soit employé quelque moyen avec l'intention «d'obtenir son propre avortement». Les «moyens» dont il est question aux par. (1) et (2) sont définis au par. (3) comme étant l'administra-

"manipulation of any kind". The crucial provision for the purposes of the present appeal is subs. (4) which states that the offences created in subss. (1) and (2) "do not apply" in certain circumstances. The Ontario Court of Appeal in the proceedings below characterized s. 251(4) as an "exculpatory provision" ((1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 353, at p. 365). In Morgentaler (1975), at p. 673, a majority of this Court held that the effect of s. 251(4) was to afford "a complete answer and defence to those who respect its terms".

The procedure surrounding the defence is rather complex. A pregnant woman who desires to have an abortion must apply to the "therapeutic abortion committee" of an "accredited or approved hospital". Such a committee is empowered to issue a certificate in writing stating that in the opinion of a majority of the committee, the continuation of the pregnancy would be likely to endanger the pregnant woman's life or health. Once a copy of the certificate is given to a qualified medical practitioner who is not a member of the therapeutic abortion committee, he or she is permitted to perform an abortion on the pregnant woman and both the doctor and the woman are freed from any criminal liability.

A number of definitions are provided in subs. (6) which have a bearing on the disposition of this appeal. An "accredited hospital" is described as a hospital accredited by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation "in which diagnostic services and medical, surgical and obstetrical treatment" are provided. An "approved hospital" is a hospital "approved for the purposes of this section by the Minister of Health" of a province. A "therapeutic abortion committee" must be "comprised of not less than three members each of whom is a qualified medical practitioner" who is appointed by a hospital's administrative board. Interestingly, the term "health" is not defined for the purposes of s. 251, so it would appear that the therapeutic abortion committees are free to develop their own theories as to when a potential impairment of a woman's "health" would justify the granting of a therapeutic abortion certificate.

tion d'une drogue ou «autre substance délétère», l'emploi d'un instrument et «toute manipulation». La disposition cruciale en l'espèce est le par. (4) selon lequel les infractions prévues aux par. (1) et (2) «ne s'appliquent pas» dans certaines circonstances. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario, en l'espèce, a qualifié le par. 251(4) de [TRADUCTION] «disposition disculpatoire» ((1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 353, à la p. 365). Dans l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975), à la p. 673, cette Cour, à la majorité, a jugé que le par. 251(4) avait pour effet d'offrir «à ceux qui satisfont à ses conditions, un moyen de défense complet».

La procédure entourant cette défense est plutôt complexe. Une femme enceinte qui désire un avortement doit s'adresser au «comité de l'avortement thérapeutique» d'un hôpital «accrédité ou approuvé». Ce comité a le pouvoir de délivrer un certificat écrit attestant que, par décision de la majorité des membres du comité, la continuation de la grossesse risque de mettre la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte en danger. Sur remise d'une copie du certificat à un médecin qualifié qui n'est pas membre du comité de l'avortement thérapeutique, celui-ci est autorisé à procurer un avortement à la femme enceinte et tant le médecin que la femme échappent à toute responsabilité criminelle.

Le paragraphe (6) fournit plusieurs définitions qui ont des répercussions sur l'issue de ce pourvoi. Un «hôpital accrédité» désigne un hôpital accrédité par le Conseil canadien d'accréditation des hôpitaux «dans lequel sont fournis des services de diagnostic et des traitements médicaux, chirurgicaux et obstétricaux». Un «hôpital approuvé» est un hôpital «approuvé aux fins du présent article par le ministre de la Santé» d'une province. Un «comité de l'avortement thérapeutique» doit être «formé d'au moins trois membres qui sont tous des médecins qualifiés» nommés par le Conseil d'administration de l'hôpital. Curieusement, le terme «santé» n'est pas défini à l'art. 251, de sorte qu'il semble que les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique sont libres d'élaborer leur propre théorie pour déterminer quand une atteinte éventuelle à la «santé» d'une femme peut justifier l'octroi d'un certificat d'avortement thérapeutique.

As is so often the case in matters of interpretation, however, the straightforward reading of this statutory scheme is not fully revealing. In order to understand the true nature and scope of s. 251, it is necessary to investigate the practical operation of the provisions. The Court has been provided with a myriad of factual submissions in this area. One of the most useful sources of information is the Badgley Report. The Committee on the Operation of the Abortion Law was established by Orders-in-Council P.C. 1975-2305, -2306, and -2307 of September 29, 1975 and its terms of reference instructed it to "conduct a study to determine whether the procedure provided in the Criminal Code for obtaining therapeutic abortions is operating equitably across Canada". Statistics were provided to the Committee by Statistics Canada and the Committee conducted its own research, meeting with officials of the departments of the provincial attorneys general and of health, and visiting 140 hospitals throughout Canada. The Committee also commissioned national hospital, hospital staff, physician, and patient surveys. The overall conclusion of the Committee was that "The procedures set out for the operation of the Abortion Law are not working equitably across Canada" (p. 17). Of course, that conclusion does not lead to the necessary inference that s. 251 procedures violate the principles of fundamental justice. Unfair functioning of the law could be caused by external forces which do not relate to the law itself.

Cependant, comme c'est souvent le cas en matière d'interprétation, la simple lecture des dispositions législatives ne dit pas tout. Pour comprendre la nature et la portée véritables de l'art. 251, il est nécessaire d'examiner l'application pratique des dispositions. La Cour a reçu une myriade de mémoires sur les faits à cet égard. L'une des sources d'information les plus utiles est le rapport Badgley. Le comité sur l'application des dispositions législatives sur l'avortement a été créé par les décrets C.P. 1975-2305, -2306, -2307 du 29 septembre 1975 avec pour mandat «d'entreprendre une étude visant à déterminer si les dispositions prévues par le Code criminel relativement à la pratique d'avortements thérapeutiques sont appliquées de manière équitable dans tout le Canada». Statistique Canada a fourni des statistiques au comité et celui-ci a aussi procédé à ses propres recherches, rencontrant les fonctionnaires des ministères des procureurs généraux et des ministères provinciaux de la santé et procédant à la visite de 140 hôpitaux canadiens. Le comité a aussi fait procéder à des sondages, à l'échelle nationale, sur les hôpitaux, leur personnel, les médecins et les patients. Le comité a conclu en somme que: «Le recours prévu par la Loi sur l'avortement n'est pas appliqué de façon équitable à travers le Canada» (à la p. 19). Bien entendu, cette conclusion n'amène pas nécessairement à dire que la procédure prévue à l'art. 251 viole les principes de justice fondamentale. Une application injuste de la loi peut être imputable à des forces externes qui n'ont rien à voir avec la loi elle-même.

The Badgley Report contains a wealth of detailed information which demonstrates, however, that many of the most serious problems with the functioning of s. 251 are created by procedural and administrative requirements established in the law. For example, the Badgley Committee noted, at p. 84, that:

> ... the Abortion Law implicitly establishes a minimum requirement of three qualified physicians to serve on a therapeutic abortion committee, plus a qualified medical practitioner who is not a member of the therapeutic abortion committee, to perform the procedure.

The Committee went on to make the following observation at p. 102:

Le rapport Badgley est une mine de renseignements qui démontre cependant qu'un grand nombre des problèmes les plus graves dans l'application de l'art. 251 résultent des exigences administratives et de procédures établies par la loi. Par exemple, le comité Badgley note, à la p. 92:

> ... la Loi sur l'avortement exige implicitement un minimum de trois médecins qualifiés agissant comme membres du comité de l'avortement thérapeutique, plus un médecin qualifié qui n'est pas membre de ce comité, pour pratiquer l'intervention.

Le comité poursuit avec l'observation suivante (à la p. 113):

Of the 1,348 civilian hospitals in operation in 1976, at least 331 hospitals had less than four physicians on their medical staff. In terms of the distribution of physicians, 24.6 percent of hospitals in Canada did not have a medical staff which was large enough to establish a therapeutic abortion committee and to perform the abortion procedure.

In other words, the seemingly neutral requirement of s. 251(4) that at least four physicians be available to authorize and to perform an abortion meant in practice that abortions would be absolutely unavailable in almost one quarter of all hospitals in Canada.

Other administrative and procedural requirements of s. 251(4) reduce the availability of therapeutic abortions even further. For the purposes of s. 251, therapeutic abortions can only be performed in "accredited" or "approved" hospitals. As noted above, an "approved" hospital is one which a provincial minister of health has designated as such for the purpose of performing therapeutic abortions. The minister is under no obligation to grant any such approval. Furthermore, an "accredited" hospital must not only be accredited by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation, it must also provide specified services. Many Canadian hospitals do not provide all of the required services, thereby being automatically disqualified from undertaking therapeutic abortions. The Badgley Report stressed the remarkable limitations created by these requirements, especially when linked with the four-physician rule discussed above (p. 105):

> Of the total of 1,348 non-military hospitals in Canada in 1976, 789 hospitals, or 58.5 percent, were ineligible in terms of their major treatment functions, the size of their medical staff, or their type of facility to establish therapeutic abortion committees.

Moreover, even if a hospital is eligible to create a therapeutic abortion committee, there is no requirement in s. 251 that the hospital need do so. The Badgley Committee discovered that in 1976, of the 559 general hospitals which met the proce-

Sur les 1,348 hôpitaux civils en service en 1976, au moins 331 hôpitaux comptaient moins de quatre médecins membres de leur personnel médical. En ce qui concerne la répartition des médecins, 24.6 pour cent des hôpitaux au Canada n'avaient pas un personnel médical suffisamment important pour pouvoir créer un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique et pratiquer l'avortement.

En d'autres termes, l'obligation du par. 251(4), neutre en apparence, qu'au moins quatre médecins soient disponibles pour autoriser et pratiquer un avortement, signifie en pratique qu'il serait absolument impossible d'obtenir un avortement dans près du quart de tous les hôpitaux au Canada.

D'autres exigences administratives et procédurales du par. 251(4) réduisent la possibilité d'obtenir des avortements thérapeutiques. Pour les fins de l'art. 251, les avortements thérapeutiques ne peuvent être pratiqués que dans des hôpitaux «accrédités» ou «approuvés». Comme il a été dit précédemment, un hôpital «approuvé» est un hôpital que le ministre de la Santé de la province désigne comme tel, afin de lui permettre de pratiquer des avortements thérapeutiques. Le ministre n'a aucune obligation d'octroyer cette approbation. En outre, un hôpital «accrédité» doit non seulement être accrédité par le Conseil canadien d'accréditation des hôpitaux, il doit aussi offrir certains services précis. Un grand nombre d'hôpitaux canadiens n'offrent pas tous les services requis, ce qui leur interdit automatiquement de pratiquer des avortements thérapeutiques. Le rapport Badgley souligne les limitations importantes que ces exigences imposent surtout lorsqu'on les lie avec la règle des quatre médecins mentionnée ci-dessus (à la p. 115):

> Sur les 1,348 hôpitaux civils que comptait le Canada en 1976, 789 hôpitaux, soit 58.5 pour cent, n'étaient pas aptes à établir un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique, soit en raison de la spécialisation des traitements fournis dans ces établissements, soit à cause d'un personnel médical insuffisant ou du genre d'installations dont ils disposaient.

De plus, même si un hôpital est autorisé à former un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique, rien dans l'art. 251 ne l'oblige à le faire. Le comité Badgley a découvert qu'en 1976, des 559 hôpitaux généraux qui répondaient aux exigences de procédure dural requirements of s. 251, only 271 hospitals in Canada, or only 20.1 per cent of the total, had actually established a therapeutic abortion committee (p. 105).

Even though the Badgley Report was issued ten years ago, the relevant statistics do not appear to be out of date. Indeed, Statistics Canada reported that in 1982 the number of hospitals with therapeutic abortion committees had actually fallen to 261. (Basic Facts on Therapeutic Abortions, Canada: 1982 (1983).) Even more recent data exists for Ontario. In the Powell Report, it was noted that in 1986 only 54 per cent of accredited acute care hospitals in the province had therapeutic abortion committees. In five counties there were no committees at all (p. 24). Of the 95 hospitals with committees, 12 did not do any abortions in 1986 (p. 24).

The Powell Report reveals another serious difficulty with s. 251 procedures. The requirement that therapeutic abortions be performed only in "accredited" or "approved" hospitals effectively means that the practical availability of the exculpatory provisions of subs. (4) may be heavily restricted, even denied, through provincial regulation. In Ontario, for example, the provincial government promulgated O. Reg. 248/70 under The Public Hospitals Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 322, now R.R.O. 1980, Reg. 865. This regulation provides that therapeutic abortion committees can only be established where there are ten or more members on the active medical staff (Powell Report, at p. 13). A minister of health is not prevented from imposing harsher restrictions. During argument, it was noted that it would even be possible for a provincial government, exercising its legislative authority over public hospitals, to distribute funding for treatment facilities in such a way that no hospital would meet the procedural requirements of s. 251(4). Because of the administrative structure established in s. 251(4) and the related definitions, the "defence" created in the section could be completely wiped out.

de l'art. 251, 271 hôpitaux seulement, au Canada, soit seulement 20,1 pour 100 du total, avaient effectivement formé un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique (à la p. 116).

Même si le rapport Badgley remonte à dix ans, les statistiques en cause ne semblent pas périmées. D'ailleurs, Statistique Canada rapportait qu'en 1982 le nombre d'hôpitaux ayant des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique était en fait tombé à 261. (Principales statistiques sur les avortements thérapeutiques, Canada: 1982 (1983).) Les statistiques pour l'Ontario sont encore plus récentes. Dans le rapport Powell, on mentionne qu'en 1986 seulement 54 pour 100 des hôpitaux accrédités dans la province ayant un département de soins intensifs avaient formé des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique. Dans cinq comtés, il n'y avait aucun comité (à la p. 24). Des 95 hôpitaux ayant des comités, 12 n'avaient pas pratiqué d'avortements en 1986 (à la p. 24).

Le rapport Powell révèle que la procédure de l'art. 251 suscite une autre difficulté grave. L'obligation que les avortements thérapeutiques soient seulement pratiqués dans des hôpitaux «accrédités» ou «approuvés» signifie que le recours en pratique aux dispositions disculpatoires du par. 4 peut être fortement limité et même supprimé par la réglementation provinciale. En Ontario, par exemple, le gouvernement provincial a promulgué le règlement 248/70 en application de The Public Hospitals Act, R.S.O. 1960, chap. 322, maintenant R.R.O. 1980, Reg. 865. Ce règlement porte que des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique ne peuvent être formés que si le personnel médical actif compte dix membres ou plus (rapport Powell, à la p. 13). Rien n'interdit au ministre de la Santé d'imposer des restrictions plus draconiennes. Au cours des plaidoiries, on a rappelé qu'il serait même possible pour un gouvernement provincial, dans l'exercice de son autorité législative sur les hôpitaux publics, de distribuer les fonds pour les soins de santé de façon à ce qu'aucun hôpital ne puisse satisfaire aux exigences procédurales du par. 251(4). À cause de la structure administrative établie par le par. 251(4) et des définitions qui s'y rapportent, la «défense» prévue par l'article pourrait disparaître complètement.

A further flaw with the administrative system established in s. 251(4) is the failure to provide an adequate standard for therapeutic abortion committees which must determine when a therapeutic abortion should, as a matter of law, be granted. Subsection (4) states simply that a therapeutic abortion committee may grant a certificate when it determines that a continuation of a pregnancy would be likely to endanger the "life or health" of the pregnant woman. It was noted above that "health" is not defined for the purposes of the section. The Crown admitted in its supplementary factum that the medical witnesses at trial testified uniformly that the "health" standard was ambiguous, but the Crown derives comfort from the fact that "the medical witnesses were unanimous in their approval of the broad World Health Organization definition of health". The World Health Organization defines "health" not merely as the absence of disease or infirmity, but as a state of physical, mental and social well-being.

I do not understand how the mere existence of a workable definition of "health" can make the use of the word in s. 251(4) any less ambiguous when that definition is nowhere referred to in the section. There is no evidence that therapeutic abortion committees are commonly applying the World Health Organization definition. Indeed, the Badgley Report indicates that the situation is quite the contrary (p. 20):

> There has been no sustained or firm effort in Canada to develop an explicit and operational definition of health, or to apply such a concept directly to the operation of induced abortion. In the absence of such a definition, each physician and each hospital reaches an individual decision on this matter. How the concept of health is variably defined leads to considerable inequity in the distribution and the accessibility of the abortion procedure.

Various expert doctors testified at trial that therapeutic abortion committees apply widely differing definitions of health. For some committees, psychological health is a justification for therapeutic abortion; for others it is not. Some committees routinely refuse abortions to married women

Le régime administratif établi par le par. 251(4) souffre d'une autre faiblesse: l'absence de norme adéquate à laquelle les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique doivent se référer lorsqu'ils ont à décider si un avortement thérapeutique devrait, en droit, être autorisé. Le paragraphe (4) dit simplement que le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique peut délivrer un certificat lorsqu'il estime que la poursuite de la grossesse pourrait mettre en danger la «vie ou la santé» de la femme enceinte. On a déjà signalé que le terme «santé» n'est pas défini aux fins de l'article. Le ministère public a reconnu dans son mémoire supplémentaire que, dans leurs dépositions au procès, les témoins médicaux ont tous dit que la norme de la "santé" était ambiguë, mais il trouve un certain réconfort dans le fait que [TRADUCTION] «les témoins médicaux ont unanimement approuvé la définition large du terme santé adoptée par l'Organisation mondiale de la santé». L'Organisation mondiale de la santé définit la «santé» non comme l'absence de maladie ou d'infirmité, mais plutôt comme un état physique, mental et social de bien-être.

Je ne comprends pas comment la simple existence d'une définition utilisable du terme «santé» peut rendre l'emploi de ce terme au par. 251(4) moins ambigu, alors que nulle part dans cet article on ne se réfère à cette définition. Il n'y a pas la moindre preuve que les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique appliquent généralement la définition de l'Organisation mondiale de la santé. En fait, le rapport Badgley révèle que c'est exactement le contraire (à la p. 22):

> Aucun effort sérieux et soutenu n'a été fait au Canada pour trouver une définition explicite et fonctionnelle de la santé ou pour appliquer un tel concept à l'avortement provoqué. En l'absence d'une telle définition, chaque médecin et chaque hôpital doit prendre une décision personnelle à ce sujet. Les différentes définitions de la santé ont conduit à des inégalités importantes dans la répartition et l'accessibilité du recours à l'avortement.

Plusieurs médecins sont venus témoigner au procès, à titre d'expert, pour dire que les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique appliquent des définitions fort différentes de la santé. Pour certains comités, la santé psychologique justifie un avortement thérapeutique; pour d'autres non. Certains unless they are in physical danger, while for other committees it is possible for a married woman to show that she would suffer psychological harm if she continued with a pregnancy, thereby justifying an abortion. It is not typically possible for women to know in advance what standard of health will be applied by any given committee. Parker A.C.J.H.C., at p. 377, found clear evidence that s. 251(4) provided no adequate guidelines for therapeutic abortion committees charged with determining when an abortion should legally be available:

> The [Badgley] report, and other evidence adduced in support of this motion, indicates that each therapeutic abortion committee is free to establish its own guidelines and many committees apply arbitrary requirements. Some committees refuse to approve applications for second abortions unless the patient consents to sterilization, others require psychiatric assessment, and others do not grant approval to married women.

It is no answer to say that "health" is a medical term and that doctors who sit on therapeutic abortion committees must simply exercise their professional judgment. A therapeutic abortion committee is a strange hybrid, part medical committee and part legal committee. Again, in the words of Parker A.C.J.H.C., at p. 381:

> Given the consequences of the issuing or refusing to issue a certificate, I have some difficulty in reducing the committee's powers to merely that of stating its opinion as to the likelihood of the continuation of the pregnancy endangering the applicant's life or health. The decision of the committee has a very real effect on access to abortion for the pregnant female applicant, and the potential criminal liability of both the applicant and the physician who performs the operation.

When the decision of the therapeutic abortion committee is so directly laden with legal consequences, the absence of any clear legal standard to be applied by the committee in reaching its decision is a serious procedural flaw.

comités refusent habituellement un avortement aux femmes mariées, à moins qu'elles ne soient physiquement en danger, alors que, pour d'autres comités, il est possible à une femme mariée de démontrer qu'elle subirait un préjudice psychologique si la grossesse se poursuivait, et de justifier ainsi un avortement. Il n'est, en général, pas possible que les femmes sachent à l'avance quelle norme de santé un comité donné appliquera. Le juge en chef adjoint Parker, à la p. 377, a jugé que la preuve montrait clairement que le par. 251(4) ne fournit pas de directives adéquates aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique chargés de décider quand, légalement, il peut y avoir avortement:

> [TRADUCTION] Le rapport [Badgley], et d'autres preuves présentées pour étayer cette requête montrent que chaque comité de l'avortement thérapeutique est libre de se doter de ses propres directives et que de nombreux comités ont des exigences arbitraires. Certains comités rejettent les demandes de deuxième avortement, à moins que la patiente ne consente à la stérilisation; d'autres exigent un examen psychiatrique et d'autres encore n'accordent pas d'approbation dans le cas des femmes mariées.

Il ne sert à rien de dire que le terme «santé» est un terme médical et que les médecins qui siègent aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique ne font qu'exercer leur jugement professionnel. Un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique est un hybride étrange, en partie comité médical et en partie comité légal. Ici encore, pour reprendre les propos du juge en chef adjoint Parker, à la p. 381:

Lorsque la décision du comité de l'avortement thérapeutique a des conséquences juridiques aussi directes, l'absence de norme légale claire à appliquer par le comité pour arriver à sa décision constitue un vice de procédure grave.

The combined effect of all of these problems with the procedure stipulated in s. 251 for access to therapeutic abortions is a failure to comply with the principles of fundamental justice. In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, Lamer J. held, at p. 503, that "the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system". One of the basic tenets of our system of criminal justice is that when Parliament creates a defence to a criminal charge, the defence should not be illusory or so difficult to attain as to be practically illusory. The criminal law is a very special form of governmental regulation, for it seeks to express our society's collective disapprobation of certain acts and omissions. When a defence is provided, especially a specifically-tailored defence to a particular charge, it is because the legislator has determined that the disapprobation of society is not warranted when the conditions of the defence are met.

L'effet combiné de tous ces problèmes et de la procédure établie par l'art. 251 pour l'obtention des avortements thérapeutiques constitue un manquement aux principes de justice fondamentale. Dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., le juge Lamer dit, à la p. 503: «les principes de justice fondamentale se trouvent dans les préceptes fondamentaux de notre système juridique». L'un des préceptes fondamentaux de notre système de justice criminelle est que, lorsque le Parlement crée une défense à l'égard d'une accusation criminelle, celle-ci ne doit être ni illusoire ni à ce point difficile à faire valoir qu'elle soit illusoire en pratique. Le droit criminel constitue une forme très spéciale de réglementation gouvernementale, car il cherche à exprimer la désapprobation collective de notre société pour certains actes ou omissions. Lorsqu'un moyen de défense est prévu, surtout lorsqu'il s'agit d'un moyen de défense conçu spécifiquement pour une accusation particulière, c'est parce que le législateur a jugé que la désapprobation de la société n'est pas justifiée lorsque les conditions de ce moyen de défense sont remplies.

Consider then the case of a pregnant married woman who wishes to apply for a therapeutic abortion certificate because she fears that her psychological health would be impaired seriously if she carried the foetus to term. The uncontroverted evidence reveals that there are many areas in Canada where such a woman would simply not have access to a therapeutic abortion. She may live in an area where no hospital has four doctors; no therapeutic abortion committee can be created. Equally, she may live in a place where the treatment functions of the nearby hospitals do not satisfy the definition of "accredited hospital" in s. 251(6). Or she may live in a province where the provincial government has imposed such stringent requirements on hospitals seeking to create therapeutic abortion committees that no hospital can qualify. Alternatively, our hypothetical woman may confront a therapeutic abortion committee in her local hospital which defines "health" in purely physical terms or which refuses to countenance abortions for married women. In each of these cases, it is the administrative structures and procedures established by s. 251 itself that would in Prenons donc le cas d'une femme mariée enceinte qui désire demander un certificat d'avortement thérapeutique parce qu'elle craint que sa santé psychologique soit gravement atteinte si elle mène le fœtus à terme. D'après la preuve indiscutée, il existe de nombreuses régions au Canada où cette femme ne pourrait tout simplement pas obtenir un avortement thérapeutique. Il se peut qu'elle vive dans une région où il n'y a pas d'hôpitaux où exercent quatre médecins; aucun comité d'avortement thérapeutique ne peut être créé. De même, il se peut qu'elle vive dans une région où les traitements qu'assurent les hôpitaux alentour ne répondent pas à la définition d'«hôpital accrédité» du par. 251(6). Ou il se peut qu'elle habite dans une province où le gouvernement provincial a imposé aux hôpitaux désireux de former des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique des conditions si rigoureuses qu'aucun hôpital ne peut y satisfaire. Ou encore, notre femme hypothétique peut avoir affaire à un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique, à l'hôpital local, qui définit la «santé» en termes purement somatiques ou qui refuse d'approuver l'avortement pour les femmes mariées. Dans practice prevent the woman from gaining the benefit of the defence held out to her in s. 251(4).

The facts indicate that many women do indeed confront these problems. Doctors from the Chedoke-McMaster Hospital in Hamilton testified that they received telephone calls from women throughout Ontario who had applied for therapeutic abortions at local hospitals and been refused. At one point, 80 per cent of abortion patients at Chedoke-McMaster were from outside Hamilton, and the hospital was forced to restrict access for women from outside its catchment area. The Powell Report revealed that in over 50 per cent of Ontario counties in 1986, the majority of women obtaining abortions had the procedure away from their place of residence (p. 7). Even more telling is the fact that "a minimum of 5000 Ontario women obtain abortions each year in free-standing clinics in Canada and the United States" (p. 7).

The Crown argues in its supplementary factum that women who face difficulties in obtaining abortions at home can simply travel elsewhere in Canada to procure a therapeutic abortion. That submission would not be especially troubling if the difficulties facing women were not in large measure created by the procedural requirements of s. 251 itself. If women were seeking anonymity outside their home town or were simply confronting the reality that it is often difficult to obtain medical services in rural areas, it might be appropriate to say "let them travel". But the evidence establishes convincingly that it is the law itself which in many ways prevents access to local therapeutic abortion facilities. The enormous emotional and financial burden placed upon women who must travel long distances from home to obtain an abortion is a burden created in many instances by Parliament. Moreover, it is not accurate to say to women who would seem to qualify under s. 251(4) that they can get a therapeutic abortion as long as chacun de ces cas, ce sont les structures administratives et la procédure établie par l'art. 251 lui-même qui, en pratique, interdisent à cette femme de se prévaloir de la défense que lui accorde le par. 251(4).

Les faits démontrent qu'un grand nombre de femmes se trouvent dans une situation de ce genre. Les médecins de l'hôpital Chedoke-McMaster d'Hamilton ont témoigné avoir reçu des appels téléphoniques de femmes de toutes les régions de l'Ontario qui avaient fait sans succès une demande d'avortement thérapeutique aux hôpitaux locaux. À une certaine époque, 80 pour 100 des patientes admises à Chedoke-McMaster pour se faire avorter venaient de l'extérieur d'Hamilton, aussi l'hôpital a-t-il été forcé de limiter l'admission des femmes venant de l'extérieur de la zone qu'il dessert. Le rapport Powell révèle que, dans plus de 50 pour 100 des comtés de l'Ontario, en 1986, la majorité des femmes qui ont obtenu un avortement l'ont fait à l'extérieur de leur lieu de résidence (à la p. 7). Mais, fait plus révélateur encore, [TRADUCTION] «un minimum de cinq mille Ontariennes se font chaque année avorter dans des cliniques indépendantes, au Canada et aux États-Unis» (à la p. 7).

Le ministère public soutient, dans son mémoire additionnel, que les femmes qui éprouvent des difficultés à se faire avorter au lieu de leur domicile n'ont qu'à se déplacer pour obtenir un avortement thérapeutique ailleurs au Canada. Cet argument ne serait pas spécialement gênant si les difficultés auxquelles les femmes ont à faire face ne résultaient pas dans une large mesure des exigences procédurales de l'art. 251 lui-même. Si les femmes ne faisaient que rechercher l'anonymat en allant ailleurs ou se trouvaient simplement confrontées aux difficultés habituelles qu'il y a à obtenir des soins médicaux dans les régions rurales, il pourrait être approprié de dire «qu'elles aillent ailleurs». Mais la preuve établit de façon concluante que c'est la loi elle-même qui, de bien des manières, les empêche d'avoir accès aux institutions locales offrant l'avortement thérapeutique. L'énorme fardeau émotionnel et financier imposé aux femmes qui doivent se déplacer loin de chez elles pour obtenir un avortement est un fardeau they are willing to travel. Ms. Carolyn Egan, administrative co-ordinator of the Birth Control and Venereal Disease Centre of Toronto, testified that many hospitals in Toronto had been forced to establish arbitrary abortion quotas, and that some Toronto hospitals restricted access to women inside the geographical area the hospitals were designated to serve. A woman from outside Toronto could run into serious difficulties attempting to procure a therapeutic abortion in that city. As noted above, the situation in Hamilton is now comparable to that in Toronto, because of the geographic restrictions imposed at the Chedoke-McMaster Hospital. Meanwhile, of course, days and weeks may pass and a woman may ultimately be forced to undergo a more dangerous abortion procedure. Or she may become desperate and choose to travel even further afield, to Quebec or to the United States, to obtain an abortion in a free-standing clinic.

créé dans bien des cas par le Parlement. En outre, il n'est pas exact de dire aux femmes qui, au départ, sembleraient admissibles en vertu du par. 251(4) qu'elles pourront obtenir un avortement thérapeutique pourvu qu'elles acceptent de se déplacer. Madame Carolyn Egan, coordonnatrice administrative du Birth Control and Venereal Disease Centre de Toronto, a déclaré dans son témoignage que de nombreux hôpitaux de Toronto avaient été forcés de contingenter arbitrairement les avortements et que certains hôpitaux torontois n'admettaient que les femmes résidant dans la zone géographique qu'ils devaient desservir. Une femme de l'extérieur de Toronto peut éprouver de sérieuses difficultés à obtenir un avortement thérapeutique dans cette ville. Comme on l'a dit précédemment, la situation à Hamilton se compare maintenant à celle de Toronto, vu les restrictions géographiques imposées à l'hôpital Chedoke-McMaster. Entre temps, bien entendu, les jours et les semaines passent et une femme peut être finalement obligée de subir un avortement selon une procédure plus dangereuse. Ou elle peut en désespoir de cause choisir d'aller plus loin encore, au Québec ou aux États-Unis, pour obtenir un avortement dans une clinique indépendante.

A majority of this Court held in R. v. Jones, at p. 304, per La Forest J., that:

> The provinces must be given room to make choices regarding the type of administrative structure that will suit their needs unless the use of such structure is in itself so manifestly unfair, having regard to the decisions it is called upon to make, as to violate the principles of fundamental justice. [Emphasis in original.]

La Cour, à la majorité, a déjà jugé dans l'arrêt R. c. Jones, à la p. 304 (le juge La Forest), que:

> Les provinces doivent avoir la possibilité de faire des choix quant au type de structure administrative qui répondra à leurs besoins, à moins que le recours à une telle structure ne soit en lui-même nettement injuste, compte tenu des décisions qu'elle est appelée à prendre, au point de violer les principes de justice fondamentale. [Souligné dans l'original.]

Similarly, Parliament must be given room to design an appropriate administrative and procedural structure for bringing into operation a particular defence to criminal liability. But if that structure is "so manifestly unfair, having regard to the decisions it is called upon to make, as to violate the principles of fundamental justice", that structure must be struck down. In the present case, the structure — the system regulating access to therapeutic abortions — is manifestly unfair. It contains so many potential barriers to its own operation that the defence it creates will in many circumstances be practically unavailable to women

De même, le Parlement doit avoir la latitude voulue pour concevoir une structure administrative et procédurale appropriée qui permette à une défense particulière de jouer, afin d'éviter une responsabilité criminelle. Mais, si cette structure est «nettement injuste, compte tenu des décisions qu'elle est appelée à prendre, au point de violer les principes de justice fondamentale», elle doit être invalidée. En l'espèce, la structure — le système régissant l'accès aux avortements thérapeutiques — est manifestement injuste. Elle comporte tellement de barrières potentielles à son propre fonctionnement que la défense qu'elle institue sera, who would prima facie qualify for the defence, or at least would force such women to travel great distances at substantial expense and inconvenience in order to benefit from a defence that is held out to be generally available.

I conclude that the procedures created in s. 251 of the Criminal Code for obtaining a therapeutic abortion do not comport with the principles of fundamental justice. It is not necessary to determine whether s. 7 also contains a substantive content leading to the conclusion that, in some circumstances at least, the deprivation of a pregnant woman's right to security of the person can never comport with fundamental justice. Simply put, assuming Parliament can act, it must do so properly. For the reasons given earlier, the deprivation of security of the person caused by s. 251 as a whole is not in accordance with the second clause of s. 7. It remains to be seen whether s. 251 can be justified for the purposes of s. 1 of the Charter.

Section 1 Analysis

Section 1 of the Charter can potentially be used to "salvage" a legislative provision which breaches s. 7: Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, per Lamer J., at p. 520. The principles governing the necessary analysis under s. 1 were set down in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., and, more precisely, in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103. A statutory provision which infringes any section of the Charter can only be saved under s. 1 if the party seeking to uphold the provision can demonstrate first, that the objective of the provision is "of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right or freedom" (R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., at p. 352) and second, that the means chosen in overriding the right or freedom are reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. This second aspect ensures that the legislative means are proportional to the legislative ends (Oakes, at pp. 139-40). In Oakes, at p. 139, the Court referred to three considerations which are typically useful in assessing the dans de nombreuses circonstances, hors de portée en pratique des femmes qui, au départ, auraient pu s'en prévaloir ou, à tout le moins, forcera ces femmes à se déplacer sur de grandes distances et à subir de grands frais et inconvénients pour bénéficier d'une défense que l'on considère généralement ouverte à tous.

Je conclus que la procédure instituée par l'art. 251 du Code criminel pour obtenir un avortement thérapeutique n'est pas conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. Il n'est pas nécessaire de déterminer si l'art. 7 a aussi un contenu de droit positif dont on peut conclure que, dans certaines circonstances au moins, l'atteinte au droit d'une femme enceinte à la sécurité de sa personne ne peut jamais s'accorder avec la justice fondamentale. En bref, si l'on présume que le Parlement peut agir, il doit le faire de la façon appropriée. Pour les motifs déjà exposés, l'atteinte à la sécurité de la personne causée par l'art. 251 dans son ensemble n'est pas conforme au second volet de l'art. 7. Il reste à voir si l'art. 251 peut être justifié en raison de l'article premier de la Charte.

L'article premier de la Charte peut potentiellement servir à «sauvegarder» une disposition législative qui enfreint l'art. 7: Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., le juge Lamer, à la p. 520. Les principes régissant l'analyse requise aux termes de l'article premier ont été énoncés dans l'arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd. et, de façon plus précise encore, dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103. Une disposition législative qui enfreint un article de la Charte ne peut être sauvegardée en vertu de l'article premier que si la partie qui en soutient la validité peut démontrer, en premier lieu, que l'objectif de la disposition est «suffisamment important pour justifier la suppression d'un droit ou d'une liberté garantis par la Constitution» (arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., à la p. 352) et, en second lieu, que les moyens choisis pour l'emporter sur le droit ou la liberté sont raisonnables et que leur justification peut se démontrer dans une société libre et démocratique. Ce second aspect fait en sorte que les moyens législatifs soient proporproportionality of means to ends. First, the means chosen to achieve an important objective should be rational, fair and not arbitrary. Second, the legislative means should impair as little as possible the right or freedom under consideration. Third, the effects of the limitation upon the relevant right or freedom should not be out of proportion to the objective sought to be achieved.

tionnels aux fins législatives (Oakes, aux pp. 139-140). Dans l'arrêt Oakes, à la p. 139, la Cour se réfère à trois facteurs particulièrement utiles à l'évaluation de la proportionnalité entre les moyens et les fins. En premier lieu, les moyens choisis pour atteindre un objectif important doivent être rationnels, justes et non arbitraires. En second lieu, les moyens législatifs doivent être de nature à porter le moins possible atteinte au droit ou à la liberté en cause. En troisième lieu, les effets de la restriction du droit ou de la liberté en cause ne doivent pas être disproportionnés par rapport à l'objectif recherché.

The appellants contended that the sole purpose of s. 251 of the Criminal Code is to protect the life and health of pregnant women. The respondent Crown submitted that s. 251 seeks to protect not only the life and health of pregnant women, but also the interests of the foetus. On the other hand, the Crown conceded that the Court is not called upon in this appeal to evaluate any claim to "foetal rights" or to assess the meaning of "the right to life". I expressly refrain from so doing. In my view, it is unnecessary for the purpose of deciding this appeal to evaluate or assess "foetal rights" as an independent constitutional value. Nor are we required to measure the full extent of the state's interest in establishing criteria unrelated to the pregnant woman's own priorities and aspirations. What we must do is evaluate the particular balance struck by Parliament in s. 251, as it relates to the priorities and aspirations of pregnant women and the government's interests in the protection of the foetus.

Les appelants soutiennent que l'art. 251 du Code criminel a pour seul but la protection de la vie et de la santé des femmes enceintes. Le ministère public intimé fait valoir que l'art. 251 cherche à protéger non seulement la vie et la santé des femmes enceintes, mais aussi les intérêts du fœtus. D'autre part, le ministère public a reconnu que la Cour n'est pas invitée en l'espèce à évaluer des arguments relatifs aux «droits du fœtus» ni à déterminer le sens du «droit à la vie». Je m'abstiens expressément de me prononcer à cet égard. À mon avis, il n'est pas nécessaire, pour les besoins de l'espèce, d'évaluer ou de déterminer les «droits du fœtus» en tant que valeur constitutionnelle indépendante. Il n'est pas non plus requis de prendre toute la mesure de l'intérêt qu'a l'État à établir des critères indépendants des propres priorités et aspirations d'une femme enceinte. Ce que nous devons faire, c'est évaluer l'équilibre particulier établi par le Parlement à l'art. 251, dans la mesure où il se rapporte aux priorités et aspirations des femmes enceintes et les intérêts qu'a le gouvernement à protéger le fœtus.

Section 251 provides that foetal interests are not to be protected where the "life or health" of the woman is threatened. Thus, Parliament itself has expressly stated in s. 251 that the "life or health" of pregnant women is paramount. The procedures of s. 251(4) are clearly related to the pregnant woman's "life or health" for that is the very phrase used by the subsection. As McIntyre J. states in his reasons (at p. 155), the aim of s. 251(4) is "to restrict abortion to cases where the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would likely, be injurious to the life or health of the woman concerned, not to provide unrestricted access to abortion." I have no difficulty in concluding that the objective of s. 251 as a whole, namely, to balance the competing interests identified by Parliament, is sufficiently important to meet the requirements of the first step in the Oakes inquiry under s. 1. I think the protection of the interests of pregnant women is a valid governmental objective, where life and health can be jeopardized by criminal sanctions. Like Beetz and Wilson JJ., I agree that protection of foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid governmental objective. It follows that balancing these interests, with the lives and health of women a major factor, is clearly an important governmental objective. As the Court of Appeal stated at p. 366, "the contemporary view [is] that abortion is not always socially undesirable behavior."

L'article 251 prescrit que les intérêts du fœtus ne doivent pas être protégés lorsque "la vie ou la santé" de la femme est en danger. Le Parlement a donc lui-même expressément déclaré à l'art. 251 que "la vie ou la santé" des femmes enceintes l'emporte. Il est clair que la procédure prévue au par. 251(4) se rapporte à "la vie ou la santé" de la femme enceinte, car c'est l'expression même utilisée dans le paragraphe. Comme le juge McIntyre le dit dans ses motifs (à la p. 155), le but du par. 251(4) vise "à limiter l'avortement aux cas où la

I am equally convinced, however, that the means chosen to advance the legislative objectives of s. 251 do not satisfy any of the three elements of the proportionality component of R. v. Oakes. The evidence has led me to conclude that the infringement of the security of the person of pregnant women caused by s. 251 is not accomplished in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. It has been demonstrated that the procedures and administrative structures created by s. 251 are often arbitrary and unfair. The procedures established to implement the policy of s. 251 impair s. 7 rights far more than is necessary because they hold out an illusory defence to many women who would prima facie qualify under the exculpatory provisions of s. 251(4). In other words, many women whom Parliament professes not to wish to subject to criminal liability will nevertheless be forced by the practical unavailability of the supposed defence to risk liability or to suffer other harm such as a traumatic late abortion caused by the delay inherent in the s. 251 system. Finally, the effects of the limitation upon the s. 7 rights of many pregnant women are out of proportion to the objective sought to be achieved. Indeed, to the continuation de la grossesse nuirait ou nuirait probablement à la vie ou à la santé de la femme en cause, et non pas à donner la possibilité illimitée de se faire avorter». Il ne m'est donc pas difficile de conclure que l'objectif de l'art. 251 dans son ensemble, soit d'équilibrer les intérêts en concurrence identifiés par le Parlement, est suffisamment important pour répondre aux exigences du premier volet de l'analyse, selon l'arrêt Oakes, au regard de l'article premier. Je pense que la protection des intérêts des femmes enceintes est un objectif gouvernemental valide, lorsque la vie et la santé peuvent être mises en danger par des sanctions criminelles. Comme les juges Beetz et Wilson, je suis d'accord pour dire que la protection des intérêts du fœtus par le Parlement constitue aussi un objectif gouvernemental valide. Il s'ensuit qu'équilibrer ces intérêts, la vie et la santé des femmes étant un facteur majeur, est clairement un objectif gouvernemental important. Comme la Cour d'appel l'a dit à la p. 366 [TRADUCTION] «le point de vue contemporain [est que] l'avortement n'est pas toujours une conduite socialement répréhensible».

Je suis également convaincu, néanmoins, que les moyens choisis pour atteindre les objectifs législatifs de l'art. 251 ne sont conformes à aucun des trois éléments de la proportionnalité énoncée par l'arrêt R. c. Oakes. La preuve m'a amené à conclure que l'atteinte à la sécurité de la personne des femmes enceintes causée par l'art. 251 n'est pas conforme avec les principes de justice fondamentale. Il a été démontré que la procédure et les structures administratives instaurées par l'art. 251 sont souvent arbitraires et injustes. La procédure établie pour mettre en œuvre la politique de l'art. 251 porte atteinte aux droits garantis par l'art. 7 au-delà de ce qui est nécessaire, puisqu'elle ne fournit qu'une défense illusoire à nombre de femmes qui, prima facie, pourraient se prévaloir des dispositions disculpatoires du par. 251(4). En d'autres termes, beaucoup de femmes que le Parlement prétend ne pas vouloir tenir criminellement responsables seront néanmoins forcées, par l'impossibilité pratique de se prévaloir de cette supposée défense, de prendre le risque d'être tenues responsables ou de s'exposer à un autre danger, tel un avortement tardif traumatisant, en raison des délais inhérents au système de l'art. 251. Enfin, extent that s. 251(4) is designed to protect the life and health of women, the procedures it establishes may actually defeat that objective. The administrative structures of s. 251(4) are so cumbersome that women whose health is endangered by pregnancy may not be able to gain a therapeutic abortion, at least without great trauma, expense and inconvenience.

I conclude, therefore, that the cumbersome structure of subs. (4) not only unduly subordinates the s. 7 rights of pregnant women but may also defeat the value Parliament itself has established as paramount, namely, the life and health of the pregnant woman. As I have noted, counsel for the Crown did contend that one purpose of the procedures required by subs. (4) is to protect the interests of the foetus. State protection of foetal interests may well be deserving of constitutional recognition under s. 1. Still, there can be no escape from the fact that Parliament has failed to establish either a standard or a procedure whereby any such interests might prevail over those of the woman in a fair and non-arbitrary fashion.

Section 251 of the Criminal Code cannot be saved, therefore, under s. 1 of the Charter.

VI

Defence Counsel's Address to the Jury

In his concluding remarks to the jury at the trial of the appellants, defence counsel asserted:

> The judge will tell you what the law is. He will tell you about the ingredients of the offence, what the Crown has to prove, what the defences may be or may not be, and you must take the law from him. But I submit to you that it is up to you and you alone to apply the law to this evidence and you have a right to say it shouldn't be applied.

pour nombre de femmes enceintes, les effets de la limitation des droits garantis par l'art. 7 sont disproportionnés par rapport à l'objectif recherché. D'ailleurs, dans la mesure où le par. 251(4) est conçu pour la protection de la vie et la santé des femmes, la procédure qu'il établit peut, en fait, mettre cet objectif en échec. Les structures administratives du par. 251(4) sont si lourdes que les femmes dont la santé est menacée par leur grossesse peuvent se trouver dans l'impossibilité d'obtenir un avortement thérapeutique, si ce n'est au prix de traumatismes, de dépenses et d'inconvénients majeurs.

Je conclus donc que la structure lourde du par. (4) non seulement assujettit indûment les droits des femmes enceintes en vertu de l'art. 7, mais peut aussi mettre en échec la valeur que le Parlement lui-même a établie comme la plus importante, soit la vie et la santé de la femme enceinte. Comme je l'ai noté, le substitut du procureur général a effectivement plaidé que l'un des buts de la procédure établie par le par. (4) est de protéger les intérêts du fœtus. La protection des intérêts du fœtus par l'État peut bien mériter une reconnaissance constitutionnelle en vertu de l'article premier. Cependant, on ne peut échapper au fait que le Parlement a omis d'établir soit une norme soit une procédure par laquelle de tels intérêts pourraient prévaloir sur ceux de la femme d'une façon juste et non arbitraire.

L'article 251 du Code criminel ne peut donc être sauvegardé en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte.

La plaidoirie de l'avocat de la défense à l'intention du jury

En terminant sa plaidoirie au procès des appelants, l'avocat de la défense, s'adressant au jury, a déclaré:

> [TRADUCTION] Le juge va vous dire quel est le droit. Il vous dira quels éléments composent l'infraction, ce que le ministère public doit prouver, quelles défenses sont ou ne sont pas admissibles, et vous devez prendre son énoncé du droit. Mais moi je vous dis que c'est à vous, et à vous seul, d'appliquer le droit à ces éléments de preuve et vous avez le droit de dire qu'il ne devrait pas être appliqué.

The burden of his argument was that the jury should not apply s. 251 if they thought that it was a bad law, and that, in refusing to apply the law, they could send a signal to Parliament that the law should be changed. Although my disposition of the appeal makes it unnecessary, strictly speaking, to review Mr. Manning's argument before the jury, I find the argument so troubling that I feel compelled to comment.

It has long been settled in Anglo-Canadian criminal law that in a trial before judge and jury, the judge's role is to state the law and the jury's role is to apply that law to the facts of the case. In Joshua v. The Queen, [1955] A.C. 121 (P.C.), at p. 130, Lord Oaksey enunciated the principle succinctly:

> It is a general principle of British law that on a trial by jury it is for the judge to direct the jury on the law and in so far as he thinks necessary on the facts, but the jury, whilst they must take the law from the judge, are the sole judges on the facts.

The jury is one of the great protectors of the citizen because it is composed of twelve persons who collectively express the common sense of the community. But the jury members are not expert in the law, and for that reason they must be guided by the judge on questions of law.

The contrary principle contended for by Mr. Manning, that a jury may be encouraged to ignore a law it does not like, could lead to gross inequities. One accused could be convicted by a jury who supported the existing law, while another person indicted for the same offence could be acquitted by a jury who, with reformist zeal, wished to express disapproval of the same law. Moreover, a jury could decide that although the law pointed to a conviction, the jury would simply refuse to apply the law to an accused for whom it had sympathy. Alternatively, a jury who feels antipathy towards an accused might convict despite a law which points to acquittal. To give a harsh but I think telling example, a jury fueled by the passions of racism could be told that they need not apply the law against murder to a white man who had killed a black man. Such a possibility need only be stated to reveal the potentially frightening implications of Essentiellement, cette plaidoirie soutient que le jury ne devrait pas appliquer l'art. 251 s'il pense qu'il s'agit d'une mauvaise loi et que, en refusant d'appliquer la loi, il signale au Parlement qu'il faut la changer. Quoique, vu la façon dont je me prononce en l'espèce, il ne me soit pas nécessaire, à strictement parler, d'examiner la plaidoirie de Me Manning devant le jury, l'argument m'a paru si troublant que je me sens obligé de le commenter.

Il est établi depuis longtemps en droit criminel anglo-canadien que, dans un procès devant un juge et un jury, le rôle du juge consiste à dire le droit et celui du jury à appliquer ce droit aux faits de l'espèce. Dans l'arrêt Joshua v. The Queen, [1955] A.C. 121 (C.P.), à la p. 130, Lord Oaksey énonce succinctement ce principe:

> [TRADUCTION] C'est un principe général du droit britannique qu'au cours d'un procès par jury, il appartient au juge d'instruire le jury sur le droit et, dans la mesure où il l'estime nécessaire, sur les faits, mais que le jury, s'il doit prendre le droit tel qu'il lui est dicté par le juge, reste seul juge des faits.

Le jury est l'un des grands protecteurs du citoyen puisqu'il est composé de douze personnes qui expriment collectivement le bon sens de la société. Mais les membres du jury ne sont pas des experts en droit et, pour cette raison, ils doivent être guidés par le juge sur les questions de droit.

Le principe contraire avancé par Me Manning selon lequel on peut encourager le jury à ignorer une règle de droit qu'il n'aime pas, pourrait conduire à de graves inéquités. Un jury pourrait appliquer le droit en vigueur et condamner un accusé alors qu'un autre jury, plein de zèle réformiste, acquitterait un autre inculpé de la même infraction pour exprimer sa désapprobation du même principe. En outre, le jury pourrait décider que, si la loi oblige à condamner, il refuse néanmoins d'appliquer la loi à un accusé sympathique. Au contraire, un jury auquel un accusé est antipathique pourrait le condamner, en dépit de la loi qui exige l'acquittement. Pour donner un exemple brutal mais, me semble-t-il, frappant, un jury entraîné par les passions du racisme pourrait se faire dire qu'il n'a pas à appliquer, à un blanc qui a tué un noir, la loi qui interdit le meurtre. Il suffit d'évoquer cette possibilité pour saisir les répercussions potentielle-

Mr. Manning's assertions. The dangerous argument that a jury may be encouraged to disregard the law was castigated as long ago as 1784 by Lord Mansfield in a criminal libel case, R. v. Shipley (1784), 4 Dougl. 73, 99 E.R. 774, at p. 824:

So the jury who usurp the judicature of law, though they happen to be right, are themselves wrong, because they are right by chance only, and have not taken the constitutional way of deciding the question. It is the duty of the Judge, in all cases of general justice, to tell the jury how to do right, though they have it in their power to do wrong, which is a matter entirely between God and their own consciences.

To be free is to live under a government by law .... Miserable is the condition of individuals, dangerous is the condition of the State, if there is no certain law, or, which is the same thing, no certain administration of law, to protect individuals, or to guard the State.

In opposition to this, what is contended for? — That the law shall be, in every particular cause, what any twelve men, who shall happen to be the jury, shall be inclined to think; liable to no review, and subject to no control, under all the prejudices of the popular cry of the day, and under all the bias of interest in this town, where thousands, more or less, are concerned in the publication of newspapers, paragraphs, and pamphlets. Under such an administration of law, no man could tell, no counsel could advise, whether a paper was or was not punishable.

I can only add my support to that eloquent statement of principle.

It is no doubt true that juries have a de facto power to disregard the law as stated to the jury by the judge. We cannot enter the jury room. The jury is never called upon to explain the reasons which lie behind a verdict. It may even be true that in some limited circumstances the private decision of a jury to refuse to apply the law will constitute, in the words of a Law Reform Commission of Canada working paper, "the citizen's ultimate protection against oppressive laws and the oppressive enforcement of the law" (Law Reform Commission of Canada, Working Paper 27, The Jury in Criminal Trials (1980)). But recognizing this reality is a far cry from suggesting that coun-ment effrayantes des assertions de Me Manning. Lord Mansfield critiquait déjà en 1784 ce dangereux argument qu'un jury peut être encouragé à ne pas tenir compte de la loi dans une affaire de libelle criminel dans l'arrêt R. v. Shipley (1784), 4 Dougl. 73, 99 E.R. 774, à la p. 824:

Être libre, c'est vivre sous la tutelle de la loi [...] Misérable est la condition des individus, dangereuse est celle de l'État, si aucune loi n'est certaine ou, ce qui revient au même, s'il n'y a aucune certitude qu'elle sera appliquée pour protéger les individus ou garder l'État.

Contre cela que prétend-on? — Que la loi doit être, dans chaque cas particulier, ce que douze hommes, dont le hasard a voulu qu'ils forment le jury, sont enclins à penser; et cela sans qu'aucun appel ne soit possible, hors de tout contrôle, sous l'influence de tous les préjugés de la rumeur publique du jour et de la partialité engendrée par l'intérêt dans cette ville alors que des milliers, à peu de chose près, ont intérêt à ce que soient publiés journaux, brochures et dépliants. Selon une telle application de la loi, nul ne pourrait dire, aucun avocat ne pourrait donner pour avis qu'un article est ou non sujet à sanction.

Je ne puis que souscrire à cet énoncé éloquent du principe.

Certes, il est vrai que le jury jouit de facto du pouvoir de ne pas tenir compte des règles de droit que lui dicte le juge. Nous ne pouvons pénétrer dans la salle des délibérations du jury. Le jury n'a jamais à expliquer les raisons qui sous-tendent son verdict. Il se peut même que, dans certaines circonstances limitées, la décision secrète d'un jury de refuser d'appliquer la loi fasse de lui, pour reprendre les termes du document de travail de la Commission de réforme du droit du Canada: le "protecteur ultime des citoyens contre l'application arbitraire de la loi et contre l'oppression du gouvernement" (C.R.D.C., Document de travail 27, Le jury en droit pénal (1980)). Mais reconnaître sel may encourage a jury to ignore a law they do not support or to tell a jury that it has a right to do so. The difference between accepting the reality of de facto discretion in applying the law and elevating such discretion to the level of a right was stated clearly by the United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, in United States v. Dougherty, 473 F.2d 1113 (1972), per Leventhal J., at p. 1134:

> The jury system has worked out reasonably well overall, providing "play in the joints" that imparts flexibility and avoid[s] undue rigidity. An equilibrium has evolved — an often marvelous balance — with the jury acting as a "safety valve" for exceptional cases, without being a wildcat or runaway institution. There is reason to believe that the simultaneous achievement of modest jury equity and avoidance of intolerable caprice depends on formal instructions that do not expressly delineate a jury charter to carve out its own rules of law.

To accept Mr. Manning's argument that defence counsel should be able to encourage juries to ignore the law would be to disturb the "marvelous balance" of our system of criminal trials before a judge and jury. Such a disturbance would be irresponsible. I agree with the trial judge and with the Court of Appeal that Mr. Manning was quite simply wrong to say to the jury that if they did not like the law they need not enforce it. He should not have done so.

Conclusion

Section 251 of the Criminal Code infringes the right to security of the person of many pregnant women. The procedures and administrative structures established in the section to provide for therapeutic abortions do not comply with the principles of fundamental justice. Section 7 of the Charter is infringed and that infringement cannot be saved under s. 1.

In oral argument, counsel for the Crown submitted that if the Court were to hold that procedural aspects of s. 251 infringed the Charter, only the procedures set out in the section should be struck ce fait est très loin de suggérer qu'un avocat peut encourager un jury à méconnaître une loi qui ne lui plaît pas ou à lui dire qu'il a le droit de le faire. La différence entre l'acceptation du pouvoir discrétionnaire de facto d'appliquer la loi et l'élévation de ce pouvoir au niveau d'un droit a été exposée clairement par la United States Court of Appeals du district de Columbia, dans l'arrêt United States v. Dougherty, 473 F.2d 1113 (1972), le juge Leventhal, à la p. 1134:

> [TRADUCTION] Le système du jury fonctionne raisonnablement bien pourvu qu'il y ait «du jeu entre les joints» garantissant sa souplesse et évitant une trop grande rigidité. Un équilibre s'est établi — un équilibre souvent merveilleux — le jury servant de «soupape» dans des cas exceptionnels, sans aller jusqu'à se comporter comme un cheval fou ou comme une machine emballée. On aura raison de croire, pour que le jury arrive simultanément à faire modestement preuve d'équité et à éviter certains caprices intolérables, que cela dépend d'instructions formelles ne délimitant pas expressément une charte par laquelle le jury se doterait de ses propres règles de droit.

Accepter l'argument de Me Manning, qu'un avocat de la défense devrait pouvoir encourager le jury à méconnaître le droit, romprait le «merveilleux équilibre» de notre système de procès criminels par juge et jury. Un tel changement serait irresponsable. Je partage l'avis du juge du procès et de la Cour d'appel que Me Manning a tout simplement eu tort de dire au jury que si la loi ne lui plaisait pas, il pouvait ne pas l'appliquer. Il n'aurait pas dû le faire.

Conclusion

L'article 251 du Code criminel porte atteinte au droit à la sécurité de la personne d'un grand nombre de femmes enceintes. La procédure et les structures administratives établies par l'article pour obtenir des avortements thérapeutiques ne sont pas conformes aux principes de justice fondamentale. Il y a atteinte à l'art. 7 de la Charte, atteinte que l'article premier ne saurait permettre.

Au cours des plaidoiries, l'avocat du ministère public a fait valoir que si la Cour devait juger que l'aspect procédural de l'art. 251 enfreignait la Charte, seule la procédure établie par l'article down, that is subss. (4) and (5). After being pressed with questions from the bench, Ms. Wein conceded that the whole of s. 251 should fall if it infringed s. 7. Mr. Blacklock for the Attorney General of Canada took the same position. This was a wise approach, for in Morgentaler (1975), at p. 676, the Court held that "s. 251 contains a comprehensive code on the subject of abortions, unitary and complete within itself". Having found that this "comprehensive code" infringes the Charter, it is not the role of the Court to pick and choose among the various aspects of s. 251 so as effectively to re-draft the section. The appeal should therefore be allowed and s. 251 as a whole struck down under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

The first constitutional question is therefore answered in the affirmative as regards s. 7 of the Charter only. The second question, as regards s. 7 of the Charter only, is answered in the negative. Questions 3, 4 and 5 are answered in the negative. I answer question 6 in the manner proposed by Beetz J. It is not necessary to answer question 7.

The reasons of Beetz and Estey JJ. were delivered by BEETZ J.—I have had the advantage of reading the reasons for judgment written by the Chief Justice, as well as the reasons written by Justice McIntyre and Justice Wilson.

I agree with the Chief Justice and Wilson J. that this case finds its resolution in the answers to the first two constitutional questions stated by the Chief Justice in so far as those questions relate to s. 7 and s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Although the greatest part of my reasons is devoted to responding to the first two constitutional questions, I consider it necessary to answer the sixth constitutional question concerning the validity of s. 605(1)(a) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, under the Charter in order to establish the Crown's right to appeal the verdict of acquittal in this case. Finally, I have decided that it is appropriate to address the appellants' arguments pertaining to s. 91(27) and s. 96 of the devrait alors être annulée, soit les par. (4) et (5). Pressée de questions par la Cour, Me Wein a finalement concédé que tout l'art. 251 doit tomber s'il enfreint l'art. 7. Me Blacklock a pris la même position au nom du procureur général du Canada. C'était fort sage, car dans l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975), à la p. 676, la Cour a jugé que: «l'art. 251 est un code sur l'avortement, un code entier et complet en lui-même». Ayant jugé que ce «code entier» enfreint la Charte, il n'appartient pas à la Cour de sélectionner divers aspects de l'art. 251 pour, en fait, réécrire l'article. Le pourvoi doit donc être accueilli et l'art. 251, en son entier, annulé en vertu du par. 52(1) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982.

La première question constitutionnelle reçoit donc une réponse affirmative en ce qui concerne l'art. 7 de la Charte uniquement. La deuxième question reçoit une réponse négative en ce qui concerne l'art. 7 de la Charte uniquement. Les troisième, quatrième et cinquième questions reçoivent une réponse négative. Je réponds à la sixième question comme le propose le juge Beetz. Il n'est pas nécessaire de répondre à la septième question.

Version française des motifs des juges Beetz et Estey rendus par

LE JUGE BEETZ—J'ai eu l'avantage de prendre connaissance des motifs rédigés par le Juge en chef, ainsi que de ceux rédigés par le juge McIntyre et par le juge Wilson.

Je suis d'accord avec le Juge en chef et le juge Wilson pour dire que cette affaire trouve sa solution dans les réponses aux deux premières questions constitutionnelles formulées par le Juge en chef, dans la mesure où ces questions concernent l'art. 7 et l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. Quoique la plus grande partie de mes motifs soit consacrée à répondre aux deux premières questions constitutionnelles, je considère qu'il est nécessaire de répondre à la sixième question constitutionnelle qui porte sur la validité de l'al. 605(1)a) du Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, chap. C-34, aux termes de la Charte afin d'établir le droit de la poursuite d'en appeler du verdict d'acquittement en l'espèce. Enfin, j'ai décidé qu'il Constitution Act, 1867, as well as the argument that s. 251 of the Criminal Code is in effect an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.

Like the Chief Justice and Wilson J., I would allow the appeal and answer the first constitutional question in the affirmative and the second constitutional question in the negative. This however is a result which I reach for reasons which differ from those of the Chief Justice and those of Wilson J.

I find it convenient to outline at the outset the steps which lead me to this result:

I — Before the advent of the Charter, Parliament recognized, in adopting s. 251(4)(c) of the Criminal Code, that the interest in the life or health of the pregnant woman takes precedence over the interest in prohibiting abortions, including the interest of the state in the protection of the foetus, when "the continuation of the pregnancy of such female person would or would be likely to endanger her life or health". In my view, this standard in s. 251(4) became entrenched at least as a minimum when the "right to life, liberty and security of the person" was enshrined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms at s. 7.

II — "Security of the person" within the meaning of s. 7 of the Charter must include a right of access to medical treatment for a condition representing a danger to life or health without fear of criminal sanction. If an act of Parliament forces a pregnant woman whose life or health is in danger to choose between, on the one hand, the commission of a crime to obtain effective and timely medical treatment and, on the other hand, inadequate treatment or no treatment at all, her right to security of the person has been violated.

III — According to the evidence, the procedural requirements of s. 251 of the Criminal Code significantly delay pregnant women's access to medical treatment resulting in an additional danger to their health, thereby depriving them of their right to security of the person.

était approprié d'analyser les arguments des appelants relativement au par. 91(27) et à l'art. 96 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867, de même que l'argument selon lequel l'art. 251 du Code criminel est en fait une délégation inconstitutionnelle du pouvoir législatif.

À l'instar du Juge en chef et du juge Wilson, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi et de répondre à la première question constitutionnelle par l'affirmative et à la seconde par la négative. J'arrive cependant à ce résultat pour des motifs différents de ceux du Juge en chef et de ceux du juge Wilson.

Il me paraît utile d'exposer dès le départ la démarche qui m'a conduit à ce résultat:

I – Avant l'avènement de la Charte, le législateur fédéral a reconnu, en adoptant l'al. 251(4)c) du Code criminel, que l'intérêt que représente la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte l'emporte sur celui qu'il y a à interdire les avortements, y compris l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus, lorsque «la continuation de la grossesse de cette personne du sexe féminin mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de cette dernière». À mon avis, ce critère du par. 251(4) a été consacré au moins comme un minimum lorsque le «droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne» a été enchâssé dans la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, à l'art. 7.

II – L'expression «sécurité de la personne», au sens de l'art. 7 de la Charte, doit inclure le droit au traitement médical d'un état dangereux pour la vie ou la santé, sans menace de répression pénale. Si une loi du Parlement force une femme enceinte dont la vie ou la santé est en danger à choisir entre, d'une part, la perpétration d'un crime pour obtenir un traitement médical efficace en temps opportun et, d'autre part, un traitement inadéquat, voire aucun traitement, son droit à la sécurité de sa personne a été violé.

III – D'après la preuve soumise, les exigences que pose l'art. 251 du Code criminel en matière de procédure ont pour effet de retarder sensiblement l'obtention par les femmes enceintes d'un traitement médical, ce qui cause un danger additionnel pour leur santé et porte atteinte, par le fait même, à leur droit à la sécurité de leur personne.

IV — The deprivation referred to in the preceding proposition does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice. While Parliament is justified in requiring a reliable, independent and medically sound opinion as to the "life or health" of the pregnant woman in order to protect the state interest in the foetus, and while any such statutory mechanism will inevitably result in some delay, certain of the procedural requirements of s. 251 of the Criminal Code are nevertheless manifestly unfair. These requirements are manifestly unfair in that they are unnecessary in respect of Parliament's objectives in establishing the administrative structure and that they result in additional risks to the health of pregnant women.

V — The primary objective of s. 251 of the Criminal Code is the protection of the foetus. The protection of the life and health of the pregnant woman is an ancillary objective. The primary objective does relate to concerns which are pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society and which, pursuant to s. 1 of the Charter, justify reasonable limits to be put on a woman's right. However, rules unnecessary in respect of the primary and ancillary objectives which they are designed to serve, such as some of the rules contained in s. 251, cannot be said to be rationally connected to these objectives under s. 1 of the Charter. Consequently, s. 251 does not constitute a reasonable limit to the security of the person.

It is not necessary to decide whether there is a proportionality between the effects of s. 251 and the objective of protecting the foetus, nor is it necessary to answer the question concerning the circumstances in which there is a proportionality between the effects of s. 251 which limit the right of pregnant women to security of the person and the objective of the protection of the foetus. But I feel bound to observe that the objective of protecting the foetus would not justify the severity of the breach of pregnant women's right to security of the person which would result if the exculpatory provision of s. 251 was completely removed from the Criminal Code. However, a rule that would require a higher degree of danger to health in the

IV – L'atteinte mentionnée dans la proposition précédente n'est pas conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. Quoique le Parlement soit justifié d'exiger une opinion médicale éclairée, indépendante et fiable relativement à «la vie ou la santé» de la femme enceinte pour protéger l'intérêt qu'a l'État à l'égard du fœtus et quoiqu'un tel dispositif législatif entraîne inévitablement des délais, certaines des exigences en matière de procédure posées par l'art. 251 du Code criminel sont nettement injustes. Ces exigences sont nettement injustes en ce sens qu'elles sont inutiles au regard des objectifs poursuivis par le Parlement en établissant la structure administrative et qu'elles entraînent des risques additionnels pour la santé des femmes enceintes.

V – L'objectif premier de l'art. 251 du Code criminel est la protection du fœtus. La protection de la vie et de la santé de la femme enceinte est un objectif secondaire. L'objectif premier touche effectivement à des questions qui sont urgentes et importantes dans une société libre et démocratique et qui, conformément à l'article premier de la Charte, justifient que des limites raisonnables soient imposées au droit d'une femme. Toutefois, on ne peut dire que les règles inutiles aux fins des objectifs premier et secondaire qu'elles sont censées appuyer, comme certaines des règles de l'art. 251, ont un lien rationnel avec ces objectifs aux termes de l'article premier de la Charte. Par conséquent, l'art. 251 ne constitue pas une limite raisonnable à la sécurité de la personne.

Il n'est pas nécessaire de décider s'il existe une proportionnalité entre les effets de l'art. 251 et l'objectif de la protection du fœtus pas plus qu'il est nécessaire de répondre à la question relative aux circonstances dans lesquelles il y a proportionnalité entre les effets de l'art. 251 qui limite le droit des femmes enceintes à la sécurité de leur personne et l'objectif de la protection du fœtus. Mais je tiens à souligner que l'objectif de la protection du fœtus ne justifierait pas la gravité de la violation du droit des femmes enceintes à la sécurité de leur personne qui se produirait si la disposition disculpatoire de l'art. 251 était totalement exclue du Code criminel. Toutefois, une règle qui imposerait que la santé soit plus gravement menalatter months of pregnancy, as opposed to the early months, for an abortion to be lawful, could possibly achieve a proportionality which would be acceptable under s. 1 of the Charter.

I — Section 251 of the Criminal Code

Section 251 of the Criminal Code provides:

251. (1) Every one who, with intent to procure the miscarriage of a female person, whether or not she is pregnant, uses any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

(2) Every female person who, being pregnant, with intent to procure her own miscarriage, uses any means or permits any means to be used for the purpose of carrying out her intention is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

(3) In this section, "means" includes

(a) the administration of a drug or other noxious thing,

(b) the use of an instrument, and

(c) manipulation of any kind.

(4) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply to

(a) a qualified medical practitioner, other than a member of a therapeutic abortion committee for any hospital, who in good faith uses in an accredited or approved hospital any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention to procure the miscarriage of a female person, or

if, before the use of those means, the therapeutic abortion committee for that accredited or approved hospital, by a majority of the members of the committee and at a meeting of the committee at which the case of such female person has been reviewed,

(c) has by certificate in writing stated that in its opinion the continuation of the pregnancy of such female person would or would be likely to endanger her life or health, and

(d) has caused a copy of such certificate to be given to the qualified medical practitioner.

(5) The Minister of Health of a province may by order cée dans les derniers mois de la grossesse que dans les premiers mois pour qu'un avortement soit licite, pourrait atteindre un degré de proportionnalité acceptable aux termes de l'article premier de la Charte.

I – L'article 251 du Code criminel

L'article 251 du Code criminel prévoit:

251. (1) Est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible de l'emprisonnement à perpétuité, quiconque, avec l'intention de procurer l'avortement d'une personne du sexe féminin, qu'elle soit enceinte ou non, emploie quelque moyen pour réaliser son intention.

(2) Est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement de deux ans, toute personne du sexe féminin qui, étant enceinte, avec l'intention d'obtenir son propre avortement, emploie, ou permet que soit employé quelque moyen pour réaliser son intention.

(3) Au présent article, l'expression «moyen» comprend

a) l'administration d'une drogue ou autre substance délétère,

b) l'emploi d'un instrument, et

c) toute manipulation.

(4) Les paragraphes (1) et (2) ne s'appliquent pas

a) à un médecin qualifié, autre qu'un membre d'un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de quelque hôpital, qui emploie de bonne foi dans un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé, quelque moyen pour réaliser son intention de procurer l'avortement d'une personne du sexe féminin, ou

b) à une personne du sexe féminin qui, étant enceinte, permet à un médecin qualifié d'employer, dans un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé, quelque moyen mentionné à l'alinéa a) aux fins de réaliser son intention d'obtenir son propre avortement, si, avant que ces moyens ne soient employés, le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de cet hôpital accrédité ou approuvé, par décision de la majorité des membres du comité et lors d'une réunion du comité au cours de laquelle le cas de cette personne du sexe féminin a été examiné,

c) a déclaré par certificat qu'à son avis la continuation de la grossesse de cette personne du sexe féminin mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de cette dernière, et

d)a fait remettre une copie de ce certificat au médecin qualifié.

(5) Le ministre de la Santé d'une province peut, par ordonnance,

(a) require a therapeutic abortion committee for any hospital in that province, or any member thereof, to furnish to him a copy of any certificate described in paragraph (4)(c) issued by that committee, together with such other information relating to the circumstances surrounding the issue of that certificate as he may require, or

(b) require a medical practitioner who, in that province, has procured the miscarriage of any female person named in a certificate described in paragraph (4)(c), to furnish to him a copy of that certificate, together with such other information relating to the procuring of the miscarriage as he may require.

(6) For the purposes of subsections (4) and (5) and this subsection

"accredited hospital" means a hospital accredited by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation in which diagnostic services and medical, surgical and obstetrical treatment are provided;

"approved hospital" means a hospital in a province approved for the purposes of this section by the Minister of Health of that province;

"board" means the board of governors, management or directors, or the trustees, commission or other person or group of persons having the control and management of an accredited or approved hospital;

"Minister of Health" means

(a) in the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, the Minister of Health,

(a.1) in the Province of Alberta, the Minister of Hospitals and Medical Care,

(b) in the Province of British Columbia, the Minister of Health Services and Hospital Insurance,

(c) in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan, the Minister of Public Health, and

(d) in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, the Minister of National Health and Welfare;

"qualified medical practitioner" means a person entitled to engage in the practice of medicine under the laws of the province in which the hospital referred to in subsection (4) is situated;

a) requérir un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de quelque hôpital, dans cette province, ou un membre de ce comité, de lui fournir une copie d'un certificat mentionné à l'alinéa (4)c) émis par ce comité, ainsi que les autres renseignements qu'il peut exiger au sujet des circonstances entourant l'émission de ce certificat, ou

b) requérir un médecin qui, dans cette province, a procuré l'avortement d'une personne de sexe féminin nommée dans un certificat mentionné à l'alinéa (4)c), de lui fournir une copie de ce certificat, ainsi que les autres renseignements qu'il peut exiger au sujet de l'obtention de l'avortement.

(6) Aux fins des paragraphes (4) et (5) et du présent paragraphe,

«médecin qualifié» désigne une personne qui a le droit d'exercer la médecine en vertu des lois de la province dans laquelle est situé l'hôpital mentionné au paragraphe (4);

«ministre de la Santé» désigne

a) dans la province d'Ontario, de Québec, du Nouveau-Brunswick, du Manitoba, de Terre-Neuve et de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard, le ministre de la Santé;

a.1) dans la province d'Alberta, le ministre de la Santé (hôpitaux et assurance-maladie);

b) dans la province de Colombie-Britannique, le ministre des Services de santé et de l'assurance-hospitalisation,

c) dans les provinces de Nouvelle-Écosse et de Saskatchewan, le ministre de la Santé publique, et,

"therapeutic abortion committee" for any hospital means a committee, comprised of not less than three members each of whom is a qualified medical practitioner, appointed by the board of that hospital for the purpose of considering and determining questions relating to terminations of pregnancy within that hospital.

(7) Nothing in subsection (4) shall be construed as making unnecessary the obtaining of any authorization or consent that is or may be required, otherwise than under this Act, before any means are used for the purpose of carrying out an intention to procure the miscarriage of a female person.

Subsection (1) defines the indictable offence committed when a person uses any means for the purpose of carrying out his or her intention of procuring the miscarriage of a female person. Subsection (2) states that a pregnant woman who uses any means or permits any means to be used for the purpose of procuring her own miscarriage is guilty of an indictable offence with a lesser maximum penalty. Subsection (3) defines the expression "means" for s. 251.

Subsection (4), when read in conjunction with subss. (5), (6) and (7), outlines the circumstances in which an abortion can be lawfully performed. For the purposes of this appeal in which the existence of a constitutional right of access to abortion and the extent of that right is in issue, it is of special importance to understand the circumstances in which Parliament decriminalized abortion and thereby rendered it available without criminal sanction under ordinary law. Indeed, before the advent of the Charter, Parliament recognized that the interest in the life or health of the pregnant woman takes precedence over the interest in prohibiting abortions, including the interest of the state in the protection of the foetus, when the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the pregnant woman's life or health. Access to lawful abortion under the Criminal Code, albeit in limited circumstances, exists independently of any right which may or may not be founded upon the Charter.

As its opening words make plain, subs. (4) is an exculpatory provision: subss. (1) and (2), which

d) dans le territoire du Yukon et les territoires du Nord-Ouest, le ministre de la Santé nationale et du Bien-être social.

(7) Rien au paragraphe (4) ne doit s'interpréter de manière à faire disparaître la nécessité d'obtenir une autorisation ou un consentement qui est ou peut être requis, autrement qu'en vertu de la présente loi, avant l'emploi de moyens destinés à réaliser une intention de procurer l'avortement d'une personne du sexe féminin.

Le paragraphe (1) définit l'acte criminel commis lorsqu'une personne recourt à un moyen quelconque pour réaliser son intention de procurer l'avortement d'une personne du sexe féminin. Le paragraphe (2) stipule qu'une femme enceinte qui emploie, ou permet que soit employé, un moyen quelconque pour réaliser son intention d'obtenir son propre avortement est coupable d'un acte criminel assorti d'une peine maximale moindre. Le paragraphe (3) définit ce que comprend l'expression «moyen» aux fins de l'art. 251.

Le paragraphe (4), conjugué aux par. (5), (6) et (7), décrit les circonstances dans lesquelles un avortement peut être légalement pratiqué. Pour les fins du présent pourvoi où l'existence d'un droit constitutionnel à l'avortement et l'étendue de ce droit sont en cause, il est particulièrement important de comprendre les circonstances dans lesquelles le Parlement a décriminalisé l'avortement et l'a ainsi rendu possible sans que l'on s'expose à des sanctions criminelles en vertu de la loi. Avant même l'avènement de la Charte, le Parlement a reconnu que l'intérêt que représente la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte l'emporte sur celui qu'il y a à interdire les avortements, y compris l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus, lorsque la continuation de la grossesse mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte. La possibilité d'obtenir un avortement licite en vertu du Code criminel, quoique dans des circonstances limitées, existe indépendamment de tout droit pouvant ou non être fondé sur la Charte.

Comme il ressort clairement de son exorde, le par. (4) est une disposition disculpatoire: les par.

indicate when conduct related to procuring a miscarriage is an indictable offence, "do not apply" when the terms of subs. (4) are respected. Until section 18 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1968-69, S.C. 1968-69, c. 38, added subss. (4), (5), (6) and (7), there was no statutory exception to the crime of abortion. In the case at bar, the Ontario Court of Appeal (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 353, explained the historical significance of the adoption in 1969 of these exculpatory provisions in the following terms, at p. 366:

> By defining criminal conduct more narrowly, these amendments reflected the contemporary view that abortion is not always socially undesirable behaviour.

Access to abortion without risk of criminal penalty under the Criminal Code is expressed by Parliament in subss. (4), (5), (6) and (7) of s. 251 as relieving provisions in respect of the indictable offences defined at s. 251(1) and (2). According to Laskin C.J. (dissenting) in Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616 [hereinafter "Morgentaler (1975)"], these relieving provisions "simply permit a person to make conduct lawful which would otherwise be unlawful" (at p. 631). In the same case, Pigeon J. said that in 1969 "an explicit and specific definition was made of the circumstances under which an abortion could lawfully be performed" (at p. 660).

What is important, for our purposes, in considering subs. (4) is not, of course, the name we give to the exculpatory rule but the rule itself: Parliament has recognized that circumstances exist in which an abortion can be procured lawfully. The Court of Appeal observed, supra, at p. 378:

> A woman's only right to an abortion at the time the Charter came into force would accordingly appear to be that given to her by s-s. (4) of s. 251.

Given that it appears in a criminal law statute, s. 251(4) cannot be said to create a "right", much less a constitutional right, but it does represent an exception decreed by Parliament pursuant to what the Court of Appeal aptly called "the contempo-

(1) et (2), qui indiquent quand un comportement lié à une interruption de grossesse est un acte criminel, «ne s'appliquent pas» lorsque les conditions du par. (4) sont remplies. Jusqu'à ce que l'art. 18 de la Loi de 1968-69 modifiant le droit pénal, S.C. 1968-69, chap. 38, ajoute les par. (4), (5), (6) et (7), il n'y avait aucune exception légale au crime d'avortement. En l'espèce, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 353, explique la signification historique de l'adoption, en 1969, de ces dispositions discupaltoires dans les termes suivants, à la p. 366:

> [TRADUCTION] En définissant la conduite criminelle plus étroitement, ces modifications reflétaient le point de vue contemporain selon lequel l'avortement n'est pas toujours une conduite socialement répréhensible.

La possibilité d'obtenir un avortement, sans s'exposer à une peine criminelle en vertu du Code criminel, est exprimée par le législateur aux par. 251(4), (5), (6) et (7), sous la forme de clauses d'exception relativement aux actes criminels définis aux par. 251(1) et (2). Selon le juge en chef Laskin (dissident) dans l'affaire Morgentaler c. La Reine, [1976] 1 R.C.S. 616 [ci-après l'arrêt «Morgentaler (1975)»], ces clauses d'exception «permet[tent] simplement de poser légalement un geste qui autrement serait illégal» (à la p. 631). Dans la même affaire, le juge Pigeon affirme qu'en 1969 «les circonstances requises pour qu'un avortement puisse être légalement pratiqué ont été définies de façon explicite et spécifique» (à la p. 660).

Ce qui importe lors de l'étude du par. (4), ce n'est pas, bien entendu, l'appellation donnée à la règle disculpatoire mais la règle elle-même: le législateur a reconnu qu'il y a des circonstances dans lesquelles un avortement peut être pratiqué licitement. La Cour d'appel fait observer dans son arrêt, précité, à la p. 378:

> [TRADUCTION] Le seul droit à l'avortement que possédait une femme à l'époque où la Charte est entrée en vigueur, semblerait donc être celui que lui conférait le par. 251(4).

Étant donné qu'il se trouve dans une loi traitant de droit criminel, on ne saurait dire que le par. 251(4) crée un «droit», encore moins un droit constitutionnel; mais il représente néanmoins une exception, décrétée par le législateur conformément à ce que rary view that abortion is not always socially undesirable behaviour". Examining the content of the rule by which Parliament decriminalizes abortion is the most appropriate first step in considering the validity of s. 251 as against the constitutional right to abortion alleged by the appellants in argument.

By enacting subss. (4), (5), (6) and (7) of s. 251 in 1969, Parliament endeavoured to decriminalize abortion in one circumstance, described in substantive terms in s. 251(4)(c): when the continuation of the pregnancy of the woman would or would be likely to endanger her life or health. This is the crux of the exception. This is the circumstance in which Parliament decided to allow women to procure a miscarriage without criminal sanction either for themselves or for their doctors. Laskin C.J. referred to this "would or would be likely to endanger her life or health" element in s. 251(4)(c) as the "standard in s. 251(4)" in Morgentaler (1975), supra, at p. 629.

The remaining provisions of subss. (4), (5), (6) and (7) of s. 251 are designed to ascertain whether the standard has been met in a given case. To employ the expression of the Attorney General of Canada who intervened in this case in defence of s. 251, these provisions were designed, in part, "to allow relief from criminal sanction where there is a reliable, independent and medically sound judgment that the life or health of the mother would be or would likely be endangered ...." Section 251(4)(a) requires, for example, that a therapeutic abortion committee give its opinion in writing that the standard has been met. The committee is comprised of not less than three qualified medical practitioners appointed by the board of the hospital where the treatment would take place. The qualified medical practitioner who would perform the abortion may not be a member of a therapeutic abortion committee for any hospital. The opinion must be that of the majority of the members of the committee and must be made by certificate in writing and given to the practitioner who, accord-la Cour d'appel a, à juste titre, appelé [TRADUCTION] «le point de vue contemporain selon lequel l'avortement n'est pas toujours une conduite socialement répréhensible». L'examen du contenu de la règle par laquelle le législateur décriminalise l'avortement est la démarche la plus appropriée qu'il convient d'adopter, dans un premier temps, lorsqu'il s'agit d'étudier la validité de l'art. 251 par rapport au droit constitutionnel à l'avortement allégué par les appelants au cours du débat.

En adoptant les par. 251(4), (5), (6) et (7) en 1969, le législateur a tenté de décriminaliser l'avortement dans un cas, décrit en substance à l'al. 251(4)c): lorsque la continuation de la grossesse de la femme mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger sa vie ou sa santé. C'est là le cœur de l'exception. C'est là la circonstance dans laquelle le législateur a décidé d'autoriser les femmes à se faire avorter, sans que ni elles ni leurs médecins n'encourent de sanctions criminelles. Le juge en chef Laskin qualifie les mots «mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de cette dernière» de l'al. 251(4)c) de «critère du par. (4) de l'art. 251», dans l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975), précité, à la p. 629.

Les autres dispositions des par. 251(4), (5), (6) et (7) ont été conçues afin d'assurer que le critère soit respecté dans un cas donné. Pour reprendre les termes du procureur général du Canada, qui est intervenu en l'espèce pour défendre l'art. 251, ces dispositions ont été conçues en partie [TRADUCTION] «pour permettre d'échapper aux sanctions criminelles en cas de jugement médical éclairé, fiable et indépendant que la vie ou la santé de la mère serait ou serait probablement en danger ...» L'alinéa 251(4)a) exige, par exemple, qu'un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique déclare par écrit qu'à son avis ce critère est respecté. Le comité se compose d'au moins trois médecins qualifiés, nommés par le conseil de l'hôpital où le traitement sera éventuellement donné. Le médecin qualifié qui, le cas échéant, pratiquera l'avortement ne peut être membre d'un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de quelque hôpital que ce soit. L'avis du comité doit être celui de la majorité de ses membres et il doit être donné par certificat remis au médecin qui ne doit pas avoir de raison de ing to s. 251(4)(a), must be in "good faith" and, consequently, have no reason to believe that the standard in s. 251(4)(c) has not been met. The Minister of Health of the province in which the certificate was issued may by order require the therapeutic abortion committee to furnish him with a copy of the certificate. Other aspects of s. 251(4) are designed to ensure the safety of the abortion itself after the standard has been met and after the certificate to this effect has been issued enabling the woman to have a lawful abortion. These include the requirements that the practitioner be properly qualified and that the abortion be carried out in an accredited or approved hospital.

Overall, the procedure set forth at s. 251(4) is in place to ensure that the standard of the exception — that the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the pregnant woman's health — is met before Parliament will allow an abortion to be performed without punishment. Parliament will protect the life and health of the pregnant woman by allowing her access to an abortion when it has been established, through the means selected by Parliament, that her life or health would or would likely be in danger if her pregnancy continued. The other provisions in s. 251(4), though necessary for an abortion to be lawful, were enacted to ensure that the standard was met and that, once met, the lawful abortion would be performed safely. These other rules are a means to an end and not an end unto themselves. As a whole, subss. (4), (5), (6) and (7) of s. 251 seek to make therapeutic abortions lawful and available but also to ensure that the excuse of therapy will not be abused and that lawful abortions be safe.

That abortions are recognized as lawful by Parliament based on a specific standard under its ordinary laws is important, I think, to a proper understanding of the existence of a right of access to abortion founded on rights guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter. The constitutional right does not have its source in the Criminal Code, but, in my view, the content of the standard in s. 251(4) that Parliament recognized in the Criminal Law croire que le critère de l'al. 251(4)c) n'est pas respecté puisqu'il lui est demandé, en vertu de l'al. 251(4)a), d'agir de «bonne foi». Le ministre de la Santé de la province où a été délivré le certificat peut ordonner au comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de lui remettre une copie du certificat. D'autres aspects du par. 251(4) ont été conçus pour assurer que l'avortement lui-même soit pratiqué en toute sécurité une fois ce critère satisfait et une fois délivré le certificat en ce sens, autorisant la femme à subir un avortement licite. Ils incluent l'obligation que le praticien soit dûment qualifié et que l'avortement soit pratiqué dans un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé.

Dans l'ensemble, la procédure exposée au par. 251(4) a été mise en place pour assurer que le critère de l'exception, savoir que la continuation de la grossesse mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la santé de la femme enceinte, a été respecté avant que le législateur n'autorise de pratiquer un avortement en toute impunité. Le législateur protège la vie et la santé de la femme enceinte en lui permettant d'obtenir un avortement lorsqu'il a été établi, par les moyens choisis par le législateur, que sa vie ou sa santé serait ou serait probablement en danger si la grossesse se poursuivait. Les autres dispositions du par. 251(4), quoique nécessaires pour rendre l'avortement licite, ont été adoptées pour assurer que le critère soit respecté et qu'une fois qu'il l'a été l'avortement devenu licite soit pratiqué en toute sécurité. Les autres règles constituent des moyens d'atteindre une fin et non une fin en soi. Dans leur ensemble, les par. 251(4), (5), (6) et (7) ont pour but de rendre les avortements thérapeutiques licites et possibles, et aussi d'assurer qu'on n'abusera pas de l'excuse de la thérapie et, enfin, que les avortements licites ne comporteront aucun risque.

La reconnaissance par le législateur de la légalité des avortements, selon un critère spécifique précisé dans la loi, est importante, je pense, pour bien comprendre l'existence d'un droit à l'avortement fondé sur les droits garantis par l'art. 7 de la Charte. Ce droit constitutionnel ne prend pas sa source dans le Code criminel mais, à mon avis, le contenu du critère du par. 251(4) que le législateur a reconnu dans la Loi de 1968-69 modifiant le Amendment Act, 1968-69 was for all intents and purposes entrenched at least as a minimum in 1982 when a distinct right in s. 7 became part of Canadian constitutional law.

II —The Right to Security of the Person in s. 7 of the Charter

Section 7 of the Charter provides:

I share the view first expressed by Wilson J. in Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 177, at p. 205, and confirmed by Lamer J. in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, at p. 500, that "it is incumbent upon this Court to give meaning to each of the elements, life, liberty and security of the person, which make up the 'right' contained in s. 7." The full ambit of this constitutionally protected right will only be revealed over time. Consequently, the minimum content which I attribute to s. 7 does not preclude, or for that matter assure, the finding of a wider constitutional right when the courts will be faced with this or other issues in other contexts. As we shall see, the content of the "security of the person" element of the s. 7 right is sufficient in itself to invalidate s. 251 of the Criminal Code and consequently dispose of the appeal.

In discussing the content of the right protected by s. 7 of the Charter in the case at bar, the Ontario Court of Appeal wrote, at pp. 377-78, that "it would place too narrow an interpretation on s. 7 to limit it to protection against arbitrary arrest and detention". It will be seen from what follows that I agree with this view. Indeed the natural meaning of "life, liberty and security of the person" belies this limited view of the scope of s. 7. As Estey J. observed in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 357, at p. 377, examining the "Legal Rights" heading which introduces ss. 7 to 14 of the Charter is at best one step in the constitutional interpretation process and is not necessarily of controlling importance. I droit pénal, a été enchâssé à tous égards, au moins comme un minimum, lorsqu'un droit distinct, à l'art. 7, est devenu partie intégrante en 1982 du droit constitutionnel canadien.

II – Le droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte

L'article 7 de la Charte prévoit:

7. Chacun a droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne; il ne peut être porté atteinte à ce droit qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale.

Je partage l'opinion exprimée pour la première fois par le juge Wilson dans l'arrêt Singh c. Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 177, à la p. 205, et confirmée par le juge Lamer dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486, à la p. 500, qu'il «incombe à la Cour de préciser le sens de chacun des éléments, savoir la vie, la liberté et la sécurité de la personne, qui constituent le «droit» mentionné à l'art. 7». La portée complète de cette garantie constitutionnelle n'apparaîtra qu'avec le temps. Par conséquent, le contenu minimum que j'attribue à l'art. 7 n'interdit pas, non plus qu'il n'assure d'ailleurs, la conclusion à l'existence d'un droit constitutionnel plus large, lorsque les tribunaux seront confrontés à cette question, ou à d'autres, dans d'autres contextes. Comme nous le verrons, le contenu de l'élément «sécurité de sa personne» du droit prévu à l'art. 7 est suffisant en soi pour invalider l'art. 251 du Code criminel et, par conséquent, pour disposer du pourvoi.

En analysant le contenu du droit protégé par l'art. 7 de la Charte en l'espèce, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario écrit, aux pp. 377 et 378, que [TRADUCTION] «ce serait donner une interprétation trop étroite à l'art. 7 que de le limiter à une protection contre les arrestations et détentions arbitraires». On verra dans ce qui suit que je partage cet avis. D'ailleurs, le sens ordinaire des termes «la vie, la liberté et la sécurité de sa personne» dément cette conception limitée de la portée de l'art. 7. Comme le juge Estey le fait observer dans l'arrêt Law Society of Upper Canada c. Skapinker, [1984] 1 R.C.S. 357, à la p. 377, l'examen de la rubrique «Garanties juridiques» qui précède les art. 7 à 14 de la Charte ne constitue tout au plus qu'une étape am mindful, however, that it is in the criminal law context that "security of the person" and the alleged violation of s. 7 arise in this case. Enjoying "security of the person" free from criminal sanction is central to understanding the violation of the Charter right which I describe herein. It is not necessary to decide whether s. 7 would apply in other circumstances.

A pregnant woman's person cannot be said to be secure if, when her life or health is in danger, she is faced with a rule of criminal law which precludes her from obtaining effective and timely medical treatment.

Generally speaking, the constitutional right to security of the person must include some protection from state interference when a person's life or health is in danger. The Charter does not, needless to say, protect men and women from even the most serious misfortunes of nature. Section 7 cannot be invoked simply because a person's life or health is in danger. The state can obviously not be said to have violated, for example, a pregnant woman's security of the person simply on the basis that her pregnancy in and of itself represents a danger to her life or health. There must be state intervention for "security of the person" in s. 7 to be violated.

If a rule of criminal law precludes a person from obtaining appropriate medical treatment when his or her life or health is in danger, then the state has intervened and this intervention constitutes a violation of that man's or that woman's security of the person. "Security of the person" must include a right of access to medical treatment for a condition representing a danger to life or health without fear of criminal sanction. If an act of Parliament forces a person whose life or health is in danger to choose between, on the one hand, the commission of a crime to obtain effective and timely medical treatment and, on the other hand, inadequate treatment or no treatment at all, the right to security of the person has been violated.

dans le processus d'interprétation constitutionnelle et ne revêt pas nécessairement une importance décisive. Je suis toutefois conscient que c'est dans un contexte de droit criminel que «la sécurité de la personne» et la violation prétendue de l'art. 7 sont en cause en l'espèce. La jouissance de «la sécurité de la personne», sans menace de répression pénale, est primordiale pour comprendre la violation du droit garanti par la Charte que je décris ici. Il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si l'art. 7 s'appliquerait dans d'autres circonstances.

On ne peut dire que la personne de la femme enceinte est en sécurité si, alors que sa vie ou sa santé est en danger, elle est confrontée à une règle de droit criminel qui l'empêche d'obtenir un traitement médical efficace en temps opportun.

En règle générale, le droit constitutionnel à la sécurité de la personne doit inclure une forme de protection contre l'intervention de l'État lorsque la vie ou la santé d'une personne est en danger. La Charte, cela va sans dire, ne protège pas les hommes et les femmes contre les infortunes, même les plus graves, dues à la nature. L'article 7 ne saurait être invoqué simplement parce que la vie ou la santé d'une personne est en danger. De toute évidence, on ne saurait dire que l'État a violé, par exemple, la sécurité de la personne d'une femme enceinte simplement parce que sa grossesse, en elle-même et par elle-même, représente un danger pour sa vie ou sa santé. Il doit y avoir intervention de l'État pour qu'il y ait violation de la «sécurité de la personne» visée à l'art. 7.

Si une règle de droit criminel empêche une personne d'obtenir un traitement médical approprié lorsque sa vie ou sa santé est en danger, l'État est alors intervenu et cette intervention constitue une violation de la sécurité de la personne de cet homme ou de cette femme. La «sécurité de la personne» doit inclure un droit au traitement médical d'un état dangereux pour la vie ou la santé, sans menace de répression pénale. Si une loi du Parlement force une personne dont la vie ou la santé est en danger à choisir entre, d'une part, la perpétration d'un crime pour obtenir un traitement médical efficace en temps opportun et, d'autre part, un traitement inadéquat ou pas de traitement du tout, le droit à la sécurité de la personne est violé.

This interpretation of s. 7 of the Charter is sufficient to measure the content of s. 251 of the Criminal Code against that of the Charter in order to dispose of this appeal. While I agree with McIntyre J. that a breach of a right to security must be "based upon an infringement of some interest which would be of such nature and such importance as to warrant constitutional protection", I am of the view that the protection of life or health is an interest of sufficient importance in this regard. Under the Criminal Code, the only way in which a pregnant woman can legally secure an abortion when the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger her life or health is to comply with the procedure set forth in s. 251(4). Where the continued pregnancy does constitute a danger to life or health, the pregnant woman faces a choice: (1) she can endeavour to follow the s. 251(4) procedure, which, as we shall see, creates an additional medical risk given its inherent delays and the possibility that the danger will not be recognized by the state-imposed therapeutic abortion committee; or (2) she can secure medical treatment without respecting s. 251(4) and subject herself to criminal sanction under s. 251(2).

Cette interprétation de l'art. 7 de la Charte suffit pour évaluer en fonction de la Charte le contenu de l'art. 251 du Code criminel, afin de statuer sur le pourvoi. Tout en convenant avec le juge McIntyre qu'une atteinte au droit à la sécurité doit «dépendre d'une atteinte à quelque intérêt dont la nature et l'importance justifieraient une protection constitutionnelle», j'estime que la protection de la vie ou de la santé est un intérêt d'une importance suffisante à cet égard. En vertu du Code criminel, la seule façon pour une femme enceinte d'obtenir légalement un avortement lorsque la continuation de la grossesse mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger sa vie ou sa santé consiste à se conformer à la procédure énoncée au par. 251(4). Lorsque la continuation de la grossesse constitue effectivement un danger pour la vie ou la santé, la femme enceinte doit faire un choix: (1) elle peut essayer de suivre la procédure du par. 251(4) qui, comme nous allons le voir, crée un risque médical supplémentaire, étant donné l'attente qu'elle comporte inévitablement et la possibilité que le danger ne soit pas reconnu par le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique imposé par l'État; ou (2) elle peut obtenir un traitement médical sans respecter le par. 251(4) et s'exposer à des sanctions criminelles en vertu du par. 251(2).

III —Delays Caused by s. 251 Procedure in Violation of Security of the Person

III – Délais engendrés par la procédure de l'art. 251 en violation de la sécurité de la personne

This chapter requires a review of the evidence, part of which is to be found in two reports, the Report of the Committee on the Operation of the Abortion Law (the "Badgley Report"), and the Report on Therapeutic Abortion Services in Ontario (the "Powell Report").

Ce chapitre exige un examen de la preuve soumise, dont une partie se trouve dans deux rapports, le Rapport du Comité sur l'application des dispositions législatives sur l'avortement (le «rapport Badgley»), et le Report on Therapeutic Abortion Services in Ontario (le «rapport Powell»).

The Badgley Report (1977) was written by a committee appointed by the Privy Council with a mandate to conduct a study to determine whether the procedure provided in the Criminal Code for obtaining therapeutic abortions is operating equitably across Canada and to make findings on the operation of this law rather than recommendations on the underlying policy: Badgley Report, at p. 27.

Le rapport Badgley, 1977, est l'œuvre d'un comité nommé par le Conseil privé, dont le mandat était de mener une enquête afin de déterminer si la procédure prévue au Code criminel pour obtenir des avortements thérapeutiques est appliquée de façon équitable dans tout le Canada et de se prononcer sur la mise en œuvre de cette loi, plutôt que de faire des recommandations sur les principes qui la sous-tendent: rapport Badgley, à la p. 31.

The Powell Report (1987) is a study commissioned by the Ministry of Health with terms of Le rapport Powell, 1987, inédit, est une étude commandée par le ministère de la Santé, dont le reference limited to a review of access to therapeutic abortion services in Ontario. Like those for the Badgley Report, these terms did not include the mandate for an evaluation of the underlying policy of the Criminal Code: Powell Report, Appendix 1.

I propose to consider first the delays caused by the s. 251 procedure and then the consequences of the delays.

1. Delays Caused by the s. 251 Procedure

The evidence reveals that the actual workings of s. 251(4) are the source of certain delays which create an additional medical risk for many pregnant women whose medical condition already meets the standard of s. 251(4)(c). Stated simply, when pregnant women suffer from a condition which represents a danger to their life or health, their efforts to conform to the procedure set forth for obtaining lawful abortions in the Criminal Code often create an additional risk to their health. They may have to choose between bearing the burden of these risks by accepting delayed medical treatment, and committing a crime by seeking timely medical treatment outside s. 251(4). Given that the procedure in s. 251(4) is the source of this additional risk, it constitutes a violation of the pregnant woman's security of the person. I shall first endeavour to show that these delays have their origin in s. 251. I will then cite evidence that these procedural delays create an additional risk to the health of pregnant women.

While only administrative inefficiencies that are caused by the rules in s. 251 are relevant to the evaluation of the constitutionality of the legislation under s. 7 of the Charter, the evidence which relates to the availability of therapeutic abortions under the Criminal Code reveals three sorts of delay, all of which can be traced to the requirements of s. 251 itself: (1) the absence of hospitals with therapeutic abortion committees in many parts of Canada; (2) the quotas which some hospitals with committees impose on the number of mandat était limité à un examen des services d'avortements thérapeutiques offerts en Ontario. Comme dans le rapport Badgley, ce mandat ne comportait pas l'évaluation de la politique sous-jacente du Code criminel: rapport Powell, appendice 1.

Je traiterai en premier lieu des délais engendrés par la procédure de l'art. 251, puis des conséquences qu'ils entraînent.

1. Les délais engendrés par la procédure de l'art. 251

Il ressort de la preuve que les rouages du par. 251(4) sont à l'origine de certains délais qui engendrent un risque médical additionnel pour beaucoup de femmes enceintes dont l'état médical satisfait déjà au critère de l'al. 251(4)c). En bref, quand l'état des femmes enceintes représente un danger pour leur vie ou leur santé, leurs efforts pour se conformer à la procédure énoncée par le Code criminel en ce qui concerne l'obtention d'avortements licites créent souvent un risque additionnel pour leur santé. Elles peuvent avoir à choisir entre assumer le fardeau de ces risques, en acceptant de retarder le traitement médical, et commettre un crime, en cherchant à obtenir en temps opportun un traitement médical qui ne relève pas du par. 251(4). Étant donné que la procédure du par. 251(4) est à la source de ce risque additionnel, cette règle constitue une violation de la sécurité de la personne de la femme enceinte. J'essaierai d'abord de montrer que l'art. 251 est à l'origine de ces délais. Je citerai ensuite des éléments de preuve étayant que ces délais en matière de procédure créent un risque additionnel pour la santé des femmes enceintes.

Quoique seule l'inefficacité administrative occasionnée par les exigences de l'art. 251 soit pertinente lors de la détermination de la constitutionnalité de la législation au regard de l'art. 7 de la Charte, la preuve soumise quant à la possibilité d'obtenir des avortements thérapeutiques conformes au Code criminel révèle l'existence de trois sortes de délais qui peuvent tous être reliés aux exigences de l'art. 251 lui-même: (1) l'absence, dans bien des régions du Canada, d'hôpitaux dotés de comités de l'avortement thérapeutique, (2) les therapeutic abortions which they perform and (3) the committee requirement itself each create delays for pregnant women who seek timely and effective medical treatment.

(1) Lack of Hospitals with Therapeutic Abortion Committees

Hospitals with therapeutic abortion committees are completely lacking in many parts of Canada, forcing women to go elsewhere and suffer delays in order to gain access to hospitals in which they may obtain therapeutic abortions free from criminal sanction. The requirements which hospitals must meet under s. 251 are responsible for this absence of eligible hospitals. Often, the absence of hospitals can be traced to the prerequisites which hospitals must meet under s. 251(6). In other cases, the absence is caused by the refusal of certain hospital boards to appoint committees in hospitals which would otherwise qualify under the law, as is their prerogative under s. 251(6). I shall consider each of these in turn.

The effect of certain definitions in s. 251(6), when read in conjunction with s. 251(4), is to cause an absence of hospitals in which therapeutic abortions can legally be performed. A "therapeutic abortion committee" for any hospital means, according to s. 251(6), a committee comprised of not less than three physicians from which the physician who performs the abortion is excluded under s. 251(4). As the Chief Justice observed, the combined effect of these two provisions is to require at least four physicians at the hospital so that the therapeutic abortion can be lawfully authorized and performed. The four-physician requirement obviously precludes therapeutic abortions from being performed in hospitals where four doctors are not available.

Moreover, the requirement in s. 251(4) that lawful abortions can only be performed in "accredited" or "approved" hospitals also has the effect of contingents que certains hôpitaux dotés de comités fixent au nombre d'avortements thérapeutiques qu'ils pratiqueront et (3) l'obligation même de recourir à un comité sont tous des causes de délai pour les femmes enceintes qui cherchent à obtenir un traitement médical efficace en temps opportun.

(1) L'absence d'hôpitaux dotés de comités de l'avortement thérapeutique

Les hôpitaux dotés de comités de l'avortement thérapeutique brillent par leur absence dans de nombreux endroits au Canada, ce qui force les femmes à s'adresser ailleurs et à attendre avant d'avoir accès aux hôpitaux où elles pourront obtenir des avortements thérapeutiques sans menace de répression pénale. Les exigences auxquelles doivent satisfaire les hôpitaux en vertu de l'art. 251 sont responsables de cette absence d'hôpitaux admissibles. Souvent, l'absence d'hôpitaux peut être reliée aux conditions préalables que les hôpitaux doivent remplir en vertu du par. 251(6). Dans d'autres cas, cette carence est due au refus de certains conseils d'hôpitaux, par ailleurs admissibles en vertu de la loi, de nommer des comités, comme c'est leur prérogative en vertu du par. 251(6). Je traiterai successivement de chacun de ces points.

Certaines définitions figurant au par. 251(6), lues conjointement avec le par. 251(4), ont pour effet de causer une absence d'hôpitaux où des avortements thérapeutiques peuvent être légalement pratiqués. Le «comité de l'avortement thérapeutique» d'un hôpital s'entend, d'après le par. 251(6), d'un comité formé d'au moins trois médecins et dont le médecin qui pratique l'avortement est exclu en vertu du par. 251(4). Comme le fait observer le Juge en chef, ces deux dispositions ont pour effet conjugué d'exiger qu'il y ait au moins quatre médecins à l'hôpital pour que l'avortement thérapeutique puisse être légalement autorisé et pratiqué. Le fait d'exiger qu'il y ait quatre médecins empêche manifestement de pratiquer des avortements thérapeutiques dans des hôpitaux qui ne comptent pas quatre médecins.

De plus, l'exigence du par. 251(4) portant que les avortements licites ne soient pratiqués que dans des hôpitaux «accrédités» ou «approuvés» a aussi contributing to the absence of hospitals, in some parts of Canada, in which lawful abortions are available. Section 251(6) defines "accredited hospital" as a hospital accredited by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation in which diagnostic services and medical, surgical and obstetrical treatment are provided. Not only are some hospitals unable to qualify because they do not provide all these services, but some hospitals also fail to meet the Council's accreditation requirements.

Alternatively, therapeutic abortions may be performed in hospitals "approved" by the Ministers of Health in the province, and standards to be met for approval vary considerably from province to province. The Badgley Report, at pp. 91 et seq., noted this variation in 1977. In Newfoundland, for example, the Department of Health guidelines required hospitals seeking approval to establish therapeutic abortion committees to have a minimum of six members of the medical staff willing to co-operate with or recognize the existence of a therapeutic abortion committee, the presence of a gynaecologist on the medical staff, and 100 beds or more in the hospital, even though many abortions are done on an out-patient basis. Thus, of 46 public general hospitals in the province in 1976, 35 were excluded by these provincial criteria, leaving only 11 hospitals qualified to establish therapeutic abortion committees, with no obligation to do so. In Saskatchewan, where provincial regulations included a requirement of a rated bed capacity of 50 beds or more, 110 of 133 general hospitals were ineligible to establish a therapeutic abortion committee. In Ontario, where the provincial regulations included a requirement of 10 or more members on a hospital's active medical staff, 51 of 205 general hospitals were ineligible to establish committees. The Criminal Code, under the "approved" hospital requirement, not only allows for an unequal distribution of hospitals across Canada, but also permits provincial authorities to set standards which appear at times largely irrelevant to the performance of therapeutic abortions.

pour effet de contribuer à l'absence, dans certaines régions du Canada, d'hôpitaux où il est possible d'obtenir des avortements licites. Le paragraphe 251(6) définit l'expression «hôpital accrédité» comme un hôpital accrédité par le Conseil canadien d'accréditation des hôpitaux, dans lequel sont fournis des services de diagnostic et des traitements médicaux, chirurgicaux et obstétricaux. Non seulement certains hôpitaux sont-ils inadmissibles parce qu'ils ne fournissent pas tous ces services, mais encore d'autres ne répondent pas aux exigences d'accréditation du Conseil.

Subsidiairement, des avortements thérapeutiques peuvent être pratiqués dans des hôpitaux «approuvés» par le ministre de la Santé d'une province et les critères d'approbation varient alors considérablement d'une province à l'autre. Le rapport Badgley a souligné cet écart en 1977, aux pp. 100 et suivantes. À Terre-Neuve, par exemple, les directives du ministère de la Santé exigent que les hôpitaux qui cherchent à obtenir l'autorisation d'établir des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique comptent au moins six membres de leur personnel médical qui soient disposés à coopérer avec un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique ou à en reconnaître l'existence, qu'il y ait un gynécologue parmi le personnel médical et que l'hôpital compte au moins 100 lits, même si de nombreux avortements sont pratiqués en consultation externe. Ainsi, sur les 46 hôpitaux généraux publics que comptait la province en 1976, 35 ont été exclus par ces critères provinciaux, de sorte qu'il ne restait que 11 hôpitaux qualifiés pour établir des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique, sans qu'ils soient tenus de le faire. En Saskatchewan, où la réglementation provinciale exigeait un taux de capacité de 50 lits ou plus, 110 des 133 hôpitaux généraux n'avaient pas les qualités requises pour établir un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique. En Ontario, où la réglementation provinciale exigeait que le personnel médical actif de l'hôpital comporte dix membres ou plus, 51 des 205 hôpitaux généraux étaient inaptes à établir de tels comités. Le Code criminel, en exigeant qu'un hôpital soit "approuvé", permet non seulement une répartition inégale des hôpitaux à travers le Canada, mais habilite aussi les autorités provinciales à fixer des normes qui semblent parfois n'avoir que fort peu de rapport avec la pratique d'avortements thérapeutiques.

Thus, the requirements of s. 251 seriously limit the number of hospitals which are eligible to perform lawful abortions, causing an absence or a serious lack of therapeutic abortion facilities in many parts of the country. The conclusions of the Badgley Report are startling (at p. 105):

> Of the total of 1,348 non-military hospitals in Canada in 1976, 789 hospitals, or 58.5 percent, were ineligible in terms of their major treatment functions, the size of their medial staff, or their type of facility to establish therapeutic abortion committees.

The rules in s. 251(4) limiting the number of eligible hospitals means that a significant proportion of Canada's population is not served by hospitals in which therapeutic abortions can lawfully be performed. The Badgley Report, at p. 109, concluded in 1977 that 39.3 per cent of the total female population of Canada was not served by eligible hospitals. As we have already seen, the absence of eligible hospitals in some parts of Canada compels many pregnant women to leave their own communities to seek medical treatment in a place where an eligible hospital is available to admit them as patients. A pregnant woman in these circumstances will inevitably incur a delay in obtaining a therapeutic abortion.

The lack of hospitals with therapeutic abortion committees is made more serious by the refusal of certain hospital boards to appoint therapeutic abortion committees in hospitals which would otherwise qualify under the Criminal Code. Given that therapeutic abortions can only be performed in eligible hospitals and that the committee certifying the abortion must come from that hospital, this effectively contributes to the inaccessibility of the treatment. Nothing in the Criminal Code obliges the board of an eligible hospital to appoint therapeutic abortion committees. Indeed, a board is entitled to refuse to appoint a therapeutic abortion committee in a hospital that would otherwise qualify to perform abortions and boards often do so in Canada. Given that the decision to appoint a committee is, in part, one of conscience and, in

Ainsi les exigences de l'art. 251 limitent sérieusement le nombre d'hôpitaux qui peuvent pratiquer des avortements licites, ce qui entraîne une absence ou un manque grave d'établissements où l'on pratique l'avortement thérapeutique dans de nombreuses régions du pays. Les conclusions du rapport Badgley sont saisissantes (à la p. 115):

> Sur les 1,348 hôpitaux civils que comptait le Canada en 1976, 789 hôpitaux, soit 58.5 pour cent, n'étaient pas aptes à établir un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique, soit en raison de la spécialisation des traitements fournis dans ces établissements, soit à cause d'un personnel médical insuffisant ou du genre d'installations dont ils disposaient.

Les règles du par. 251(4) qui limitent le nombre d'hôpitaux admissibles signifient qu'une proportion importante de la population canadienne n'est pas desservie par des hôpitaux où des avortements thérapeutiques peuvent être pratiqués licitement. Le rapport Badgley, à la p. 120, a conclu en 1977 que 39,3 pour 100 de la population féminine totale du Canada n'était pas desservie par des hôpitaux admissibles. Comme nous l'avons déjà vu, l'absence d'hôpitaux admissibles dans certaines régions du Canada force un grand nombre de femmes enceintes à quitter leur propre localité pour aller demander des soins médicaux là où un hôpital admissible peut les accueillir comme patientes. Une femme enceinte, dans ces circonstances, devra inévitablement attendre pour obtenir un avortement thérapeutique.

Le manque d'hôpitaux dotés d'un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique est aggravé par le refus de certains conseils d'hôpitaux, par ailleurs admissibles en vertu du Code criminel, de nommer des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique. Comme les avortements thérapeutiques ne peuvent être pratiqués que dans des hôpitaux admissibles et que le comité qui certifie l'avortement doit être formé par l'hôpital même, il en découle effectivement une impossibilité de se faire traiter. Rien dans le Code criminel n'oblige le conseil d'un hôpital admissible à nommer des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique. En fait, un conseil a le droit de refuser de nommer un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique dans un hôpital qui aurait, par ailleurs, les qualités requises pour pratiquer des avortements, et les conseils le font souvent au Canada. Comme la some cases, one which affects religious beliefs, a law cannot force a board to appoint a committee any more than it could force a physician to perform an abortion. The defect in the law is not that it does not force boards to appoint committees, but that it grants exclusive authority to those boards to make such appointments.

In "Abortion and the Just Society" (1970), 5 R.J.T. 27, at p. 36, lawyer Natalie Fochs Isaacs correctly anticipated the effect of the exclusive authority of hospital boards in establishing committees:

> S. 237 [now s. 251] sets out the requirement of the certification of therapeutic abortion by a therapeutic abortion committee prior to its performance. But the section does not require any hospital to set up such a committee. Given the undesirability of forcing any hospital to do so, the restriction of legal abortions to this type of preliminary certification fails nevertheless to provide for alternative methods of prior medical consultation among those staff members of any hospital opposed to the creation of the committee required, who themselves approve of therapeutic abortions. The new legislation in this manner also places the prospective petitioner for the operation at the mercy of the institutional policy of what may be the only hospital available in her community. [Footnotes omitted.]

The Badgley Report, at p. 93, again documented the reduction of the number of hospitals with therapeutic abortion committees due to the refusal of boards of hospitals which would otherwise qualify under the law to appoint committees. In Newfoundland, 6 of the 11 hospitals which were otherwise qualified to perform therapeutic abortions did in fact appoint committees so that only 6 of a total of 46 general hospitals were eligible to perform therapeutic abortions under the Criminal Code. In Quebec, 31 of 128 general hospitals appointed therapeutic abortion committees. In Saskatchewan, 10 of 133 general hospitals appointed committees. In Manitoba, 8 of 78 general hospitals appointed committees. Overall, the Badgley Report, supra, at p. 105, concluded in the following terms:

décision de nommer un comité est, en partie, une décision de conscience et, dans certains cas, une décision qui touche aux croyances religieuses, une loi ne peut forcer un conseil à nommer un comité, pas plus qu'elle ne peut forcer un médecin à pratiquer un avortement. Le défaut de la loi réside non pas dans le fait qu'elle ne force pas les conseils à nommer des comités, mais dans celui qu'elle confère à ces conseils le pouvoir exclusif de les nommer.

Dans son article intitulé «Abortion and the Just Society» (1970), 5 R.J.T. 27, à la p. 36, Me Natalie Fochs Isaacs avait prévu avec justesse l'effet qu'aurait le pouvoir exclusif des conseils d'hôpitaux d'établir des comités:

Le rapport Badgley, à la p. 102, fournit aussi des données sur la réduction du nombre d'hôpitaux dotés d'un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique par suite du refus des conseils des hôpitaux par ailleurs admissibles en vertu de la loi de nommer des comités. À Terre-Neuve, 6 des 11 hôpitaux par ailleurs admissibles à pratiquer des avortements thérapeutiques ont effectivement nommé des comités, de sorte que seulement 6 hôpitaux généraux sur un total de 46 étaient aptes à pratiquer des avortements thérapeutiques en vertu du Code criminel. Au Québec, 31 des 128 hôpitaux généraux ont nommé des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique. En Saskatchewan, 10 des 133 hôpitaux généraux ont nommé de tels comités. Au Manitoba, 8 des 78 hôpitaux généraux ont nommé des comités. De manière générale, le rapport Badgley, précité, conclut ce qui suit, à la p. 116:

In terms of all civilian hospitals (1,348) in Canada in 1976, 20.1 percent had established a therapeutic abortion committee. If only those general hospitals which met hospital practices and provincial requirements and were not exempt in terms of their special treatment facilities are considered, then of these 559 hospitals, 271 hospitals, or 48.5 percent, had established therapeutic abortion committees, while 288 hospitals, or 51.5 percent, did not have these committees.

According to the Powell Report, a comparable fraction of hospitals had established therapeutic abortion committees in Ontario: "out of 176 accredited acute care hospitals, 95 (54%) had therapeutic abortion committees" (at p. 24). The figures reported by the Badgley Committee in 1977 were confirmed in a recent Statistics Canada report according to which the total number of hospitals with therapeutic abortion committees fell across the country from 271 in 1976 to 250 in 1985 (Therapeutic abortions, 1985 (1986), at p. 12).

For the purposes of the case at bar, it is important to reiterate that the absence of hospitals with therapeutic abortion committees in many parts of Canada is caused by the following requirements of the law:

(a) that a total of four physicians in the hospital must participate in the authorization and performance of the therapeutic abortion;

(b) that the hospital must be "approved" or "accredited"; and

(c) that only the board of the hospital is entitled to appoint a therapeutic abortion committee.

Finally, it is worth noting that 18 per cent of the hospitals that did have therapeutic abortion committees in 1984 performed no therapeutic abortions (Therapeutic abortions, 1985, supra, at p. 38). Dr. Augustin Roy, the President of the Corporation professionnelle des médecins du Québec, testified at trial that of the 30 hospitals with therapeutic abortion committees in Quebec, "only about fourteen or fifteen of these hospitals are operational, because many of them, say half of

Si l'on considère l'ensemble des hôpitaux civils au Canada en 1976, soit 1,348 établissements, 20.1 pour cent d'entre eux avaient établi un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique. Si l'on considère uniquement les hôpitaux généraux qui satisfaisaient aux exigences provinciales et aux normes de la pratique hospitalière et qui n'étaient pas exclus du fait de leur spécialisation, sur ces 559 centres hospitaliers, 271 hôpitaux, soit 48.5 pour cent, avaient établi un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique tandis que 288 hôpitaux, soit 51.5 pour cent, n'en avaient pas formé.

D'après le rapport Powell, une proportion comparable d'hôpitaux avaient établi des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique en Ontario: [TRADUCTION] «des 176 hôpitaux à soins intensifs accrédités, 95 (54 %) avaient des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique» (à la p. 24). Les chiffres publiés par le comité Badgley en 1977 ont été confirmés dans un rapport récent de Statistique Canada selon lequel le nombre total d'hôpitaux pourvus d'un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique est passé, à l'échelle du pays, de 271 en 1976 à 250 en 1985 (Avortements thérapeutiques, 1985 (1986), à la p. 12).

Pour les fins de l'espèce, il importe de réitérer que l'absence, dans de nombreuses régions du Canada, d'hôpitaux dotés d'un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique est due aux conditions suivantes de la loi, savoir:

a) qu'un nombre total de quatre médecins de l'hôpital doivent participer à l'autorisation et à la pratique de l'avortement thérapeutique;

b) que l'hôpital doit être "approuvé" ou "accrédité"; et

c) que seul le conseil de l'hôpital a le droit de nommer un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique.

Enfin, il vaut la peine de noter que 18 pour 100 des hôpitaux qui avaient des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique en 1984 n'ont pratiqué aucun avortement thérapeutique (Avortements thérapeutiques, 1985, précité, à la p. 38). Le Dr Augustin Roy, président de la Corporation professionnelle des médecins du Québec, a déclaré dans son témoignage au procès que sur les 30 hôpitaux pourvus de comités de l'avortement thérapeutique au Québec, [TRADUCTION] «seuls environ quatorze ou quinze de ces hôpitaux étaient opérationnels, parce them, have a committee but they don't do any abortions. It is a committee on paper."

A hospital with a dormant committee is no more useful to a pregnant woman seeking a therapeutic abortion than a hospital without a committee or no hospital at all. The delay suffered by a pregnant woman because her local hospital has a dormant committee is perhaps more the result of internal hospital policy than of s. 251 of the Criminal Code, but s. 251 is at least indirectly the cause of the delay in requiring an opinion from the therapeutic abortion committee of that hospital before a lawful abortion can be performed there.

(2) Delays Caused by Quotas

Delays result not only from the absence or inactivity of therapeutic abortion committees. The evidence discloses that some hospitals with committees impose quotas on the number of therapeutic abortions which they perform while others place quotas on patients depending on their place of residence. The evidence at trial confirmed that these quotas, initially observed in the Badgley Report, at pp. 258 et seq., have been retained in many Canadian hospitals and that they often delay timely medical treatment for pregnant women seeking therapeutic abortions. It is true, of course, that these quotas are set by internal hospital policy and not by the terms of the law itself. It is also true that quotas may be necessary given hospitals' limited resources and the significant demands placed on those resources by pregnant women seeking abortions, some of whom may not qualify for therapeutic abortions in respect of the standard of s. 251(4). There is evidence, however, of quotas in absolute numbers of abortions performed and quotas based on the place of residence which can affect women who otherwise qualify for lawful abortions under s. 251(4)(c). Indeed the Badgley Committee reported in 1977, at p. 259, that:

que beaucoup d'entre eux, disons la moitié, ont bel et bien un comité, mais ils ne pratiquent pas d'avortements. C'est un comité sur papier.»

Un hôpital dont le comité est inactif n'est pas plus utile à une femme enceinte qui veut un avortement thérapeutique qu'un hôpital sans comité ou que pas d'hôpital du tout. Le délai imposé à une femme enceinte parce que le comité de l'hôpital local est inactif résulte peut-être plus de la politique interne de l'hôpital que de l'art. 251 du Code criminel, mais l'art. 251 est à tout le moins indirectement la cause du délai du fait qu'il requiert l'opinion du comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de cet hôpital avant qu'un avortement licite puisse y être pratiqué.

(2) Les délais dus au contingentement

Les délais ne résultent pas uniquement de l'absence ou de l'inactivité des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique. Il ressort de la preuve que certains hôpitaux ayant des comités contingentent le nombre d'avortements thérapeutiques, alors que d'autres contingentent les patientes en fonction de leur lieu de résidence. La preuve soumise en première instance confirme que ces contingents, signalés initialement par le rapport Badgley, aux pp. 287 et suiv., existent toujours dans de nombreux hôpitaux canadiens et qu'ils ont souvent pour effet d'empêcher les femmes enceintes qui demandent des avortements thérapeutiques de recevoir un traitement médical en temps opportun. Il est vrai, bien sûr, que ces contingents résultent de la politique interne de l'hôpital et non des termes de la loi elle-même. Il est vrai également que ces contingents peuvent être nécessaires, compte tenu des ressources limitées des hôpitaux et de la demande importante dont font l'objet ces ressources de la part des femmes enceintes qui veulent se faire avorter et dont certaines peuvent ne pas avoir les qualités requises pour obtenir un avortement thérapeutique selon le critère du par. 251(4). Toutefois, on a soumis en preuve l'existence de contingents fixés en nombre absolu d'avortements pratiqués et de contingents fondés sur le lieu de résidence qui peuvent toucher des femmes par ailleurs aptes à obtenir un avortement licite en vertu de l'al. 251(4)c). D'ailleurs, le comité Badgley déclarait ceci en 1977, à la p. 288 de son rapport:

Two out of five hospitals (38.2 per cent) considered only applications from women who were considered to reside with the hospital's usual service catchment area. Residential requirements and patient quotas were more often adopted in the Maritimes (43.8 per cent) and Quebec (66.7 per cent) than among hospitals elsewhere where about a third followed this practice. Where the proportion of the hospitals with committees having these residency or quota requirements was higher in a province or a region, there were proportionately more women who went to the United States to obtain induced abortions.

These quotas are inevitable given that s. 251 requires that therapeutic abortions be performed only in eligible hospitals and that there is a lack of hospitals with committees in some parts of the country. The quotas cannot, therefore, be said to reflect simple administrative or budgetary constraints. In this respect, the s. 251 procedure is again the source of delays in medical treatment.

(3) Delays Caused by the Committee Requirement

The committee requirement itself contributes to a delay in securing treatment. The law requires the therapeutic abortion committee to certify that the standard of s. 251(4) has been met before a therapeutic abortion can proceed lawfully. As I shall endeavour to explain in my consideration of s. 251 and the principles of fundamental justice, I believe that the state interest in the protection of the foetus justifies the requirement that the standard of s. 251(4) be ascertained by independent medical opinion. This being the case, some delay will always be incurred whatever system is put in place to ensure that the standard has been met. However, at this stage of my analysis, I seek only to establish that a delay has in fact been caused by the present requirements of the Criminal Code.

The time needed to convene the committee in the hospital, for the pregnant woman's file to come before the committee, for her application to be evaluated by whatever means the committee may choose and for the certificate to be issued to the Deux hôpitaux sur 5 (38.2 pour cent) n'étudiaient que les demandes des femmes résidant sur le territoire généralement desservi par l'hôpital. Des conditions de résidence et des quotas de patientes étaient plus fréquemment imposés dans les provinces maritimes (43.8 pour cent) et le Québec (66.7 pour cent) que dans les hôpitaux des autres provinces où seulement un tiers d'entre eux posait de telles conditions. Dans les provinces ou les régions où la proportion d'hôpitaux ayant un comité et ayant établi de telles conditions de résidence ou des quotas était plus élevée, il y avait proportionnellement plus de femmes qui allaient aux États-Unis pour obtenir un avortement provoqué.

Ces contingents sont inévitables si l'on tient compte du fait que l'art. 251 exige que les avortements thérapeutiques ne soient pratiqués que dans des hôpitaux admissibles et qu'il y a absence d'hôpitaux dotés de comités dans certaines régions du pays. On ne peut donc pas affirmer que les contingents sont simplement le reflet de contraintes administratives ou budgétaires. À cet égard, la procédure de l'art. 251 est ici encore à l'origine de délais dans les soins prodigués.

(3) Les délais dus à l'obligation de recourir à un comité

L'obligation d'avoir recours à un comité contribue elle-même à retarder le traitement. La loi oblige le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique à certifier que le critère du par. 251(4) est respecté pour que l'on puisse pratiquer licitement un avortement thérapeutique. Comme je tenterai de l'expliquer dans mon examen de l'art. 251 au regard des principes de justice fondamentale, je crois que l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus justifie l'exigence que le critère du par. 251(4) fasse l'objet d'une opinion médicale indépendante. Cela étant, il y aura toujours un certain délai quel que soit le système mis en place pour assurer que le critère est respecté. Toutefois, à ce stade de mon analyse, je ne cherche qu'à établir que les exigences actuelles du Code criminel sont effectivement à l'origine d'un délai.

Le temps qu'il faut pour réunir le comité de l'hôpital, pour que le dossier de la femme enceinte parvienne devant le comité, pour que sa demande soit évaluée quels que soient les moyens choisis par le comité, et pour que le certificat soit délivré au qualified medical practitioner together create some delay for obtaining treatment. The Badgley Report, at p. 146, identified an average interval of 8.0 weeks until the induced abortion operation was done after the pregnant woman's initial visit to her physician. Some of this delay is attributable to the absence of committees and hospital quotas which I have outlined above. It is difficult to isolate with precision the fraction of the delay attributable to the committee requirement taken by itself. It is relevant as one part of the overall delay which pregnant women must endure to obtain a therapeutic abortion.

In spite of evidence that the overall delay has been reduced, as will be seen shortly, the committee requirement continues to add to the delay. In 1987, the Powell Report, at p. 27, identified as one problem the number of committee members who must certify that the s. 251(4) standard has been met:

> The number of members on the TAC [therapeutic abortion committee] ranges from three to five although up to seven members sit on some committees. When five or seven members have been appointed and no quorum is stated, a majority of the committee (three to five) must be present and three must approve each abortion. This has caused problems in several of the hospitals contacted, where it was not possible for an adequate number of members to be present and the meeting had to be rescheduled. Thus precious time was lost and the abortion delayed to a more advanced gestational age.

Furthermore, the delays caused by the committee requirements necessarily impact upon the pregnant woman who seeks to become a patient of the hospital for which the committee has been appointed. Section 251(4) states in part that it is "the therapeutic abortion committee for that accredited or approved hospital" which must issue the certificate [emphasis added]. This precludes a committee from one hospital from authorizing abortions which take place at other hospitals. Eliminating such a requirement would have the effect of shortening the delays without forcing reluctant hospital boards or hospital staff to participate.

médecin qualifié est globalement à l'origine d'un certain délai dans l'obtention du traitement. Le rapport Badgley, à la p. 163, constate qu'il s'écoule un intervalle moyen de 8 semaines avant qu'on ne provoque l'avortement, après la première visite de la femme enceinte chez son médecin. Une partie de ce délai est attribuable à l'absence de comité et aux contingents hospitaliers que j'ai mentionnés précédemment. Il est difficile d'identifier avec précision la fraction du délai attribuable à l'obligation même de recourir à un comité. Sa pertinence tient au fait qu'il s'agit d'une partie du délai global auquel les femmes enceintes doivent se plier pour obtenir un avortement thérapeutique.

En dépit de la preuve que le délai global a été réduit, comme on le verra bientôt, l'obligation de s'adresser à un comité accroît toujours ce délai. En 1987, le rapport Powell a constaté que l'un des problèmes était le nombre de membres du comité qui doivent certifier que le critère du par. 251(4) est respecté (à la p. 27):

> [TRADUCTION] Le nombre de membres du CAT (comité de l'avortement thérapeutique) varie de trois à cinq, mais il arrive que certains comités comptent jusqu'à sept membres. Lorsque cinq ou sept membres ont été nommés sans qu'aucun quorum ne soit fixé, une majorité du comité (de trois à cinq) doit être présente et il en faut trois pour approuver chaque avortement. C'était là une source d'ennuis dans plusieurs des hôpitaux rejoints, lorsqu'il était impossible d'obtenir la présence d'un nombre adéquat de membres et qu'il fallait reporter la réunion. Ainsi un temps précieux était perdu et l'avortement reporté à un stade de grossesse plus avancé.

De plus, les délais dus à l'obligation de recourir à un comité ont, par la force des choses, un effet sur la femme enceinte qui veut être admise à l'hôpital pour lequel le comité a été nommé. Le paragraphe 251(4) précise notamment que c'est "le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de cet hôpital accrédité ou approuvé" qui doit délivrer le certificat [je souligne]. Cela empêche le comité d'un hôpital d'autoriser des avortements dans d'autres hôpitaux. L'élimination de cette exigence aurait pour effet de réduire les délais sans forcer les conseils d'hôpitaux ou le personnel de l'hôpital récalcitrants à participer.

2. Consequences of the Delays

The delays which a pregnant woman may have to suffer as a result of the requirements of s. 251(4) must undermine the security of her person in order that there be a violation of this element of s. 7 of the Charter. As I said earlier, s. 7 cannot be invoked simply because a woman's pregnancy amounts to a medically dangerous condition. If, however, the delays occasioned by s. 251(4) of the Criminal Code result in an additional danger to the pregnant woman's health, then the state has intervened and this intervention constitutes a violation of that woman's security of the person. By creating this additional risk, s. 251 prevents access to effective and timely medical treatment for the continued pregnancy which would or would be likely to endanger her life or health. If an effective and timely therapeutic abortion may only be obtained by committing a crime, then s. 251 violates the pregnant woman's right to security of the person.

The evidence reveals that the delays caused by s. 251(4) result in at least three broad types of additional medical risks. The risk of post-operative complications increases with delay. Secondly, there is a risk that the pregnant woman require a more dangerous means of procuring a miscarriage because of the delay. Finally, since a pregnant woman knows her life or health is in danger, the delay created by the s. 251(4) procedure may result in an additional psychological trauma. I shall explain each of the additional risks in turn.

The Chief Justice outlined the different techniques employed to perform abortions at different stages of pregnancy and the increasing risk attached to each method as gestational age advances. As he also noted, the evidence showed that within the periods appropriate to each method of abortion, the earlier the abortion was performed, the lower the risk of complication. Evidence introduced at trial confirms findings in the Badgley Report, at pp. 308 et seq., and the Powell Report, at p. 23, that the earlier an abortion is performed, the less chance a woman has of

Les délais auxquels une femme enceinte peut avoir à se plier par suite des exigences du par. 251(4) doivent porter atteinte à la sécurité de sa personne pour qu'il y ait violation de cet élément de l'art. 7 de la Charte. Comme je l'ai dit précédemment, l'art. 7 ne saurait être invoqué simplement parce que la grossesse d'une femme constitue un état dangereux du point de vue médical. Si toutefois les délais causés par le par. 251(4) du Code criminel entraînent un danger additionnel pour la santé de la femme enceinte, alors l'État intervient et cette intervention constitue une violation de la sécurité de la personne de cette femme. En créant ce risque additionnel, l'art. 251 empêche l'obtention en temps opportun, du traitement médical efficace d'une femme dont la continuation de la grossesse mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger sa vie ou sa santé. Si un avortement thérapeutique efficace ne peut être obtenu en temps opportun que par la perpétration d'un crime, l'art. 251 viole alors le droit de la femme enceinte à la sécurité de sa personne.

La preuve révèle que les délais causés par le par. 251(4) entraînent des risques médicaux additionnels d'au moins trois grandes catégories. Le risque de complications postopératoires croît avec le délai. Ensuite, il y a le risque qu'il faille recourir à une méthode d'avortement plus dangereuse à cause du délai. Enfin, comme la femme enceinte sait que sa vie ou sa santé est en danger, le délai engendré par la procédure du par. 251(4) est susceptible de causer un traumatisme psychologique additionnel. Je vais expliquer chacun de ces risques supplémentaires l'un après l'autre.

Le Juge en chef a exposé les différentes techniques employées pour pratiquer des avortements aux différents stades de la grossesse et a souligné le risque grandissant lié à chaque méthode, au fur et à mesure que la grossesse avance. Comme il l'a aussi noté, la preuve soumise démontrait que, à l'intérieur des périodes qui s'appliquent à chaque méthode d'avortement, plus l'avortement était pratiqué tôt, moins il y avait de risques de complications. Les éléments de preuve produits en première instance confirment les constatations du rapport Badgley, aux pp. 343 et suiv., et du rapport Powell, experiencing a post-operative complication, whatever abortion technique is used. The respondent agrees with this proposition but cites the low complication rate across Canada and the negligible mortality rate reported since 1974 as evidence that abortion under the current system is very safe. According to Therapeutic abortions, 1985, supra, at p. 20, no Canadian women have died as a result of therapeutic abortion since 1979. One such death took place in 1974 and another in 1979.

It should be noted, however, that reported complication rates for any given abortion technique are generally limited to certain post-operative physical complications and do not include data on psychological complications inherent to those techniques. Furthermore, the psychological trauma that women suffer before the operation is not reflected in reported figures. This is equally true for any physical complications associated with the pregnant woman's initially dangerous condition which may arise during the delay before the therapeutic abortion.

However low the post-operative complication rate may appear, it increases as gestational age advances. In other words, with each passing week of pregnancy, even in the very early stages, the risk to health that an abortion represents increases. Therapeutic abortions, 1982 confirms this. The complication rate for abortions performed under nine weeks was 0.7 per cent. This increased to 1.0 per cent in the 9 to 12 week gestation period. A complication rate of 8.5 per cent was reported for the 13 to 16 week gestation period. The complication rate for the 17 to 20 week gestation period was higher still, reported as 22 per cent (Therapeutic abortions, 1982 (1984), at p. 111). Ontario statistics cited in the Powell Report confirm these national figures for that province. Data from 1976, 1981 and 1984 confirm the relation between abortion complications and gestational age in Ontario. In terms of absolute numbers, there were twice as many reported complications for women with gestational age 13 weeks and above compared to gestational age under 13 weeks. The rate expressed à la p. 23, que plus l'avortement est pratiqué tôt, moins il y a de chances qu'une femme éprouve des complications postopératoires, quelle que soit la technique utilisée. L'intimée reconnaît cela, mais cite le faible taux de complications qui existe partout au Canada, et le taux négligeable de mortalité rapporté depuis 1974 comme preuve que l'avortement selon le système actuel est très sûr. D'après Avortements thérapeutiques, 1985, précité, à la p. 20, aucune Canadienne n'est morte des suites d'un avortement thérapeutique depuis 1979. Un tel décès a eu lieu en 1974 et un autre en 1979.

Il faut rappeler cependant que les taux de complications rapportés pour toute technique d'avortement donnée sont généralement limités à certaines complications postopératoires somatiques et ne comprennent pas les données sur les complications psychologiques inhérentes à ces techniques. De plus, les chiffres rapportés ne reflètent pas le traumatisme psychologique éprouvé par les femmes avant l'intervention. Il en va également de même pour toute complication somatique liée à la condition initialement dangereuse de la femme enceinte qui peut survenir au cours du délai précédant l'avortement thérapeutique.

Si faible que puisse paraître le taux de complications postopératoires, il croît au fur et à mesure que la grossesse avance. En d'autres termes, avec chaque semaine de grossesse qui passe, même dans les tout premiers stades, le danger qu'un avortement représente pour la santé croît. Avortements thérapeutiques, 1982 le confirment. Le taux de complications pour les avortements pratiqués avant neuf semaines était de 0,7 pour 100. Il augmentait à 1 pour 100 pour la période comprise entre 9 et 12 semaines de grossesse. Un taux de complications de 8,5 pour 100 était rapporté pour celle comprise entre 13 et 16 semaines de grossesse. Le taux de complications pour la période comprise entre 17 et 20 semaines de grossesse était encore plus élevé, soit 22 pour 100 (Avortements thérapeutiques, 1982 (1984), à la p. 111). Les statistiques ontariennes publiées dans le rapport Powell confirment que des chiffres analogues s'appliquent à cette province. Les données pour 1976, 1981 et 1984 confirment pour l'Ontario le rapport qui existe entre les complications dues aux avorteas a percentage of total reported therapeutic abortions performed ("per 100 gestational age specific abortions") was ten times higher for the group of women with gestational age 13 weeks and above (see Powell Report, at p. 23 and Table 4).

The procedure set forth in s. 251(4) of the Criminal Code often causes, as we have seen, significant delays in obtaining therapeutic abortions. Delay increases the risk of post-operative complications. Section 251(4) thereby violates a pregnant woman's security of the person.

As I have already observed, the evidence indicates that the different techniques employed to perform abortions in Canada at different stages of pregnancy progressively increase risks to the woman. Expert testimony established that the suction dilation and curettage method generally used in the first twelve weeks is the safest technique. The dilation and evacuation method used from the thirteenth to the sixteenth week is relatively more dangerous. From the sixteenth week of pregnancy, an even more dangerous instillation method may be used. This method involves the introduction of prostaglandin, urea or saline solution which causes the woman to go into labour, giving birth to a foetus which is usually dead but not invariably so. Although the number of abortions done by the instillation technique amounts to only 4.5 per cent of the total number of therapeutic abortions performed in Canada, saline, urea or prostaglandin instillation is nevertheless used for 85.6 per cent of therapeutic abortions for women at least 16 weeks pregnant (Therapeutic abortions, 1985, supra, at pp. 18-19). It has been shown that the complication rate increases dramatically with the use of the instillation procedure (ibid., at p. 50). In addition, psychological trauma resulting from induced labour and the birth of the foetus is a very real consideration which is not included in post-ments et le stade de la grossesse. En nombres absolus, deux fois plus de complications sont rapportées dans le cas des femmes enceintes depuis 13 semaines et plus, comparativement aux femmes enceintes depuis moins de 13 semaines. Le taux, exprimé en pourcentage du nombre total d'avortements thérapeutiques pratiqués qui ont été rapportés ([TRADUCTION] «pour 100 avortements pratiqués à ce stade de la grossesse»), était dix fois supérieur dans le cas du groupe de femmes enceintes depuis treize semaines et plus (voir le rapport Powell, à la p. 23 et au tableau 4).

La procédure énoncée au par. 251(4) du Code criminel engendre souvent, comme nous l'avons vu, des délais importants dans l'obtention des avortements thérapeutiques. Les délais accroissent le risque de complications postopératoires. Le paragraphe 251(4) viole donc la sécurité de la personne d'une femme enceinte.

Comme je l'ai déjà fait observer, il ressort de la preuve que les différentes techniques employées pour pratiquer des avortements au Canada, à différents stades de la grossesse, accroissent progressivement les dangers pour la femme. Le témoignage des experts établit que la méthode de l'aspiration et de la dilatation, suivies d'un curetage, utilisée dans les douze premières semaines est la technique la plus sûre. La méthode de la dilatation cervicale et de l'évacuation utérine utilisée entre la treizième et la seizième semaines est relativement plus dangereuse. À partir de la seizième semaine de grossesse, on peut avoir recours à la méthode médicamenteuse qui est encore plus dangereuse. Cette méthode comporte l'introduction de prostaglandine, d'urée ou d'une solution saline qui provoque les contractions chez la femme, qui accouche alors d'un fœtus habituellement mort-né, encore que ce ne soit pas toujours le cas. Bien que le nombre d'avortements provoqués par la méthode médicamenteuse ne soit que de 4,5 pour 100 du nombre total d'avortements thérapeutiques pratiqués au Canada, la technique de l'introduction de la solution saline, d'urée ou de prostaglandine est néanmoins employée dans 85,6 pour 100 des avortements thérapeutiques des femmes enceintes depuis au moins 16 semaines (Avortements thérapeutiques, 1985, précité, aux pp. 18 et 19). Il a été operative statistics. It is in the pregnant woman's utmost interest that the delay for obtaining a therapeutic abortion be as short as possible so that the risks associated with more dangerous abortion techniques can be avoided.

Women are aware of the increased risk associated with the later stage abortion techniques. They are also aware of the more traumatic circumstances in which these techniques, particularly the instillation methods, are carried out. It is thus not only the risk of post-operative complications that increases progressively with each method. Women are aware of the increased risk well before the operation is performed. Experts testified at trial that awareness of the increased post-operative risk and of the added trauma associated with the later-stage methods create an increased psychological risk to health distinct from the increased physical risk. There is a world of difference, from the psychological point of view of the patient, between a reputedly safe technique of abortion performed under local anaesthetic requiring only a few hours in a hospital and an abortion procedure with a substantially higher complication rate performed under general anaesthetic requiring a longer period of hospitalization, and involving the trauma of induced labour and the delivery of a dead foetus. When the delays caused by s. 251(4) require a woman to undergo a saline procedure abortion, for example, the psychological trauma associated with that procedure amounts to an additional risk to health attributable to the Criminal Code. More generally, the delay that a pregnant woman must endure before she receives treatment of any kind results in psychological trauma. To force a woman, under threat of criminal sanction, to wait for medical treatment when she knows that her pregnancy represents a danger to her life or health is a violation of her right to security of the person. As was stated in Collin v. Lussier, [1983] 1 F.C. 218, at p. 239 (later reversed on appeal, démontré que le taux de complications croît dramatiquement avec le recours à la méthode médicamenteuse (ibid., à la p. 50). En outre, le traumatisme psychologique résultant de la provocation des contractions et de l'accouchement d'un fœtus est un facteur fort réel que n'incluent pas les statistiques portant sur les complications postopératoires. Il est dans le plus grand intérêt de la femme enceinte que le délai d'obtention d'un avortement thérapeutique soit aussi court que possible, de façon que les risques liés aux techniques d'avortement les plus dangereuses puissent être évités.

Les femmes savent que des risques accrus sont liés aux techniques d'avortement du dernier stade. Elles savent aussi que ces techniques, particulièrement la méthode médicamenteuse, sont employées dans des circonstances plus traumatisantes. Ce n'est donc pas uniquement le risque de complications postopératoires qui croît progressivement avec chaque méthode. Les femmes savent qu'il y a croissance des risques bien avant que l'intervention ne soit pratiquée. Des experts ont témoigné lors du procès que la conscience de cette croissance des risques postopératoires et du traumatisme additionnel lié aux méthodes du dernier stade crée un plus grand danger psychologique pour la santé, distinct du risque somatique accru. Il y a un monde, du point de vue psychologique de la patiente, entre une technique d'avortement sous anesthésie locale, réputée sans danger et ne requérant qu'un séjour de quelques heures à l'hôpital, et une méthode d'avortement sous anesthésie générale qui comporte un taux de complications sensiblement plus élevé et qui requiert l'hospitalisation et comporte le traumatisme découlant de la provocation des contractions et de l'accouchement d'un fœtus mort-né. Lorsque les délais engendrés par le par. 251(4) exigent qu'une femme se fasse avorter selon la méthode de la solution saline, par exemple, le traumatisme psychologique lié à cette méthode équivaut à un danger additionnel pour la santé, attribuable au Code criminel. De manière plus générale, le délai auquel une femme enceinte doit se plier avant de recevoir un traitement quelconque provoque un traumatisme psychologique. Forcer une femme, sous menace de répression pénale, à attendre de subir un traitement médical alors qu'elle sait que sa grossesse représente un danger [1985] 1 F.C. 124, but cited with approval on this point by Wilson J. in Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, supra, at p. 208):

> . . . such detention, by increasing the applicant's anxiety as to his state of health, is likely to make his illness worse and, by depriving him of access to adequate medical care, it is in fact an impairment of the security of his person.

The psychological trauma that a pregnant woman suffers as a result of the delay shows that the procedure established by the Criminal Code violates the security of her person.

I have observed three instances in which s. 251 of the Criminal Code results in delays for women who qualify for therapeutic abortions in respect of the standard of s. 251(4)(c). This being said, the overall delay appears to have been reduced from the 8.0 weeks observed by the Badgley Committee in 1977. Evidence indicates that where a hospital with a committee is in place in a region, as in the case of Toronto, pregnant women can obtain therapeutic abortions within one to three weeks from their initial contact with a physician. Experts testified at trial that these delays are longer in some parts of the country, particularly in Quebec, but that overall delays have, on balance, been reduced. Furthermore, therapeutic abortion committees generally can speed up the certification process in an emergency situation, particularly when the pregnant woman's gestational age requires immediate medical attention. In spite of the reduction, however, these delays continue to result in an additional risk to the health of these women. The risk of post-operative complications increases with each passing week of delay. There is a heightened physical and psychological risk associated with later stage pregnancy techniques for abortion. Finally, psychological trauma increases with delay. The delays mean therefore that the state has intervened in such a manner as to create an additional risk to health, and conse-

pour sa vie ou sa santé, est une violation de son droit à la sécurité de sa personne. Comme il a été dit dans la décision Collin c. Lussier, [1983] 1 C.F. 218, à la p. 239 (ultérieurement infirmée en appel, [1985] 1 C.F. 124, mais citée et approuvée sur ce point par le juge Wilson dans l'arrêt Singh c. Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration, précité, à la p. 208):

> . . . cette détention, en augmentant l'anxiété du requérant due à son état de santé, risque d'aggraver sa maladie et en le privant d'accès à des soins médicaux adéquats, elle porte atteinte effectivement à la sécurité de sa personne.

Le traumatisme psychologique que le délai provoque chez une femme enceinte démontre que la procédure établie par le Code criminel viole la sécurité de sa personne.

J'ai remarqué trois cas où l'art. 251 du Code criminel entraîne des délais pour les femmes aptes à subir un avortement thérapeutique selon la norme de l'al. 251(4)c). Cela étant dit, le délai global de 8 semaines constaté par le comité Badgley en 1977 a vraisemblablement diminué. La preuve indique que lorsqu'il existe un hôpital doté d'un comité dans une région, comme celle de Toronto, les femmes enceintes peuvent obtenir des avortements thérapeutiques dans un délai d'une à trois semaines après leur première consultation d'un médecin. Des experts ont témoigné en première instance que ces délais sont plus longs dans certaines régions du pays, particulièrement au Québec, mais que, somme toute, les délais globaux ont été réduits. En outre, les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique peuvent, en général, accélérer la procédure de certification dans un cas d'urgence, particulièrement lorsque, en raison du stade où elle est rendue dans sa grossesse, une femme requiert une attention médicale immédiate. Malgré cette réduction, ces délais continuent toutefois d'engendrer un risque additionnel pour la santé de ces femmes. Le risque de complications postopératoires croît avec chaque semaine qui s'écoule. Un risque somatique et psychologique accru est lié aux techniques d'avortement utilisées au dernier stade de la grossesse. Enfin, le délai provoque un accroissement du traumatisme psychologique. Ces délais signifient donc que l'État est intervenu de manière à créer un risque addiquently this intervention constitutes a violation of the woman's security of the person.

IV — The Principles of Fundamental Justice

I turn now to a consideration of the manner in which pregnant women are deprived of their right to security of the person by s. 251. Section 7 of the Charter states that everyone has the right not to be deprived of security of the person except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. As I will endeavour to demonstrate, s. 251(4) does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice.

I am of the view, however, that certain elements of the procedure for obtaining a therapeutic abortion which counsel for the appellants argued could not be saved by the second part of s. 7 are in fact in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The expression of the standard in s. 251(4)(c), and the requirement for some independent medical opinion to ascertain that the standard has been met as well as the consequential necessity of some period of delay to ascertain the standard are not in breach of s. 7 of the Charter.

Counsel for the appellants argued that the expression of the standard in s. 251(4)(c) is so imprecise that it offends the principles of fundamental justice. He submits that pregnant women are arbitrarily deprived of their s. 7 right by reason of the different meanings that can be given to the word "health" in s. 251(4)(c) by therapeutic abortion committees.

I agree with McIntyre J. and the Ontario Court of Appeal that the expression "the continuation of the pregnancy of such female person would or would be likely to endanger her life or health" found in s. 251(4)(c) does provide, as a matter of law, a sufficiently precise standard by which therapeutic abortion committees can determine when therapeutic abortions should be granted.

As the Court of Appeal said, supra, at p. 388:

tionnel pour la santé et, par conséquent, cette intervention constitue une violation de la sécurité de la personne de la femme.

IV – Les principes de justice fondamentale

J'en viens maintenant à l'examen de la manière dont l'art. 251 porte atteinte au droit des femmes enceintes à la sécurité de leur personne. L'article 7 de la Charte prévoit qu'il ne peut être porté atteinte au droit de chacun à la sécurité de sa personne qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale. Comme je vais tenter de le démontrer, le par. 251(4) n'est pas conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

Cependant, je suis d'avis que certains éléments de la procédure d'obtention d'un avortement thérapeutique qui, selon l'avocat des appelants, ne peuvent être sauvegardés par la seconde partie de l'art. 7, sont en fait conformes aux principes de justice fondamentale. La formulation du critère à l'al. 251(4)c) et l'obligation d'obtenir une opinion médicale indépendante pour s'assurer qu'il est respecté ainsi que la nécessité, qui en découle, de disposer d'un certain délai pour le faire ne violent pas l'art. 7 de la Charte.

L'avocat des appelants a soutenu que la formulation du critère à l'al. 251(4)c) est tellement imprécise qu'il y a atteinte aux principes de justice fondamentale. Il fait valoir qu'il y a atteinte arbitraire au droit que l'art. 7 confère aux femmes enceintes, en raison des sens différents que les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique peuvent donner au terme «santé» qui figure à l'al. 251(4)c).

Je suis d'accord avec le juge McIntyre et avec la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario pour dire que l'expression «la continuation de la grossesse de cette personne du sexe féminin femme mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de cette dernière» que l'on trouve à l'al. 251(4)c) fournit, sur le plan du droit, un critère suffisamment précis pour permettre aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique de décider quand il faut autoriser des avortements thérapeutiques.

Comme la Cour d'appel l'a dit, précité, à la p. 388:

In this case ... from a reading of s. 251 with its exceptions, there is no difficulty in determining what is proscribed and what is permitted. It cannot be said that no sensible meaning can be given to the words of the section. Thus, it is for the courts to say what meaning the statute will bear.

Laskin C.J. held in Morgentaler (1975), at p. 634, that s. 251(4)(c) was not so vague so as to constitute a violation of "security of the person" without due process of law under s. 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights:

It is enough to say that Parliament has fixed a manageable standard because it is addressed to a professional panel, the members of which would be expected to bring a practised judgment to the question whether "the continuation of the pregnancy ... would or would be likely to endanger ... life or health." Moreover, I am of the view that Parliament would assign such an exercise of judgment to a professional group without colliding with any imperatives called for by due process of law under s. 1 (a).

I agree with Laskin C.J. that the standard is manageable because it is addressed to a panel of doctors exercising medical judgment on a medical question. This being the case, the standard must necessarily be flexible. Flexibility and vagueness are not synonymous. Parliament has set a medical standard to be determined over a limited range of circumstances. With the greatest of respect, I cannot agree with the view that the therapeutic abortion committee is a "strange hybrid, part medical committee and part legal committee" as the Chief Justice characterizes it (at p. 69). In section 251(4) Parliament has only given the committee the authority to make a medical determination regarding the pregnant woman's life or health. The committee is not called upon to evaluate the sufficiency of the state interest in the foetus as against the woman's health. This evaluation of the state interest is a question of law already decided by Parliament in its formulation of s. 251(4). Evidence has been submitted that many committees fail to apply the standard set by Parliament by requiring the consent of the pregnant woman's spouse, by refusing to authorize second abortions or by refusing all abortions to married women. In [TRADUCTION] Dans cette affaire [...] après lecture de l'art. 251 et de ses exceptions, il n'y a aucune difficulté à déterminer ce qui est interdit et ce qui est permis. On ne peut pas dire qu'aucun sens raisonnable ne peut être donné aux termes de cet article. Donc, il revient aux tribunaux de dire quel sens il faut donner à la loi.

Le juge en chef Laskin a conclu, dans l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975), à la p. 634, que l'al. 251(4)c) n'est pas vague au point de constituer une violation de la «sécurité de la personne» sans que ce ne soit par l'application régulière de la loi comme le prévoit l'al. 1*a*) de la Déclaration canadienne des droits:

Qu'il suffise de dire que le Parlement a fixé un critère maniable parce qu'il s'adresse à un comité composé d'hommes de l'art, dont on peut s'attendre que les membres portent un jugement exercé sur la question de savoir si «la continuation de la grossesse ... mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé ...» De plus, je suis d'avis que le Parlement peut confier à un groupe d'hommes de l'art l'exercice d'un tel jugement sans heurter d'impératif issu de l'exigence d'application régulière de la loi sous le régime de l'al. a) de l'art. 1.

Je conviens avec le juge en chef Laskin que le critère est maniable parce qu'il s'adresse à un comité de médecins qui portent un jugement médical sur une question médicale. Cela étant le cas, le critère doit nécessairement être souple. Souplesse n'est pas synonyme d'imprécision. Le législateur a établi un critère médical déterminable en fonction d'un nombre limité de circonstances. En toute déférence pour l'opinion contraire, je ne saurais admettre que le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique soit un «hybride étrange, en partie comité médical et en partie comité légal» comme le Juge en chef le qualifie (à la p. 69). Au paragraphe 251(4), le législateur n'a conféré au comité que le pouvoir de prendre une décision médicale concernant la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte. On ne demande pas au comité d'évaluer si l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus par rapport à la santé de la femme est suffisant. L'évaluation de l'intérêt de l'État est une question de droit que le législateur a déjà tranchée quand il a formulé le par. 251(4). On a soumis en preuve que de nombreux comités n'appliquent pas le critère fixé par le législateur en exigeant le consentement du conjoint de la femme enceinte, en refusant d'autoriser so far as these and other requirements fall outside s. 251(4)(c), they constitute an unfounded interpretation of the plain terms of the Criminal Code. These patent excesses of authority do not, however, mean that the standard of s. 251 is vague.

The wording of s. 251(4)(c) limits the authority of the committee. The word "health" is not vague but plainly refers to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman. I note with interest the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), in which a District of Columbia statute outlawing abortions except when they were "necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health" was at issue. It was argued that the word "health" was so imprecise and had so uncertain a meaning that the statute offended the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution. Mindful of the differences between the Due Process Clause and the principles of fundamental justice in s. 7 of the Charter, I nevertheless believe the following extract, at p. 72, of the majority opinion delivered by Black J. to be instructive:

> ... the general usage and modern understanding of the word "health" ... includes psychological as well as physical well-being. Indeed Webster's Dictionary, in accord with that common usage, properly defines health as the "[s]tate of being ... sound in body [or] mind." Viewed in this light, the term "health" presents no problem of vagueness. Indeed, whether a particular operation is necessary for a patient's physical or mental health is a judgment that physicians are obviously called upon to make routinely whenever surgery is considered.

The standard is further circumscribed by the word "endanger". Not only must the continuation of the pregnancy affect the woman's life or health, it must endanger life or health, so that a committee that authorizes an abortion when this element is not present or fails to authorize it when it is present exceeds its authority. Finally, the expression "would or would be likely" eliminates any requirement that the danger to life or health be un second avortement ou en refusant tout avortement aux femmes mariées. Dans la mesure où de telles exigences ne relèvent pas de l'al. 251(4)c), elles constituent une interprétation injustifiée des termes clairs du Code criminel. Ces abus manifestes de pouvoir ne signifient pas toutefois que le critère de l'art. 251 est vague.

Le texte de l'al. 251(4)c) limite le pouvoir du comité. Le terme «santé», loin d'être vague, vise clairement la santé mentale ou physique de la femme enceinte. Je note avec intérêt l'arrêt de la Cour suprême des États-Unis dans l'affaire United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), où une loi du district de Columbia, interdisant les avortements sauf lorsqu'ils sont [TRADUCTION] «nécessaires à la préservation de la vie ou de la santé de la mère» était en cause. On soutenait que le terme «santé» était tellement imprécis et avait un sens tellement incertain que la loi violait la clause de l'application régulière de la loi de la Constitution américaine. Tout en ayant à l'esprit les différences qui existent entre la clause de l'application régulière de la loi et les principes de justice fondamentale de l'art. 7 de la Charte, je crois néanmoins que l'extrait suivant de l'opinion de la majorité, dont l'auteur est le juge Black, est instructif (à la p. 72):

> [TRADUCTION] ... le sens moderne et courant du terme «santé» [. . .] inclut le bien-être psychologique autant que physique. D'ailleurs le dictionnaire Webster, en accord avec l'usage courant définit à juste titre la santé comme l'«[é]tat de bien-être physique [ou] mental.» Vu sous cet angle, le terme «santé» ne présente aucun problème d'imprécision. En fait, la question de savoir si une intervention particulière est nécessaire pour préserver la santé physique ou mentale d'un patient est une décision que les médecins ont, de toute évidence, à prendre tous les jours, chaque fois qu'une intervention chirurgicale est envisagée.

Le critère est en outre circonscrit par les termes «mettre en danger». Non seulement la continuation de la grossesse doit-elle nuire à la vie ou à la santé de la femme, elle doit encore mettre en danger sa vie ou sa santé, de sorte qu'un comité qui autorise un avortement en l'absence de cet élément ou qui refuse de l'autoriser alors qu'il est présent, abuse de son pouvoir. Enfin, l'expression «mettrait ou mettrait probablement» élimine toute condition certain or immediate at the time the certificate is issued.

The presence of the exculpatory provision in the Criminal Code and the wording of the standard itself point to the parameters of s. 251(4). The required standard of threat to life or health must necessarily be lesser than that required under the common law defence of necessity, otherwise s. 251(4) would be superfluous. It is proper to infer, on the other hand, that s. 251(4) must be interpreted as relating solely to therapeutic grounds since only qualified medical practitioners are entitled to evaluate the threat to life or health.

Not only is the standard expressed in s. 251(4)(c) sufficiently precise to permit therapeutic abortion committees to determine when therapeutic abortions should be granted, but the crime of procuring a miscarriage is expressed with sufficient clarity for those subject to its terms so as not to offend the principles of fundamental justice. In this respect, counsel for the respondent correctly observed in his written argument that " . . . s. 251 presents no degree of uncertainty or vagueness as to potential criminal liability: anyone charged with an offence would know whether prohibited conduct was being undertaken and whether an exemption certificate had been received. Equally, any official entrusted with enforcing this section would know whether an offence had been committed." Police officers are not called upon by the section to define "health" but, in respect of the medical justification for a therapeutic abortion, they must ensure that a certificate in writing has been duly issued.

Just as the expression of the standard in s. 251(4)(c) does not offend the principles of fundamental justice, the requirement that an independent medical opinion be obtained for a therapeutic abortion to be lawful also cannot be said to constitute a violation of these principles when considered in the context of pregnant women's right to security of the person.

In R. v. Jones, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 284, at p. 304, La Forest J. explained that the legislator must be que le danger pour la vie ou la santé soit certain ou immédiat au moment où le certificat est délivré.

La présence de la disposition disculpatoire dans le Code criminel et la formulation du critère lui-même fixent les paramètres du par. 251(4). Le critère requis de menace à la vie ou à la santé doit obligatoirement être moindre que celui qu'exige le moyen de défense de common law de la nécessité, car autrement le par. 251(4) serait superflu. Par contre, on peut à bon droit conclure que le par. 251(4) doit être interprété comme portant seulement sur des motifs thérapeutiques puisque seuls des médecins qualifiés ont le droit d'évaluer la menace à la vie ou à la santé.

Non seulement le critère exprimé à l'al. 251(4)c) est-il suffisamment précis pour permettre au comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de décider quand il convient d'autoriser les avortements thérapeutiques, mais encore le crime consistant à procurer un avortement est exprimé avec suffisamment de clarté pour ceux qui sont assujettis à ces termes pour qu'il ne porte pas atteinte aux principes de justice fondamentale. À cet égard, l'avocat de l'intimée fait observer à juste titre dans son argumentation écrite que [TRADUCTION] «. . . l'art. 251 ne présente aucun degré d'incertitude ou d'imprécision quant à une éventuelle responsabilité criminelle: tout inculpé saurait s'il y avait conduite interdite et si un certificat d'exemption avait été reçu. Également, tout officier chargé de faire respecter cet article saurait si une infraction a été perpétrée.» L'article n'oblige pas les agents de police à définir ce qu'est «la santé» mais, au chapitre de la justification médicale d'un avortement thérapeutique, ils doivent s'assurer qu'un certificat écrit a dûment été délivré.

Tout comme le critère exprimé à l'al. 251(4)c) ne porte pas atteinte aux principes de justice fondamentale, on ne peut non plus dire que l'obligation d'obtenir une opinion médicale indépendante pour qu'un avortement thérapeutique soit licite constitue une violation de ces principes sous l'angle du droit des femmes enceintes à la sécurité de leur personne.

Dans l'arrêt R. c. Jones, [1986] 2 R.C.S. 284, à la p. 304, le juge La Forest explique que le législa-accorded a certain latitude to make choices regarding the type of administrative structure that will suit its needs unless the use of such structure is in itself "so manifestly unfair, having regard to the decisions it is called upon to make [emphasis added], as to violate the principles of fundamental justice". An administrative structure made up of unnecessary rules, which result in an additional risk to the health of pregnant women, is manifestly unfair and does not conform to the principles of fundamental justice. Section 251(4), taken as a whole, does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice in that certain of the procedural requirements of s. 251 create unnecessary delays. As will be seen, some of these requirements are manifestly unfair because they have no connection whatsoever with Parliament's objectives in establishing the administrative structure in s. 251(4). Although connected to Parliament's objectives, other rules in s. 251(4) are manifestly unfair because they are not necessary to assure that the objectives are met.

teur doit jouir d'une certaine latitude pour choisir le genre de structure administrative qui répondra à ses besoins, à moins que le recours à une telle structure ne soit en lui-même «nettement injuste, compte tenu des décisions qu'elle [le législateur] est appelée à prendre [je souligne], au point de violer les principes de justice fondamentale». Une structure administrative comportant des règles inutiles, qui ont pour effet d'accroître le danger pour la santé des femmes enceintes, est nettement injuste et non conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale. Le paragraphe 251(4), pris dans son ensemble, n'est pas compatible avec les principes de justice fondamentale en raison des délais inutiles qu'engendrent certaines exigences en matière de procédure de l'art. 251. Comme nous le verrons, certaines de ces exigences sont manifestement injustes du fait qu'elles n'ont absolument aucun rapport avec les objectifs poursuivis par le législateur en établissant la structure administrative que l'on trouve au par. 251(4). Quoique liées aux objectifs du législateur, d'autres règles du par. 251(4) sont nettement injustes du fait qu'elles ne sont pas nécessaires pour assurer la réalisation des objectifs poursuivis.

As I noted in my analysis of s. 251(4), by requiring that a committee state that the medical standard has been met for the criminal sanction to be lifted, Parliament seeks to assure that there is a reliable, independent and medically sound opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the woman's life or health. Whatever the failings of the current system, I believe that the purpose pursuant to which it was adopted does not offend the principles of fundamental justice. As I shall endeavour to explain, the current mechanism in the Criminal Code does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice. This does not preclude, in my view, Parliament from adopting another system, free of the failings of s. 251(4), in order to ascertain that the life or health of the pregnant woman is in danger, by way of a reliable, independent and medically sound opinion.

Comme je le souligne dans mon analyse du par. 251(4), en obligeant un comité à déclarer que le critère médical est rempli pour que la sanction criminelle soit levée, le législateur veut assurer qu'il y ait une opinion médicale éclairée, fiable et indépendante que la continuation de la grossesse mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de la femme. Quelles que soient les faiblesses du système actuel, je crois que l'objectif visé par son adoption ne porte pas atteinte aux principes de justice fondamentale. Comme je vais tenter de l'expliquer, le mécanisme actuel du Code criminel n'est pas compatible avec les principes de justice fondamentale. Cela n'empêche pas, à mon avis, le législateur d'adopter un autre système, exempt des faiblesses du par. 251(4), pour vérifier si la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte est en danger, au moyen d'une opinion médicale éclairée, fiable et indépendante.

Parliament is justified in requiring a reliable, independent and medically sound opinion in order to protect the state interest in the foetus. This is undoubtedly the objective of a rule which requires an independent verification of the practising physician's opinion that the life or health of the pregnant woman is in danger. It cannot be said to be simply a mechanism designed to protect the health of the pregnant woman. While this latter objective clearly explains the requirement that the practising physician be a "qualified medical practitioner" and that the abortion take place in a safe place, it cannot explain the necessary intercession of an in-hospital committee of three physicians from which is excluded the practising physician.

Le législateur est justifié d'exiger une opinion médicale éclairée, fiable et indépendante, afin de préserver l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du

While a second medical opinion is very often seen as necessary in medical circles when difficult questions as to a patient's life or health are at issue, the independent opinion called for by the Criminal Code has a different purpose. Parliament requires this independent opinion because it is not only the woman's interest that is at stake in a decision to authorize an abortion. The Ontario Court of Appeal alluded to this at p. 378 when it stated that "One cannot overlook the fact that the situation respecting a woman's right to control her own person becomes more complex when she becomes pregnant, and that some statutory control may be appropriate". The presence of the foetus accounts for this complexity. By requiring an independent medical opinion that the pregnant woman's life or health is in fact endangered, Parliament seeks to ensure that, in any given case, only therapeutic reasons will justify the decision to abort. The amendments to the Criminal Code in 1969 amounted to a recognition by Parliament, as I have said, that the interest in the life or health of the pregnant woman takes precedence over the interest of the state in the protection of the foetus when the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the pregnant woman's life or health. Parliament decided that it was necessary to ascertain this from a medical point of view before the law would allow the interest of the pregnant woman to indeed take precedence over that of the foetus and permit an abortion to be performed without criminal sanction.

fœtus. C'est forcément l'objet de la règle qui exige une vérification indépendante de l'opinion du médecin traitant que la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte est en danger. On ne saurait dire qu'il s'agit simplement d'un mécanisme conçu pour protéger la santé de la femme enceinte. Bien que ce dernier objectif explique manifestement l'obligation pour le médecin traitant d'être un «médecin qualifié» et celle que l'avortement ait lieu dans un endroit sûr, il ne peut expliquer la nécessité de l'intervention d'un comité interne de l'hôpital, composé de trois médecins, dont est exclu le médecin traitant.

Certes, une seconde opinion médicale est souvent considérée comme nécessaire dans les milieux médicaux lorsque de difficiles questions de vie ou de santé du patient sont en cause, mais l'opinion indépendante qu'exige le Code criminel vise un objet différent. Le législateur exige cette opinion indépendante parce que ce n'est pas seulement l'intérêt de la femme qui est en jeu dans la décision d'autoriser un avortement. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario fait allusion à cela à p. 378, lorsqu'elle dit que [TRADUCTION] «[o]n ne saurait oublier que la situation du droit de la femme à être maîtresse de sa propre personne se complique lorsqu'elle devient enceinte et qu'un certain contrôle de la loi peut se révéler approprié». La présence du fœtus est responsable de cette complexité. En exigeant une opinion médicale indépendante portant que la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte est réellement en danger, le législateur veut s'assurer que, dans un cas donné, seules des raisons thérapeutiques justifieront la décision d'avorter. Comme je l'ai dit, les modifications apportées au Code criminel en 1969 équivalent à la reconnaissance par le législateur que l'intérêt que présente la vie ou la santé des femmes enceintes l'emporte sur l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus, lorsque la continuation de la grossesse mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte. Le législateur a décidé qu'il était nécessaire de vérifier cela du point de vue médical, avant que la loi ne laisse l'intérêt de la femme enceinte l'emporter effectivement sur celui du fœtus et qu'elle ne permette qu'un avortement soit pratiqué sans qu'il y ait de sanction criminelle.

I do not believe it to be unreasonable to seek independent medical confirmation of the threat to the woman's life or health when such an important and distinct interest hangs in the balance. I note with interest that in a number of foreign jurisdictions, laws which decriminalize abortions require an opinion as to the state of health of the woman independent from the opinion of her own physician. The Crown, in its book of authorities, cited the following statutes which included such a mechanism: United Kingdom, Abortion Act, 1967, 1967, c. 87, s. 1(1)(a); Australian Northern Territory, Criminal Law Consolidation Act and Ordinance, s. 79 A(3)(a); South Australia, Criminal Law Consolidation Act, 1935-1975, s. 82a(1)(a); Federal Republic of Germany, Criminal Code, as amended by the Fifteenth Criminal Law Amendment Act (1976), s. 219; Israel, Penal Law, 5737-1977 (as amended), s. 315; New Zealand, Crimes Act 1961, as amended by the Crimes Amendment Act 1977 and the Crimes Amendment Act 1978, s. 187A(4); Code pénal suisse, art. 120(1). This said, the practising physician must, according to s. 251(4)(a), be in "good faith" and, consequently, have no reason to believe that the standard in s. 251(4)(c) has not been met. The practising physician is, however, properly excluded from the body giving the independent opinion. I believe that Parliament is justified in requiring what is no doubt an extraordinary medical practice in its regulation of the criminal law of abortion in accordance with the various interests at stake.

The assertion that an independent medical opinion, distinct from that of the pregnant woman and her practising physician, does not offend the principles of fundamental justice would need to be reevaluated if a right of access to abortion is founded upon the right to "liberty" in s. 7 of the Charter. I am of the view that there would still be circumstances in which the state interest in the protection of the foetus would require an independent medical opinion as to the danger to the life or health of the pregnant woman. Assuming without deciding that a right of access to abortion can be founded upon the right to "liber-

Je ne crois pas qu'il soit déraisonnable de demander une confirmation médicale indépendante au sujet de la menace pour la vie ou la santé de la femme lorsqu'un intérêt aussi important et marqué pèse dans la balance. Je constate avec intérêt que, dans de nombreux ressorts étrangers, les lois qui décriminalisent l'avortement requièrent un avis concernant l'état de santé de la femme indépendant de celui de son propre médecin. Le ministère public, dans son dossier de sources législative, jurisprudentielle et doctrinale, cite les lois suivantes qui comportent un mécanisme de ce genre: Royaume-Uni, Abortion Act, 1967, 1967, chap. 87, al. 1(1)a); Territoire du Nord de l'Australie, Criminal Law Consolidation Act and Ordinance, sous-al. 79 A(3)a); Australie-Méridionale, Criminal Law Consolidation Act, 1935-1975, al. 82a(1)a); République fédérale de l'Allemagne, Criminal Code, modifié par la Fifteenth Criminal Law Amendment Act (1976), art. 219; Israël, Penal Law, 5737-1977 (modifiée), art. 315; Nouvelle-Zélande, Crimes Act 1961, modifiée par la Crimes Amendment Act 1977 et la Crimes Amendment Act 1978, par. 187A(4); Code pénal suisse, par. 120(1). Cela dit, le médecin traitant doit, d'après l'al. 251(4)a), être «de bonne foi» et, par conséquent, n'avoir aucune raison de croire que le critère de l'al. 251(4)c) n'est pas rempli. Le médecin traitant est toutefois exclu à juste titre de l'organisme qui donne une opinion indépendante. Je crois que le législateur a raison d'exiger ce qui, sans aucun doute, est une pratique médicale extraordinaire dans sa réglementation du droit criminel en matière d'avortement, conformément aux divers intérêts en jeu.

L'affirmation selon laquelle une opinion médicale indépendante, distincte de celle de la femme enceinte et de son médecin traitant, ne porte pas atteinte aux principes de justice fondamentale, devrait être réévaluée si le droit à l'avortement était fondé sur le droit à la «liberté» de l'art. 7 de la Charte. Je suis d'avis qu'il y aurait encore des circonstances dans lesquelles l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus exigerait une opinion médicale indépendante concernant le danger pour la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte. Même en présumant, sans le décider, que le droit à l'avortement peut se fonder sur le droit à la «liberté», il y ty", there would be a point in time at which the state interest in the foetus would become compelling. From this point in time, Parliament would be entitled to limit abortions to those required for therapeutic reasons and therefore require an independent opinion as to the health exception. The case law reveals a substantial difference of opinion as to the state interest in the protection of the foetus as against the pregnant woman's right to liberty. Wilson J., for example, in her discussion of s. 1 of the Charter in the case at bar, notes the following, at p. 183:

The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes "compelling" I leave to the informed judgment of the legislature which is in a position to receive guidance on the subject from all the relevant disciplines. It seems to me, however, that it might fall somewhere in the second trimester.

This view as to when the state interest becomes compelling may be compared with that of O'Connor J. of the United States Supreme Court in her dissenting opinion in City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983), at pp. 460-61:

In Roe [Roe v. Wade 410 U.S. 113 (1973)], the Court held that although the State had an important and legitimate interest in protecting potential life, that interest could not become compelling until the point at which the fetus was viable. The difficulty with this analysis is clear: potential life is no less potential in the first weeks of pregnancy than it is at viability or afterward. At any stage in pregnancy, there is the potential for human life. Although the Court refused to "resolve the difficult question of when life begins," id., at 159, the Court chose the point of viability — when the foetus is capable of life independent of its mother — to permit the complete proscription of abortion. The choice of viability as the point at which state interest in potential life becomes compelling is no less arbitrary than choosing any point before viability or any point afterward. Accordingly, I believe that the State's interest in protecting potential human life exists throughout the pregnancy.

As I indicated at the outset of my reasons, it is nevertheless possible to resolve this appeal without attempting to delineate the right to "liberty" in s.

aurait un moment où l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus deviendrait supérieur. Dès ce moment-là, le législateur serait en droit de limiter les avortements à ceux qui sont nécessaires pour des motifs thérapeutiques et donc d'exiger une opinion indépendante concernant l'exception pour cause de santé. La jurisprudence est fort partagée sur la question de l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus face au droit de la femme enceinte à la liberté. Le juge Wilson, par exemple, dans l'analyse qu'elle fait en l'espèce de l'article premier de la Charte, souligne ceci (à la p. 183):

Quant au point précis du développement du fœtus où l'intérêt qu'a l'État de le protéger devient "supérieur", je laisse le soin de le fixer au jugement éclairé du législateur, qui est en mesure de recevoir des avis à ce sujet de l'ensemble des disciplines pertinentes. Il me semble cependant que ce point pourrait se situer quelque part au cours du second trimestre.

Ce point de vue quant au moment où l'intérêt de l'État devient supérieur peut être comparé à celui exprimé en dissidence par le juge O'Connor de la Cour suprême des États-Unis, dans l'affaire City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983), aux pp. 460 et 461:

[TRADUCTION] Dans l'arrêt Roe [Roe v. Wade 410 U.S. 113 (1973)], la Cour a jugé que si l'État avait un intérêt important et légitime à protéger la vie potentielle, cet intérêt ne pouvait devenir supérieur qu'au moment où le fœtus devenait viable. La difficulté que pose ce genre d'analyse est claire: la vie potentielle n'est pas moins potentielle au cours des premières semaines de grossesse qu'elle ne l'est au point de viabilité ou ultérieurement. À tout stade de la grossesse, il y a une vie humaine en puissance. Bien qu'elle ait refusé de «résoudre la difficile question du moment où la vie commence», id., à la p. 159, la Cour a choisi le point de viabilité, c'est-à-dire lorsque le fœtus est capable de vivre indépendamment de sa mère, pour interdire complètement l'avortement. Le choix de la viabilité comme point où l'intérêt de l'État dans la vie potentielle devient supérieur n'est pas moins arbitraire que le choix de tout autre point avant la viabilité ou de tout autre point ultérieur. Par conséquent, je crois que l'intérêt qu'a l'État à protéger la vie humaine potentielle existe tout au long de la grossesse.

Comme je l'ai indiqué au début de mes motifs, il est néanmoins possible de résoudre le pourvoi sans tenter de délimiter le droit à «la liberté» de l'art. 7

7 of the Charter. The violation of the right to "security of the person" and the relevant principles of fundamental justice are sufficient to invalidate s. 251 of the Criminal Code.

Some delay is inevitable in connection with any system which purports to limit to therapeutic reasons the grounds upon which an abortion can be performed lawfully. Any statutory mechanism for ensuring an independent confirmation as to the state of the woman's life or health, adopted pursuant to the objective of assuring the protection of the foetus, will inevitably result in a delay which would exceed whatever delay would be encountered if an independent opinion was not required. Furthermore, rules promoting the safety of abortions designed to protect the interest of the pregnant woman will also cause some unavoidable delay. It is only in so far as the administrative structure creates delays which are unnecessary that the structure can be considered to violate the principles of fundamental justice. Indeed, an examination of the delays caused by certain of the procedural requirements in s. 251(4) reveals that they are unnecessary, given Parliament's objectives in establishing the administrative structure. I note parenthetically that it is not sufficient to argue that the structure would operate in a fair manner but for the applications from women who do not qualify in respect of the standard in s. 251(4)(c). A fair structure, put in place to decide between those women who qualify for a therapeutic abortion and those who do not, should be designed with a view to efficiently meeting the demands which it must necessarily serve.

One such example of a rule which is unnecessary is the requirement in s. 251(4) that therapeutic abortions must take place in an eligible hospital to be lawful. I have observed that s. 251(4) directs that therapeutic abortions take place in accredited or approved hospitals, with at least four physicians, and that, because of the lack of such hospitals in many parts of Canada, this often causes delay for women seeking treatment. As I noted earlier, this requirement was plainly adopted to assure the safety of the abortion procedure generde la Charte. La violation du droit à «la sécurité de la personne» et les principes pertinents de justice fondamentale sont suffisants pour invalider l'art. 251 du Code criminel.

Un certain délai est inévitable pour tout système qui prétend limiter à des raisons thérapeutiques les motifs qui permettent de pratiquer un avortement licitement. Tout mécanisme légal qui vise à obtenir une confirmation indépendante de l'état de santé de la femme ou du danger pour sa vie, adopté conformément à l'objectif d'assurer la protection du fœtus, engendre inévitablement un délai supérieur à tout autre délai auquel on pourrait avoir à se plier si une opinion indépendante n'était pas exigée. En outre, les règles qui visent à assurer des avortements sans danger et qui sont conçues pour la protection de la femme enceinte sont elles aussi, inévitablement, sources d'un certain délai. C'est uniquement dans la mesure où la structure administrative crée des délais qui ne sont pas nécessaires qu'on peut considérer qu'elle viole les principes de justice fondamentale. Un examen des délais occasionnés par certaines exigences en matière de procédure du par. 251(4) révèle effectivement qu'ils ne sont pas nécessaires, compte tenu des objectifs que poursuivait le législateur en établissant cette structure administrative. Je souligne, entre parenthèses, qu'il ne suffit pas de soutenir que la structure fonctionnerait équitablement n'étaient-ce les demandes de femmes inadmissibles au regard du critère de l'al. 251(4)c). Une structure équitable mise en place pour départager les femmes admissibles à un avortement thérapeutique de celles qui ne le sont pas devrait être conçue de manière à satisfaire efficacement aux demandes auxquelles elle doit nécessairement répondre.

Un exemple de règle inutile, c'est l'exigence du par. 251(4) que les avortements thérapeutiques aient lieu dans un hôpital admissible pour être licites. J'ai fait observer que le par. 251(4) exige que les avortements thérapeutiques soient pratiqués dans des hôpitaux accrédités ou approuvés, comptant au moins quatre médecins, et que l'absence de tels hôpitaux dans bien des régions du Canada est souvent à la source de délais pour les femmes qui veulent être traitées. Comme je l'ai noté précédemment, cette exigence a manifesteally, and particularly the safety of the pregnant woman, after the standard of s. 251(4) has been met and after the certificate to this effect has been issued enabling the woman to have a lawful abortion. The objective in respect of which the in-hospital rule was adopted is safety and not the state interest in the protection of the foetus. As the rule stands in s. 251(4), however, no exception is currently possible. The evidence discloses that there is no justification for the requirement that all therapeutic abortions take place in hospitals eligible under the Criminal Code. In this sense, the delays which result from the hospital requirement are unnecessary and, consequently, in this respect, the administrative structure for therapeutic abortions is manifestly unfair and offends the principles of fundamental justice.

ment été adoptée pour assurer, de manière générale, que les avortements soient pratiqués en toute sécurité et, plus particulièrement, pour assurer la sécurité de la femme enceinte, une fois satisfait le critère du par. 251(4) et une fois délivré le certificat en ce sens, autorisant la femme à subir un avortement licite. L'objectif pour lequel la règle de l'avortement à l'hôpital a été adoptée était la sécurité et non l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus. Mais la règle, que l'on trouve au par. 251(4), ne permet actuellement aucune exception. Il ressort de la preuve que l'obligation que tous les avortements aient lieu dans des hôpitaux admissibles en vertu du Code criminel n'est pas justifiée. En ce sens, les délais qui résultent de l'exigence relative aux hôpitaux ne sont pas nécessaires et, par conséquent, à cet égard, la structure administrative concernant les avortements thérapeutiques est nettement injuste et viole les principes de justice fondamentale.

Experts testified at trial that the principal justification for the in-hospital rule is the problem of post-operative complications. There are of course instances in which the danger to life or health observed by the therapeutic abortion committee will constitute sufficient grounds for the procedure to take place in a hospital. There are other instances in which the circumstances of the procedure itself requires that it be performed in hospital, such as certain abortions performed at an advanced gestational age or cases in which the patient is particularly vulnerable to what might otherwise be a simple procedure.

Des experts sont venus témoigner en première instance que la principale justification de la règle de l'avortement à l'hôpital réside dans le problème des complications postopératoires. Il y a bien sûr des cas où le danger pour la vie ou la santé constaté par le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique constituera un motif suffisant pour que l'intervention ait lieu à l'hôpital. Il y a d'autres cas où les circonstances entourant l'intervention elle-même exigent qu'elle soit pratiquée à l'hôpital; il en va ainsi notamment de certains avortements pratiqués à un stade avancé de la grossesse ou des cas où la patiente est particulièrement vulnérable à ce qui autrement pourrait constituer une intervention simple.

In many cases, however, there is no medical justification that the therapeutic abortion take place in a hospital. Experts testified at trial, that many first trimester therapeutic abortions may be safely performed in specialized clinics outside of hospitals because the possible complications can be handled, and in some cases better handled, by the facilities of a specialized clinic. The parties submitted statistics comparing complication rates for in-hospital abortions and those performed in non-hospital facilities. These statistics are of limited value for our purposes because, not surprisingly,

Dans bien des cas cependant, il n'y a aucune justification médicale à ce que l'avortement thérapeutique soit pratiqué à l'hôpital. D'après les témoignages des experts en première instance, un grand nombre d'avortements thérapeutiques du premier trimestre peuvent être pratiqués en toute sécurité à l'extérieur de l'hôpital dans des cliniques spécialisées du fait que celles-ci sont équipées, et dans certains cas mieux équipées, pour faire face aux éventuelles complications. Les parties ont produit des statistiques comparant les taux de complications des avortements à l'hôpital et des avortethe higher reported rates in hospitals are due in part to the fact that the more dangerous cases are treated in hospital. What is more revealing, however, are statistics which show that a high percentage of therapeutic abortions performed in Canada are performed on an out-patient basis:

> The average length of stay in hospitals per therapeutic abortion case was less than a day in 1985. This average includes 46,567 cases or 76.9 per cent of 60,518 therapeutic abortion cases for women, for whom the pregnancy terminations took place on an outpatient (day care) basis. The per cent of outpatient therapeutic abortions increased to 76.9% in 1985 from 59.7% in 1981 and 34.9% in 1975. [Therapeutic abortions, 1985, supra, at p. 20.]

The substantial increase in the percentage of abortions performed on an out-patient basis since 1975 underscores the view that the in-hospital requirement, which may have been justified when it was first adopted, has become exorbitant. One suspects that the number of out-patient abortions would be even higher if the Criminal Code did not prevent women in many parts of Canada from obtaining timely and effective treatment by requiring them to travel to places where eligible hospital facilities were available. Furthermore, these figures do not include out-patient abortions which may have qualified as therapeutic under the standard in s. 251(4)(c) which were performed on Canadian women in the United States and in clinics currently operating in Canada outside the s. 251(4) exception. Citing the Canadian abortion law's in-hospital requirement as a legislative standard which is difficult to satisfy, Rebecca J. Cook and Bernard M. Dickens observe that "Rigid statutory formulae may not improve ... distribution of services but may obstruct appropriate response to health needs": Abortion Laws in Commonwealth Countries (1979), at p. 28.

ments pratiqués en dehors du milieu hospitalier. Ces statistiques n'ont qu'une valeur limitée pour nos fins car, cela ne surprend guère, les taux plus élevés donnés pour les hôpitaux sont dus en partie au fait que les cas les plus dangereux sont traités à l'hôpital. Sont toutefois plus révélatrices les statistiques qui démontrent qu'un fort pourcentage d'avortements thérapeutiques au Canada sont pratiqués en consultation externe:

> La durée moyenne d'hospitalisation des femmes ayant subi un avortement thérapeutique a été de moins d'une journée en 1985. Cette moyenne tient compte des 46,567 cas d'avortements thérapeutiques pratiqués en consultation externe, soit 76.9% des 60,518 avortements thérapeutiques déclarés. Le pourcentage des avortements thérapeutiques pratiqués en consultation externe est passé de 34.9% en 1975, puis 59.7% en 1981 et à 76.9% en 1985. [Avortements thérapeutiques, 1985, précité, à la p. 20.]

La croissance importante du pourcentage des avortements pratiqués en consultation externe depuis 1975 confirme que l'exigence relative aux hôpitaux, peut-être justifiée lorsqu'elle a été adoptée, est devenue exorbitante. Il y a lieu de croire que le nombre d'avortements pratiqués en consultation externe serait encore plus élevé si le Code criminel n'empêchait pas les femmes, dans de nombreuses régions du Canada, d'obtenir un traitement efficace, au moment opportun, en les obligeant à se déplacer et à se rendre là où se trouve un établissement hospitalier admissible. De plus, ces chiffres n'incluent pas les avortements pratiqués en consultation externe, qui auraient pu être admissibles à titre d'avortements thérapeutiques d'après le critère de l'al. 251(4)c), sur des Canadiennes aux États-Unis et dans des cliniques canadiennes agissant en dehors de l'exception du par. 251(4). Décrivant l'obligation de l'avortement à l'hôpital imposée par le droit canadien comme un critère législatif difficile à respecter, Rebecca J. Cook et Bernard M. Dickens font observer que [TRADUCTION] «[u]ne formulation législative rigide pourrait fort bien ne pas améliorer la distribution des services et constituer un obstacle à toute réponse appropriée aux besoins de santé»: La législation de l'avortement dans les pays du Commonwealth (1979), à la p. 31.

In the Powell Report, several recommendations were made as to options for abortion service delivery in Ontario. In support of these recommendations, the Report included the following, at pp. 21 and 35:

When many countries legalized abortion, hospitals were viewed as the appropriate providers of safe abortion services. Since then, studies have demonstrated that abortions can be performed safely in other types of facilities, (Tietze & Henshaw, 1986). The complication rate for all abortions performed in nonhospital facilities, is no higher than for those which take place in hospitals (Grimes et al., 1981).

Hospitals are often hard pressed to find time in the busy operating room schedules to fit in abortion procedures. In most hospitals, abortions are not viewed as a priority for scheduling. Gynaecologists must fit abortions into their allotted time in operating rooms. Although abortions can be performed in minor procedure rooms with no jeopardy to the patient, this is an unusual practice.

The presence of legislation in other jurisdictions permitting certain abortions to be performed outside of hospitals is especially revealing as to the safety of the procedure in those circumstances and of the necessity to provide alternative means given the limited resources of hospitals. In the Powell Report, it was observed, at p. 21, that:

In a number of European countries, including the Netherlands, Poland and West Germany, approximately half of the abortions are performed in non-hospital facilities. In France in 1982, 53 percent of abortions were performed in 90 "centres d'interruption volontaire de grossesse" which were administered by hospitals but were in practice separate abortion clinics. The French government ordered all public hospitals that could not meet the demand for abortions to provide such clinics.

Particularly striking is the United States experience in respect of the in-hospital rule. The Powell Report noted that 82 per cent of abortions performed in the United States in 1982 were done outside of hospitals (at p. 22). Experts confirmed

Dans le rapport Powell, plusieurs recommandations portent sur les options envisageables en matière de services d'avortement en Ontario. À l'appui de ces recommandations, le rapport contient ce qui suit, aux pp. 21 et 35:

Les hôpitaux éprouvent beaucoup de difficultés à trouver du temps, dans l'horaire surchargé des salles d'opération, pour pratiquer les interruptions de grossesse. Dans la plupart des hôpitaux, les avortements ne sont pas considérés comme une priorité sur leur liste. Les gynécologues doivent caser les avortements à l'intérieur du temps de salle d'opération qui leur est alloué. Bien que les avortements puissent être pratiqués dans des salles d'interventions mineures, sans risque pour la patiente, il s'agit bien là d'une pratique inhabituelle.

L'existence de lois dans d'autres pays autorisant la pratique de certains avortements à l'extérieur de l'hôpital est particulièrement révélatrice de la sûreté de l'intervention dans ces circonstances et de la nécessité de prévoir d'autres moyens étant donné les ressources limitées des hôpitaux. Dans le rapport Powell, on fait observer, à la p. 21, que:

L'expérience américaine est particulièrement saisissante au sujet de la règle de l'avortement à l'hôpital. Le rapport Powell a souligné que 82 pour 100 des avortements pratiqués aux États-Unis en 1982 l'avaient été en dehors du milieu hospitalier this finding at trial. Dr. Christopher Tietze, a recognized expert on abortion, explained at trial that in 1981 all out-of-hospital abortion clinics in the United States performed abortions up to 10 weeks gestational age, 90 per cent of clinics performed abortions up to 12 weeks, 50 per cent of clinics up to 14 weeks and 20 per cent accepted patients up to 16 weeks. Although the legal basis upon which women assert a constitutional right of access to abortion is different in the United States than that which I find in the case at bar, the American experience as to the inappropriateness of a universal in-hospital requirement remains relevant.

The Powell Report proposed a number of projects as alternatives to the in-hospital rule for therapeutic abortions. Each proposal is designed to be "under the jurisdiction of a hospital board or several hospital boards with approval for abortion services provided through hospital therapeutic abortion committee mechanisms" (at p. 37). One such proposal is for the establishment of comprehensive women's health care clinics which would provide first trimester abortions, referrals to hospitals for second trimester abortions and post-abortion counselling. Regional centres for therapeutic abortion clinics affiliated with but not necessarily located in a hospital are also proposed in the Report, which goes on to emphasize that first trimester ambulatory abortions are those most appropriate for a non-hospital setting.

The Badgley Committee also made a series of proposals designed to reduce the number and type of complications associated with therapeutic abortions. These included a proposal, at p. 322, for "concentrating the performance of the abortion procedure into specialized units with a full range of the required equipment and facilities and staffed by experienced and specially trained nurses and medical personnel".

Le rapport Powell a proposé un certain nombre de solutions de rechange à la règle de l'hôpital applicable aux avortements thérapeutiques. Chaque proposition est conçue de façon à [TRADUCTION] «relever de la compétence d'un conseil d'hôpital ou de plusieurs conseils d'hôpitaux, avec approbation des avortements par le biais des comités de l'avortement thérapeutique de l'hôpital» (à la p. 37). L'une de ces propositions est d'établir des cliniques générales de santé pour les femmes qui offriraient des avortements du premier trimestre et l'assistance postavortement, et renverraient aux hôpitaux pour les avortements du second trimestre. Des centres régionaux de clinique d'avortements thérapeutiques affiliés à un hôpital, sans nécessairement y être localisés, sont aussi proposés dans le rapport, qui souligne également que les avortements ambulatoires du premier trimestre sont les plus appropriés en dehors du cadre hospitalier.

Le comité Badgley a fait lui aussi une série de propositions conçues pour réduire le nombre et le genre de complications liées aux avortements thérapeutiques. Il a proposé notamment le "regroupement de la pratique des avortements dans des services spécialisés munis de tout l'équipement et de toutes les installations nécessaires et dotés d'un personnel médical et infirmier expérimenté et ayant reçu une formation spéciale à cet égard", à la p. 358.

Whatever the eventual solution may be, it is plain that the in-hospital requirement is not justified in all cases. Although the protection of health of the woman is the objective which the in-hospital rule is intended to serve, the requirement that all therapeutic abortions be performed in eligible hospitals is unnecessary to meet that objective in all cases. In this sense, the rule is manifestly unfair and offends the principles of fundamental justice. I appreciate that the precise nature of the administrative solution may be complicated by the constitutional division of powers between Parliament and the provinces. There is no doubt that Parliament could allow the criminal law exception to operate in all hospitals, for example, though the provinces retain the power to establish these hospitals under s. 92(7) of the Constitution Act, 1867. On the other hand, if Parliament decided to allow therapeutic abortions to be performed in provincially licensed clinics, it is possible that both Parliament and the provinces would be called upon to collaborate in the implementation of the plan.

Quelle que soit la solution adoptée, il est clair que l'obligation de pratiquer l'avortement dans un hôpital n'est pas justifiée dans tous les cas. Si la protection de la santé de la femme est l'objectif visé par la règle de l'hôpital, l'exigence que tous les avortements thérapeutiques soient pratiqués dans des hôpitaux admissibles n'est pas nécessaire pour l'atteindre dans tous les cas. En ce sens, la règle est nettement injuste et viole les principes de justice fondamentale. Je sais que la nature précise de la solution administrative peut se trouver compliquée par le partage constitutionnel des compétences entre le Parlement et les provinces. Il ne fait pas de doute que le Parlement pourrait permettre que l'exception du droit criminel s'applique dans tous les hôpitaux, par exemple, bien que les provinces conservent le pouvoir d'établir ces hôpitaux en vertu du par. 92(7) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867. D'autre part, si le Parlement décidait d'autoriser de pratiquer des avortements thérapeutiques dans des cliniques autorisées par une province, il se peut que le Parlement et les provinces soient amenés à collaborer à la mise en œuvre du plan.

An objection can also be raised in respect of the requirement that the committee come from the accredited or approved hospital in which the abortion is to be performed. It is difficult to see a connection between this requirement and any of the practical purposes for which s. 251(4) was enacted. It cannot be said to have been adopted in order to promote the safety of therapeutic abortions or the safety of the pregnant woman. Nor is the rule designed to preserve the state interest in the foetus. The integrity of the independent medical opinion is no better served by a committee within the hospital than a committee from outside the hospital as long as the practising physician remains excluded in both circumstances as part of a proper state participation in the choice of the procedure necessary to secure an independent opinion.

Une objection peut également être soulevée à l'égard de l'obligation que le comité provienne de l'hôpital accrédité ou approuvé où l'avortement doit être pratiqué. Il est difficile de voir un lien entre cette exigence et l'une ou l'autre des raisons pratiques pour lesquelles le par. 251(4) a été adopté. On ne peut pas dire qu'elle a été adoptée pour promouvoir la sécurité des avortements thérapeutiques ni celle de la femme enceinte. La règle n'est pas non plus conçue pour préserver l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans le fœtus. L'intégrité de l'opinion médicale indépendante n'est pas mieux garantie par un comité interne de l'hôpital que par un comité externe, à la condition que le médecin traitant demeure exclu dans les deux cas comme élément de la participation appropriée de l'État au choix de la procédure nécessaire pour assurer l'obtention d'une opinion indépendante.

In a recent unpublished paper entitled Options for Abortion Policy Reform: A Consultation Document (1986), at p. 74, the Fetal Status Working Group, (Edward W. Keyserlingk, Director), Protection of Life Project of the Law Reform

Dans un document récent inédit, intitulé La réforme en matière d'avortement: les solutions possibles (1986), à la p. 74, le groupe de travail sur le statut juridique du fœtus, section de recherche sur la protection de la vie (Edward W. Keyser-

Commission of Canada confirmed the view that the requirement that abortion committees be limited to hospitals is unnecessary:

> Restricting the existence of these committees to hospitals appears to be one of the reasons for delays and inequitable access. There appears to be no compelling medical reason why committees should not be attached to clinics which are equipped and licensed to provide this procedure.

The Law Reform Commission's Working Group raises the possibility of regional abortion committees to replace the current rule (supra, at p. 76). The Powell Report proposals include a model whereby a central therapeutic abortion committee could serve several hospitals (supra, at p. 38).

Whatever solution is finally retained, it is plain that the requirement that the therapeutic abortion committee come from the hospital in which the abortion will be performed serves no real purpose. The risk resulting from the delay caused by s. 251(4) in this respect is unnecessary. Consequently, this requirement violates the principles of fundamental justice.

Other aspects of the committee requirement in s. 251(4) add to the manifest unfairness of the administrative structure. These include requirements which are at best only tenuously connected to the purpose of obtaining independent confirmation that the standard in s. 251(4)(c) has been met and which do not usefully contribute to the realization of that purpose. Hospital boards are entitled to appoint committees made up of three or more qualified medical practitioners. As I observed earlier, if more than three members are appointed, precious time can be lost when quorum cannot be established because members are absent. Whatever the number of members necessary to arrive at an independent appreciation of the state of the woman's life or health may in fact be, this number should be kept to a minimum to avoid unnecessary delays which, as I have explained, result in increased risk to women. Allowing a board to increase the number of members above a statutory lingk, directeur), Commission de réforme du droit du Canada, confirme l'opinion qu'il n'est pas nécessaire d'exiger que les comités de l'avortement soient limités aux hôpitaux:

> Les lenteurs du système actuel et les inégalités d'accès sont en partie imputables au fait que les comités ne peuvent être établis que dans des hôpitaux. Or, il ne semble exister, sur le plan médical, aucune raison contraignante pour empêcher de constituer un comité dans une clinique qui dispose du matériel et des permis nécessaires.

Le groupe de travail de la Commission de réforme du droit soulève la possibilité d'avoir des comités d'avortement régionaux pour remplacer la règle actuelle (précitée, à la p. 76). Les propositions du rapport Powell comportent un modèle selon lequel un comité central de l'avortement thérapeutique desservirait plusieurs hôpitaux (précité, à la p. 38).

Quelle que soit la solution finalement retenue, il est clair que l'obligation que le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique provienne de l'hôpital où l'avortement sera pratiqué ne sert aucune fin véritable. Le risque résultant du délai engendré par le par. 251(4) à cet égard est inutile. Par conséquent, cette exigence viole les principes de justice fondamentale.

D'autres aspects de l'obligation d'avoir un comité, imposée par le par. 251(4), ajoutent à l'inéquité manifeste de la structure administrative. Ils comportent des exigences qui, au mieux, n'ont qu'un rapport ténu avec l'objectif d'obtenir une confirmation indépendante que le critère de l'al. 251(4)c) a été respecté et qui n'apportent aucune contribution utile à la réalisation de cet objectif. Les conseils d'hôpitaux ont le droit de nommer des comités formés de trois médecins qualifiés ou plus. Comme je l'ai déjà fait observer, si l'on nomme plus de trois membres, un temps précieux peut être perdu lorsqu'il est impossible d'atteindre le quorum en raison de l'absence de certains membres. Quel que soit le nombre de membres du comité nécessaire pour avoir une appréciation indépendante de l'état de santé de la femme ou du danger pour sa vie, il faudrait s'en tenir à un nombre minimum afin d'éviter les délais inutiles qui, comme je l'ai expliqué, accroissent les risques minimum of three members does not add to the integrity of the independent opinion. This aspect of the current rule is unnecessary and, since it can result in increased risks, offends the principles of fundamental justice.

Similarly, the exclusion of all physicians who practise therapeutic abortions from the committees is exorbitant. This rule was no doubt included in s. 251(4) to promote the independence of the therapeutic abortion committees' appreciation of the standard. As I have said, the exclusion of the practising physician, although it diverges from usual medical practice, is appropriate in the criminal context to ensure the independent opinion with respect to the life or health of that physician's patient. The exclusion of all physicians who perform therapeutic abortions from committees, even when they have no connection with the patient in question, is not only unnecessary but potentially counterproductive. There are no reasonable grounds to suspect bias from a physician who has no connection with the patient simply because, in the course of his or her medical practice, he or she performs lawful abortions. Furthermore, physicians who perform therapeutic abortions have useful expertise which would add to the precision and the integrity of the independent opinion itself. Some state control is appropriate to ensure the independence of the opinion. However, this rule as it now stands is excessive and can increase the risk of delay because fewer physicians are qualified to serve on the committees.

The foregoing analysis of the administrative structure of s. 251(4) is by no means a complete catalogue of all the current systems' strengths and failings. It demonstrates, however, that the administrative structure put in place by Parliament has enough shortcomings so that s. 251(4), when considered as a whole, violates the principles of fundamental justice. These shortcomings stem from rules which are not necessary to the purposes for which s. 251(4) was established. These un-pour les femmes. Autoriser un conseil à augmenter le nombre de ses membres au-dessus du minimum légal de trois n'ajoute rien à l'intégrité de l'opinion indépendante. Cet aspect de la règle actuelle n'est pas nécessaire et, comme il peut en résulter des risques accrus, il viole les principes de justice fondamentale.

De même, l'exclusion au sein de ces comités de tous les médecins qui pratiquent des avortements thérapeutiques est exorbitante. Cette règle a sans doute été incluse dans le par. 251(4) pour favoriser le caractère indépendant de l'appréciation du critère par les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique. Comme je l'ai dit, l'exclusion du médecin traitant, bien qu'elle s'écarte de la pratique médicale habituelle, est appropriée dans un contexte criminel pour assurer une opinion indépendante sur le danger pour la vie ou la santé de la patiente du médecin. L'exclusion au sein des comités de tous les médecins qui pratiquent des avortements thérapeutiques, même lorsqu'ils n'ont aucun lien avec la patiente en cause, est non seulement inutile mais potentiellement nuisible. Il n'y a pas de motifs raisonnables de soupçonner qu'un médecin qui n'a aucun lien avec la patiente est partial simplement parce que, dans le cours de son exercice de la médecine, il pratique des avortements licites. De plus, les médecins qui pratiquent des avortements thérapeutiques possèdent des compétences utiles qui peuvent accroître la précision et l'intégrité de l'opinion indépendante elle-même. Un certain contrôle de l'État s'impose si l'on veut assurer le caractère indépendant de l'opinion. Toutefois, la règle dans son état actuel est excessive et susceptible d'accroître le risque de délai du fait que moins de médecins sont admissibles à siéger à ces comités.

L'analyse qui précède de la structure administrative du par. 251(4) ne se veut nullement un tableau complet de tous les points forts et de toutes les faiblesses du système actuel. Elle démontre néanmoins que la structure administrative mise en place par le législateur fédéral comporte suffisamment de lacunes pour que le par. 251(4), pris dans son ensemble, viole les principes de justice fondamentale. Ces lacunes résultent de règles qui ne sont pas nécessaires pour atteindre les objectifs necessary rules, because they impose delays which result in an additional risk to women's health, are manifestly unfair.

V — Section 1 of the Charter

I agree with the view that s. 1 of the Charter can be used to save a legislative provision which breaches s. 7 in the manner which s. 251 of the Criminal Code violates s. 7 in this case. Section 1 states:

> 1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

The Chief Justice provided an analysis of s. 1 in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, at pp. 138-39, which is appropriate for the purposes of addressing s. 1 in the case at bar. Those seeking to uphold s. 251 of the Criminal Code must demonstrate the following:

(1) the objective which s. 251 is designed to serve must "relate to concerns which are pressing and substantial"; and

(2) "once a sufficiently significant objective is recognized, then the party invoking s. 1 must show that the means chosen are reasonable and demonstrably justified. This involves a 'form of proportionality test'."

I shall consider each of these two criteria which must be met if the limit on the s. 7 right is to be found reasonable.

(1) The Objective of s. 251

I agree with Wilson J.'s characterization of s. 251, explained in the following terms, at p. 181:

> In my view, the primary objective of the impugned legislation must be seen as the protection of the foetus. It undoubtedly has other ancillary objectives, such as the protection of the life and health of pregnant women, but I believe that the main objective advanced to justify a restriction on the pregnant woman's s. 7 right is the protection of the foetus.

pour lesquels le par. 251(4) a été édicté. Ces règles inutiles, du fait qu'elles imposent des délais qui entraînent un risque additionnel pour la santé des femmes, sont nettement injustes.

V – L'article premier de la Charte

Je partage l'avis qu'on peut avoir recours à l'article premier de la Charte pour sauvegarder une disposition législative qui enfreint l'art. 7 de la manière dont l'art. 251 du Code criminel viole celui-ci en l'espèce. L'article premier porte:

> 1. La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés. Ils ne peuvent être restreints que par une règle de droit dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

Le Juge en chef fournit, dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103, aux pp. 138 et 139, une analyse de l'article premier qui est pertinente aux fins d'aborder ce même article en l'espèce. Ceux qui veulent soutenir la validité de l'art. 251 du Code criminel doivent démontrer ce qui suit:

(1) l'objectif que l'art. 251 vise à servir doit «se rapporte[r] à des préoccupations urgentes et réelles»; et

(2) «dès qu'il est reconnu qu'un objectif est suffisamment important, la partie qui invoque l'article premier doit alors démontrer que les moyens choisis sont raisonnables et que leur justification peut se démontrer. Cela nécessite l'application d'«une sorte de critère de proportionnalité»».

Je vais examiner chacun de ces deux critères auxquels il faut satisfaire pour que la restriction du droit conféré par l'art. 7 soit jugée raisonnable.

(1) L'objectif de l'art. 251

Je souscris à la façon dont le juge Wilson qualifie l'art. 251, à la p. 181:

> À mon avis, il faut voir dans l'objectif premier de la loi contestée la protection du fœtus. Elle a sans doute d'autres objectifs secondaires, telle la protection de la vie et de la santé de la femme enceinte, mais je crois que l'objectif principal invoqué pour justifier la restriction du droit de la femme enceinte garanti par l'art. 7 est la protection du fœtus.

The primary objective of the protection of the foetus is the main objective relevant to the analysis of s. 251 under the first test of Oakes. With the greatest respect, I believe the Chief Justice incorrectly identifies (at p. 75) the objective of balancing foetal interests and those of pregnant women, "with the lives and health of women a major factor", as "sufficiently important to meet the requirements of the first step in the Oakes inquiry under s. 1".

The focus in Oakes is the objective "which the measures responsible for a limit on a Charter right or freedom are designed to serve" (supra, at p. 138). In the context of the criminal law of abortion, the objective, which the measures in s. 251 responsible for a limit on the s. 7 Charter right are designed to serve, is the protection of the foetus. The narrow aim of s. 251(4) should not be confused with the primary objective of s. 251 as a whole. Given that s. 251 is a "comprehensive code", to use the expression of the Chief Justice, it is inappropriate, in my view, to focus on the exculpatory provision alone as the statement of Parliament's objective in establishing the crime. (See R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 713, at p. 751, in which the Court unanimously held that an exemption must be read in light of the affirmative provision to which it relates.) The ancillary objective of protecting the life or health of the pregnant woman, whether viewed alone or balanced against the protection of the foetus, is not the primary objective which the measures responsible for a limit on the constitutional right to security of the person were put in place to achieve.

This balance cannot be considered as Parliament's objective in establishing the crime nor in maintaining this activity as a crime following the amendments to the Criminal Code in 1969. Section 251(4) only applies in specified circumstances. When the life or health of a pregnant woman is not in danger and she seeks an abortion on the basis of her own non-medical "priorities and aspirations", it is plain that the rules in s. 251 preclud-

L'objectif premier, celui de la protection du fœtus, est le principal objectif pertinent pour l'analyse de l'art. 251 selon le premier critère de l'arrêt Oakes. Je crois, en toute déférence, que le Juge en chef a mal identifié (à la p. 75) l'objectif d'équilibrer les intérêts du fœtus et ceux des femmes enceintes — "la vie et la santé des femmes étant un facteur majeur" — comme étant "suffisamment important pour répondre aux exigences du premier volet de l'analyse, selon l'arrêt Oakes, au regard de l'article premier".

Le point central en vertu de l'arrêt Oakes est l'objectif «que visent à servir les mesures qui apportent une restriction à un droit ou à une liberté garantis par la Charte» (précité, à la p. 138). Dans le contexte du droit criminel en matière d'avortement, l'objectif que visent à servir les mesures prévues à l'art. 251, qui sont à l'origine de la restriction du droit conféré par l'art. 7 de la Charte, est la protection du fœtus. On ne doit pas confondre le but limité du par. 251(4) et l'objectif premier de l'art. 251 pris dans son ensemble. Étant donné que l'art. 251 constitue un «code complet», pour reprendre l'expression du Juge en chef, on ne peut à bon droit, à mon sens, se concentrer sur la disposition disculpatoire seule comme étant l'énoncé de l'objectif du Parlement en créant le crime. (Voir l'arrêt R. c. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., [1986] 2 R.C.S. 713, à la p. 751, où cette Cour a reconnu unanimement qu'une exemption doit s'interpréter en fonction de la disposition affirmative à laquelle elle se rapporte.) L'objectif secondaire, savoir la protection de la vie ou de la santé de la femme enceinte, considéré seul ou par rapport à la protection du fœtus, n'est pas l'objectif premier pour lequel les mesures à l'origine de la restriction du droit constitutionnel à la sécurité de la personne ont été instaurées.

Cet équilibre ne peut pas être considéré comme l'objectif ayant conduit le Parlement à créer ce crime ni à conserver cette activité dans la catégorie des crimes suite aux modifications apportées au Code criminel en 1969. Le paragraphe 251(4) ne s'applique que dans des cas délimités. Lorsque la vie ou la santé d'une femme enceinte n'est pas en danger et qu'elle recherche un avortement en raison de ses propres «priorités et aspirations» non ing her from obtaining a lawful abortion have as their sole objective the protection of the foetus.

Furthermore, as federal legislation in respect of Parliament's jurisdiction over the criminal law in s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867, s. 251 cannot be said to have as its sole or principal objective, as the appellants argue, the protection of the life or health of pregnant women. Legislation which in its pith and substance is related to the life or health of pregnant women, depending of course on its precise terms, would be characterized as in relation to one of the provincial heads of power (see Schneider v. The Queen, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 112, at p. 137, per Dickson J., as he then was). The exculpatory provision in s. 251(4) cannot stand on its own as a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power.

Does the objective of protecting the foetus in s. 251 relate to concerns which are pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society? The answer to the first step of the Oakes test is yes. I am of the view that the protection of the foetus is and, as the Court of Appeal observed, always has been, a valid objective in Canadian criminal law. I have already elaborated on this objective in my discussion of the principles of fundamental justice. I think s. 1 of the Charter authorizes reasonable limits to be put on a woman's right having regard to the state interest in the protection of the foetus.

(2) Proportionality

I turn now to the second test in Oakes. The Crown must show that the means chosen in s. 251 are reasonable and demonstrably justified. In Oakes, supra, at p. 139, the Chief Justice outlined three components of the proportionality test:

First, the measures adopted must be carefully designed to achieve the objective in question. They must not be arbitrary, unfair or based on irrational considerations. In short, they must be rationally connected to the objective. Second, the means, even if rationally connected to the objective in this first sense, should impair "as little médicales, il est manifeste que les règles de l'art. 251 qui l'empêchent d'obtenir un avortement licite ont comme seul objectif la protection du fœtus.

En outre, comme il s'agit d'un texte législatif fédéral relevant de la compétence du Parlement en matière de droit criminel, selon le par. 91(27) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867, on ne peut dire de l'art. 251 qu'il a pour unique ou principal objectif, comme les appelants le soutiennent, la protection de la vie ou de la santé des femmes enceintes. Une mesure législative qui, de par son caractère véritable, se rapporte à la vie ou à la santé des femmes enceintes, en fonction naturellement de ses termes précis, serait qualifiée de relative à l'un des chefs de compétence provinciale (voir Schneider c. La Reine, [1982] 2 R.C.S. 112, à la p. 137, le juge Dickson, maintenant Juge en chef). La disposition disculpatoire du par. 251(4) ne saurait subsister d'elle-même à titre d'exercice valide de la compétence fédérale en matière de droit criminel.

La protection du fœtus à titre d'objectif de l'art. 251 se rapporte-t-elle à des préoccupations urgentes et réelles dans une société libre et démocratique? La réponse au premier volet du critère de l'arrêt Oakes est affirmative. Je suis d'avis que la protection du fœtus est et, comme l'a fait observer la Cour d'appel, a toujours été un objectif valide du droit criminel canadien. J'ai déjà examiné en détail cet objectif dans mon analyse des principes de justice fondamentale. Je pense que l'article premier de la Charte permet de limiter raisonnablement le droit d'une femme compte tenu de l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus.

(2) Le critère de proportionnalité

J'en viens maintenant au second critère de l'arrêt Oakes. Le ministère public doit démontrer que les moyens choisis à l'art. 251 sont raisonnables et que leur justification peut se démontrer. Dans l'arrêt Oakes, précité, à la p. 139, le Juge en chef expose les trois composantes du critère de la proportionnalité:

Premièrement, les mesures adoptées doivent être soigneusement conçues pour atteindre l'objectif en question. Elles ne doivent être ni arbitraires, ni inéquitables, ni fondées sur des considérations irrationnelles. Bref, elles doivent avoir un lien rationnel avec l'objectif en question. Deuxièmement, même à supposer qu'il y ait un as possible" the right or freedom in question: R. v. Big M. Drug Mart Ltd., ... at p. 352. Third, there must be a proportionality between the effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the Charter right or freedom, and the objective which has been identified as of "sufficient importance".

For the purposes of the first component of proportionality, I observe that it was necessary, in my discussion of s. 251(4) and the principles of fundamental justice, to explain my view that certain of the rules governing access to therapeutic abortions free from criminal sanction are unnecessary in respect of the objectives which s. 251 is designed to serve. A rule which is unnecessary in respect of Parliament's objectives cannot be said to be "rationally connected" thereto or to be "carefully designed to achieve the objective in question". Furthermore, not only are some of the rules in s. 251 unnecessary to the primary objective of the protection of the foetus and the ancillary objective of the protection of the pregnant woman's life or health, but their practical effect is to undermine the health of the woman which Parliament purports to consider so important. Consequently, s. 251 does not meet the proportionality test in Oakes.

There is no saving s. 251 by simply severing the offending portions of s. 251(4). The current rule expressed in s. 251, which articulates both Parliament's principal and ancillary objectives, cannot stand without the exception in s. 251(4). The violation of pregnant women's security of the person would be greater, not lesser, if s. 251(4) was severed leaving the remaining subsections of s. 251 as they are in the Criminal Code.

Given my conclusion in respect of the first component of the proportionality test, it is not necessary to address the questions as to whether the means in s. 251 "impair as little as possible" the s. 7 Charter right and whether there is a proportionality between the effects of s. 251 and the objective of protecting the foetus. Thus, I am not required to answer the difficult question concerning the cir-tel lien rationnel, le moyen choisi doit être de nature à porter «le moins possible» atteinte au droit ou à la liberté en question: R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [...] à la p. 352. Troisièmement, il doit y avoir proportionnalité entre les effets des mesures restreignant un droit ou une liberté garantis par la Charte et l'objectif reconnu comme «suffisamment important».

Pour les fins de la première composante de la proportionnalité, j'ai fait observer, dans mon analyse du par. 251(4) et des principes de justice fondamentale, qu'il était nécessaire d'expliquer mon opinion que certaines des règles régissant la possibilité d'obtenir un avortement thérapeutique, sans menace de répression pénale, ne sont pas nécessaires pour atteindre les objectifs pour lesquels l'art. 251 a été conçu. On ne saurait dire d'une règle qui n'est pas nécessaire pour atteindre les objectifs du législateur qu'elle a un «lien rationnel» avec ceux-ci ni qu'elle a été «soigneusement conçue pour atteindre l'objectif en question». De plus, non seulement certaines des règles de l'art. 251 ne sont-elles pas nécessaires à l'objectif premier, soit la protection du fœtus, et à l'objectif secondaire, soit la protection de la vie ou de la santé de la femme enceinte, mais encore elles ont pour effet pratique de miner la santé de la femme que le législateur prétend considérer si importante. Par conséquent, l'art. 251 ne satisfait pas au critère de proportionnalité de l'arrêt Oakes.

L'article 251 ne saurait être sauvegardé par le simple retranchement des parties fautives du par. 251(4). La règle actuellement exprimée à l'art. 251, qui traduit à la fois les objectifs principaux et secondaires du législateur, ne saurait subsister sans l'exception du par. 251(4). La violation de la sécurité de la personne des femmes enceintes serait plus grande, et non moindre, si le par. 251(4) devait être retranché, laissant tels quels dans le Code criminel les autres paragraphes de l'art. 251.

Étant donné ma conclusion relative à la première composante du critère de la proportionnalité, il n'est pas nécessaire d'aborder les questions de savoir si les moyens choisis à l'art. 251 «porte[nt] le moins possible atteinte» au droit conféré par l'art. 7 de la Charte et s'il y a proportionnalité entre les effets de l'art. 251 et l'objectif consistant à protéger le fœtus. Ainsi, je n'ai pas à répondre à cumstances in which there is a proportionality between the effects of s. 251 which limit the right of pregnant women to security of the person and the objective of the protection of the foetus. I do feel bound, however, to comment upon the balance which Parliament sought to achieve between the interest in the protection of the foetus and the interest in the life or health of the pregnant woman in adopting the amendments to the Criminal Code in 1969.

In Oakes, supra, at p. 140, the Chief Justice further explained the third component of the proportionality test in the following terms:

> Even if an objective is of sufficient importance, and the first two elements of the proportionality test are satisfied, it is still possible that, because of the severity of the deleterious effects of a measure on individuals or groups, the measure will not be justified by the purposes it is intended to serve. The more severe the deleterious effects of a measure, the more important the objective must be if the measure is to be reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. [Emphasis added.]

The objective of protecting the foetus would not justify, in my view, the severity of the breach of pregnant women's right to security which would result if the exculpatory provision was completely removed from the Criminal Code.

The gist of s. 251(4) is, as I have said, that the objective of protecting the foetus is not of sufficient importance to defeat the interest in protecting pregnant women from pregnancies which represent a danger to life or health. I take this parliamentary enactment in 1969 as an indication that, in a free and democratic society, it would be unreasonable to limit the pregnant woman's right to security of the person by a rule prohibiting abortions in all circumstances when her life or health would or would likely be in danger. This decision of the Canadian Parliament to the effect that the life or health of the pregnant woman takes precedence over the state interest in the foetus is also reflected in legislation in other free and democratic societies.

la difficile question des circonstances dans lesquelles il y aurait proportionnalité entre les effets de l'art. 251, qui limitent le droit des femmes enceintes à la sécurité de leur personne, et la protection du fœtus en tant qu'objectif. J'estime devoir néanmoins commenter l'équilibre que le législateur a cherché à établir entre l'intérêt qu'il y a dans la protection du fœtus et celui qu'il y a dans la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte, en adoptant les modifications apportées au Code criminel en 1969.

Dans l'arrêt Oakes, précité, à la p. 140, le Juge en chef poursuit son explication de la troisième composante du critère de la proportionnalité dans les termes suivants:

> Même si un objectif est suffisamment important et même si on a satisfait aux deux premiers éléments du critère de proportionnalité, il se peut encore qu'en raison de la gravité de ses effets préjudiciables sur des particuliers ou sur des groupes, la mesure ne soit pas justifiée par les objectifs qu'elle est destinée à servir. Plus les effets préjudiciables d'une mesure sont graves, plus l'objectif doit être important pour que la mesure soit raisonnable et que sa justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique. [Je souligne.]

L'objectif consistant à protéger le fœtus ne justifierait pas, à mon avis, une atteinte au droit à la sécurité des femmes enceintes aussi grave que celle qui résulterait si la disposition disculpatoire était complètement supprimée du Code criminel.

Le paragraphe 251(4) porte essentiellement, comme je l'ai dit, que l'objectif de protection du fœtus n'est pas suffisamment important pour repousser l'intérêt qu'il y a à protéger les femmes enceintes contre des grossesses qui représentent un danger pour leur vie ou leur santé. Je considère que le texte adopté par le législateur en 1969 constitue une indication que, dans une société libre et démocratique, il serait déraisonnable de limiter le droit de la femme enceinte à la sécurité de sa personne par une règle interdisant les avortements dans toutes les circonstances lorsque sa vie ou sa santé serait ou serait probablement en danger. Cette décision du Parlement du Canada que la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte a préséance sur l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus trouve aussi son pendant dans les lois d'autres sociétés libres et démocratiques.

In Emerging Issues in Commonwealth Abortion Laws, 1982 (1983), passim, submitted as an exhibit at trial, Rebecca J. Cook and Bernard M. Dickens report that, on the basis of the law in force as of November 1, 1982, the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Australia Capital Territory, New South Wales, Northern Territory, Queensland, South Australia, and Victoria, among other Commonwealth jurisdictions, include risk to the pregnant woman's life, physical health and mental health as legal grounds for abortion. The Crown and the Attorney General of Canada, in their books of authorities, cited statutes from these and other jurisdictions which indicate that a danger to the life or health of the pregnant woman takes precedence over the state interest in the foetus: the United Kingdom, Abortion Act, 1967, 1967, c. 87, s. 1(1)(a); Australian Northern Territory, Criminal Law Consolidation Act and Ordinance, s. 79 A(3)(a); South Australia, Criminal Law Consolidation Act, 1935-1975, s. 82a(1)(a)(i); Federal Republic of Germany, Criminal Code, as amended by the Fifteenth Criminal Law Amendment Act (1976), s. 218a(1); Israel, Penal Law, 5737-1977 (as amended), art. 316(a)(4); New Zealand, Crimes Act 1961, as amended by the Crimes Amendment Act 1977 and the Crimes Amendment Act 1978, s. 187A(1)(a); and France, Code pénal, art. 317 and Code de la santé publique, art. 162-1 and 162-12. This substantiates the view that the legislative decision in Canada that the life or health of the woman takes precedence over the state interest in the foetus is in accordance with s. 1 of the Charter.

I note that the laws in some of these foreign jurisdictions, unlike s. 251 of the Criminal Code, require a higher standard of danger to health in the latter months of pregnancy, as opposed to the early months, for an abortion to be lawful. Would such a rule, if it was adopted in Canada, constitute a reasonable limit on the right to security of the person under s. 1 of the Charter? As I have said, given the actual wording of s. 251, pursuant to which the standard necessary for a lawful abortion does not vary according to the stage of pregnancy, Dans l'ouvrage intitulé Emerging Issues in Commonwealth Abortion Laws, 1982 (1983), passim, une pièce produite en première instance, Rebecca J. Cook et Bernard M. Dickens rapportent que, selon le droit en vigueur au 1er novembre 1982, le Royaume-Uni, la Nouvelle-Zélande et le Territoire de la capitale de l'Australie, la Nouvelle-Galles du Sud, le Territoire du Nord, le Queensland, l'Australie-Méridionale et Victoria, parmi d'autres ressorts du Commonwealth, incluent le risque pour la vie ou la santé physique et mentale de la femme enceinte comme motifs légaux d'avortement. Le ministère public et le procureur général du Canada, dans leurs dossiers de sources législative, jurisprudentielle et doctrinale, citent des lois de ces ressorts notamment, qui indiquent qu'un danger pour la vie ou la santé de la femme enceinte l'emporte sur l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus: Royaume-Uni, Abortion Act, 1967, 1967, chap. 87, al. 1(1)a); Territoire du Nord de l'Australie, Criminal Law Consolidation Act and Ordinance, al. 79 A(3)a); Australie-Méridionale, Criminal Law Consolidation Act, 1935-1975, sous-al. 82a(1)a)(i); République fédérale de l'Allemagne, Criminal Code, modifié par la Fifteenth Criminal Law Amendment Act (1976), al. 218a(1); Israël, Penal Law, 5737-1977 (modifiée), al. 316*a*)(4); Nouvelle-Zélande, Crimes Act 1961, modifiée par la Crimes Amendment Act 1977 et la Crimes Amendment Act 1978, al. 187A(1)a) et France, Code pénal, art. 317 et Code de la santé publique, art. 162-1 et 162-12. Cela corrobore le point de vue selon lequel la décision du législateur canadien que la vie ou la santé de la femme a préséance sur l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans la protection du fœtus est conforme à l'article premier de la Charte.

Je souligne que les lois de certains de ces ressorts étrangers exigent, à la différence de l'art. 251 du Code criminel, que la santé soit plus gravement menacée dans les derniers mois de la grossesse que dans les premiers pour que l'avortement soit légal. Si une telle règle était adoptée au Canada, constituerait-elle une limite raisonnable du droit à la sécurité de la personne au sens de l'article premier de la Charte? Comme je l'ai dit, vu le texte actuel de l'art. 251 selon lequel le critère requis pour qu'un avortement soit licite ne varie pas selon le this Court is not required to consider this question under s. 1 of the Charter. It is possible that a future enactment by Parliament along the lines of the laws adopted in these jurisdictions could achieve a proportionality which is acceptable under s. 1. As I have stated, however, I am of the view that the objective of protecting the foetus would not justify the complete removal of the exculpatory provisions from the Criminal Code.

Finally, I wish to stress that we have not been asked to decide nor is it necessary, given my own conclusion that s. 251 contains rules unnecessary to the protection of the foetus, to decide whether a foetus is included in the word "everyone" in s. 7 so as to have a right to "life, liberty and security of the person" under the Charter.

VI — Other Grounds for Appeal

Counsel for the appellants raised several other grounds for appeal before this Court. The argument concerning the alleged invalidity of s. 605(1)(a) of the Criminal Code is the only Charter argument, apart from that pertaining to s. 7, which must be addressed. If the Crown had no right of appeal, the appellants would necessarily succeed on this sole ground as this Court would be required to quash the decision of the Court of Appeal. Although, as a result of my answers to the first and second constitutional questions, I am not required to respond to the other arguments to dispose of this appeal, I believe that it is appropriate to answer the non-Charter issues.

Section 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867

I agree with McIntyre J. and the Court of Appeal that there is no merit in the argument that s. 251 is ultra vires of Parliament. In Morgentaler (1975), supra, this Court unanimously held that s. 251 is not colourable provincial legislation in relation to health but that it constitutes a proper exercise of Parliament's criminal law power pursuant to s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. I agree. Indeed, as I have decided, s. 251 cannot be said to be simply a mechanism designed to protect stade de la grossesse, cette Cour n'est pas obligée d'examiner cette question aux termes de l'article premier de la Charte. Il est possible que le législateur puisse adopter à l'avenir une modification dans la veine des lois adoptées par ces ressorts qui créerait une proportionnalité acceptable aux termes de l'article premier. Toutefois, comme je l'ai dit, je suis d'avis que l'objectif de la protection du fœtus ne justifierait pas l'exclusion totale des dispositions disculpatoires du Code criminel.

Enfin, je tiens à souligner qu'on ne nous a pas demandé, pas plus qu'il n'est nécessaire de le faire, étant donné ma propre conclusion que l'art. 251 comporte des règles qui ne sont pas nécessaires pour la protection du fœtus, de décider si ce dernier est inclus dans le terme «chacun» de l'art. 7, de manière à être titulaire du droit «à la vie, à la liberté et la sécurité de sa personne» au sens de la Charte.

VI – Les autres moyens d'appel

L'avocat des appelants a soulevé plusieurs autres moyens d'appel devant nous. Le seul autre argument relatif à la Charte, à part celui concernant l'art. 7, que l'on doive examiner est celui qui a trait à l'invalidité de l'al. 605(1)a) du Code criminel. Si le ministère public n'avait aucun droit d'appel, les appelants auraient nécessairement gain de cause pour ce seul motif et nous serions tenus de casser la décision de la Cour d'appel. Quoique je ne sois pas obligé de répondre aux autres arguments pour trancher ce pourvoi vu mes réponses à la première et à la deuxième questions constitutionnelles, je crois qu'il est justifié de résoudre les questions qui ne mettent pas la Charte en cause.

Le paragraphe 91(27) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867

Comme le juge McIntyre et la Cour d'appel, je suis d'avis que l'allégation que l'art. 251 excède les pouvoirs du Parlement n'est pas fondée. Dans l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975), précité, cette Cour a décidé à l'unanimité que l'art. 251 n'était pas un texte législatif provincial déguisé relatif à la santé, mais qu'il constituait un exercice valide du pouvoir du Parlement en matière de droit criminel conformément au par. 91(27) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867. Je suis d'accord. De fait, comme je the life or health of the pregnant woman. While this ancillary objective explains, in part, certain of the requirements of the exculpatory provision in s. 251(4), it does not represent the principal objective of s. 251 as a whole, which is to protect the state interest in the foetus. Parliament established the indictable offence of procuring a miscarriage, defined in s. 251(1) and s. 251(2), pursuant to this primary objective. I consider this a valid exercise of the criminal law power.

Section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867

I agree with McIntyre J. that s. 251 does not give judicial powers to therapeutic abortion committees which were exercised by county, district and superior courts at the time of Confederation. As I have observed, in s. 251(4) Parliament has only given the committee the authority to make a medical determination regarding the pregnant woman's life or health. The panel of doctors exercises medical judgment on a medical question and performs no s. 96 judicial function. There is no merit in this argument.

Unlawful Delegation and Abdication of the Criminal Law Power

For the reasons given by McIntyre J., I agree that s. 251 does not constitute an unlawful delegation of federal legislative power nor does it represent an abdication of the criminal law power by Parliament.

Section 605(1)(a) of the Criminal Code

For the reasons given by McIntyre J., I agree that there is no merit in this argument.

Section 610(3) of the Criminal Code

Counsel for the appellants argued that s. 610(3) of the Criminal Code, which prohibits the awarding of costs in appeals involving indictable offences, violates ss. 7, 11(d), (f), (h) and 15 of the Charter. He also argued that this Court had the power to award costs on appeals under s. 24(1) of the Charter. It is unnecessary to decide whether or l'ai décidé, on ne peut pas considérer l'art. 251 comme étant simplement un mécanisme visant la protection de la vie ou de la santé d'une femme enceinte. Quoique l'objectif secondaire explique en partie certaines des exigences de la disposition disculpatoire du par. 251(4), ce n'est pas l'objectif principal de l'art. 251 pris dans son ensemble, qui vise à protéger l'intérêt qu'a l'État dans le fœtus. Le Parlement a créé l'infraction criminelle de procurer un avortement comme le définissent les par. 251(1) et (2), conformément à cet objectif premier. Je considère qu'il s'agit d'un exercice valide du pouvoir en matière de droit criminel.

L'article 96 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867

Comme le juge McIntyre, je suis d'avis que l'art. 251 ne donne pas aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique les pouvoirs judiciaires que les cours de comté, de district et supérieures exerçaient au moment de la Confédération. Comme je l'ai souligné, à l'art. 251(4), le Parlement a seulement donné au comité le pouvoir de prendre une décision médicale relativement à la vie ou à la santé de la femme enceinte. Les médecins portent un jugement médical sur une question médicale et n'exercent aucune fonction judiciaire au sens de l'art. 96. Cet argument est mal fondé.

Délégation illégale du pouvoir en matière de droit criminel ou renonciation à ce pouvoir

Pour les motifs donnés par le juge McIntyre, je suis d'avis que l'art. 251 ne constitue pas une délégation illégale d'un pouvoir législatif fédéral et ne représente pas non plus une renonciation du Parlement au pouvoir en matière de droit criminel.

L'alinéa 605(1)a) du Code criminel

Pour les motifs exposés par le juge McIntyre, je suis d'avis que cet argument est mal fondé.

Le paragraphe 610(3) du Code criminel

L'avocat des appelants a soutenu que le par. 610(3) du Code criminel, qui interdit d'accorder des frais lors d'un appel relatif à un acte criminel, va à l'encontre de l'art. 7, des al. 11*d*), f), h) et de l'art. 15 de la Charte. Il a aussi allégué que cette Cour dispose du pouvoir d'accorder, lors d'un pourvoi, des frais en vertu du par. 24(1) de la not s. 610(3) of the Criminal Code violates a Charter right. I agree with the Court of Appeal that, whatever this Court's power to award costs in appeals such as this one, costs should not be awarded in this case.

With regard to defence counsel's address to the jury at trial, I associate myself completely with the comments made by the Chief Justice. In his address, Mr. Manning wrongly chose not to respect the very distinct roles the trial judge and the jury play in our system of criminal justice. In Mezzo v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 802, at p. 836, McIntyre J., in a different context, stated:

> No authority need be cited for the proposition that in a jury trial all questions of law are for the judge alone and, of equal importance, all questions of fact are for the jury alone. The distinction is of fundamental importance. It should be preserved so long as it is considered right to continue the use of the jury in criminal law.

The defence submission was, as the Court of Appeal stated, "a direct attack on the role and authority of the trial judge and a serious misstatement to the jury as to its duty and right in carrying out its oath" (supra, at p. 434). I am of the view that these strongly-stated observations are required for the benefit of counsel who in other proceedings may be tempted to follow this unacceptable practice.

Conclusion

The constitutional questions should be answered as follows:

1. Question:

> Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2(a), 7, 12, 15, 27 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Charte. Il n'est pas nécessaire de déterminer si le par. 610(3) du Code criminel viole un droit conféré par la Charte. J'estime, tout comme la Cour d'appel, que quel que soit le pouvoir de cette Cour d'accorder des dépens dans des pourvois comme celui-ci, aucuns dépens ne devraient être accordés en l'espèce.

Pour ce qui est de la plaidoirie que l'avocat de la défense a adressée au jury en première instance, je partage totalement l'avis du Juge en chef. Dans sa plaidoirie, Me Manning a choisi à tort de ne pas respecter les rôles très distincts que jouent le juge du procès et le jury dans notre système de justice criminelle. Dans l'arrêt Mezzo c. La Reine, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 802, à la p. 836, le juge McIntyre a dit, dans un autre contexte:

> Aucun précédent n'a à être cité pour justifier la proposition selon laquelle, dans un procès par jury, toutes les questions de droit relèvent exclusivement du juge et que, ce qui est tout aussi important, toutes les questions de fait relèvent exclusivement du jury. Cette distinction est d'une importance fondamentale. Elle doit être maintenue tant qu'on jugera bon de continuer d'avoir recours au jury en droit criminel.

La plaidoirie de la défense était, comme l'a dit la Cour d'appel, [TRADUCTION] «une attaque directe du rôle et du pouvoir du juge du procès et une déclaration sérieusement erronée quant aux obligations et aux droits du juré dans l'exécution de son engagement sous serment» (précité, à la p. 434). J'estime que ces observations fermes sont nécessaires pour la gouverne des avocats qui, dans d'autres affaires, peuvent être tentés de suivre cette pratique inacceptable.

Conclusion

Les questions constitutionnelles doivent recevoir les réponses suivantes:

1. Question:

> L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada porte-t-il atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7, 12, 15, 27 et 28 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Answer:

The first constitutional question is answered in the affirmative in respect of the right of a pregnant woman to "security of the person" in s. 7 of the Charter.

2. Question:

If section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada infringes or denies the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2(a), 7, 12, 15, 27 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is s. 251 justified by s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?

Answer:

In respect of the violation of the right of a pregnant woman to "security of the person" in s. 7 caused by s. 251 of the Criminal Code, s. 251 is not justified by s. 1 of the Charter.

3. Question:

Is section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada ultra vires the Parliament of Canada?

Answer:

No, in the sense that s. 251 is within the proper jurisdiction of Parliament on the basis of s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

4. Question:

Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada violate s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867?

Answer:

No.

5. Question:

Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada unlawfully delegate federal criminal power to provincial Ministers of Health or Therapeutic Abortion Committees, and in doing so, has the Federal Government abdicated its authority in this area?

Answer:

No.

Réponse:

La première question constitutionnelle doit recevoir une réponse affirmative en ce qui concerne le droit d'une femme enceinte à la «sécurité de sa personne» prévu par l'art. 7 de la Charte.

2. Question:

Si l'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada porte atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7, 12, 15, 27 et 28 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, est-il justifié par l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et donc compatible avec la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982?

Réponse:

En ce qui concerne la violation du droit d'une femme enceinte à la «sécurité de sa personne» prévu à l'art. 7 que cause l'art. 251 du Code criminel, l'art. 251 n'est pas justifié par l'article premier de la Charte.

3. Question:

L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada excède-t-il les pouvoirs du Parlement du Canada?

Réponse:

Non, en ce que l'art. 251 est un exercice valide du pouvoir du Parlement en vertu du par. 91(27) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867.

4. Question:

L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada viole-t-il l'art. 96 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867?

Réponse:

Non.

5. Question:

L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada délègue-t-il illégalement la compétence fédérale en matière criminelle aux ministres de la Santé provinciaux ou aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique et, ce faisant, le gouvernement fédéral a-t-il abdiqué son autorité dans ce domaine?

Réponse:

Non.

6. Question:

Do sections 605 and 610(3) of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 7, 11(d), 11(f), 11(h) and 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Answer:

With respect to s. 605, the answer is no. Whether or not s. 610(3) of the Criminal Code violates a Charter right, I agree with the Court of Appeal that, whatever this Court's power to award costs in appeals such as this one, costs should not be awarded in this case.

7. Question:

If sections 605 and 610(3) of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 7, 11(d), 11(f), 11(h) and 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, are ss. 605 and 610(3) justified by s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?

Answer:

Given the answer to question 6, this question does not call for an answer.

On the basis of my answers to the first two constitutional questions, I would allow the appeal.

The reasons of McIntyre and La Forest JJ. were delivered by

MCINTYRE J. (dissenting)—I have read the reasons for judgment prepared by my colleagues, the Chief Justice and Justices Beetz and Wilson. I agree that the principal issue which arises is whether s. 251 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, contravenes s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I will make some comments later on other issues put forward by the appellants. The Chief Justice has set out the constitutional questions and the relevant statutory provisions, as well as the facts and procedural history. He has considered the scope of s. 7 of the Charter and, having found that it has been offended, he would allow the appeal. I am unable to

6. Question:

L'article 605 et le par. 610(3) du Code criminel du Canada portent-ils atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'art. 7, les al. 11*d*), 11*f*), 11*h*) et le par. 24(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Réponse:

En ce qui concerne l'art. 605, la réponse est non. Indépendamment de savoir si le par. 610(3) du Code criminel viole un droit conféré par la Charte, j'estime, tout comme la Cour d'appel, que quel que soit le pouvoir de cette Cour d'accorder des dépens dans des pourvois comme celui-ci, aucuns dépens ne devrait être accordé en l'espèce.

7. Question:

Si l'article 605 et le par. 610(3) du Code criminel du Canada portent atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'art. 7, les al. 11*d*), 11*f*), 11*h*) et le par. 24(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, sont-ils justifiés par l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et donc compatibles avec la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982?

Réponse:

Vu la réponse à la question 6, aucune réponse n'a à être donnée à cette question-ci.

Compte tenu de mes réponses aux deux premières questions constitutionnelles, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi.

Version française des motifs des juges McIntyre et La Forest rendus par

LE JUGE MCINTYRE (dissident)—J'ai lu les motifs de jugement rédigés par mes collègues le Juge en chef et les juges Beetz et Wilson. Je suis d'accord pour dire que la question principale qui se pose est de savoir si l'art. 251 du Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, chap. C-34, viole l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. Pour ce qui est de certaines autres questions soulevées par les appelants, j'y viendrai plus loin. Le Juge en chef a énoncé les questions constitutionnelles ainsi que les dispositions législatives pertinentes et il a présenté un exposé des faits et des procédures. Il a examiné la portée de l'art. 7 de la Charte et, après avoir conclu qu'il avait été enfreint, il s'est dit d'avis agree with his reasons or his disposition of the appeal. I find myself in broad general agreement with the reasons of the Court of Appeal, and I would dismiss the appeal on that basis and for reasons that I will endeavour to set forth.

Section 251 of the Criminal Code

I would say at the outset that it may be thought that this case does not raise the Charter issues which were argued and which have been addressed in the reasons of my colleagues. The charge here is one of conspiracy to breach the provisions of s. 251 of the Criminal Code. There is no doubt, and it has never been questioned, that the appellants adopted a course which was clearly in defiance of the provisions of the Code and it is difficult to see where any infringement of their rights, under s. 7 of the Charter, could have occurred. There is no female person involved in the case who has been denied a therapeutic abortion and, as a result, the whole argument on the right to security of the person, under s. 7 of the Charter, has been on a hypothetical basis. The case, however, was addressed by all the parties on that basis and the Court has accepted that position.

Section 251(1) and (2) of the Criminal Code make it an indictable offence for a person to use any means to procure the miscarriage of a female person and prescribe on conviction a maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment, in the case of the woman herself, and a maximum sentence of life imprisonment in the case of another person. Parliament has decreed that procuring a non-therapeutic abortion is a crime deserving of severe punishment. Subsection (4) provides that subss. (1) and (2) shall not apply where an abortion is performed in accordance with paras. (a), (b), (c) and (d) of subs. (4). These paragraphs provide that a qualified medical practitioner may perform an abortion, and a pregnant woman may permit an abortion, in an accredited or an approved hospital where the therapeutic abortion committee for the hospital (defined in subs. (6)) has given its certificate in writing, stating that in its opinion the continuation of the woman's pregnancy would or d'accueillir le pourvoi. Pour ma part, je ne puis accepter ni ses motifs ni sa façon de trancher le pourvoi. Je souscris d'une manière générale aux motifs de la Cour d'appel et, pour cette raison et pour d'autres que j'essayerai d'exposer, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

L'article 251 du Code criminel

Je dirais au départ qu'on pourrait penser que le présent pourvoi ne soulève pas les questions liées à la Charte sur lesquelles ont porté les débats et que mes collègues ont traitées dans leurs motifs de jugement. Il s'agit, en l'espèce, d'une accusation de complot en vue d'enfreindre les dispositions de l'art. 251 du Code criminel. Il ne fait pas de doute et on n'a jamais nié que les appelants ont adopté une ligne de conduite qui allait nettement à l'encontre des dispositions du Code, et on voit mal en quoi ils ont pu subir une atteinte aux droits dont ils jouissent en vertu de l'art. 7 de la Charte. Il n'est nullement question ici d'une personne du sexe féminin qui s'est vu refuser l'avortement thérapeutique et, par conséquent, toute l'argumentation relative au droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte repose sur une hypothèse. C'est toutefois sur ce fondement que toutes les parties ont plaidé et la Cour a accepté cette façon de procéder.

Les paragraphes 251(1) et (2) du Code criminel disposent que quiconque emploie quelque moyen pour procurer l'avortement d'une personne du sexe féminin se rend coupable d'un acte criminel et prescrivent sur déclaration de culpabilité une peine maximale de deux ans d'emprisonnement dans le cas de la femme elle-même et une peine maximale d'emprisonnement à perpétuité dans le cas de toute autre personne. Le Parlement a décrété que pratiquer un avortement non thérapeutique constitue un crime qui mérite d'être puni sévèrement. Aux termes du par. (4), les par. (1) et (2) ne s'appliquent pas lorsqu'un avortement est pratiqué en conformité avec les al. (4)a), b), c) et d). Suivant ces alinéas, un médecin qualifié peut pratiquer un avortement, et une femme enceinte peut permettre qu'on la fasse avorter, dans un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé dont le comité de l'avortement thérapeutique (expression définie au par. (6)) a délivré un certificat attestant qu'à son avis la continuation de would be likely to endanger her life or health. The certificate may be given to a qualified medical practitioner only after the committee, by a majority of its members and at a meeting where the woman's case has been reviewed, has authorized the giving of the certificate. Subsection (5) empowers the Minister of Health of a province to require a therapeutic abortion committee to furnish copies of certificates issued by the committee and such other information relating to the issuing of the certificate as he may require, and gives the Minister power to require similar information from a medical practitioner who has procured an abortion. Subsection (6) is the definitional section. It is clear from the foregoing that abortion is prohibited and that subs. (4) provides relieving provisions allowing an abortion in certain limited circumstances. It cannot be said that s. 251 of the Criminal Code confers any general right to have or to procure an abortion. On the contrary, the provision is aimed at protecting the interests of the unborn child and only lifts the criminal sanction where an abortion is necessary to protect the life or health of the mother.

la grossesse de cette personne du sexe féminin mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de cette dernière. Ce certificat ne peut être remis à un médecin qualifié qu'une fois que le comité, par décision de la majorité de ses membres et lors d'une réunion au cours de laquelle le cas de la femme a été examiné, a autorisé la délivrance du certificat. Le paragraphe (5) habilite le ministre de la Santé d'une province à requérir un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de lui fournir des copies des certificats délivrés par le comité ainsi que les autres renseignements qu'il peut exiger relativement à la délivrance du certificat. Le même paragraphe investit ce ministre du pouvoir d'exiger que le médecin qui a pratiqué un avortement lui fournisse des renseignements similaires. Le paragraphe (6) est consacré à des définitions. Or, il ressort clairement de ce qui précède que l'avortement est interdit, mais que le par. (4) prévoit des exceptions en vertu desquelles l'avortement est permis dans certaines circonstances limitées. On ne saurait affirmer que l'art. 251 du Code criminel confère un droit général de subir ou de procurer un avortement. Au contraire, la disposition vise à protéger les intérêts de l'enfant qui n'est pas encore né et ne lève la sanction criminelle que si l'avortement s'impose pour protéger la vie ou la santé de la mère.

In considering the constitutionality of s. 251 of the Criminal Code, it is first necessary to understand the background of this litigation and some of the problems which it raises. Section 251 of the Code has been denounced as ill-conceived and inadequate by those at one extreme of the abortion debate and as immoral and unacceptable by those at the opposite extreme. There are those, like the appellants, who assert that on moral and ethical grounds there is a simple solution to the problem: the inherent "right of women to control their own bodies" requires the repeal of s. 251 in favour of the principle of "abortion on demand". Opposing this view are those who contend with equal vigour, and also on moral and ethical grounds, for a clear and simple solution: the inherent "right to life of the unborn child" requires the repeal of s. 251(4), (5), (6) and (7) in order to leave an absolute ban on abortions. The battle lines so drawn are firmly held and the attitudes of the opposing parties

En examinant la question de la constitutionnalité de l'art. 251 du Code criminel, il est d'abord nécessaire de saisir le contexte dans lequel le présent litige a pris naissance ainsi que quelques-uns des problèmes qu'il pose. L'article 251 du Code a été taxé de mal conçu et d'insuffisant par certains dans le débat sur l'avortement, alors que d'autres, qui se situent à l'extrême opposé, l'ont qualifié d'immoral et d'inacceptable. D'aucuns, comme c'est le cas des appelants, prétendent en invoquant la morale et l'éthique qu'il y a une solution simple au problème: «le droit des femmes d'être maîtresse de leur propre corps» commande l'abrogation de l'art. 251 en faveur du principe de «l'avortement libre». S'opposent à cette thèse ceux qui affirment, tout aussi énergiquement et également pour des raisons d'ordre moral et d'éthique, que la solution est claire et simple: «le droit à la vie qu'a l'enfant qui n'est pas encore né» exige l'abrogation des par. 251(4), (5), (6) et (7) de sorte que l'avortement admit of no compromise. From the submission of the Attorney General of Canada (set out in his factum at paragraph 6), however, it may appear that a majority in Canada do not see the issue in such black and white terms. Paragraph 6 is in these words:

The evidence of opinion surveys indicates that there is a surprising consistency over the years and in different survey groups in the spectrum of opinions on the issue of abortion. Roughly 21 to 23% of people at one end of the spectrum are of the view, on the one hand, that abortion is a matter solely for the decision of the pregnant woman and that any legislation on this subject is an unwarranted interference with a woman's right to deal with her own body, while about 19 to 20% are of the view, on the other hand, that destruction of the living fetus is the killing of human life and tantamount to murder. The remainder of the population (about 60%) are of the view that abortion should be prohibited in some circumstances.

Parliament has heeded neither extreme. Instead, an attempt has been made to balance the competing interests of the unborn child and the pregnant woman. Where the provisions of s. 251(4) are met, the abortion may be performed without legal sanction. Where they are not, abortion is deemed to be socially undesirable and is punished as a crime. In Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616 [hereinafter Morgentaler (1975)], Laskin C.J. said (in dissent, but not on this point), at p. 627:

What is patent on the face of the prohibitory portion of s. 251 is that Parliament has in its judgment decreed that interference by another, or even by the pregnant woman herself, with the ordinary course of conception is socially undesirable conduct subject to punishment. That was a judgment open to Parliament in the exercise of its plenary criminal law power, and the fact that there may be safe ways of terminating a pregnancy or that any woman or women claim a personal privilege to that end, becomes immaterial. I need cite no authority for the proposition that Parliament may determine what is not criminal as well as what is, and may hence introduce dispensations or exemptions in its criminal legislation.

soit frappé d'une interdiction totale. De chaque côté, on maintient fermement sa position et on n'admet aucun compromis. Cependant, l'argument avancé par le procureur général du Canada (au paragraphe 6 de son mémoire) peut porter à croire que la majorité des Canadiens ne considèrent pas que la question est aussi claire et nette. Le paragraphe 6 est ainsi conçu:

[TRADUCTION] Les sondages d'opinion révèlent qu'il y a eu au cours des années et pour les différents groupes cibles une constance surprenante dans la gamme des opinions exprimées sur la question de l'avortement. D'une part, environ 21 % à 23 % des gens estiment qu'il appartient uniquement à la femme enceinte de décider si elle se fera avorter et que toute loi dans ce domaine représente une atteinte injustifiée au droit de la femme de disposer, comme elle l'entend, de son propre corps, alors que, d'autre part, à peu près 19 % à 20 % jugent que détruire un fœtus vivant c'est enlever la vie à un être humain et ainsi commettre un meurtre. Le reste de la population (environ 60 %) est d'avis que l'avortement devrait être interdit dans certaines circonstances.

Le législateur n'a retenu ni l'un ni l'autre de ces points de vue extrêmes. Il a plutôt tenté d'équilibrer les intérêts de l'enfant qui n'est pas encore né et ceux opposés de la femme enceinte. Du moment que sont respectées les dispositions du par. 251(4), l'avortement peut être accompli sans que cela n'entraîne de sanction légale. Dans l'hypothèse contraire, l'avortement est considéré comme un acte socialement répréhensible, réprimé comme un crime. Dans l'arrêt Morgentaler c. La Reine, [1976] 1 R.C.S. 616, [ci-après l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975)] le juge en chef Laskin (dissident, mais non sur ce point) affirme, à la p. 627:

Ce qui est évident à la lecture de la partie de l'art. 251 qui porte interdiction, c'est que le Parlement, exerçant son jugement, a décrété que l'intervention d'une autre personne, voire de la mère elle-même, dans le cours ordinaire de la conception constitue une conduite socialement indésirable et passible de sanctions. C'est là un jugement que le Parlement pouvait porter dans l'exercice de son pouvoir législatif plénier en matière criminelle, et le fait qu'il puisse exister des moyens sûrs d'interrompre une grossesse ou qu'une ou plusieurs femmes prétendent à un droit individuel de poser ce geste, n'est aucunement pertinent. Je n'ai pas besoin de citer de précédents pour affirmer que le Parlement peut déterminer ce qui n'est pas criminel aussi bien que ce qui l'est, et qu'il peut par conséquent introduire dans ses lois pénales des dispenses ou des immunités.

Parliament's view that abortion is, in its nature, "socially undesirable conduct" is not new. Parliament's policy, as expressed by s. 251 of the Code, is consistent with that which has governed Canadian criminal law since Confederation and before: see Dickson J. (as he then was) in Morgentaler (1975), supra, at p. 672, and the reasons of the Ontario Court of Appeal in this case: (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 353, at pp. 364-66. It is against this background that I turn to the question of judicial review in light of the Charter.

L'opinion du législateur portant que l'avortement constitue, de par sa nature même, une «conduite socialement indésirable» ou répréhensible n'a rien de nouveau. La politique du législateur, énoncée à l'art. 251 du Code, concorde avec celle qui a régi le droit criminel canadien depuis la Confédération et même avant: voir les motifs du juge Dickson (alors juge puîné) dans l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975), précité, à la p. 672, ainsi que ceux de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario dans la présente affaire, (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 353, aux pp. 364 à 366. C'est dans ce contexte que j'aborde la question du contrôle judiciaire en fonction de la Charte.

Scope of Judicial Review under the Charter

Before the adoption of the Charter, there was little question of the limits of judicial review of the criminal law. For all practical purposes it was limited to a determination of whether the impugned enactment dealt with a subject which could fall within the criminal law power in s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. There was no doubt of the power of Parliament to say what was and what was not criminal and to prohibit criminal conduct with penal sanctions, although from 1960 onwards legislation was subject to review under the Canadian Bill of Rights: see Morgentaler (1975), supra. The adoption of the Charter brought a significant change. The power of judicial review of legislation acquired greater scope but, in my view, that scope is not unlimited and should be carefully confined to that which is ordained by the Charter. I am well aware that there will be disagreement about what was ordained by the Charter and, of course, a measure of interpretation of the Charter will be required in order to give substance and reality to its provisions. But the courts must not, in the guise of interpretation, postulate rights and freedoms which do not have a firm and a reasonably identifiable base in the Charter. In his reasons, the Chief Justice refers to the problem. He says, at pp. 45-46:

Portée du contrôle judiciaire fondé sur la Charte

Avant l'adoption de la Charte, il n'était guère question des limites du contrôle judiciaire du droit criminel. À toutes fins pratiques, ce contrôle consistait uniquement à déterminer si le texte attaqué portait sur un sujet pouvant relever de la compétence en matière de droit criminel que conférait le par. 91(27) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867. Personne ne doutait que le Parlement était autorisé à décider ce qui constituait et ce qui ne constituait pas une conduite criminelle et à réprimer cette conduite au moyen de sanctions pénales, quoique, à partir de 1960, toute loi pouvait faire l'objet d'un contrôle en vertu de la Déclaration canadienne des droits: voir l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975), précité. Or, un changement important a résulté de l'adoption de la Charte. Le pouvoir d'exercer un contrôle judiciaire sur des mesures législatives a pris de l'envergure mais, à mon avis, sa portée n'en demeure pas moins restreinte et elle devrait soigneusement être limitée à celle prescrite par la Charte. Je sais très bien qu'on ne s'entendra pas sur ce que prescrit la Charte et il va sans dire qu'il faudra une certaine mesure d'interprétation pour conférer substance et réalité à ses dispositions. Les tribunaux ne doivent pas cependant, sous prétexte d'interpréter, supposer l'existence de droits et de libertés qui ne reposent pas de manière solide et raisonnablement identifiable sur la Charte. Le Juge en chef évoque ce problème dans ses motifs de jugement, où il dit, aux pp. 45 et 46:

During argument before this Court, counsel for the Crown emphasized repeatedly that it is not the role of the judiciary in Canada to evaluate the wisdom of legislation enacted by our democratically elected representatives, or to second-guess difficult policy choices that confront all governments. In Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616, at p. 671, (hereinafter "Morgentaler (1975)") I stressed that the Court had "not been called upon to decide, or even to enter, the loud and continuous public debate on abortion." Eleven years later, the controversy persists, and it remains true that this Court cannot presume to resolve all of the competing claims advanced in vigorous and healthy public debate. Courts and legislators in other democratic societies have reached completely contradictory decisions when asked to weigh the competing values relevant to the abortion question. See, e.g., Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Paton v. United Kingdom (1980), 3 E.H.R.R. (European Court of Human Rights); The Abortion Decision of the Federal Constitutional Court — First Senate — of the Federal Republic of Germany, February 25, 1975, translated and reprinted in (1976), 9 John Marshall J. Prac. and Proc. 605; and the Abortion Act, 1967, 1967, c. 87 (U.K.)

But since 1975, and the first Morgentaler decision, the Court has been given added responsibilities. I stated in Morgentaler (1975), at p. 671, that:

> The values we must accept for the purposes of this appeal are those expressed by Parliament which holds the view that the desire of a woman to be relieved of her pregnancy is not, of itself, justification for performing an abortion.

Although no doubt it is still fair to say that courts are not the appropriate forum for articulating complex and controversial programmes of public policy, Canadian courts are now charged with the crucial obligation of ensuring that the legislative initiatives pursued by our Parliament and legislatures conform to the democratic values expressed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms .... It is in this latter sense that the current Morgentaler appeal differs from the one we heard a decade ago.

While I differ with the Chief Justice in the disposition of this appeal, I would accept his words, referred to above, which describe the role of the Court, but I would suggest that in "ensuring that the legislative initiatives pursued by our Parliament and legislatures conform to the democratic values expressed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" the courts must confine luer la sagesse des lois édictées par nos députés élus démocratiquement, ni de réinterpréter les choix difficiles de politique auxquels tous les gouvernements sont confrontés. Dans l'arrêt Morgentaler c. La Reine, [1976] 1 R.C.S. 616, à la p. 671, (ci-après l'arrêt «Morgentaler (1975)») j'ai souligné que la Cour «n'est pas appelée à trancher, ni même à aborder, le débat public animé et constant sur l'avortement». Onze ans plus tard, la controverse fait toujours rage et il est tout aussi vrai que la Cour ne saurait prétendre concilier toutes les allégations contradictoires avancées dans le vigoureux et sain débat public ainsi suscité. Tant les tribunaux que les législateurs, dans d'autres sociétés démocratiques, sont arrivés à des décisions entièrement contradictoires lorsqu'il leur a été demandé de soupeser les valeurs que la question de l'avortement oppose. Voir, p. ex., l'arrêt Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); l'arrêt Paton c. Royaume-Uni (1980), 3 E.H.R.R. (Cour européenne des droits de l'homme); The Abortion Decision of the Federal Constitutional Court — First Senate — of the Federal Republic of Germany, 25 février 1975, traduit en anglais et réédité dans (1976), 9 John Marshall J. Prac. and Proc. 605; et l'Abortion Act, 1967, 1967, chap. 87 (R.-U.)

Mais depuis 1975, et le premier arrêt Morgentaler, la Cour s'est vue confier des responsabilités additionnelles. Je disais dans l'arrêt Morgentaler (1975), à la p. 671:

> Les valeurs que nous devons accepter aux fins du pourvoi sont celles qu'a proclamées le Parlement, qui s'en tient à l'opinion que le désir d'une femme d'être soulagée de sa grossesse ne justifie pas en soi l'avortement.

Quoiqu'on puisse toujours sans aucun doute affirmer que les tribunaux ne sont pas le lieu où doivent s'élaborer les politiques générales complexes et controversées, les tribunaux canadiens se voient néanmoins confier aujourd'hui l'obligation cruciale de veiller à ce que les initiatives législatives de notre Parlement et de nos législatures se conforment aux valeurs démocratiques qu'exprime la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés [...] C'est en ce dernier sens que le présent pourvoi diffère de celui dont nous étions saisis voici une décennie.

Bien que je ne partage pas l'avis du Juge en chef quant à la façon de trancher le pourvoi, je souscris à ce qu'il affirme, dans le passage qui vient d'être cité, concernant le rôle de cette Cour. Je prétends cependant qu'en veillant «à ce que les initiatives législatives de notre Parlement et de nos législatures se conforment aux valeurs démocratiques qu'exprime la Charte canadienne des droits et themselves to such democratic values as are clearly found and expressed in the Charter and refrain from imposing or creating other values not so based.

It follows, then, in my view, that the task of the Court in this case is not to solve nor seek to solve what might be called the abortion issue, but simply to measure the content of s. 251 against the Charter. While this may appear to be self-evident, the distinction is of vital importance. If a particular interpretation enjoys no support, express or reasonably implied, from the Charter, then the Court is without power to clothe such an interpretation with constitutional status. It is not for the Court to substitute its own views on the merits of a given question for those of Parliament. The Court must consider not what is, in its view, the best solution to the problems posed; its role is confined to deciding whether the solution enacted by Parliament offends the Charter. If it does, the provision must be struck down or declared inoperative, and Parliament may then enact such different provisions as it may decide. I adopt the words of Holmes J., which were referred to in Ferguson v. Skrupka, 372 U.S. 726 (1963), at pp. 729-30:

There was a time when the Due Process Clause was used by this Court to strike down laws which were thought unreasonable, that is, unwise or incompatible with some particular economic or social philosophy. In this manner the Due Process Clause was used, for example, to nullify laws prescribing maximum hours for work in bakeries, Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), outlawing "yellow dog" contracts, Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1 (1915), setting minimum wages for women, Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923), and fixing the weight of loaves of bread, Jay Burns Baking Co. v. Bryan, 264 U.S. 504 (1924). This intrusion by the judiciary into the realm of legislative value judgments was strongly objected to at the time, particularly by Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Brandeis. Dissenting from the Court's invalidating a state statute which regulated the resale price of theatre and other tickets, Mr. Justice Holmes said:

libertés», les tribunaux doivent s'en tenir aux valeurs démocratiques qui sont clairement énoncées dans la Charte et s'abstenir d'imposer ou de créer d'autres valeurs qui ne s'y trouvent pas.

Il s'ensuit donc, selon moi, que notre tâche en l'espèce consiste non pas à résoudre ni à tenter de résoudre ce qu'on pourrait appeler la question de l'avortement, mais simplement à examiner le contenu de l'art. 251 en fonction de la Charte. Quoique cela puisse paraître évident en soi, la distinction revêt une importance capitale. Si une interprétation particulière n'est pas appuyée, expressément ou implicitement, par la Charte, la Cour est alors impuissante à prêter à cette interprétation un caractère constitutionnel. Il n'appartient nullement à la Cour de substituer ses propres opinions à celles du législateur concernant le bien-fondé d'une question donnée. La Cour ne doit pas considérer ce qu'elle estime être la meilleure solution aux problèmes posés; son rôle se limite à décider si la solution adoptée par le législateur va à l'encontre de la Charte. Si c'est le cas, la disposition en question doit être déclarée invalide ou inopérante et il est alors loisible au législateur d'adopter toute disposition différente qu'il pourra juger à propos. Je fais miens les propos du juge Holmes, mentionnés dans l'arrêt Ferguson v. Skrupka, 372 U.S. 726 (1963), aux pp. 729 et 730:

[TRADUCTION] Il fut un temps où cette Cour recourait à la clause de l'application régulière de la loi pour invalider des lois jugées déraisonnables, c'est-à-dire insensées ou incompatibles avec une certaine philosophie économique ou sociale. C'est ainsi qu'on s'est servi de cette clause notamment pour annuler des lois prescrivant le nombre maximal d'heures de travail dans les boulangeries, Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), interdisant les contrats de «jaune», Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1 (1915), établissant un salaire minimum pour les femmes, Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 525 (1923), et fixant le poids des pains, Jay Burns Baking Co. v. Bryan, 264 U.S. 504 (1924). Cette incursion par les tribunaux dans le domaine des jugements de valeur du législateur a suscité à l'époque une opposition vigoureuse, notamment de la part des juges Holmes et Brandeis. Bien que la Cour ait déclaré invalide une loi d'un État réglementant le prix de revente des billets de théâtre et d'autres billets, le juge Holmes, dissident, a dit:

"I think the proper course is to recognize that a state legislature can do whatever it sees fit to do unless it is restrained by some express prohibition in the Constitution of the United States or of the State, and that Courts should be careful not to extend such prohibitions beyond their obvious meaning by reading into them conceptions of public policy that the particular Court may happen to entertain".

And in an earlier case he had emphasized that, "The criterion of constitutionality is not whether we believe the law to be for the public good."

The doctrine that prevailed in Lochner, Coppage, Adkins, Burns, and like cases — that due process authorizes courts to hold laws unconstitutional when they believe the legislature has acted unwisely — has long since been discarded. We have returned to the original constitutional proposition that courts do not substitute their social and economic beliefs for the judgment of legislative bodies, who are elected to pass laws.

Holmes J. wrote in 1927, but his words have retained their force in American jurisprudence: see New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297 (1976), at p. 304, Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co., 449 U.S. 456 (1981), at p. 469, and Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489 (1982), at pp. 504-5. In my view, although written in the American context, the principle stated is equally applicable in Canada.

It is essential that this principle be maintained in a constitutional democracy. The Court must not resolve an issue such as that of abortion on the basis of how many judges may favour "pro-choice" or "pro-life". To do so would be contrary to sound principle and the rule of law affirmed in the preamble to the Charter which must mean that no discretion, including a judicial discretion, can be unlimited. But there is a problem, for the Court must clothe the general expression of rights and freedoms contained in the Charter with real substance and vitality. How can the courts go about this task without imposing at least some of their views and predilections upon the law? This question has been the subject of much discussion and comment. Many theories have been postulated but

Dans un arrêt antérieur, il avait souligné que «Le critère de la constitutionnalité ne consiste pas à nous demander si nous estimons que la loi en question est pour le bien public».

Voilà maintenant longtemps que n'a plus cours le principe retenu dans les décisions Lochner, Coppage, Adkins, Burns, etc., savoir qu'en vertu de l'application régulière de la loi, les tribunaux peuvent déclarer des lois inconstitutionnelles lorsqu'ils estiment que le législateur a agi de façon insensée. On est en effet revenu à la vieille proposition constitutionnelle portant que les tribunaux ne doivent pas substituer leurs convictions en matière sociale et économique au jugement des corps législatifs dont les membres sont élus pour légiférer.

Les propos du juge Holmes datent de 1927, mais ils n'ont pas perdu de leur force dans la jurisprudence américaine: voir New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297 (1976), à la p. 304; Minnesota v. Clover Leaf Creamery Co., 449 U.S. 456 (1981), à la p. 469; et Hoffman Estates v. The Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489 (1982), aux pp. 504 et 505. À mon avis, bien qu'il ait été établi dans le contexte américain, ce principe est tout aussi applicable au Canada.

Il est essentiel de maintenir ce principe dans une démocratie constitutionnelle. Il ne faut pas que la décision de la Cour sur une question comme celle de l'avortement soit fonction du nombre de juges qui peuvent faire partie du camp «prochoix» ou «provie», car cela irait à l'encontre de principes solides et de la primauté du droit dont parle le préambule de la Charte, ce qui doit donc signifier qu'aucun pouvoir discrétionnaire, pas même celui des tribunaux, n'est absolu. Il existe toutefois un problème en ce sens que la Cour doit conférer à l'énoncé général des droits et libertés que contient la Charte une substance et une vitalité véritables. Or, comment les tribunaux peuvent-ils s'acquitter de cette tâche sans assujettir la loi à au moins certaines de leurs opinions et préférences? C'est là few have had direct reference to the problem in the Canadian context. In my view, this Court has offered guidance in this matter. In such cases as Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, at pp. 155-56, and R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344, it has enjoined what has been termed a "purposive approach" in applying the Charter and its provisions. I take this to mean that the Courts should interpret the Charter in a manner calculated to give effect to its provisions, not to the idiosyncratic view of the judge who is writing. This approach marks out the limits of appropriate Charter adjudication. It confines the content of Charter guaranteed rights and freedoms to the purposes given expression in the Charter. Consequently, while the courts must continue to give a fair, large and liberal construction to the Charter provisions, this approach prevents the Court from abandoning its traditional adjudicatory function in order to formulate its own conclusions on questions of public policy, a step which this Court has said on numerous occasions it must not take. That Charter interpretation is to be purposive necessarily implies the converse: it is not to be "non-purposive". A court is not entitled to define a right in a manner unrelated to the interest which the right in question was meant to protect. I endeavoured to formulate an approach to the problem in Reference Re Public Service Employee Relations Act, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 313, in these words, at p. 394:

> It follows that while a liberal and not overly legalistic approach should be taken to constitutional interpretation, the Charter should not be regarded as an empty vessel to be filled with whatever meaning we might wish from time to time. The interpretation of the Charter, as of all constitutional documents, is constrained by the language, structure and history of the constitutional text, by constitutional tradition, and by the history, traditions, and underlying philosophies of our society.

une question qui a fait l'objet de beaucoup de discussion et de commentaires. Maintes théories ont été avancées, mais peu d'entre elles se rapportent directement au problème tel qu'il se pose dans le contexte canadien. Pour ma part, j'estime que la jurisprudence de cette Cour est instructive à cet égard. Dans des arrêts comme Hunter c. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 R.C.S. 145, aux pp. 155 et 156, et R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 R.C.S. 295, à la p. 344, la Cour a recommandé que, dans l'application de la Charte et de ses dispositions, soit adoptée ce qu'on a appelé une «méthode qui tient compte de l'objet visé». J'interprète cela comme signifiant que les tribunaux devraient interpréter la Charte de manière à mettre à exécution ses dispositions plutôt que le point de vue personnel du juge qui écrit. Cette façon de procéder établit des bornes que les tribunaux ne devraient pas dépasser lorsqu'ils se prononcent sur la Charte. Elle circonscrit le contenu des droits et libertés garantis par la Charte aux objets qui y sont formulés. Par conséquent, bien que les tribunaux doivent continuer à donner aux dispositions de la Charte une interprétation juste, large et libérale, cette méthode empêche la Cour d'abandonner son rôle décisionnel traditionnel pour formuler ses propres conclusions sur des questions de politique générale, ce qu'à maintes reprises la Cour a dit qu'elle devait éviter de faire. Affirmer que l'interprétation de la Charte doit tenir compte de son objet implique nécessairement l'inverse: elle ne doit pas s'interpréter «d'une manière qui fait abstraction de l'objet visé». Une cour n'est pas habilitée à donner à un droit une définition n'ayant aucun rapport avec l'intérêt qu'est destiné à protéger le droit en question. Dans le Renvoi relatif à la Public Service Employee Relations Act, [1987] 1 R.C.S. 313, à la p. 394, j'ai tenté de formuler une façon d'aborder le problème:

> Il s'ensuit que, bien qu'il faille adopter une attitude libérale et pas trop formaliste en matière d'interprétation constitutionnelle, la Charte ne saurait être considérée comme un simple contenant, à même de recevoir n'importe quelle interprétation qu'on pourrait vouloir lui donner. L'interprétation de la Charte, comme celle de tout document constitutionnel, est circonscrite par la formulation, la structure et l'historique du texte constitutionnel, par la tradition constitutionnelle et par l'histoire, les traditions et les philosophies inhérentes de notre société.

The approach, as I understand it, does not mean that judges may not make some policy choices when confronted with competing conceptions of the extent of rights or freedoms. Difficult choices must be made and the personal views of judges will unavoidably be engaged from time to time. The decisions made by judges, however, and the interpretations that they advance or accept must be plausibly inferable from something in the Charter. It is not for the courts to manufacture a constitutional right out of whole cloth. I conclude on this question by citing and adopting the following words, although spoken in dissent, from the judgment of Harlan J. in Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964), which, in my view, while stemming from the American experience, are equally applicable in a consideration of the Canadian position. Harlan J. commented, at pp. 624-25, on the:

> ... current mistaken view of the Constitution and the constitutional function of this Court. This view, in a nutshell, is that every major social ill in this country can find its cure in some constitutional "principle," and that this Court should "take the lead" in promoting reform when other branches of government fail to act. The Constitution is not a panacea for every blot upon the public welfare, nor should this Court, ordained as a judicial body, be thought of as a general haven for reform movements. The Constitution is an instrument of government, fundamental to which is the premise that in a diffusion of governmental authority lies the greatest promise that this Nation will realize liberty for all its citizens. This Court, limited in function in accordance with that premise, does not serve its high purpose when it exceeds its authority, even to satisfy justified impatience with the slow workings of the political process. For when, in the name of constitutional interpretation, the Court adds something to the Constitution that was deliberately excluded from it, the Court in reality substitutes its view of what should be so for the amending process.

Si je comprends bien, cela ne veut pas dire que les juges ne peuvent pas faire certains choix de politique générale lorsqu'ils se trouvent devant des conceptions opposées de l'étendue de droits ou de libertés. Des choix difficiles doivent être faits et le point de vue personnel des juges jouera inévitablement à l'occasion. Toutefois, les décisions rendues par les juges ainsi que les interprétations qu'ils proposent ou qu'ils retiennent doivent découler plausiblement de la Charte. Il n'appartient nullement aux tribunaux de forger de toutes pièces un droit constitutionnel. Pour terminer mes observations sur cette question, je cite, en les adoptant, les propos suivants tirés des motifs du juge Harlan, dissident, dans l'affaire Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964), qui, selon moi, bien qu'ils découlent de l'expérience américaine, sont tout autant applicables dans une étude de la position canadienne. Le juge Harlan commente, aux pp. 624 et 625:

> [TRADUCTION] ... l'idée erronée qu'on se fait actuellement de la Constitution et du rôle qu'elle attribue à cette Cour. Ce point de vue, en un mot, porte qu'on peut trouver dans quelque «principe» constitutionnel un remède à tous les maux sociaux importants qui affligent ce pays et que cette Cour doit «prendre l'initiative» de promouvoir la réforme lorsque les autres organes du gouvernement n'agissent pas. La Constitution n'est pas une panacée qui permet de remédier à toutes les atteintes au bien-être public et cette Cour, en tant que corps judiciaire, ne doit pas non plus être considérée comme un refuge pour tous les mouvements de réforme. La Constitution est un instrument de gouvernement; elle repose sur la prémisse fondamentale selon laquelle c'est la répartition du pouvoir gouvernemental qui offre à cette nation les meilleures possibilités d'assurer la liberté à tous ses citoyens. Cette Cour, dont les fonctions sont limitées en conformité avec cette prémisse, ne remplit pas sa noble mission lorsqu'elle excède sa compétence, fût-ce par suite d'une impatience justifiée face aux lenteurs du processus politique. Car lorsqu'au nom de l'interprétation constitutionnelle, la Cour ajoute à la Constitution quelque chose qui en a été délibérément exclu, elle se trouve en réalité à substituer au processus d'amendement sa propre conception de ce que devrait dire la Constitution.

The Right to Abortion and s. 7 of the Charter

The judgment of my colleague, Wilson J., is based upon the proposition that a pregnant woman

Le droit à l'avortement et l'art. 7 de la Charte

Le jugement de ma collègue le juge Wilson est fondé sur la proposition selon laquelle la femme has a right, under s. 7 of the Charter, to have an abortion. The same concept underlies the judgment of the Chief Justice. He reached the conclusion that a law which forces a woman to carry a foetus to term, unless certain criteria are met which are unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, impairs the security of her person. That, in his view, is the effect of s. 251 of the Criminal Code. He has not said in specific terms that the pregnant woman has the right to an abortion, whether therapeutic or otherwise. In my view, however, his whole position depends for its validity upon that proposition and that interference with the right constitutes an infringement of her right to security of the person. It is said that a law which forces a woman to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations interferes with security of her person. If compelling a woman to complete her pregnancy interferes with security of her person, it can only be because the concept of security of her person includes a right not to be compelled to carry the child to completion of her pregnancy. This, then, is simply to say that she has a right to have an abortion. It follows, then, that if no such right can be shown, it cannot be said that security of her person has been infringed by state action or otherwise.

All laws, it must be noted, have the potential for interference with individual priorities and aspirations. In fact, the very purpose of most legislation is to cause such interference. It is only when such legislation goes beyond interfering with priorities and aspirations, and abridges rights, that courts may intervene. If a law prohibited membership in a lawful association it would be unconstitutional, not because it would interfere with priorities and aspirations, but because of its interference with the guaranteed right of freedom of association under s. 2(d) of the Charter. Compliance with the Income Tax Act has, no doubt, frequently interfered with priorities and aspirations. The taxing provisions are not, however, on that basis unconstitutional, because the ordinary taxpayer enjoys no right to be tax free. Other illustrations may be found. In my view, it is clear that before it could be concluded that any enactment infringed the concept of security of the person, it would have to infringe enceinte a droit à l'avortement en vertu de l'art. 7 de la Charte. La même notion sous-tend le jugement du Juge en chef. Il en vient à la conclusion que la loi qui force une femme à mener à terme un fœtus, à moins de satisfaire à certains critères qui n'ont rien à voir avec ses propres priorités et aspirations, porte atteinte à la sécurité de sa personne. Voilà, à son avis, l'effet de l'art. 251 du Code criminel. Il n'a pas affirmé expressément que la femme enceinte a droit à l'avortement thérapeutique ou autre. J'estime cependant que la validité de sa position dépend de cette proposition et que l'atteinte à ce droit constitue une atteinte au droit à la sécurité de sa personne. On dit que la loi qui force une femme à mener à terme un fœtus, à moins de satisfaire à certains critères qui n'ont rien à voir avec ses propres priorités et aspirations, porte atteinte à la sécurité de sa personne. Si en obligeant une femme à mener à terme sa grossesse, on attente à la sécurité de sa personne, ce ne peut être que parce que le concept de la sécurité de la personne inclut le droit de ne pas être contrainte à mener à terme sa grossesse. Cela revient alors simplement à dire qu'elle a droit à l'avortement. Il s'ensuit donc que si on ne peut prouver l'existence d'un tel droit, on ne saurait dire que la sécurité de sa personne a été violée par l'action de l'État ou de quelque autre manière.

Toute loi, soulignons-le, peut éventuellement porter atteinte aux priorités et aux aspirations d'une personne. De fait, c'est précisément cela que visent la plupart des mesures législatives. Ce n'est que lorsque ces mesures ne constituent plus une simple entrave auxdites priorités et aspirations et qu'elles portent atteinte à des droits que les tribunaux peuvent intervenir. La loi qui interdirait de faire partie d'une association licite serait inconstitutionnelle, non parce qu'elle porterait atteinte à des priorités et à des aspirations, mais parce qu'elle léserait le droit à la liberté d'association garanti par l'al. 2*d*) de la Charte. Il ne fait aucun doute que le respect de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu a souvent porté atteinte aux priorités et aux aspirations de particuliers. Les dispositions fiscales n'en sont toutefois pas pour autant inconstitutionnelles, parce que le contribuable ordinaire ne jouit d'aucun droit à l'exemption d'impôts. On pourrait en donner d'autres exemples. À mon avis, il est some underlying right included in or protected by the concept. For the appellants to succeed here, then, they must show more than an interference with priorities and aspirations; they must show the infringement of a right which is included in the concept of security of the person.

évident qu'on ne saurait conclure qu'un texte législatif porte atteinte à la sécurité de la personne que dans la mesure où ce texte porte atteinte à quelque droit sous-jacent inclus dans cette notion ou protégé par celle-ci. Donc, pour que les appelants aient gain de cause en l'espèce, ils ne peuvent pas se contenter de démontrer l'existence d'une simple entrave à des priorités et à des aspirations; ils doivent prouver qu'il y a atteinte à un droit inclus dans la notion de la sécurité de la personne.

The proposition that women enjoy a constitutional right to have an abortion is devoid of support in the language of s. 7 of the Charter or any other section. While some human rights documents, such as the American Convention on Human Rights, 1969 (Article 4(1)), expressly address the question of abortion, the Charter is entirely silent on the point. It may be of some significance that the Charter uses specific language in dealing with other topics, such as voting rights, religion, expression and such controversial matters as mobility rights, language rights and minority rights, but remains silent on the question of abortion which, at the time the Charter was under consideration, was as much a subject of public controversy as it is today. Furthermore, it would appear that the history of the constitutional text of the Charter affords no support for the appellants' proposition. A reference to the Minutes of the Special Joint Committee of Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada (Proceedings 32nd. Parl., Sess. 1 (1981), vol. 46, p. 43) reveals the following exchange:

Ni l'article 7 de la Charte ni aucune autre disposition n'appuie la proposition selon laquelle les femmes jouissent d'un droit constitutionnel à l'avortement. Alors que certains textes sur les droits de la personne, comme l'American Convention on Human Rights, 1969 (article 4(1)), abordent expressément la question de l'avortement, la Charte est tout à fait muette sur ce point. Par ailleurs, il n'est peut-être pas sans importance que la Charte traite explicitement d'autres sujets, comme le droit de vote, la liberté de religion, la liberté d'expression et d'autres questions controversées comme la liberté de circulation et d'établissement, les droits linguistiques et les droits des minorités, sans toutefois parler de la question de l'avortement qui, à l'époque de son élaboration, était tout aussi publiquement controversée qu'elle l'est aujourd'hui. Il semblerait en outre n'y avoir rien dans l'historique du texte constitutionnel de la Charte qui puisse étayer la proposition avancée par les appelants. Dans les procès-verbaux du Comité mixte spécial du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes sur la Constitution du Canada (Procès-verbaux 32e Parl., sess. 1 (1981), vol. 46, p. 43), on trouve l'échange de propos suivant:

Mr. Crombie: ... And I ask you then finally, what effect will the inclusion of the due process clause have on the question of marriage, procreation, or the parental care of children?

Mr. Chrétien: The point, Mr. Crombie, that it is important to understand the difference is that we pass legislation here on abortion, criminal code, and we pass legislation on capital punishment; parliament [sic] has the authority to do that, and the court at this moment, because we do not have the due process of law written there, cannot go and see whether we made the right decision or the wrong decision in Parliament.

M. Crombie: Je vous demande donc, en terminant, quelles seront les répercussions de l'inclusion de cet article sur les voies de droit régulières sur le mariage, la procréation et le soin des enfants?

M. Chrétien: Monsieur Crombie, il est important de comprendre la différence entre l'adoption d'une loi sur l'avortement, le Code criminel et l'adoption d'une loi sur la peine capitale. Le Parlement est habilité à adopter ces lois et le tribunal, parce que nous n'avons pas de voies de droit régulières écrites, ne peut pas vérifier si le Parlement a pris une bonne décision.

If you write down the words, "due process of law" here, the advice I am receiving is the court could go behind our decision and say that their decision on abortion was not the right one, their decision on capital punishment was not the right one, and it is a danger, according to legal advice I am receiving, that it will very much limit the scope of the power of legislation by the Parliament and we do not want that; and it is why we do not want the words "due process of law". These are the two main examples that we should keep in mind.

You can keep speculating on all the things that have never been touched, but these are two very sensitive areas that we have to cope with as legislators and my view is that Parliament has decided a certain law on abortion and a certain law on capital punishment, and it should prevail and we do not want the courts to say that the judgment of Parliament was wrong in using the constitution.

This passage, of course, revolves around the second and not the first limb of s. 7, but it offers no support for the suggestion that it was intended to bring the question of abortion into the Charter.

It cannot be said that the history, traditions and underlying philosophies of our society would support the proposition that a right to abortion could be implied in the Charter. The history of the legal approach to this question, reflective of public policy, was conveniently canvassed in the Ontario Court of Appeal in this case in these terms, at pp. 364-66:

History of the law of abortion

The history of the law of abortion is of some importance. At common law procuring an abortion before quickening was not a criminal offence. Quickening occurred when the pregnant woman could feel the foetus move in her womb. It was a misdemeanour to procure an abortion after quickening: Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, Book 1, pp. 129-30. The law of criminal abortion was first codified in England in Lord Ellenborough's Act, 1803 (U.K.), c. 58. That Act made procuring an abortion of a quick foetus a capital offence and provided lesser penalties for abortion before quickening. After the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (U.K.), c. 100, s. 58, no differentiation in penalty was made in England on the basis of the stage of foetal development. The offence was a felony and the max-

Si nous couchons cela sur le papier, on me dit que le tribunal pourra désormais aller au-delà de la décision du Parlement et renverser une décision que ce dernier aurait prise sur l'avortement ou sur la peine capitale. On risque donc, selon les avis juridiques que j'ai reçus, de limiter le pouvoir législatif du Parlement, et ce n'est pas ce que nous souhaitons. C'est pourquoi nous ne voulons pas inclure cette expression «voies de droit régulières». Ce sont deux exemples qu'il faut garder à l'esprit.

On peut spéculer quant aux implications que cela aurait sur des domaines sur lesquels on n'a pas encore légiférer (sic); mais voilà deux domaines très particuliers avec lesquels les législateurs sont aux prises et, à mon avis, le Parlement qui a adopté certaines lois sur l'avortement et la peine capitale devrait avoir préséance en la matière, et nous ne voulons pas que les tribunaux puissent, en invoquant la constitution, renverser le jugement du Parlement.

Bien entendu, ce passage concerne le second plutôt que le premier volet de l'art. 7, mais il ne permet pas du tout d'affirmer qu'on a voulu que la question de l'avortement relève de la Charte.

On ne saurait prétendre que l'histoire, les traditions et les philosophies fondamentales de notre société appuient la proposition selon laquelle la Charte confère implicitement un droit à l'avortement. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a fait en l'espèce un examen utile de la manière dont la position du législateur face à cette question a évolué en fonction des exigences de l'ordre public. Voici ce qu'a dit la Cour d'appel, aux pp. 364 à 366:

[TRADUCTION] Historique du droit en matière d'avortement

L'historique du droit en matière d'avortement revêt passablement d'importance. En common law, procurer un avortement avant que le fœtus ne donne des signes de vie ne constituait pas une infraction criminelle. Le fœtus donnait des signes de vie lorsque la femme enceinte pouvait le sentir bouger dans son ventre. Quiconque procurait un avortement à ce stade-là de la grossesse commettait une infraction mineure (misdemeanour): Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, tome 1, pp. 129 et 130. Le droit en matière d'avortement criminel a été codifié pour la première fois en Angleterre dans Lord Ellenborough's Act, 1803 (R.-U.), chap. 58. Cette loi prévoyait que la pratique d'un avortement lorsqu'il s'agissait d'un fœtus qui donnait des signes de vie constituait une infraction majeure (felony), et presimum penalty life imprisonment. The Infant Life (Preservation) Act, 1929 (U.K.), c. 34, gave greater protection to a viable foetus by creating the offence of child destruction where a child capable of being born alive was caused to die except in good faith to preserve the life of the mother. In R. v. Bourne, [1939] 1 K.B. 687, the prohibition against abortion both at common law and by statute was held to be subject to the common law defence based upon the necessity of saving the mother's life.

crivait des peines moindres pour l'avortement pratiqué à un stade moins avancé. Suite à l'adoption de l'Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (R.-U.), chap. 100, art. 58, on n'imposait plus en Angleterre des peines différentes selon le stade de développement fœtal. L'infraction était majeure et entraînait alors une peine maximale d'emprisonnement à perpétuité. L'Infant Life (Preservation) Act, 1929 (R.-U.), chap. 34, accordait une plus grande protection à un fœtus viable en créant l'infraction de destruction d'enfant qui consistait à faire mourir un enfant susceptible de naître vivant, sauf lorsque la mort était provoquée de bonne foi afin de protéger la vie de la mère. Dans la décision R. v. Bourne, [1939] 1 K.B. 687, on a jugé qu'on pouvait opposer à l'interdiction de l'avortement édictée tant par la common law que par la loi écrite le moyen de défense de common law fondé sur la nécessité de sauver la vie de la mère.

The earliest statutory prohibition in Canada against attempting to procure an abortion is to be found in "An Act respecting Offences against the Person", 1869 (Can.), c. 20, ss. 59 and 60. The Act was based on Lord Ellenborough's Act and the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861. The provisions relating to abortion were included in the Canadian Criminal Code in 1892 (1892 (Can.), c. 29, ss. 272 to 274), and with slight changes were included in the Codes of 1906 (R.S.C. 1906, c. 146, ss. 303 to 306); 1927 (R.S.C. 1927, c. 36, ss. 303 to 306) and 1954 (1953-54 (Can.), c. 51, ss. 237 and 238).

Les premières dispositions législatives canadiennes interdisant de tenter de procurer un avortement se trouvent dans l'Acte concernant les offenses contre la Personne, 1869 (Can.), chap. 20, art. 59 et 60. Il s'agissait d'un texte qui s'inspirait de la Lord Ellenborough's Act et de l'Offences Against the Person Act, 1861. Les dispositions relatives à l'avortement ont été incluses dans le Code criminel de 1892 (1892 (Can.), chap. 29, art. 272 à 274) et, avec de légères modifications, dans les codes de 1906 (S.R.C. 1906, chap. 146, art. 303 à 306), de 1927 (S.R.C. 1927, chap. 36, art. 303 à 306), et de 1954 (1953-54 (Can.), chap. 51, art. 237 et 238).

Section 251(1) made it clear that Parliament regarded procuring an abortion as a very serious crime for which there was a maximum sentence of imprisonment for life.

Il se dégage nettement du par. 251(1) que le législateur considérait que procurer un avortement constituait un crime très grave punissable par une peine maximale d'emprisonnement à perpétuité.

In 1969, Parliament alleviated the situation by the addition to s. 251 of s-ss (4), (5), (6) and (7) as exculpatory provisions by 1968-69, c. 38, s. 18. These subsections provided that it was not a criminal act to procure an abortion where the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life or health of a female person. As can be seen, in order to come within the exceptions to s. 251(1) and (2),

En 1969, le législateur a atténué la rigueur de la loi par l'adjonction à l'art. 251 des par. (4), (5), (6) et (7) à titre de dispositions disculpatoires (1968-69, chap. 38, art. 18). Ces paragraphes prévoient que procurer un avortement ne constitue pas un acte criminel lorsque la continuation de la grossesse de cette personne du sexe féminin mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé de cette dernière. Comme on le constate, les exceptions aux par. 251(1) et (2) ne jouent que

(a) the majority of the members of a therapeutic abortion committee comprising not less than three qualified medical practitioners of an accredited or approved hospital had to certify in writing after reviewing the case at a meeting that in the opinion of the majority the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life or health of a female person;

a) si la majorité des membres d'un comité de l'avortement thérapeutique, composé d'au moins trois médecins qualifiés, d'un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé certifie par écrit à la suite d'un examen du cas au cours d'une réunion du comité que, de l'avis de la majorité, la continuation de la grossesse mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé d'une personne du sexe féminin;

(b) the abortion had to be performed in an accredited or approved hospital by a medical practitioner to whom the certificate was given who was not a member of the committee.

By defining criminal conduct more narrowly, these amendments reflected the contemporary view that abortion is not always socially undesirable behaviour.

As the Court of Appeal said, the amendments to the Criminal Code which imported s. 251 are indicative of a changing view on this question, but it is not possible to erect upon the words of s. 251 a constitutional right to abortion.

The historical review of the legal approach in Canada taken from the judgment of the Court of Appeal serves, as well, to cast light on the underlying philosophies of our society and establishes that there has never been a general right to abortion in Canada. There has always been clear recognition of a public interest in the protection of the unborn and there has been no evidence or indication of any general acceptance of the concept of abortion at will in our society. It is to be observed as well that at the time of adoption of the Charter the sole provision for an abortion in Canadian law was that to be found in s. 251 of the Criminal Code. It follows then, in my view, that the interpretive approach to the Charter, which has been accepted in this Court, affords no support for the entrenchment of a constitutional right of abortion.

As to an asserted right to be free from any state interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress, I would say that to be accepted, as a constitutional right, it would have to be based on something more than the mere imposition, by the State, of such stress and anxiety. It must, surely, be evident that many forms of government action deemed to be reasonable, and even necessary in our society, will cause stress and anxiety to many, while at the same time being acceptable exercises of government power in pursuit of socially desirable goals. The very facts of life in a modern society would preclude the entrenchment of such a constitutional right. Governmental action for the due governance and

b) si l'avortement se fait dans un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé, par un médecin à qui le certificat a été remis et qui n'est pas membre du comité.

En définissant la conduite criminelle plus étroitement, ces modifications reflétaient le point de vue contemporain selon lequel l'avortement n'est pas toujours une conduite socialement répréhensible.

Comme l'a dit la Cour d'appel, les modifications apportées à l'art. 251 du Code criminel traduisent un changement de point de vue sur cette question, mais on ne saurait déduire du texte de l'art. 251 l'existence d'un droit constitutionnel à l'avortement.

L'historique qu'a fait la Cour d'appel de la position prise par le législateur canadien permet en outre de mettre en lumière les philosophies fondamentales ayant cours dans notre société et démontre qu'il n'y a jamais eu de droit général à l'avortement au Canada. L'existence d'un intérêt public dans la protection des enfants non encore nés a toujours été clairement reconnue et rien ne prouve ni n'indique que le concept de l'avortement à volonté est généralement accepté dans notre société. On doit noter également qu'au moment où la Charte a été adoptée, la seule disposition en matière d'avortement qui existait en droit canadien était l'art. 251 du Code criminel. Il s'ensuit donc, selon moi, que la façon d'interpréter la Charte acceptée par cette Cour ne justifie aucunement une conclusion que le droit à l'avortement est enchâssé dans la Constitution.

Pour ce qui est de la revendication d'un droit à la protection contre toute atteinte de l'État à l'intégrité physique et contre toute tension psychologique causée par l'État, je dirais que pour être accepté à titre de droit constitutionnel, il devrait reposer sur autre chose que les simples tensions et l'angoisse causées par l'État. Il est certainement évident que bien des formes d'action gouvernementale considérées comme raisonnables, voire nécessaires, dans notre société sont pour beaucoup de gens une source de tensions et d'angoisse, tout en constituant des exercices acceptables du pouvoir gouvernemental dans la poursuite d'objectifs socialement désirables. La réalité même de la vie dans une société moderne vient s'opposer à ce qu'un tel administration of society can rarely please everyone. It is hard to imagine a governmental policy or initiative which will not create significant stress or anxiety for some and, frequently, for many members of the community. Governments must have the power to expropriate land, to zone land, to regulate its use and the rights and conditions of its occupation. The exercise of these powers is frequently the cause of serious stress and anxiety. In the interests of public health and welfare, governments must have and exercise the power to regulate, control — and even suppress — aspects of the manufacture, sale and distribution of alcohol and drugs and other dangerous substances. Stress and anxiety resulting from the exercise of such powers cannot be a basis for denying them to the authorities. At the present time there is great pressure on governments to restrict — and even forbid — the use of tobacco. Government action in this field will produce much stress and anxiety among smokers and growers of tobacco, but it cannot be said that this will render unconstitutional control and regulatory measures adopted by governments. Other illustrations abound to make the point.

droit soit enchâssé dans la Constitution. Il est rare que les actes accomplis pour le bon gouvernement et la bonne administration de la collectivité aient l'heur de plaire à tous. Il est difficile de concevoir une politique ou une initiative gouvernementale qui ne créera pas beaucoup de tensions ou d'angoisse chez certaines personnes et, souvent, chez un bon nombre de citoyens. Les gouvernements doivent être habilités à exproprier des biens-fonds, à procéder au zonage et à réglementer l'utilisation de biens-fonds ainsi que les droits et les conditions rattachés à l'occupation de ceux-ci. L'exercice de ces pouvoirs est souvent une source de tensions graves et d'angoisse. Or il faut, dans l'intérêt de la santé et du bien-être publics, que les gouvernements possèdent et exercent le pouvoir de réglementer, de contrôler et, voire même, d'abolir certains aspects de la fabrication, de la vente et de la distribution d'alcool et de médicaments ainsi que d'autres substances dangereuses. Les tensions et l'angoisse résultant de l'exercice de ces pouvoirs ne sauraient justifier qu'on les refuse aux autorités. À l'heure actuelle, beaucoup de pressions sont exercées sur les gouvernements pour qu'ils limitent, interdisent même, l'usage du tabac. L'action gouvernementale dans ce domaine engendrera beaucoup de tensions et d'angoisse chez les fumeurs et les producteurs de tabac, mais on ne saurait dire que cela entraînera l'inconstitutionnalité des mesures de contrôle et de réglementation que pourront adopter les gouvernements. Une foule d'autres exemples pourraient être cités à ce propos.

To invade the s. 7 right of security of the person, there would have to be more than state-imposed stress or strain. A breach of the right would have to be based upon an infringement of some interest which would be of such nature and such importance as to warrant constitutional protection. This, it would seem to me, would be limited to cases where the state-action complained of, in addition to imposing stress and strain, also infringed another right, freedom or interest which was deserving of protection under the concept of security of the person. For the reasons outlined above, the right to have an abortion — given the language, structure and history of the Charter and given the history, traditions and underlying philosophies of our society — is not such an inter-

Pour qu'il y ait atteinte au droit à la sécurité de la personne garanti par l'art. 7, il devrait y avoir plus que des tensions ou de l'angoisse causées par l'État. Une violation de ce droit devrait dépendre d'une atteinte à quelque intérêt dont la nature et l'importance justifieraient une protection constitutionnelle. Cela, me semble-t-il, se limiterait aux cas où l'action de l'État dont on se plaint a, en plus d'engendrer des tensions et de l'angoisse, porté également atteinte à un autre droit, à une autre liberté ou à un autre intérêt qui méritaient d'être protégés selon le concept de la sécurité de la personne. Pour les raisons exposées ci-dessus, le droit à l'avortement, compte tenu du texte, de la structure et de l'historique de la Charte ainsi que de l'histoire, des traditions et des philosophies

est. Any right to an abortion will remain circumscribed by the terms of s. 251 of the Criminal Code. I refer to the following passage from the judgment of the court below, at p. 378:

> One cannot overlook the fact that the situation respecting a woman's right to control her own person becomes more complex when she becomes pregnant, and that some statutory control may be appropriate. We agree with Parker A.C.J.H.C. in the court below that, bearing in mind the statutory prohibition against abortion in Canada which has existed for over 100 years, it could not be said that there is a right to procure an abortion so deeply rooted in our traditions and way of life as to be fundamental. A woman's only right to an abortion at the time the Charter came into force would accordingly appear to be that given to her by s-s. (4) of s. 251.

I would only add that even if a general right to have an abortion could be found under s. 7 of the Charter, it is by no means clear from the evidence the extent to which such a right could be said to be infringed by the requirements of s. 251 of the Code. In the nature of things that is difficult to determine. The mere fact of pregnancy, let alone an unwanted pregnancy, gives rise to stress. The evidence reveals that much of the anguish associated with abortion is inherent and unavoidable and that there is really no psychologically painless way to cope with an unwanted pregnancy.

It is for these reasons I would conclude, that save for the provisions of the Criminal Code, which permit abortion where the life or health of the woman is at risk, no right of abortion can be found in Canadian law, custom or tradition, and that the Charter, including s. 7, creates no further right. Accordingly, it is my view that s. 251 of the Code does not in its terms violate s. 7 of the Charter. Even accepting the assumption that the concept of security of the person would extend to vitiating a law which would require a woman to carry a child to the completion of her pregnancy at the risk of her life or health, it must be observed that this is not our case. As has been pointed out, fondamentales de notre société, ne constitue pas un tel intérêt. Tout droit à l'avortement demeure circonscrit par les termes de l'art. 251 du Code criminel. Je reprends le passage suivant tiré de la p. 378 de l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel:

> [TRADUCTION] On ne saurait oublier que la situation du droit de la femme à être maîtresse de sa propre personne se complique davantage lorsqu'elle devient enceinte et qu'un certain contrôle de la loi peut se révéler approprié. Nous sommes d'accord avec le juge en chef adjoint Parker de la Haute Cour pour dire que, si on garde à l'esprit l'interdiction légale de l'avortement qui existe depuis plus de cent ans au Canada, on ne saurait affirmer qu'il existe un droit de procurer un avortement qui soit ancré dans nos traditions et notre mode de vie au point d'être fondamental. Le seul droit à l'avortement que possédaient les femmes au moment de l'entrée en vigueur de la Charte semblerait donc être celui que leur conférait le par. 251(4).

J'ajouterais seulement que même s'il était possible de conclure à l'existence d'un droit général à l'avortement en vertu de l'art. 7 de la Charte, la preuve est loin de révéler clairement jusqu'à quel point on pourrait dire que les exigences de l'art. 251 du Code peuvent porter atteinte à ce droit. Il est normal que ce soit difficile à déterminer. Le seul fait d'être enceinte, sans parler de la grossesse non voulue, est une source de stress. Il ressort de la preuve que l'angoisse liée à l'avortement est, dans une large mesure, naturelle et inévitable et qu'il est vraiment impossible de faire face à une grossesse non voulue, sans difficulté sur le plan psychologique.

Pour ces raisons, je conclus que, sous réserve des dispositions du Code criminel qui autorisent l'avortement lorsque la vie ou la santé de la mère est en danger, aucun droit à l'avortement ne saurait se trouver dans le droit, la coutume ou les traditions ayant cours au Canada, et que la Charte, y compris l'art. 7, ne crée aucun droit supplémentaire. Par conséquent, j'estime que les modalités de l'art. 251 du Code ne violent pas l'art. 7 de la Charte. Même en acceptant de supposer que la notion de la sécurité de la personne aurait pour effet d'entacher de nullité une loi qui obligerait une femme à mener à terme sa grossesse au risque de sa propre vie ou santé, il faut noter que ce n'est pas le cas en

s. 251 of the Code already provides for abortion in such circumstances.

Procedural Fairness

I now turn to the appellant's argument regarding the procedural fairness of s. 251 of the Criminal Code. The basis of the argument is that the exemption provisions of subs. (4) are such as to render illusory or practically illusory any defence arising from the subsection for many women who seek abortions. It is pointed out that therapeutic abortions are available only in accredited or approved hospitals, that hospitals so accredited or approved may or may not appoint abortion committees, and that "health" is defined in vague terms which afford no clear guide to its meaning. Statistically, it was said that abortions could be lawfully performed in only twenty per cent of all hospitals in Canada. Because abortions are not generally available to all women who seek them, the argument goes, the defence is illusory, or practically so, and the section therefore fails to comport with the principles of fundamental justice.

Precise evidence on the questions raised is, of course, difficult to obtain and subject to subjective interpretation depending upon the views of those adducing it. Much evidence was led at trial based largely on the Ontario experience. Additional material in the form of articles, reports and studies was adduced, from which the Court was invited to conclude that access to abortion is not evenly provided across the country and that this could be the source of much dissatisfaction. While I recognize that in constitutional cases a greater latitude has been allowed concerning the reception of such material, I would prefer to place principal reliance upon the evidence given under oath in court in my considerations of the factual matters. Evidence was adduced from the chairman of a therapeutic abortion committee at a hospital in Hamilton, where in 1982 eleven hundred and eighty-seven abortions were performed, who testified that of all applications received by his committee in that year l'espèce. Comme je l'ai déjà souligné, l'art. 251 du Code prescrit déjà l'avortement dans ces circonstances.

L'équité en matière de procédure

Je passe maintenant à l'argument des appelants relatif à l'équité, sur le plan de la procédure, de l'art. 251 du Code criminel. Cet argument a pour fondement que les exceptions prévues au par. (4) rendent illusoire ou pratiquement illusoire pour bien des femmes désireuses de se faire avorter tout moyen de défense découlant dudit paragraphe. On fait remarquer que des avortements thérapeutiques ne peuvent être obtenus que dans des hôpitaux accrédités ou approuvés, que les hôpitaux ainsi accrédités ou approuvés peuvent à leur guise constituer ou ne pas constituer des comités de l'avortement, et que le mot «santé» est défini en des termes vagues qui n'indiquent pas clairement son sens. Selon les statistiques, a-t-on affirmé, des avortements ne peuvent être légalement accomplis que dans vingt pour cent des hôpitaux canadiens. Toujours suivant cet argument, puisque l'avortement n'est pas généralement accessible à toutes les femmes qui cherchent à l'obtenir, le moyen de défense en question est illusoire ou pratiquement illusoire et l'article n'est donc pas conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

Il est évidemment difficile de réunir des éléments de preuve précis portant sur les questions soulevées en l'espèce et ces éléments de preuve feront l'objet d'une interprétation subjective en fonction des opinions de ceux qui les apportent. La majeure partie de la preuve volumineuse produite au procès concernait l'expérience ontarienne. On a produit en outre des textes sous la forme d'articles, de rapports et d'études sur lesquels on a demandé à la Cour de se fonder pour conclure que les possibilités d'obtenir un avortement n'étaient pas les mêmes partout au pays et qu'il pouvait en résulter un grand mécontentement. Tout en reconnaissant que, dans les affaires constitutionnelles, une plus grande latitude a été accordée en ce qui concerne la réception de tels documents, je préfère, pour ce qui est d'examiner les questions de fait, m'appuyer principalement sur les dépositions faites sous serment au cours du procès. On a cité comme témoin le président d'un comité de l'avortement less than a dozen were ultimately refused. Refusal in each case was based upon the fact that a majority of the committee was not convinced that "the continuation of the pregnancy would be detrimental to the woman's health". All physicians who performed abortions under the Criminal Code provisions admitted in cross-examination that they had never had an application for a therapeutic abortion on behalf of the patient ultimately refused by an abortion committee. No woman testified that she personally had applied for an abortion anywhere in Canada and had been refused, and no physician testified to his participation in such an application. In 1982, the province of Ontario had ninety-nine hospitals with abortion committees. In that year in Ontario, hospitals performed 31,379 abortions and thirty-six of those hospitals performed more than two hundred in one year. There were seventeen hospitals with abortion committees in metropolitan Toronto and they performed 16,706 abortions in 1982, nine of them performing more than one thousand abortions each. In 1982 all ten provinces and both territories had at least one hospital with an abortion committee. The evidence was not as clear as to the situation in rural or more remote areas. It would be reasonable to assume that access to abortion would have been more difficult outside of the principal inhabited areas. This situation, however, is common to the delivery of all health-care services. Significantly, the testimony and exhibits entered at trial reflect that even in the more permissive abortion regime in the United States there is a similar problem of access. Ten years after the decision in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), only slight gains in access had been made in rural areas. It is also worth noting that the evidence adduced at trial, comparing the respective abortion regimes in Canada and the United States, reveals other significant parallels. For example, there is a close parallel in the two countries concerning such matters as the stage in the pregnancy at which abortions are performed and the procedures used to perform abortions at the respective stages. There is also a high degree of similarity in the two countries regarding the percentages and methods of abortion performed in the crucial early second trimester. In both countries, it thérapeutique d'un hôpital de Hamilton où onze cent quatre-vingt-sept avortements ont été pratiqués en 1982. Celui-ci a affirmé que, sur toutes les demandes reçues par son comité cette année-là, moins de douze ont finalement été rejetées. Dans chacun de ces cas, le refus était motivé par le fait que la majorité des membres du comité n'était pas convaincue que [TRADUCTION] «la continuation de la grossesse compromettrait la santé de la femme en question». Tous les médecins qui ont témoigné et qui ont pratiqué des avortements en vertu du Code criminel ont reconnu, en contre-interrogatoire, que jamais il ne leur était arrivé qu'une demande d'avortement thérapeutique présentée pour le compte d'une patiente se heurte au refus d'un comité de l'avortement. Aucune femme n'est venue témoigner qu'elle s'était vu refuser une demande qu'elle avait faite personnellement en vue d'obtenir un avortement où que ce soit au Canada, et aucun médecin n'a dit avoir participé à une telle demande. En 1982, la province de l'Ontario comptait quatre-vingt-dix-neuf hôpitaux dotés d'un comité de l'avortement. Cette année-là en Ontario, 31 379 avortements ont été pratiqués dans des hôpitaux et dans trente-six de ceux-ci, le chiffre des avortements s'élevait à plus de deux cents en une seule année. Dans la communauté urbaine de Toronto, il y avait dix-sept hôpitaux qui étaient dotés d'un comité de l'avortement et où 16 706 avortements ont été pratiqués en 1982. Dans neuf cas, le nombre dépassait mille avortements par année. En 1982, il y avait dans chaque province et dans les deux territoires au moins un hôpital doté d'un comité de l'avortement. La preuve n'est toutefois pas aussi claire quant à la situation dans les régions rurales ou éloignées. Il serait néanmoins raisonnable de supposer qu'en dehors des principales régions habitées, il aurait été plus difficile d'obtenir un avortement. En cela, l'avortement ne diffère donc pas de n'importe quel autre service de santé. Fait révélateur, il se dégage des dépositions et des pièces produites au procès que, même sous le régime d'avortement plus libéral que l'on trouve aux États-Unis, l'accessibilité demeure un problème. En effet, dix ans après l'arrêt Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), il n'y avait eu qu'une modeste amélioration de l'accessibilité dans les régions rurales. Il vaut également la peine de noter appears that many of the problems that have arisen in relation to abortion reflect the more general reality that medical services are subject to budgetary, time, space and staff constraints. With abortion, in particular, matters are further complicated by the fact that many physicians regard abortions as unethical and refuse to perform them. In all, the extent to which the statutory procedure contributes to the problems connected with procuring an abortion is anything but clear. Accordingly, even if one accepts that it would be contrary to the principles of fundamental justice for Parliament to make available a defence which, by reason of its terms, is illusory or practically so, it cannot, in my view, be said that s. 251 of the Code has had that effect.

It would seem to me that a defence created by Parliament could only be said to be illusory or practically so when the defence is not available in the circumstances in which it is held out as being available. The very nature of the test assumes, of course, that it is for Parliament to define the defence and, in so doing, to designate the terms and conditions upon which it may be available. The Chief Justice has said in his reasons, at p. 70:

The criminal law is a very special form of governmental regulation, for it seeks to express our society's collective disapprobation of certain acts and omissions. When a defence is provided, especially a specifically-tailored defence to a particular charge, it is because the legislator has determined that the disapprobation of society is que la preuve présentée au procès, qui compare les régimes d'avortement respectifs du Canada et des États-Unis, fait ressortir d'autres ressemblances importantes. Il y a par exemple entre les deux pays une grande similarité en ce qui concerne notamment le stade de la grossesse auquel l'avortement est pratiqué et les méthodes employées aux stades respectifs. Les deux pays se ressemblent beaucoup également quant aux pourcentages et aux méthodes d'avortements pratiqués au début du second trimestre crucial. Dans l'un et l'autre pays, un bon nombre des problèmes qui ont surgi en matière d'avortement paraissent traduire une réalité plus générale, savoir que les services médicaux sont assujettis à des restrictions budgétaires et à des restrictions sur les plans du temps, des locaux et du personnel disponible. En matière d'avortement en particulier, la situation se complique davantage du fait que beaucoup de médecins considèrent l'avortement comme immoral et refusent de pratiquer ce type d'intervention. Somme toute, on est loin de savoir clairement dans quelle mesure la procédure établie par la loi contribue à créer les problèmes liés à l'obtention d'un avortement. Par conséquent, même si l'on accepte qu'il serait contraire aux principes de justice fondamentale que le législateur prévoie un moyen de défense qui, en raison de ses modalités, est illusoire ou pratiquement illusoire, je ne crois pas que l'on puisse dire que l'art. 251 du Code a eu cet effet.

Il me semble qu'on ne pourrait dire qu'un moyen de défense créé par le législateur n'est illusoire ou pratiquement illusoire que lorsqu'on ne peut pas recourir à ce moyen de défense dans les circonstances où l'on a dit qu'il était possible de le faire. De par sa nature même, ce critère sous-entend, bien sûr, que c'est au législateur qu'il incombe de définir le moyen de défense et, en ce faisant, de préciser les conditions à remplir pour pouvoir l'invoquer. Le Juge en chef affirme, à la p. 70 de ses motifs:

Le droit criminel constitue une forme très spéciale de réglementation gouvernementale, car il cherche à exprimer la désapprobation collective de notre société pour certains actes ou omissions. Lorsqu'un moyen de défense est prévu, surtout lorsqu'il s'agit d'un moyen de défense conçu spécifiquement pour une accusation particulière, not warranted when the conditions of the defence are met.

From this comment, I would suggest it is apparent that the Court's role is not to second-guess Parliament's policy choice as to how broad or how narrow the defence should be. The determination of when "the disapprobation of society is not warranted" is in Parliament's hands. The Court's role when the enactment is attacked on the basis that the defence is illusory is to determine whether the defence is available in the circumstances in which it was intended to apply. Parliament has set out the conditions, in s. 251(4), under which a therapeutic abortion may be obtained, free from criminal sanction. It is patent on the face of the legislation that the defence is circumscribed and narrow. It is clear that this was the Parliamentary intent and it was expressed with precision. I am not able to accept the contention that the defence has been held out to be generally available. It is, on the contrary, carefully tailored and limited to special circumstances. Therapeutic abortions may be performed only in certain hospitals and in accordance with certain specified provisions. It could only be classed as illusory or practically so if it could be found that it does not provide lawful access to abortions in circumstances described in the section. No such finding should be made upon the material before this Court. The evidence will not support the proposition that significant numbers of those who meet the conditions imposed in s. 251 of the Criminal Code are denied abortions.

It is evident that what the appellants advocate is not the therapeutic abortion referred to in s. 251 of the Code. Their clinic was called into being because of the perceived inadequacies of s. 251. They propose and seek to justify "abortion on demand". The defence in s. 251(4) was not intendc'est parce que le législateur a jugé que la désapprobation de la société n'est pas justifiée lorsque les conditions de ce moyen de défense sont remplies.

Selon moi, il est clair à la lecture de ces observations qu'il n'appartient nullement à cette Cour de revenir sur le choix de principe fait par le législateur quant à la portée précise de ce moyen de défense. Il appartient au Parlement de déterminer quand «la désapprobation de la société n'est pas justifiée». Lorsque le texte législatif fait l'objet d'une attaque fondée sur le caractère illusoire du moyen de défense offert, la tâche de la Cour consiste à déterminer s'il est possible de recourir à ce moyen de défense dans les circonstances où on a voulu qu'il puisse être invoqué. Au paragraphe 251(4), le législateur énonce les conditions qui doivent être remplies pour obtenir un avortement thérapeutique sans s'exposer à des sanctions criminelles. Il est évident, à la lecture de cette disposition législative, que le moyen de défense a une portée restreinte. Il est clair que c'est ce qu'a voulu le législateur qui a exprimé cette intention en des termes précis. Je ne puis retenir l'argument selon lequel ce moyen de défense a été présenté comme pouvant être invoqué de manière générale. Bien au contraire, il s'agit d'un moyen de défense soigneusement conçu dont l'application se limite à des circonstances particulières. Les avortements thérapeutiques ne peuvent être pratiqués que dans certains hôpitaux et en conformité avec certaines dispositions précises. Le moyen de défense ne pourrait être qualifié d'illusoire ou de pratiquement illusoire que s'il était possible de conclure qu'il ne permet pas d'obtenir un avortement licite dans les circonstances décrites dans l'article en cause. Or, la documentation soumise à cette Cour ne permet pas de tirer une telle conclusion. La preuve n'appuie pas la proposition selon laquelle de nombreuses femmes qui remplissent les conditions imposées par l'art. 251 du Code criminel se voient refuser l'avortement.

Il est évident que ce que préconisent les appelants n'est pas l'avortement thérapeutique visé par l'art. 251 du Code. Ils ont ouvert leur clinique en raison des lacunes que présentait, d'après eux, cet article. Ils proposent et cherchent à justifier «l'avortement libre». Or, le moyen de défense prévu ed to meet the views of the appellants and provide a defence at large which would effectively repeal the operative subsections of s. 251. Some feel strongly that s. 251 is not adequate in today's society. Be that as it may, it does not follow that the defence provisions of s. 251(4) are illusory. They represent the legislative choice on this question and, as noted, it has not been shown that therapeutic abortions have not been available in cases contemplated by the provision.

au par. 251(4) n'a pas été conçu pour refléter les opinions des appelants ni pour créer un moyen de défense général qui aurait pour effet d'abroger les dispositions essentielles de l'art. 251. D'aucuns croient fermement que l'art. 251 ne répond plus aux besoins de la société moderne. Quoi qu'il en soit, il ne s'ensuit pas que les dispositions du par. 251(4) qui établissent un moyen de défense sont illusoires. Elle traduisent le choix qu'a fait le législateur en la matière et, comme je l'ai déjà souligné, il n'a pas été démontré que des avortements thérapeutiques n'ont pu être obtenus dans les cas envisagés par l'article.

It was further argued that the defence in s. 251(4) is procedurally unfair in that it fails to provide an adequate standard of "health" to guide the abortion committees which are charged with the responsibility for approving or disapproving applications for abortions. It is argued that the meaning of the word "health" in s. 251(4) is so vague as to render the sub-section unconstitutional. This argument was, in my view, dealt with fully and effectively in the Court of Appeal. I accept and adopt the following passage from the judgment of that court, at pp. 387-88:

On a fait valoir, en outre, que le moyen de défense prévu par le par. 251(4) est inéquitable sur le plan de la procédure en ce sens qu'il n'établit pas une norme satisfaisante de «santé» pour la gouverne des comités de l'avortement chargés d'approuver ou de rejeter les demandes d'avortement. On soutient que le sens du mot «santé» employé au par. 251(4) est vague au point de rendre ce paragraphe inconstitutionnel. À mon avis, la Cour d'appel a donné à cet argument une réponse complète et efficace. J'accepte et je fais mien le passage suivant tiré des pp. 387 et 388 des motifs de la Cour d'appel:

Counsel for the respondent in his attack on s. 251 also argued that the section was void for "vagueness". The argument under this head was that the concepts of "health" and "miscarriage" in s. 251(4) yield an arbitrary application being so vague and uncertain that it is difficult to understand what conduct is proscribed. It is fundamental justice that a person charged with an offence should know with sufficient particularity the nature of the offence alleged.

There was a far-ranging discussion by the respondents' counsel on the concept of "health" and the meaning of the term "miscarriage"; the way in which courts deal with the "vagueness" in the interpretation of municipal by-laws, and an extensive examination of American authorities.

In this case, however, from a reading of s. 251 with its exception, there is no difficulty in determining what is proscribed and what is permitted. It cannot be said that no sensible meaning can be given to the words of the section. Thus, it is for the courts to say what meaning the statute will bear. Counsel was unable to give the Court any authority for holding a statute void for uncertainty. In any event, there is no doubt the respondents [TRADUCTION] L'avocat des intimés reproche en outre à l'art. 251 d'être entaché de nullité pour cause d'«imprécision». Suivant cet argument, les termes «santé» et «avortement» utilisés au par. 251(4) ouvrent la voie à une application arbitraire si vague et incertaine qu'on a de la difficulté à comprendre quelle conduite est proscrite. Or, la justice fondamentale exige que soient communiqués à l'inculpé des détails suffisants concernant la nature de l'infraction qu'on lui impute.

L'avocat des intimés a parlé en long et en large du concept de la «santé» et du sens du mot «avortement» ainsi que de la manière dont les tribunaux font face au problème de l'«imprécision» en interprétant les règlements municipaux. De plus, l'avocat a fait un examen poussé de la jurisprudence américaine.

Dans cette affaire, cependant, après lecture de l'art. 251 et de ses exceptions, il n'y a aucune difficulté à déterminer ce qui est interdit et ce qui est permis. On ne peut pas dire qu'aucun sens raisonnable ne peut être donné aux termes de cet article. Donc, il revient aux tribunaux de dire quel sens il faut donner à la loi. L'avocat a été incapable de citer à la Cour une décision dans laquelle une loi a été déclarée nulle pour cause knew that the acts they proposed and carried out were in breach of the section. The fact that they did not approve of the law in this regard does not make it "uncertain". They could have no doubt but that the procuring of a miscarriage which they proposed (and we agree with the trial judge that the phrase "procuring a miscarriage" is synonymous with "performing an abortion"), could only be carried out in an accredited or approved hospital after the securing of the required certificate in writing from the therapeutic abortion committee of that hospital.

Finally, this Court has dealt with the matter. Dickson J. (as he then was), speaking for the majority in Morgentaler (1975), supra, in concluding a discussion of s. 251(4) of the Criminal Code, said, at p. 675:

> Whether one agrees with the Canadian legislation or not is quite beside the point. Parliament has spoken unmistakably in clear and unambiguous language.

In the same case, Laskin C.J., while dissenting on other grounds, said at p. 634:

> The contention under point 2 is equally untenable as an attempt to limit the substance of legislation in a situation which does not admit of it. In submitting that the standard upon which therapeutic abortion committees must act is uncertain and subjective, counsel who make the submission cannot find nourishment for it even in Doe v. Bolton. There it was held that the prohibition of abortion by a physician except when "based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary" did not prescribe a standard so vague as to be constitutionally vulnerable. A fortiori, under the approach taken here to substantive due process, the argument of uncertainty and subjectivity fails. It is enough to say that Parliament has fixed a manageable standard because it is addressed to a professional panel, the members of which would be expected to bring a practised judgment to the question whether "the continuation of the pregnancy . . . would or would be likely to endanger . . . life or health".

In my opinion, then, the contention that the defence provided in s. 251(4) of the Criminal Code is illusory cannot be supported. From evidence adduced by the appellants, it may be said that d'imprécision. Quoi qu'il en soit, il ne fait pas de doute que les intimés savaient que les actes projetés et accomplis par eux constituaient une infraction à l'article en cause. Ce n'est pas parce qu'ils désapprouvaient la loi à cet égard que celle-ci est «imprécise». Ils ne pouvaient pas douter que l'avortement qu'ils comptaient pratiquer (et nous sommes d'accord avec le juge du procès que l'expression «procurer l'avortement» est synonyme de «pratiquer un avortement») ne pouvait être accompli que dans un hôpital accrédité ou approuvé après avoir obtenu du comité de l'avortement thérapeutique de l'hôpital en question le certificat requis.

Finalement, cette Cour s'est déjà penchée sur la question. Le juge Dickson (alors juge puîné), en terminant une étude du par. 251(4) du Code criminel dans l'affaire Morgentaler (1975), précitée, a affirmé, au nom de la majorité, à la p. 675:

> La question n'est pas de savoir si l'on est d'accord avec la législation canadienne. Le Parlement s'est exprimé sans équivoque en des termes clairs et précis.

Dans la même cause, le juge en chef Laskin, quoique dissident pour d'autres motifs, affirmait, à la p. 634:

> La prétention avancée sur le 2e point est également insoutenable parce qu'on veut restreindre la portée d'une loi dans une situation qui ne s'y prête pas. Les avocats qui prétendent que le critère prescrit aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique est imprécis et subjectif, ne peuvent rien trouver à l'appui de cette prétention même dans l'arrêt Doe v. Bolton. En cette affaire-là il a été décidé que l'interdiction au médecin de procurer l'avortement sauf lorsque [TRADUCTION] «d'après son meilleur jugement fondé sur un examen physique, un avortement est nécessaire» ne prescrit pas un critère assez peu précis pour être constitutionnellement vulnérable. A fortiori, de la façon dont on aborde ici la question de l'application régulière des garanties légales aux principes de droit, l'argument d'imprécision et de subjectivité ne peut être retenu. Qu'il suffise de dire que le Parlement a fixé un critère maniable parce qu'il s'adresse à un comité composé d'hommes de l'art, dont on peut s'attendre que les membres portent un jugement exercé sur la question de savoir si «la continuation de la grossesse . . . mettrait ou mettrait probablement en danger la vie ou la santé . . . ».

Je tiens donc pour insoutenable l'argument voulant que le moyen de défense prévu par le par. 251(4) du Code criminel soit illusoire. On peut conclure de la preuve produite par les appelants qu'un bon many women seeking abortions have been unable to get them in Canada because s. 251(4) fails to respond to this need. This cannot serve as an argument supporting the claim that subs. (4) is procedurally unfair. Section 251(4) was designed to meet specific circumstances. Its aim is to restrict abortion to cases where the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would likely, be injurious to the life or health of the woman concerned, not to provide unrestricted access to abortion. It was to meet this requirement that Parliament provided for the administrative procedures to invoke the defence in subs. (4). This machinery was considered adequate to deal with the type of abortion Parliament had envisaged. When, however, as the evidence would indicate, many more would seek abortions on a basis far wider than that contemplated by Parliament, any system would come under stress and possibly fail. It is not without significance that many of the appellants' clients did not meet the standard set or did not seek to invoke it and that is why their clinic took them in. What has confronted the scheme has been a flood of demands for abortions, some of which could meet the tests of s. 251(4) and many which could not. In so far as it may be said that the administrative scheme of the Act has operated inefficiently, a proposition which may be highly questionable, it is caused principally by forces external to the statute, the external circumstances being a general demand for abortion irrespective of the provisions of s. 251. It is not open to a court, in my view, to strike down a statutory provision on this basis.

nombre de femmes désireuses d'obtenir un avortement n'ont pas pu l'obtenir au Canada parce que le par. 251(4) ne répond pas à ce besoin. Cela ne peut toutefois pas servir d'argument appuyant l'allégation que le par. (4) est inéquitable sur le plan de la procédure. Le paragraphe 251(4) a été conçu pour faire face à des circonstances bien précises. Il vise à limiter l'avortement aux cas où la continuation de la grossesse nuirait ou nuirait probablement à la vie ou à la santé de la femme en cause, et non pas à donner la possibilité illimitée de se faire avorter. C'est pour satisfaire à cette exigence que le législateur a établi des procédures administratives qui doivent être suivies lorsqu'on invoque le moyen de défense prévu au par. (4). Ce mécanisme a été considéré comme suffisant pour traiter le type d'avortement envisagé par le législateur. Si, toutefois, comme l'indique la preuve, beaucoup plus de femmes demandaient des avortements pour un motif beaucoup plus large que celui envisagé par le législateur, tout système finirait peut-être par céder sous le poids de ce fardeau trop lourd. Il est révélateur que beaucoup de patientes des appelants ne satisfaisaient pas au critère établi et n'ont pas cherché à l'invoquer, et c'est là la raison pour laquelle elles ont été acceptées à la clinique des appelants. Le système a eu à répondre à une avalanche de demandes d'avortement dont certaines pouvaient remplir les conditions du par. 251(4), mais dont un grand nombre ne le pouvait pas. Dans la mesure où l'on peut dire que le régime administratif instauré par la loi a fonctionné inefficacement, ce qui peut être fort douteux, cela tient principalement à des facteurs étrangers à la loi, savoir la demande générale d'avortements en dépit des dispositions de l'art. 251. À mon avis, un tribunal ne peut, pour ce motif, invalider une disposition législative.

The appellants in this Court raised other arguments, most of which, in my view, may be briefly dealt with.

Section 605 of the Criminal Code

It was contended that s. 605(1)(a), giving the Crown a right of appeal against an acquittal in a trial court on any ground involving a question of law alone offended ss. 7 and 11(d), (f) and (h) of the Charter. Reliance was placed primarily on s.

Les appelants en cette Cour ont soulevé d'autres arguments dont la plupart peuvent, selon moi, être traités brièvement.

L'article 605 du Code criminel

On a soutenu que l'al. 605(1)a), qui habilite le ministère public à interjeter appel contre un verdict d'acquittement prononcé par une cour de première instance, pour tout motif comportant une question de droit seulement, est contraire à l'art. 7

11(h). There is a simple answer to this argument. The words of s. 11(h), "if finally acquitted" and "if finally found guilty", must be construed to mean after the appellate procedures have been completed, otherwise there would be no point or meaning in the word "finally". There is no merit in this ground. I would dispose of this question for the reasons given by the Court of Appeal.

Section 251 of the Criminal Code — Violation of s. 15 of the Charter

I find no merit in the argument advanced under this heading to the effect that the equality rights of women are infringed by s. 251 of the Criminal Code and on this issue again I would adopt the reasons of the Ontario Court of Appeal found at (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 353, at pp. 392-97.

Section 251 of the Criminal Code and s. 2(a) of the Charter

I am unable to find any abridgement of freedom of conscience and religion in s. 251 of the Criminal Code. I agree with, and on this ground of appeal I would adopt, the reasons for judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal: supra, at pp. 389-91.

Section 251 of the Criminal Code and s. 12 of the Charter — Cruel and Unusual Punishment

I would reject this argument and again adopt without variation or addition the reasons of the Ontario Court of Appeal: supra, at p. 392.

Section 91(27) Constitution Act, 1867 (ultra vires)

It was submitted on this issue that s. 251 was ultra vires of Parliament and could no longer be supported under the criminal power because it was colourable legislation in pith and substance, legislation for the protection of health and, therefore, within provincial competence. There is, in my view, no merit in this argument and I again adopt the reasons of the Ontario Court of Appeal: supra, at pp. 397-99.

et aux al. 11*d*), f) et h) de la Charte. C'est principalement sur l'al. 11*h*) qui a été invoqué. Or, la réponse à cet argument est simple. Les expressions «définitivement acquitté» et «définitivement déclaré coupable» employées à l'al. 11*h*) doivent s'interpréter comme signifiant après que toutes les procédures d'appel sont terminées, sinon le mot «définitivement» serait inutile ou dénué de tout sens. Ce moyen n'est donc pas fondé. Je suis d'avis de trancher cette question en adoptant les motifs donnés par la Cour d'appel.

L'article 251 du Code criminel — violation de l'art. 15 de la Charte

Je juge mal fondé l'argument avancé sous cette rubrique, suivant lequel l'art. 251 du Code criminel porte atteinte aux droits des femmes à l'égalité. Sur ce point également, j'adopte les motifs de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario que l'on trouve à (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 353, aux pp. 392 à 397.

L'article 251 du Code criminel et l'al. 2*a*) de la Charte

Je ne vois pas en quoi l'art. 251 du Code criminel porte atteinte à la liberté de conscience et de religion. Sur ce moyen d'appel, je partage et je fais miens les motifs de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario: précité, aux pp. 389 à 391.

L'article 251 du Code criminel et l'art. 12 de la Charte — peine cruelle et inusitée

Je suis d'avis de rejeter cet argument et d'adopter, encore une fois sans modification ni adjonction, les motifs de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario: précité, à la p. 392.

Le paragraphe 91(27) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 (ultra vires)

On fait valoir relativement à cette question que l'art. 251 outrepasse la compétence du Parlement et ne peut plus se justifier par la compétence en matière criminelle parce qu'il s'agit de législation déguisée qui vise, de par son caractère véritable, à protéger la santé et qui relève donc de la compétence provinciale. À mon avis, cet argument n'est pas fondé et j'adopte, une fois de plus les motifs de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario: précité, aux pp. 397 à 399.

Section 96 Constitution Act, 1867

The essence of this argument was that s. 251 of the Criminal Code purported to give powers to therapeutic abortion committees exercised by county, district and superior courts at the time of Confederation. There is no merit in this argument. I adopt the reasons of the Ontario Court of Appeal: supra, at p. 400.

Wrongful Interdelegation of Powers

I would dispose of this argument which was to the effect that s. 251 delegated powers relating to criminal law to the provinces generally, as did the Court of Appeal in their reasons: supra, at p. 399. I do not wish, however, to say anything about Re Peralta and The Queen in Right of Ontario (1985), 49 O.R. (2d) 705, which is relied upon by that court and is currently on appeal to this Court.

Defence of Necessity

This ground of appeal must also fail. There is no evidence whatever in the record that could support the defence.

Counsel's Address

In his reasons for judgment, the Chief Justice referred to defence counsel's address to the jury at trial, in which he had told the jury that they need not apply s. 251 of the Criminal Code if they thought it was bad law. I would associate myself with what the Chief Justice has said on this question. I am in full agreement with him that counsel was wrong in addressing the jury as he did and I would add that such practice, if commonly adopted, would undermine and place at risk the whole jury system.

Conclusion

Before leaving this case, I wish to make it clear that I express no opinion on the question of whether, or upon what conditions, there should be a right for a pregnant woman to have an abortion free of legal sanction. No valid constitutional objection to s. 251 of the Criminal Code has, in my view, been raised and, consequently, if there is to be a change

Cet argument porte essentiellement que l'art. 251 du Code criminel a pour effet d'investir les comités de l'avortement thérapeutique de pouvoirs qui étaient exercés, à l'époque de la Confédération, par les cours de comté et de district et les cours supérieures. Cet argument est sans fondement. Je fais miens les motifs de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario: précité, à la p. 400.

Délégation illégale de pouvoirs

Suivant cet argument, l'art. 251 délègue aux provinces en général des pouvoirs en matière de droit criminel. J'y réponds de la même manière que le fait la Cour d'appel dans ses motifs: précité, à la p. 399. Je m'abstiens toutefois de me prononcer sur la décision Re Peralta and The Queen in Right of Ontario (1985), 49 O.R. (2d) 705, qui a été invoquée par cette cour et qui fait actuellement l'objet d'un pourvoi devant nous.

Le moyen de défense fondé sur la nécessité

Ce moyen doit également être rejeté. D'après le dossier, il n'y a aucun élément de preuve qui puisse justifier ce moyen de défense.

La plaidoirie de l'avocat

Dans ses motifs de jugement, le Juge en chef fait mention de la plaidoirie dans laquelle l'avocat de la défense, au procès, a dit aux jurés qu'ils n'avaient pas à appliquer l'art. 251 du Code criminel s'ils estimaient qu'il s'agissait là d'une mauvaise règle de droit. Sur cette question, je me range à l'avis du Juge en chef. Je souscris entièrement à son opinion que l'avocat a eu tort de s'adresser ainsi au jury et j'ajouterais qu'une telle pratique, si elle devait se répandre, minerait et compromettrait tout le système des procès par jury.

Conclusion

Avant de terminer, je tiens à préciser que je n'exprime aucune opinion sur la question de savoir si, et à quelles conditions, les femmes enceintes devraient avoir le droit de se faire avorter impunément. On n'a soulevé selon moi aucune objection à l'art. 251 du Code criminel qui soit valable sur le plan constitutionnel et, par conséquent, j'estime in the law concerning this question it will be for Parliament to make. Questions of public policy touching on this controversial and divisive matter must be resolved by the elected Parliament. It does not fall within the proper jurisdiction of the courts. Parliamentary action on this matter is subject to judicial review but, in my view, nothing in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms gives the Court the power or duty to displace Parliament in this matter involving, as it does, general matters of public policy.

I would adopt as clearly expressive of the proper approach to be taken by the courts in dealing with Charter issues the words of Taylor J., of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, in the case of Harrison v. University of British Columbia, [1986] 6 W.W.R. 7. The facts of that case concerned the question of a mandatory retirement provision for employees of the University of British Columbia. The question of discrimination under s. 15 was raised. In dealing with the question of the purpose and constitutional effect of the Charter, Taylor J., at p. 11, after noting that the Charter functions assigned to the courts do not "allocate to the courts the responsibility for designing, initiating or directing social or economic policy", continued:

> It is, of course, true that the function of the courts has been extended. In many cases in which the meaning or proper application of the Charter is in doubt the courts must decide whether or not a legislative, administrative or other act complained of requires constitutional sanction, and such decisions may well have social or economic consequences. As has been emphasized by Lamer J. in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 at 496-97, [1986] 1 W.W.R. 481 (sub nom. Ref. re S. 94(2) of Motor Vehicle Act), 69 B.C.L.R. 145, 48 C.R. (3d) 289, 36 M.V.R. 240, 23 C.C.C. (3d) 289, 24 D.L.R. (4th) 536, 18 C.R.R. 30, 63 N.R. 266, this imposes on the courts a new and onerous duty. In carrying out that task, however, the courts can be concerned with social or economic implications only to the extent that they assist in answering the question whether or not the right claimed is one entitled to constitutional protection. The rights to which the Chart-que si la loi doit être changée à ce propos, il appartiendra au Parlement de le faire. C'est aux députés élus que revient la tâche de résoudre les questions de politique générale touchant ce domaine controversé qui est la cause de tant de discorde. Les tribunaux n'ont pas compétence en la matière. Certes, les mesures prises par le législateur peuvent être soumises à un contrôle judiciaire mais, selon moi, il n'y a rien dans la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés qui habilite ou oblige la Cour à se substituer au Parlement dans ce domaine qui comporte des questions générales d'intérêt public.

J'adopte comme un énoncé clair de la façon dont les tribunaux doivent aborder les questions touchant la Charte, les propos qu'a tenus le juge Taylor de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique dans la décision Harrison v. University of British Columbia, [1986] 6 W.W.R. 7. Dans cette affaire, il était question d'une disposition prescrivant la retraite obligatoire d'employés de l'Université de la Colombie-Britannique. On a soulevé la question de la discrimination au sens de l'art. 15. En traitant de l'objet et de l'effet constitutionnel de la Charte, le juge Taylor affirme ce qui suit, à la p. 11, après avoir fait observer que les fonctions dont la Charte investit les tribunaux [TRADUCTION] "n'impose[nt] pas . . . aux tribunaux la responsabilité de concevoir, d'inaugurer ou de diriger la politique sociale ou économique":

> [TRADUCTION] Il est vrai, bien entendu, que le rôle des tribunaux a pris de l'ampleur. Dans bien des cas où il subsiste des doutes quant au sens de la Charte ou quant à la façon dont il convient de l'appliquer, les tribunaux doivent décider si un acte législatif, administratif ou autre, dont on se plaint, requiert une sanction en vertu de la Constitution, et il se peut bien que ces décisions aient des conséquences sociales ou économiques. Comme l'a souligné le juge Lamer dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486, aux pp. 496 et 497, [1986] 1 W.W.R. 481 (sub nom. Ref. re S. 94(2) of Motor Vehicle Act), 69 B.C.L.R. 145, 48 C.R. (3d) 289, 36 M.V.R. 240, 23 C.C.C. (3d) 289, 24 D.L.R. (4th) 536, 18 C.R.R. 30, 63 N.R. 266, cela a pour effet d'imposer aux tribunaux une responsabilité nouvelle et lourde. En remplissant cette tâche, cependant, ils ne peuvent tenir compte des répercussions sociales ou économiques que dans la mesure où celles-ci er grants protection are those fundamental to the free and democratic society.

This approach is applicable to the abortion question. The solution to this question in this country must be left to Parliament. It is for Parliament to pronounce on and to direct social policy. This is not because Parliament can claim all wisdom and knowledge but simply because Parliament is elected for that purpose in a free democracy and, in addition, has the facilities — the exposure to public opinion and information — as well as the political power to make effective its decisions. I refer with full approval to a further comment by Taylor J., supra, at p. 12:

> The present case may serve, perhaps, to emphasize that the courts lack both the exposure to public opinion required in order to discharge the essentially "political" task of weighing social or economic interests and deciding between them, and also the ability to gather the information they would need for that task. When it has run its course the litigation may also have served to demonstrate — if demonstration be needed — that the judicial system of necessity lacks the capacity of parliamentary bodies to act promptly when economic or social considerations indicate that a change in the law is desirable and, of equal importance, to react promptly when results show either that a change made for that purpose has not achieved its objective or that the objective is no longer desirable.

For all of these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal. I would answer the constitutional questions as follows:

1. Question:

> Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2(a), 7, 12, 15, 27 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

aident à répondre à la question de savoir si le droit revendiqué jouit d'une protection en vertu de la Constitution. Or, les droits garantis par la Charte sont ceux qui sont fondamentaux dans une société libre et démocratique.

Ce point de vue est applicable à la question de l'avortement. Au Canada, il appartient au Parlement de régler cette question. C'est au Parlement qu'il revient de formuler et de diriger la politique sociale, non pas parce qu'il possède une sagesse infinie et la connaissance de toutes choses, mais simplement parce que c'est précisément dans ce but que les députés sont élus dans une démocratie libre. De plus, le Parlement dispose des moyens (du fait qu'il est au courant de l'opinion publique) ainsi que du pouvoir politique de mettre à exécution ses décisions. J'approuve entièrement les observations suivantes que fait le juge Taylor dans la décision précitée, à la p. 12:

> [TRADUCTION] La présente affaire sert peut-être à mettre en relief le fait que les tribunaux ne sont pas suffisamment au courant de l'opinion publique pour pouvoir s'acquitter de la tâche essentiellement «politique» qui consiste à soupeser les différents intérêts sociaux ou économiques et à faire un choix entre ces intérêts et aussi le fait qu'ils ne sont pas non plus à même de réunir les données qu'il leur faudrait pour pouvoir remplir cette fonction. Il se peut par ailleurs que le litige, quand il aura abouti, aura servi en outre à démontrer, à supposer que cela soit nécessaire, que, par la force des choses, le système judiciaire n'a pas la capacité des organes parlementaires d'agir promptement lorsque des facteurs d'ordre économique ou social indiquent qu'il est souhaitable de modifier la loi ni, ce qui est tout aussi important, celle de réagir promptement lorsqu'il s'avère qu'une telle modification n'a pas eu l'effet escompté ou que l'objectif visé n'est plus souhaitable.

Pour tous ces motifs, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi et de répondre ainsi aux questions constitutionnelles:

1. Question:

> L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada porte-t-il atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7, 12, 15, 27 et 28 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Answer:

No.

2. Question:

If section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada infringes or denies the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2(a), 7, 12, 15, 27 and 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is s. 251 justified by s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?

Answer:

No answer is required.

3. Question:

Is section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada ultra vires the Parliament of Canada?

Answer:

No.

4. Question:

Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada violate s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867?

Answer:

No.

5. Question:

Does section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada unlawfully delegate federal criminal power to provincial Ministers of Health or Therapeutic Abortion Committees, and in doing so, has the Federal Government abdicated its authority in this area?

Answer:

No.

6. Question:

Do sections 605 and 610(3) of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 7, 11(d), 11(f), 11(h) and 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Réponse:

Non.

2. Question:

Si l'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada porte atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'al. 2*a*) et les art. 7, 12, 15, 27 et 28 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, est-il justifié par l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et donc compatible avec la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982?

Réponse:

Il n'est pas nécessaire de répondre à cette question.

3. Question:

L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada excède-t-il les pouvoirs du Parlement du Canada?

Réponse:

Non.

4. Question:

L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada viole-t-il l'art. 96 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867?

Réponse:

Non.

5. Question:

L'article 251 du Code criminel du Canada délègue-t-il illégalement la compétence fédérale en matière criminelle aux ministres de la Santé provinciaux ou aux comités de l'avortement thérapeutique et, ce faisant, le gouvernement fédéral a-t-il abdiqué son autorité dans ce domaine?

Réponse:

Non.

6. Question:

L'article 605 et le par. 610(3) du Code criminel du Canada portent-ils atteinte aux droits et aux libertés garantis par l'art. 7, les al. 11*d*), 11*f*), 11*h*) et le par. 24(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Answer:

With respect to s. 605, the answer is No. As to s. 610(3), I adopt the reasons of the Court of Appeal and say that no costs should be awarded.

7. Question:

If sections 605 and 610(3) of the Criminal Code of Canada infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 7, 11(d), 11(f), 11(h) and 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, are ss. 605 and 610(3) justified by s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?

Answer:

No answer is required.

The following are the reasons delivered by

WILSON J.—At the heart of this appeal is the question whether a pregnant woman can, as a constitutional matter, be compelled by law to carry the foetus to term. The legislature has proceeded on the basis that she can be so compelled and, indeed, has made it a criminal offence punishable by imprisonment under s. 251 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, for her or her physician to terminate the pregnancy unless the procedural requirements of the section are complied with.

My colleagues, the Chief Justice and Justice Beetz, have attacked those requirements in reasons which I have had the privilege of reading. They have found that the requirements do not comport with the principles of fundamental justice in the procedural sense and have concluded that, since they cannot be severed from the provisions creating the substantive offence, the whole of s. 251 must fall.

With all due respect, I think that the Court must tackle the primary issue first. A consideration as to whether or not the procedural requirements for obtaining or performing an abortion comport with fundamental justice is purely academic if such requirements cannot as a constitutional matter be imposed at all. If a pregnant

Version française des motifs rendus par

LE JUGE WILSON—La question au cœur de ce pourvoi est de savoir si une femme enceinte peut, sur le plan constitutionnel, être forcée par la loi à mener le fœtus à terme. Le législateur a tenu pour acquis qu'on pouvait l'y forcer et a d'ailleurs prévu, à l'art. 251 du Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, chap. C-34, que l'interruption de grossesse par une femme ou son médecin, à moins que les exigences procédurales de cet article ne soient respectées, constitue une infraction criminelle punissable d'emprisonnement.

Mes collègues, le Juge en chef et le juge Beetz, ont attaqué ces exigences dans des motifs que j'ai eu l'avantage de lire. Ils ont jugé qu'elles ne respectent pas les principes de justice fondamentale sur le plan de la procédure et ont conclu que, puisqu'elles ne peuvent être séparées des dispositions de fond qui créent l'infraction, l'ensemble de l'art. 251 doit être invalidé.

Avec égards, je pense que la Cour doit s'attaquer d'abord à la question fondamentale. Se demander si les exigences procédurales pour obtenir un avortement ou pour le pratiquer respectent ou non la justice fondamentale devient une question purement théorique si, sur le plan constitutionnel, ces exigences ne peuvent absolument pas woman cannot, as a constitutional matter, be compelled by law to carry the foetus to term against her will, a review of the procedural requirements by which she may be compelled to do so seems pointless. Moreover, it would, in my opinion, be an exercise in futility for the legislature to expend its time and energy in attempting to remedy the defects in the procedural requirements unless it has some assurance that this process will, at the end of the day, result in the creation of a valid criminal offence. I turn, therefore, to what I believe is the central issue that must be addressed.

1. The Right of Access to Abortion

Section 7 of the Charter provides:

I agree with the Chief Justice that we are not called upon in this case to delineate the full content of the right to life, liberty and security of the person. This would be an impossible task because we cannot envisage all the contexts in which such a right might be asserted. What we are asked to do, I believe, is define the content of the right in the context of the legislation under attack. Does section 251 of the Criminal Code which limits the pregnant woman's access to abortion violate her right to life, liberty and security of the person within the meaning of s. 7?

Leaving aside for the moment the implications of the section for the foetus and addressing only the s. 7 right of the pregnant woman, it seems to me that we can say with a fair degree of confidence that a legislative scheme for the obtaining of an abortion which exposes the pregnant woman to a threat to her security of the person would violate her right under s. 7. Indeed, we have already stated in Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 177, that security of the person even on the purely physical level must encompass freedom from the threat of physical punishment or suffering as well as freedom from the actual punishment or suffering itself. In other words, the fact of exposure is enough to violate security of the person. I agree with the Chief Justice and Beetz J. who, for differing reasons, être imposées. Si une femme enceinte ne peut, sur le plan constitutionnel, être forcée par la loi à mener le fœtus à terme contre sa volonté, l'examen des exigences procédurales par lesquelles elle peut y être forcée perd sa raison d'être. En outre, il serait, à mon avis, futile pour le législateur de gaspiller temps et énergie à tenter de remédier aux défauts des exigences procédurales s'il n'a quelque assurance que ce faisant, une infraction criminelle valide sera en fin de compte créée. J'en viens donc à ce que je crois être le point central qu'il faut examiner.

1. Le droit à l'avortement

L'article 7 de la Charte porte:

Je conviens avec le Juge en chef qu'il ne nous est pas demandé dans cette affaire de délimiter dans tous ses aspects le droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne. Ce serait là une tâche impossible car nous ne pouvons concevoir tous les contextes dans lesquels ce droit pourrait être revendiqué. Ce qu'on nous demande de faire, je crois, c'est de définir ce droit dans le contexte de la loi contestée. L'article 251 du Code criminel qui limite le recours d'une femme enceinte à l'avortement viole-t-il son droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de sa personne au sens de l'art. 7?

Si nous mettons de côté pour le moment les incidences que peut avoir l'article pour le fœtus et que nous nous intéressons uniquement au droit que l'art. 7 confère à la femme enceinte, il me semble que nous pouvons dire avec suffisamment de certitude qu'une structure législative régissant l'avortement qui menace la sécurité de la personne de la femme enceinte viole le droit que lui garantit l'art. 7. D'ailleurs, nous avons déjà dit dans l'arrêt Singh c. Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 177, que la sécurité de la personne, même au niveau purement physique, doit comprendre la liberté d'être exempt de toute menace de châtiment corporel ou de souffrance, tout autant que la liberté d'être exempt du châtiment ou de la souffrance eux-mêmes. En d'autres termes, l'éventualité elle-même suffit pour qu'il y find that pregnant women are exposed to a threat to their physical and psychological security under the legislative scheme set up in s. 251 and, since these are aspects of their security of the person, their s. 7 right is accordingly violated. But this, of course, does not answer the question whether even the ideal legislative scheme, assuming that it is one which poses no threat to the physical and psychological security of the person of the pregnant woman, would be valid under s. 7. I say this for two reasons: (1) because s. 7 encompasses more than the right to security of the person; it speaks also of the right to liberty, and (2) because security of the person may encompass more than physical and psychological security; this we have yet to decide.

ait atteinte à la sécurité de la personne. Je partage l'avis du Juge en chef et du juge Beetz qui, pour des raisons différentes, ont conclu que les femmes enceintes voient leur sécurité physique et psychologique menacée par la structure législative élaborée à l'art. 251 et, comme il s'agit là d'aspects de la sécurité de la personne, leur droit en vertu de l'art. 7 est par conséquent violé. Mais bien entendu, cela ne répond pas à la question de savoir si même une structure législative idéale, en présumant qu'elle ne constitue pas une menace à la sécurité physique et psychologique de la personne de la femme enceinte, serait valide en vertu de l'art. 7. Il y a deux raisons à cela: (1) parce que l'art. 7 englobe plus que le droit à la sécurité de la personne, il mentionne aussi le droit à la liberté, et (2) parce qu'il se peut que la sécurité de la personne englobe plus que la sécurité physique et psychologique; c'est ce que nous avons à décider.

It seems to me, therefore, that to commence the analysis with the premise that the s. 7 right encompasses only a right to physical and psychological security and to fail to deal with the right to liberty in the context of "life, liberty and security of the person" begs the central issue in the case. If either the right to liberty or the right to security of the person or a combination of both confers on the pregnant woman the right to decide for herself (with the guidance of her physician) whether or not to have an abortion, then we have to examine the legislative scheme not only from the point of view of fundamental justice in the procedural sense but in the substantive sense as well. I think, therefore, that we must answer the question: what is meant by the right to liberty in the context of the abortion issue? Does it, as Mr. Manning suggests, give the pregnant woman control over decisions affecting her own body? If not, does her right to security of the person give her such control? I turn first to the right to liberty.

Il me semble donc que prendre comme point de départ de l'analyse la prémisse que le droit de l'art. 7 ne comprend qu'un droit à la sécurité physique et psychologique, sans traiter du droit à la liberté, dans ce contexte de «la vie, la liberté et la sécurité de sa personne», c'est présumer résolue dès le départ la question centrale en litige. Si le droit à la liberté, le droit à la sécurité de la personne ou une combinaison des deux confèrent à la femme enceinte le droit de décider elle-même (sur les conseils de son médecin) d'avoir ou non un avortement, il nous faut alors examiner la structure législative non seulement du point de vue de la justice fondamentale quant à la procédure mais aussi quant au fond. Je pense donc que nous devons répondre à la question: qu'entend-on par le droit à la liberté dans le contexte de la question de l'avortement? Donne-t-il, comme Me Manning le prétend, à la femme enceinte le pouvoir de prendre des décisions relativement à son corps? Sinon, son droit à la sécurité de sa personne lui donne-t-il ce pouvoir? Je traiterai d'abord du droit à la liberté.

(a) The Right to Liberty

In order to ascertain the content of the right to liberty we must, as Dickson C.J. stated in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, commence with an analysis of the purpose of the right. Quoting from the Chief Justice at p. 344:

a) Le droit à la liberté

Pour déterminer ce que comprend le droit à la liberté, nous devons, comme le juge en chef Dickson le dit dans l'arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 R.C.S. 295, procéder d'abord à l'analyse de l'objet de ce droit. Pour citer le Juge en chef, à la p. 344:

... the purpose of the right or freedom in question is to be sought by reference to the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, to the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, to the historical origins of the concepts enshrined, and where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter. The interpretation should be, as the judgment in Southam emphasizes, a generous rather than a legalistic one, aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection.

We are invited, therefore, to consider the purpose of the Charter in general and of the right to liberty in particular.

The Charter is predicated on a particular conception of the place of the individual in society. An individual is not a totally independent entity disconnected from the society in which he or she lives. Neither, however, is the individual a mere cog in an impersonal machine in which his or her values, goals and aspirations are subordinated to those of the collectivity. The individual is a bit of both. The Charter reflects this reality by leaving a wide range of activities and decisions open to legitimate government control while at the same time placing limits on the proper scope of that control. Thus, the rights guaranteed in the Charter erect around each individual, metaphorically speaking, an invisible fence over which the state will not be allowed to trespass. The role of the courts is to map out, piece by piece, the parameters of the fence.

The Charter and the right to individual liberty guaranteed under it are inextricably tied to the concept of human dignity. Professor Neil MacCormick, Regius Professor of Public Law and the Law of Nature and Nations, University of Edinburgh, in his work entitled Legal Right and Social Democracy: Essays in Legal and Political Philosophy (1982), speaks of liberty as "a condition of human self-respect and of that contentment which resides in the ability to pursue one's own conception of a full and rewarding life" (p. 39). He says at p. 41:

To be able to decide what to do and how to do it, to carry out one's own decisions and accept their consequences, seems to me essential to one's self-respect as a

... l'objet du droit ou de la liberté en question doit être déterminé en fonction de la nature et des objectifs plus larges de la Charte elle-même, des termes choisis pour énoncer ce droit ou cette liberté, des origines historiques des concepts enchâssés et, s'il y a lieu, en fonction du sens et de l'objet des autres libertés et droits particuliers qui s'y rattachent selon le texte de la Charte. Comme on le souligne dans l'arrêt Southam, l'interprétation doit être libérale plutôt que formaliste et viser à réaliser l'objet de la garantie et à assurer que les citoyens bénéficient pleinement de la protection accordée par la Charte.

On nous invite donc à examiner l'objet de la Charte en général et du droit à la liberté en particulier.

La Charte est fondée sur une conception particulière de la place de l'individu dans la société. Un individu ne constitue pas une entité totalement coupée de la société dans laquelle il vit. Cependant l'individu n'est pas non plus un simple rouage impersonnel d'une machine subordonnant ses valeurs, ses buts et ses aspirations à celles de la collectivité. L'individu est un peu les deux. La Charte exprime cette réalité en laissant un vaste champ d'activités et de décisions au contrôle légitime du gouvernement, tout en fixant des bornes à l'étendue appropriée de ce contrôle. Ainsi, les droits garantis par la Charte érigent autour de chaque individu, pour parler métaphoriquement, une barrière invisible que l'État ne sera pas autorisé à franchir. Le rôle des tribunaux consiste à délimiter, petit à petit, les dimensions de cette barrière.

La Charte et le droit à la liberté individuelle qu'elle garantit sont inextricablement liés à la notion de dignité humaine. Neil MacCormick, professeur de droit public et de droit naturel et international à l'Université d'Édimbourg, dans son ouvrage intitulé Legal Right and Social Democracy: Essays in Legal and Political Philosophy (1982), parle de la liberté comme [TRADUCTION] "une condition du respect de soi et de la satisfaction que procure la capacité de réaliser sa propre conception d'une vie bien remplie, qui vaille la peine d'être vécue" (à la p. 39). Il dit à la p. 41:

[TRADUCTION] Pouvoir décider ce qu'on veut faire et comment le faire, pour concrétiser ses propres décisions, en en acceptant les conséquences, me semble essentiel au human being, and essential to the possibility of that contentment. Such self-respect and contentment are in my judgment fundamental goods for human beings, the worth of life itself being on condition of having or striving for them. If a person were deliberately denied the opportunity of self-respect and that contentment, he would suffer deprivation of his essential humanity.

Dickson C.J. in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd. makes the same point at p. 346:

It should also be noted, however, that an emphasis on individual conscience and individual judgment also lies at the heart of our democratic political tradition. The ability of each citizen to make free and informed decisions is the absolute prerequisite for the legitimacy, acceptability, and efficacy of our system of self-government. It is because of the centrality of the rights associated with freedom of individual conscience both to basic beliefs about human worth and dignity and to a free and democratic political system that American jurisprudence has emphasized the primacy or "firstness" of the First Amendment. It is this same centrality that in my view underlies their designation in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as "fundamental". They are the sine qua non of the political tradition underlying the Charter.

It was further amplified in Dickson C.J.'s discussion of Charter interpretation in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, at p. 136:

A second contextual element of interpretation of s. 1 is provided by the words "free and democratic society". Inclusion of these words as the final standard of justification for limits on rights and freedoms refers the Court to the very purpose for which the Charter was originally entrenched in the Constitution: Canadian society is to be free and democratic. The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society. The underlying values and principles of a free and democratic society are the genesis of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter and the respect de soi en tant qu'être humain et essentiel pour parvenir à cette satisfaction. Ce respect de soi et cette satisfaction sont, à mon avis, des biens fondamentaux pour l'être humain, la vie elle-même ne valant la peine d'être vécue qu'à la condition de les éprouver ou de les rechercher. L'individu auquel on refuserait délibérément la possibilité de parvenir au respect de lui-même et à cette satisfaction se verrait privé de l'essence de son humanité.

Le juge en chef Dickson, dans l'arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., soutient le même point de vue, à la p. 346:

Toutefois, il faut aussi remarquer que l'insistance sur la conscience et le jugement individuels est également au cœur de notre tradition politique démocratique. La possibilité qu'a chaque citoyen de prendre des décisions libres et éclairées constitue la condition sine qua non de la légitimité, de l'acceptabilité et de l'efficacité de notre système d'auto-détermination. C'est précisément parce que les droits qui se rattachent à la liberté de conscience individuelle se situent au cœur non seulement des convictions fondamentales quant à la valeur et à la dignité de l'être humain, mais aussi de tout système politique libre et démocratique, que la jurisprudence américaine a insisté sur la primauté ou la prééminence du Premier amendement. À mon avis, c'est pour cette même raison que la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés parle de libertés «fondamentales». Celles-ci constituent le fondement même de la tradition politique dans laquelle s'insère la Charte.

Le juge en chef Dickson a approfondi ce point de vue dans son analyse de l'interprétation de la Charte dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103, à la p. 136:

Un second élément contextuel d'interprétation de l'article premier est fourni par l'expression «société libre et démocratique». L'inclusion de ces mots à titre de norme finale de justification de la restriction des droits et libertés rappelle aux tribunaux l'objet même de l'enchâssement de la Charte dans la Constitution: la société canadienne doit être libre et démocratique. Les tribunaux doivent être guidés par des valeurs et des principes essentiels à une société libre et démocratique, lesquels comprennent, selon moi, le respect de la dignité inhérente de l'être humain, la promotion de la justice et de l'égalité sociales, l'acceptation d'une grande diversité de croyances, le respect de chaque culture et de chaque groupe et la foi dans les institutions sociales et politiques qui favorisent la participation des particuliers et des groupes dans la société. Les valeurs et les principes sous-jacents d'une société libre et démocratique sont à ultimate standard against which a limit on a right or freedom must be shown, despite its effect, to be reasonable and demonstrably justified.

The idea of human dignity finds expression in almost every right and freedom guaranteed in the Charter. Individuals are afforded the right to choose their own religion and their own philosophy of life, the right to choose with whom they will associate and how they will express themselves, the right to choose where they will live and what occupation they will pursue. These are all examples of the basic theory underlying the Charter, namely that the state will respect choices made by individuals and, to the greatest extent possible, will avoid subordinating these choices to any one conception of the good life.

Thus, an aspect of the respect for human dignity on which the Charter is founded is the right to make fundamental personal decisions without interference from the state. This right is a critical component of the right to liberty. Liberty, as was noted in Singh, is a phrase capable of a broad range of meaning. In my view, this right, properly construed, grants the individual a degree of autonomy in making decisions of fundamental personal importance.

This view is consistent with the position I took in the case of R. v. Jones, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 284. One issue raised in that case was whether the right to liberty in s. 7 of the Charter included a parent's right to bring up his children in accordance with his conscientious beliefs. In concluding that it did I stated at pp. 318-19:

> I believe that the framers of the Constitution in guaranteeing "liberty" as a fundamental value in a free and democratic society had in mind the freedom of the individual to develop and realize his potential to the full, to plan his own life to suit his own character, to make his own choices for good or ill, to be non-conformist, idiosyncratic and even eccentric — to be, in to-day's parlance, "his own person" and accountable as such. John Stuart Mill described it as "pursuing our own good in our own way". This, he believed, we should be free to l'origine des droits et libertés garantis par la Charte et constituent la norme fondamentale en fonction de laquelle on doit établir qu'une restriction d'un droit ou d'une liberté constitue, malgré son effet, une limite raisonnable dont la justification peut se démontrer.

La notion de dignité humaine trouve son expression dans presque tous les droits et libertés garantis par la Charte. Les individus se voient offrir le droit de choisir leur propre religion et leur propre philosophie de vie, de choisir qui ils fréquenteront et comment ils s'exprimeront, où ils vivront et à quelle occupation ils se livreront. Ce sont tous là des exemples de la théorie fondamentale qui sous-tend la Charte, savoir que l'État respectera les choix de chacun et, dans toute la mesure du possible, évitera de subordonner ces choix à toute conception particulière d'une vie de bien.

Ainsi, un aspect du respect de la dignité humaine sur lequel la Charte est fondée est le droit de prendre des décisions personnelles fondamentales sans intervention de l'État. Ce droit constitue une composante cruciale du droit à la liberté. La liberté, comme nous l'avons dit dans l'arrêt Singh, est un terme susceptible d'une acception fort large. À mon avis, ce droit, bien interprété, confère à l'individu une marge d'autonomie dans la prise de décisions d'importance fondamentale pour sa personne.

Ce point de vue est conforme à la position que j'ai prise dans l'arrêt R. c. Jones, [1986] 2 R.C.S. 284. Dans cette affaire, il s'agissait de déterminer notamment si le droit à la liberté énoncé à l'art. 7 de la Charte incluait le droit pour un père d'élever ses enfants conformément à ses croyances intimes. En concluant que c'était le cas, j'ai dit, aux pp. 318 et 319:

> Je crois que les rédacteurs de la Constitution en garantissant la «liberté» en tant que valeur fondamentale d'une société libre et démocratique, avaient à l'esprit la liberté pour l'individu de se développer et de réaliser son potentiel au maximum, d'établir son propre plan de vie, en accord avec sa personnalité; de faire ses propres choix, pour le meilleur ou pour le pire, d'être non conformiste, original et même excentrique, d'être, en langage courant, «lui-même» et d'être responsable en tant que tel. John Stuart Mill décrit cela ainsi: [TRA-do "so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs or impede their efforts to obtain it". He added:

> Each is the proper guardian of his own health, whether bodily or mental and spiritual. Mankind are greater gainers by suffering each other to live as seems good to themselves than by compelling each to live as seems good to the rest.

Liberty in a free and democratic society does not require the state to approve the personal decisions made by its citizens; it does, however, require the state to respect them.

This conception of the proper ambit of the right to liberty under our Charter is consistent with the American jurisprudence on the subject. While care must undoubtedly be taken to avoid a mechanical application of concepts developed in different cultural and constitutional contexts, I would respectfully agree with the observation of my colleague, Estey J., in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 357, at pp. 366-67:

> With the Constitution Act, 1982 comes a new dimension, a new yardstick of reconciliation between the individual and the community and their respective rights, a dimension which, like the balance of the Constitution, remains to be interpreted and applied by the Court.
> The courts in the United States have had almost two hundred years experience at this task and it is of more than passing interest to those concerned with these new developments in Canada to study the experience of the United States courts.

As early as the 1920's the American Supreme Court employed the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the American Constitution to give parents a degree of choice in the education of their children. In Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), the Court struck down a law prohibiting the teaching of any subject in a language other than English. In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), an Oregon statute requiring all "normal children" to attend public school and thus prohibiting private school attendance was held to be unconstitutional. The Court in Pierce at pp. 534-35 characterized the interest being infringed DUCTION] «rechercher notre propre bien, à notre façon». Nous devrions, pensait-il, être libre de le faire «dans la mesure où nous ne tentons pas de priver les autres du leur, ni d'entraver leurs efforts pour y parvenir». Il ajoutait:

> [TRADUCTION] Chacun est le véritable gardien de sa propre santé, tant physique que mentale et spirituelle. L'humanité a plus à gagner à laisser chacun vivre comme cela lui semble bon, qu'à forcer chacun à vivre comme cela semble bon aux autres.

La liberté dans une société libre et démocratique n'oblige pas l'État à approuver les décisions personnelles de ses citoyens; elle l'oblige cependant à les respecter.

Cette conception de la portée qu'il convient de donner au droit à la liberté sous le régime de notre Charte est conforme à la jurisprudence américaine sur le sujet. Quoiqu'il faille sans doute prendre garde d'appliquer mécaniquement des concepts élaborés dans des contextes culturels et constitutionnels différents, je souscris à l'observation que fait le juge Estey dans l'arrêt Law Society of Upper Canada c. Skapinker, [1984] 1 R.C.S. 357, aux pp. 366 et 367:

> La Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 apporte une nouvelle dimension, un nouveau critère d'équilibre entre les individus et la société et leurs droits respectifs, une dimension qui, comme l'équilibre de la Constitution, devra être interprétée et appliquée par la Cour.
> Les tribunaux américains ont presque deux cents ans d'expérience dans l'accomplissement de cette tâche, et l'analyse de leur expérience offre plus qu'un intérêt passager pour ceux qui s'intéressent à cette nouvelle évolution au Canada.

Dès les années 20, la Cour suprême des États-Unis a eu recours au Cinquième et au Quatorzième amendements de la Constitution américaine pour accorder aux parents une certaine latitude dans l'éducation de leurs enfants. Dans l'arrêt Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), la Cour a annulé une loi interdisant l'enseignement, quelle que soit la matière, dans une langue autre que l'anglais. Dans l'arrêt Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925), une loi de l'Oregon obligeant tous les «enfants normaux» à fréquenter l'école publique, et leur interdisant par le fait même la fréquentation d'une école privée, a été jugée as "the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control".

The sanctity of the family was underlined by the decision in Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), where the Supreme Court invalidated a state law authorizing the sterilization of individuals convicted of two or more crimes involving moral turpitude. While the law was struck down on the basis that it violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court had this to say of the interest at stake: "We are dealing here with legislation which involves one of the basic civil rights of man. Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race" (at p. 541).

Later the Supreme Court was asked to determine the constitutionality of a Connecticut statute forbidding the use of contraceptives by married couples. In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), the majority held this statute to be invalid. The judges writing for the majority used various constitutional routes to arrive at this conclusion but the common denominator seems to have been a profound concern over the invasion of the marital home required for the enforcement of the law. Griswold was interpreted by the Supreme Court in the later case of Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), where the majority stated at p. 453:

> It is true that in Griswold the right of privacy in question inhered in the marital relationship. Yet the marital couple is not an independent entity with a mind and heart of its own, but an association of two individuals each with a separate intellectual and emotional make up. If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child.

In Eisenstadt the Court struck down a Massachusetts law that prohibited the distribution of any Le caractère sacré de la famille a été souligné par l'arrêt Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), où la Cour suprême a invalidé la loi d'un État qui autorisait la stérilisation des individus reconnus coupables de deux ou plusieurs crimes impliquant la turpitude morale. Quoique la loi ait été annulée parce qu'elle violait la clause de l'égale protection de la loi établie par le Quatorzième amendement, voici ce que la Cour a dit de l'intérêt en cause: [TRADUCTION] "Nous avons affaire ici à une loi qui touche aux droits civils fondamentaux de l'homme. Le mariage et la procréation sont fondamentaux pour l'existence et la survie mêmes de la race" (à la p. 541).

Ultérieurement, la Cour suprême a été appelée à statuer sur la constitutionnalité d'une loi du Connecticut interdisant aux gens mariés d'utiliser des contraceptifs. Dans l'arrêt Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), la majorité a jugé cette loi invalide. Les juges qui ont écrit au nom de la majorité ont emprunté diverses voies constitutionnelles pour arriver à cette conclusion, mais le dénominateur commun semble avoir été une profonde appréhension que l'application de la loi exige une incursion dans le foyer conjugal. La Cour suprême a interprété l'arrêt Griswold dans une affaire ultérieure, Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), où elle a dit, à la majorité, à la p. 453:

> [TRADUCTION] Il est vrai que dans l'arrêt Griswold le droit à la vie privée en cause a été considéré comme inhérent à la relation conjugale. Néanmoins le couple marié n'est pas une entité indépendante dotée d'un esprit et d'un cœur distincts, mais une association de deux individus, chacun pourvu de caractéristiques intellectuelles et émotionnelles distinctes. Si le droit à la vie privée signifie quelque chose, c'est bien le droit de l'individu, marié ou célibataire, d'être libre de toute intrusion gouvernementale injustifiée dans des domaines touchant si fondamentalement à la personne, comme la décision de porter ou de mettre au monde un enfant.

Dans l'arrêt Eisenstadt, la Cour a annulé une loi du Massachusetts qui interdisait la distribution de drug for the purposes of contraception to unmarried persons on the ground that it violated the equal protection clause.

The equal protection clause was also used by the Supreme Court in Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), to strike down legislation that purported to forbid inter-racial marriage. The Court tied its decision to the previous line of cases that protected basic choices relating to family life. It stated at p. 12: "The freedom to marry has long been recognized as one of the 'vital personal rights essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men. Marriage is one of the 'basic civil rights of man,' fundamental to our very existence and survival .... [The] freedom to marry . . . resides with the individual...." Thus, by a process of accretion the scope of the right of individuals to make fundamental decisions affecting their private lives was elaborated in the United States on a case by case basis. The parameters of the fence were being progressively defined.

For our purposes the most interesting development in this area of American law are the decisions of the Supreme Court in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), and its sister case Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973). In Roe v. Wade the Court held that a pregnant woman has the right to decide whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. This conclusion, the majority stated, was mandated by the body of existing law ensuring that the state would not be allowed to interfere with certain fundamental personal decisions such as education, child-rearing, procreation, marriage and contraception. The Court concluded that the right to privacy found in the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee of liberty "... is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy" (p. 153).

This right was not, however, to be taken as absolute. At some point the legitimate state interests in the protection of health, proper medical standards, and pre-natal life would justify its qualification. Lawrence H. Tribe, Professor of Law at Harvard University, in his work entitled toute drogue à des fins de contraception aux gens non mariés pour le motif qu'elle violait la clause de l'égale protection de la loi.

La Cour suprême a aussi eu recours à la clause de l'égale protection de la loi dans l'arrêt Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), pour invalider une loi qui avait pour objet d'interdire les mariages raciaux mixtes. La Cour a lié sa décision à la jurisprudence antérieure qui protégeait les choix fondamentaux en matière de vie familiale. Elle dit, à la p. 12: [TRADUCTION] «La liberté de se marier est reconnue depuis longtemps comme l'un des droits vitaux personnels essentiels à la recherche méthodique du bonheur par les hommes libres. Le mariage est l'un des «droits civils fondamentaux de l'homme», le fondement de notre existence et de notre survie mêmes . . . [La] liberté de se marier . . . réside chez l'individu». Ainsi, en quelque sorte par accrétion, l'étendue du droit des individus de prendre des décisions fondamentales concernant leur vie privée a été élaborée cas par cas aux États-Unis. Les dimensions de la barrière ont ainsi été progressivement définies.

Pour nos fins, les décisions concomitantes de la Cour suprême Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), et Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973), constituent le développement le plus intéressant dans ce domaine du droit américain. Dans l'arrêt Roe v. Wade, la Cour a jugé qu'une femme enceinte a le droit de décider d'interrompre ou non sa grossesse. Cette conclusion, a dit la majorité, était imposée par le corps de droit existant qui interdit à l'État d'intervenir dans certaines décisions personnelles fondamentales telles l'enseignement donné aux enfants et leur éducation, la procréation, le mariage et la contraception. La Cour a conclu que le droit à la vie privée que l'on trouve dans la garantie de la liberté du Quatorzième amendement [TRADUCTION] «... est suffisamment large pour inclure la décision d'une femme d'interrompre ou non sa grossesse» (à la p. 153).

Ce droit ne doit pas, toutefois, être considéré comme absolu. Parvenu à un certain point, les intérêts légitimes de l'État vis-à-vis de la protection de la santé, des normes médicales appropriées et de la vie fœtale justifient de le restreindre. Dans son ouvrage intitulé American Constitutional Law, American Constitutional Law (1978), conveniently summarizes the limits the Court found to be inherent in the woman's right. I quote from pp. 924-25:

Specifically, the Court held that, because the woman's right to decide whether or not to end a pregnancy is fundamental, only a compelling interest can justify state regulation impinging in any way upon that right. During the first trimester of pregnancy, when abortion is less hazardous in terms of the woman's life than carrying the child to term would be, the state may require only that the abortion be performed by a licensed physician; no further regulations peculiar to abortion as such are compellingly justified in that period.

After the first trimester, the compelling state interest in the mother's health permits it to adopt reasonable regulations in order to promote safe abortions — but requiring abortions to be performed in hospitals, or only after approval of another doctor or committee in addition to the woman's physician, is impermissible, as is requiring that the abortion procedure employ a technique that, however preferable from a medical perspective, is not widely available.

Once the fetus is viable, in the sense that it is capable of survival outside the uterus with artificial aid, the state interest in preserving the fetus becomes compelling, and the state may thus proscribe its premature removal (i.e., its abortion) except to preserve the mother's life or health.

The decision in Roe v. Wade was re-affirmed by the Supreme Court in City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983), and again, though by a bare majority, in Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 106 S. Ct. 2169 (1986). In Thornburgh, Blackmun J., speaking for the majority, identifies the core value which the American courts have found to inhere in the concept of liberty. He states at pp. 2184-85:

Our cases long have recognized that the Constitution embodies a promise that a certain private sphere of individual liberty will be kept largely beyond the reach of government . . . . [citations omitted] That promise extends to women as well as to men. Few decisions are more personal and intimate, more properly private, or more basic to individual dignity and autonomy, than a 1978, Lawrence H. Tribe, professeur de droit à l'Université Harvard, donne un résumé commode des limites que la Cour a jugé inhérentes au droit de la femme. Je cite les pp. 924 et 925:

[TRADUCTION] Plus précisément, la Cour a jugé que, puisque le droit de la femme de décider d'interrompre ou non une grossesse est fondamental, seul un intérêt supérieur peut justifier une réglementation de l'État qui entraverait ce droit de quelque façon. Au cours du premier trimestre de la grossesse, alors que l'avortement est moins dangereux pour la vie de la femme que mener la grossesse à terme le serait, tout ce que l'État peut exiger, c'est que l'avortement soit pratiqué par un médecin qualifié; aucune autre réglementation de l'avortement comme tel n'est impérieusement justifiée au cours de cette période.

Après le premier trimestre, l'intérêt supérieur de l'État dans la santé de la mère l'autorise à adopter une réglementation raisonnable afin de favoriser des avortements sans danger; mais exiger que les avortements ne soient pratiqués que dans des hôpitaux, ou uniquement après qu'un autre médecin ou comité aura donné son aval, outre le médecin de la femme, ne saurait être autorisé, car ce serait exiger que la procédure d'avortement suive une technique qui, si préférable soit-elle dans une optique médicale, n'est pas largement répandue.

Lorsque le fœtus devient viable, en ce sens qu'il peut survivre à l'extérieur de l'utérus pourvu qu'on l'aide artificiellement, l'intérêt de l'État dans la préservation du fœtus devient supérieur et l'État peut alors interdire qu'on l'enlève prématurément (c.-à-d. le faire avorter) sauf pour préserver la vie ou la santé de la mère.

L'arrêt Roe v. Wade a été réaffirmé par la Cour suprême dans l'arrêt City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., 462 U.S. 416 (1983), et aussi, quoique par une très mince majorité, dans l'arrêt Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 106 S. Ct. 2169 (1986). Dans l'arrêt Thornburgh, le juge Blackmun, s'exprimant au nom de la majorité, cerne la valeur centrale que les tribunaux américains ont jugé inhérente à la notion de liberté. Il dit, aux pp. 2184 et 2185:

[TRADUCTION] Notre jurisprudence reconnaît depuis longtemps que la Constitution comporte la promesse qu'une certaine sphère privée de la liberté individuelle demeurera largement hors de portée du gouvernement . . . [références omises]. Cette promesse vaut pour les femmes autant que pour les hommes. Peu de décisions sont aussi personnelles et intimes, aussi littéralement woman's decision — with the guidance of her physician and within the limits specified in Roe — whether to end her pregnancy. A woman's right to make that choice freely is fundamental. Any other result, in our view, would protect inadequately a central part of the sphere of liberty that our law guarantees equally to all.

In my opinion, the respect for individual decision-making in matters of fundamental personal importance reflected in the American jurisprudence also informs the Canadian Charter. Indeed, as the Chief Justice pointed out in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., beliefs about human worth and dignity "are the sine qua non of the political tradition underlying the Charter". I would conclude, therefore, that the right to liberty contained in s. 7 guarantees to every individual a degree of personal autonomy over important decisions intimately affecting their private lives.

The question then becomes whether the decision of a woman to terminate her pregnancy falls within this class of protected decisions. I have no doubt that it does. This decision is one that will have profound psychological, economic and social consequences for the pregnant woman. The circumstances giving rise to it can be complex and varied and there may be, and usually are, powerful considerations militating in opposite directions. It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision; it is a profound social and ethical one as well. Her response to it will be the response of the whole person.

It is probably impossible for a man to respond, even imaginatively, to such a dilemma not just because it is outside the realm of his personal experience (although this is, of course, the case) but because he can relate to it only by objectifying it, thereby eliminating the subjective elements of the female psyche which are at the heart of the dilemma. As Noreen Burrows, lecturer in European Law at the University of Glasgow, has point-privées ou aussi fondamentales pour la dignité et l'autonomie individuelles que la décision prise par une femme — sur les conseils de son médecin et dans les limites indiquées dans l'arrêt Roe — d'interrompre ou non une grossesse. Le droit de la femme de faire ce choix librement est fondamental. Toute autre conclusion, à notre avis, protégerait inadéquatement un aspect central de cette sphère de liberté que notre droit garantit également à tous.

À mon avis, le respect du pouvoir décisionnel de l'individu dans des domaines d'importance personnelle aussi fondamentaux que traduit la jurisprudence américaine nous renseigne aussi sur la Charte canadienne. D'ailleurs, comme le Juge en chef le rappelle dans l'arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., la foi en la valeur et en la dignité humaines «constitue [. . .] le fondement même de la tradition politique dans laquelle s'insère la Charte». Je conclus donc que le droit à la liberté énoncé à l'art. 7 garantit à chaque individu une marge d'autonomie personnelle sur ses décisions importantes touchant intimement à sa vie privée.

La question devient alors de savoir si la décision que prend une femme d'interrompre sa grossesse relève de cette catégorie de décisions protégées. Je n'ai pas de doute que ce soit le cas. Cette décision aura des conséquences psychologiques, économiques et sociales profondes pour la femme enceinte. Les circonstances qui y mènent peuvent être compliquées et multiples et il peut y avoir, comme c'est généralement le cas, des considérations puissantes en faveur de décisions opposées. C'est une décision qui reflète profondément l'opinion qu'une femme a d'elle-même, ses rapports avec les autres et avec la société en général. Ce n'est pas seulement une décision d'ordre médical; elle est aussi profondément d'ordre social et éthique. La réponse qu'elle y donne sera la réponse de tout son être.

Il est probablement impossible pour un homme d'imaginer une réponse à un tel dilemme, non seulement parce qu'il se situe en dehors du domaine de son expérience personnelle (ce qui, bien entendu, est le cas), mais aussi parce qu'il ne peut y réagir qu'en l'objectivant et en éliminant par le fait même les éléments subjectifs de la psyché féminine qui sont au cœur du dilemme. Comme Noreen Burrows, maître de conférence en ed out in her essay on "International Law and Human Rights: the Case of Women's Rights", in Human Rights: From Rhetoric to Reality (1986), the history of the struggle for human rights from the eighteenth century on has been the history of men struggling to assert their dignity and common humanity against an overbearing state apparatus. The more recent struggle for women's rights has been a struggle to eliminate discrimination, to achieve a place for women in a man's world, to develop a set of legislative reforms in order to place women in the same position as men (pp. 81-82). It has not been a struggle to define the rights of women in relation to their special place in the societal structure and in relation to the biological distinction between the two sexes. Thus, women's needs and aspirations are only now being translated into protected rights. The right to reproduce or not to reproduce which is in issue in this case is one such right and is properly perceived as an integral part of modern woman's struggle to assert her dignity and worth as a human being.

Given then that the right to liberty guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter gives a woman the right to decide for herself whether or not to terminate her pregnancy, does s. 251 of the Criminal Code violate this right? Clearly it does. The purpose of the section is to take the decision away from the woman and give it to a committee. Furthermore, as the Chief Justice correctly points out, at p. 56, the committee bases its decision on "criteria entirely unrelated to [the pregnant woman's] own priorities and aspirations". The fact that the decision whether a woman will be allowed to terminate her pregnancy is in the hands of a committee is just as great a violation of the woman's right to personal autonomy in decisions of an intimate and private nature as it would be if a committee were established to decide whether a woman should be allowed to continue her pregnancy. Both these arrangements violate the woman's right to liberty by deciding for her something that she has the right to decide for herself.

droit européen à l'Université de Glasgow, le fait observer dans son essai "International Law and Human Rights: the Case of Women's Rights", dans Human Rights: From Rhetoric to Reality (1986), l'histoire du combat pour les droits de la personne, du dix-huitième siècle à aujourd'hui, est l'histoire des hommes qui ont lutté pour affirmer leur dignité et leur commune humanité contre un appareil d'État autoritaire. Plus récemment, la lutte pour la reconnaissance des droits des femmes a été un combat contre la discrimination, pour que les femmes trouvent une place dans un monde d'hommes, pour élaborer un ensemble de réformes législatives afin de placer les femmes sur le même pied que les hommes (aux pp. 81 et 82). Il ne s'agit pas d'une lutte pour définir les droits des femmes par rapport à leur position particulière dans la structure sociale et par rapport à la différence biologique entre les deux sexes. Ainsi les besoins et les aspirations des femmes se traduisent seulement aujourd'hui en des droits garantis. Le droit de se reproduire ou de ne pas se reproduire, qui est en cause en l'espèce, est l'un de ces droits et c'est à raison qu'on le considère comme faisant partie intégrante de la lutte contemporaine de la femme pour affirmer sa dignité et sa valeur en tant qu'être humain.

Étant donné alors que le droit à la liberté garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte confère à une femme le droit de décider elle-même d'interrompre ou non sa grossesse, l'art. 251 du Code criminel viole-t-il ce droit? Manifestement il le viole. L'article a pour objet d'enlever cette décision à la femme pour confier à un comité le soin de la prendre. En outre, comme le Juge en chef l'observe à juste titre, à la p. 56, le comité fonde sa décision sur "des critères totalement sans rapport avec ses [celles de la femme enceinte] propres priorités et aspirations". Le fait que la décision d'autoriser ou non une femme à interrompre sa grossesse soit dans les mains d'un comité est une violation tout aussi grave du droit de la femme à l'autonomie personnelle en matière de décision de nature intime et privée que serait celle d'établir un comité pour décider s'il faut autoriser une femme à mener sa grossesse à terme. Dans les deux cas, il y a violation du droit de la femme à la liberté, car on décide pour elle ce qu'elle a le droit de décider elle-même.

(b) The Right to Security of the Person

Section 7 of the Charter also guarantees everyone the right to security of the person. Does this, as Mr. Manning suggests, extend to the right of control over one's own body?

I agree with the Chief Justice and with Beetz J. that the right to "security of the person" under s. 7 of the Charter protects both the physical and psychological integrity of the individual. State enforced medical or surgical treatment comes readily to mind as an obvious invasion of physical integrity. Lamer J. held in Mills v. The Queen, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 863, that the right to security of the person entitled a person to be protected against psychological trauma as well — in that case the psychological trauma resulting from delays in the trial process under s. 11(b) of the Charter. He found that psychological trauma could take the form of "stigmatization of the accused, loss of privacy, stress and anxiety resulting from a multitude of factors, including possible disruption of family, social life and work, legal costs, uncertainty as to outcome and sanction". I agree with my colleague and I think that his comments are very germane to the instant case because, as the Chief Justice and Beetz J. point out, the present legislative scheme for the obtaining of an abortion clearly subjects pregnant women to considerable emotional stress as well as to unnecessary physical risk. I believe, however, that the flaw in the present legislative scheme goes much deeper than that. In essence, what it does is assert that the woman's capacity to reproduce is not to be subject to her own control. It is to be subject to the control of the state. She may not choose whether to exercise her existing capacity or not to exercise it. This is not, in my view, just a matter of interfering with her right to liberty in the sense (already discussed) of her right to personal autonomy in decision-making, it is a direct interference with her physical "person" as well. She is truly being treated as a means — a means to an end which she does not desire but over which she has no control. She is the passive recipient of a decision made by others as to whether her body is to be used to nurture a new life. Can there be anything that comports less with human dignity and self-respect? How can a woman in this

b) Le droit à la sécurité de sa personne

L'article 7 de la Charte garantit aussi à chacun le droit à la sécurité de sa personne. Cela va-t-il, comme le prétend Me Manning, jusqu'au droit à la maîtrise de son propre corps?

Je suis d'accord avec le Juge en chef et le juge Beetz pour dire que le droit de chacun à «la sécurité de sa personne» garanti par l'art. 7 de la Charte protège à la fois l'intégrité physique et psychologique de la personne. Les traitements médicaux ou chirurgicaux imposés par l'État viennent tout de suite à l'esprit comme exemples d'atteintes manifestes à l'intégrité corporelle. Le juge Lamer a conclu dans l'arrêt Mills c. La Reine, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 863, qu'aux termes du droit à la sécurité de la personne on avait aussi le droit d'être protégé contre le traumatisme psychologique: dans cette affaire, le traumatisme psychologique résultait du retard à être jugé au sens de l'al. 11*b*) de la Charte. Il a conclu que le traumatisme psychologique pouvait prendre pour forme «la stigmatisation de l'accusé, l'atteinte à la vie privée, la tension et l'angoisse résultant d'une multitude de facteurs, y compris éventuellement les perturbations de la vie familiale, sociale et professionnelle, les frais de justice et l'incertitude face à l'issue et face à la peine». Je partage l'opinion de mon collègue et j'estime ses commentaires particulièrement appropriés en l'espèce car, comme le Juge en chef et le juge Beetz le soulignent, la structure législative actuelle d'obtention d'un avortement soumet clairement les femmes enceintes à une tension émotionnelle considérable ainsi qu'à un risque physique inutile. Je crois néanmoins que la faille dans la structure législative actuelle est beaucoup plus profonde. Essentiellement, ce qu'elle fait, c'est affirmer que la capacité de reproduction de la femme ne doit pas être soumise à son propre contrôle. Elle doit être soumise au contrôle de l'État. On ne lui permet pas de choisir d'exercer la capacité qui est la sienne ou de ne pas l'exercer. À mon avis, il ne s'agit pas seulement d'une entrave à son droit à la liberté au sens (déjà analysé) de son droit à son autonomie décisionnelle personnelle, c'est aussi une atteinte à sa «personne» physique. Elle est littéralement traitée comme un moyen, un moyen pour une fin qu'elle ne désire pas et qu'elle ne position have any sense of security with respect to her person? I believe that s. 251 of the Criminal Code deprives the pregnant woman of her right to security of the person as well as her right to liberty.

2. The Scope of the Right under s. 7

I turn now to a consideration of the degree of personal autonomy the pregnant woman has under s. 7 of the Charter when faced with a decision whether or not to have an abortion or, to put it into the legislative context, the degree to which the legislature can deny the pregnant woman access to abortion without violating her s. 7 right. This involves a consideration of the extent to which the legislature can "deprive" her of it under the second part of s. 7 and the extent to which it can put "limits" on it under s. 1.

(a) The Principles of Fundamental Justice

Does section 251 deprive women of their right to liberty and to security of the person "in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice"? I agree with Lamer J. who stated in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, at p. 513, that the principles of fundamental justice "cannot be given any exhaustive content or simple enumerative definition, but will take on concrete meaning as the courts address alleged violations of s. 7". In the same judgment Lamer J. also stated at p. 503:

In other words, the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system. They do not lie in the realm of general public policy but in the inherent domain of the judiciary as guardian of the justice system. Such an approach to the interpretation of "principles of fundamental justice" is consistent with the wording and structure of s. 7, the context of the section, i.e., ss. 8 to 14, and the character and larger objects of the Charter itself. It provides meaningful content for the contrôle pas. Elle subit une décision prise par d'autres sur l'éventuelle utilisation de son corps pour alimenter une nouvelle vie. Que peut-il y avoir de moins compatible avec la dignité humaine et le respect de soi? Comment une femme dans cette situation peut-elle entretenir un quelconque sentiment de sécurité à l'égard de sa personne? Je crois que l'art. 251 du Code criminel prive la femme enceinte à la fois de son droit à la sécurité de sa personne et de son droit à la liberté.

2. La portée du droit garanti par l'art. 7

J'examine maintenant le degré d'autonomie personnelle dont jouit la femme enceinte en vertu de l'art. 7 de la Charte, lorsqu'elle a à prendre la décision de se faire avorter ou non ou, pour situer la question dans son cadre législatif, jusqu'à quel point le législateur peut refuser à la femme enceinte de se faire avorter sans violer le droit que lui garantit l'art. 7. Ceci amène à examiner dans quelle mesure le législateur peut y «porter atteinte», dans son cas, en vertu du second volet de l'art. 7 et dans quelle mesure il peut le restreindre par des «limites» en vertu de l'article premier.

a) Les principes de justice fondamentale

L'article 251 prive-t-il les femmes de leur droit à la liberté et à la sécurité de leur personne «en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale»? Je partage l'opinion du juge Lamer lorsqu'il dit, dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486, à la p. 513, en parlant des principes de justice fondamentale, «on ne peut donner à ces mots un contenu exhaustif ou une simple définition par énumération; ils prendront un sens concret au fur et à mesure que les tribunaux étudieront des allégations de violation de l'art. 7.» Dans le même arrêt, le juge Lamer dit aussi, à la p. 503:

En d'autres mots, les principes de justice fondamentale se trouvent dans les préceptes fondamentaux de notre système juridique. Ils relèvent non pas du domaine de l'ordre public en général, mais du pouvoir inhérent de l'appareil judiciaire en tant que gardien du système judiciaire. Cette façon d'aborder l'interprétation de l'expression «principes de justice fondamentale» est conforme à la lettre et à l'économie de l'art. 7, au contexte de cet article, c.-à-d. les art. 8 à 14, ainsi qu'à la nature

s. 7 guarantee all the while avoiding adjudication of policy matters.

While Lamer J. draws mainly upon ss. 8 to 14 of the Charter to give substantive content to the principles of fundamental justice, he does not preclude, but seems rather to encourage, the idea that recourse may be had to other rights guaranteed by the Charter for the same purpose. The question, therefore, is whether the deprivation of the s. 7 right is in accordance not only with procedural fairness (and I agree with the Chief Justice and Beetz J. for the reasons they give that it is not) but also with the fundamental rights and freedoms laid down elsewhere in the Charter.

This approach to s. 7 is supported by comments made by La Forest J. in R. v. Lyons, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 309. He urged that the rights enshrined in the Charter should not be read in isolation. Rather, he states at p. 326:

> . . . the Charter protects a complex of interacting values, each more or less fundamental to the free and democratic society that is Canada (R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, at p. 136), and the particularization of rights and freedoms contained in the Charter thus represents a somewhat artificial, if necessary and intrinsically worthwhile attempt to structure and focus the judicial exposition of such rights and freedoms. The necessity of structuring the discussion should not, however, lead us to overlook the importance of appreciating the manner in which the amplification of the content of each enunciated right and freedom imbues and informs our understanding of the value structure sought to be protected by the Charter as a whole and, in particular, of the content of the other specific rights and freedoms it embodies.

I believe, therefore, that a deprivation of the s. 7 right which has the effect of infringing a right guaranteed elsewhere in the Charter cannot be in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

In my view, the deprivation of the s. 7 right with which we are concerned in this case offends s. 2(a) of the Charter. I say this because I believe that the decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy is essentially a moral decision, a matter of con-et aux objets plus généraux de la Charte elle-même. Elle donne de la substance aux droits garantis par l'art. 7 tout en évitant de trancher des questions de politique générale.

Quoique le juge Lamer puise surtout dans les art. 8 à 14 de la Charte pour donner une substance aux principes de justice fondamentale, il n'écarte pas l'idée, qu'il semble au contraire encourager, qu'on puisse recourir aux autres droits garantis par la Charte dans le même but. Il faut donc se demander si l'atteinte au droit garanti par l'art. 7 respecte non seulement l'équité en matière de procédure (et je suis d'accord avec les motifs que le Juge en chef et le juge Beetz donnent pour exposer que tel n'est pas le cas), mais aussi les droits et libertés fondamentaux énoncés ailleurs dans la Charte.

Les commentaires du juge La Forest dans l'arrêt R. c. Lyons, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 309, vont dans le sens de cette conception de l'art. 7. Il invite à ne pas interpréter les droits enchâssés dans la Charte isolément. Au contraire, dit-il, à la p. 326:

> . . . la Charte sert à sauvegarder un ensemble complexe de valeurs interreliées, dont chacune constitue un élément plus ou moins fondamental de la société libre et démocratique qu'est le Canada (R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103, à la p. 136), et la spécification des droits et libertés dans la Charte représente en conséquence une tentative quelque peu artificielle, quoique nécessaire et intrinsèquement valable, de structurer et d'orienter l'expression judiciaire de ces mêmes droits et libertés. La nécessité d'une analyse structurée ne devrait toutefois pas nous amener à perdre de vue l'importance que revêt la manière dont l'élargissement de la portée de chaque droit et liberté énoncé donne sens et forme à notre compréhension du système de valeurs que vise à protéger la Charte dans son ensemble et, en particulier, à notre compréhension de la portée des autres droits et libertés qu'elle garantit.

Je crois donc qu'une atteinte au droit conféré par l'art. 7 qui a pour effet d'enfreindre un droit que garantit par ailleurs la Charte ne saurait être conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale.

À mon avis, l'atteinte au droit conféré par l'art. 7 qui nous intéresse en l'espèce enfreint l'al. 2*a*) de la Charte. Si je dis ceci, c'est que je crois que la décision d'interrompre ou non une grossesse est essentiellement une décision morale, une question science. I do not think there is or can be any dispute about that. The question is: whose conscience? Is the conscience of the woman to be paramount or the conscience of the state? I believe, for the reasons I gave in discussing the right to liberty, that in a free and democratic society it must be the conscience of the individual. Indeed, s. 2(a) makes it clear that this freedom belongs to "everyone", i.e., to each of us individually. I quote the section for convenience:

> 2. Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
>
> (a) freedom of conscience and religion;

In R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, Dickson C.J. made some very insightful comments about the nature of the right enshrined in s. 2(a) of the Charter at pp. 345-47:

> Beginning, however, with the Independent faction within the Parliamentary party during the Commonwealth or Interregnum, many, even among those who shared the basic beliefs of the ascendent religion, came to voice opposition to the use of the State's coercive power to secure obedience to religious precepts and to extirpate non-conforming beliefs. The basis of this opposition was no longer simply a conviction that the State was enforcing the wrong set of beliefs and practices but rather the perception that belief itself was not amenable to compulsion. Attempts to compel belief or practice denied the reality of individual conscience and dishonoured the God that had planted it in His creatures. It is from these antecedents that the concepts of freedom of religion and freedom of conscience became associated, to form, as they do in s. 2(a) of our Charter, the single integrated concept of "freedom of conscience and religion".

What unites enunciated freedoms in the American First Amendment, in s. 2(a) of the Charter and in the provisions of other human rights documents in which they are associated is the notion of the centrality of individual conscience and the inappropriateness of governmental intervention to compel or to constrain its manifestation. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., supra, the purpose of the Charter was identified, at p. 155, as "the unremitting protection of individual rights and liberties". It is easy to see the relationship between respect de conscience. Je ne pense pas qu'on le conteste ni puisse le contester. La question qui se pose est donc: quelle conscience? La conscience de la femme doit-elle prévaloir sur la conscience de l'État? Je crois, pour les raisons que j'ai données dans mon analyse du droit à la liberté, que dans une société libre et démocratique ce doit être la conscience de l'individu. D'ailleurs l'al. 2*a*) dit clairement que cette liberté c'est celle de "chacun", c.-à-d. de chacun de nous pris individuellement. Je cite l'alinéa pour plus de commodité:

> 2. Chacun a les libertés fondamentales suivantes:
> a) liberté de conscience et de religion;

Dans l'arrêt R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., précité, le juge en chef Dickson fait preuve d'une grande perspicacité dans ses commentaires sur la nature du droit enchâssé à l'al. 2*a*) de la Charte, aux pp. 345 à 347:

> Toutefois, suivant le mouvement amorcé à l'époque du Commonwealth ou de l'Interrègne par la faction dite «indépendante» au sein du parti parlementaire, bien des gens, même parmi les adeptes des croyances fondamentales de la religion dominante, ont fini par s'opposer à ce que le pouvoir coercitif de l'État soit utilisé pour assurer l'obéissance à des préceptes religieux et pour extirper les croyances non conformistes. Il s'agissait, à ce moment-là, non plus d'une opposition fondée simplement sur la conviction que l'État imposait l'observance des mauvaises croyances et pratiques, mais d'une opposition fondée sur le sentiment que la croyance elle-même n'était pas quelque chose qui pouvait être imposé. Toute tentative d'imposer l'observance de croyances et de pratiques constituait un déni de la réalité de la conscience individuelle et déshonorait le Dieu qui en avait doté Ses créatures. Voilà donc comment les concepts de la liberté de religion et de la liberté de conscience se sont rattachés pour former, comme c'est le cas à l'al. 2*a*) de notre Charte, une seule et unique notion qui est la «liberté de conscience et de religion».

Les libertés énoncées dans le Premier amendement de la Constitution des États-Unis, à l'al. 2*a*) de la Charte et dans les dispositions d'autres documents relatifs aux droits de la personne ont en commun la prééminence de la conscience individuelle et l'inopportunité de toute intervention gouvernementale visant à forcer ou à empêcher sa manifestation. L'arrêt Hunter c. Southam Inc. précité, précise à la p. 155, que la Charte a pour objet «la protection constante des droits et libertés individuels». On voit facilement le rapport entre le respect de for individual conscience and the valuation of human dignity that motivates such unremitting protection.

It should also be noted, however, that an emphasis on individual conscience and individual judgment also lies at the heart of our democratic political tradition. The ability of each citizen to make free and informed decisions is the absolute prerequisite for the legitimacy, acceptability, and efficacy of our system of self-government. It is because of the centrality of the rights associated with freedom of individual conscience both to basic beliefs about human worth and dignity and to a free and democratic political system that American jurisprudence has emphasized the primacy or "firstness" of the First Amendment. It is this same centrality that in my view underlies their designation in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as "fundamental". They are the sine qua non of the political tradition underlying the Charter.

Viewed in this context, the purpose of freedom of conscience and religion becomes clear. The values that underlie our political and philosophic traditions demand that every individual be free to hold and to manifest whatever beliefs and opinions his or her conscience dictates, provided inter alia only that such manifestations do not injure his or her neighbours or their parallel rights to hold and manifest beliefs and opinions of their own. Religious belief and practice are historically prototypical and, in many ways, paradigmatic of conscientiously-held beliefs and manifestations and are therefore protected by the Charter. Equally protected, and for the same reasons, are expressions and manifestations of religious non-belief and refusals to participate in religious practice. It may perhaps be that freedom of conscience and religion extends beyond these principles to prohibit other sorts of governmental involvement in matters having to do with religion. For the present case it is sufficient in my opinion to say that whatever else freedom of conscience and religion may mean, it must at the very least mean this: government may not coerce individuals to affirm a specific religious belief or to manifest a specific religious practice for a sectarian purpose. I leave to another case the degree, if any, to which the government may, to achieve a vital interest or objective, engage in coercive action which s. 2(a) might otherwise prohibit. [Emphasis added.]

The Chief Justice sees religious belief and practice as the paradigmatic example of conscientiously-held beliefs and manifestations and as such la conscience individuelle et la valorisation de la dignité humaine qui motive cette protection constante.

Toutefois, il faut aussi remarquer que l'insistance sur la conscience et le jugement individuels est également au a cœur de notre tradition politique démocratique. La possibilité qu'a chaque citoyen de prendre des décisions libres et éclairées constitue la condition sine qua non de la légitimité, de l'acceptabilité et de l'efficacité de notre système d'auto-détermination. C'est précisément parce b que les droits qui se rattachent à la liberté de conscience individuelle se situent au cœur non seulement des convictions fondamentales quant à la valeur et à la dignité de l'être humain, mais aussi de tout système politique libre et démocratique, que la jurisprudence américaine a c insisté sur la primauté ou la prééminence du Premier amendement. À mon avis, c'est pour cette même raison que la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés parle de libertés «fondamentales». Celles-ci constituent le fondement même de la tradition politique dans laquelle s'in*d* sère la Charte.

Vu sous cet angle, l'objet de la liberté de conscience et de religion devient évident. Les valeurs qui sous-tendent nos traditions politiques et philosophiques exigent que chacun soit libre d'avoir et de manifester les croyances e et les opinions que lui dicte sa conscience, à la condition notamment que ces manifestations ne lèsent pas ses semblables ou leur propre droit d'avoir et de manifester leurs croyances et opinions personnelles. Historiquement, la foi et la pratique religieuses sont, à bien des f égards, des archétypes des croyances et manifestations dictées par la conscience et elles sont donc protégées par la Charte. La même protection s'applique, pour les mêmes motifs, aux expressions et manifestations d'incroyance et au refus d'observer les pratiques religieuses. g Il se peut que la liberté de conscience et de religion outrepasse ces principes et qu'elle ait pour effet d'interdire d'autres sortes d'ingérences gouvernementales dans les affaires religieuses. Aux fins de la présente espèce, il me paraît suffisant d'affirmer que, quels que soient les h autres sens que peut avoir la liberté de conscience et de religion, elle doit à tout le moins signifier ceci: le gouvernement ne peut, dans un but sectaire, contraindre des personnes à professer une foi religieuse ou à pratiquer une religion en particulier. Je ne me prononce pas i ici sur la question de savoir dans quelle mesure, s'il y a lieu, le gouvernement peut, en vue de réaliser un intérêt ou un objectif essentiel, exercer une coercition qui pourrait par ailleurs être interdite par l'al. 2*a*). [Je souligne.]

j Le Juge en chef voit dans la foi et la pratique religieuses l'archétype de croyances et de manifestations dictées par la conscience et, de ce fait, protected by the Charter. But I do not think he is saying that a personal morality which is not founded in religion is outside the protection of s. 2(a). Certainly, it would be my view that conscientious beliefs which are not religiously motivated are equally protected by freedom of conscience in s. 2(a). In so saying I am not unmindful of the fact that the Charter opens with an affirmation that "Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God . . . ." But I am also mindful that the values entrenched in the Charter are those which characterize a free and democratic society.

As is pointed out by Professor Cyril E. M. Joad, then Head of the Department of Philosophy and Psychology at Birkbeck College, University of London, in Guide to the Philosophy of Morals and Politics (1938), the role of the state in a democracy is to establish the background conditions under which individual citizens may pursue the ethical values which in their view underlie the good life. He states at p. 801:

> For the welfare of the state is nothing apart from the good of the citizens who compose it. It is no doubt true that a State whose citizens are compelled to go right is more efficient than one whose citizens are free to go wrong. But what then? To sacrifice freedom in the interests of efficiency, is to sacrifice what confers upon human beings their humanity. It is no doubt easy to govern a flock of sheep; but there is no credit in the governing, and, if the sheep were born as men, no virtue in the sheep.

Professor Joad further emphasizes at p. 803 that individuals in a democratic society can never be treated "merely as means to ends beyond themselves" because:

> To the right of the individual to be treated as an end, which entails his right to the full development and expression of his personality, all other rights and claims must, the democrat holds, be subordinated. I do not know how this principle is to be defended any more than I can frame a defence for the principles of democracy and liberty.

Professor Joad stresses that the essence of a democracy is its recognition of the fact that the state is made for man and not man for the state (p. 805). He firmly rejects the notion that science protégées par la Charte. Mais je ne pense pas qu'il dise qu'une morale personnelle qui n'est pas fondée sur la religion se trouve en dehors de la sphère de protection de l'al. 2*a*). Certainement, je serais d'avis que ce que l'on croit en conscience, sans motivation religieuse, est également protégé par la liberté de conscience garantie à l'al. 2*a*). En disant cela, je n'oublie pas que la Charte s'ouvre par l'affirmation que «le Canada est fondé sur des principes qui reconnaissent la suprématie de Dieu . . . » Mais je n'oublie pas non plus que les valeurs que consacre la Charte sont celles qui caractérisent une société libre et démocratique.

Comme l'a fait observer Cyril E. M. Joad, à l'époque chef du département de philosophie et de psychologie au Birkbeck College de l'Université de Londres, dans Guide to the Philosophy of Morals and Politics (1938), le rôle de l'État dans une démocratie consiste à créer les conditions de base qui permettent aux citoyens, pris individuellement, de chercher les valeurs éthiques qui à leurs yeux sous-tendent une vie de bien. Il dit, à la p. 801:

> [TRADUCTION] Car le bien de l'État n'est rien sans le bien des citoyens qui le composent. Il est sans doute vrai qu'un État dont les citoyens sont forcés de suivre le droit chemin est plus efficace que celui où les citoyens sont libres de s'en écarter. Et alors? Sacrifier la liberté dans l'intérêt de l'efficacité, c'est sacrifier ce qui donne aux êtres humains leur humanité. Sans doute est-il facile de régenter un troupeau de moutons; mais il n'y a alors aucune gloire à gouverner et, si les moutons sont nés hommes, guère de vertu chez les moutons.

Le professeur Joad souligne encore, à la p. 803, que les individus dans une société démocratique ne peuvent jamais être traités [TRADUCTION] «comme un simple moyen pour des fins qui les dépassent», car:

> [TRADUCTION] Au droit de l'individu d'être traité comme une fin, qui comporte son droit au plein développement et à la pleine expression de sa personnalité, tous les autres droits et prétentions doivent, prétend le démocrate, être subordonnés. Je ne sais comment défendre ce principe, tout comme je ne saurais concevoir une défense des principes démocratiques et de la liberté.

Le professeur Joad souligne que l'essence d'une démocratie est sa reconnaissance du fait que l'État est fait pour l'homme et non l'homme pour l'État (à la p. 805). Il rejette fermement la notion que la provides a basis for subordinating the individual to the state. He says at pp. 805-6:

Human beings, it is said, are important only in so far as they fit into a biological scheme or assist in the furtherance of the evolutionary process. Thus each generation of women must accept as its sole function the production of children who will constitute the next generation who, in their turn, will devote their lives and sacrifice their inclinations to the task of producing a further generation, and so on ad infinitum. This is the doctrine of eternal sacrifice — "jam yesterday, jam tomorrow, but never jam today". For, it may be asked, to what end should generations be produced, unless the individuals who compose them are valued in and for themselves, are, in fact, ends in themselves? There is no escape from the doctrine of the perpetual recurrence of generations who have value only in so far as they produce more generations, the perpetual subordination of citizens who have value only in so far as they promote the interests of the State to which they are subordinated, except in the individualist doctrine, which is also the Christian doctrine, that the individual is an end in himself.

It seems to me, therefore, that in a free and democratic society "freedom of conscience and religion" should be broadly construed to extend to conscientiously-held beliefs, whether grounded in religion or in a secular morality. Indeed, as a matter of statutory interpretation, "conscience" and "religion" should not be treated as tautologous if capable of independent, although related, meaning. Accordingly, for the state to take sides on the issue of abortion, as it does in the impugned legislation by making it a criminal offence for the pregnant woman to exercise one of her options, is not only to endorse but also to enforce, on pain of a further loss of liberty through actual imprisonment, one conscientiously-held view at the expense of another. It is to deny freedom of conscience to some, to treat them as means to an end, to deprive them, as Professor MacCormick puts it, of their "essential humanity". Can this comport with fundamental justice? Was Blackmun J. not correct when he said in Thornburgh, supra, at p. 2185:

A woman's right to make that choice freely is fundamental. Any other result . . . would protect inadequately science fournit un fondement pour subordonner l'individu à l'État. Il dit, aux pp. 805 et 806:

[TRADUCTION] Les êtres humains, dit-on, ne sont importants que dans la mesure où ils s'insèrent dans une structure biologique ou contribuent au processus évolutif. Ainsi chaque génération de femmes doit accepter comme unique fonction de produire les enfants qui formeront la génération suivante et qui, à leur tour, consacreront leur vie et sacrifieront leurs inclinations à la tâche de produire une autre génération, et ainsi de suite, ad infinitum. C'est là la doctrine de l'éternel sacrifice. «Confiture demain et confiture hier, mais jamais confiture aujourd'hui». Car, pourrait-on demander, pour quelle fin ces générations sont-elles produites, à moins que les individus qui les composent ne soient valorisés en eux-mêmes et pour eux-mêmes, et deviennent, en fait, des fins en eux-mêmes? On ne peut échapper à la doctrine du cycle perpétuel des générations n'ayant de valeur que dans la mesure où elles produisent d'autres générations, à la subordination perpétuelle des citoyens, qui n'auraient de valeur que dans la mesure où ils favorisent les intérêts de l'État auquel ils sont subordonnés, si ce n'est dans la doctrine individualiste, qui est aussi la doctrine chrétienne, que l'individu est une fin en lui-même.

Il me semble donc que, dans une société libre et démocratique, la "liberté de conscience et de religion" devrait être interprétée largement et s'étendre aux croyances dictées par la conscience, qu'elles soient fondées sur la religion ou sur une morale laïque. D'ailleurs, sur le plan de l'interprétation législative, les termes "conscience" et "religion" ne devraient pas être considérés comme tautologiques quand ils peuvent avoir un sens distinct, quoique relié. Par conséquent, lorsque l'État prend parti sur la question de l'avortement, comme il le fait dans la loi contestée en incriminant l'exercice par la femme enceinte d'une de ses options, non seulement il adopte mais aussi il impose, sous peine d'une autre perte de liberté par emprisonnement, une opinion dictée par la conscience des uns aux dépens d'une autre. C'est nier la liberté de conscience à certains, les traiter comme un moyen pour une fin, les priver, selon le mot du professeur MacCormick, de "l'essence de leur humanité". Est-ce compatible avec la justice fondamentale? Le juge Blackmun n'a-t-il pas raison quand il dit dans l'arrêt Thornburgh, précité, à la p. 2185:

a central part of the sphere of liberty that our law guarantees equally to all.

Legislation which violates freedom of conscience in this manner cannot, in my view, be in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7.

(b) Section 1 of the Charter

The majority of this Court held in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, that a deprivation of the s. 7 right in violation of the principles of fundamental justice in the substantive sense could nevertheless constitute a reasonable limit under s. 1 and be justified in a free and democratic society. It is necessary therefore to consider whether s. 251 of the Criminal Code can be saved under s. 1. The section provides:

> 1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

This section received judicial scrutiny by this Court in R. v. Oakes, supra. Dickson C.J., speaking for the majority, set out two criteria which must be met if the limit is to be found reasonable: (1) the objective which the legislation is designed to achieve must relate to concerns which are pressing and substantial; and (2) the means chosen must be proportional to the objective sought to be achieved. The Chief Justice identified three important components of proportionality at p. 139:

> First, the measures adopted must be carefully designed to achieve the objective in question. They must not be arbitrary, unfair or based on irrational considerations. In short, they must be rationally connected to the objective. Second, the means, even if rationally connected to the objective in the first sense, should impair "as little as possible" the right or freedom in question: R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 352. Third, there must be a proportionality between the effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the Charter right or freedom, and the objective which has been identified as of "sufficient importance".

protégerait inadéquatement un aspect central de cette sphère de liberté que notre droit garantit également à tous.

Une loi qui viole la liberté de conscience de cette manière ne saurait, à mon avis, être conforme aux principes de justice fondamentale au sens de l'art. 7.

b) L'article premier de la Charte

Cette Cour, à la majorité, a jugé dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., précité, qu'une atteinte au droit garanti par l'art. 7, en violation des principes de justice fondamentale sur le plan du fond, pouvait néanmoins constituer une limite raisonnable au sens de l'article premier et être justifiée dans une société libre et démocratique. Il est donc nécessaire de rechercher si l'art. 251 du Code criminel peut être sauvegardé en vertu de l'article premier. Cet article porte:

> 1. La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés. Ils ne peuvent être restreints que par une règle de droit, dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

La Cour a étudié cet article dans son arrêt R. c. Oakes, précité. Le juge en chef Dickson, au nom de la majorité, y énonce deux critères qui doivent être respectés pour que la limite soit jugée raisonnable: 1) l'objectif pour lequel la loi a été conçue doit être lié à des préoccupations urgentes et réelles; 2) les moyens choisis doivent être proportionnels à l'objectif recherché. Le Juge en chef discerne trois composantes importantes de la proportionnalité, à la p. 139:

> Premièrement, les mesures adoptées doivent être soigneusement conçues pour atteindre l'objectif en question. Elles ne doivent être ni arbitraires, ni inéquitables, ni fondées sur des considérations irrationnelles. Bref, elles doivent avoir un lien rationnel avec l'objectif en question. Deuxièmement, même à supposer qu'il y ait un tel lien rationnel, le moyen choisi doit être de nature à porter «le moins possible» atteinte au droit ou à la liberté en question: R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd. précité, à la p. 352. Troisièmement, il doit y avoir proportionnalité entre les effets des mesures restreignant un droit ou une liberté garantis par la Charte et l'objectif reconnu comme «suffisamment important».

Does section 251 meet this test?

In my view, the primary objective of the impugned legislation must be seen as the protection of the foetus. It undoubtedly has other ancillary objectives, such as the protection of the life and health of pregnant women, but I believe that the main objective advanced to justify a restriction on the pregnant woman's s. 7 right is the protection of the foetus. I think this is a perfectly valid legislative objective.

Miss Wein submitted on behalf of the Crown that the Court of Appeal was correct in concluding at p. 378 that "the situation respecting a woman's right to control her own person becomes more complex when she becomes pregnant, and that some statutory control may be appropriate". I agree. I think s. 1 of the Charter authorizes reasonable limits to be put upon the woman's right having regard to the fact of the developing foetus within her body. The question is: at what point in the pregnancy does the protection of the foetus become such a pressing and substantial concern as to outweigh the fundamental right of the woman to decide whether or not to carry the foetus to term? At what point does the state's interest in the protection of the foetus become "compelling" and justify state intervention in what is otherwise a matter of purely personal and private concern?

In Roe v. Wade, supra, the United States Supreme Court held that the state's interest became compelling when the foetus became viable, i.e., when it could exist outside the body of the mother. As Miss Wein pointed out, no particular justification was advanced by the Court for the selection of viability as the relevant criterion. The Court expressly avoided the question as to when human life begins. Blackmun J. stated at p. 159:

> We need not resolve the difficult question of when life begins. When those trained in the respective disciplines of medicine, philosophy, and theology are unable to arrive at any consensus, the judiciary, at this point in the development of man's knowledge, is not in a position to speculate as to the answer.

L'article 251 répond-il à ce critère?

À mon avis, il faut voir dans l'objectif premier de la loi contestée la protection du fœtus. Elle a sans doute d'autres objectifs secondaires, telle la protection de la vie et de la santé de la femme enceinte, mais je crois que l'objectif principal invoqué pour justifier la restriction du droit de la femme enceinte garanti par l'art. 7 est la protection du fœtus. J'estime que c'est là un objectif législatif parfaitement valide.

Me Wein a soutenu au nom du ministère public que la Cour d'appel pouvait, à bon droit, conclure que [TRADUCTION] «la situation du droit de la femme à être maîtresse de sa propre personne se complique lorsqu'elle devient enceinte et qu'un certain contrôle de la loi peut se révéler approprié» (à la p. 378). J'en conviens. Je pense que l'article premier de la Charte permet de fixer des limites raisonnables au droit de la femme compte tenu du fœtus qui se développe dans son corps. Il faut donc se demander à quel stade de la grossesse, la protection du fœtus devient-elle urgente et revêt-elle une importance réelle telle qu'elle prévaut sur le droit fondamental de la femme de décider de le mener ou non à terme? À quel stade l'intérêt qu'a l'État à protéger le fœtus devient-il «supérieur» et justifie-t-il son intervention dans ce qui, autrement, ne serait qu'une question purement personnelle et privée?

Dans l'arrêt Roe v. Wade, précité, la Cour suprême des États-Unis a jugé que l'intérêt de l'État doit prévaloir lorsque le fœtus devient viable, c'est-à-dire lorsqu'il peut vivre à l'extérieur du corps de la mère. Comme Me Wein l'a fait observer, la Cour n'a proposé aucune justification particulière pour le choix du critère de la viabilité. La Cour a expressément évité la question du moment où la vie humaine commence. Le juge Blackmun dit, à la p. 159:

> [TRADUCTION] Nous n'avons pas à résoudre la difficile question du moment où commence la vie. Lorsque les spécialistes de ces disciplines respectives que sont la médecine, la philosophie et la théologie sont incapables d'arriver à un consensus, le pouvoir judiciaire, à ce point du développement des connaissances humaines, n'est pas en mesure de conjecturer une réponse.

He referred, therefore, to the developing foetus as "potential life" and to the state's interest as "the protection of potential life".

Il qualifie donc le fœtus en développement de [TRADUCTION] «vie potentielle» et l'intérêt de l'État comme étant [TRADUCTION] «la protection d'une vie potentielle».

Miss Wein submitted that it was likewise not necessary for the Court in this case to decide when human life begins although she acknowledged that the value to be placed on "potential life" was significant in assessing the importance of the legislative objective sought to be achieved by s. 251. It would be my view, and I think it is consistent with the position taken by the United States Supreme Court in Roe v. Wade, that the value to be placed on the foetus as potential life is directly related to the stage of its development during gestation. The undeveloped foetus starts out as a newly fertilized ovum; the fully developed foetus emerges ultimately as an infant. A developmental progression takes place in between these two extremes and, in my opinion, this progression has a direct bearing on the value of the foetus as potential life. It is a fact of human experience that a miscarriage or spontaneous abortion of the foetus at six months is attended by far greater sorrow and sense of loss than a miscarriage or spontaneous abortion at six days or even six weeks. This is not, of course, to deny that the foetus is potential life from the moment of conception. Indeed, I agree with the observation of O'Connor J., dissenting in City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., supra, at p. 461, (referred to by my colleague Beetz J. in his reasons, at p. 113) that the foetus is potential life from the moment of conception. It is simply to say that in balancing the state's interest in the protection of the foetus as potential life under s. 1 of the Charter against the right of the pregnant woman under s. 7 greater weight should be given to the state's interest in the later stages of pregnancy than in the earlier. The foetus should accordingly, for purposes of s. 1, be viewed in differential and developmental terms: see L. W. Sumner, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Toronto, Abortion and Moral Theory (1981), pp. 125-28.

Me Wein a fait valoir qu'il n'était de même pas nécessaire qu'en l'espèce la Cour décide du moment où commence la vie quoiqu'elle ait reconnu que la valeur attribuée à une "vie potentielle" devait être prise en compte dans l'évaluation de l'importance de l'objectif législatif recherché par l'art. 251. Je serais d'avis, et je pense que ce point de vue est compatible avec la position prise par la Cour suprême des États-Unis dans l'arrêt Roe v. Wade, que la valeur attribuée au fœtus en tant que vie potentielle est directement reliée au stade de son développement au cours de la grossesse. Le fœtus au stade embryonnaire provient d'un ovule nouvellement fécondé; le fœtus totalement développé devient en définitive un nouveau-né. Le développement progresse entre ces deux extrêmes et, à mon avis, cette progression influe directement sur la valeur à attribuer au fœtus en tant que vie potentielle. Il ressort en fait de l'expérience humaine qu'une fausse-couche ou un avortement spontané du fœtus à six mois cause un chagrin et une épreuve beaucoup plus grands qu'une fausse-couche ou un avortement spontané à six jours ou même à six semaines. Ceci ne revient évidemment pas à nier que le fœtus soit une vie potentielle dès le moment de la conception. De fait, je suis d'accord avec le commentaire du juge O'Connor, dissidente, dans l'affaire City of Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, Inc., précitée, à la p. 461 (citée par le juge Beetz dans ses motifs, à la p. 113) que le fœtus est une vie potentielle dès le moment de la conception. Cela revient simplement à dire qu'en soupesant l'intérêt qu'a l'État à protéger le fœtus en tant que vie potentielle en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte et le droit de la femme enceinte en vertu de l'art. 7, un plus grand poids devrait être donné à l'intérêt de l'État dans les derniers stades de la grossesse que dans les premiers. On devrait donc considérer le fœtus, aux fins de l'article premier, en termes de développement et de phases: voir L. W. Sumner, professeur de philosophie à l'Université de Toronto, Abortion and Moral Theory (1981), aux pp. 125 à 128.

As Professor Sumner points out, both traditional approaches to abortion, the so-called "liberal" and "conservative" approaches, fail to take account of the essentially developmental nature of the gestation process. A developmental view of the foetus, on the other hand, supports a permissive approach to abortion in the early stages of pregnancy and a restrictive approach in the later stages. In the early stages the woman's autonomy would be absolute; her decision, reached in consultation with her physician, not to carry the foetus to term would be conclusive. The state would have no business inquiring into her reasons. Her reasons for having an abortion would, however, be the proper subject of inquiry at the later stages of her pregnancy when the state's compelling interest in the protection of the foetus would justify it in prescribing conditions. The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes "compelling" I leave to the informed judgment of the legislature which is in a position to receive guidance on the subject from all the relevant disciplines. It seems to me, however, that it might fall somewhere in the second trimester. Indeed, according to Professor Sumner (p. 159), a differential abortion policy with a time limit in the second trimester is already in operation in the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Sweden, the Soviet Union, China, India, Japan and most of the countries of Eastern Europe although the time limits vary in these countries from the beginning to the end of the second trimester (cf. Stephen L. Isaacs, "Reproductive Rights 1983: An International Survey" (1982-83), 14 Columbia Human Rights Law Rev. 311, with respect to France and Italy).

Section 251 of the Criminal Code takes the decision away from the woman at all stages of her pregnancy. It is a complete denial of the woman's constitutionally protected right under s. 7, not merely a limitation on it. It cannot, in my opinion, meet the proportionality test in Oakes. It is not sufficiently tailored to the legislative objective and does not impair the woman's right "as little as possible". It cannot be saved under s. 1. Accordingly, even if the section were to be amended to Comme le fait observer le professeur Sumner, les deux approches traditionnelles de l'avortement, les approches dites "libérale" et "conservatrice", ne tiennent pas compte de la nature essentiellement évolutive de la grossesse. Une conception du fœtus fondée sur le stade de développement, d'autre part, appuie une approche permissive de l'avortement dans les premiers stades de la grossesse et une approche restrictive dans les derniers stades. Dans les premiers stades, l'autonomie de la femme serait absolue; sa décision, prise en consultation avec son médecin, de ne pas mener le fœtus à terme serait décisive. L'État n'aurait pas à connaître ses raisons. Ses raisons d'avoir un avortement pourraient toutefois, à bon droit, faire l'objet d'une investigation dans les derniers stades de sa grossesse, alors que l'intérêt supérieur qu'a l'État de protéger le fœtus justifierait l'imposition de conditions. Quant au point précis du développement du fœtus où l'intérêt qu'a l'État de le protéger devient "supérieur", je laisse le soin de le fixer au jugement éclairé du législateur, qui est en mesure de recevoir des avis à ce sujet de l'ensemble des disciplines pertinentes. Il me semble cependant que ce point pourrait se situer quelque part au cours du second trimestre. D'ailleurs, d'après le professeur Sumner (à la p. 159), une politique d'avortement en fonction de phases, avec une limite placée au cours du second trimestre, est déjà en vigueur aux États-Unis, en Grande-Bretagne, en France, en Italie, en Suède, en Union soviétique, en Chine, en Inde, au Japon et dans la plupart des pays de l'Europe de l'Est, le délai variant, selon les pays, du début à la fin du second trimestre (cf. Stephen L. Isaacs, "Reproductive Rights 1983: An International Survey" (1982-83), 14 Columbia Human Rights Law Rev. 311, en ce qui concerne la France et l'Italie).

L'article 251 du Code criminel enlève cette décision à la femme à tous les stades de la grossesse. C'est une dénégation complète du droit constitutionnellement garanti à la femme par l'art. 7, non une simple limitation de celui-ci. L'article ne saurait, à mon avis, répondre au critère de proportionnalité de l'arrêt Oakes. Il n'est pas suffisamment adapté à l'objectif législatif et ne porte pas atteinte au droit de la femme «le moins possible». Il ne saurait être sauvegardé en vertu de l'article pre-remedy the purely procedural defects in the legislative scheme referred to by the Chief Justice and Beetz J. it would, in my opinion, still not be constitutionally valid.

One final word. I wish to emphasize that in these reasons I have dealt with the existence of the developing foetus merely as a factor to be considered in assessing the importance of the legislative objective under s. 1 of the Charter. I have not dealt with the entirely separate question whether a foetus is covered by the word "everyone" in s. 7 so as to have an independent right to life under that section. The Crown did not argue it and it is not necessary to decide it in order to dispose of the issues on this appeal.

3. Disposition

I would allow the appeal. I would strike down s. 251 of the Criminal Code as having no force or effect under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. I would answer the first constitutional question in the affirmative as regards s. 7 of the Charter and the second constitutional question in the negative. I would answer questions 3, 4 and 5 in the negative and question 6 in the manner proposed by Beetz J. It is not necessary to answer question 7.

I endorse the Chief Justice's critical comments on Mr. Manning's concluding remarks to the jury.

Appeal allowed, MCINTYRE and LA FOREST JJ. dissenting. The first constitutional question should be answered in the affirmative as regards s. 7 only and the second in the negative as regards s. 7 only. The third, fourth and fifth constitutional questions should be answered in the negative. The sixth constitutional question should be answered in the negative with respect to s. 605 of the Criminal Code and should not be answered as regards s. 610(3). The seventh constitutional question should not be answered.

mier. Par conséquent, même si l'article devait être modifié pour remédier aux vices de procédure de la structure législative dont ont parlé le Juge en chef et le juge Beetz, il demeurerait, à mon avis, inconstitutionnel.

Un dernier mot. Je désire souligner que dans ces motifs je n'ai traité du fœtus en développement que dans la mesure où il s'agissait d'un facteur dont il fallait tenir compte pour évaluer l'importance de l'objectif législatif, au regard de l'article premier de la Charte. Je n'ai pas traité de la question entièrement distincte de savoir si le terme «chacun», à l'art. 7, vise aussi le fœtus, lui conférant un droit indépendant à la vie en vertu de l'article. Le ministère public n'en a pas débattu et il n'est pas nécessaire de la trancher pour statuer sur les questions en litige en l'espèce.

3. Dispositif

Je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'annuler l'art. 251 du Code criminel parce qu'inopérant en vertu du par. 52(1) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982. Je suis également d'avis de répondre à la première question constitutionnelle par l'affirmative en ce qui concerne l'art. 7 de la Charte, et à la seconde question constitutionnelle par la négative. Je réponds aux troisième, quatrième et cinquième questions par la négative et à la sixième question de la manière proposée par le juge Beetz. Il n'est pas nécessaire de répondre à la septième question.

J'adopte les critiques du Juge en chef à l'égard des observations finales adressées par Me Manning au jury.

Pourvoi accueilli, les juges MCINTYRE et LA FOREST étant dissidents. La première question constitutionnelle reçoit une réponse affirmative en ce qui concerne l'art. 7 uniquement et la deuxième question une réponse négative en ce qui concerne l'art. 7 uniquement. Les troisième, quatrième et cinquième questions reçoivent une réponse négative. La sixième question reçoit une réponse négative en ce qui concerne l'art. 605 du Code criminel et aucune réponse en ce qui concerne le par. 610(3). Il n'est pas nécessaire de répondre à la septième question.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR SASKATCHEWAN
ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO
ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL OF ALBERTA

Constitutional law — Division of powers — Greenhouse gas emissions — Federal legislation setting minimum national standards of greenhouse gas pricing — Whether greenhouse gas pricing is matter of national concern falling within Parliament's power to legislate in respect of peace, order and good government of Canada — Constitution Act, 1867, s. 91 "preamble" — Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, S.C. 2018, c. 12, s. 186.

In 2018, Parliament enacted the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act ("GGPPA"). The GGPPA comprises four parts and four schedules. Part 1 establishes a fuel charge that applies to producers, distributors and importers of various types of carbon-based fuel. Part 2 sets out a pricing mechanism for industrial greenhouse gas ("GHG") emissions by large emissions-intensive industrial facilities. Part 3 authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations providing for the application of provincial law concerning GHG emissions to federal works and undertakings, federal land and Indigenous land located in that province, as well as to internal waters located in or contiguous with the province. Part 4 requires the Minister of the Environment to prepare an annual report on the administration of the GGPPA and have it tabled in Parliament.

Saskatchewan, Ontario and Alberta challenged the constitutionality of the first two parts and the four schedules of the GGPPA by references to their respective courts of appeal, asking whether the GGPPA is unconstitutional in whole or in part. In split decisions, the courts of appeal for Saskatchewan and Ontario held that the GGPPA is constitutional, while the Court of Appeal of Alberta held that it is unconstitutional. The Attorney General of British Columbia, who had intervened in the Court of Appeal of Alberta, the Attorney General of Saskatchewan and the Attorney General of Ontario now appeal as of right to the Court.

Held (Côté J. dissenting in part and Brown and Rowe JJ. dissenting): The appeals by the Attorney General of Saskatchewan and the Attorney General of Ontario should be dismissed, and the appeal by the Attorney General of British Columbia should be allowed. The reference questions are answered in the negative.

Per Wagner C.J. and Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ.: The GGPPA is constitutional. It sets minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. Parliament has jurisdiction to enact this law as a matter of national concern under the peace, order, and good government ("POGG") clause of s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Federalism is a foundational principle of the Canadian Constitution. Its objectives are to reconcile diversity with unity, promote democratic participation by reserving meaningful powers to the local and regional level and foster cooperation between Parliament and the provincial legislatures for the common good. Sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution give expression to the principle of federalism and divide legislative powers between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. Under the division of powers, broad powers were conferred on the provinces to ensure diversity, while at the same time reserving to the federal government powers better exercised in relation to the country as a whole to provide for Canada's unity. Federalism recognizes that within their spheres of jurisdiction, provinces have autonomy to develop their societies. Federal power cannot be used in a manner that effectively eviscerates provincial power.

Courts, as impartial arbiters, are charged with resolving jurisdictional disputes over the boundaries of federal and provincial powers on the basis of the principle of federalism. Although early Canadian constitutional decisions by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council applied a rigid division of federal-provincial powers as watertight compartments, the Court has favoured a flexible view of federalism, best described as a modern cooperative federalism, that accommodates and encourages intergovernmental cooperative efforts. However, the Court has also always maintained that flexibility and cooperation, while important, cannot override or modify federalism and the constitutional division of powers.

The review of legislation on federalism grounds consists of the well-established two-stage analytical approach. At the first stage, a court must consider the purpose and effects of the challenged statute or provision with a view to characterizing the subject matter or "pith and substance". A court must then classify the subject matter with reference to federal and provincial heads of power under the Constitution in order to determine whether it is intra vires Parliament and therefore valid.

At the first stage of the division of powers analysis, a court must consider the purpose and effects of the challenged statute or provision in order to identify its "pith and substance" or its main thrust or dominant or most important characteristic. In determining the purpose of the challenged statute or provision, a court can consider both intrinsic evidence, such as the legislation's preamble or purpose clauses, and extrinsic evidence, such as Hansard or minutes of parliamentary committees. In considering the effects of the challenged legislation, a court can consider both the legal effects, those that flow directly from the provisions of the statute itself, and the practical effects, the side effects that flow from the application of the statute. Where a court is asked to adjudicate the constitutionality of legislation that has been in force for only a short time, any prediction of future practical effect is necessarily short-term, since the court is not equipped to predict accurately the future consequential impact of legislation. The characterization process is not technical or formalistic. A court can look at the background and circumstances of a statute's enactment as well as at the words used in it.

Three points with respect to the identification of the pith and substance are important to clarify. First, the pith and substance of a challenged statute or provision must be described as precisely as possible. A vague or general description is unhelpful, as it can result in the law being superficially assigned to both federal and provincial heads of powers or may exaggerate the extent to which the law extends into the other level of government's sphere of jurisdiction. However, precision should not be confused with narrowness. A court must focus on the law itself and what it is really about. The pith and substance of a challenged statute or provision should capture the law's essential character in terms that are as precise as the law will allow. Second, it is permissible in some circumstances for a court to include the legislative choice of means in the definition of a statute's pith and substance, as long as it does not lose sight of the fact that the goal of the analysis is to identify the true subject matter of the challenged statute or provision. In some cases, the choice of means may be so central to the legislative objective that the main thrust of a statute or provision, properly understood, is to achieve a result in a particular way, which would justify including the means in identifying the pith and substance. Third, the characterization and classification stages of the division of powers analysis are and must be kept distinct. The pith and substance of a statute or a provision must be identified without regard to the heads of legislative competence.

At the second stage of the division of power analysis, a court must classify the matter by reference to the heads of power set out in the Constitution. Matters and classes of subjects are distinct. Law-making powers are exercisable in relation to matters, which in turn generally come within broader classes of subjects. Section 91 does not provide in the context of the POGG power that Parliament can make laws in relation to classes of subjects; instead, it states that Parliament can make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada in relation to "Matters". National concern is a well-established but rarely applied doctrine of Canadian constitutional law derived from the introductory clause of s. 91 of the Constitution, which empowers Parliament to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. A matter that falls under the POGG power necessarily does not come within the classes of subjects enumerated in ss. 91 and 92.

Courts must approach a finding that the federal government has jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine with great caution. The effect of finding that a matter is one of national concern is permanent and confers exclusive jurisdiction over that matter on Parliament. However, the scope of the federal power is defined by the nature of the national concern itself and only aspects with a sufficient connection to the underlying inherent national concern will fall within the scope of the federal power.

A closely related question concerns the applicability of the double aspect doctrine to a matter of national concern. The double aspect doctrine recognizes that the same fact situations can be regulated from different perspectives, one of which may relate to a provincial power and the other to a federal power. The doctrine can apply in cases in which the federal government has jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine. Such an approach fosters coherence in the law, because the double aspect doctrine can apply to every enumerated federal and provincial head of power. It is also consistent with the modern approach to federalism, which favours flexibility and a degree of overlapping jurisdiction. However, the fact that the double aspect doctrine can apply does not mean that it will apply in a given case. It may apply if a fact situation can be regulated from different federal and provincial perspectives and each level of government has a compelling interest in enacting legal rules in relation to that situation. It should be applied cautiously so as to avoid eroding the importance attached to provincial autonomy.

The double aspect doctrine takes on particular significance where Canada asserts jurisdiction over a matter that involves a minimum national standard imposed by legislation that operates as a backstop. The recognition of a matter of national concern such as this will inevitably result in a double aspect situation. This is in fact the very premise of a federal scheme that imposes minimum national standards: Canada and the provinces are both free to legislate in relation to the same fact situation but the federal law is paramount. In such a case, even if the national concern test would otherwise be met, a cautious approach to the double aspect doctrine should act as an additional check. The court must be satisfied that Canada in fact has a compelling interest in enacting legal rules over the federal aspect of the activity at issue and that the multiplicity of aspects is real and not merely nominal.

Turning to the national concern test, there are two points worth noting about the framework as a whole. First, the recognition of a matter of national concern must be based on evidence. An onus rests on Canada throughout the national concern analysis to adduce evidence in support of its assertion of jurisdiction. Second, there is no requirement that a matter be historically new in order to be found to be one of national concern. Many new developments may be predominantly local and provincial in character and fall under provincial heads of power. The term “new”, as used in the jurisprudence, refers to matters that could satisfy the national concern test and includes both “new” matters that did not exist in 1867 and matters that are “new” in the sense that the understanding of those subject matters has, in some way, shifted so as to bring out their inherently national character. Thus, the critical element of the analysis is the requirement that matters of national concern be inherently national in character, not that they be historically new.

Finding that a matter is one of national concern involves a three-step analysis. First, as a threshold question, Canada must establish that the matter is of sufficient concern to the country as a whole to warrant consideration as a possible matter of national concern. Second, the matter must have a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility. Third, Canada must show that the proposed matter has a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the division of powers. The purpose of the national concern analysis is to identify matters of inherent national concern — matters which, by their nature, transcend the provinces.

The analysis begins by asking, as a threshold question, whether the matter is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole to warrant consideration under the national concern doctrine. This invites a common-sense inquiry into the national importance of the proposed matter. This approach does not open the door to the recognition of federal jurisdiction simply on the basis that a legislative field is important; it operates to limit the application of the national concern doctrine and provides essential context for the analysis that follows.

The second step of the analysis requires that a matter have a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern. Two principles underpin this requirement: first, to prevent federal overreach, jurisdiction should be found to exist only over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern; and second, federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter.

Under the first principle of the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility analysis, the court should inquire into whether the matter is predominantly extraprovincial and international in its nature or its effects, into the content of any international agreements in relation to the matter, and into whether the matter involves a federal legislative role that is distinct from and not duplicative of that of the provinces. It is clearly not enough for a matter to be quantitatively different from matters of provincial concern — the mere growth or extent of a problem across Canada is insufficient to justify federal jurisdiction. International agreements may in some cases indicate that a matter is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. However, the existence of treaty obligations is not determinative of federal jurisdiction as there is no freestanding federal treaty implementation power and Parliament's jurisdiction to implement treaties signed by the federal government depends on the ordinary division of powers. Furthermore, to be qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern, the matter must not be an aggregate of provincial matters. The federal legislative role must be distinct from and not duplicative of that of the provinces. Federal legislation will not be qualitatively distinct if it overshoots regulation of a national aspect of the field and instead duplicates provincial regulation or regulates issues that are primarily of local concern.

The second principle underpinning the singleness, distinctiveness, and indivisibility analysis is that federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter. Provincial inability functions as a strong constraint on federal power and should be seen as a necessary but not sufficient requirement for the purposes of the national concern doctrine. In order for provincial inability to be established both of these factors are required: (1) the legislation should be of a nature that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of enacting; and (2) the failure to include one or more provinces or localities in a legislative scheme would jeopardize the successful operation of the scheme in other parts of the country. And there is a third factor that is required in the context of the national concern doctrine in order to establish provincial inability: a province's failure to deal with the matter must have grave extraprovincial consequences. The requirement for grave extraprovincial consequences sets a high bar for a finding of provincial inability for the purposes of the national concern doctrine and can be satisfied by actual harm or by a serious risk of harm being sustained in the future. It may include serious harm to human life and health or to the environment, though it is not necessarily limited to such consequences. Mere inefficiency or additional financial costs stemming from divided or overlapping jurisdiction is clearly insufficient. Evaluating extraprovincial harm helps to determine whether a national law is not merely desirable, but essential, in the sense that the problem is beyond the power of the provinces to deal with it. This connects the provincial inability test to the overall purpose of the national concern test, which is to identify matters of inherent national concern that transcend the provinces.

At the third and final step of the national concern analysis, Canada must show that the proposed matter has a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution. The purpose of the scale of impact analysis is to protect against unjustified intrusions on provincial autonomy and prevent federal overreach. At this stage of the analysis, the intrusion upon provincial autonomy that would result from empowering Parliament to act is balanced against the extent of the impact on the interests that would be affected if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level. Identifying a new matter of national concern will be justified only if the latter outweighs the former.

In this case, the true subject matter of the GGPPA is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. Both the short and long titles of the GGPPA confirm that its true subject matter is not just to mitigate climate change, but to do so through the pan-Canadian application of pricing mechanisms to a broad set of GHG emission sources. Likewise, it is clear from reading the preamble as a whole that the focus of the GGPPA is on national GHG pricing. In Parliament's eyes, the relevant mischief is the effects of the failure of some provinces to implement GHG pricing systems or to implement sufficiently stringent pricing systems, and the consequential failure to reduce GHG emissions across Canada. To address this mischief, the GGPPA establishes minimum national standards of GHG pricing that apply across Canada, setting a GHG pricing floor across the country.

Similarly, it can be seen from the events leading up to the enactment of the GGPPA and from government policy papers that there was a focus on GHG pricing and establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency for GHG emissions — through a federally imposed national direct GHG pricing backstop — without displacing provincial and territorial jurisdiction over the choice and design of pricing instruments. This is supported by evidence of the legislative debates. Both elected representatives and senior public servants consistently described the purpose of the GGPPA in terms of imposing a Canada-wide GHG pricing system, not of regulating GHG emissions generally.

The legal effects of the GGPPA confirm that its focus is on national GHG pricing and confirm its essentially backstop nature. In jurisdictions where Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA apply, the primary legal effect is to create one GHG pricing scheme that prices GHG emissions in a manner that is consistent with what is done in the rest of the Canadian economy. Part 1 of the GGPPA directly prices the emissions of certain fuel producers, distributors and importers. Part 2 directly prices the GHG emissions of covered facilities to the extent that they exceed the applicable efficiency standards. The GGPPA does not require those to whom it applies to perform or refrain from performing specified GHG emitting activities. Nor does it tell industries how they are to operate in order to reduce their GHG emissions. Instead, all it does is to require persons to pay for engaging in specified activities that result in the emission of GHGs. The GGPPA leaves individual consumers and businesses free to choose how they will respond, or not, to the price signals sent by the marketplace. The legal effects of the GGPPA are thus centrally aimed at pricing GHG emissions nationally.

Moreover, because the GGPPA operates as a backstop, the legal effects of Parts 1 and 2 of the statute — a federally imposed GHG pricing scheme — apply only if the Governor in Council has listed a province or territory. The GGPPA provides that the Governor in Council may make listing decisions for Parts 1 and 2 of the statute only for the purpose of ensuring that the pricing of greenhouse gas emissions is applied broadly in Canada at levels that the Governor in Council considers appropriate, taking into account, as the primary factor, the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for greenhouse gas emissions. As a result, the GHG pricing mechanism described in Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA will not come into operation at all in a province or territory that already has a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing system. Not only does this confirm the backstop nature of the GGPPA — that of creating minimum national standards of GHG pricing — but this feature gives legal effect to the federal government's commitment to give the provinces and territories the flexibility to design their own policies to meet emissions reductions targets, including carbon pricing, adapted to each province and territory's specific circumstances, as well as to recognize carbon pricing policies already implemented or in development by provinces and territories.

Although evidence of practical effects is not helpful in this case given the dearth of such evidence, the evidence of practical effects to date is consistent with providing flexibility and support for provincially designed GHG pricing schemes. Practically speaking, the only thing not permitted by the GGPPA is for provinces and territories not to implement a GHG pricing mechanism or one that is not sufficiently stringent.

Applying the threshold question, Canada has adduced evidence that clearly shows that establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole that it warrants consideration in accordance with the national concern doctrine. The history of efforts to address climate change in Canada reflects the critical role of carbon pricing strategies in policies to reduce GHG emissions. There is also a broad consensus among expert international bodies that carbon pricing is a critical measure for the reduction of GHG emissions. This matter is critical to our response to an existential threat to human life in Canada and around the world. As a result, it passes the threshold test and warrants consideration as a possible matter of national concern.

Minimum national standards of GHG price stringency, which are implemented by means of the backstop architecture of the GGPPA, relate to a federal role in carbon pricing that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. GHGs are a specific and precisely identifiable type of pollutant. The harmful effects of GHGs are known, and the fuel and excess emissions charges are based on the global warming potential of the gases. GHG emissions are also predominantly extraprovincial and international in their character and implications. This flows from their nature as a diffuse atmospheric pollutant and from their effect in causing global climate change. Moreover, the regulatory mechanism of GHG pricing is also specific and limited. GHG pricing operates in a particular way, seeking to change behaviour by internalizing the cost of climate change impacts, incorporating them into the price of fuel and the cost of industrial activity. It is a distinct form of regulation that does not amount to the regulation of GHG emissions generally or encompass regulatory mechanisms that do not involve pricing. The Governor in Council's power to make a regulation that applies the GGPPA's pricing system to a province may be exercised only if it is first determined that the province's pricing mechanisms are insufficiently stringent. If each province designed its own pricing system and all the provincial systems met the federal pricing standards, the GGPPA would achieve its purpose without operating to directly price GHG emissions anywhere in the country. The GGPPA is tightly focused on this distinctly federal role and does not descend into the detailed regulation of all aspects of GHG pricing.

Provincial inability is established in this case. First, the provinces, acting alone or together, are constitutionally incapable of establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. While the provinces could choose to cooperatively establish a uniform carbon pricing scheme, doing so would not assure a sustained approach because the provinces and territories are constitutionally incapable of establishing a binding outcome-based minimum legal standard — a national GHG pricing floor — that applies in all provinces and territories at all times. Second, a failure to include one province in the scheme would jeopardize its success in the rest of Canada. The withdrawal of one province from the scheme would clearly threaten its success for two reasons: emissions reductions that are limited to a few provinces would fail to address climate change if they were offset by increased emissions in other Canadian jurisdictions; and any province's failure to implement a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing mechanism could undermine the efficacy of GHG pricing everywhere in Canada because of the risk of carbon leakage. Third, a province's failure to act or refusal to cooperate would have grave consequences for extraprovincial interests. It is well established that climate change is causing significant environmental, economic and human harm nationally and internationally, with especially high impacts in the Canadian Arctic, coastal regions and on Indigenous peoples.

Although the matter has a clear impact on provincial jurisdiction, its impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate and on areas of life that would fall under provincial heads of power is qualified and limited. First, the matter is limited to GHG pricing of GHG emissions — a narrow and specific regulatory mechanism. If a province fails to meet the minimum national standards, the GGPPA imposes a backstop pricing system, but only to the extent necessary to remedy the deficiency in provincial regulation to address the extraprovincial and international harm that might arise from the province's failure to act or to set sufficiently stringent standards. Second, the matter's impact on areas of life that would generally fall under provincial heads of power is also limited. The discretion of the Governor in Council is necessary in order to ensure that some provinces do not subordinate or unduly burden the other provinces through their unilateral choice of standards. Although this restriction may interfere with a province's preferred balance between economic and environmental considerations, it is necessary to consider the interests that would be harmed — owing to irreversible consequences for the environment, for human health and safety and for the economy — if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level. This irreversible harm would be felt across the country and would be borne disproportionality by vulnerable communities and regions in Canada. The impact on those interests justify the limited constitutional impact on provincial jurisdiction.

As a final matter, the fuel and excess emission charges imposed by the GGPPA have a sufficient nexus with the regulatory scheme to be considered constitutionally valid regulatory charges. To be a regulatory charge, as opposed to a tax, a governmental levy with the characteristics of a tax must be connected to a regulatory scheme. The first step is to identify the existence of a relevant regulatory scheme; if such a scheme is found to exist, the second step is to establish a relationship between the charge and the scheme itself. Influencing behaviour is a valid purpose for a regulatory charge and regulatory charges need not reflect the cost of the scheme. The amount of a regulatory charge whose purpose is to alter behaviour is set at a level designed to proscribe, prohibit, or lend preference to a behaviour. Limiting such a charge to the recovery of costs would be incompatible with the design of a scheme of this nature. Nor must the revenues that are collected be used to further the purposes of the regulatory scheme. Rather, the required nexus with the scheme will exist where the charges themselves have a regulatory purpose. There is ample evidence that the fuel and excess emission charges imposed by Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA have a regulatory purpose. They cannot be characterized as taxes; rather, they are regulatory charges whose purpose is to advance the GGPPA's regulatory purpose by altering behaviour.

Per Côté J. (dissenting in part): There is agreement with the majority with respect to the formulation of the national concern test. There is also agreement that Parliament has the power to enact constitutionally valid legislation establishing minimum national standards of price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. However, the GGPPA is, in its current form, unconstitutional. It cannot be said to accord with the matter of national concern formulated by the majority because the breadth of the discretion that it confers on the Governor in Council results in no meaningful limits on the power of the executive. Minimum standards are set by the executive, not the GGPPA. Additionally, the provisions in the GGPPA that permit the Governor in Council to amend and override the GGPPA violate the Constitution Act, 1867, and the fundamental constitutional principles of parliamentary sovereignty, rule of law and the separation of powers. Clauses that purport to confer on the executive branch the power to nullify or amend Acts of Parliament are unconstitutional.

The GGPPA, as it is currently written, vests inordinate discretion in the executive with no meaningful checks on fundamental alterations of the current pricing scheme. The critical feature of the fuel levy established in Part 1, that being what fuels are covered under the GGPPA, is so open-ended, allowing any substance, if prescribed by the Governor in Council, to fall within the ambit of the fuel charge regime. The operative provisions of Part 1 similarly prescribe vast law-making power to the executive such that the very nature of the regime can be altered. The full breadth of executive powers can be seen most notably within ss. 166 and 168. The only limit whatsoever on the expansive regulation-making powers set out in s. 166 is that, in amending Part 1 of Schedule 1 to modify the list of provinces where the fuel levy is payable, the Governor in Council shall take into account, as the primary factor, the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for GHGs (s. 166(3)). No such factor applies to the Governor in Council's regulation-making powers under Part 1's provisions, thus, by virtue of s. 166(4), the executive has a wholly-unfettered ability to amend Part 1 of the GGPPA. Sections 168(2) and (3) also allow the Governor in Council to make and amend regulations in relation to the fuel charge system, its application, and its implementation. These wide-ranging powers set forth a wholly-unfettered grant of broad discretion to amend Part 1. Most notably, s. 168(4) states that in the event of a conflict between the statute enacted by Parliament and the regulations made by the executive, the regulation prevails to the extent of the conflict. This breathtaking power circumvents the exercise of law-making power by the legislative branch by permitting the executive to amend by regulation the very statute which authorizes the regulation.

Further, it is clear from a review of Part 2's provisions that the broad powers accorded to the executive permit the Governor in Council to regulate GHG emissions broadly or regulate specific industries in other ways than by setting GHG emissions limits and pricing excess emissions across the country, despite the majority's assertion to the contrary. The sole limit on the executive's expansive discretion found in Part 2, similar to Part 1, is in s. 189(2): when amending Part 2 of Schedule 1 to modify the list of provinces where the output-based pricing system applies, the Governor in Council shall take into account, as the primary factor, the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for GHGs. Again, as in Part 1, no such factor applies to the Governor in Council's regulation-making powers under Part 2's provisions. There is agreement with Brown and Rowe JJ. that Part 2's skeletal framework accords the executive vast discretion to unilaterally set standards on an industry-by-industry basis, creating the potential for differential treatment of industries at the executive's whim.

Therefore, minimum standards are set by the executive, not the GGPPA. Accordingly, the GGPPA cannot be said to establish national standards of price stringency because there is no meaningful limit to the power of the executive. Rather than establishing minimum national standards, Part 2 empowers the executive to establish variable and inconsistent standards on an industry-by-industry basis. The fact that the executive is permitted to place a number of conditions on individuals and industries at any time, and is moreover allowed to revise those conditions at any time to any extent, is untenable. The GGPPA, as it is currently written, employs a discretionary scheme that knows no bounds. While it is agreed that a matter which is restricted to minimum national GHG pricing stringency standards properly fits within federal authority, the GGPPA does not reflect this crucial restriction.

Moreover, certain parts of the GGPPA are so inconsistent with our system of democracy that they are independently unconstitutional. Sections 166(2), 166(4) and 192 all confer on the Governor in Council the power to amend parts of the GGPPA. Section 168(4) confers the power to adopt secondary legislation that is inconsistent with Part 1 of the Act. Executive power to amend or repeal provisions in primary legislation raises serious constitutional concerns.

Sections 17 and 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, both affirm that the authority to legislate is exclusively exercisable by the Queen, with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons. This means that every exercise of the federal legislative power must have the consent of all three elements of Parliament. The fundamental principles of the Constitution support this reading of ss. 17 and 19.

First, although Parliamentary sovereignty could appear to support Parliament's ability to delegate whatever they want to whomever they wish, this is not the case. Parliamentary sovereignty contains both a positive and negative aspect. The positive aspect is that Parliament has the ability to create any law. The negative aspect, however, is that no institution is competent to override the requirements of an Act of Parliament. Henry VIII clauses, as found in the GGPPA, run afoul of the negative aspect of parliamentary sovereignty, as they give the executive the authority to override the requirements of primary legislation and create a contradiction within an Act by simultaneously requiring the executive to do something and authorizing the executive to defy that requirement. Henry VIII clauses are also incompatible with the conception of parliamentary sovereignty that demands an impartial, independent and authoritative body to interpret Parliament's acts, as they limit the availability of judicial review by providing no meaningful limits against which a court could review.

Second, the rule of law, which provides a shield for individuals from arbitrary state action, requires that all legislation be enacted in the manner and form prescribed by law. This includes the requirements that legislation receive three readings in the Senate and House of Commons and that it receive Royal Assent. When the Governor in Council amends legislation, it does not follow this prescribed manner and thus violates the rule of law. There are other additional rule of law concerns with the delegation of legislative power to the executive: the delegation of power to amend a statute is generally regarded as objectionable for the reason that the text of the statute is then not to be found in the statute book, which gives rise to confusion and uncertainty; Henry VIII clauses endow the executive with authority to act arbitrarily by permitting it to act contrary to the empowering statute, creating an authority without meaningful limits enforceable through judicial review and thus an absolute discretion; and given that judicial review is constitutionally required, legislation cannot oust review, either expressly or implicitly.

Lastly, the Constitution insists on a separation of powers according to the separation of function among the three branches of government — the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. The executive cannot interfere with the legislative process in a manner that would restrict the power to enact, amend and repeal legislation, despite the important role played by the executive in the legislative process. The separation of powers equally demands that the core function of enacting, amending and repealing statutes be protected from the executive and remain exclusive to the legislature. Doing so supports the two main normative principles underlying the separation of powers: the legislature is the institution best suited to set policy down into legislation, and limiting the power to enact, amend and repeal legislation to the legislature helps to confine power and prevent an even greater concentration of power in the executive. There is nothing more core to the legislative power than legislating. When the executive usurps this function, the separation of powers is clearly violated.

Per Brown J. (dissenting): The Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act ("Act") cannot be supported by any source of federal authority, and it is therefore wholly ultra vires Parliament. The Act's subject matter falls squarely within provincial jurisdiction. The fact that the Act's structure and operation is premised on provincial legislatures having authority to enact the same scheme is fatal to the constitutionality of the Act under Parliament's residual authority to legislate with respect to matters of national concern for the peace, order, and good government of Canada under the Constitution Act, 1867.

There is agreement with Rowe J.'s reasons, and therefore Rowe J.'s review of the jurisprudence on the residual POGG power is adopted. To determine whether an enactment falls within the legislative authority of its enacting body, a reviewing court must apply two steps: first, it must characterize the enactment to determine its pith and substance or dominant subject matter and, secondly, it must classify the identified subject matter, with reference to the classes of subjects or heads of power enumerated in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Where an enumerated head of power is relied upon, the pith and substance of the impugned law is identified at the characterization step, and that pith and substance is then classified under a head of power or class of subjects. Where Parliament relies upon the national concern branch of POGG as the source of its authority to legislate, the analytical process differs. If it is decided that the pith and substance of the impugned law does not fall under an enumerated head of power, the reviewing court must then consider whether the matter said to be of national concern satisfies the requirements of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility as stated in Crown Zellerbach. If so, the matter is placed under exclusive and permanent federal jurisdiction.

The dominant subject matter of an enactment is determined by considering its purpose and effects. The purpose of characterization is to facilitate classification so as to determine whether the Constitution grants the enacting body legislative authority over the subject matter. The legislation's dominant subject matter must therefore be characterized precisely enough for it to be associated with a specific class of subjects described in the Constitution's heads of power. If an enactment's subject matter could be classified under different heads of power listed under both ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, then the subject matter should be identified with more precision until it is clear which single level of authority (as between federal and provincial) may legislate in respect thereof.

As a sufficiently precise description may well refer to why and how the law operates, it can be appropriate to include reference to the legislative means in the pith and substance analysis. However, it is not appropriate to do so where describing legislation only in terms of its means would not accurately capture its dominant subject matter or where the description of the means is something that only federal legislative authority can undertake, such as minimum national standards. The determinative consideration in identifying an appropriate level of abstraction should be facilitating the subject matter's classification among the classes of subjects described in the Constitution's heads of power so far as necessary to resolve the case.

In this case, describing the Act's pith and substance as relating to the regulation of GHG emissions is too broad because it does not facilitate classification under a federal or provincial head of power. Greater specificity in describing how the legislation proposes to regulate GHG emissions is required so as to determine whether the Constitution grants Parliament legislative authority over the subject matter. However, the inclusion of minimum national standards in the pith and substance of the Act is equally unhelpful. It adds nothing to the pith and substance of a matter, which is directed not to the fact of a standard, but to the subject matter to which the standard is to be applied. The inclusion of minimum national standards in the pith and substance of a federal statute also effectively decides the jurisdictional dispute, given that only Parliament is capable of imposing minimum national standards — only federally enacted standards can apply nationwide, and, by operation of paramountcy, only federally enacted standards can be a minimum. Furthermore, reference to "integral" standards also has no relevance to identifying the Act's pith and substance because such a determination would require the Court to consider whether the standards set out in the Act are effective, which is not a valid consideration in the pith and substance analysis.

In order to characterize the Act's pith and substance appropriately, its purpose and effects must be determined. In this case, the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 of the Act must be characterized separately. While the two parts share a purpose — the reduction of GHG emissions — they are otherwise not remotely similar to each other. They each have distinct operational features and the legislative means they employ are mutually distinct. The pith and substance of Part 1 is the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel. The pith and substance of Part 2 is the reduction of GHG emissions by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure.

Once identified, the subject matter must be classified, with reference to the classes of subjects or heads of power described in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Courts should look first to the enumerated powers, rather than immediately considering whether a statute's dominant subject matter fits within the residual POGG authority.

In this case, provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights authorized by s. 92(13) stands out as the most relevant source of legislative authority for the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 of the Act. Regulating trade and industrial activity, all within the boundaries of specified provinces, is indisputably captured by this broad head of power, which includes the regulation of business not coming within one of the enumerated federal heads of power, as well as the law of property and of contracts. In the alternative, the provincial residuum in s. 92(16), granting authority over all matters of a local or private nature, could also authorize Parts 1 and 2. Part 2, as a deep foray into industrial policy, also falls within matters of provincial legislative authority granted by s. 92(10) over local works and undertakings. Also relevant to Part 2 is s. 92A, which gives the provinces the exclusive jurisdiction to make laws in relation to the exploration, development, conservation and management of non-renewable natural resources in the province.

The identification of several applicable provincial heads of power should be the end of the matter, since all such heads of power are, by the terms of ss. 92 and 92A(1), matters over which the provincial legislatures may exclusively make laws. By the terms of s. 91, the POGG power applies only in relation to matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces. This exclusivity of provincial jurisdiction over matters falling under s. 92 is fundamental to the Canadian brand of federalism, and was a unique and deliberate choice by the makers of the Constitution who were concerned about federal overreach via the POGG power. The federal law-making authority for the peace, order, and good government of Canada was intended to be subject to the division of powers. Within their areas of legislative authority, provinces are not only sovereign, but exclusively so. The Act's entire scheme is premised on the provinces having jurisdiction to do precisely what Parliament has presumed to do in the Act — it operates only where provincial legislative authority is not exercised, or not exercised in a manner acceptable to the federal Cabinet. The Act's backstop model is therefore constitutionally impossible: if the provinces have jurisdiction to do what the Act does, then the Act cannot be constitutional under the national concern branch of POGG. This demonstrates that Parliament has legislated in respect of a matter that falls within provincial legislative authority.

Even so, given the majority's acceptance that some aspect of the Act is truly and distinctly national in scope and lies outside provincial jurisdiction, the question of whether the matter said to be of national concern satisfies the requirements stated in Crown Zellerbach must be considered. The POGG jurisprudence offers little guidance on the question of whether the pith and substance of the impugned legislation can or should be coextensive with the matter of national concern, or whether the matter of national concern can or should be broader than the pith and substance of the legislation. It would be unprecedented and undesirable to accept that the matter of national concern must always be the same as the pith and substance of the statute under review, which can include legislative means, because this would effectively confine Parliament to that particular legislative means in responding to the matter of national concern.

It is not possible for a matter formerly under provincial jurisdiction to be transformed, when minimum national standards are invoked, into a matter of national concern. To accept that allocating national targets or minimum national standards can serve as a basis for recognizing that some aspect of an area of provincial jurisdiction is distinctly national in scope, and therefore lies outside provincial jurisdiction, would be to accept a model of supervisory federalism by which the provinces can exercise their jurisdiction only as long as they do so in a manner that the federal legislation authorizes. This would open up any area of provincial jurisdiction to unconstitutional federal intrusion once Parliament decides to legislate uniform treatment.

In this case, a broad characterization of the national concern is unavoidable in order to encompass the pith and substance of both Part 1 and Part 2. The matter said to be of national concern can therefore be identified as the purpose of the Act as a whole: the reduction of GHG emissions. This matter does not meet the requirements of Crown Zellerbach for a valid national concern: it fails to meet the requirements of singleness and indivisibility. The fact that harms may cross borders is not enough to make out indivisibility. The matter is divisible because GHGs emissions can be connected to the source province. Responsibility for the reduction of GHG emissions among the provinces can therefore be readily identified for regulation at the source of the emissions. Nationwide GHG emissions are nothing more than the sum of provincial and territorial GHG emissions. The reduction of GHG emissions therefore lacks the degree of unity required to qualify as an indivisible matter of national concern. While a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of GHG emissions may cause more emissions from that province to cross provincial boundaries, that is insufficient to meet the requirement of indivisibility in Crown Zellerbach.

Even if each of the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 as proposed matters of national concern are considered on their own, the pith and substance of each part is not distinct from matters falling under provincial jurisdiction under s. 92; they therefore do not meet the requirements of Crown Zellerbach. The reduction of GHG emissions (whether by raising the cost of fuel, or by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure) does not have the requisite distinctiveness to be recognized as a matter of national concern because the Act encourages provinces to enact substantially the same scheme to serve the same regulatory purpose. The provinces clearly have jurisdiction to establish standards of GHG price stringency in the province.

The double aspect doctrine has no application in this case. While this doctrine allows for the concurrent application of both federal and provincial legislation, it does not create concurrent jurisdiction. The Act purports to do exactly what the provinces can do, and for precisely the same reason. There are simply no distinctly federal aspects of the reduction of GHG emissions that cannot be divided among the enumerated heads of power. The imposition of minimum national standards cannot be described as the distinctly federal aspect of the matter.

Even were the reduction of GHG emissions a single and indivisible area of jurisdiction, its impact on provincial jurisdiction would be of a scale that is irreconcilable with the division of powers. Because the power to legislate to reduce GHG emissions effectively authorizes an array of regulations and extends to the regulation of any activity that requires carbon-based fuel, it has the potential to undo Canada's division of powers. GHG emissions simply cannot be treated as a single regulatory matter. While the Act does not forbid any activity, the charges it imposes will affect the cost of fuel and dictate the viability of emissions-intensive trade-exposed activities. These charges thereby stand to have a profound effect on provincial jurisdiction and the division of powers. The division of powers analysis allows no recourse to balancing or proportionality considerations. The Constitution Act, 1867, sets out spheres of exclusive jurisdiction so that within their sphere of jurisdiction, the provincial legislatures are sovereign, which sovereignty connotes provincial power to act or not act as they see fit, not as long as they do so in a manner that finds approval at the federal Cabinet table.

The delegation granted by the Act to the Cabinet is breathtakingly broad. On this point, the guidance provided by Rowe J. is endorsed, both as to the imperative that the division of powers confines the exercise by the federal Cabinet of Parliament's delegated authority, and as to the appropriate methodology for reviewing regulations for compliance with the division of powers.

The long-established principles set down in Crown Zellerbach should not be departed from. The doctrine of stare decisis establishes a high threshold for departing from precedents and that threshold is not met in this case. There is disagreement with the majority's modernization of the national concern doctrine and with the three-step framework it adopts, which dilutes the national concern test set down in Crown Zellerbach. The framework adopted results in a new, distinctly hierarchical and supervisory model of Canadian federalism that subjects provincial legislative authority to Parliament's overriding authority to establish national standards of how such authority may be exercised and replaces the constitutionally mandated division of powers with a judicially struck balance of power, which must account for other interests. No province, and not even Parliament itself, ever agreed to — or even contemplated — either of these features. This is a model of federalism that rejects the Constitution and re-writes the rules of Confederation. Its implications go far beyond the Act, opening the door to federal intrusion — by way of the imposition of national standards — into all areas of provincial jurisdiction, including intra-provincial trade and commerce, health, and the management of natural resources. It is bound to lead to serious tensions in the federation. And all for no good reason, since Parliament could have achieved its goals in constitutionally valid ways.

Per Rowe J. (dissenting): The national concern doctrine is a residual power of last resort. Faithful adherence to the doctrine leads inexorably to the conclusion that the national concern branch of the POGG power cannot be the basis for the constitutionality of the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act ("Act"). Accordingly, there is agreement with Brown J.'s analysis and with his conclusion that the Act is ultra vires in whole.

Federalism is one of the fundamental underlying principles animating the Canadian Constitution. The primary textual expression of the principle of federalism can be found in the division of powers effected mainly by ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. An essential characteristic of the division of powers is its exhaustiveness, which precludes legislative voids and reconciles parliamentary sovereignty and federalism: it ensures that there is no subject matter which cannot be legislated upon and that Canada, as a whole, is fully sovereign. The exhaustive nature of the division of powers means that matters that do not come within the enumerated classes must fit somewhere. This is dealt with by two residual clauses: one federal, and one provincial. The federal residual clause, the POGG power, comes from the opening words of s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The provincial residual clause is in s. 92(16), and provides that the provincial legislatures may exclusively make laws relating to matters of "a merely local or private Nature in the Province". The wording of s. 91 provides textual support for the view that the POGG power is residual to s. 92, as s. 91 confers the power to legislate for peace, order and good government "in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces". Further, every conferral of provincial legislative jurisdiction is qualified by words such as "in the Province", including s. 92(16). The result is that the POGG power is limited to only those matters that are not of a provincial nature, as the residual scope of the POGG power is narrowed by s. 92(16), which applies to matters that are of a local and private nature even if they do not come within any other enumerated head of power. The scope of s. 92(16) must be interpreted as a counterbalance to the introductory paragraph of s. 91 to reflect the constitutional principle that both Parliament and provincial legislatures must be seen as equals. The POGG power is also residual to the federal heads of power, as the normal process of constitutional interpretation is to rely first on a more specific provision before resorting to a more general one.

Since the POGG power is residual to both the enumerated provincial and federal heads of power, matters that come within enumerated federal or provincial heads of power should be located in those enumerated heads and the POGG power accommodates the matters which do not come within any of the enumerated federal or provincial heads. There is no reason to hold that a matter falls under POGG when it comes within an enumerated head of jurisdiction and it is not possible for a matter to fall both within the POGG power and within a federal enumerated head of power at the same time. If a matter cannot fit within any enumerated head, only then may resort be had to the federal residual clause. This methodology helps ensure that the federal residual power cannot be used as a tool to upset the balance of federalism by stripping away provincial powers.

Courts have long struggled to define the contours of the POGG power in a way that preserves the division of powers. Early POGG cases suffered from a series of twists and turns, with various national concern statements infusing them at various points. The common theme of these cases, however, is that courts rely on POGG to give effect to the exhaustive nature of the division of powers, but courts have always been cautious to guard provincial jurisdiction and ensure POGG does not become a vehicle for federal overreach. The POGG jurisprudence should be read as signaling the existence of just two branches: a general residual power and the emergency power.

What some commentators have named "gap" and "national concern" are simply manifestations of the exhaustive nature of the division of powers, and the residual nature of the POGG power. Matters that do not come within any enumerated head of power or cannot be distributed among multiple heads of power must fit somewhere, and they belong under POGG when they pass the test set out in Crown Zellerbach. However, the analysis of the Crown Zellerbach framework would be the same even if there is only one residual authority (POGG) and even if there are three branches to POGG.

The national concern doctrine, when properly applied, plays an essential role in achieving the goal that the division of powers be collectively exhaustive, in a way that respects provincial jurisdiction. Matters that do not come within one of the enumerated heads of jurisdiction and that cannot be separated and shared between the enumerated heads of jurisdiction of both orders of government do not fit comfortably within the division of powers. In order to maintain exhaustiveness, such matters fall under the general residual power of Parliament by virtue of their distinctiveness from matters under provincial jurisdiction and their indivisibility between various heads of jurisdiction. But when the national concern doctrine is improperly applied, POGG ceases to be residual in nature. When that is so, it can become an instrument to enhance federal and correspondingly decrease provincial authority. Courts must be careful in recognizing matters of national concern, because the national concern branch has great potential to upset the division of powers. Once a matter is qualified as of national concern, Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over the matter, including its intra-provincial aspects. Thus, an expansive interpretation of the doctrine can threaten the fundamental structure of federalism and unduly restrain provincial legislature's law-making authority. It would allow Parliament to acquire exclusive jurisdiction over matters that fall squarely within provincial jurisdiction and flatten regional differences. Courts should never start a division of powers analysis by looking to the federal residual power. To preserve the federal balance, courts should treat POGG as a power of last resort. The scope of the national concern doctrine must be limited to matters that cannot fall under other heads of jurisdiction and that cannot be distributed among multiple heads, thus filling a constitutional gap. Accordingly, the doctrine only applies to matters which are truly of national concern, as opposed to matters of a merely local or private nature that fall under s. 92(16).

The national concern doctrine applies when two conditions are met: first, the matter does not fall within (i.e., it is distinct from) the enumerated heads of jurisdiction and, second, it is single and indivisible. The requirements of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility serve the purpose of identifying matters that are truly residual in two ways. The matter must be distinct from provincial matters and must be incapable of division between both orders of government such that it must be entrusted solely to Parliament. These requirements give effect to the general residual power of Parliament under POGG and ensure that there is no jurisdictional gap in the division of powers. They apply to both new matters and to matters which, although originally falling under provincial jurisdiction, have come to extend beyond the powers of the province and, due to indivisibility, must be entrusted exclusively to Parliament.

Given the residual nature of POGG, the importance of a matter has nothing to do with whether it is a matter of national concern. The role of the general residual power is to maintain the exhaustiveness of the division of powers, not to centralize important matters that can be legislated upon by the provinces or by both orders of government. First, the impugned matter must be distinct from matters falling under the enumerated heads of s. 92. This will be met when the matter is beyond provincial reach, including because of the limitation of provincial jurisdiction to matters in the province. This inquiry includes consideration of the provincial residuum: if the matter is of a merely local or private nature, it would fall under s. 92(16). The matter must also be distinct from matters falling under federal jurisdiction, as POGG is purely residual. Second, even if the matter does not come within an enumerated head of power, it must be single and indivisible to fall under POGG rather than an aggregate that can be broken down and distributed to enumerated heads of jurisdiction. The fact that provinces are unable to deal with a matter is insufficient to conclude that it falls under POGG. The nature of the matter must be such that it cannot be shared between both orders of government and that it must be entrusted to Parliament, exclusively, to avoid a jurisdictional vacuum.

In evaluating whether the matter has a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility, it is relevant to consider what is known as the provincial inability test, that is, what would be the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspect of the matter. The provincial inability inquiry has been designed to control the centralization of powers and to limit the extension of the national concern doctrine to matters that are beyond the power of the provinces to deal with and that must be legislated upon by Parliament, exclusively. Extra-provincial effects, on their own, are insufficient to satisfy the provincial inability test. Rather, the extra-provincial effects must be such that the matter, or part of the matter, is beyond the powers of the provinces to deal with on their own or in tandem. If the pith and substance of provincial legislation comes within the classes of subjects assigned to the provinces, incidental or ancillary extra-provincial effects are irrelevant to its validity. Evidence that provinces are not cooperating, even combined with the presence of extra-provincial effects, is also insufficient to make out provincial inability. Provinces are sovereign within their sphere of jurisdiction and can legitimately choose different policies than other provinces. Further, provincial inability is no more than an indicium of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility. In line with the residual role of POGG, federal authority over what was formerly within provincial competence is only justified where a matter has become distinct from what the provinces can do, and cannot be shared between orders of government because of its indivisibility. In such a case, reliance on POGG is the only way to maintain the exhaustiveness of the division of powers. Otherwise, there would be a jurisdictional void — if the federal Parliament did not have jurisdiction over such a matter, no one would.

When determining if a matter can pass muster as a subject matter falling under POGG, the final consideration is whether it has a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution. The evaluation of the scale of impact on the federal balance illustrates the need for caution when determining whether a new permanent head of exclusive power should, in effect, be added to the federal list of powers. This prong of the test requires courts to determine whether recognizing the proposed new federal power would be compatible with the federal structure. It does not ask whether the importance of the proposed new federal power outweighs the infringement on provincial jurisdiction. Importance is irrelevant because it does not indicate whether there is a jurisdictional gap that must be filled with the general residual power. Important matters can and should be dealt with by the provinces. Courts must also be careful not to let the double aspect doctrine undermine the scale of impact inquiry by suggesting that provinces retain ample means to regulate the matter. The double aspect doctrine recognizes that the same fact situation or matter may possess both federal and provincial aspects, which means that both orders of government can legislate from their respective perspective. This doctrine only applies when a subject matter has multiple aspects, some that may be regulated under provincial jurisdiction, and some under federal jurisdiction. The double aspect doctrine must be applied carefully, since increasing overlap between provincial and federal competence can severely disrupt the federal balance. The combined operation of the doctrines of double aspect and federal paramountcy can have profound implications for the federal structure and for provincial autonomy.

The national concern doctrine must be applied with caution in light of its residual role and its potential to upset the division of powers. If the doctrine is not strictly applied so as to limit it to ensuring that the division of powers is exhaustive, the federal nature of the Constitution would disappear not gradually but rapidly.

Canada's proposed doctrinal expansion of national concern should be rejected because it departs in a marked and unjustified way from the jurisprudence of the Court and, if adopted, it will provide a broad and open pathway for further incursions into what has been exclusive provincial jurisdiction. In the instant case, Canada's proposed pith and substance of the Act of "establishing minimum national standards integral to reducing nationwide GHG emissions" has not attained national dimensions. While the seriousness or the immediacy of the threat that climate change poses may be relevant to an argument under the emergency branch, it has no place in the national concern analysis. Furthermore, the distinctiveness requirement is inherently incompatible with the backstop nature of the Act, which contemplates that some or all provinces could implement GHG pricing schemes that accord with standards set (from time to time) by the federal Cabinet, thereby avoiding the triggering of federal intervention. Singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility should not be collapsed into provincial inability, and provincial inability should not be informed by tests for enumerated heads of power, because this approach fails to give effect to the residual nature of the POGG power.

The device of "minimum national standards" makes wider still the pathway for enhancement of federal jurisdiction. "By means of minimum national standards" could be applied to any matter, and therefore adds nothing to the description of a matter and has no place. Including "minimum national standards" in the matter of national concern short-circuits the analysis and opens the door to federal "minimum standards" with respect to other areas of provincial jurisdiction, artificially expanding federal capacity to legislate in what have been until now matters coming within provincial jurisdiction. This device undermines federalism by replacing provincial autonomy in the exercise of its jurisdiction with the exercise of such jurisdiction made permanently subject to federal supervision. Finally, the Act's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction is not reconcilable with the distribution of powers. The Act leaves room for provincial jurisdiction only insofar as the decision of the province conforms to the will of Parliament and the federal Cabinet. It is not an exercise in cooperative federalism; rather, it is the means to enforce supervisory federalism. The problem is not cured by the double aspect doctrine: since the federal matter is defined in terms of the extent to which it can limit the provinces' discretion to legislate (the backstop mechanism), this is not two aspects of the same fact situation — it is one aspect, and it gives the federal government the upper hand and the final say. Parliament did not have jurisdiction to enact the Act under its general residual power.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE —

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. Overview

[1] In 2018, Parliament enacted the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, S.C. 2018, c. 12, s. 186 ("GGPPA"). Three provinces challenged the constitutionality of the GGPPA by references to their respective courts of appeal. The question divided the courts. In split decisions, the courts of appeal for Saskatchewan and Ontario held that the GGPPA is constitutional, while the Court of Appeal of Alberta held that it is unconstitutional. Those decisions have now been appealed to this Court.

[2] The essential factual backdrop to these appeals is uncontested. Climate change is real. It is caused by greenhouse gas emissions resulting from human activities, and it poses a grave threat to humanity's future. The only way to address the threat of climate change is to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. In the Paris Agreement, U.N. Doc. FCCC/CP/2015/10/Add.1, December 12, 2015, states around the world undertook to drastically reduce their greenhouse gas emissions in order to mitigate the effects of climate change. In Canada, Parliament enacted the GGPPA as part of the country's effort to implement its commitment.

[3] However, none of these facts answer the question in these appeals. The issue here is whether Parliament had the constitutional authority to enact the GGPPA.

To answer this question, the Court must identify the true subject matter of the GGPPA and then classify that subject matter with reference to the division of powers set out in the Constitution Act, 1867 ("Constitution"). In doing so, the Court must give effect to the principle of federalism, a foundational principle of the Canadian Constitution, which requires that an appropriate balance be maintained between the powers of the federal government and those of the provinces.

[4] Below, I conclude that the GGPPA sets minimum national standards of greenhouse gas price stringency to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, pollutants that cause serious extraprovincial harm. Parliament has jurisdiction to enact this law as a matter of national concern under the "Peace, Order, and good Government" clause of s. 91 of the Constitution. National concern is a well-established but rarely applied doctrine of Canadian constitutional law. The application of this doctrine is strictly limited in order to maintain the autonomy of the provinces and respect the diversity of Confederation, as is required by the principle of federalism. However, Parliament has the authority to act in appropriate cases, where there is a matter of genuine national concern and where the recognition of that matter is consistent with the division of powers. In this case, Parliament has acted within its jurisdiction.

[5] I also conclude that the levies imposed by the GGPPA are constitutionally valid regulatory charges. In the result, the GGPPA is constitutional.

II. Reference Question

[6] The reference question in each of the three appeals is substantially the same: Is the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act unconstitutional in whole or in part?

III. Background

A. The Global Climate Crisis

[7] Global climate change is real, and it is clear that human activities are the primary cause. In simple terms, the combustion of fossil fuels releases greenhouse gases ("GHGs") into the atmosphere, and those gases trap solar energy from the sun's incoming radiation in the atmosphere instead of allowing it to escape, thereby warming the planet. Carbon dioxide is the most prevalent and recognizable GHG resulting from human activities. Other common GHGs include methane, nitrous oxide, hydrofluorocarbons, perfluorocarbons, sulfur hexafluoride and nitrogen trifluoride.

[8] At appropriate levels, GHGs are beneficial, keeping temperatures around the world at levels at which humans, animals, plants and marine life can live in balance. And the level of GHGs in the atmosphere has been relatively stable over the last 400,000 years. Since the 1950s, however, the concentrations of GHGs in the atmosphere have increased at an alarming rate, and they continue to rise. As a result, global surface temperatures have already increased by 1.0°C above pre-industrial levels, and that increase is expected to reach 1.5°C by 2040 if the current rate of warming continues.

[9] These temperature increases are significant. As a result of the current warming of 1.0°C, the world is already experiencing more extreme weather, rising sea levels and diminishing Arctic sea ice. Should warming reach or exceed 1.5°C, the world could experience even more extreme consequences, including still higher sea levels and greater loss of Arctic sea ice, a 70 percent or greater global decline of coral reefs, the thawing of permafrost, ecosystem fragility and negative effects on human health, including heat-related and ozone-related morbidity and mortality.

[10] The effects of climate change have been and will be particularly severe and devastating in Canada. Temperatures in this country have risen by 1.7°C since 1948, roughly double the global average rate of increase, and are expected to continue to rise faster than that rate. Canada is also expected to continue to be affected by extreme weather events like floods and forest fires, changes in precipitation levels, degradation of soil and water resources, increased frequency and severity of heat waves, sea level rise, and the spread of potentially life-threatening vector-borne diseases like Lyme disease and West Nile virus.

[11] The Canadian Arctic faces a disproportionately high risk from climate change. There, the average temperature has increased at a rate of nearly three times the global average, and that increase is causing significant reductions in sea ice, accelerated permafrost thaw, the loss of glaciers and other ecosystem impacts. Canada's coastline, the longest in the world, is also being affected disproportionately by climate change, as it experiences changes in relative sea level and rising water temperatures, as well as increased ocean acidity and loss of sea ice and permafrost. Climate change has also had a particularly serious effect on Indigenous peoples, threatening the ability of Indigenous communities in Canada to sustain themselves and maintain their traditional ways of life.

[12] Climate change has three unique characteristics that are worth noting. First, it has no boundaries; the entire country and entire world are experiencing and will continue to experience its effects. Second, the effects of climate change do not have a direct connection to the source of GHG emissions. Provinces and territories with low GHG emissions can experience effects of climate change that are grossly disproportionate to their individual contributions to Canada's and the world's total GHG emissions. In 2016, for example, Alberta, Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan and British Columbia accounted for approximately 90.5 percent of Canada's total GHG emissions, while the approximate percentages were 9.1 percent for the other five provinces and 0.4 percent for the territories. Yet the effects of climate change are and will continue to be experienced across Canada, with heightened impacts in the Canadian Arctic, coastal regions and Indigenous territories. Third, no one province, territory or country can address the issue of climate change on its own. Addressing climate change requires collective national and international action. This is because the harmful effects of GHGs are, by their very nature, not confined by borders.

B. Canada's Efforts to Address Climate Change

[13] Canada's history of international commitments to address climate change began in 1992 with its ratification of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, U.N. Doc. A/AC.237/18 (Part II)/Add.1, May 15, 1992 ("UNFCCC"). After failing to meet its commitments under multiple UNFCCC agreements, including the Kyoto Protocol, U.N. Doc. FCCC/CP/1997/L.7/Add.1, December 10, 1997, and the Copenhagen Accord, U.N. Doc. FCCC/CP/2009/11/Add.1, December 18, 2009, Canada agreed to the Paris Agreement in 2015. Recognizing that "climate change represents an urgent and potentially irreversible threat to human societies and the planet and thus requires the widest possible cooperation by all countries", the participating states agreed to hold the global average temperature increase to well below 2.0°C above pre-industrial levels and to pursue efforts to limit that increase to 1.5°C: United Nations, Framework Convention on Climate Change, Report of the Conference of the Parties on its twenty-first session, U.N. Doc. FCCC/CP/2015/10/Add.1, January 29, 2016, at p. 2; Paris Agreement, art. 2(1)(a). Canada ratified the Paris Agreement in 2016, and the agreement entered into force that same year. Canada committed to reducing its GHG emissions by 30 percent below 2005 levels by 2030.

[14] Under the Paris Agreement, states are free to choose their preferred approaches for meeting their nationally determined contributions. In Canada, the provinces and the federal government agreed to work together in order to meet the country's international commitments. In March 2016, before Canada had ratified the Paris Agreement, all the First Ministers met in Vancouver and adopted the Vancouver Declaration on clean growth and climate change ("Vancouver Declaration"): Canadian Intergovernmental Conference Secretariat, March 3, 2016 (online). In that declaration, the First Ministers recognized the call in the Paris Agreement for significant reductions in GHG emissions and committed to "[i]mplement[ing] GHG mitigation policies in support of meeting or exceeding Canada's 2030 target of a 30% reduction below 2005 levels of emissions, including specific provincial and territorial targets and objectives": ibid, at p. 3. In the Vancouver Declaration, the First Ministers also recognized the importance of a collaborative approach between provincial and territorial governments and the federal government to reducing GHG emissions and noted that "the federal government has committed to ensuring that the provinces and territories have the flexibility to design their own policies to meet emission reductions targets": ibid.

[15] The Vancouver Declaration resulted in the establishment of a federal-provincial-territorial Working Group on Carbon Pricing Mechanisms ("Working Group") to study the role of carbon pricing mechanisms in meeting Canada's emissions reduction targets. The Working Group included at least one representative from each provincial and territorial government as well as the federal government. Its final report identified carbon pricing as one of the most efficient policy approaches for reducing GHG emissions and outlined three carbon pricing options: (1) a single form broad-based carbon pricing mechanism that would apply across Canada, an option that would not be supportive of existing or planned provincial or territorial pricing policies; (2) broad-based carbon pricing mechanisms across Canada, an option that would give each province and territory flexibility as to the choice of instruments; and (3) a range of broad-based carbon pricing mechanisms in some jurisdictions, while the remaining jurisdictions would implement other mechanisms or policies designed to meet GHG emissions reduction targets within their borders: Working Group on Carbon Pricing Mechanisms, Final Report, 2016 (online), at pp. 1, 44-47 and 50.

[16] Carbon pricing, or GHG pricing, is a regulatory mechanism that, in simple terms, puts a price on GHG emissions in order to induce behavioural changes that will lead to widespread reductions in emissions. By putting a price on GHG emissions, governments can incentivize individuals and businesses to change their behaviour so as to make more environmentally sustainable purchasing and consumption choices, to redirect their financial investments, and to reduce their GHG emissions by substituting carbon-intensive goods for low-GHG alternatives. Generally speaking, there are two different approaches to GHG pricing: (1) a carbon tax that entails setting a price on GHG emissions directly, but not setting a cap on emissions; and (2) a cap-and-trade system that prices emissions indirectly by placing a cap on GHG emissions, allocating emission permits to businesses and allowing businesses to buy and sell emission permits from and to other businesses. A carbon tax sets an effective price per unit of GHG emissions. In a cap-and-trade system, the market sets an effective price per unit of GHG emissions, but a cap is placed on permitted emissions. Both approaches put a price on GHG emissions. I also find it worthwhile to note that while "carbon tax" is the term used among policy experts to describe GHG pricing approaches that directly price GHG emissions, it has no connection to the concept of taxation as understood in the constitutional context.

[17] Building on the Working Group's final report, the federal government released the Pan-Canadian Approach to Pricing Carbon Pollution ("Pan-Canadian Approach") in October 2016: Environment and Climate Change Canada, October 3, 2016 (online). In it, the federal government introduced a pan-Canadian benchmark for carbon pricing and stated the benchmark's underlying principles, two of which were that carbon pricing should be a central component of the pan-Canadian framework and that the overall approach should be flexible and recognize carbon pricing policies already being implemented or developed by provinces and territories. The Pan-Canadian Approach also set out the criteria for the pan-Canadian benchmark that would be used for determining acceptable minimum carbon pricing systems. Provinces and territories would have the flexibility to implement, by 2018, one of two carbon pricing systems with a common broad scope and legislated increases in stringency. A federal backstop carbon pricing system would be implemented in jurisdictions that either requested it or failed to implement a system that met the benchmark.

[18] In December 2016, based on the Pan-Canadian Approach, the federal government released the Pan-Canadian Framework on Clean Growth and Climate Change ("Pan-Canadian Framework"): Environment and Climate Change Canada, December 9, 2019 (online). In it, the federal government reaffirmed the principles expounded in the Vancouver Declaration and the Pan-Canadian Approach, and outlined in greater detail the criteria of the pan-Canadian benchmark for carbon pricing. As in the Pan-Canadian Approach, the Pan-Canadian Framework required every province and territory to have one of two carbon pricing systems in place by 2018: a carbon tax or carbon levy system similar to the ones that had already been implemented in British Columbia and Alberta, or a cap-and-trade system similar to the ones that had been implemented in Ontario and Quebec. All carbon pricing systems had to have a common broad scope and to increase in stringency over time. All revenues from the carbon pricing system would remain in the jurisdiction of origin. A federal backstop pricing system would apply only in jurisdictions that requested it, that had no carbon pricing system or that had an insufficiently stringent carbon pricing system. All revenues from the federal system would be returned to the jurisdiction of origin.

[19] On the day the federal government released the Pan-Canadian Framework, it was adopted by eight provinces, including Ontario and Alberta, and by all three territories. Manitoba adopted the framework in February 2018, but Saskatchewan has not done so yet. Later in 2018, Ontario, Alberta and Manitoba withdrew their support from the Pan-Canadian Framework.

[20] In May 2017, after the release of the Pan-Canadian Framework, the federal government published the Technical Paper on the Federal Carbon Pricing Backstop: Environment and Climate Change Canada, May 18, 2017 (online). This paper provided further details, outlined the components of the proposed federal carbon pricing system and sought feedback from stakeholders. The federal government then published documents entitled Guidance on pan-Canadian carbon pollution pricing benchmark, in August 2017, and Supplemental benchmark guidance, in December 2017, which further detailed the scope of the GHG emissions to which the carbon pricing system would apply as well as the minimum legislated increases in stringency: Environment and Climate Change Canada, Guidance on the pan-Canadian Carbon pollution pricing benchmark, August 2017 (online); Environment and Climate Change Canada, Supplemental benchmark guidance, December 20, 2017 (online).

[21] On the day the Supplemental benchmark guidance document was released, the federal Minister of Finance and Minister of Environment and Climate Change wrote to their provincial and territorial counterparts to reaffirm Canada's commitment to carbon pricing under the Pan-Canadian Framework. The letter requested the provincial and territorial ministers to explain how they would be implementing carbon pricing and also outlined the next steps in the federal government's process to price carbon.

[22] In the context of this process, the GGPPA was introduced in Parliament as Part 5 of Bill C-74, An Act to implement certain provisions of the budget, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., on March 27, 2018, and it received royal assent on June 21, 2018. In the lead-up to the introduction of the GGPPA, the federal government had published further guidance on the components of the proposed federal carbon pricing system.

C. Provincial Action on Climate Change

[23] At the time the Pan-Canadian Framework was released, most of the provinces and territories had already taken significant actions to address climate change, including rehabilitating forests, developing low carbon fuels, capping emissions for oil sands projects and the electricity sector, regulating methane emissions, closing fossil-fuelled and coal-fired electricity generating stations, and investing in renewable energy and transportation. British Columbia, Alberta, Ontario and Quebec were the only provinces with carbon pricing systems. All the other provinces and territories, except Saskatchewan and Manitoba, had indicated that they planned to implement either a carbon tax or levy system or a cap-and-trade system.

[24] Despite the actions that had been taken, Canada's overall GHG emissions had decreased by only 3.8 percent between 2005 and 2016, which was well below its target of 30 percent by 2030. Over that period, GHG emissions had decreased in British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Yukon, but had increased in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Newfoundland and Labrador, Northwest Territories and Nunavut. Illustrative of the collective action problem of climate change, between 2005 and 2016, the decreases in GHG emissions in Ontario, Canada's second largest GHG emitting province, were mostly offset by increases in emissions in two of Canada's five largest emitting provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Canada's remaining emissions reduction between 2005 and 2016 came from two of Canada's remaining five largest emitting provinces, Quebec and British Columbia, as well as from decreases in GHG emissions of over 10 percent — well above Canada's 3.8 percent overall GHG emissions reduction — in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Yukon.

IV. The GGPPA

[25] The GGPPA came into force on June 21, 2018.

A. Basic Architecture of the GGPPA

[26] The GGPPA comprises four parts and four schedules. Part 1 of the GGPPA establishes a fuel charge that applies to producers, distributors and importers of various types of carbon-based fuel. Part 2 sets out a pricing mechanism for industrial GHG emissions by large emissions-intensive industrial facilities. Part 3 authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations providing for the application of provincial law concerning GHG emissions to federal works and undertakings, federal land and Indigenous land located in that province, as well as to internal waters located in or contiguous with the province. And Part 4 requires the Minister of the Environment to prepare an annual report on the administration of the GGPPA and have it tabled in Parliament. Only the first two parts and the four schedules are at issue in these appeals. The parties do not challenge the constitutionality of Parts 3 and 4 of the GGPPA.

[27] Because the GGPPA operates as a backstop, the GHG pricing mechanism described in Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA does not automatically apply in all provinces and territories. A province or territory will only be subject to Part 1 or 2 of the GGPPA if the Governor in Council determines that its GHG pricing mechanism is insufficiently stringent. However, the GGPPA itself always applies in the sense that provincial and territorial GHG pricing mechanisms are always subject to assessment to ensure they are sufficiently stringent. At the time of the hearing of these appeals, Ontario, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Yukon and Nunavut were subject to both Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA. Alberta was subject only to Part 1, and Prince Edward Island only to Part 2. After the hearing, the GGPPA was amended such that Part 1 no longer applies to New Brunswick: Regulations Amending Part 1 of Schedule 1 and Schedule 2 to the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act and the Fuel Charge Regulations, SOR/2020-261. The federal government has also announced that Ontario will be subject only to Part 1, but the GGPPA has not yet been amended to reflect this announcement.

B. The Preamble

[28] The GGPPA has a 16-paragraph preamble that sets out the background to and purpose of the legislation. This preamble can helpfully be divided into five parts in which the following points are articulated: (1) GHG emissions contribute to global climate change, and that change is already affecting Canadians and poses a serious risk to the environment, to human health and safety and to economic prosperity both in Canada and internationally (at paras. 1-5); (2) Canada has committed internationally to reducing its GHG emissions by ratifying the UNFCCC and the Paris Agreement (at paras. 6-8); (3) it is recognized in the Pan-Canadian Framework that climate change requires immediate action by the federal, provincial and territorial governments, and GHG pricing is a core element of that framework (at paras. 9-10); (4) behavioural change that leads to increased energy efficiency is necessary to take effective action against climate change (at para. 11); and (5) the purpose of the GGPPA is to implement stringent pricing mechanisms designed to reduce GHG emissions by creating incentives for that behavioural change (paras. 12-16).

[29] In the fifth part of the preamble, it is recognized that some provinces are developing or have implemented GHG pricing systems: para. 14. However, it is also acknowledged that the absence of such systems in some provinces and a lack of stringency in some provincial pricing systems could contribute to significant harm to the environment, to human health and safety and to economic prosperity: para. 15. The preamble concludes with a statement that it is accordingly necessary to create a federal GHG pricing system in order to ensure that GHG pricing applies broadly in Canada: para. 16.

C. Part 1: Fuel Charge

[30] Part 1 of the GGPPA establishes a charge on prescribed types of fuel that applies to fuel produced, delivered or used in a listed province, fuel brought into a listed province from another place in Canada and fuel imported into Canada at a location in a listed province: ss. 17(1), 18(1), 19(1) and (2) and 21(1). Part 1 of Sch. 1 contains the list of provinces to which Part 1 of the GGPPA applies. The fuel charge applies to 22 types of carbon-based fuel that release GHG emissions when burned, including gasoline, diesel fuel and natural gas, as well as to combustible waste. Schedule 2 lists the types of fuel to which the fuel charge applies and indicates the applicable rates of charge for each one. Although the fuel charge is paid by fuel producers, distributors and importers, and not directly by consumers, it is anticipated that retailers will pass the fuel charge on to consumers in the form of higher energy prices. The fuel charge is not payable on qualifying fuel delivered to farmers and fishers (s. 17(2)) or on fuel used at prescribed facilities, including industrial facilities to which the pricing mechanism in Part 2 of the GGPPA applies (ss. 3 and 18(4)). The fuel charge is administered by the Minister of National Revenue acting through the Canada Revenue Agency.

[31] Section 165 of the GGPPA concerns the distribution of the proceeds of the fuel charge. Section 165(2) provides that the Minister of National Revenue must distribute the amount collected in respect of the fuel charge in any listed province less amounts that are rebated, refunded or remitted in respect of those charges, but that the Minister of National Revenue has discretion whether to distribute the net amount to the province itself, other prescribed persons or classes of persons or a combination of the two. The federal government's present policy is to give 90 percent of the proceeds of the fuel charge directly to residents of the province of origin in the form of "Climate Action Incentive" payments under the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), as provided for in s. 13 of the Budget Implementation Act, 2018, No. 2, S.C. 2018, c. 27. The Climate Action Incentive is a deemed rebate under the GGPPA that reduces the amount that must be distributed under s. 165: Income Tax Act, s. 122.8(6). The remaining 10 percent of the proceeds is paid out to schools, hospitals, colleges and universities, municipalities, not-for-profit organizations, Indigenous communities and small and medium-sized businesses in the province of origin. Simply put, the net amount collected from a listed province is returned to persons and entities in that province.

[32] Part 1 of the GGPPA also provides the Governor in Council with considerable power to make regulations. For example, s. 166 authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations to list or delist provinces in relation to the application of the fuel charge under Part 1 of the GGPPA. Any such regulations must be made "[f]or the purpose of ensuring that the pricing of greenhouse gas emissions is applied broadly in Canada at levels that the Governor in Council considers appropriate" (s. 166(2)), and the Governor in Council must, in making them, "take into account, as the primary factor, the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for greenhouse gas emissions" (s. 166(3)).

[33] In addition, the Governor in Council is authorized to make regulations prescribing anything that is to be prescribed or determined by regulation under Part 1: s. 166(1)(a). Specifically, the Governor in Council can make regulations in relation to the fuel charge system (s. 168(2)) by, for example, modifying the listed types of fuel and the applicable rates of charge in Sch. 2 (ss. 166(4) and 168(3)(a)), or defining words or expressions used in Part 1 of the GGPPA, in Part 1 of Sch. 1, or in Sch. 2 (s. 168(3)(a) and (b)). In the event of a conflict between a regulation and Part 1 of the GGPPA, s. 168(4) provides that the regulation prevails to the extent of the conflict.

D. Part 2: Industrial Greenhouse Gas Emissions

[34] Part 2 of the GGPPA establishes an output-based pricing system ("OBPS") for industrial GHG emissions by large emissions-intensive industrial facilities. The OBPS applies only to a "covered facility" in a province listed in Part 2 of Sch. 1: ss. 169 and 174. Covered facilities include facilities that meet the criteria set out in the Output-Based Pricing System Regulations, SOR/2019-266 ("OBPS Regulations"): GGPPA, s. 169. Under the OBPS Regulations, a covered facility is one that meets a specified emissions threshold and is engaged in specific industrial activities: s. 8. The Minister of the Environment may also, upon request, designate an industrial facility located in a backstop jurisdiction (i.e., one listed in Part 2 of Sch. 1) as a covered facility even if it does not meet the criteria in the regulations: GGPPA, s. 172. A covered facility is exempt from the fuel charge (ss. 18(3) and 18(4)), but it must pay for any GHG emissions that exceed its applicable emissions limits on the basis of sector-specific output-based standards. This can be done in one of three ways: (1) by remitting surplus compliance units earned by the facility at a time when its GHG emissions were below its annual limit, or surplus credits purchased from other facilities; (2) paying an excess emissions charge; or (3) a combination of the two (ss. 174(1) and (2) and 175). The OBPS Regulations require that a covered facility's emissions limit be generally calculated on the basis of the facility's production from each industrial activity and an output-based emissions standard in respect of that activity expressed in units of emissions per unit of product: s. 36; Sch. 1. If the efficiency of a facility's industrial processes meets the applicable efficiency standards, the facility will not exceed its emissions limit. It is only where an industrial process is not sufficiently efficient in terms of its production per unit of emissions that a person responsible for a covered facility must provide compensation for the facility's excess emissions. A facility whose efficiency exceeds the standards earns surplus credits: GGPPA, s. 175. Schedule 3 lists 33 GHGs and sets out the global warming potential of each one as defined in accordance with the OBPS, while Sch. 4 sets out the charges for excess emissions. The OBPS is administered by the Minister of the Environment.

[35] Section 188 of the GGPPA, which concerns the distribution of revenues from excess emission charge payments, works similarly to s. 165 of Part 1. Section 188(1) provides that the Minister of National Revenue must distribute all revenues from excess emissions charge payments, but that the Minister has discretion whether to distribute them to the province itself, to persons specified in the regulations or that meet criteria set out in the regulations, or to a combination of both. The federal government has indicated that these revenues will be used to support carbon pollution reduction in the jurisdictions in which they were collected, but has not yet provided further details.

[36] Part 2 of the GGPPA — like Part 1 — also provides the Governor in Council with considerable power to make regulations and orders. For example, s. 189 authorizes the Governor in Council to make orders to list or delist provinces in relation to the application of the OBPS in Part 2 of the GGPPA. As with s. 166, any such order must be made "[f]or the purpose of ensuring that the pricing of greenhouse gas emissions is applied broadly in Canada at levels that the Governor in Council considers appropriate" (s. 189(1)), and the Governor in Council must, in making it, "take into account, as the primary factor, the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for greenhouse gas emissions" (s. 189(2)).

[37] As well, the Governor in Council is authorized to make orders adding GHGs to, or deleting them from, Sch. 3 or amending the global warming potential of any gas; in doing so, the Governor in Council may take into account any factor it considers appropriate: ss. 190(1) and (2). The Governor in Council also has the authority to amend Sch. 4 by amending an excess emissions charge or by adding calendar years: s. 191. Finally, the Governor in Council is authorized to make regulations pertaining to a number of aspects of the OBPS, including covered facilities, GHG emissions limits, the quantification of GHGs, the circumstances under which GHGs are deemed to have been emitted by a facility, compensation, and permitted transfers of compliance units: s. 192.

[38] It is important to understand that Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA together create a single GHG pricing scheme. Part 1 of the GGPPA directly prices GHG emissions. The OBPS created by the OBPS Regulations made under Part 2 of the GGPPA constitutes a complex exemption to Part 1. The OBPS exempts covered facilities from the blunt fuel charge under Part 1, creating a more tailored GHG pricing scheme that lowers the effective GHG price such facilities would otherwise have to pay under Part 1. Part 2 thus also directly prices GHG emissions, but only to the extent that covered facilities exceed applicable efficiency standards. Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA therefore function together to price GHG emissions throughout the Canadian economy.

V. Judicial History

A. Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan, 2019 SKCA 40, 440 D.L.R. (4th) 398

[39] The majority of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan (Richards C.J.S., Jackson and Schwann JJ.A.) concluded that the GGPPA is intra vires Parliament on the basis of the national concern doctrine. The majority identified the pith and substance of the GGPPA as "the establishment of minimum national standards of price stringency for GHG emissions": para. 125. Applying the framework from R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., [1988] 1 S.C.R. 401, they found that the establishment of minimum national standards of price stringency for GHG emissions is a matter of national concern. This matter is of genuine national importance and has the requisite singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility. GHGs are readily identifiable and distinguishable from other gases, and minimum pricing standards are distinguishable from other forms of regulation. Each province is vulnerable to another province's failure to adequately price GHG emissions. Interprovincial cooperation could not be a basis for a sustainable approach to minimum GHG pricing, because provinces are free to withdraw from cooperative arrangements. As well, recognizing federal authority over minimum national standards of price stringency for GHG emissions would have an acceptable impact on provincial jurisdiction, because it would limit Parliament's role to pricing and would not threaten the constitutional validity of provincial initiatives to regulate GHGs.

[40] Ottenbreit and Caldwell JJ.A. dissented. They concluded that Part 1 of the GGPPA is the result of an unconstitutional exercise of Parliament's taxation power and that the GGPPA as a whole is ultra vires Parliament. GHG emissions do not represent a constitutionally distinct matter, and the concepts of "stringency" and "national standards" should not be used to tease an abstraction out of recognizable matters within provincial jurisdiction. The asserted need for a national standard of stringency is based not on a genuine provincial inability to set such a standard, but simply on a policy dispute. Finally, the dissent concluded that the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction is not reconcilable with the balance of federalism. The GGPPA would deprive provinces of the ability to regulate GHGs within their borders. Furthermore, it would be possible for the power delegated to the executive branch by the GGPPA to be exercised so as to widen the scope of the statute, thus further eroding provincial authority.

B. Court of Appeal for Ontario, 2019 ONCA 544, 146 O.R. (3d) 65

[41] The majority of the Court of Appeal for Ontario (Strathy C.J.O., MacPherson and Sharpe JJ.A.) concluded that the GGPPA is intra vires Parliament on the basis of the national concern doctrine. The majority characterized the pith and substance of the GGPPA as "establishing minimum national standards to reduce greenhouse gas emissions": para. 77. Applying the framework from Crown Zellerbach, they reasoned that this matter is new as it was not recognized at Confederation. It is a matter of national concern, as evidenced by the GGPPA's relationship to Canada's international obligations and by the fact that the statute was the product of extensive efforts to achieve a national response to climate change. The matter meets the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility requirement. GHGs are a chemically distinct form of pollution with international and interprovincial impacts. The provinces cannot establish minimum national standards to reduce GHG emissions. No province can control the deleterious effects of GHGs emitted in other provinces or require other provinces to take steps to do so. In assessing the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction, the majority found that the GGPPA strikes an appropriate balance between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. Finally, the majority rejected the Attorney General of Ontario's argument that the levies imposed by the GGPPA are unconstitutional regulatory charges. The majority found the levies to be valid because they have a sufficient connection to the regulatory scheme based on their purpose of behaviour modification.

[42] Hoy A.C.J.O. concurred with Strathy C.J.O.'s national concern analysis, although she characterized the pith and substance of the GGPPA more narrowly as "establishing minimum national greenhouse gas emissions pricing standards to reduce greenhouse gas emissions": paras. 165-66 (emphasis added). In her view, including the means — carbon pricing — in the description of the pith and substance is legally permissible and desirable. In some cases, as here, Parliament's choice of means may be so central to the legislative objective that the main thrust of the law, properly understood, is to achieve a result in a particular way.

[43] Huscroft J.A. dissented. He characterized the pith and substance of the GGPPA broadly as the regulation of GHG emissions. At the classification stage, he reasoned that the national concern doctrine requires the identification of a new subject matter that is independent of the means adopted in the relevant law. In this case, the proposed matter of national concern is federal authority over GHG emissions, which fails to meet the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility requirement from Crown Zellerbach. In addition, recognizing federal jurisdiction on the basis of provincial inability to establish a national standard would allow any matter to be transformed into a matter of national concern by just adding the word "national" to it. The fact that one province's inaction could undermine another province's carbon pricing efforts does not establish provincial inability either; this simply reflects a legitimate policy disagreement. Finally, Huscroft J.A. concluded that the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction is incompatible with the federal-provincial division of powers. For a matter to be one of national concern, it must have ascertainable and reasonable limits in order to contain its reach.

[44] The majority of the Court of Appeal of Alberta (Fraser C.J.A., Watson and Hughes JJ.A.) held that the GGPPA is unconstitutional. They reasoned that the national concern doctrine can apply only to matters that would originally have fallen within the provincial power respecting matters of a merely local or private nature under s. 92(16) of the Constitution. The doctrine has no application to matters that would originally have fallen under other enumerated provincial heads of power. The majority characterized the pith and substance of the GGPPA as "at a minimum, regulation of GHG emissions": paras. 211 and 256. This subject falls under various enumerated provincial powers, and in particular the power relating to the development and management of natural resources under s. 92A of the Constitution. Accordingly, the majority reasoned, the national concern doctrine has no application in this case. The majority went on to apply the framework from Crown Zellerbach. They found that the regulation of GHG emissions is not a single, distinctive and indivisible matter and that it would have an unacceptable impact on provincial jurisdiction. The GGPPA intrudes significantly into the provinces' exclusive jurisdiction over the development and management of natural resources, thereby depriving provinces of their right to balance environmental concerns with economic sustainability.

[45] Wakeling J.A., writing separately, questioned the need for the national concern doctrine and proposed a significant reformulation of the Crown Zellerbach framework. He concluded that the GGPPA is ultra vires Parliament. Canada was in fact seeking judicial approbation of the "environment" or "climate change" as a new federal head of power. Recognition of such a broad federal power would fundamentally destabilize Canadian federalism. The provinces are already taking action to reduce GHG emissions, and the country is better served when governments at both levels work to reduce GHG emissions within their own areas of jurisdiction.

[46] Feehan J.A., dissenting, found that the GGPPA is valid on the basis of the national concern doctrine. He identified the pith and substance of the law as follows: "To effect behavioural change throughout Canada leading to increased energy efficiencies by the use of minimum national standards necessary and integral to the stringent pricing of greenhouse gas emissions" (para. 1056). He found that this is a new matter or a matter of national concern, and that it is single, distinctive and indivisible. The GGPPA has a small scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction, since it accommodates existing provincial systems and is designed merely to set minimum national standards in order to ensure equity as between provinces. The provincial inability test is also met, given that one province's failure to address GHG emissions would have an adverse effect on other provinces.

VI. Analysis

[47] Alberta, Ontario and Saskatchewan challenge the constitutionality of the GGPPA on federalism-related grounds. Ontario further argues that the levies imposed by the GGPPA are unconstitutional. Canada and British Columbia argue that the GGPPA is constitutional on the basis of the national concern doctrine. Below, I will begin by briefly discussing the foundational principle of federalism. I will then undertake the well-established two-stage analytical approach to the review of legislation on federalism grounds: Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, 2018 SCC 48, [2018] 3 S.C.R. 189 ("2018 Securities Reference"), at para. 86. I will first consider the purpose and effects of the GGPPA with a view to characterizing the subject matter — the pith and substance — of the statute. Then I will classify the subject matter of the GGPPA with reference to federal and provincial heads of power under the Constitution in order to determine whether it is intra vires Parliament and therefore valid. Finally, independently of the jurisdiction issue, I will consider the constitutionality of the levies imposed by the GGPPA.

A. Principle of Federalism

[48] Federalism is a foundational principle of the Canadian Constitution. It was a legal response to the underlying political and cultural realities that existed at Confederation, and its objectives are to reconcile diversity with unity, promote democratic participation by reserving meaningful powers to the local or regional level and foster cooperation between Parliament and the provincial legislatures for the common good: Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217 ("Secession Reference"), at para. 43; Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 22.

[49] Sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution give expression to the principle of federalism and divide legislative powers between Parliament and the provincial legislatures: Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 837 ("2011 Securities Reference"), at para. 54. Under the division of powers, broad powers were conferred on the provinces to ensure diversity, while at the same time reserving to the federal government powers better exercised in relation to the country as a whole to provide for Canada's unity: Canadian Western Bank, at para. 22. Importantly, the principle of federalism is based on a recognition that within their spheres of jurisdiction, provinces have autonomy to develop their societies, such as through the exercise of the significant provincial power in relation to "Property and Civil Rights" under s. 92(13). Federal power cannot be used in a manner that effectively eviscerates provincial power: Secession Reference, at para. 58; 2011 Securities Reference, at para. 7. A view of federalism that disregards regional autonomy is in fact as problematic as one that underestimates the scope of Parliament's jurisdiction: R. v. Comeau, 2018 SCC 15, [2018] 1 S.C.R. 342, at para. 82.

[50] As this Court observed in Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 124, courts, as impartial arbiters, are charged with resolving jurisdictional disputes over the boundaries of federal and provincial powers on the basis of the principle of federalism. Although early Canadian constitutional decisions by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council applied a rigid division of federal-provincial powers as watertight compartments, this Court has favoured a flexible view of federalism — what is best described as a modern form of cooperative federalism — that accommodates and encourages intergovernmental cooperation: 2011 Securities Reference, paras. 56-58. That being said, the Court has always maintained that flexibility and cooperation, while important to federalism, cannot override or modify the constitutional division of powers. As the Court remarked in 2011 Securities Reference, "[t]he 'dominant tide' of flexible federalism, however strong its pull may be, cannot sweep designated powers out to sea, nor erode the constitutional balance inherent in the Canadian federal state": para. 62. It is in light of this conception of federalism that I approach this case.

B. Characterization of the GGPPA

(1) Overarching Principles

[51] At the first stage of the division of powers analysis, a court must consider the purpose and effects of the challenged statute or provision in order to identify its "pith and substance", or true subject matter: 2018 Securities Reference, at para. 86; Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17, at paras. 28 and 166. The court does so with a view to identifying the statute's or provision's main thrust, or dominant or most important characteristic: Desgagnés Transport Inc. v. Wärtsilä Canada Inc., 2019 SCC 58, at para. 31. To determine the purpose of the challenged statute or provision, the court can consider both intrinsic evidence, such as the legislation's preamble or purpose clauses, and extrinsic evidence, such as Hansard or minutes of parliamentary committees: Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), 2002 SCC 31, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 146, at para. 53; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 27. In considering the effects of the challenged legislation, the court can consider both the legal effects, those that flow directly from the provisions of the statute itself, and the practical effects, the "side" effects that flow from the application of the statute: Kitkatla, at para. 54; R. v. Morgentaler, [1993] 3 S.C.R. 463, at p. 480. The characterization process is not technical or formalistic. A court can look at the background and circumstances of a statute's enactment as well as at the words used in it: Ward v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 17, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 569, at para. 18.

[52] Three further points with respect to the identification of the pith and substance are important here. First, the pith and substance of a challenged statute or provision must be described as precisely as possible. A vague or general description is unhelpful, as it can result in the law being superficially assigned to both federal and provincial heads of powers or may exaggerate the extent to which the law extends into the other level of government's sphere of jurisdiction: Desgagnés Transport, at para. 35; Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 457 ("Assisted Human Reproduction Act"), at para. 190. However, precision should not be confused with narrowness. Instead, the pith and substance of a challenged statute or provision should capture the law's essential character in terms that are as precise as the law will allow: Genetic Non-Discrimination, at para. 32. It is only in this manner that a court can determine what the law is in fact "all about": Desgagnés Transport, at para. 35, quoting A. S. Abel, "The Neglected Logic of 91 and 92" (1969), 19 U.T.L.J. 487, at p. 490.

[53] Second, it is permissible in some circumstances for a court to include the legislative choice of means in the definition of a statute's pith and substance, as long as it does not lose sight of the fact that the goal of the analysis is to identify the true subject matter of the challenged statute or provision. In the courts below, a central issue was the permissibility of including the means of the statute in the definition of the subject matter of the GGPPA. In Ward and other cases, this Court cautioned against "confus[ing] the purpose of the legislation with the means used to carry out that purpose": Ward, at para. 25; see also Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 693, at para. 29; Goodwin v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles), 2015 SCC 46, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 250, at para. 24. However, those cases did not establish a blanket prohibition on considering the means in characterizing the pith and substance of a law. Rather, they stand for the basic proposition that Parliament's or a provincial legislature's choice of means is not determinative of the legislation's true subject matter, although it may sometimes be permissible to consider the choice of means in defining a statute's purpose. This Court has in fact frequently included references to legislative means when defining the pith and substance of laws: Ward, at para. 28; Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 783 ("Firearms"), at paras. 4 and 19; Reference re Employment Insurance Act (Can.), ss. 22 and 23, 2005 SCC 56, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 669, at para. 34; 2011 Securities Reference, at para. 106. And there may be cases in which an impugned statute's dominant characteristic or main thrust is so closely tied to its means that treating the means as irrelevant to the identification of the pith and substance would make it difficult to define the matter of a statute or a provision precisely. In such a case, a broad pith and substance that does not include the means would be the very type of vague and general characterization, like "health" or "the environment", that this Court described as unhelpful in Desgagnés Transport, at paras. 35 and 167 (citing Assisted Human Reproduction Act, at para. 190).

[54] Even this Court's jurisprudence on the national concern doctrine illustrates that there is nothing impermissible about defining a matter with reference to the legislative means. In Munro v. National Capital Commission, [1966] S.C.R. 663, the Court defined the matter in terms of both the overarching objective — ensuring that "the nature and character of the seat of the Government of Canada may be in accordance with its national significance" — and the legislative means for achieving this objective — "development, conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region": pp. 669 and 671. Similarly, in Crown Zellerbach, the Court did not define the matter of the statute broadly in terms of marine pollution. The definition of the matter was in fact a combination of the overarching purpose — controlling marine pollution — and the particular means that had been chosen — controlling the dumping of substances into the sea: pp. 436-37. La Forest J., dissenting, pointed out that regulating the dumping of substances into the sea was only one of multiple means to control marine pollution, given that pollution could also enter the sea through fresh water and through the air: p. 457.

[55] I therefore agree with Hoy A.C.J.O.'s statement in the case at bar that in some cases the choice of means may be so central to the legislative objective that the main thrust of a statute or provision, properly understood, is to achieve a result in a particular way, which would justify including the means in identifying the pith and substance: para. 179.

[56] Third, the characterization and classification stages of the division of powers analysis are and must be kept distinct. In other words, the pith and substance of a statute or a provision must be identified without regard to the heads of legislative competence. As Binnie J. noted in Chatterjee v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2009 SCC 19, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 624, at para. 16, a failure to keep these two stages of the analysis distinct would create "a danger that the whole exercise will become blurred and overly oriented towards results". The characterization exercise must ultimately be rooted in the purpose and the effects of the impugned statute or provision.

(2) Application to the GGPPA

[57] In this case, the judges in the courts below, the parties and the interveners have proposed various formulations of the GGPPA's pith and substance. These formulations can be grouped in three basic categories: (1) a broad formulation to the effect that the GGPPA's pith and substance is the regulation of GHG emissions; (2) a national standards-based formulation to the effect that the GGPPA's pith and substance is to establish minimum national standards to reduce GHG emissions; and (3) a national standards pricing-based formulation to the effect that the GGPPA's pith and substance is to establish minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. I would adopt a national standards pricing-based formulation of the pith and substance of the GGPPA. In my view, the true subject matter of the GGPPA is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. Allow me to explain why.

(a) Intrinsic Evidence

[58] This Court has frequently used a statute's title as a tool for the purposes of characterization: Re: Exported Natural Gas Tax, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 1004, at p. 1077; R. v. Swain, [1991] 1 S.C.R. 933, at p. 1004; Siemens v. Manitoba (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 3, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 6, at para. 21. However, a statute's title is not determinative in the pith and substance analysis: Re: Anti-Inflation Act, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 373, at p. 451. In the case at bar, the statute is titled "Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act". Its long title is "An Act to mitigate climate change through the pan-Canadian application of pricing mechanisms to a broad set of greenhouse gas emission sources and to make consequential amendments to other Acts". Both of these titles confirm that the purpose of the GGPPA is more precise than the regulation of GHG emissions. As the long title makes clear, the true subject matter of the GGPPA is not just "to mitigate climate change", but to do so "through the pan-Canadian application of pricing mechanisms to a broad set of greenhouse gas emission sources". The short title also makes it clear that the GGPPA is concerned not simply with regulating GHG emissions, but with pricing them, as the statute is titled the "Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act". Just as Lamer C.J. found in Swain, it is in the instant case clear even from the title of the GGPPA that its main thrust is national GHG pricing, not, more broadly, the reduction of GHG emissions.

[59] Likewise, the preamble of the GGPPA confirms that its subject matter is national GHG pricing. In general, preambles are useful in constitutional litigation in order to illustrate the "mischief" the legislation is designed to cure and the goals Parliament sought to achieve: R. Sullivan, Sullivan on the Construction of Statutes (6th ed. 2014), at § 14.25; P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp. (loose-leaf)), vol. 1, at pp. 15-14 to 15-15. Although a preamble is not conclusive or determinative, it can be a useful tool in interpreting the purpose of a statute or a provision.

[60] It is clear from reading the preamble as a whole that the focus of the GGPPA is on national GHG pricing. The preamble begins with a review of the contribution of GHG emissions to global climate change, of the impact of climate change on — and the risks it poses to — Canada and Canadians (at paras. 1-5), and of the international commitments made by Canada in the UNFCCC and the Paris Agreement to reduce GHG emissions (paras. 6-8). It then focuses on establishing a minimum national standards GHG pricing scheme. It identifies GHG pricing as "a core element" of the Pan-Canadian Framework (at para. 10), and recognizes that climate change requires immediate collective action to promote behavioural change which leads to increased energy efficiency (paras. 9 and 11). After that, pricing mechanisms are commented on at length (at paras. 12-16): in particular, it is noted that some provinces are developing or have implemented GHG pricing systems (at para. 14), but that the absence of such systems or a lack of stringency in some provincial GHG pricing systems could contribute to significant harm to the environment and to human health (para. 15). The preamble concludes with a statement that a national GHG pricing scheme is accordingly necessary in order to ensure that, taking provincial pricing systems into account, "greenhouse gas emissions pricing applies broadly in Canada": para. 16.

[61] Furthermore, the "mischief" the GGPPA is intended to address is clearly identified in the preamble: the profound nationwide harm associated with a purely intraprovincial approach to regulating GHG emissions. In Firearms, the Court stated that the mischief approach — one in which a court considers the problem a statute is intended to address — is one way to determine the purpose of impugned legislation: para. 21. In the instant case, the preamble shows that the law is intended to address the "significant deleterious effects on the environment, including its biological diversity, on human health and safety and on economic prosperity" that could result from "the absence of greenhouse gas emissions pricing in some provinces and a lack of stringency in some provincial greenhouse gas emissions pricing systems": para. 15. In Parliament's eyes, the relevant mischief is not GHG emissions generally, but rather the effects of the failure of some provinces to implement GHG pricing systems or to implement sufficiently stringent pricing systems, and the consequential failure to reduce GHG emissions across Canada. To address this mischief, the GGPPA establishes minimum national standards for GHG pricing that apply across Canada, setting a GHG pricing "floor" across the country.

(b) Extrinsic Evidence

[62] In considering extrinsic evidence, a court may consider the statute's legislative history — the events leading up to its enactment, for example, as well as government policy papers and legislative debates — in order to determine what the legislative purpose is: Hogg, at pp. 15-14 to 15-15; Kitkatla, at para. 53. In the case at bar, the extrinsic evidence confirms that the main thrust of the GGPPA is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions.

[63] First, it can be seen from the events leading up to the enactment of the GGPPA and from government policy papers that there was a focus on GHG pricing and establishing a national GHG pricing benchmark, and that GHG pricing is a distinct portion of the field of governmental responses to climate change. In the Paris Agreement, states made general international commitments to reduce GHG emissions. They are not required to adopt GHG pricing systems; rather, they are free to choose their preferred means. Immediately after the adoption of the Paris Agreement, however, the First Ministers endorsed the Vancouver Declaration, in which they recognized that governments in Canada and around the world were using carbon pricing mechanisms to combat climate change, and Canada and the provinces committed to adopting "a broad range of domestic measures, including carbon pricing mechanisms" in order to reduce GHG emissions: at p. 3 (emphasis added). Moreover, the signers of the Vancouver Declaration clearly recognized carbon pricing as a distinct aspect of the field of governmental responses to climate change by establishing a working group on carbon pricing mechanisms that was independent of other working groups on clean technology, innovation and jobs, on specific opportunities for mitigation of climate change, and on adaptation to climate change and climate resilience.

[64] The Working Group on Carbon Pricing Mechanisms was established to explore the role of carbon pricing mechanisms in meeting Canada's GHG emissions reduction targets under the Paris Agreement. In its final report, the Working Group identified carbon pricing as one of the most efficient policy approaches for reducing GHG emissions and advocated for broad-based carbon pricing mechanisms across Canada that would give each province and territory flexibility on instrument choice. The federal government then endorsed this recommendation in both the Pan-Canadian Approach and the Pan-Canadian Framework, and the Pan-Canadian Approach introduced a federal benchmark for carbon pricing. Each province and territory would have flexibility to implement either a direct or an indirect carbon pricing system that would have a common scope to ensure effectiveness and minimize interprovincial competitiveness impacts, while a federal backstop, a direct carbon pricing system, would apply only in jurisdictions that did not meet the federal benchmark. This approach would ensure that GHG pricing would be applied across the Canadian economy, and it would recognize GHG pricing policies already implemented or being developed by provinces or territories. The Pan-Canadian Framework reaffirmed the Pan-Canadian Approach and outlined the federal benchmark for carbon pricing in greater detail. In the Pan-Canadian Framework, the federal government reiterated the need for a regulatory framework for carbon pricing that priced GHG emissions across the Canadian economy, highlighted the federal commitment to "ensuring that the provinces and territories have the flexibility to design their own policies and programs to meet emission-reductions targets" and stated that the purpose of the federal benchmark was to preserve the flexibility of the provinces and territories to design their own GHG pricing policies: Foreword and pp. 7-8. Each province or territory would have flexibility to implement a direct or indirect GHG pricing system within its borders. A federal direct GHG pricing backstop would apply in jurisdictions that did not meet the benchmark.

[65] In my view, it is clear from the Working Group's final report, the Pan-Canadian Approach and the Pan-Canadian Framework that the federal government's intention was not to take over the field of regulating GHG emissions, or even that of GHG pricing, but was, rather, to establish minimum national standards of GHG price stringency for GHG emissions — through a federally imposed national direct GHG pricing backstop — without displacing provincial and territorial jurisdiction over the choice and design of pricing instruments. Courts should generally hesitate to attribute to Parliament an intention to occupy an entire field: Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 419, at para. 20. In the instant case, this statement rings all the more true because the extrinsic evidence of the lead-up to the enactment of the GGPPA reveals a process of federal-provincial-territorial cooperation in which the federal government's goal was a system where the provincial and territorial governments would be free to design and implement their own GHG pricing programs.

[66] Second, it can also be seen from the legislative debates leading up to the GGPPA that the focus of the statute was not broadly on regulating GHG emissions or establishing minimum national standards to reduce GHG emissions, but was, rather, on establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency. During the parliamentary debate on the GGPPA, the then Minister of Environment and Climate Change, the Hon. Catherine McKenna, indicated that pricing carbon pollution was "[c]entral to any credible climate plan" and was "a major contribut[or] to helping Canada meet its climate targets under the Paris Agreement": House of Commons Debates, vol. 148, No. 289, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., May 1, 2018, at p. 18958. The then Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment and Climate Change, Jonathan Wilkinson, echoed these comments. He observed that, "[t]o ensure that a national pollution pricing system can be implemented across the country, the government promised to set a regulated federal floor price on carbon": House of Commons Debates, vol. 148, No. 294, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., May 8, 2018, at p. 19213 (emphasis added). What is more, he identified carbon pricing as a distinct part of the field of governmental responses to climate change, stating that "the focus of the pricing of carbon pollution is to actually incent choices that drive people toward more efficient use of hydrocarbon resources so that we will reduce our GHG emissions over time. It is an important piece of a broader approach to addressing climate change and to achieving our Paris targets": p. 19214 (emphasis added).

[67] Similarly, before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Judy Meltzer, the then Director General, Carbon Pricing Bureau, Department of the Environment, observed that the GGPPA was "a step in the development of a federal carbon pricing backstop system" and that "[t]he key purpose of the [GGPPA] is to help reduce [GHG] emissions by ensuring that a carbon price applies broadly throughout Canada, with increasing stringency over time": House of Commons, Standing Committee on Finance, Evidence, No. 146, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., April 25, 2018, at p. 6 (emphasis added). And finally, before the same Standing Committee, John Moffet, the then Associate Assistant Deputy Minister, Environmental Protection Branch, Department of the Environment, expressed the opinion that "the government's goal was to ensure that carbon pricing applied throughout Canada" as well as "to send a signal to other countries and businesses planning to invest in Canada that Canada was committed to carbon pricing": House of Commons, Standing Committee on Finance, Evidence, No. 148, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., May 1, 2018, at p. 5 (emphasis added). He also mentioned another goal of the GGPPA, that is, to "make a contribution, but not be the sole contributor to attaining the [Paris] target": House of Commons, Standing Committee on Finance, Evidence, No. 152, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., May 8, 2018, at p. 8.

[68] Although statements made in the course of parliamentary debates should be viewed with caution, given that the purpose of the statute is that of Parliament, not that of its individual members, such statements can nonetheless be helpful in discerning Parliament's purpose: Genetic Non-Discrimination, at paras. 40 and 194; Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1939] A.C. 117 (P.C.), at p. 131; Canadian National Railway Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 40, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 135, at para. 47. In the case at bar, it is notable that both elected representatives and senior public servants consistently described the purpose of the GGPPA in terms of imposing a Canada-wide GHG pricing system, not of regulating GHG emissions generally.

[69] As an aside, I note that in finding that the GGPPA is ultra vires Parliament, the majority of the Court of Appeal of Alberta did not deny that Parliament was concerned with setting a minimum national GHG pricing standard in enacting the legislation. But they found that Parliament's focus on GHG pricing was merely a means to achieve its ultimate purpose of reducing GHG emissions and mitigating the effects of climate change: paras. 213-14. As I explained above, however, a court should characterize the pith and substance — including the purpose being pursued by Parliament or the provincial legislature — precisely. The fact that Parliament's purpose can be stated at multiple levels of generality does not mean that the most general purpose is the true one, or the one that most accurately reflects the thrust of the legislation. This Court has in fact often declined to attribute the broadest possible purpose to Parliament: see R. v. Hydro-Québec, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 213, at para. 130. When characterizing a matter, a court must strive to be as precise as possible, because a precise statement more accurately reflects the true nature of what Parliament did and what it intended to do. Here, that means not denying that Parliament ultimately intended to reduce GHG emissions but, rather, recognizing that its goal in enacting this particular statute was to establish minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions.

(c) Legal Effects

[70] A law's legal effects are discerned from its provisions by asking "how the legislation as a whole affects the rights and liabilities of those subject to its terms":

Morgentaler, at p. 482. In my view, the legal effects of the GGPPA confirm that its focus is on national GHG pricing and confirm its essentially backstop nature.

[71] In jurisdictions where Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA are applied, the primary legal effect is to create one GHG pricing scheme that prices GHG emissions in a manner that is consistent with what is done in the rest of the Canadian economy. Certain fuel producers, distributors and importers are required to pay a charge for fuel and for combustible waste under Part 1. And as I explained earlier, the OBPS created by the OBPS Regulations made under Part 2 creates a complex exemption to Part 1: covered industrial facilities are exempt from the flat fuel charge under Part 1 of the GGPPA, but must pay a charge that applies to the extent that they fail to meet applicable GHG efficiency standards. Both Part 1 and Part 2 of the GGPPA thus directly price GHG emissions. Part 1 directly prices the emissions of certain fuel producers, distributors and importers. Part 2 directly prices the GHG emissions of covered facilities to the extent that they exceed the applicable efficiency standards. Significantly, the GGPPA does not require those to whom it applies to perform or refrain from performing specified GHG-emitting activities. Nor does it tell industries how they are to operate in order to reduce their GHG emissions. Instead, all the GGPPA does is to require persons to pay for engaging in specified activities that result in the emission of GHGs. As the majority of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan observed, the GGPPA leaves "individual consumers and businesses . . . free to choose how they will respond, or not, to the price signals sent by the marketplace": para. 160. The legal effects of the GGPPA are thus centrally aimed at pricing GHG emissions nationally. The GGPPA does not represent an attempt to occupy other areas of the field of GHG emissions reduction that were discussed in the Pan-Canadian Framework, such as tightening energy efficiency standards and codes, taking sector-specific action with respect to electricity, buildings, transportation, industry, forestry, agriculture, waste and the public sector, and promoting clean technology innovation: pp. 2-3 and 7-25.

[72] Moreover, because the GGPPA operates as a backstop, the legal effects of Parts 1 and 2 of the statute — a federally imposed national GHG pricing scheme — apply only if the Governor in Council has listed a province or territory pursuant to s. 166 for Part 1 or s. 189 for Part 2. The GGPPA provides that the Governor in Council may make decisions with respect to listing only "[f]or the purpose of ensuring that the pricing of greenhouse gas emissions is applied broadly in Canada at levels that the Governor in Council considers appropriate" (ss. 166(2) and 189(1)) and must, in making them, "take into account, as the primary factor, the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for greenhouse gas emissions" (ss. 166(3) and 189(2)). As a result, the GHG pricing mechanism described in Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA will not come into operation at all in a province or territory that already has a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing system. Not only does this confirm the backstop nature of the GGPPA — that of creating minimum national standards of GHG pricing — but this feature of the statute gives legal effect to the federal government's commitment in the Pan-Canadian Framework to give the provinces and territories "the flexibility to design their own policies to meet emissions reductions targets, including carbon pricing, adapted to each province and territory's specific circumstances", as well as to "recognize carbon pricing policies already implemented or in development by provinces and territories": pp. 7-8.

[73] It is notable that the GGPPA does not itself define the word "stringency" used in ss. 166 and 189. But this does not mean that the Governor in Council's discretion with respect to listing is "open-ended and entirely subjective": Alta. C.A. reasons, at para. 221. Rather, the Governor in Council's discretion is limited both by the statutory purpose of the GGPPA and by specific guidelines set out in the statute for listing decisions: see Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, at para. 108; Katz Group Canada Inc. v. Ontario (Health and Long-Term Care), 2013 SCC 64, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 810, at para. 24. Specifically, the discretion to list a province or territory must be exercised in a way that is consistent with the statutory purpose of reducing GHG emissions by putting a price on them. And any decision of the Governor in Council with respect to listing would have to be consistent with the specific guideline of ensuring that emissions pricing is applied broadly in Canada and would have to take the stringency of existing provincial GHG pricing mechanisms into account as the primary factor: preamble, para. 16, and ss. 166 and 189. Moreover, because the GGPPA provides for a legal standard to be applied in assessing provincial and territorial pricing mechanisms, any decision of the Governor in Council in this regard would be open to judicial review to ensure that it is consistent with the purpose of the GGPPA and with the specific constraints set out in ss. 166(2) and (3) and 189(1) and (2). In other words, although the Governor in Council has considerable discretion with respect to listing, that discretion is limited, as it must be exercised in accordance with the purpose for which it was given. The Governor in Council certainly does not, therefore, have "absolute and untrammelled 'discretion'": Vavilov, at para. 108, quoting Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121, at p. 140.

[74] Similarly, the Governor in Council's discretion under the GGPPA to make regulations modifying the schedules and, in some cases, provisions of the statute itself does not make the pith and substance of the GGPPA broader. Nor does it permit the Governor in Council to include "any substance, material or thing known to mankind" in the system under Part 1 or to boundlessly change the coverage of Part 2 of the GGPPA by adding gases or redefining what qualifies as a covered facility in a way that is unrelated to the underlying purpose of the statute: Alta. C.A. reasons, at paras. 227 and 237.

[75] Under Part 1 of the GGPPA, the Governor in Council has the discretion to make regulations prescribing anything that is to be prescribed or determined by regulation under that Part (s. 166(1)(a)), including regulations in relation to the fuel charge system (s. 168(2)), regulations modifying the listed types of fuel and the rates of charge in Sch. 2 (ss. 166(4) and 168(3)(a)), and regulations defining words or expressions used in Part 1 of the GGPPA, in Part 1 of Sch. 1, or in Sch. 2 (s. 168(3)(a) and (b)). First, no aspect of this discretion permits the Governor in Council to regulate GHG emissions broadly in any way other than by implementing a GHG pricing scheme. Second, any exercise of the power to make regulations under Part 1 of the GGPPA is constrained by that Part's own words and statutory purpose. Part 1, as its very title indicates, establishes a "Fuel Charge". Any exercise of the regulation-making power that prescribed substances other than fuel or combustible waste would be open to judicial review and could be found to be ultra vires the GGPPA. Similarly, the Governor in Council could not list a fuel or substance that does not emit GHGs when burned; any regulation to that effect would be ultra vires the GGPPA, whose purpose is to reduce GHG emissions by putting a price on GHGs.

[76] The Governor in Council also has a discretion under Part 2 of the GGPPA, that is, the discretion to make orders adding GHGs to, or deleting them from, Sch. 3 or amending the global warming potential of any gas while taking into account any factor the Governor in Council considers appropriate (ss. 190(1) and (2)), amending an excess emissions payments charge in, or adding calendar years to, Sch. 4 (s. 191), or making regulations pertaining to a number of aspects of the OBPS, including covered facilities, GHG emissions limits, the quantification of GHGs, the circumstances under which GHGs are deemed to have been emitted by a facility, compensation, and permitted transfers of compliance units (s. 192). First, as with Part 1 of the GGPPA, no aspect of the discretion provided for in Part 2 permits the Governor in Council to regulate GHG emissions broadly or to regulate specific industries in any way other than by setting GHG emissions limits and pricing excess emissions across the country. Instead, the OBPS uses GHG intensity standards to set emissions limits and price emissions beyond those limits in order to create incentives for behavioural change across industries. Industrial entities can determine whether to increase their efficiency or to pay to exceed their applicable efficiency standard emission limits. Second, the power to make orders concerning which gases Part 2 applies to is also limited by the statutory purpose of reducing GHG emissions through GHG pricing. If the Governor in Council were to list a gas that does not contribute to GHG emissions or to indicate a figure for the global warming potential of a gas that was unsupported by scientific evidence, the regulation would be open to judicial review. As for the power to redefine what qualifies as a covered facility, it must be understood in light of the title of Part 2, which specifies that the focus is on "Industrial Greenhouse Gas Emissions". Any attempt to extend Part 2 to a facility other than an industrial facility would also be ultra vires the GGPPA and open to judicial review.

(d) Practical Effects

[77] A law's practical effects are "'side' effects flow[ing] from the application of the statute which are not direct effects of the provisions of the statute itself": Kitkatla, at para. 54. Where, as here, a court is asked to adjudicate the constitutionality of legislation that has been in force for only a short time, "any prediction of future practical effect is necessarily short-term, since the court is not equipped to predict accurately the future consequential impact of legislation": Morgentaler, at p. 486.

[78] In my view, the evidence of practical effects in the case at bar is not particularly helpful for characterizing the GGPPA. Given the dearth of such evidence, it would be unwise to attempt to predict the economic consequences of the GGPPA. It is, moreover, not for the Court to assess how effective the GGPPA is at reducing GHG emissions: Firearms, at para. 18.

[79] Nonetheless, it should be noted that the evidence of practical effects to date is consistent with the principle of flexibility and support for provincially designed GHG pricing schemes. Practically speaking, the only thing not permitted by the GGPPA is for a province or a territory not to implement a GHG pricing mechanism, or to implement one that is not sufficiently stringent. The federal backstop GHG pricing regime in Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA does not have a legal effect to the extent that there is a provincial system of comparable stringency in place, whatever its design. For example, the Governor in Council has declined to list Alberta under Part 2 of the GGPPA, because Alberta's self-designed Technology Innovation and Emissions Reduction ("TIER") system is considered to meet federal stringency requirements: Alberta, TIER Regulation Fact Sheet, July 2020 (online). The government of Alberta has itself described the TIER system as one "that is cost-efficient and tailored to Alberta's industries and priorities": TIER Regulation Fact Sheet. Similarly, Part 2 applies only partially in Saskatchewan, because that province has implemented its own output-based performance standards system for large industrial facilities. Part 2 applies only to electricity generation and natural gas transmission pipelines, which are exempt from Saskatchewan's self-designed system: Sask. C.A. reasons, at para. 50; see also Environment and Climate Change, Saskatchewan and pollution pricing, February 21, 2019 (online).

(e) Conclusion on Pith and Substance

[80] For the foregoing reasons, I conclude that the true subject matter of the GGPPA is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. With respect, I cannot accept the broader characterizations of the GGPPA advanced by the majorities of the Court of Appeal for Ontario and the Court of Appeal of Alberta. Not only is GHG pricing central to the GGPPA, but Parts 1 and 2 of the statute operate as a backstop by creating a national GHG pricing floor. In my view, a national GHG pricing scheme is not merely the means of achieving the end of reducing GHG emissions. Rather, it is the entire matter to which the GGPPA is directed, as is evident from the analysis of the purpose and effects of the statute. It is also the most precise characterization of the subject matter of the GGPPA, as it accurately reflects both what the statute does — imposing a minimum standard of GHG price stringency — and why the statute does what it does — reducing GHG emissions in order to mitigate climate change: see Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 536 ("COPA"), at para. 17.

[81] I would pause here to note that my colleague Brown J. argues that the phrase "minimum national standards" is an artifice that adds nothing to the pith and substance of the GGPPA. I respectfully disagree. Here, "minimum national standards" gives expression to the national backstop nature of the GGPPA. In my view, this phrase adds something essential to the pith and substance that goes to the true subject matter of the GGPPA, because the statute operates as a national backstop that gives effect to Parliament's purpose of ensuring that GHG pricing applies broadly across Canada.

"Minimum national standards" expresses the fact that the GGPPA functions through the imposition of an outcome-based minimum legal standard on all provinces and territories at all times. This contrasts with the proposed federal legislation the Court considered in 2011 Securities Reference, which had not been enacted to impose a unified system of securities regulation for Canada that would apply in all the provinces and territories, but would instead have permitted provinces to opt in, in the hope that this would create an effective unified national securities regulation system: para. 31. By contrast, the GGPPA applies in all the provinces at all times. It is "national" in scope. At the same time, the backstop system set out in the GGPPA also gives the provinces flexibility by allowing them to implement their own GHG pricing mechanisms, provided they meet the federally determined standard of stringency. It imposes "minimum standards". In this way, the GGPPA does not create a blunt unified national system. The national GHG pricing system provided for in it is limited to the imposition of minimum national standards of stringency.

[82] Moreover, the legislation in this case is distinguishable from the equivalency provision of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 16 (4th Supp.), that was considered in Hydro-Québec. In that case, the equivalency provision was but one feature of the federal legislation at issue, which had a broader pith and substance of prohibiting acts causing the entry of certain toxic substances into the environment: para. 130. In the instant case, as I have mentioned, the GGPPA operates as a backstop. The intrinsic evidence, the extrinsic evidence, the legal effects and the practical effects all illustrate that operation as a backstop is the main thrust and dominant characteristic of the GGPPA. In my view, a mechanism that may be a mere feature of one law can be the defining feature of another law such that it goes to that other law's pith and substance. The evidence in this case clearly shows that Parliament acted with a remedial mindset in order to address the risks of provincial non-cooperation on GHG pricing by establishing a national GHG pricing floor.

[83] I also note here that my colleague Côté J. finds that ss. 166(2), 166(4), 168(4) and 192 of the GGPPA are unconstitutional delegations of power to the Governor in Council (at para. 242). I respectfully disagree.

[84] First, it is necessary to review the concept of delegation. As this Court explained in 2018 Securities Reference, the principle of parliamentary sovereignty "means that the legislature has the authority to enact laws on its own and the authority to delegate to some other person or body certain administrative or regulatory powers, including the power to make binding but subordinate rules and regulations": para. 73 (emphasis in original). Delegation is common in the administrative state: ibid. As this Court further explained, "a delegated power is rooted in and limited by the governing statute . . . . [T]he sovereign legislature always ultimately retains the complete authority to revoke any such delegated power": para. 74.

[85] This Court has consistently held that delegation such as the one at issue in this case is constitutional. Even broad or important powers may be delegated to the executive, so long as the legislature does not abdicate its legislative role. In Hodge v. The Queen, (1883) 9 App. Cas. 117, the starting point of the jurisprudence on delegated authority, the Privy Council found that the Ontario legislature's delegation of power to a board to regulate and license taverns was constitutional. The Privy Council held that delegating the power to make "important regulations" did not amount to an abdication of the legislature's role and that the choice and the extent of any such delegation were matters for the legislature, not the courts. Next, in Re George Edwin Gray (1918), 57 S.C.R. 150, this Court affirmed the constitutionality of a very broad grant of law-making power by Parliament to the Governor in Council that included a "Henry VIII clause", that is, a clause by which Parliament delegates to the executive the power to make regulations that amend an enabling statute: see also Shannon v. Lower Mainland Dairy Products Board, [1938] A.C. 708 (P.C.), in which a broad delegation to the provincial executive by way of a provincial skeletal statute was upheld. This Court affirmed and applied Re Gray in Reference as to the Validity of the Regulations in relation to Chemicals, [1943] S.C.R. 1. And in R. v. Furtney, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 89, Stevenson J., writing for a unanimous Court, commented in obiter that "[t]he power of Parliament to delegate its legislative powers has been unquestioned, at least since the Reference as to the Validity of the Regulations in relation to Chemicals. The delegate is, of course, always subordinate in that the delegation can be circumscribed and withdrawn": p. 104 (citations omitted). This governing law has been consistently applied by courts of appeal: see, e.g., R. v. P. (J.) (2003), 67 O.R. (3d) 321, at paras. 20-23 (C.A.); Canadian Generic Pharmaceutical Association v. Canada (Health), 2010 FCA 334, [2012] 2 F.C.R. 618, at para. 63; House of Sga'nisim v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 BCCA 49, 41 B.C.L.R. (5th) 23, at paras. 89-91.

[86] None of the impugned provisions are unconstitutional delegations of power to the Governor in Council. Sections 166(2), 166(4) and 192 of the GGPPA are permissible delegations of law-making power to the Governor in Council to implement Parliament's policy choice to legislate a nationwide GHG pricing backstop. Section 166(2) and s. 166(4) allow the Governor in Council to determine where and to what the fuel charge established and detailed in Part 1 of the statute applies. Section 192 permits the Governor in Council to make regulations to implement the OBPS established in Part 2 of the GGPPA. Legislatures frequently include provisions with a similar regulation-making scope to that of s. 192 in complex environmental legislative schemes: see, e.g., Environmental Protection Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.19, ss. 175.1 to 177 (provisions that have been used to develop a scheme equivalent to the OBPS in Greenhouse Gas Emissions Performance Standards, O. Reg. 241/19); Carbon Tax Act, S.B.C. 2008, c. 40, s. 84; Greenhouse Gas Industrial Reporting and Control Act, S.B.C. 2014, c. 29, ss. 46 to 53; Environmental Protection and Enhancement Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. E-12, ss. 37(1), 59, 86, 120, 122(1), 133, 146, 162, 166, 175, 187, 193 and 239; Environment Quality Act, CQLR, c. Q-2, s. 46.5 (a provision used to develop Quebec's cap-and-trade system in Regulation respecting a cap-and-trade system for greenhouse gas emission allowances, CQLR, c. Q-2, r. 46.1). Indeed, it is common for a statute to "set out the legislature's basic objects and provisions", while "most of the heavy lifting [is] done by regulations, adopted by the executive branch of government under orders-in-council": B. McLachlin, P.C., Administrative Tribunals and the Courts: An Evolutionary Relationship, May 27, 2013 (online).

[87] To the extent that the GGPPA delegates to the executive the power to make regulations that amend the statute, such as in s. 168(4), this too, constitutes a permissible delegation to the Governor in Council. As I explained above, the constitutionality of Henry VIII clauses is settled law, and I would decline to revisit the issue in this case. Furthermore, the power to make regulations under a Henry VIII clause is not exempted from the general rules of administrative law. Any regulation that is made must be consistent both with specific provisions of the enabling statute and with its overriding purpose or object (Waddell v. Governor in Council (1983), 8 Admin. L.R. 266 (B.C.S.C.), at p. 292, quoted in Katz Group, at para. 24), and it must be "within the scope [of] and subject to the conditions prescribed" by that statute (Re Gray, at p. 168). Therefore, the scope of the authority delegated in s. 168(4) is limited by and subject to the provisions of the GGPPA. The Governor in Council cannot use s. 168(4) of the GGPPA to alter the character of Part 1 of the statute, since any exercise of this authority to make regulations that are inconsistent with either the general purpose of reducing GHG emissions through the specific means of establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency would be ultra vires the GGPPA and open to judicial review. Moreover, the Governor in Council's power under s. 168(4) can be revoked by Parliament.

[88] In the case at bar, Parliament, far from abdicating its legislative role, has in the GGPPA instituted a policy for combatting climate change by establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency. Sections 166(2), 166(4), 168(4) and 192 of the GGPPA simply delegate to the executive a power to implement this policy. This delegation of power is within constitutionally acceptable limits and the general rules of administrative law apply to constrain the Governor in Council's discretion under all of these provisions.

C. Classification of the GGPPA

(1) National Concern Doctrine

[89] Canada argues that the GGPPA is constitutional on the basis of the national concern doctrine. This doctrine is derived from the introductory clause of s. 91 of the Constitution, which empowers Parliament "to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces" ("POGG power"). According to the doctrine, the federal government has jurisdiction over matters that are found to be of inherent national concern. As Professor Hogg explains, it "is residuary in its relationship to the provincial heads of power": at p. 17-1 to 17-2. Therefore, the national concern doctrine does not allow Parliament to legislate in relation to matters that come within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provinces under s. 92. The national concern test is the mechanism by which matters of inherent national concern, which transcend the provinces, can be identified.

[90] The effect of finding that a matter is one of national concern is permanent: see Re: Anti-Inflation Act, at pp. 460-61. For this reason, a finding that the federal government has authority on the basis of the national concern doctrine raises special concerns about maintaining the constitutional division of powers. As La Forest J. put it in Crown Zellerbach, when the federal government asserts its authority on this basis, "[t]he challenge for the courts, as in the past, will be to allow the federal Parliament sufficient scope to acquit itself of its duties to deal with national and international problems while respecting the scheme of federalism provided by the Constitution" (p. 448). By grappling with this challenge over time, the courts have developed a workable framework for identifying federal authority on the basis of the national concern doctrine in appropriate, exceptional cases and for adequately constraining federal power in accordance with the principle of federalism.

[91] Below, I will trace the development of this framework, beginning with a discussion of the origins of the doctrine in Privy Council cases. I will then review how this Court has dealt with the doctrine, consistently taking a restrained approach to applying it while gradually developing its legal framework. Next, I will identify and clarify some areas of ongoing uncertainty with respect to the national concern doctrine and review the test for applying it. Lastly, I will apply the test to determine whether the GGPPA represents a valid exercise of a federal power based on the national concern doctrine.

(a) Origins of the National Concern Doctrine

[92] The first two cases in which the Privy Council dealt with the national concern doctrine, Russell v. The Queen (1882), 7 App. Cas. 829 (P.C.), and Attorney- General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion, [1896] A.C. 348 (P.C.) ("Local Prohibition Reference"), speak to the potential for expansion of federal power on the basis of the doctrine and to the importance of placing adequate constraints on that power.

[93] The issue in Russell was the constitutionality of the Canada Temperance Act, 1878, S.C. 1878, c. 16, a federal statute establishing a local-option prohibition scheme, that is, one that required local action in order to come into force in a given county or city. Sir Montague Smith noted that the scope and objects of the law were general — "to promote temperance by means of a uniform law throughout the Dominion" — and that intemperance was "assumed to exist throughout the Dominion": pp. 841-42. He concluded that the law fell within federal jurisdiction: "Parliament deals with the subject as one of general concern to the Dominion, upon which uniformity of legislation is desirable, and the Parliament alone can so deal with it" (p. 841). As commentators have noted, the reasoning in Russell appeared to open the door to a potentially unlimited scope of federal power: A. S. Abel, "What Peace, Order and Good Government?" (1968), 7 West. Ont. L. Rev. 1, at pp. 4-5; Hogg, at pp. 17-8 to 17-12.

[94] The next time the Privy Council considered the national concern doctrine, it recognized the potential breadth of the federal power as defined in Russell and sounded a strong note of caution. Local Prohibition Reference concerned the constitutionality of a provincial local-option prohibition scheme. The Privy Council accepted "that some matters, in their origin local and provincial, might attain such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion" and therefore to fall under federal jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine: p. 361. However, Lord Watson recognized the risk the national concern doctrine represented for the division of powers in no uncertain terms: a failure to properly confine its application "would practically destroy the autonomy of the provinces": p. 361. He stressed that federal authority based on the national concern doctrine must be "strictly confined to such matters as are unquestionably of Canadian interest and importance" (p. 360) and urged courts to exercise "great caution . . . in distinguishing between that which is local and provincial, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, and that which has ceased to be merely local or provincial, and has become [a] matter of national concern, in such sense as to bring it within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada" (p. 361). The Privy Council upheld the provincial legislation at issue in that case. Applying the double aspect doctrine, it held that provinces could regulate traffic in alcohol from a local point of view where there was no issue with respect to federal paramountcy: pp. 365-70; see also Hogg, at pp. 17-8 to 17-9.

[95] The cautious approach urged in Local Prohibition Reference was reflected in the rejection of federal jurisdiction over the regulation of insurance in In Re "Insurance Act, 1910" (1913), 48 S.C.R. 260 ("Insurance Reference SCC"), aff'd Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Alberta, [1916] 1 A.C. 588 ("Insurance Reference PC"). In a majority opinion that was subsequently affirmed by the Privy Council, Duff J. rejected the idea that the growth of the insurance business to "great proportions" across Canada should ground the application of the POGG power:

p. 304. Duff J. was alive to the risk that an unconstrained approach to that power could result in a continual expansion of federal jurisdiction over the provincial private sector simply as a consequence of business growth.

[96] As Professor G. Le Dain wrote before being appointed to this Court, although it had been decided in the Insurance References that "mere growth and extent was not to be the criterion for the application of the general power", the criterion that should be applied was not yet clear: "Sir Lyman Duff and the Constitution" (1974), 12 Osgoode Hall L.J. 261, at p. 277. The need to be cautious in applying the national concern doctrine followed from Local Prohibition Reference, but the limits on the federal power were not fully defined. In a series of cases over the next few decades, the Privy Council, searching for a "concrete, specific and restrictive criterion" in order to limit federal power based on the POGG clause, sought to restrict its application of that clause to emergencies: Le Dain, at pp. 277-81; see also Hogg, at p. 17-9.

[97] These cases did not satisfactorily reconcile the emergency requirement with the reasoning in Russell and Local Prohibition Reference. The Privy Council ultimately confronted this problem in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Canada Temperance Federation, [1946] A.C. 193 ("Canada Temperance Federation"). In that case, the issue was the constitutionality of a substantially similar successor to the temperance statute that had been considered in Russell. Viscount Simon rejected an argument that the POGG power could apply only in an emergency. In the critical passage of his reasons, he stated the test as follows:

> . . . the true test must be found in the real subject matter of the legislation: if it is such that it goes beyond local or provincial concern or interests and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the Dominion as a whole (as, for example, in the Aeronautics case and the Radio case), then it will fall within the competence of the Dominion Parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, though it may in another aspect touch on matters specially reserved to the provincial legislatures. War and pestilence, no doubt, are instances; so, too, may be the drink or drug traffic, or the carrying of arms. In Russell v. The Queen, Sir Montague Smith gave as an instance of valid Dominion legislation a law which prohibited or restricted the sale or exposure of cattle having a contagious disease. [Citations omitted; pp. 205-6.]

Some of the examples Viscount Simon listed, such as war, would of course satisfy an emergency requirement. The precise distinction between emergency cases and national concern cases was ultimately clarified some decades later: see Re: Anti-Inflation Act, at pp. 459-461. But the holding of Canada Temperance Federation with respect to national concern is clear: an emergency is not required for a case to meet the national concern test; instead, the test is whether the real subject matter of the legislation goes beyond provincial concern and is, from its inherent nature, the concern of the country as a whole. On this basis, Viscount Simon firmly established national concern as a distinct branch of the POGG power that grounded federal jurisdiction over matters that were inherently of national concern.

(b) Early Application of the National Concern Doctrine by the Court

[98] This Court stepped into its role as the final court of appeal for Canada in 1949. Over the next two decades, there were only two matters that the Court, relying on the Canada Temperance Federation test and heeding the concern for provincial autonomy highlighted in Local Prohibition Reference, found to come within federal jurisdiction on the basis of national concern. The first was aeronautics (Johannesson v. Municipality of West St. Paul, [1952] 1 S.C.R. 292). The second was the development of the National Capital Region: Munro, at p. 671. In the same period, Canadian lower courts identified a third matter of national concern, the control of atomic energy: Pronto Uranium Mines Limited v. The Ontario Labour Relations Board, [1956] O.R. 862 (H.C.); Denison Mines Ltd. v. Attorney-General of Canada, [1973] 1 O.R. 797 (H.C.).

[99] Ten years after Munro, the Court applied the national concern doctrine again, for the first time in the environmental context: Interprovincial Co-operatives Ltd. v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 477. The issue was whether Manitoba could legislate in relation to pollution that originated outside its provincial boundaries but caused damage within them. The majority in the result, in reasons written by Pigeon J., held that a province has no authority to legislate in relation to acts done outside the province, even if those acts cause damaging pollution to enter the province. Pigeon J. recognized that the federal government can legislate in relation to the pollution of interprovincial rivers, which he described as "a pollution problem that is not really local in scope but truly interprovincial": p. 514. The concurring and dissenting judges also endorsed the view that the federal government has jurisdiction over interprovincial rivers: pp. 499, 520 and 525-26. Although none of the judges explicitly referenced the POGG power, the application of that power explains the result: Crown Zellerbach, at pp. 445-46, per La Forest J. (dissenting, but not on this point); Morguard Investments Ltd. v. De Savoye, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1077, at p. 1099; W. R. Lederman, "Unity and Diversity in Canadian Federalism: Ideals and Methods of Moderation" (1975), 53 Can. Bar Rev. 597, at p. 614.

[100] In applying Canada Temperance Federation in its decisions, this Court confirmed that an emergency is not needed in order for a matter to be of national concern, and offered some incremental guidance on the criteria for identifying a matter that is inherently of national concern. Moreover, although the Court did find that the federal government had jurisdiction in a small number of cases in that period, it "exhibited the caution and restraint" displayed in the Privy Council's approach to the doctrine: Lederman, at p. 609.

(c) Development of the National Concern Test

[101] The specific parameters of the limits on the federal power began to take shape in Re: Anti-Inflation Act, which marked the Court's first serious effort to wrestle with the national concern doctrine. The issue was the constitutionality of the federal Anti-Inflation Act, S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 75, the purpose of which was to comprehensively contain and reduce inflation. A majority of the Court upheld the law as a valid exercise of Parliament's POGG power on the basis of the existence of an emergency. Although Beetz J. dissented in the result, his views on the national concern doctrine were endorsed by a majority of the Court.

[102] As in the cases discussed above, Beetz J. stressed the threat the national concern doctrine poses to provincial autonomy. In an emergency case, federal jurisdiction on the basis of the POGG power is temporary, but the national concern doctrine involves a finding of federal jurisdiction that is permanent: p. 461. Beetz J. emphasized that federal jurisdiction over a matter of national concern is exclusive. Thus, if the federal government were found to have jurisdiction over the proposed matter of "containment and reduction of inflation", then "the provinces could probably continue to regulate profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation if Parliament saw fit to leave them any room; but they could not regulate them in relation to inflation which would have become an area of exclusive federal jurisdiction": pp. 444-45. If broad subjects such as "inflation", "economic growth" or "protection of the environment" were found to be matters of national concern, the federal-provincial balance "would disappear not gradually but rapidly": p. 445.

[103] In Beetz J.'s view, the national concern doctrine does not allow for an erosion of provincial autonomy such as that. After reviewing the jurisprudence, he explained that the doctrine applies only to "clear instances of distinct subject matters which do not fall within any of the enumerated heads of s. 92 and which, by nature, are of national concern": p. 457. Elaborating on the framework for identifying a matter that is inherently of national concern, he found that federal authority based on the national concern doctrine had rightly been reserved for "cases where a new matter was not an aggregate but had a degree of unity that made it indivisible, an identity which made it distinct from provincial matters and a sufficient consistence to retain the bounds of form": p. 458. The Court also had to consider the scale upon which the new matter permitted Parliament to affect provincial matters so as to preserve the federal-provincial division of powers. The containment and reduction of inflation failed these tests. It lacked specificity and was instead an aggregate of several subjects, such as monetary policy, public spending and restraint of profits, prices and wages, many of which fell under provincial jurisdiction. Moreover, because its scope was so broad, finding that it was a federal matter "would render most provincial powers nugatory": p. 458. Although Beetz J.'s views on the national concern doctrine were not determinative in Re: Anti-Inflation Act, they were subsequently adopted by Le Dain J. in Crown Zellerbach, in which the Court gave further structure to the national concern doctrine.

[104] There were several cases after Re: Anti-Inflation Act in which another consideration was applied to limit the application of the national concern doctrine: provincial inability. This test took centre stage in Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Attorney General of Canada, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 914, in which Estey J. endorsed the following statement by Professor Hogg:

> . . . the most important element of national dimension or national concern is a need for one national law which cannot realistically be satisfied by cooperative provincial action because the failure of one province to cooperate would carry with it grave consequences for the residents of other provinces.
> (p. 945, quoting Constitutional Law of Canada (1977), at p. 261)

In Labatt Breweries, the brewing and labelling of beer failed the provincial inability test. It was not "a matter of national concern transcending the local authorities' power to meet and solve it by legislation": p. 945. Indeed, the proposed matter did not even concern the extraprovincial distribution of beer, but instead related to the brewing process itself: pp. 943-45. Likewise, in Schneider v. The Queen, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 112, the Court explained that the treatment of drug dependency was not a matter of national concern, because, unlike the illegal trade in drugs, one province's failure to provide treatment facilities would not endanger other provinces' interests: p. 131. Bookending this group of cases is R. v. Wetmore, [1983] 2 S.C.R. 284, in which Dickson J., dissenting but not on this point, rejected regulation of the pharmaceutical industry as a matter of national concern. Dickson J. referred both to Beetz J.'s framework and to Professor Hogg's formulation of the provincial inability test, and concluded that the matter failed to meet both standards: p. 296.

[105] Crown Zellerbach afforded this Court an opportunity to give structure to the national concern doctrine. At issue was the validity of s. 4(1) of the Ocean Dumping Control Act, S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 55, which prohibited the dumping of any substance at sea without a permit. The definition of the word "sea" in that Act excluded fresh waters but included internal marine waters within provincial boundaries. In a split decision, the Court found that the law was valid on the basis of the national concern doctrine. Le Dain J., writing for the majority, restated that doctrine. After surveying the jurisprudence, he set out a framework that now serves as a touchstone for analyzing proposed matters of national concern, determining that the following four conclusions were "firmly established":

> 1. The national concern doctrine is separate and distinct from the national emergency doctrine of the peace, order and good government power, > which is chiefly distinguishable by the fact that it provides a constitutional basis for what is necessarily legislation of a temporary nature;

>
> 2. The national concern doctrine applies to both new matters which did not exist at Confederation and to matters which, although originally matters of a local or private nature in a province, have since, in the absence of national emergency, become matters of national concern;
>
> 3. For a matter to qualify as a matter of national concern in either sense it must have a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern and a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution;
> 4. In determining whether a matter has attained the required degree of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern it is relevant to consider what would be the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspects of the matter. [pp. 431-32]

Le Dain J. elaborated on the final point, the provincial inability test. He reasoned that provincial inability would be established where a "provincial failure to deal effectively with the intra-provincial aspects of the matter could have an adverse effect on extra-provincial interests": p. 434. He characterized provincial inability as "one of the indicia" of singleness or indivisibility: ibid.

[106] Applying this framework to the federal ocean dumping law at issue in that case, Le Dain J. held that the law was valid on the basis of the national concern doctrine. He found that marine pollution in general is clearly a matter of concern to Canada as a whole because of its predominantly extraprovincial and international character. Focusing specifically on "the control of pollution by the dumping of substances in marine waters, including provincial marine waters", Le Dain J. concluded that this matter is single and distinctive: p. 436. In a relevant international convention, marine pollution by dumping was treated as a distinct and separate form of water pollution. Marine pollution has its own characteristics and scientific considerations that distinguish it from fresh water pollution. It is indivisible, because there is a close relationship between pollution in provincial internal waters and pollution in the federal territorial sea, and because it is difficult to ascertain by visual observation the boundary between these waters. The distinction in the statute between fresh water and salt water ensured that the matter would have "ascertainable and reasonable limits" so that its impact on provincial jurisdiction would be acceptable: p. 438.

[107] In the more than 30 years since Crown Zellerbach, the Court has not found that the federal government has jurisdiction over any new matters of national concern. However, in Ontario Hydro v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 327, the Court accepted the earlier finding by lower courts that atomic energy is a matter of national concern: see Pronto; Denison. In accepting the applicability of the national concern doctrine in that case, this Court was unanimous on the point that federal jurisdiction over atomic energy is grounded in the potential for catastrophic interprovincial and international harm. At issue was whether labour relations comprised part of the matter of atomic energy. A majority of the Court held that labour relations falls within that matter of national concern, finding that labour relations is "integral" to the federal interests that make atomic energy a national concern: pp. 340, 352 and 379-80.

[108] Finally, the most recent case in which the Court considered the national concern doctrine was Hydro-Québec. At issue was the constitutional validity of Part II of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, which empowered federal ministers to determine what substances are toxic and to prohibit the introduction of such substances into the environment except in accordance with specified terms and conditions. La Forest J., writing for the majority, upheld the law on the basis of the criminal law power and declined to apply the national concern doctrine. He cautioned against an "enthusiastic adoption" of that doctrine, but acknowledged that a "discrete area of environmental legislative power" can form a matter of national concern if it meets the Crown Zellerbach test: paras. 115-16.

[109] From the infancy of the national concern doctrine in Local Prohibition Reference to the Court's most recent consideration of the doctrine in Hydro-Québec, the jurisprudence reviewed above shows that the Court has been responsive to the legitimate concern that the doctrine poses a threat to provincial autonomy. The national concern test, properly understood, adequately addresses this risk. The test places a clear limit on the federal POGG power and ensures that the national concern doctrine can be applied only in exceptional cases, where doing so is necessary in order for the federal government to discharge its duty to address truly national problems and is consistent with the division of powers.

(2) Clarifying the National Concern Doctrine

[110] The case law reviewed above firmly establishes the national concern doctrine in Canadian law and explains the fundamental principles underlying its application. This doctrine applies only to matters that transcend the provinces owing to their inherently national character. In Crown Zellerbach, this Court explained that a proposed matter of national concern must have a "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility". Furthermore, a finding that the matter is one of national concern must be reconcilable with the division of powers.

[111] As can be seen from the decisions of the courts below and from the parties' arguments, there is significant uncertainty regarding a number of issues that are central to the national concern doctrine. This is unsurprising, given that there are very few recent cases concerning the doctrine, which in turn flows from the fact that one of its defining features is its restrictive application. This case presents an opportunity to clarify these issues.

[112] In particular, each of the steps of the national concern test requires further discussion. Before turning to those steps, however, I must address two preliminary issues with respect to the "matter" in question in the analysis. First, there is some uncertainty about what the "matter" to which the national concern test applies actually is. Second, this case raises the question of the scope and nature of the federal power over a matter of national concern, and in particular whether the double aspect doctrine can apply in this context. In other words, what are the consequences for the division of powers of identifying a new matter of national concern? The answer to this question will have a significant impact on the analysis undertaken at the final step of the test, at which the court must determine whether finding that the proposed matter is one of national concern is reconcilable with the division of powers.

[113] Throughout my analysis on these issues, I will be relying in part on this Court's trade and commerce jurisprudence, and in particular on 2011 Securities Reference and 2018 Securities Reference. As the Court has observed, the national concern doctrine and the trade and commerce power pose similar challenges to federalism. In both contexts, the Court has interpreted the federal power narrowly to ensure that it does not overwhelm provincial jurisdiction and undermine the federal-provincial division of powers: Re: Anti-Inflation Act, at p. 458; Wetmore, at p. 294. Although the Court has not addressed the national concern doctrine in any detail for many years, the more recent cases of 2011 Securities Reference and 2018 Securities Reference, in which it applied the general branch of the trade and commerce power, offer useful insight and are consistent with the modern approach to federalism. However, my citing these cases should not be taken as an invitation to conflate the two powers. They are distinct, and, as Beetz J. warned in Re: Anti-Inflation Act, courts should be "all the more careful" when applying the residual POGG power than when interpreting the enumerated trade and commerce power: p. 458.

(a) "Matter" of National Concern

[114] As I explained above, the division of powers analysis follows a familiar pathway. The first stage is to characterize the pith and substance, or matter, of the impugned statute or provision. The second stage is to classify that matter by reference to the heads of power set out in the Constitution. Having identified the pith and substance of the GGPPA, I come now to the classification analysis in relation to the national concern doctrine. The Attorney General of Saskatchewan argues that the classification analysis in this context must depart from the usual framework. Rather than assessing whether the matter of the statute can be classified on the basis of the national concern doctrine, Saskatchewan submits that the classification analysis must be applied to a different "proposed head of power" based on the POGG power, one cast at a level of generality that is broader than the matter of the statute: A.F., at para. 58. This approach cannot be accepted. There is no principled basis for departing from the ordinary division of powers analysis to require that the matter of national concern analyzed by the court at the classification stage be broader than the matter of the statute as identified by the court at the characterization stage. Applying the classification analysis to the matter of the statute in the context of the national concern doctrine is consistent with the constitutional text, with the jurisprudence and with the principle of judicial restraint.

[115] First, as to the constitutional text, s. 91 does not provide in the context of the POGG power that Parliament can make laws in relation to classes of subjects. Instead, it states that Parliament can make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada "in relation to . . . Matters". Matters and classes of subjects are distinct. Law-making powers are exercisable in relation to matters, which in turn generally come within broader classes of subjects. A matter that falls under the POGG power necessarily does not come within the classes of subjects enumerated in ss. 91 and 92. This does not mean, however, that the word "matter" has a different meaning in the context of the POGG power. "Matter" is used in ss. 91 and 92 to refer to the pith and substance of legislation: Firearms, at para. 16. Nothing in the words of the Constitution supports the construction of a class of subjects under the POGG power that is broader than the matter of the statute. Instead, the text of the Constitution supports the approach of applying the national concern test to the matter of the statute as identified by the court at the characterization stage.

[116] Second, this approach is consistent with the jurisprudence. In the leading cases on the national concern doctrine, the Court focused on the matter of the statute in considering the classification issue. In Re: Anti-Inflation Act, the broad matter of containment and reduction of inflation that Beetz J. rejected was not based on a statute whose real focus was narrower, but was in fact what the Attorney General of Canada identified as the matter of the statute at issue: p. 450. In Crown Zellerbach, the majority did not find that marine pollution generally was a matter of national concern, but instead found that the specific matter of the Ocean Dumping Control Act — the control of marine pollution by the dumping of substances — was one: see p. 436. In those cases, the pith and substance of the legislation itself determined the breadth and content of the matter to which the national concern test was applied.

[117] Third, this approach is consistent with the principle of judicial restraint. In Munro, Cartwright J. emphasized on the subject of the national concern doctrine that the court should "confine itself to the precise question raised in the proceeding which is before it": p. 672. Similarly, in Canadian Western Bank, this Court stated that courts should not attempt to "define the possible scope of [broad] powers in advance and for all time", but should instead "procee[d] with caution on a case-by-case basis": para. 43. The Attorney General of Saskatchewan proposes that the court go beyond the precise question asked. In fact, however, a more cautious approach is appropriate in the context of the national concern doctrine, given its potential to disrupt the federal-provincial balance. Put simply, if Parliament has not indicated in a statute that its intention is to exercise jurisdiction over a broad matter, there is no reason for a court to artificially construct such a broad matter.

[118] Finally, I respectfully reject the suggestion that this approach somehow conflates the characterization and classification stages: see Ont. C.A. reasons, at para. 224. It does not. As I explained above, the analyses at the two stages are distinct. At the first stage, a court must follow the accepted approach to the pith and substance analysis in order to characterize the matter of the statute. As both Karakatsanis J. and Kasirer J. recently stated in Genetic Non-Discrimination, the court must focus on "the law itself and what it is really about": paras. 31 and 165. Only then does it proceed to the classification analysis, which in the case at bar involves consideration of the national concern doctrine. If the matter is not legally viable as a matter of national concern, then, as was the case in Re: Anti-Inflation Act, the statute cannot be upheld on the basis of that doctrine. If, on the other hand, the matter meets the national concern test, then the statute will be valid. Respectfully, this does not "constitutionalize" the statute: see Ont. C.A. reasons, at para. 224. It simply determines the validity of the law and resolves the question before the court.

[119] Therefore, the matter to consider in this national concern analysis is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan that stringency in this context is not limited to the charge per unit of GHG emissions. It encompasses the scope or breadth of application of the charge in the sense of the fuels, operations and activities to which the charge applies and the authority to implement regulatory schemes that are necessary in order to implement such a charge: para. 139.

(b) Exclusive Federal Jurisdiction Based on the National Concern Doctrine

[120] There is no doubt that a finding that a matter is of national concern confers exclusive jurisdiction over that matter on Parliament: Re: Anti-Inflation Act, at p. 444; Crown Zellerbach, at pp. 433 and 455; Hydro-Québec, at para. 115. However, the nature and consequences of this exclusive federal jurisdiction is contested by the parties in this case and requires clarification. Understanding the consequences of the recognition of a new matter of national concern is critical in order to properly undertake the scale of impact analysis at the third step of the national concern test.

[121] Uncertainty about the nature of exclusive federal jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine may be rooted in the use of the word "plenary" to describe the power in certain cases. In Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. characterized Beetz J.'s views in Re: Anti-Inflation Act as follows: ". . . where a matter falls within the national concern doctrine . . . Parliament has an exclusive jurisdiction of a plenary nature to legislate in relation to that matter, including its intra-provincial aspects" (p. 433). However, Le Dain J. went on to reject the proposition that there must be "plenary jurisdiction . . . to deal with any legislative problem": p. 434. In Ontario Hydro, a majority of this Court concluded that federal jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine is not plenary and does not give Parliament jurisdiction over "all aspects" of, in that case, atomic energy. Instead, the Court had to determine whether the regulation of labour relations falls within the national concern aspects of atomic energy: pp. 340 and 425; see also M. Olsynski, N. Bankes, and A. Leach, "Breaking Ranks (and Precedent): Reference re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, 2020 ABCA 74" (2020), 33 J. Env. Law & Prac. 159, at pp. 180-81; A. Leach, and E. M. Adams, "Seeing Double: Peace, Order, and Good Government, and the Impact of Federal Greenhouse Gas Emissions Legislation on Provincial Jurisdiction" (2020), 29 Const. Forum 1, at n. 71.

[122] In my view, describing the power as "plenary" is unhelpful. The word "plenary" speaks to the scope of the power: see RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at paras. 28 and 32. As can be seen from Ontario Hydro, in the context of the national concern doctrine, the scope of the federal power is defined by the nature of the national concern itself. Only aspects with a sufficient connection to the underlying inherent national concern will fall within the scope of the federal power. It was not a foregone conclusion that labour relations at a nuclear generating station would fall within the federal government's jurisdiction over atomic energy, as one might expect if the national concern doctrine grounded a "plenary" federal power. Rather, the question was whether the safety concerns that make atomic energy a matter of inherent national concern had a sufficient connection to labour relations to bring labour relations within the scope of the federal power.

[123] The Attorney General of Ontario asserts, as a general proposition, that "[t]he consequences of recognizing a new matter of national concern are sweeping": A.F., at para. 64. It is true that the recognition of any new matter of national concern has consequences for federalism. However, the scope of such consequences is case-specific because, as I have just explained, the scope of the federal power in the context of the national concern doctrine depends on the nature of the national concern at issue in the case in question.

[124] Thus, there is some truth to Ontario's submission in the case of, for example, the national concern matter of aeronautics. But this flows from the particular nature of the matter of aeronautics and not from the general nature of the national concern doctrine. The siting of aerodromes falls within the federal power over aeronautics, not because aeronautics has some predetermined breadth flowing from its status as a matter of national concern, but because the nature of the matter is such that it must include "terrestrial installations that facilitate flight": Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 453, at para. 27. Moreover, in its early case law on aeronautics, this Court held that the siting of aerodromes is not merely within the scope of the federal power, but is essential to that power, such that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity applies: Johannesson, at p. 295; COPA, at para. 37. The application of interjurisdictional immunity to any federal power has an obvious impact on provincial jurisdiction. But interjurisdictional immunity does not automatically apply to matters of national concern. It was applied in COPA because there was a precedent that compelled its application, not because the national concern doctrine required that it be applied. Today's restrained approach to interjurisdictional immunity suggests that it would not apply to a newly identified matter of national concern: Canadian Western Bank, at paras. 47 and 77. The example of aeronautics therefore tells us little about the consequences of identifying any other matter of national concern. Sensibly, the national concern test requires a case-specific inquiry into whether the recognition of a particular matter of national concern is reconcilable with the division of powers in the scale of impact analysis.

[125] A closely related question concerns the applicability of the double aspect doctrine to a matter of national concern. The double aspect doctrine "recognizes that the same fact situations can be regulated from different perspectives, one of which may relate to a provincial power and the other to a federal power": Desgagnés Transport, at para. 84. If a fact situation can be regulated from different federal and provincial perspectives and each level of government has a compelling interest in enacting legal rules in relation to that situation, the double aspect doctrine may apply: ibid., at para. 85.

[126] In my view, the double aspect doctrine can apply in cases in which the federal government has jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine, but whether or not it does apply will vary from case to case. This approach fosters coherence in the law, because the double aspect doctrine can apply to every enumerated federal and provincial head of power, including the general branch of the trade and commerce power (e.g., General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 641, at p. 682; 2018 Securities Reference, at para. 114. See also S. Choudhry, "Recasting social Canada: A reconsideration of federal jurisdiction over social policy" (2002), 52 U.T.L.J. 163, at p. 231, fn. 212; S. Elgie, "Kyoto, The Constitution, and Carbon Trading: Waking A Sleeping BNA Bear (Or Two)" (2007), 13 Rev. Const. Stud. 67, at p. 88), and can also apply in respect of POGG matters (e.g., Munro; Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161). Applying the double aspect doctrine to the national concern doctrine is also consistent with the modern approach to federalism, which favours flexibility and a degree of overlapping jurisdiction: Desgagnés Transport, at para. 4; see also N. J. Chalifour, P. Oliver and T. Wormington, "Clarifying the Matter: Modernizing Peace, Order, and Good Government in the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act Appeals" (2020), 40 N.J.C.L. 153, at pp. 204-6; Leach and Adams, at p. 6.

[127] The National Capital Region provides a helpful example of the application of the double aspect doctrine in the national concern context. The finding in Munro that the development, conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region is a matter of national concern has not displaced municipal planning and development, which is based on a provincially delegated authority. Instead, the National Capital Commission and the cities of Ottawa and Gatineau each regulate land use planning, the Commission from the federal perspective of the national nature and character of the national capital and the municipalities from a local perspective: J. Poirier, "Choix, statut et mission d'une capitale fédérale: Bruxelles au regard du droit comparé", in E. Witte et al., eds., Bruxelles et son statut (1999), 61, at pp. 73-74; N. J. Chalifour, "Jurisdictional Wrangling Over Climate Policy in the Canadian Federation: Key Issues in the Provincial Constitutional Challenges to Parliament's Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act" (2019), 50 Ottawa L. Rev. 197, at p. 234; Leach and Adams, at p. 7.

[128] However, as I noted above, the fact that the double aspect doctrine can apply does not mean that it will apply in a given case. It should be applied cautiously so as to avoid eroding the importance attached to provincial autonomy in this Court's jurisprudence. Beetz J. cautioned that it can be applied only "in clear cases where the multiplicity of aspects is real and not merely nominal": Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 749, at p. 766. In some cases, the double aspect doctrine has not been applied where federal jurisdiction fell under the national concern doctrine: e.g., Rogers Communications Inc. v. Châteauguay (City), 2016 SCC 23, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 467, at para. 51.

[129] The double aspect doctrine takes on particular significance where, as in the case at bar, Canada asserts jurisdiction over a matter that involves a minimum national standard imposed by legislation that operates as a backstop. The recognition of a matter of national concern such as this will inevitably result in a double aspect situation. This is in fact the very premise of a federal scheme that imposes minimum national standards: Canada and the provinces are both free to legislate in relation to the same fact situation — in this case by imposing GHG pricing — but the federal law is paramount.

[130] I recognize that it might be argued that Canada and the provinces are exercising their jurisdiction in relation to different matters rather than to different aspects of the same matter, that is, that Canada's authority is limited to minimum national standards of GHG pricing stringency and that this is obviously different than the matters in relation to which provinces might exercise jurisdiction over GHG pricing. This view finds support in some of the language used by this Court, such as the comment in Canadian Western Bank that the double aspect doctrine concerns "the various 'aspects' of the 'matter'": para. 30. However, I do not read Canadian Western Bank that narrowly, given this Court's recent guidance in Desgagnés Transport, in which it stated that the double aspect doctrine concerns "fact situations". Moreover, the fact that Canada can be understood to be empowered to deal only with a different matter than the provinces does not change the resulting jurisdictional reality that where Canada is empowered to impose a minimum national standard, a double aspect situation arises: federal and provincial laws apply concurrently, but the federal law is paramount. From the perspective of provincial autonomy, the corrosive effect is the same. Therefore, courts must recognize that this amounts to an invitation to identify a previously unidentified double aspect, with clear consequences for provincial autonomy.

[131] Beetz J.'s caution about the double aspect doctrine thus applies with particular force where Canada asserts jurisdiction over a matter that involves a minimum national standard. In such a case, even if the national concern test would otherwise be met, Beetz J.'s caution should act as an additional check. The court must be satisfied that Canada in fact has a "compelling interest" in enacting legal rules over the federal aspect of the activity at issue and that the "multiplicity of aspects is real and not merely nominal": Desgagnés Transport, at para. 85; Bell Canada, at p. 766. As I will explain in greater detail below, the court must be satisfied at the scale of impact step that the consequences of finding that the proposed matter is one of national concern are reconcilable with the division of powers.

(3) National Concern Test

[132] I will now turn to the specifics of the test for identifying matters that are inherently of national concern. As I will explain below, the applicable framework involves a three-step process: the threshold question; the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility analysis; and the scale of impact analysis. Before detailing these steps, there are two points worth noting about the framework as a whole.

[133] First, the recognition of a matter of national concern must be based on evidence: see K. Swinton, "Federalism under Fire: The Role of the Supreme Court of Canada" (1992), 55 Law & Contemp. Probs. 121, at p. 134; J. Leclair, "The Elusive Quest for the Quintessential 'National Interest'" (2005), 38 U.B.C. L. Rev. 353, at p. 370. I find the Court's trade and commerce power jurisprudence instructive in this regard. In the 2011 Securities Reference, Canada argued that securities trading had once been primarily a local matter, but that it had since evolved to become a "matter of transcendent national concern" that brought it within the trade and commerce power: para. 114. For this argument to succeed, Canada had to "present the Court with a factual matrix" supporting its assertion of jurisdiction: para. 115. In other words, the onus was on Canada to show that the statute at issue "addresses concerns that transcend local, provincial interests" by producing "not mere conjecture, but evidentiary support": para. 116. Similarly, an onus rests on Canada throughout the national concern analysis to adduce evidence in support of its assertion of jurisdiction.

[134] Second, there is no requirement that a matter be historically new in order to be found to be one of national concern: Crown Zellerbach, at p. 432. Moreover, it is not helpful to link historical newness to a finding of federal jurisdiction. Many new developments may be predominantly local and provincial in character and fall under provincial heads of power. As LeBel and Deschamps JJ. wrote in Assisted Human Reproduction Act in the context of the federal criminal law power, reasoning that novelty alone justifies federal jurisdiction would upset the federal-provincial balance: paras. 255-56. I agree with scholars who have characterized newness as an unhelpful or neutral factor in the national concern analysis: Hogg, at p. 17-18; K. Lysyk, "Constitutional Reform and the Introductory Clause of Section 91: Residual and Emergency Law-Making Authority" (1979), 57 Can. Bar Rev. 531, at pp. 571-72.

[135] Given that historical newness is irrelevant to the analysis, it may be helpful to explain certain references to "newness" in the jurisprudence. In Re: Anti-Inflation Act, Beetz J. spoke of the application of the national concern doctrine only to "new matters" (p. 458), whereas in Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. spoke of its applying to both "new matters" and matters that had "become" matters of national concern (p. 432). Some commentators suggest that Crown Zellerbach therefore represents a departure from Beetz J.'s approach: J. Leclair, "The Supreme Court of Canada's Understanding of Federalism: Efficiency at the Expense of Diversity" (2003), 28 Queen's L.J. 411, at p. 429; E. Brouillet, La Négation de la nation: L'identité culturelle québécoise et le fédéralisme canadien (2005), at p. 295.

[136] In my view, all this confusion stems from what is meant by the word "new". In Re: Anti-Inflation Act, Beetz J. intended "new" to refer to matters that could satisfy the national concern test. This included both "new" matters that did not exist in 1867 and matters that are "new" in the sense that our understanding of those subject matters has, in some way, shifted so as to bring out their inherently national character: see also Hogg, at pp. 17-17 to 17-18. The critical element of this analysis is the requirement that matters of national concern be inherently national in character, not that they be historically new. The use of the word "become" in Crown Zellerbach served to articulate that the newness of the matter can also refer to our belated understanding of a matter's true or inherent nature: see pp. 427-28 and 430-31. This is what Beetz J. meant when he explained that these matters are ones "which do not fall within any of the enumerated heads of s. 92 and which, by nature, are of national concern": Re: Anti-Inflation Act, at p. 457 (emphasis added). There is no inconsistency between Re: Anti-Inflation Act and Crown Zellerbach on this point. To be clear, the national concern doctrine does not allow Parliament to legislate in relation to matters that come within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provinces. The purpose of the analysis is strictly to determine whether a matter is by nature one of national concern.

[137] It follows that the majority of the Court of Appeal of Alberta erred in adding, as a threshold restriction, that matters that originally fell under provincial heads of power other than s. 92(16) of the Constitution are incapable of acquiring national dimensions: para. 185. Instead, the possibility that an existing matter may be found to be one of national concern provides a principled basis for courts to be responsive to new evidence in their application of the constitutional text. This is as it should be: "Constitutional texts must be interpreted in a broad and purposive manner. Constitutional texts must also be interpreted in a manner that is sensitive to evolving circumstances because they 'must continually adapt to cover new realities'": Comeau, at para. 52 (citations omitted).

[138] Let us consider atomic energy, the matter of national concern that this Court identified in Ontario Hydro. This matter encompasses the mining of raw materials such as uranium — materials that existed and were mined prior to the discovery of atomic energy. Before World War II, the dominant characteristic of uranium mining would likely have been the management of natural resources within the province, which would have come within various enumerated provincial classes of subjects: ss. 92(5), 92(9), 92(10) and 92(13) (s. 92A, while also relevant, did not come into being until the Constitution was amended in 1982). But that did not prevent atomic energy, including the production of its raw materials, from being found to be a matter which is, by nature, of national concern because of its safety and security risks, particularly the risk of catastrophic interprovincial harm: see Pronto; Denison; Ontario Hydro. In other words, the discovery of atomic energy brought out the inherently national character of uranium mining. The fact that uranium mining would have fallen under provincial heads of power other than s. 92(16) prior to this discovery is irrelevant to the analysis and did not preclude the finding that atomic energy is a matter of national concern. The "historical newness" of atomic energy is equally irrelevant; the dispositive feature of the cases in question was instead that the discovery of atomic energy had led to evidence grounding a new understanding of the inherent nature of the matter as one of national concern.

[139] It also follows that I do not agree with my colleague Rowe J.'s articulation of the national concern test, which consists of two requirements as follows: first, the matter must not come within the enumerated powers; and second, the matter "must be such that it cannot be shared between both orders of government and that it must be entrusted to Parliament, exclusively, to avoid a jurisdictional vacuum" (Rowe J.'s reasons, at para. 545). With great respect, I see a jurisprudential barrier to my colleague's approach, which I find myself unable to resolve. I am not persuaded that the matters of national concern this Court has recognized, such as the development of the National Capital Region (Munro; see also: Re: Anti-Inflation Act, at p. 457) or the control of marine pollution by dumping (Crown Zellerbach), would necessarily meet his test if it were applied in the manner he proposes. Nor, in my view, can Munro or Crown Zellerbach be read as an application of my colleague's methodology. In those cases, this Court did not proceed by way of a two-step search for a jurisdictional vacuum; rather, it applied the national concern test to identify matters of inherent national concern.

[140] Thus, Munro and Crown Zellerbach can be explained in light of a more conventional understanding of the national concern doctrine that was articulated in Crown Zellerbach itself and which I will explain in greater detail below. Marine pollution is predominantly extraprovincial and international in character, while the development of the national capital is of concern to Canada as a whole. The matters proposed in those cases were specific and identifiable and had ascertainable and reasonable limits. The requirement of provincial inability, understood in the sense of serious extraprovincial harm, was met: ". . . the failure of either Quebec or Ontario to cooperate in the development of the national capital region would have denied to all Canadians the symbolic value of a suitable national capital", and ". . . the failure of one province to protect its waters would probably lead to the pollution of the waters of other provinces as well as the (federal) territorial sea and high sea" (Hogg, at p. 17-14).

Lastly, the recognition of these matters was compatible with the division of powers. The result of this analysis leads to the conclusion that these matters, by their nature, transcend the provinces. They were thus shown to fall outside of s. 92 and were appropriate matters for recognition under the national concern doctrine. I therefore respectfully disagree with my colleague's articulation of the national concern test.

[141] To sum up, the purpose of the national concern analysis is to identify matters of inherent national concern — matters which, by their nature, transcend the provinces. "Historical newness" is irrelevant to this analysis, and there is no threshold question whether the matter can be characterized as being new. Instead, the analysis has three steps: the threshold question, which relates not to newness but to whether the matter is of sufficient concern to Canada as whole; the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility analysis; and the scale of impact analysis. The onus is on Canada to adduce evidence to satisfy the court that a matter of inherent national concern is made out. I will now discuss each of these three steps in detail.

(a) Threshold Question

[142] Courts must approach a finding that the federal government has jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine with great caution. The analysis therefore begins by asking, as a threshold question, whether the matter is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole to warrant consideration under the doctrine. This invites a common-sense inquiry into the national importance of the proposed matter.

[143] This Court's analysis in key national concern decisions has begun with an assessment of whether the matter at issue is one "of concern to Canada as a whole": Crown Zellerbach, at p. 436. In Munro, Cartwright J. began with an observation that the matter was "the concern of Canada as a whole": p. 671. The reasons of the majorities of the Saskatchewan and Ontario courts of appeal in the instant case reflect this approach: Richards C.J.S. began his analysis on this subject with the "broad starting point" of "whether this matter is something of genuine national importance" (para. 146); Strathy C.J.O. first asked whether "the matter is both 'national' and a 'concern'" before proceeding to the analysis of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility (para. 106). Although this inquiry was not identified as a distinct step of the analysis in Crown Zellerbach, it serves an important purpose. The threshold question ensures that the national concern doctrine cannot be invoked too lightly and provides essential context for the analysis that follows. Requiring that this question be asked as the first step of the test is an appropriate, incremental development in the law to ensure that federal power under the national concern doctrine is properly constrained.

[144] At the threshold step, Canada must adduce evidence to satisfy the court that the matter is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole to warrant consideration in accordance with the national concern doctrine. If Canada discharges this burden, the analysis proceeds. This approach does not open the door to the recognition of federal jurisdiction simply on the basis that a legislative field is "important"; it operates to limit the application of the national concern doctrine.

(b) Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[145] The second step of the analysis was explained by Le Dain J. as follows in Crown Zellerbach: the matter "must have a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern" (p. 432). Le Dain J. added that this inquiry includes the provincial inability test: "In determining whether a matter has attained the required degree of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern it is relevant to consider what would be the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspects of the matter" (p. 432).

[146] The phrase "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" requires some explanation. On its own, this phrase does not amount to a readily applicable legal test. Rather, in my view, two principles underpin the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility requirement and must be satisfied in order to determine that a matter is one of national concern. In Le Dain J.'s formulation, these characteristics are essential because they are features that clearly distinguish a matter of national concern from matters of provincial concern. This is the first principle underpinning the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility inquiry: to prevent federal overreach, jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine should be found to exist only over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. The recognition of "provincial inability" as a marker of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility points to a second principle animating the inquiry: federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter. This means that the matter at issue is of a nature that the provinces cannot address either jointly or severally, because the failure of one or more provinces to cooperate would prevent the other provinces from successfully addressing it, and that a province's failure to deal with the matter within its own borders would have grave extraprovincial consequences.

[147] Regarding the first principle, the proposed federal matter must be specific and readily identifiable. As Beetz J. made clear in Re: Anti-Inflation Act, a matter that is "lacking in specificity" or is boundless cannot pass muster as a matter of national concern: p. 458. The specific and identifiable matter must also be qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. It is clearly not enough for a matter to be quantitatively different from matters of provincial concern — the mere growth or extent of a problem across Canada is insufficient to justify federal jurisdiction: Insurance Reference SCC; see also Le Dain, at pp. 277-78; Wetmore, at p. 296. The case law points to several factors that properly inform this analysis.

[148] One key consideration for determining whether the matter is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern is whether it is predominantly extraprovincial and international in character, having regard both to its inherent nature and to its effects. The case law demonstrates that this inquiry is central to the national concern doctrine. The finding that marine pollution is extraprovincial and international in its character and implications was critical to the recognition of a matter of national concern in Crown Zellerbach: p. 436; see also Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 3, at p. 64. In Ontario Hydro, the judges were unanimous in grounding the federal government's jurisdiction over atomic energy based on the POGG power in the potential for catastrophic interprovincial and international harm. By contrast, in Hydro-Québec, the judges who considered the issue concluded that the fact that the statute regulated substances whose effects were entirely intraprovincial and localized was a barrier to its recognition as a matter of national concern. However, they accepted that a matter dealing with toxic substances that originate in a particular province may nonetheless be predominantly extraprovincial and international in character if the substances in question have serious effects that can cross provincial boundaries: paras. 68, 74 and 76.

[149] International agreements may in some cases indicate that a matter is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. Consideration of international agreements figured into the Court's national concern analysis in Johannesson and in Crown Zellerbach: see also G. van Ert, "POGG and Treaties: The Role of International Agreements in National Concern Analysis" (2020), 43 Dalhousie L.J. 901, at p. 920. Significantly, the existence of treaty obligations is not determinative of federal jurisdiction: there is no freestanding federal treaty implementation power and Parliament's jurisdiction to implement treaties signed by the federal government depends on the ordinary division of powers: Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, [1937] A.C. 326 (P.C.). Treaty obligations and international agreements can be relevant to the national concern analysis, however. Depending on their content, they may help to show that a matter has an extraprovincial and international character, thereby supporting a finding that it is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern.

[150] Furthermore, to be qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern, the matter must not be an aggregate of provincial matters: Re: Anti-Inflation Act, at p. 458. The federal legislative role must be distinct from and not duplicative of that of the provinces. Once again, the Court's trade and commerce jurisprudence is helpful in this regard. The Court's opinions with respect to securities regulation show that a regulatory field with an international or extraprovincial dimension can also have local features. While there are aspects of securities regulation that are national in character and have genuine national goals, much of this sphere is primarily focused on local concerns related to investor protection and market fairness: 2011 Securities Reference, at paras. 115 and 124-28; 2018 Securities Reference, at paras. 105-6. As the 2011 Securities Reference and the 2018 Securities Reference confirm, federal legislation will not be qualitatively distinct if it overshoots regulation of a national aspect of the field and instead duplicates provincial regulation or regulates issues that are primarily of local concern.

[151] Thus, the first principle underpinning the requirement of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility is that federal jurisdiction may only be recognized over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. At this stage, the court should inquire into whether the matter is predominantly extraprovincial and international in its nature or its effects, into the content of any international agreements in relation to the matter, and into whether the matter involves a federal legislative role that is distinct from and not duplicative of that of the provinces.

[152] I will now turn to the second principle, that is, that federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter. This Court's jurisprudence in relation to the general branch of the trade and commerce power is helpful on this point, too. The starting point for this analysis should be the provincial inability test expressed through the fourth and fifth indicia discussed in General Motors, at p. 662: (1) the legislation should be of a nature that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of enacting; and (2) the failure to include one or more provinces or localities in a legislative scheme would jeopardize the successful operation of the scheme in other parts of the country. For provincial inability to be established for the purposes of the national concern doctrine, both of these factors are required.

[153] But there is a third factor that is required in the context of the national concern doctrine in order to establish provincial inability: a province's failure to deal with the matter must have grave extraprovincial consequences. Professor Hogg explains that evaluating extraprovincial harm helps to determine whether a national law "is not merely desirable, but essential, in the sense that the problem 'is beyond the power of the provinces to deal with it'": p. 17-14, quoting D. Gibson, "Measuring 'National Dimensions'" (1976), 7 Man. L.J. 15, at p. 33. This connects the provincial inability test to the overall purpose of the national concern test, which is to identify matters of inherent national concern that transcend the provinces.

[154] The need for "grave consequences for the residents of other provinces" was adopted by this Court in Labatt Breweries (at p. 945) and can be seen woven throughout its national concern jurisprudence. In Local Prohibition Reference, the Privy Council suggested arms trafficking as an example of a potential matter of national concern, which is consistent with this requirement of grave extraprovincial consequences flowing from provincial inaction in relation to the matter: Local Prohibition Reference, at p. 362. And in Johannesson, Locke J. of this Court had emphasized that one province's failure to provide space for aerodromes could have the "intolerable" extraprovincial consequence of isolating northern regions of Canada: pp. 326-27. Although the extraprovincial harm at issue in Munro was of a different nature, it was nonetheless meaningful, as it would have resulted in the denial of a suitable national capital to all Canadians. In Ontario Hydro, La Forest J. reasoned that one province's failure to effectively regulate atomic energy "could invite disaster", endangering "the safety of people hundreds of miles from a nuclear facility": p. 379. In contrast, the majority in Schneider reasoned that one province's failure to provide treatment facilities for heroin users "will not endanger the interests of another province": p. 131. This conception of provincial inability was reaffirmed in Crown Zellerbach.

[155] The requirement of grave extraprovincial consequences sets a high bar for a finding of provincial inability for the purposes of the national concern doctrine. This requirement can be satisfied by actual harm or by a serious risk of harm being sustained in the future. It may include serious harm to human life and health or to the environment, though it is not necessarily limited to such consequences. Mere inefficiency or additional financial costs stemming from divided or overlapping jurisdiction is clearly insufficient: Wetmore, at p. 296. Moreover, as I noted above, the onus is on Canada to establish that provincial inability is made out, and evidence is required, "for the questions of provincial inability and the harm that flows therefrom are both factual in part": Swinton, at p. 134; see also Leclair (2005), at p. 370.

[156] In Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. characterized provincial inability as an indicium of singleness and indivisibility. But in much of this Court's national concern jurisprudence, it has been treated as a strict requirement rather than as a mere optional indicium. Provincial inability has been used on this basis to reject national concern arguments and limit the doctrine's application: Labatt Breweries; Schneider; Wetmore. In my view, provincial inability functions as a strong constraint on federal power and should be seen as a necessary but not sufficient requirement for the purposes of the national concern doctrine. Treating provincial inability as merely an optional indicium "rob[s] it of its initial, necessity-based, narrowing effect and opens doors for national concern": G. Baier, "Tempering Peace, Order and Good Government: Provincial Inability and Canadian Federalism" (1998), 9 N.J.C.L. 277, at p. 291; see also Leclair (2005), at p. 360.

[157] In conclusion, there are two principles that apply in relation to singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility: first, federal jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine should be found to exist only over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern; and second, federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter. Provincial inability will be established only if the matter is of a nature that the provinces cannot address either jointly or severally, because the failure of one or more provinces to cooperate would prevent the other provinces from successfully addressing it, and if a province's failure to deal with the matter within its own borders would have grave extraprovincial consequences.

[158] A few further words about indivisibility are in order, because my colleagues Brown and Rowe JJ. say that it has been written out of the national concern test in these reasons. The requirement of indivisibility is given effect through both of the principles I have discussed. The first of these principles requires a specific and identifiable matter which is not a boundless aggregate. The second principle requires provincial inability, as it is clearly defined in Crown Zellerbach and, indeed, throughout the Court's national concern jurisprudence, which is a marker of indivisibility.

[159] I respectfully disagree with my colleagues' understanding of indivisibility, according to which "interrelatedness" is a criterion for establishing indivisibility (Rowe J.'s reasons, at paras. 545 and 548, citing Crown Zellerbach, at p. 434). Le Dain J. referred to interrelatedness only once, in his explanation of why the provincial inability test helps the court determine whether a matter has the "character of singleness or indivisibility": p. 434. Thus, if a province's approach to the intraprovincial aspects of a matter could cause grave extraprovincial harm — that is, if the provincial inability test is met — the matter can be said to have an interrelatedness, which supports a finding of indivisibility. One difficulty with my colleagues' approach, in my view, is that they treat interrelatedness (a situation in which the provincial inability test is met) as sufficient to establish indivisibility, while at the same time maintaining that meeting the provincial inability test cannot establish indivisibility (Rowe J.'s reasons, at paras. 545 and 560; see also Brown J.'s reasons, at para. 383). Respectfully, I would favour giving effect to the requirement of indivisibility on the basis of the two principles I have set out, which is consistent both with Le Dain J.'s treatment of interrelatedness and with the national concern jurisprudence as a whole, and presents no such analytical difficulties.

(c) Scale of Impact

[160] At the final step of the national concern test, Canada must show that the proposed matter has "a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution": Crown Zellerbach, at p. 432; Hydro-Québec, at para. 66, per Lamer C.J. and Iacobucci J. (dissenting, but not on this point). Determining whether the matter's scale of impact is reconcilable with the division of powers requires the Court to balance competing interests. As Professor Elgie writes, it does not make sense to treat the acceptable impact on provincial authority as a static threshold; instead, the effect on provincial jurisdiction should be assessed in the context of the matter at issue: pp. 85-86.

[161] The purpose of the scale of impact analysis is to prevent federal overreach: S. Choudhry, Constitutional Law and the Politics of Carbon Pricing in Canada (2019), IRPP Study 74, at p. 15; 2011 Securities Reference, at para. 61. In other words, it is designed to protect against unjustified intrusions on provincial autonomy. In accordance with this purpose, at this stage of the analysis, the intrusion upon provincial autonomy that would result from empowering Parliament to act is balanced against the extent of the impact on the interests that would be affected if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level. Identifying a new matter of national concern will be justified only if the latter outweighs the former.

(d) Summary of the Framework

[162] In summary, finding that a matter is one of national concern involves a three-step analysis.

[163] First, Canada must establish that the matter is of sufficient concern to the country as a whole to warrant consideration as a possible matter of national concern. This question arises in every case, regardless of whether the matter can be characterized as historically new. If Canada discharges its burden at the step of this threshold inquiry, the analysis will proceed.

[164] Second, the court must undertake the analysis explained in Crown Zellerbach through the language of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility". More important than this terminology, however, are the principles underpinning the inquiry. The first of these principles is that, to prevent federal overreach, jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine should be found to exist only over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. The second principle to be considered at this stage of the inquiry is that federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter.

[165] If these two principles are satisfied, the court will proceed to the third and final step and determine whether the scale of impact of the proposed matter of national concern is reconcilable with the division of powers.

[166] The onus is on Canada throughout this analysis, and evidence is required. Where a proposed federal matter satisfies the requirements of all three steps of the framework, there is a principled basis to conclude that the matter is one that, by its nature, transcends the provinces and should be recognized as a matter of national concern.

(4) Application to the GGPPA

(a) Threshold Question

[167] Canada has adduced evidence that clearly shows that establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole that it warrants consideration in accordance with the national concern doctrine. To begin, this matter's importance to Canada as a whole must be understood in light of the seriousness of the underlying problem. All parties to this proceeding agree that climate change is an existential challenge. It is a threat of the highest order to the country, and indeed to the world. This context, on its own, provides some assurance that in the case at bar, Canada is not seeking to invoke the national concern doctrine too lightly. The undisputed existence of a threat to the future of humanity cannot be ignored.

[168] That being said, the matter at issue here is not the regulation of GHG emissions generally, and Canada is not seeking to have all potential forms of GHG regulation classified as matters of national concern. Rather, the specific question before the Court is whether establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is a matter of national concern.

[169] The history of efforts to address climate change in Canada reflects the critical role of carbon pricing strategies in policies to reduce GHG emissions. As discussed above, Canada and all the provinces committed, in the Vancouver Declaration, to including carbon pricing in the country's efforts to reduce GHG emissions. The subsequently established Working Group on Carbon Pricing Mechanisms recognized in its final report that many experts regard carbon pricing as a necessary tool for efficiently reducing GHG emissions: p. 5. The Working Group's final report had the support of all provinces and of Canada at the time it was published, and its affirmation of the importance of carbon pricing is supported by the record in this case. Similarly, the Specific Mitigation Opportunities Working Group, one of the other three working groups established under the Vancouver Declaration, listed, in its final report, "broad, economy-wide carbon pricing" as one of "three essential elements of a comprehensive approach to mitigating GHG emissions": Specific Mitigation Opportunities Working Group, Final Report, 2016 (online), at p. 17.

[170] Furthermore, there is a broad consensus among expert international bodies such as the World Bank, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development and the International Monetary Fund that carbon pricing is a critical measure for the reduction of GHG emissions. For example, the High-Level Commission on Carbon Prices' Report of the High-Level Commission on Carbon Prices, May 29, 2017 (online), states: "A well-designed carbon price is an indispensable part of a strategy for reducing emissions in an efficient way" (p. 1). And an International Monetary Fund Staff Discussion Note entitled After Paris: Fiscal, Macroeconomic, and Financial Implications of Climate Change states: "The central problem is that no single firm or household has a significant effect on climate, yet collectively there is a huge effect — so pricing is necessary to force the factoring of climate effects into individual-level decisions" (M. Farid, et al., After Paris: Fiscal, Macroeconomic, and Financial Implications of Climate Change, January 11, 2016 (online), at p. 6). In my view, the evidence reflects a consensus, both in Canada and internationally, that carbon pricing is integral to reducing GHG emissions.

[171] In summary, the evidence clearly shows that establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is of concern to Canada as a whole. This matter is critical to our response to an existential threat to human life in Canada and around the world. As a result, it readily passes the threshold test and warrants consideration as a possible matter of national concern.

(b) Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[172] As I explained above, the first principle to be considered in the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility inquiry is that federal jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine should be found to exist only over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. Recognizing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions as a matter of national concern satisfies this requirement.

[173] Given that the matter at issue is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHGs, it is important to begin by observing that these gases are a specific and precisely identifiable type of pollutant. The harmful effects of GHGs are known, and the fuel and excess emissions charges are based on the global warming potential of the gases (see Sch. 3 of the GGPPA). Moreover, GHG emissions are predominantly extraprovincial and international in their character and implications. This flows from their nature as a diffuse atmospheric pollutant and from their effect in causing global climate change. GHG emissions are precisely the type of diffuse and persistent substances with serious deleterious extraprovincial effects that the dissent in Hydro-Québec suggested might appropriately be regulated on the basis of the national concern doctrine: para. 76. In Interprovincial Co-operatives, a case concerning one province's emission of pollutants into an interprovincial river, Pigeon J. observed that the Court was "faced with a pollution problem that is not really local in scope but truly interprovincial": p. 514. GHG emissions represent a pollution problem that is not merely interprovincial, but global, in scope.

[174] The international response to GHG emissions over the past three decades confirms this. As early as 1992, the preamble to the UNFCCC recognized climate change as "a common concern of humankind", and also acknowledged its "global nature". The acknowledgment that climate change is a common concern of humankind was reiterated in the Paris Agreement. As well, the need for an effective international response to climate change was recognized in both agreements. Specifically, the Paris Agreement identifies imperatives of holding the increase in the global average temperature to well below 2.0°C above pre-industrial levels and achieving net zero emissions in the second half of the 21st century: arts. 2(1)(a) and 4(1). States parties are therefore required to make nationally determined contributions that are increasingly ambitious and to implement domestic mitigation measures for the purpose of ensuring that those contributions are achieved: arts. 4(2) and (3). Both the UNFCCC and the Paris Agreement help illustrate the predominantly extraprovincial and international nature of GHG emissions and support the conclusion that the matter at issue is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern.

[175] Not only is the type of pollutant to which the matter applies identifiable and qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern, but the regulatory mechanism of GHG pricing is a specific, and limited, one. It operates in a particular way, seeking to change behaviour by internalizing the cost of climate change impacts, incorporating them into the price of fuel and the cost of industrial activity. The Vancouver Declaration and the Working Group on Carbon Pricing Mechanisms that it established reflect the status of carbon pricing as a distinct form of regulation. GHG pricing does not amount to the regulation of GHG emissions generally. It is also different in kind from regulatory mechanisms that do not involve pricing, such as sector-specific initiatives concerning electricity, buildings, transportation, industry, forestry, agriculture and waste.

[176] Minimum national standards of GHG price stringency, which are implemented in this case by means of the backstop architecture of the GGPPA, relate to a federal role in carbon pricing that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. The 2011 Securities Reference and 2018 Securities Reference illustrate this point. The proposed legislation at issue in the 2011 Securities Reference did not have a distinctly national focus; it ran afoul of the division of powers by replicating existing provincial schemes: para. 116. However, the Court held that "[l]egislation aimed at imposing minimum standards applicable throughout the country and preserving the stability and integrity of Canada's financial markets might well relate to trade as a whole" and could be a matter of national importance to which the federal general trade and commerce power applies: para. 114. This was the approach the federal government took in the proposed legislation at issue in the 2018 Securities Reference. The focus of that legislation was on controlling systemic risks that represented a threat to the stability of the country's financial system as a whole. Its effect was "to address any risk that 'slips through the cracks' and poses a threat to the Canadian economy": para. 92. Rather than displacing provincial securities legislation by ensuring the day-to-day regulation of securities trading, it sought to complement provincial legislation by addressing national economic objectives: para. 96.

[177] The backstop approach taken in the GGPPA is analogous to the approach taken in the proposed legislation that was at issue in the 2018 Securities Reference. The GGPPA establishes minimum national standards of price stringency to reduce GHG emissions in order to ensure that Canada's nationally determined contribution under the Paris Agreement is achieved. It does so on a distinctly national basis, one that neither represents an aggregate of provincial matters nor duplicates provincial GHG pricing systems.

[178] Moreover, the Governor in Council's power to make a regulation that applies the GGPPA's pricing system to a province may be exercised only if it is first determined that the province's pricing mechanisms are insufficiently stringent: ss. 166 and 189. This is similar to the situation in the 2018 Securities Reference, in which the legislation required the federal regulator to consider the adequacy of existing provincial regulations before designating a benchmark or prescribing a product or practice: para. 92. If each province designed its own pricing system and all the provincial systems met the federal pricing standards, the GGPPA would achieve its purpose without operating to directly price GHG emissions anywhere in the country. In other words, the GGPPA's pricing system comes into play only to address the risk of increased GHG emissions that would otherwise "slip through the cracks" as a result of one province's failure to implement a sufficiently stringent pricing mechanism.

[179] The GGPPA is tightly focused on this distinctly federal role and does not descend into the detailed regulation of all aspects of GHG pricing. While it is true that the administrative pricing mechanism set out in the GGPPA is detailed, it can apply only to provinces that fail to meet the federal stringency standard. Thus, the GGPPA's fundamental role is a distinctly federal one: evaluating provincial pricing mechanisms against an outcome-based legal standard in order to address national risks posed by insufficient carbon pricing stringency in any part of the country. The GGPPA does not prescribe any rules for provincial pricing mechanisms as long as they meet the federally designated standard. Even if the GGPPA were to apply so as to supplement an insufficiently stringent provincial pricing scheme, the prior existence of similar provincial legislation is not, as this Court confirmed in the 2018 Securities Reference, a constitutional bar to federal legislation that pursues a qualitatively different national concern: para. 114; see also General Motors, at pp. 680-82.

[180] Unlike the proposed legislation that was at issue in the 2011 Securities Reference, the GGPPA does not depend on provinces "opt[ing] in": para. 31. The GGPPA imposes minimum standards of price stringency on all provinces at all times. If a province is not listed, it is because the Governor in Council has determined that the province's system meets the federally determined standard, not because the province has opted out. Thus, like the 2018 Securities Reference, the instant case involves the distinctly federal role of setting national targets and stepping in to make up for an absence of provincial legislation or to supplement insufficient provincial legislation. The GGPPA deals with the specific regulatory mechanism of GHG pricing in a way that is qualitatively different than how the provinces do so.

[181] The second principle to be considered at this stage of the inquiry is that federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter. I find that provincial inability is established in this case.

[182] First, the provinces, acting alone or together, are constitutionally incapable of establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. The situation here is much like the one in the 2018 Securities Reference, in which the provinces would be able to enact legislation to address national goals relating to systemic risk but could not do so on a sustained basis, because any province could choose to withdraw at any time: para. 113; see also 2011 Securities Reference, at paras. 119-21. In the instant case, while the provinces could choose to cooperatively establish a uniform carbon pricing scheme, doing so would not assure a sustained approach to minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions: the provinces and territories are constitutionally incapable of establishing a binding outcome-based minimum legal standard — a national GHG pricing floor — that applies in all provinces and territories at all times.

[183] Second, a failure to include one province in the scheme would jeopardize its success in the rest of Canada. It is true that a cooperative scheme might continue to exist if one province withdrew from it, but the issue here is whether it would be successful. The withdrawal of one province from the scheme would clearly threaten its success for two reasons: emissions reductions that are limited to a few provinces would fail to address climate change if they were offset by increased emissions in other Canadian jurisdictions; and any province's failure to implement a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing mechanism could undermine the efficacy of GHG pricing everywhere in Canada because of the risk of carbon leakage.

[184] The evidence in the instant case shows that even significant emissions reductions in some provinces have failed to further the goals of any cooperative scheme, because they were offset by increased emissions in other provinces. Between 2005 and 2016, Canada's total GHG emissions declined by only 3.8 percent: Environment and Climate Change, National Inventory Report 1990-2016: Greenhouse Gas Sources and Sinks in Canada — Executive Summary, 2018 (online), at p. 13. In that period, emissions fell by 22 percent in Ontario, 11 percent in Quebec and 5.1

percent in British Columbia, three of the five provinces with the highest levels of emissions in Canada, as well as by over 10 percent in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Yukon. But these decreases were largely offset by increases of 14 percent in Alberta and 10.7 percent in Saskatchewan, the other two provinces among the five with the highest levels of GHG emissions: p. 13. As a result, Canada failed to honour its commitment under the Kyoto Protocol before withdrawing from that agreement in 2011, and it is not currently on track to honour its Copenhagen Accord commitment.

[185] More recently, even though all the provinces made a commitment in the Vancouver Declaration in March 2016 to work collectively to significantly reduce GHG emissions, Saskatchewan had withdrawn by the time of the Pan-Canadian Framework seven months later, and Ontario and Alberta also subsequently withdrew. Together, these three provinces accounted for 71 percent of Canada's total GHG emissions in 2016: see National Inventory Report, at p. 13; Environment Canada, A Climate Change Plan for the Purposes of the Kyoto Protocol Implementation Act — 2007, 2007 (online), at p. 17. It is true that their withdrawal from the Pan-Canadian Framework does not mean that Saskatchewan, Ontario and Alberta will necessarily fail to reduce their GHG emissions. But when provinces that are collectively responsible for more than two thirds of Canada's total GHG emissions opt out of a cooperative scheme, this illustrates the stark limitations of a non-binding cooperative approach. The participating provinces can only reduce their own emissions — less than one third of Canada's total — and are vulnerable to the consequences of the lion's share of the emissions being generated by the non-participating provinces.

[186] What is more, any province's refusal to implement a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing mechanism could undermine GHG pricing everywhere in Canada because of the risk of carbon leakage. Carbon leakage is a phenomenon by which businesses in sectors with high levels of carbon emissions relocate to jurisdictions with less stringent carbon pricing policies: Report of the High-Level Commission on Carbon Prices, at p. 23. To be clear, the concern here is not with the economic extraprovincial consequences of carbon leakage. Jurisdictions routinely compete for business, and mere economic effects are not among the grave consequences that would support a finding of provincial inability in the national concern context. Rather, I am referring to the environmental consequences, and the resulting harm to humans, of carbon leakage — the risk that any emissions reductions achieved by pricing in one province would be offset by an increase in emissions in another province as a result of the relocation of businesses. Thus, provincial cooperation may not result in national emissions reductions, as businesses could simply relocate to non-cooperating provinces, leaving Canada's net emissions unchanged and people across Canada vulnerable to the consequences of those emissions.

[187] Third, a province's failure to act or refusal to cooperate would in this case have grave consequences for extraprovincial interests. It is uncontroversial that GHG emissions cause climate change. It is also an uncontested fact that the effects of climate change do not have a direct connection to the source of GHG emissions; every province's GHG emissions contribute to climate change, the consequences of which will be borne extraprovincially, across Canada and around the world. And it is well-established that climate change is causing significant environmental, economic and human harm nationally and internationally, with especially high impacts in the Canadian Arctic, in coastal regions and on Indigenous peoples. This includes increases in average temperatures and in the frequency and severity of heat waves, extreme weather events like floods and forest fires, significant reductions in sea ice and sea level rises, the spread of life-threatening diseases like Lyme disease and West Nile virus, and threats to the ability of Indigenous communities to sustain themselves and maintain their traditional ways of life.

[188] Furthermore, I reject the notion that because climate change is "an inherently global problem", each individual province's GHG emissions cause no "measurable harm" or do not have "tangible impacts on other provinces": Alta. C.A. reasons, at para. 324; I.F., Attorney General of Alberta, at para. 85 (emphasis in original). Each province's emissions are clearly measurable and contribute to climate change. The underlying logic of this argument would apply equally to all individual sources of emissions everywhere, so it must fail.

[189] I note that similar arguments have been rejected by courts around the world. In Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency, 549 U.S. 497 (2007), for instance, the majority of the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the federal government's argument that projected increases in other countries' emissions meant that there was no realistic prospect that domestic reductions in GHG emissions in the U.S. would mitigate global climate change. The Supreme Court reasoned that "[a] reduction in domestic emissions would slow the pace of global emissions increases, no matter what happens elsewhere": p. 526. Similarly, in The State of the Netherlands (Ministry of Economic Affairs and Climate Policy) v. Stichting Urgenda, ECLI:NL:HR:2019:2007, the Supreme Court of the Netherlands upheld findings of The Hague District Court and The Hague Court of Appeal that "[e]very emission of greenhouse gases leads to an increase in the concentration of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere" and thus contributes to the global harms of climate change: para. 4.6. The Hague District Court's finding that "any anthropogenic greenhouse gas emission, no matter how minor, contributes to . . . hazardous climate change" was thus confirmed on appeal: Stichting Urgenda v. The State of the Netherlands (Ministry of Infrastructure and the Environment), ECLI:NL:RBDHA:2015:7196, at para. 4.79. In Gloucester Resources Limited v. Minister for Planning, [2019] N.S.W.L.E.C. 7, a New South Wales court rejected an argument of a coal mining project's proponent that the project's GHG emissions would not make a meaningful contribution to climate change. The court noted that many courts have recognized that "climate change is caused by cumulative emissions from a myriad of individual sources, each proportionally small relative to the global total of GHG emissions, and will be solved by abatement of the GHG emissions from these myriad of individual sources": para. 516 (AustLII).

[190] While each province's emissions do contribute to climate change, there is no denying that climate change is an "inherently global problem" that neither Canada nor any one province acting alone can wholly address. This weighs in favour of a finding of provincial inability. As a global problem, climate change can realistically be addressed only through international efforts. Any province's failure to act threatens Canada's ability to meet its international obligations, which in turn hinders Canada's ability to push for international action to reduce GHG emissions. Therefore, a provincial failure to act directly threatens Canada as a whole. This is not to say that Parliament has jurisdiction to implement Canada's treaty obligations — it does not — but simply that the inherently global nature of GHG emissions and the problem of climate change supports a finding of provincial inability in this case.

[191] I am accordingly unpersuaded by Huscroft J.A.'s observation in his dissenting reasons in the Court of Appeal for Ontario that "[t]here are many ways to address climate change and the provinces have ample authority to pursue them, whether alone or in partnership with other provinces": para. 230. The underlying premise of this position is that the provinces will implement sufficient controls on their GHG emissions, using GHG pricing or some other mechanism. But in the absence of a federal law binding the provinces, there is nothing whatsoever to protect individual provinces or the country as a whole from the consequences of one province's decision, in exercising its authority, to take insufficient action to control GHGs, or to take no steps at all. In short, federal action is indispensable, and GHG pricing in particular is an integral aspect of any scheme to reduce GHG emissions.

[192] In my view, the principles underpinning the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility inquiry clearly support a finding that the federal government has jurisdiction over the matter of establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. The matter is specific, identifiable and qualitatively different from any provincial matters. As well, federal jurisdiction is necessitated by the provinces' inability to address the matter as a whole through cooperation, which exposes each province to grave harm that it is unable to prevent.

[193] I therefore respectfully disagree with my colleague Brown. J.'s view that the requirement of indivisibility is not met in this case. My colleague places great weight on "the difficulty of knowing the source and physical location" of pollution in Crown Zellerbach, asserting that because "no question arises as to physical location" in the case at bar, indivisibility cannot be made out: paras. 380-81. Even if it is assumed that this represents a valid distinction between Crown Zellerbach and the case at bar, Le Dain J. clearly confined this aspect of his reasoning to "the matter of marine pollution by the dumping of substances": p. 437. He did not purport to lay down the only way to determine whether indivisibility is made out. This makes sense. A matter can be of inherent national concern even if it does not relate to something that is "difficult" to locate. There is no "difficulty" in determining the location of the National Capital Region, but the matter in Munro meets the requirement of indivisibility: pp. 671-72; Re: Anti-Inflation Act, at pp. 457-58; see also Rowe J.'s reasons, at para. 548. Likewise, there is no "difficulty" in identifying the sites of atomic energy generation, but atomic energy, too, is a matter of inherent national concern: Ontario

Hydro; Pronto; Denison. In the instant case, the indivisibility of the matter — establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency — is made out, as my application of the two principles underpinning the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility inquiry shows. This is so regardless of the "difficulty" of locating the source or physical location of GHG emissions. "GHG emissions" are not the matter in this case, and the "difficulty" of identifying the source and location of what a matter relates to is not the test for indivisibility.

[194] The analogy between this case and Crown Zellerbach is clear. Le Dain J. emphasized the international character of marine pollution; GHG emissions represent a truly global pollution problem that demands a coordinated international response. Le Dain J. focused on the unique scientific characteristics of marine pollution that distinguish it from fresh water pollution; GHG emissions, like marine pollution, are a precisely identifiable form of pollution that can readily be scientifically distinguished from other atmospheric pollutants.

[195] But the case for finding that the matter is of national concern is even stronger here than in Crown Zellerbach. This is true for two reasons. First, in the case at bar, there is uncontested evidence of grave extraprovincial harm as a result of one province's failure to cooperate. In other words, this is a true interprovincial pollution problem of the highest order. This Court's decisions have consistently reflected the view that interprovincial pollution is constitutionally different from local pollution and that it may fall within federal jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine:

Interprovincial Co-operatives; Crown Zellerbach, at pp. 445-46; Hydro-Québec, at para. 76; see also Morguard Investments, at p. 1099; Lederman, at p. 614. Second, the proposed federal matter in the instant case relates only to the risk of non-cooperation that gives rise to this threat of grievous extraprovincial harm. In other words, this matter would empower the federal government to do only what the provinces cannot do to protect themselves from this grave harm, and nothing more.

(c) Scale of Impact

[196] At this step of the analysis, as I explained above, the court must determine whether the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction is acceptable having regard to the impact on the interests that will be affected if Parliament is unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level. This determination is made in light of the jurisdictional consequences of accepting the proposed matter of national concern. I conclude that, while it is true that finding that the federal government has jurisdiction over this matter will have a clear impact on provincial autonomy, the matter's impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate and on areas of provincial life that fall under provincial heads of power will be limited and will ultimately be outweighed by the impact on interests that would be affected if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address this matter at a national level.

[197] I accept that finding that this matter is one of national concern has a clear impact on provincial jurisdiction. It leads to the recognition of a previously unidentified area of double aspect in which the federal law is paramount. Provinces can regulate GHG pricing from a local perspective (e.g., under ss. 92(13) and (16) and 92A), but legislation enacted on the basis of these provincial powers would apply concurrently in a field also occupied by a paramount federal law that establishes minimum standards of GHG price stringency. There is a clear impact on provincial autonomy. Provincial governments and their residents may well wish to pursue GHG pricing standards lower than those set by the federal government in order to protect the vitality of local industries, or may wish to choose policies that do not involve GHG pricing.

[198] However, I am persuaded that there is a real, and not merely nominal, federal perspective on the fact situation of GHG pricing: Canada can regulate GHG pricing from the perspective of addressing the risk of grave extraprovincial and international harm associated with a purely intraprovincial approach to GHG pricing. This is manifestly not the "same aspect of the same matter". On the contrary, the compelling federal interest is in doing precisely — and only — what the provinces cannot do: protect themselves from the risk of grave harm if some provinces were to adopt insufficiently stringent GHG pricing standards. Moreover, the matter's impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate and on areas of provincial life that would fall under provincial heads of power is qualified and limited.

[199] First, the matter's impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate is minimal. It is important to mention that the issue in this case is not the freedom of the provinces and territories to legislate in relation to GHG emissions generally. Here, the matter is limited to GHG pricing of GHG emissions — a narrow and specific regulatory mechanism. Any legislation that related to non-carbon pricing forms of GHG regulation — legislation with respect to roadways, building codes, public transit and home heating, for example — would not fall under the matter of national concern.

[200] Nor is the freedom of the provinces and territories to legislate in relation to all methods of pricing GHG emissions at issue. Even where the specific regulatory mechanism of GHG pricing is concerned, the extent to which the matter interferes with provincial jurisdiction is strictly limited. Under the GGPPA, provinces and territories are free to design and legislate any GHG pricing system as long as it meets minimum national standards of price stringency. If a province wants to exceed the federal standards, it is free to do so without fear of federal legislation rendering its legislation inoperative, because the federal matter concerns minimum standards, not maximum standards. If a province fails to meet the minimum national standards, the GGPPA imposes a backstop pricing system, but only to the extent necessary to remedy the deficiency in provincial regulation in order to address the extraprovincial and international harm that might arise from the province's failure to act or to set sufficiently stringent standards. In Saskatchewan, for example, the provincially designed industrial GHG pricing scheme applies to many industrial emitters, but Part 2 of the GGPPA applies to electricity generation and natural gas transmission pipelines, the emissions of which Saskatchewan declined to price: see Notice Establishing Criteria Respecting Facilities and Persons and Publishing Measures, SOR/2018-213, ss. 2(b)(ii), 3(a) and (c)(x). The federal matter thus deals with GHG pricing stringency in a way that relates only to the risk of non-cooperation and the attendant risk of grave extraprovincial harm and has the ascertainable and reasonable limits required by Crown Zellerbach so as to ensure that provincial jurisdiction is not eroded more than necessary.

[201] Second, the matter's impact on areas of provincial life that would generally fall under provincial heads of power is also limited. Although the identified matter of national concern could arguably apply to types of fuel and to industries to which the GGPPA does not apply at present, that matter is, crucially, restricted to standards for GHG pricing stringency. As the majority of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan pointed out, it leaves "individual consumers and businesses . . . free to choose how they will respond, or not, to the price signals sent by the marketplace": para. 160. Indeed, the federal power recognized in this case is significantly less intrusive than the one at issue in Crown Zellerbach, in which, as La Forest J. noted, the effect of finding that the federal government has jurisdiction over ocean pollution caused by the dumping of waste was to "virtually preven[t] a province from dealing with certain of its own public property without federal consent": p. 458.

[202] Nor does the federal "supervisory" jurisdiction of the GGPPA increase the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction. As I explained above, the Governor in Council's discretion under the GGPPA is limited by the purpose of the statute, by specific guidelines set out in it and by administrative law principles. The Governor in Council does not have an unfettered discretion to determine whether a provincial GHG pricing system is desirable, but is confined to determining whether it meets results-based standards.

[203] Moreover, the Governor in Council's decision-making role in the GGPPA is an incident of the flexibility the provinces retain in relation to GHG pricing within their borders. If provincial pricing systems are to be taken into account and federal intervention is to be limited to remedying deficiencies in those systems, the GGPPA must include a mechanism for determining whether provincial pricing systems meet federal standards. It would not be feasible for the statute itself to indicate which provincial pricing systems meet federal standards, as provincial pricing schemes and policies frequently change. The Governor in Council's decision-making role thus seems to be an incident of a flexible model designed to preserve provincial regulation. Furthermore, the discretion of the Governor in Council is necessary in order to ensure that some provinces do not subordinate or unduly burden the other provinces through their unilateral choice of standards.

[204] Indeed, the design of the GGPPA to ensure provincial flexibility is consistent with the 2018 Securities Reference. In that case, the proposed law also involved a "supervisory" aspect, given that the federal regulator's intervention was contingent upon there being a risk that "slips through the cracks" of a provincial scheme that posed a threat to the Canadian economy: para. 92. The Court found that this feature weighed in favour of constitutionality, because the statute was a "carefully tailored" response to "this provincial incapacity": para. 113.

[205] In summary, although the matter has a clear impact on provincial jurisdiction, its impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate and on areas of provincial life that would fall under provincial heads of power is qualified and limited.

[206] On the whole, I am of the view that the scale of impact of this matter of national concern on provincial jurisdiction is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution. The GGPPA puts a Canada-wide price on carbon pollution. Emitting provinces retain the ability to legislate, without any federal supervision, in relation to all methods of regulating GHG emissions that do not involve pricing. They are free to design any GHG pricing system they choose as long as they meet the federal government's outcome-based targets. The result of the GGPPA is therefore not to limit the provinces' freedom to legislate, but to partially limit their ability to refrain from legislating pricing mechanisms or to legislate mechanisms that are less stringent than would be needed in order to meet the national targets. Although this restriction may interfere with a province's preferred balance between economic and environmental considerations, it is necessary to consider the interests that would be harmed — owing to irreversible consequences for the environment, for human health and safety and for the economy — if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level. This irreversible harm would be felt across the country and would be borne disproportionately by vulnerable communities and regions, with profound effects on Indigenous peoples, on the Canadian Arctic and on Canada's coastal regions. In my view, the impact on those interests justifies the limited constitutional impact on provincial jurisdiction.

(d) Conclusion on the National Concern Doctrine

[207] In conclusion, the GGPPA is intra vires Parliament on the basis of the national concern doctrine. Canada has adduced evidence that shows that the proposed matter of establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is of clear concern to Canada as a whole and that the two principles underpinning the "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" inquiry are satisfied. Considering the impact on the interests that would be affected if Canada were unable to address this matter at a national level, the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction is reconcilable with the division of powers.

[208] I wish to emphasize that nothing about this conclusion flows inevitably from the fact that this matter of national concern involves a minimum national standard. My colleague Brown J. warns that my analysis opens the floodgates to federal "minimum national standards" in all areas of provincial jurisdiction. Respectfully, this concern is entirely misplaced. As can be seen from the foregoing reasons, the test for finding that a matter is of national concern is an exacting one. Canada must establish not just that the matter is of concern to Canada as a whole, but also that it is specific and identifiable and is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern, and that federal jurisdiction is necessitated by provincial inability to deal with the matter. Each of these requirements, as well as the final scale of impact analysis, represents a meaningful barrier to the acceptance of any matter of national concern that might be proposed in the future.

[209] This Court's decision in Schneider demonstrates that where one province's failure to deal with health care "will not endanger the interests of another province", the national concern doctrine cannot apply: p. 131. This central insight from Schneider has application beyond the field of health care, and in my view precludes the application of the national concern doctrine to many of the fields my colleague suggests would be vulnerable to federal encroachment as a result of the case at bar. Many fields my colleague points to are ones in which the effects of one province's approach are in fact primarily felt in that province only. I note as well that this Court recently emphasized that education is an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction that has a uniquely intraprovincial character: Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia, 2020 SCC 13, at para. 7. Schneider itself confirmed that "[the] view that the general jurisdiction over health matters is provincial . . . has prevailed and is now not seriously questioned": p. 137.

[210] Moreover, nothing in these reasons should be understood to diminish the significant place of s. 92(13), the provincial power over "Property and Civil Rights", in the Canadian constitutional order. Historically and jurisprudentially, it is well known that this head of power serves as a means to accommodate regional and cultural diversity in law, and that it is of particular importance in this regard to the province of Quebec: see Citizens Insurance Co. v. Parsons (Canada) (1881), 7 App. Cas. 96, at pp. 109-12; Secession Reference, at paras. 38 and 58-60. As a result, this Court has continued to affirm that this provincial power should be carefully protected: see, e.g., Re: Anti-Inflation Act, at pp. 440-41; 2018 Securities Reference, at para. 100;

Desgagnés Transport, at para. 57. In light of this, the rigorous national concern test represents a meaningful constraint on federal power.

[211] Even in a case in which a matter can be connected to climate change, a truly global pollution problem with grave extraprovincial consequences, I emphasize that much of the reasoning in this decision turns on the evidence before the Court with respect to GHG pricing itself: the critical value of GHG pricing as a tool for the mitigation of climate change, its nature as a distinct and limited regulatory mechanism, how it operates across the economy, and the risk of carbon leakage. Furthermore, finding that this matter is of national concern is appropriate only because the matter amounts to a real, and compelling, federal perspective on GHG pricing, focused on addressing only the well-established risk of grave extraprovincial harm, and doing so in a way that has a qualified and limited impact on provincial jurisdiction.

VII. Validity of the Levies as Regulatory Charges

[212] Finally, I must address Ontario's argument that the fuel and excess emission charges imposed by the GGPPA do not have a sufficient nexus with the regulatory scheme to be considered constitutionally valid regulatory charges.

[213] To be a regulatory charge, as opposed to a tax, a governmental levy with the characteristics of a tax must be connected to a regulatory scheme: Westbank First Nation v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 134, at para. 43; 620 Connaught Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2008 SCC 7, [2008] 1

S.C.R. 131, at para. 24. In Westbank, Gonthier J. set out a two-step approach for determining whether a governmental levy is connected to a regulatory scheme. The first step is to identify the existence of a relevant regulatory scheme. If such a scheme is found to exist, the second step is to establish a relationship between the charge and the scheme itself: Westbank, at para. 44; 620 Connaught, at paras. 25-27.

[214] Ontario does not dispute that the GGPPA creates a regulatory scheme. Its argument instead focuses on the second step of the Westbank analysis: determining whether the levy has a sufficient nexus with the regulatory scheme. The GGPPA does not require that revenues collected under Parts 1 and 2 be expended in a manner connected to the regulatory purpose of the GGPPA. Ontario argues that this undermines the levies' characterization as regulatory charges; in its view, the nexus requirement cannot be met solely by showing that the regulatory purpose of a charge is to influence behaviour. It submits that, for there to be a nexus with the regulatory scheme, the revenues that are collected must be used to recover the cost of the scheme or be spent in a manner connected to a particular regulatory purpose, and that a conclusion to the contrary would undermine the "no taxation without representation" principle that underlies s. 53 of the Constitution: A.F., at para. 97.

[215] It is well-established that influencing behaviour is a valid purpose for a regulatory charge. As Rothstein J. put it in 620 Connaught, a regulatory charge may be intended to "alter individual behaviour", in which case "the fee may be set at a level designed to proscribe, prohibit or lend preference to a behaviour": para. 20. Two examples Gonthier J. mentioned in Westbank were that "[a] per-tonne charge on landfill waste may be levied to discourage the production of waste [and that a] deposit-refund charge on bottles may encourage recycling of glass or plastic bottles": para. 29. However, the case law on the required nexus in the Westbank framework for a behaviour-modifying charge is not settled. In 620 Connaught, the Court explicitly left the question "[w]hether the costs of the regulatory scheme are a limit on the fee revenue generated, where the purpose of the regulatory charge is to proscribe, prohibit or lend preference to certain conduct," for another day: para. 48.

[216] I agree with Strathy C.J.O. that regulatory charges need not reflect the cost of the scheme: paras. 159-60; see also Canadian Assn. of Broadcasters v. Canada (F.C.A.), 2008 FCA 157, [2009] 1 F.C.R. 3. As contemplated in 620 Connaught, the amount of a regulatory charge whose purpose is to alter behaviour is set at a level designed to proscribe, prohibit, or lend preference to a behaviour. Canada rightly observes that limiting such a charge to the recovery of costs would be incompatible with the design of a scheme of this nature: R.F., at para. 138. Nor must the revenues that are collected be used to further the purposes of the regulatory scheme. Rather, as Gonthier J. suggested in Westbank, the required nexus with the scheme will exist "where the charges themselves have a regulatory purpose": para. 44. Where, as in the instant case, the charge itself is a regulatory mechanism that promotes compliance with the scheme or furthers its objective, the nexus between the scheme and the levy inheres in the charge itself.

[217] This Court's decision in Allard Contractors Ltd. v. Coquitlam (District), [1993] 4 S.C.R. 371, is of no assistance to Ontario. Ontario seizes on an aspect of Allard that Iacobucci J. specifically framed as an effort "to determine the scope of s. 92(9) rather than to define 'taxation' as such": p. 398. The provincial licensing power under s. 92(9) raised specific questions about its interplay with the s. 92(2) limitation on provincial taxation to direct, as opposed to indirect, taxation, as well as about its relationship to other provincial heads of power. It had been argued that to give s. 92(9) a meaning independent of the other provincial heads of power, it ought not to be limited to raising money to support a regulatory scheme. In that context, very different from the one in the case at bar, Iacobucci J. remarked in obiter that a finding that there was "a power of indirect taxation in s. 92(9) extending substantially beyond regulatory costs could have the more serious consequence of rendering s. 92(2) meaningless": pp. 404-5 (emphasis in original). It was unnecessary to decide the point, however, because the levy in Allard was intended only to cover the costs of the regulatory scheme: p. 412.

[218] It does not follow from Allard that a finding that there is a nexus with the regulatory scheme where the levy is a regulatory mechanism would, as Ontario asserts, "render s. 53 meaningless": A.F., at para. 100. Section 53 codifies the principle of no taxation without representation by requiring any bill that imposes a tax to originate with the legislature: Eurig Estate (Re), [1998] 2 S.C.R. 565, at para. 30. Section 53 applies expressly to taxation. The Westbank approach remains adequate for the purpose of distinguishing between taxes and regulatory charges in order to determine whether s. 53 applies. Holding that the required nexus can be found to exist by establishing that the charge itself is a regulatory mechanism does not open the door to disguised taxation. Instead, in every case, the court must scrutinize the scheme in order to identify the primary purpose of the levy on the basis of Westbank. An attempt to circumvent s. 53 by disguising a tax as a regulatory charge without a sufficient nexus to a regulatory scheme would be colourable.

[219] In the instant case, there is ample evidence that the fuel and excess emission charges imposed by Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA have a regulatory purpose. Ontario does not assert, nor would such an assertion be supportable, that the levies in this case amount to disguised taxation. The GGPPA as a whole is directed to establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions, not to the generation of revenue. As Richards C.J.S. aptly observed, the GGPPA "could fully accomplish its objectives . . . without raising a cent": para. 87. This is true of both Part 1 and Part 2. The levies imposed by Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA cannot be characterized as taxes; rather, they are regulatory charges whose purpose is to advance the GGPPA's regulatory purpose by altering behaviour. The levies are constitutionally valid regulatory charges.

VIII. A Final Matter

[220] In this case, I have identified the pith and substance of the GGPPA having regard to the statute and the regulations in force at the time of these appeals. My colleague Rowe J. has taken this opportunity to propose a methodology for assessing the constitutionality of regulations made under the GGPPA. Although the underlying premise of my colleague's comments — that regulations made pursuant to an enabling statute must be consistent with the division of powers and further the purpose of the statute — is uncontroversial, his speculative concern that such regulations could be used to further industrial favouritism is neither necessary nor desirable. I would leave the matter of the validity of regulations under the GGPPA for a future case should the issue arise. It is not this Court's role to express opinions about the substance, arguments or merits of future challenges.

IX. Conclusion

[221] In conclusion, I would answer the reference questions in the negative. The Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act is constitutional. Accordingly, the Attorney General of Saskatchewan's appeal is dismissed, the Attorney General of Ontario's appeal is dismissed, and the Attorney General of British Columbia's appeal is allowed.

The following are the reasons delivered by

CÔTÉ J. —

[222] I have read the carefully crafted reasons of the Chief Justice, and I am in agreement with his formulation of the national concern branch analysis. However, I must respectfully part company with the Chief Justice's ultimate conclusion that the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, S.C. 2018, c. 12, s. 186 ("GGPPA" or "Act") is, in its current form, constitutional. In my view, the GGPPA, as presently drafted, cannot be said to accord with the matter of national concern properly formulated by the Chief Justice because the breadth of the discretion conferred by the Act on the Governor in Council results in the absence of any meaningful limits on the power of the executive. Additionally, the provisions in the GGPPA that permit the Governor in Council to amend and override the GGPPA itself violate the Constitution Act, 1867, and the fundamental constitutional principles of parliamentary sovereignty, rule of law, and the separation of powers.

[223] This Court must decide the constitutionality of the GGPPA based on the totality of the measures it authorizes, and not simply the steps currently taken under the Act. Thus, when I consider what the GGPPA authorizes, irrespective of whether it has in fact been implemented, it is clear that the Act, as it is currently written, vests inordinate discretion in the executive with no meaningful checks on fundamental alterations of the current pricing schemes.

[224] Although delegation of legislative power is not inherently problematic, as discretion provides flexibility and makes it possible to overcome the practical difficulties associated with amending provisions and enacting regulations at the legislative level, when an Act endows a select few with the power to re-write, and thus reengineer, a law which affects virtually every aspect of individuals' daily lives and provincial industrial, economic, and municipal activities, it goes too far.

[225] I would therefore find that the Act is unconstitutional in part.

I. The GGPPA Vests a Considerable Amount of Discretion in the Executive [226] A detailed review of the provisions of the Act leads to the conclusion that a considerably high degree of discretion has been vested in the Governor in Council.

A. Part 1 of the Act

[227] Part 1 of the Act establishes a fuel charge against certain producers, distributors, and importers of various greenhouse gas ("GHG") producing fuels named in Schedule 2 (which includes aviation gasoline, aviation turbo fuel, butane, ethane, gas liquids, gasoline, heavy and light fuel oils, kerosene, methanol, naphtha, petroleum coke, pentanes plus, propane, coke oven gas, marketable and non-marketable natural gas, still gas and coal) and on combustible waste. In s. 3 of the Act, the critical feature of the fuel levy — that being, what fuels are covered by the Act — is so open-ended, allowing any substance, if prescribed by the Governor in Council, to fall within the ambit of the fuel charge regime:

> combustible waste means
> (a) tires or asphalt shingles whether in whole or in part; or
>
> (b) a prescribed substance, material or thing. (déchet combustible)
>
> . . .

(b) a prescribed substance, material or thing. (combustible)

[228] The operative provisions of Part 1 similarly prescribe vast legislative law-making power to the executive such that the very nature of the regime can be altered. For example:

Covered facility of a person
5 For the purposes of this Part, a covered facility is a covered facility of a person if

(b) the person is a prescribed person, a person of a prescribed class or a person meeting prescribed conditions in respect of the covered facility.

Delivery of marketable natural gas — distribution system
14 For the purposes of this Part, if marketable natural gas is delivered to a particular person by means of a distribution system, the person that is considered to deliver the marketable natural gas is

(b) if prescribed circumstances exist or prescribed conditions are met, the person that is a prescribed person, a person of a prescribed class or a person meeting prescribed conditions.

Charge — regulations
26 Subject to this Part, a prescribed person, a person of a prescribed class or a person meeting prescribed conditions must pay to Her Majesty in right of Canada a charge in respect of a type of fuel or combustible waste in the amount determined in prescribed manner if prescribed circumstances exist or prescribed conditions are met. The charge becomes payable at the prescribed time.

Charge not payable — regulations
27 A charge under this Part in respect of a type of fuel or combustible waste is not payable

(a) by a prescribed person, a person of a prescribed class or a person meeting prescribed conditions; or

(b) if prescribed circumstances exist or prescribed conditions are met.

Charge amount — mixture
40(2) Despite subsection (1), if a manner is prescribed in respect of a mixture that is deemed to be fuel of a prescribed type under subsection 16(2), the amount of a charge payable under this Division in respect of such a mixture is equal to the amount determined in prescribed manner.

Charge amount — regulations
40(3) Despite subsection (1), if prescribed circumstances exist or prescribed conditions are met, the amount of a charge payable under this Division in respect of fuel and a listed province is equal to the amount determined in prescribed manner.

Charge amount — regulations
41(2) Despite subsection (1), if prescribed circumstances exist or prescribed conditions are met, the amount of a charge payable in respect of combustible waste and a listed province is equal to the amount determined in prescribed manner.

Amount of rebate — regulations
47(3) Despite subsection (2), if prescribed circumstances exist or prescribed conditions are met, the amount of a rebate payable under this section is equal to the amount determined in prescribed manner.

[229] The full breadth of executive powers can be seen most notably within ss. 166 and 168 of the Act. Section 166(1)(a) states that the Governor in Council may make regulations "prescribing anything that, by this Part, is to be prescribed or is to be determined or regulated by regulation". The only limit whatsoever on s. 166's expansive regulation-making powers is that s. 166(3) stipulates that in making a regulation under subsection (2) — that is, amending Part 1 of Schedule 1 to modify the list of provinces where the fuel levy is payable — "the Governor in Council shall take into account, as the primary factor, the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for greenhouse gas emissions". No such factor applies to the Governor in Council's regulation-making powers under Part 1's provisions. Most importantly, by virtue of s. 166(4), the executive has a wholly-unfettered ability to amend Part 1 of the Act:

> 166(4) The Governor in Council may, by regulation, amend Schedule 2 respecting the application of the fuel charge under this Part including by adding, deleting, varying or replacing a table.

[230] Sections 168(2) and 168(3) also allow the Governor in Council to make and amend regulations in relation to the fuel charge system, its application, and its implementation. These wide-ranging powers set forth a wholly-unfettered grant of broad discretion to amend Part 1 of the Act:

> 168(2) The Governor in Council may make regulations, in relation to the fuel charge system,
> > (a) prescribing rules in respect of whether, how and when the fuel charge system applies and rules in respect of other aspects relating to the application of that system, including rules deeming, in specified circumstances and for specified purposes, the status of anything to be different than what it would otherwise be, including when an amount under this Part became due or was paid, when fuel or a substance, material or thing was delivered, how and when an amount under this

Part is required to be reported and accounted for and when any period begins and ends;

(b) prescribing rules in respect of whether, how and when a change in a rate, set out in any table in Schedule 2 for a type of fuel and for a province or area, applies and rules in respect of a change to another parameter affecting the application of the fuel charge system in relation to such a fuel or province or area, including rules deeming, in specified circumstances and for specified purposes, the status of anything to be different than what it would otherwise be, including when an amount under this Part became due or was paid, when fuel or a substance, material or thing was delivered, how and when an amount under this Part is required to be reported and accounted for and when any period begins and ends;

(c) prescribing rules in respect of whether, how and when a change to the provinces or areas listed in Part 1 of Schedule 1 or referenced in Schedule 2 applies and rules in respect of a change to another parameter affecting the application of the fuel charge system in relation to a province or area or to a type of fuel, including rules deeming, in specified circumstances and for specified purposes, the status of anything to be different than what it would otherwise be, including when an amount under this Part became due or was paid, when fuel or a substance, material or thing was delivered, how and when an amount under this Part is required to be reported and accounted for and when any period begins and ends;

(d) if an amount is to be determined in prescribed manner in relation to the fuel charge system, specifying the circumstances or conditions under which the manner applies;

(e) providing for rebates, adjustments or credits in respect of the fuel charge system;

(f) providing for rules allowing persons, which elect to have those rules apply, to have the provisions of this Part apply in a manner different from the manner in which those provisions would otherwise apply, including when an amount under this Part became due or was paid, when fuel or a substance, material or thing was delivered, how and when an amount under this Part is required to be reported or accounted for and when any period begins and ends;

(g) specifying circumstances and any terms or conditions that must be met for the payment of rebates in respect of the fuel charge system;

(h) prescribing amounts and rates to be used to determine any rebate, adjustment or credit that relates to, or is affected by, the fuel charge system, excluding amounts that would otherwise be included in determining any such rebate, adjustment or credit, and specifying > circumstances under which any such rebate, adjustment or credit must not be paid or made;

>
> (i) respecting information that must be included by a specified person in a written agreement or other document in respect of specified fuel or a specified substance, material or thing and prescribing charge-related consequences in respect of such fuel, substance, material or thing, and penalties, for failing to do so or for providing incorrect information;
>
> (j) deeming, in specified circumstances, a specified amount of charge to be payable by a specified person, or a specified person to have paid a specified amount of charge, for specified purposes, as a consequence of holding fuel at a specified time;
>
> (k) prescribing compliance measures, including anti-avoidance rules; and
> (l) generally to effect the transition to, and implementation of, that system in respect of fuel or a substance, material, or thing and in respect of a province or area.

[231] Most notably, s. 168(4) of the Act states that in the event of a conflict between the statute enacted by Parliament and the regulations made by the executive, "the regulation prevails to the extent of the conflict". This breathtaking power circumvents the exercise of law-making power by the legislative branch by permitting the executive to amend by regulation the very statute which authorizes the regulation. Section 168(4), along with ss. 166(2) and 166(4), all constitute what are known as "Henry VIII clauses". Their name, Henry VIII clauses, is inspired by the King whose lust for power included the Statute of Proclamations (An Act that Proclamations made by the King shall be obeyed (Eng.), 1539, 31 Hen. 8, c. 8), which elevated the King's proclamations to have the same legal force as Acts of Parliament (J. W. F. Allison, "The Westminster Parliament's Formal Sovereignty in Britain and Europe from a Historical Perspective" (2017), 34 Journal of Constitutional History 57, at pp. 62-63).

B. Part 2 of the Act

[232] The output-based pricing system ("OBPS") created under Part 2 of the Act exempts certain industrial enterprises, defined as "covered facilities", from Part 1's fuel charge regime. I have concerns about the Chief Justice's assertion that "no aspect of the discretion provided for in Part 2 permits the Governor in Council to regulate GHG emissions broadly or to regulate specific industries in any way other than by setting GHG emissions limits and pricing excess emissions across the country" (para. 76). In my view, and with respect, it is clear from a review of Part 2's provisions that the broad powers accorded to the executive allow for this very result.

[233] Section 192 contains a Henry VIII clause and empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations for a variety of matters, including regulations:

> (a) defining facility;
>
> (b) respecting covered facilities, including the circumstances under which they cease to be covered facilities;
>
> (c) allowing for the determination of the persons that are responsible for a facility or covered facility;
>
> (d) respecting designations and cancellations of designations under section 172;
>
> (e) respecting compliance periods and the associated regular-rate compensation deadlines and increased-rate compensation deadlines;
>
> (f) respecting the reports and verifications referred to in section 173 and subsections 176(2) and 177(2);
>
> (g) respecting greenhouse gas emissions limits referred to in sections 173 to 175, subsection 178(1), section 182 and subsection 183(1);
>
> (h) respecting the quantification of greenhouse gases that are emitted by a facility;

> (i) respecting the circumstances under which greenhouse gases are deemed to have been emitted by a facility;
>
> (j) respecting the methods, including sampling methods, and equipment that are to be used to gather information on greenhouse gas emissions and activities related to those emissions;
>
> (k) respecting the compensation referred to in sections 174 and 178;
>
> (l) respecting compliance units, including transfers of compliance units, the circumstances under which transfers of compliance units are prohibited and the recognition of units or credits issued by a person other than the Minister as compliance units;
>
> (m) respecting the tracking system referred to in section 185 and the accounts in that system;
>
> (n) providing for user fees;
>
> (o) respecting the rounding of numbers;
>
> (p) respecting the retention of records referred to in section 187; and
> (q) respecting the correction or updating of information that has been provided under this Division.

[234] Additionally, a number of provisions in Part 2 allow the executive, in accordance with the regulations crafted by said executive, to: designate a facility as a covered facility, thus making it exempt from paying the fuel charge (s. 172(1)), cancel the designation of a covered facility (s. 172(3)), suspend or revoke compliance units (s. 180(1)), recover compensation owing in compliance units (s. 182), or close an account (s. 186(3)). The sole limit on the executive's expansive discretion found in Part 2, similar to Part 1, is in s. 189(2); when amending Part 2 of Schedule 1 to modify the list of provinces where the OBPS applies, "the Governor in Council shall take into account, as the primary factor, the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for greenhouse gas emissions". Again, as in Part 1, no such factor applies to the Governor in Council's regulation-making powers under Part 2's provisions.

[235] While the Governor in Council's powers in this regard are ostensibly exercisable to allow for ongoing review, I am in agreement with both Justices Brown and Rowe that Part 2's "skeletal" framework accords the executive vast discretion to unilaterally set standards on an industry-by-industry basis, creating the potential for differential treatment of industries at the executive's whim.

II. "Minimum" Standards Are Set By the Executive, Not the Act

[236] As noted above, I agree with the Chief Justice that the use of minimum national standards of price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is legally viable as a matter of national concern. However, the Act, as it is currently written, cannot be said to establish national standards of price stringency because there is no meaningful limit to the power of the executive. In my view, it is not the Act, but the executive, who sets, constrains, or expands, the standards.

[237] The legislative decision to transfer law and policy-making power to the executive is central to the contours of the GGPPA. In his article "The Case for a Canadian Nondelegation Doctrine" (2019), 52 U.B.C. L. Rev. 817, (Alyn) James Johnson, a constitutional and administrative law scholar, notes the deleterious consequences of this excessive delegation:

> Legislatures are high-profile bodies where law and policy making on contentious issues can occur with a degree of public awareness, scrutiny, and input. Courts and executive bodies, on the other hand, while themselves institutionally distinct, both lack the open and broadly-> deliberative character that gives legislatures their unique position in a democratic society. [Footnote omitted; pp. 825-26.]

This excessively broad delegation of power removes the regulation of GHGs from the legitimizing forum of the legislature and places it into the hands of the few.

[238] The Chief Justice emphasizes that regulation-making power is conscribed to the statutory purpose of reducing GHG emissions through GHG pricing — such as imposing a fuel charge and industrial GHG emissions pricing regimes. But, in my view, this is not a meaningful limitation to the executive's power. As Justice Brown has helpfully outlined, rather than establishing minimum national standards, Part 2 of the Act empowers the executive to establish variable and inconsistent standards on an industry-by-industry basis. For instance, the executive could decide to impose such strict limits on the fossil fuel or potash industries, both heavy emitters of GHG emissions, that the industries would be decimated. According to the majority's reasoning, this example, regardless of its improbability, would fulfill the statutory purpose of reducing GHG emissions through GHG pricing and therefore be a valid use of the executive's regulatory powers accorded by the GGPPA. This cannot be so.

[239] I recognize that in response, one may argue that Canadian citizens can simply make their displeasure known at election time. However, the fact that the executive is permitted to place a number of conditions on individuals and industries at any time, and is moreover allowed to revise those conditions at any time to any extent, is untenable. This results in provinces having applicable regimes one day, and being under the federal scheme the next. The meaningful check on the legislation ought to be the separation of powers analysis, not simply a further delegation to the ballot box.

[240] The Act, as it is currently written, employs a discretionary scheme that knows no bounds. While I agree with the Chief Justice's reasons that a matter which is restricted to minimum national GHG pricing stringency standards properly fits within federal authority, the Act does not reflect this crucial restriction. Given the boundless discretion that is contained within the provisions, including the ability to expand the ambit of both Parts to fundamentally change the nature of the fuel charge regime or target specific industries, the Act cannot be said to accord with the matter.

III. Constitutional Restrictions on Delegated Power

[241] Moreover, I am of the view that certain parts of the Act are so inconsistent with our system of democracy that they are independently unconstitutional. I explain why below.

[242] Sections 166(2), 166(4) and 192 all confer on the Governor in Council the power to amend parts of the Act. Section 168(4) confers the power to adopt secondary legislation that is inconsistent with Part 1 of the Act. Scholars have long warned that executive power to amend or repeal provisions in primary legislation raises serious constitutional concerns (see Hewart L.C.J., The New Despotism (1929); D. J. Mullan, "The Role of the Judiciary in the Review of Administrative Policy Decisions: Issues of Legality", in M. J. Mossman and G. Otis, eds., The Judiciary as Third Branch of Government: Manifestations and Challenges to Legitimacy (1999), 313, at p. 375; L. Neudorf, "Reassessing the Constitutional Foundation of Delegated Legislation in Canada" (2018), 41 Dal. L.J. 519, at p. 545; Johnson; see also M. Mancini, "The Non-Abdication Rule in Canadian Constitutional Law" (2020), 83 Sask. L. Rev. 45). The time has come to acknowledge that clauses that purport to empower a body other than Parliament to amend primary legislation are contrary to ss. 17 and 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Therefore, ss. 166(2), 166(4), 168(4) and 192 of the GGPPA are unconstitutional.

A. The Architecture of the Constitution of Canada

[243] The Constitution of Canada is a "comprehensive set of rules and principles which are capable of providing an exhaustive legal framework for our system of government" (Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 32). The rules and principles that compose the Constitution of Canada "emerge from an understanding of the constitutional text itself, the historical context, and previous judicial interpretations of constitutional meaning" (Secession Reference, at para. 32). They include both written and unwritten elements (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 92; Secession Reference, at para. 32). The question here is whether these rules and principles permit Parliament to authorize the Governor in Council to amend an Act of Parliament.

[244] One of the core features of the Constitution of Canada is the identification and definition of three constituent elements of the state: the executive, the legislative and the judicial (Reference re Senate Reform, 2014 SCC 32, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 704, at para. 23; Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 108). The Constitution Act, 1867, plays a critical role in defining these three constituent elements. Part III of the Constitution Act, 1867, defines the Executive Power, Part IV the Legislative Power and Part VII the Judicature. Additionally, Part V establishes the executive and legislative powers for provinces and Part VI establishes the distribution of legislative powers between the Parliament of Canada and provincial legislatures.

[245] Constitutional documents must be interpreted in a broad and purposive manner, informed by not only the proper linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts but also by the foundational principles of the Constitution (Senate Reference, at para. 25; Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, at pp. 155-56; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344). They must also be read in light of the broader architecture of the Constitution (Senate Reference, at para. 26; Secession Reference, at para. 50; OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 57).

[246] We must thus begin with the actual text of the Constitution Act, 1867. Under Part IV, the first provision declares that "[t]here shall be One Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons" (s. 17). Under Part VI, the first provision provides:

> 91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say . . . .

[247] A linguistic or ordinary and grammatical reading of these sections leads me to conclude that they simultaneously confer the federal legislative power upon the Parliament of Canada and constrain how the Parliament of Canada may exercise the legislative power. Section 17 begins by emphasizing "[t]here shall be One Parliament for Canada", meaning that all of the legislative power conferred upon the federal state shall reside in a single Parliament. Then comes the constraint on how legislative power must be exercised, arising from the decision of the Fathers of Confederation to "particularize the participants in the law making process" (Re: Authority of Parliament in relation to the Upper House, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 54, at p. 74). Sections 17 and 91 both affirm that the authority to legislate is exclusively exercisable by the Queen, with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons. This means, at the federal level, every exercise of legislative power — every enactment, amendment and repeal of a statute — must have the consent of all three elements of Parliament: the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. In contrast, under Part III "Executive Power", s. 9 vests the "Executive Government and Authority of and over Canada" exclusively upon the Queen alone.

[248] Our case law also supports this interpretation. In Hodge v. The Queen (1883), 9 App. Cas. 117, the Privy Council held that a province could lawfully delegate the power to set regulations regarding liquor licensees to License Commissioners. However, Sir Barnes Peacock for the panel noted that "[i]t is obvious that such an authority is ancillary to legislation, and without it an attempt to provide for varying details and machinery to carry them out might become oppressive, or absolutely fail" and that there were an "abundance of precedents for this legislation, entrusting a limited discretionary authority to others" (p. 132 (emphasis added)). He also noted that the provincial legislature "retains its powers intact, and can, whenever it pleases, destroy the agency it has created and set up another, or take the matter directly into his own hands" (p. 132).

[249] In In re Initiative and Referendum Act, [1919] A.C. 935, the Privy Council reviewed the constitutionality of Manitoba's Initiative and Referendum Act, S.M. 1916, c. 59. This Act provided that laws may be made and repealed by referendum, and that such laws would have the same effect as laws made by an Act of the Legislature (s. 7). The Manitoba Court of Appeal had found that s. 92 of the British North America Act, 1867 (now the Constitution Act, 1867) vested the power of law making exclusively with the Legislature and the Legislature could not confer that power upon any other body (Re The Initiative and Referendum Act (1916), 27 Man. R. 1).

[250] For the Privy Council, Viscount Haldane found that "[t]he language of s. 92 is important. That section commences by enacting that 'in such Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters' coming within certain classes of subjects" (p. 943). Although he went on to dismiss the appeal on the basis that Manitoba did not have jurisdiction to interfere with the office of Lieutenant-Governor, in "a deliberate and important obiter" (OPSEU, at p. 47), Viscount Haldane continued on to discuss the limits of legislative power:

> Sect. 92 of the Act of 1867 entrusts the legislative power in a Province to its Legislature, and to that Legislature only. No doubt a body, with a power of legislation on the subjects entrusted to it so ample as that enjoyed by a Provincial Legislature in Canada, could, while preserving its own capacity intact, seek the assistance of subordinate agencies, as had been done when in Hodge v. The Queen, the Legislature of Ontario was held entitled to entrust to a Board of Commissioners authority to enact regulations relating to taverns; but it does not follow that it can create and endow with its own capacity a new legislative power not created by the Act to which it owes its own existence. [Emphasis added; footnote omitted; p. 945.]

[251] In Re: Authority of Parliament in relation to the Upper House, the Court reiterated this finding that "s. 92 of the Act vests the power to make or repeal laws exclusively in the Legislature and that it did not contemplate the creation of a new legislative body to which the Legislature could delegate its powers of legislation or with which it would share them" (p. 72).

[252] In Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721, this Court affirmed the Constitution requires that each part of a legislature — in the case of Manitoba, both the Legislative Assembly and the Lieutenant-Governor — consent to a bill in order to validly exercise legislative power. Section 4(1) of An Act Respecting the Operation of Section 23 of the Manitoba Act in Regard to Statutes, S.M. 1980, c. 3, provided that statutes could be enacted in one official language and subsequently be translated into the other official language. It authorized the translation to merely be deposited with the Clerk of the House in order to become law. The Court found this to be "an unconstitutional attempt to interfere with the powers of the Lieutenant-Governor. Royal assent is required of all enactments" (Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 777).

[253] There is, however, one authority that presents a different view of Parliament's ability to delegate legislative power. In Re George Edwin Gray (1918), 57 S.C.R. 150, a majority of the Supreme Court upheld an Order in Council which contradicted a statute. Re Gray was an application for habeas corpus. George Gray was a young farmer who had been exempted from military service under The Military Service Act, 1917, S.C. 1917, c. 19, because of his farming duties. Section 6 of The War Measures Act, 1914, S.C. 1914, c. 2, provided that "[t]he Governor in Council shall have power to do and authorize such acts and things, and to make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war . . . deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada". Section 13(5) of The Military Service Act, 1917, correspondingly provided: "Nothing in this Act contained shall be held to limit or affect . . . the powers of the Governor in Council under The War Measures Act, 1914."

[254] On April 19, 1918, the Senate and House of Commons passed a joint resolution: "That in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that regulations respecting Military Service shall be made and enacted by the Governor in Council in manner and form and in the words and figures following, that is to say . . .” (Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, No. 22, 1st Sess., 13th Parl., April 19, 1918, at p. 242; Journals of the Senate of Canada, vol. 54, 1st Sess., 13th Parl., April 19, 1918, at p. 100). The resolution went on to repeat verbatim a set of regulations that the Governor in Council made the next day. These regulations altered the exemptions from military service such that Mr. Gray was no longer exempt. The Order in Council’s military service requirements were contrary to The Military Service Act, 1917.

[255] The sole question before the Court was whether there was authority for the Order in Council nullifying the exemption. Writing in the majority, Fitzpatrick C.J. found that while it was argued that Parliament alone may make laws, Parliament could delegate legislative powers so long as it did not amount to abdicating its role (Re Gray, at pp. 156-57). He then turned to The War Measures Act, 1914, to determine whether the Order in Council was intra vires. The War Measures Act, 1914, did not expressly authorize the Governor in Council to promulgate orders inconsistent with statutes, but according to Fitzpatrick C.J. express language was not necessary:

> It seems to me obvious that parliament intended, as the language used implies, to clothe the executive with the widest powers in time of danger. Taken literally, the language of the section contains unlimited powers. Parliament expressly enacted that, when need arises, the executive may for the common defence make such orders and regulations as they may deem necessary or advisable for the security, peace, order and welfare of Canada. The enlightened men who framed that section, and the members of parliament who adopted it, were providing for a very great emergency, and > they must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said. [Emphasis added; pp. 158-59.]

[256] In finding that the statute conferred unlimited power, Fitzpatrick C.J. was most certainly influenced by the urgency of war: "Our legislators were no doubt impressed in the hour of peril with the conviction that the safety of the country is the supreme law against which no other law can prevail. It is our clear duty to give effect to their patriotic intention" (p. 160 (emphasis added)). Justices Duff and Anglin were similarly concerned, with Anglin J. even noting that thousands of men had already been drafted and were on their way to Europe under the authority of this Order in Council (pp. 169, 174 and 180). Were it not for the urgency of war, it is difficult to see any justice agreeing to permit the Governor in Council to exercise what appears to be unlimited power, as such power is the very antithesis to the rule of law. As Lord Bingham wrote:

> The rule of law does not require that official or judicial decision-makers should be deprived of all discretion, but it does require that no discretion should be unconstrained so as to be potentially arbitrary. No discretion may be legally unfettered.
> (The Rule of Law (2010), at p. 54)

[257] In contrast, the dissenting judges refused to accept the "bald proposition" that The Military Service Act, 1917, "was liable to be repealed or nullified by an order in council" (Re Gray, at p. 164). Even with the emergency of war, overruling statutes by Order in Council was not cognizable, "such conceptions of law as within the realm of legislation assigned by the 'British North America Act' to the Dominion have no existence" (p. 165).

[258] The Chief Justice cites Re Gray as establishing the constitutionality of Henry VIII clauses (para. 85). With great respect, I do not read Re Gray as being conclusive of the constitutionality of Henry VIII clauses. First, the comments of the majority justices in Re Gray, particularly with respect to the unlimited powers of the Governor in Council, demonstrate that their findings are not in accord with our contemporary understandings of core constitutional principles. The justices in Re Gray were clearly moved by the great emergency of war. In the case before us, Parliament did not pass the impugned legislation under the emergency branch. Second, Re Gray is distinguishable from the present case in that all three of the bodies charged under ss. 17 and 91 with the exclusive authority to make legislation agreed with the Order in Council. Although not passed as an Act of Parliament, the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons along with the Order in Council may adequately meet the demands of ss. 17 and 91 in the urgent situation of war. There was no consent of the House of Commons or Senate to the regulations promulgated by the Governor in Council under the GGPPA. Third, this reading is inconsistent with our most recent pronouncement on delegation of law-making powers.

[259] The Chief Justice also cites Reference as to the Validity of the Regulations in Relation to Chemicals, [1943] S.C.R. 1, and R. v. Furtney, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 89, as cases relying upon the findings in Re Gray (Chief Justice's reasons, at para. 85).

Neither of these cases concerned Henry VIII clauses. In the Chemicals Reference, the Governor in Council had established various boards to assist with the Second World War effort. The question at issue was whether the Governor in Council could delegate its power under The War Measures Act, 1914, to these other bodies. Not only was there no Henry VIII clause at issue, but the Court unanimously ruled that part of the Order in Council was ultra vires for being contrary to the enabling statute (pp. 7, 21, 27, 32 and 37). Despite the broad statements about Parliament's ability to delegate "legislative" power in time of emergency, Duff C.J. also recognized that the British North America Act, 1867, may impose limits upon Parliament's ability to commit legislative powers to the executive (p. 10). I use the word "legislative" in quotation marks because Duff C.J. spoke of actions that are legislative in character (p. 12). For the purpose of the present appeals, I define legislative power more narrowly, referring specifically to the formal power to enact, amend or repeal an Act of Parliament. On this definition, no legislative power was at issue in the Chemicals Reference.

[260] Furtney is part of a different line of jurisprudence regarding inter-governmental delegation that, in my view, only lends support to the unconstitutionality of Henry VIII clauses. In Attorney General of Nova Scotia v. Attorney General of Canada, [1951] S.C.R. 31, this Court held that Parliament could not delegate its legislative powers to a provincial legislature and similarly, the provincial legislature could not delegate its legislative powers to Parliament. Although Rinfret C.J. distinguished this from cases where a delegation is made to a body subordinate to Parliament, his focus on the word "exclusively" in both ss. 91 and 92, along with the lack of an express delegation power, supports my reading of ss. 17 and 91 (pp. 34-35). In the Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, 2018 SCC 48, [2018] 3 S.C.R. 189, we affirmed that the Constitution Act, 1867, prohibits Parliament from delegating legislative powers to another legislature (para. 75). Throughout the judgment we repeatedly emphasize the ability of Parliament to delegate the power to make "subordinate" regulations (paras. 73 and 75-76 (emphasis in original)) or exercise "administrative" powers (paras. 123 and 125 (emphasis in original)). At no point do we support the delegation of primary legislative authority.

[261] I thus cannot take Re Gray to be conclusive of the issue. I turn now to the fundamental principles of the Constitution which further support my reading of ss. 17 and 91.

B. Fundamental Principles of the Constitution of Canada

[262] This Court's recent jurisprudence demonstrates that the unwritten principles of our Constitution help to inform the written text (Manitoba Language Rights, at pp. 750-51; Secession Reference, at para. 53; Provincial Judges Reference, at paras. 94-95 and 104; British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473, at paras. 44 and 57; Babcock v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 57, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 54).

[263] In my view, there are three fundamental principles that must inform the interpretation of ss. 17 and 91: parliamentary sovereignty, rule of law and the separation of powers.

(1) Parliamentary Sovereignty

[264] Parliamentary sovereignty is a foundational principle in the Westminster system of government that the Constitution of Canada employs. Parliamentary sovereignty is generally thought to mean that Parliament has "the right to make or unmake any law whatever" (A. V. Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (10th ed. 1959), at pp. 39-40). Of course, in Canada the sovereignty of Parliament has always been qualified by the written constitution (Pan-Canadian Securities Reference, at para. 56). For that reason, the Court has said that it may be more useful to refer to our system of government as one of constitutional supremacy, rather than parliamentary supremacy (Secession Reference, at para. 72). Nonetheless, parliamentary sovereignty remains an important constitutional principle, as absent constitutional restraint, Parliament may make or unmake any law.

[265] At first glance, parliamentary sovereignty supports Parliament's ability to delegate whatever they want to whomever they wish. If Parliament can make or unmake any law whatever, then Parliament can make a law empowering the Governor in Council to amend Acts of Parliament. However, this is not the case. Parliamentary sovereignty contains both a positive and negative aspect. The positive aspect is, as we have seen, that Parliament has the ability to create any law. The negative aspect, however, is that no institution is competent to override the requirements of an Act of Parliament. Dicey covered both of these aspects in his definition:

> The principle of Parliamentary sovereignty means neither more nor less than this, namely, that Parliament thus defined has, under the English constitution, the right to make or unmake any law whatever; and, further, that no person or body is recognised by the law of England as having a right to override or set aside the legislation of Parliament. [Footnote omitted; pp. 39-40.]

[266] It is this negative aspect of parliamentary sovereignty that Henry VIII clauses run afoul of. Henry VIII clauses "give the executive the authority to override the requirements of primary legislation and thereby directly violate the principle of parliamentary sovereignty" (A. Tucker, "Parliamentary Scrutiny of Delegated Legislation", in A. Horne and G. Drewry, eds., Parliament and the Law (2018), 347, at p. 359). In the 2010 Mansion House Speech to the Lord Mayor of London, the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales agreed, declaring that "proliferation of clauses like these will have the inevitable consequence of yet further damaging the sovereignty of Parliament and increasing yet further the authority of the executive over the legislature . . . Henry VIII clauses should be confined to the dustbin of history" (Lord Judge, July 13, 2010 (online), at p. 6; see also Lord Judge, "Ceding Power to the Executive; the Resurrection of Henry VIII", speech delivered at King's College London, April 12, 2016 (online), at p. 3).

[267] In Pan-Canadian Securities Reference, this Court emphasized the negative aspect of parliamentary sovereignty in its definition of parliamentary sovereignty:

". . . the legislature has the exclusive authority to enact, amend, and repeal any law as it sees fit, and . . . there is no matter in respect of which it may not make laws" (para. 54 (emphasis in original)). The Court unanimously found that it was consistent with parliamentary sovereignty to limit Parliament's ability to delegate its legislative powers to provincial legislatures:

> To put it simply: while Parliament or a provincial legislature may delegate the regulatory authority to make subordinate laws (like binding rules and regulations) in respect of matters over which it has jurisdiction to another person or body, it is nevertheless barred from transferring its primary legislative authority — that is, its authority to enact, amend and repeal statutes — with respect to a particular matter over which it has exclusive constitutional jurisdiction to a legislature of the other level of government. [Emphasis added; para. 76.]

[268] Even if one were to reject the idea that parliamentary sovereignty entails accepting that no other body can enact, amend or repeal statutes, the concept of parliamentary sovereignty has other inherent limitations. For instance, in order for Parliament to be sovereign it cannot be limited by the actions of previous Parliaments and therefore "neither Parliament nor the legislatures can, by ordinary legislation, fetter themselves against some future legislative action" (Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 837, at para. 119). Similarly, logic limits Parliament from achieving two contradictory purposes simultaneously. For instance, Parliament cannot create a body of limited jurisdiction and simultaneously insulate that body from judicial review because "it is a contradiction in terms to create a tribunal with limited jurisdiction and unlimited power to determine such limit at its own will and pleasure — such a tribunal would be autocratic, not limited" (R. v. Shoreditch Assessment Committee, [1910] 2 K.B. 859 (C.A.), at p. 880). Henry VIII clauses create a contradiction within an Act by simultaneously requiring the executive to do something and authorizing the executive to defy that requirement. For instance, in the GGPPA, s. 168(2) empowers the Governor in Council to regulate several specific subjects relating to the fuel charge, such as "providing for rebates, adjustments or credits in respect of the fuel charge system" (s. 168(2)(e)). However s. 168(4) provides that the Governor in Council can act contrary to any provision in Part 1. Therefore, Parliament simultaneously attempts to limit the Governor in Council to regulating specific subjects whilst also attempting to permit the Governor in Council to regulate anything they want.

[269] Recently, some of the senior judiciary in England and Wales have accepted that another inherent limit is that parliamentary sovereignty demands an impartial, independent and authoritative body to interpret Parliament's acts. Because Parliament can only speak through written texts, its work can only be effective when interpreted by such a body (R. (Cart) v. Upper Tribunal, [2009] EWHC 3052 (Admin.), [2011] Q.B. 120, at paras. 37-39, per Laws L.J.; R. (Privacy International) v. Investigatory Powers Tribunal, [2019] UKSC 22, [2020] A.C. 491, at paras. 189-90 and 208-10). Henry VIII clauses are incompatible with this conception of sovereignty. Henry VIII clauses limit the availability of judicial review by providing no meaningful limits against which a court could review. This is a problem that equally affects the rule of law, a principle to which I now turn.

(2) The Rule of Law

[270] The rule of law is one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution, lying "at the root of our system of government" (Secession Reference, at para. 70; see also Roncarelli v. Duplessis, [1959] S.C.R. 121, at p. 142). It is also expressly recognized in the preamble to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: "Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law."

[271] The rule of law embraces three related principles (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 58). First, "the law is supreme over officials of the government as well as private individuals, and thereby preclusive of the influence of arbitrary power" (Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 748). Second, "the rule of law requires the creation and maintenance of an actual order of positive laws which preserves and embodies the more general principle of normative order" (Manitoba Language Rights, at p. 749). Third, "the exercise of all public power must find its ultimate source in a legal rule" (Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 10). In other words, "[a]t its most basic level, the rule of law vouchsafes to the citizens and residents of the country a stable, predictable and ordered society in which to conduct their affairs. It provides a shield for individuals from arbitrary state action" (Secession Reference, at para. 70).

[272] Even in its most formal sense, the rule of law requires that all legislation be enacted in the manner and form prescribed by law (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 60). This includes the requirements that legislation receive three readings in the Senate and House of Commons and that it receive Royal Assent (Authorson v. Canada (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 39, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 40, at paras. 37-41). When the Governor in Council amends legislation, it does not follow this prescribed manner and thus violates the rule of law.

[273] There are two additional rule of law concerns with the delegation of legislative power to the executive. The first, as Professor Elmer A. Driedger noted, the "delegation of power to amend a statute is generally regarded as objectionable for the reason that the text of the statute is then not to be found in the statute book" (The Composition of Legislation: Legislative Forms and Precedents (2nd rev. ed. 1976), at p. 198). This gives rise to confusion and uncertainty, which are inimical to the rule of law (Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, at para. 72).

[274] The second additional concern is that Henry VIII clauses endow the executive with authority to act arbitrarily. They do so by permitting the executive to act contrary to the empowering statute, creating an authority without meaningfully enforceable limits and thus an absolute discretion. Dicey articulated the rule of law's concern with preventing arbitrary power:

> [The rule of law] means, in the first place, the absolute supremacy or predominance of regular law as opposed to the influence of arbitrary power, and excludes the existence of arbitrariness, of prerogative, or even of wide discretionary authority on the part of the government. [p. 202]

[275] In the Canadian context, Justice Rand's famous reasons in Roncarelli also warn against absolute power:

> . . . there is no such thing as absolute and untrammelled "discretion", that is that action can be taken on any ground or for any reason that can be suggested to the mind of the administrator; no legislative Act can, without express language, be taken to contemplate an unlimited arbitrary power exercisable for any purpose, however capricious or irrelevant, regardless of the nature or purpose of the statute. [p. 140]

[276] The Chief Justice says that the Governor in Council will be bound by the express terms and overall purpose and object of the GGPPA (para. 87). I agree with Brown J. when he says that Henry VIII clauses cannot merely be treated as a matter of administrative law (para. 414). My concerns are constitutional in nature because I do not see the Governor in Council as being constrained by meaningful limits that can be enforced through judicial review. For example, s. 168(4) expressly authorizes the Governor in Council to act contrary to the provisions of Part 1. Further, the overall purpose and object of the Act is so broad that the only limit on the Governor in Council is to act within the matter of national concern identified by the Chief Justice. When executive action is only limited by the division of powers and not by its empowering statute, then we can no longer call it executive action. Review for constitutional compliance with the division of powers is not enough. When an empowering Act contains a privative clause, the rule of law is not satisfied merely by judicial review for constitutional compliance.

[277] In order to protect the rule of law, and prevent arbitrary conduct, courts have a constitutional duty to judicially review actions of the executive (Crevier v. Attorney General of Quebec, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 220, at p. 234; see also Dr. Q v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia, 2003 SCC 19, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 226, at para. 21). In Dunsmuir v. New Brunswick, 2008 SCC 9, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 190, the majority affirmed that "[j]udicial review is the means by which the courts supervise those who exercise statutory powers, to ensure that they do not overstep their legal authority. The function of judicial review is therefore to ensure the legality, the reasonableness and the fairness of the administrative process and its outcomes" (para. 28).

[278] Given that judicial review is constitutionally required, legislation cannot oust review, either expressly or implicitly (Crevier, at p. 238; Dunsmuir, at para. 31). When the Governor in Council is given the power to amend an Act, or to act in a manner inconsistent with the Act, it cannot be said that they are meaningfully limited by the Act. In the words of Campbell J.:

> This power is constitutionally suspect because it confers upon the government the unprotected authority to pull itself up by its own legal bootstraps and override arbitrarily, with no further advice from the Legislative Assembly, and no right to be heard by those who may be adversely affected by the change, the very legislative instrument from which the government derives its original authority.

(3) The Separation of Powers

[279] Like parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law, the separation of powers is "a fundamental principle of the Canadian Constitution" (Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 138). Although it is often said that Canada does not have a strict separation of powers, time and time again this Court has recognized the separation of powers as "an essential feature of our constitution", "a cornerstone of our constitutional regime", "[o]ne of the defining features of the Canadian Constitution" and a "backbone of our constitutional system" (Wells v. Newfoundland, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 199, at paras. 52 and 54; Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 107; Cooper v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 854, at paras. 3 and 10).

[280] As an abstract theory, the separation of powers may embody three dimensions: the same persons should not form part of more than one branch, one branch should not control or intervene in the work of another, and one branch should not exercise the functions of another (E. C. S. Wade and G. G. Phillips, Constitutional Law (3rd ed. 1946), at p. 18).

[281] In Canada, the first two dimensions of the separation of powers are not always met. For instance, it is well accepted that "the same individuals control both the executive and the legislative branches of government" (Wells, at paras. 53-54; see also Attorney General of Quebec v. Blaikie, [1981] 1 S.C.R. 312, at pp. 320-21). However, this does not mean that our Constitution fuses the legislative and executive powers (Canada (Auditor General) v. Canada (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 49, at p. 103). Instead, the Constitution of Canada insists on a separation of powers according to the third dimension — the separation of function. In Fraser v. Public Service Staff Relations Board, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 455, Dickson C.J. described the basic functions of each of the three branches:

> There is in Canada a separation of powers among the three branches of government — the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. In broad terms, the role of the judiciary is, of course, to interpret and apply the law; the role of the legislature is to decide upon and enunciate policy; the role of the executive is to administer and implement that policy. [pp. 469-70]

[282] The separation of powers does not strictly require that all of these functions remain exclusive. Our Constitution permits one branch to exercise some of the functions of another branch, when it does so in a way that respects both roles. These appeals provide a perfect example. We, members of the judiciary, are called upon to provide advice to three Lieutenant Governors in Council on the constitutionality of the GGPPA — something that would typically be an executive function (Secession Reference, at para. 15). However, our jurisprudence also clearly establishes that "[t]he separation of powers requires, at the very least, that some functions must be exclusively reserved to particular bodies" (Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 139).

[283] In Ontario v. Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, 2013 SCC 43, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 3, my colleague, Karakatsanis J., confirmed the importance of identifying and protecting each branch's core functions:

> Over several centuries of transformation and conflict, the English system evolved from one in which power was centralized in the Crown to one in which the powers of the state were exercised by way of distinct organs with separate functions. The development of separate executive, legislative and judicial functions has allowed for the evolution of certain core competencies in the various institutions vested with these functions. The legislative branch makes policy choices, adopts laws and holds the purse strings of government, as only it can authorize the spending of public funds. The executive implements and administers those policy choices and laws with the assistance of a professional public service. The judiciary maintains the rule of law, by interpreting and applying these laws through the independent and impartial adjudication of references and disputes, and protects the fundamental liberties and freedoms guaranteed under the Charter.
> All three branches have distinct institutional capacities and play critical and complementary roles in our constitutional democracy. [Emphasis added; paras. 28-29.]

[284] Justice Karakatsanis's reasons aptly articulate one of the normative goals underlying the separation of powers: ensuring that power is allocated according to skillset and institutional capacities. Another reason was provided by McLachlin J. (as she then was) in New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 319, where she emphasized the importance of maintaining the balance of power established between the three branches, finding that "[i]t is fundamental to the working of government as a whole that all these parts play their proper role. It is equally fundamental that no one of them overstep its bounds, that each show proper deference for the legitimate sphere of activity of the other" (p. 389). Maintaining this balance prevents an accumulation of power in any one branch.

[285] The Court's concern for protecting the core functions of each branch from intrusion is perhaps most well developed in the judicial sphere. Grounded in the judicature provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, both legislative and executive bodies are incapable of intruding upon the core jurisdiction of superior courts or infringing upon the independence of the judiciary (MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, at paras. 2 and 15; Reference re Amendments to the Residential Tenancies Act (N.S.), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 186, at para. 56; Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, at paras. 19 and 26; Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59, [2014] 3 S.C.R. 31). This core judicial function includes the duty to maintain the rule of law and protect citizens from arbitrary action by supervising state action (MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 32-35; Crevier, at pp. 234-38).

[286] There are also well developed doctrines to protect core executive functions from judicial intrusion. For instance, our jurisprudence demonstrates the importance of restraint when reviewing certain exercises of royal prerogative (Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441; Secession Reference, at paras. 26-28; Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 44, at paras. 36-37; see also Hupacasath First Nation v. Canada (Minister of Foreign Affairs), 2015 FCA 4, 379 D.L.R. (4th) 737). The doctrine of cabinet privilege similarly serves to protect core executive functions (Carey v. Ontario, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 637; Babcock, at paras. 18-19 and 60).

[287] The Court has also established limits on judicial interference with essential legislative functions, most notably through acknowledging the existence of parliamentary privilege over core legislative activities. As Binnie J. said, "[e]ach of the branches of the State is vouchsafed a measure of autonomy from the others"; "[p]arliamentary privilege, therefore, is one of the ways in which the fundamental constitutional separation of powers is respected" (Canada (House of Commons) v. Vaid, 2005 SCC 30, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 667, at para. 21; see also New Brunswick Broadcasting Co., at p. 377). Parliamentary privilege provides immunity "necessary to protect legislators in the discharge of their legislative and deliberative functions, and the legislative assembly's work in holding the government to account for the conduct of the country's business" (Vaid, at para. 41; see also Chagnon v. Syndicat de la fonction publique et parapublique du Québec, 2018 SCC 39, [2018] 2 S.C.R 687, at paras. 27 and 127).

[288] In addition to respecting the bounds of parliamentary immunity, courts have refrained from imposing procedural fairness requirements on legislating, other than requiring that legislation receive three readings in the Senate and House of Commons and that it receive Royal Assent (Authorson, at paras. 37-41). Recently, a majority of this Court held that the duty to consult does not apply to ministers of the Crown engaged in drafting bills, as this is a legislative function: "Extending the duty to consult doctrine to the legislative process would oblige the judiciary to step beyond the core of its institutional role and threaten the respectful balance between the three pillars of our democracy" (Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Governor General in Council), 2018 SCC 40, [2018] 2 S.C.R. 765, at para. 2; see also paras. 117, 122, 148, 163-64 and 167).

[289] Most of these protections are against judicial intrusion. However, the Court has also recognized that the executive cannot interfere with the legislative process in a manner that would restrict the power to enact, amend and repeal legislation, despite the important role played by the executive in the legislative process (Pan-Canadian Securities Reference, at para. 53). Chief Justice Lamer noted that "there is a hierarchical relationship between the executive and the legislature, whereby the executive must execute and implement the policies which have been enacted by the legislature in statutory form" (Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 139).

[290] The separation of powers equally demands that the core function of enacting, amending and repealing statutes be protected from the executive and remain exclusive to the legislature. Doing so supports the two main normative principles underlying the separation of powers.

[291] First, the legislature is the institution best suited to set policy down into legislation. The constitutionally mandated process in ss. 17 and 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, ensures that the legislation is made in public forums that provide opportunities for substantial examination and debate. The legislative process provides equally for high-level policy debates and line-by-line technical edits. Most importantly, legislating through legislatures requires, by "its very nature, the need to build majorities [and] necessitates compromise, negotiation, and deliberation. No one has a monopoly on truth, and our system is predicated on the faith that in the marketplace of ideas, the best solutions to public problems will rise to the top" (Secession Reference, at para. 68).

This is why "the role of the legislature is to decide upon and enunciate policy" (Fraser, at p. 470).

[292] Second, limiting the power to enact, amend and repeal legislation to the legislature helps to confine power and prevent an even greater concentration of power in the executive. There is no doubt that the executive branch wields great power in this country. In practice, the executive can control the day-to-day operations of the legislature (Blaikie, at p. 320). However, an executive branch with the power to legislate on its own, without the legislature at all, wields a much greater and far more dangerous power. As we have seen above, the legislative process takes place in public before the scrutiny of non-government members and the press. When the government does not control a majority of seats in the legislature, the legislative process can require extensive compromise. In contrast, when Cabinet amends the GGPPA, it does so shrouded in cabinet secrecy, free from public scrutiny. There can be no doubt as to "the pre-eminent importance of the House of Commons as 'the grand inquest of the nation'" (Vaid, at para. 20).

[293] The Fathers of Confederation and the Framers of the Constitution Act, 1982, both recognized the importance of the parliamentary process by requiring that Parliament sit at least once every twelve months (s. 20 of the British North America Act, 1867 (as enacted) and s. 5 of the Charter). There is nothing more core to the legislative power than legislating. When the executive usurps this function, the separation of powers is clearly violated.

IV. Conclusion

[294] When the clear text of ss. 17 and 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, is read in light of the foundational constitutional principles of parliamentary sovereignty, rule of law and separation of powers, I have no doubt that clauses that purport to confer on the executive branch the power to nullify or amend Acts of Parliament are unconstitutional. In addition, the GGPPA cannot fall within a matter of national concern defined by minimum standards when such standards are those of the executive, and not those of the Parliament.

[295] Therefore, while I agree with the Chief Justice's formulation of the national concern branch analysis, I do not agree with his application of the law to the facts of this case. As this Act is presently drafted, it does not set minimum standards and delegates a legislative power to the executive. Accordingly, while I join the Chief Justice in finding that Parliament has the power to enact constitutionally valid legislation in this realm, I must partially dissent.

The following are the reasons delivered by

BROWN J. —

I. Introduction

[296] With the aim of mitigating climate change, the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, S.C. 2018, c. 12, s. 186 ("Act"), implements measures — specifically, carbon pricing (in the case of Part 1 of the Act) and the regulation of heavy industry (in the case of Part 2) — to discourage activities that emit greenhouse gases ("GHGs") into the atmosphere.

[297] The issue before us is whether the Act is intra vires Parliamentary authority. Importantly, the issue is not whether Parliament can act to combat climate change. It clearly can — indeed, it can do much of what it seeks to do in the Act by, for example, exercising its taxation power under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Nor is the issue whether Parliament can act to confront this or other existential threats to the country. Again, it clearly can, by relying upon its broad residual power to legislate in response to emergencies for the peace, order, and good government of Canada ("POGG").

[298] In other words, the constitutionality of the scheme that Parliament has enacted in this case does not govern whether Parliament can seek to control GHG emissions so as to meet reduction targets. It can. The question before us goes simply to how Parliament has chosen to do so — and, in particular, whether it has chosen a means of doing so that is supported by its legislative authority as conferred by the Constitution of Canada. This question properly directs our attention to the structure and operation of the Act — features which receive little to no consideration in the majority's reasons — and to the jurisdictional basis upon which the Attorney General of Canada seeks to uphold it. Again, it is worth stressing — since all parties before us say that much is at stake in the fight against climate change — that Parliament's capacity to contribute meaningfully to that fight does not hang on the Court's answer to the reference question.

[299] The Attorney General of Canada urges us to find that the Act represents a constitutionally valid exercise by Parliament not of the powers it clearly has to address climate change, but of its residual authority to legislate with respect to matters of "national concern" under POGG. The significance of this cannot be overstated. This power — unlike Parliament's authority to legislate in the face of national emergencies — permanently vests exclusive jurisdiction in Parliament over the matter said to be of national concern. Were this simply the straightforward matter, as the Attorney General of Canada says, of requiring polluters to "pay", the consequences for the division of powers would be minor. But neither the Attorney General nor the majority fairly or completely describes what the Act does. In particular, they downplay significantly what the Act actually authorizes the Governor in Council — that is, the federal Cabinet — to do, and ignore the detailed regulatory intrusion into matters of provincial jurisdiction authorized by Part 2 of the Act. The result is a permanent and significant expansion of federal power at the expense of provincial legislative authority — unsanctioned by our Constitution, and indeed, as I will explain, expressly precluded by it.

[300] The majority accedes to all these things, granting the Attorney General of Canada everything he seeks. But it does not stop there. The majority goes even further, in substance abandoning and re-writing this Court's jurisprudence on the national concern branch of POGG as stated in R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., [1988] 1 S.C.R. 401. Specifically, it dilutes the test stated in Crown Zellerbach, which required that a national concern exhibit qualities of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" (p. 432) from a matter falling within provincial legislative authority, by injecting into that test a body of unrelated trade and commerce jurisprudence. The result is a new three-step test. Under this new test, the requirement of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" is informed by two "principles" that "animat[e]" the inquiry (Chief Justice's reasons, at para. 146). The first of these "animating" principles is two-pronged, and one of those prongs is informed by three "factors" (paras. 147, 151 and 157). The second "animating principle" is to be analyzed by reference to three other requirements (paras. 152-56). To add to the confusion, the inevitable resulting expansion of federal authority under the national concern branch is fortified by the injection of judicial discretion into the scale of impact analysis, by which the scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction is balanced in light of other "interests", which implicitly include the judiciary's view of the importance of the matter (paras. 161 and 206). (It is apparently to be assumed that all important matters fall within federal jurisdiction.)

[301] But the true danger in the majority's reasons for judgment does not lie in the blending of trade and commerce jurisprudence with POGG jurisprudence, or in the confusing and confused test that it states. It is in the majority's abandonment of any meaningful constraint on the national concern branch of the POGG power.

[302] I concur with Rowe J.'s reasons and therefore adopt his review of the jurisprudence on the residual POGG power, conferred upon Parliament by the preamble to s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. My reasons proceed as follows. First, I will canvass the scheme of the Act itself, with a view to explaining its structure and operation so as to characterize its pith and substance, and to classify it among the heads of legislative authority prescribed in the Constitution. In so doing, I will explain why Parliament's reliance on the national concern doctrine to defend the Act encounters an insurmountable constitutional problem. The Act's very structure belies any argument that its dominant subject matter relates to a distinctly federal matter, since it applies only where provincial legislatures have not enacted carbon pricing measures, either at all or as stringent as those preferred by the federal Cabinet. In other words, the Act's structure and operation is premised on provincial legislatures having authority to enact the same scheme. This is fatal to the constitutionality of the Act under the POGG national concern branch, since s. 91 states provincial legislative authority is "assigned exclusively" — that is, to the exclusion of Parliament's authority to act. This is a fundamental limiting feature of the federal POGG power for which the majority's reasons do not account.

[303] I will then consider how the Attorneys General of Canada and of British Columbia, seeking to overcome that objection, argue that the imposition of minimum national standards is the distinctly federal or national aspect of the matter. But this simply begs the question — minimum national standards of what? If the subject of those "minimum national standards" is a matter falling within provincial legislative authority — which, again, the Act by its very structure contemplates — the injection of "minimum national standards" adds nothing. For example, until this Court's judgment from which I now dissent, it would have been no more constitutional for Parliament to adopt "minimum national standards" governing hospital administration, the location or construction of hydroelectric generating facilities, the inflationary effects of intra-provincial trade and commerce (such as wage and price controls), or the exploration and development of non-renewable natural resources. Now, such things are entirely possible (at least, where a judge views them as being "important").

[304] It follows that the Act is not a valid exercise of Parliament's residual legislative authority. Nor — though the argument was hardly pursued by the Attorney General of Canada — can the Act be upheld as a valid exercise of any other federal head of power, at least not without the benefit of fuller argument than the passing reference contained in the Attorney General's factum. I would therefore conclude that the Act is wholly ultra vires Parliament.

[305] Having disposed of the reference question by applying this Court's jurisprudence, I will then turn to consider the majority's dilution of the Crown Zellerbach test.

II. The Act

[306] The Act's preamble describes climate change as a national problem, which cannot be contained within geographic boundaries and requires immediate action. It therefore states its intention to create "incentives for . . . behavioural change" by implementing a "federal greenhouse gas emissions pricing scheme".

[307] Two distinct regulatory mechanisms are authorized by the Act. Part 1 creates a regulatory charge on GHG-emitting fuels, which will increase annually until 2022. This charge is levied against certain producers, distributors and importers, with the expectation that they will pass this charge on to end consumers. In this way, it is expected to change public behaviour, thereby reducing demand for and consumption of GHG-emitting fuels. Subject to a number of exceptions, the charge applies to fuels that are produced, delivered or used in a "listed province", brought into a listed province from another place in Canada, or imported into Canada at a location in a listed province (ss. 17 to 39). The fuel charge currently applies to 22 fuels that emit GHGs when burned, including gasoline, diesel fuel, natural gas and "combustible waste". The fuels are listed in Sch. 2 of the Act and are subject to modification by the federal Cabinet.

[308] The second mechanism, created under Part 2, is described as an output-based pricing system ("OBPS"). The structure of the OBPS casts significant doubt on the correctness of the majority's characterization of the entire Act's pith and substance as "establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions" (para. 57). Rather, the OBPS is animated by concerns over industrial competitiveness in specific emissions-intensive Canadian industries that compete in international markets, and with the consequent economic and environmental impacts of "carbon leakage" — the movement of industry to jurisdictions with a lower carbon price. Part 2, therefore, is designed not only "to create incentives for . . . behavioural change", but also to maintain the international competitiveness of some emissions-intensive and trade-exposed industries (being those selected by the federal Cabinet) by exempting them from the fuel charge established by Part 1, and subjecting them instead to different levels of carbon pricing based on Cabinet's responsiveness to the competitiveness and carbon leakage concerns of that particular industry.

[309] Part 2 achieves its goal by authorizing the federal Cabinet to limit the total emissions that can be produced without charge by an industrial facility. It applies to facilities located in a listed province that either meet the criteria set out in the regulations or are designated by the Minister of the Environment. Facilities subject to the OBPS that operate within their emissions limit receive surplus credits called compliance units which can be sold or banked to offset future emissions. Facilities that exceed their limit must pay an excess emissions charge, remit compliance units, or both.

[310] The emissions limit of a particular facility is calculated by multiplying its volume of production by a factor — in the language of the Act, a sector-specific "output-based standard" — set out in the Output-Based Pricing System Regulations, SOR/2019-266 ("Regulations"). This standard is typically based on a percentage of the national, production-weighted average emissions intensity of the specific industrial activity in question (a large exception is electricity generation, where the standards are based on whether solid, liquid or gaseous fuels are used). The percentage used to calculate the standard is adjusted based on an assessment of competitiveness and carbon leakage concerns for that particular industrial activity. This assessment is crucial because the cost per tonne of carbon emitted in relation to any given industrial activity is dictated solely by the percentage used to set the output-based standard.

[311] In the result, Part 2 grants the federal Cabinet the power to set carbon costs on an activity-by-activity basis. Schedule 1 of the Regulations sets out the standards for an array of different products, from bitumen to potash to pulp, that give rise to different carbon prices for emissions related to that product.

[312] A key feature of the Act is that its application is dependent upon whether and how provinces have exercised their legislative authority to reduce GHG emissions. Meaning, the Act is designed to operate as a backstop, applying in only those provinces that have not (1) adopted carbon pricing as the means for reducing GHG emissions, (2) to a stringency that meets the federal Cabinet's preferred measure. To allow for this contingent operation, the Act grants the federal Cabinet discretion to determine whether it will apply in a given province. (As I will discuss below, this is a significant consideration militating against the Act's constitutionality.) In Part 1, ss. 166(2) and (3) provide that, "[f]or the purpose of ensuring that the pricing of greenhouse gas emissions is applied broadly in Canada at levels that the [federal Cabinet] considers appropriate", Cabinet may designate the listed provinces in which the fuel charge regime will apply, taking into account "the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for greenhouse gas emissions" as the primary factor. In Part 2, ss. 189(1) and (2) authorize Cabinet to designate the backstop jurisdictions in which Part 2 will apply, "[f]or the purpose of ensuring that the pricing of greenhouse gas emissions is applied broadly in Canada at levels that the [federal Cabinet] considers appropriate" taking into account, again, "the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for greenhouse gas emissions" as the primary factor.

III. Analysis for Constitutionality

[313] A reviewing court must apply two steps to determine whether an enactment falls within the legislative authority of the enacting body. First, the enactment must be characterized to determine its pith and substance or dominant subject matter. Secondly, the identified subject matter must be classified, with reference to the classes of subjects described in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (Desgagnés Transport Inc. v. Wärtsilä Canada Inc., 2019 SCC 58, at para. 30). Each step must be treated distinctly. Characterizing an enactment with reference to the heads of power creates "a danger that the whole exercise will become blurred and overly oriented towards results" (Chatterjee v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2009 SCC 19, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 624, at para. 16; see also A. S. Abel, "The Neglected Logic of 91 and 92" (1969), 19 U.T.L.J. 487, at p. 490). At the same time, however, we cannot lose sight of how these two distinct steps interact. As Professor P. W. Hogg explains in Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp. (loose-leaf)), vol. 1, at p. 15-6:

> . . . neither of these two steps has any significance by itself. The challenged statute is characterized . . . as in relation to a "matter" (step 1) only to determine whether it is authorized by some head of power in the Constitution. The "classes of subjects" are interpreted (step 2) only to determine which one will accommodate the matter of a particular statute.

[314] The analytical process differs somewhat, however, where, as here, Parliament relies upon the national concern branch of POGG as the source of its authority to legislate. After identifying the pith and substance of the impugned law, and deciding that it does not fall under an enumerated head of power, the reviewing court must then consider whether the matter said to be of national concern satisfies the requirements stated in Crown Zellerbach.

A. Characterization

[315] The pith and substance of a law has been described as "an abstract of the statute's content", or the law's "dominant purpose", "leading feature", "true nature and character", or "dominant or most important characteristic" (Whitbread v. Walley, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 1273, at p. 1286, citing P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (2nd ed. 1985), at p. 313; R. v. Morgentaler, [1993] 3 S.C.R. 463, at p. 482). It is well established that the dominant subject matter of an enactment is determined by considering its purpose and effects (Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 693, at para. 29).

[316] Determining the appropriate breadth by which to characterize the impugned law is essential. The legislation's dominant subject matter must be characterized precisely enough for it to be associated with a specific class of subjects described in the Constitution's heads of power. Characterizations that are too broad, vague, or general "are unhelpful in that they can be superficially assigned to various heads of powers" (Desgagnés, at para. 35; see also Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 457, at para. 190).

(1) Broad Proposed Characterizations

[317] The Attorneys General of Ontario and Alberta describe the Act's pith and substance as relating to the regulation of GHG emissions. I agree with the Attorneys General of Canada and British Columbia that this is too broad because it does not facilitate classification under a federal or provincial head of power. GHG emissions are produced by virtually all facets of human activity and can therefore be regulated in innumerable different ways that will correspond to different heads of power. In that sense, identifying "regulating GHG emissions" as the pith and substance of a law suffers from the same deficiency as "regulating the environment" which, as this Court has said, is "not an independent matter of legislation" but rather "a sweeping subject or theme virtually all-pervasive in its legislative implications", that "touch[es] several of the heads of power assigned to the respective levels of government" (Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 3, at pp. 63-64; R. v. Hydro-Québec, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 213, at para. 154, quoting W. R. Lederman, "Unity and Diversity in Canadian Federalism: Ideals and Methods of Moderation" (1975), 53 Can. Bar Rev. 597, at p. 610). Identifying the pith and substance requires greater specificity in describing how the legislation proposes to regulate GHG emissions. Again, the purpose of characterization must be borne in mind: it is to facilitate classification so as to determine whether the Constitution grants the enacting body — in this case, Parliament — legislative authority over the subject matter.

[318] In support of a broad characterization, Ontario says that legislative purpose must not be confused with the means chosen to achieve it, a proposition various parties attribute to this Court's decision in Ward v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 17, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 569, at para. 25 (A.F., Attorney General of Ontario, at para. 35; I.F., Attorney General of New Brunswick (38663 and 38781), at para. 20; I.F., Attorney General of Manitoba (38663 and 38781), at para. 25). But Ward simply reinforces the view that greater specificity than "regulating GHG emissions" is required. While the provision at issue in Ward imposed a prohibition on the "sale, trade or barter" of whitecoat and blueback seals, to refer to the legislation as prohibiting trade in baby seals was insufficiently precise. The same prohibition might relate to property and trade (authorized by s. 92(13)), or to conserving the economic viability of the seal fishery (authorized by s. 91(12)). It was clear from the broader context, however, that the enactment's purpose was to conserve the seal fishery, and the enactment was therefore authorized by the federal government's fisheries power (paras. 23 and 49). This Court's statement in Ward was, accordingly, directed to cases where describing legislation only in terms of its means would not accurately capture its dominant subject matter. Nothing in Ward requires altogether excluding legislative means from the pith and substance analysis.

[319] Moreover, it will not always be possible to clearly distinguish between means and purpose. The end goal at one level of abstraction may be viewed as the means to some broader goal at another level of abstraction. Here, for example, carbon pricing is the chosen means to generate behavioral change, which is the chosen means to reduce GHG emissions, which is the chosen means to combat climate change. Feasibility and efficacy aside, alternatives exist at each level of abstraction: the government might opt to remove GHGs from the atmosphere to combat climate change; it might prohibit certain products or activities to reduce GHG emissions; and it might reward "green" behaviours to generate behavioral change. It cannot therefore be said, as a general proposition, that the dominant subject matter of an enactment must not refer to the means chosen to implement the legislative purpose. That said, and as I will explain below, to incorporate the legislative means within the pith and substance of a statute will have particular consequences when deciding its constitutionality under the national concern branch of POGG.

[320] Whether one views the stated subject matter as the means or the objective depends, then, on the chosen level of abstraction. And the determinative consideration in identifying an appropriate level of abstraction should be facilitating the subject matter's classification among the classes of subjects described in ss. 91 and 92 so far as necessary to resolve the case. If an enactment's subject matter could be classified under different heads of power listed under both ss. 91 and 92, then the subject matter should be identified with more precision until it is clear which single level of authority (as between federal and provincial) may legislate in respect thereof (Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, at para. 190). A sufficiently precise description may well refer to why and how the law operates (Chatterjee, at para. 16).

(2) Narrow Proposed Characterizations

[321] I turn now to the characterizations advanced by the Attorneys General of Canada and British Columbia in support of their arguments that the Act is intra vires Parliamentary authority to regulate matters of national concern under POGG.

[322] I observe at the outset that, when Parliament seeks to permanently and exclusively regulate a matter of national concern, one would expect the Attorney General of Canada to have a single, clear, and consistent position about just what he thinks Parliament was doing. More particularly, he should be able to readily — and, again, consistently — identify the narrow and distinct matter that the legislation in question addresses. That has not occurred here. Instead, the Attorney General has offered up a vast array of shifting arguments in various courts at various stages in the proceedings. This alone should provoke deep suspicion about the correctness of those arguments.

[323] To assuage these suspicions, the Attorney General of Canada acknowledges that his approach has "evolved", having been "informed" along the way "by the characterizations of [the] courts below" (R.F., at para. 61). So where has this "evolution" brought him? Before this Court, it has at last brought him to the revelation that the Act's dominant subject matter is "establishing minimum national standards integral to reducing nationwide GHG emissions" (para. 56 (emphasis deleted)).

[324] This is similar to the characterization that the Attorney General of British Columbia successfully urged the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan to adopt: ". . . 'minimum national standards of stringency for pricing GHG emissions'" (2019 SKCA 40, 440 D.L.R. (4th) 398, at paras. 11 and 431). Before us, British Columbia urged a variation, specifically: ". . . establishing minimum national pricing standards to allocate part of Canada's targets for GHG emissions reduction" (A.F., at para. 2 (emphasis deleted)).

[325] None of these characterizations can be sustained.

[326] The principal difficulty with these submissions is the invocation of "minimum national standards". It adds nothing to the pith and substance of a matter, which is directed not to the fact of a standard, but to the subject matter to which the standard is to be applied. In other words, identifying "minimum national standards" as part of the dominant subject matter begs the very question which the characterization analysis seeks to answer: minimum national standards of what?

[327] "Minimum national standards" is a nothing. It is an artifice — or, as the Attorney General of Alberta puts it, a rhetorical "sleight of hand" (R.F., at para. 44). Only federally enacted standards can be both "national" (in the sense that only federal legislation can apply nationwide, while provincial legislative authority cannot extend beyond its borders) and a "minimum" (since, if a provincial standard is different from a corresponding federal standard, the operation of paramountcy ensures that the federal standard will prevail). In the result, using "minimum" and "national" to describe the Act's pith and substance is empty and misleading.

[328] None of this is answered by the majority. Indeed, nowhere does the majority justify the inclusion of "minimum national standards" in its characterization of the pith and substance of the Act. Instead, the majority simply and peremptorily expresses its "view" that "the federal government's intention was not to take over the field of regulating GHG emissions, or even that of GHG pricing, but was, rather, to establish minimum national standards of GHG price stringency for GHG emissions", and that "minimum national standards" adds something "essential" to the pith and substance of the Act (paras. 65 and 81). The majority also says that the impugned federal legislation in Hydro-Québec (which also included a backstop) was not described by this Court as imposing minimum national standards (at para. 33, per Lamer C.J. and Iacobucci J., dissenting, and at paras. 130 and 146, per La Forest J.), because the backstop nature of that legislation was but a "mere feature" — whereas, in this case, the backstop nature of the Act is its "main thrust", "dominant characteristic", and "defining feature" (Chief Justice's reasons, at para. 82). Respectfully, the distinction between a legislative structure that operates as a "mere" feature as opposed to a "dominant" or "defining" one is elusive. Indeed, my colleagues appear also to find it so, since they do not explain it. Little in Part 1 or 2 of the Act is cited in support for the proposition that, here, the backstop model is a "defining", as opposed to a "mere", feature. We are simply to accept that this is so because the majority declares it to be so, citing not the actual statute and what it does, but instead the Final Report of the Federal-Provincial-Territorial Working Group on Carbon Pricing Mechanisms, 2016 (online), two federal reports, and excerpts from debates in the House of Commons (paras. 65-67). While these sources form part of the relevant backdrop, they are not a proxy for serious judicial scrutiny of the Act and, in particular, of Part 2 — the slightest attention to which reveals, as I have already described, that it does indeed have the potential to "take over the field of regulating GHG emissions" in the listed industries.

[329] The majority responds to this point by stating that some federal legislation — such as the legislation at issue in Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 837 ("2011 Securities Reference"), which allowed provinces to opt-in — does not necessarily apply nationally or create a minimum standard. Here, by contrast, the Act "applies in all the provinces at all times" (yet it is not a "blunt unified national system") (Chief Justice's reasons, at para. 81). This, says the majority, somehow legitimizes the inclusion of "minimum national standards" in its description of the Act's pith and substance (para. 81). With respect, this misses the critical point. It is not that all federal legislation imposes minimum national standards, but rather that, by operation of paramountcy and the territorial limits of provincial jurisdiction, only Parliament is capable of imposing minimum national standards. The inclusion of "minimum national standards" in the pith and substance of a federal statute effectively decides the jurisdictional dispute. While, as I have explained, it can be appropriate to include reference to the legislative means in the pith and substance, it is entirely inappropriate to short-circuit the analysis by describing the means as something that only federal legislative authority can undertake.

[330] In short, and remarkably, the majority barely acknowledges that this idea of describing the pith and substance of a statute in terms of "minimum national standards" might be the least bit controversial, saying nothing to justify it, either generally or specifically. Indeed, in the face of objections thereto from the parties, and majority and dissenting judgments at the courts of appeal, one can only surmise that the majority does not wish to truly engage the point. This may well be because the device of "minimum national standards" allows the majority to effectively bypass several steps of their diluted reformulation of the test for the national concern branch from Crown Zellerbach — a subject to which I return below.

[331] A final point about "minimum national standards". Even if "minimum national standards" represented anything meaningful for our purposes, the fact remains that Part 2 of the Act imposes no explicit standards, whether "minimum" or "national". Rather, it allows the federal Cabinet to selectively impose an array of carbon prices on an array of different trade-exposed industries, with the stated goal of maintaining their international competitiveness and minimizing carbon leakage.

[332] The Attorney General of Canada's reference to "integral" standards also has no relevance to identifying the Act's pith and substance. Determining whether the standards implemented through the Act are "integral" to reducing Canada's GHG emissions would require this Court to consider whether the standards set out in the Act are effective. Yet, as this Court has repeatedly maintained, "the efficacy of the law is not a valid consideration in the pith and substance analysis" (Ward, at para. 22). Indeed, "the wisdom or expediency or likely success of a particular policy expressed in legislation is not subject to judicial review" (Re: Anti-Inflation Act, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 373, at p. 425). Whether and to what extent any given standard is integral to reducing Canada's GHG emissions is a matter of policy that has no bearing on the constitutional question facing this Court.

[333] Without "minimum national standards" and "integral" to round out the characterization proposed by the Attorney General of Canada, we are left with "reducing nationwide GHG emissions" which — as a statement of the goal of the law without any reference to the means proposed to achieve it — obviously lacks the specificity necessary to enable classification. This Court's description of the Act's subject matter should provide "an abstract of [its] content, instancing the subjects or situations to which it applies and the ways it proposes to govern them" (Abel, at p. 490). In order to determine whether the federal government can enact any particular GHG emission "standard of stringency", we must describe, concisely but precisely, how that standard operates.

[334] Turning to the Attorney General of British Columbia's proposed characterization, without "minimum national standards", we are left with "allocat[ing] part of Canada's targets for GHG emissions reduction". However, as the Attorney General of Alberta points out, it is difficult to accept that the Act allocates part of Canada's overall targets when it "neither sets nor allocates any targets" at all (R.F., at para. 45). The Act imposes a fuel charge and gives the federal Cabinet policy levers to set carbon prices by industry. This is an odd way to allocate emissions reduction targets.

[335] For these reasons, Canada and British Columbia's proposed characterizations of the Act's pith and substance must be rejected. It is therefore necessary to analyze anew the purpose and effects of the law so as to characterize them appropriately.

(3) Purpose and Effects

[336] There is no real dispute about the Act's purpose. Its broad aim is to reduce Canada's GHG emissions to mitigate climate change. More narrowly, the Act's purpose is to change behaviour. Its preamble states that behavioral change "is necessary for effective action against climate change" and, further, that "the pricing of greenhouse gas emissions on a basis that increases over time is an appropriate and efficient way to create incentives for that behavioural change". The Act refers to Canada having made international commitments to reducing its GHG emissions.

[337] The difficulty with many of the submissions before us, however, including those of the Attorney General of Canada, is that they attempt to characterize the pith and substance of the Act as if Parts 1 and 2 were each doing the same thing in the same way. The majority's pith and substance analysis is based on the same premise (para. 71). This is both inexplicable and superficial. Inexplicable, because the two parts of the Act are not remotely similar to each other; Parliament could have set out each Part in its own statute. Indeed, doing so might have prompted the majority to consider the distinct operational features of each Part. And superficial, because it pays little attention to the regulations; where regulations have been passed, they can — and, here, should — be scrutinized to ascertain the true intent of the legislature (Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, at para. 84). While Part 1 of the Act increases the cost of producing, delivering, using, or importing fuels that produce GHG emissions (which is expected to be passed on to consumers through an increase in the ultimate retail cost of those fuels), Part 2 does something quite different: it increases the cost of certain industrial activities by charging large facilities for producing GHG emissions over prescribed limits based on their particular industry and production processes. Part 2 also alleviates the impact of carbon pricing on some industries, but not all: the OBPS covers only the emissions-intensive trade-exposed industries that carry out an activity that the federal Cabinet chooses to list in the regulations. Picking winners and losers in this way is the stuff of industrial policy, not carbon price stringency.

[338] It becomes even more difficult to reconcile Part 2 with the notion of carbon price stringency when considering the effects of the Regulations themselves. My colleague Rowe J. has comprehensively reviewed the provisions in the Act that empower the federal Cabinet to make regulations, and I endorse his analysis, to which I add this. The current regulations impose varying carbon costs on the industries subject to the OBPS. The present Regulations establish, by my count, 78 separate output-based standards across 38 industrial activities. As these output-based standards depend on a chosen level of stringency (to be decided based on competitiveness and carbon leakage concerns), the output-based standards — and thus the average cost per tonne of GHG emissions — varies for each of these activities. For example, the 2019 Regulatory Impact Analysis Statement indicates that a stringency of 95 percent of the average emissions intensity is prescribed for iron, steel and cement production, which (with an excess emissions charge of $40 per tonne of carbon emissions in 2021) sets an average carbon cost of $2 per tonne; a stringency of 90 percent is prescribed for refineries and petrochemical production, setting an average carbon cost of $4 per tonne; and a stringency of 80 percent is prescribed for mining, potash and bitumen production and upgrading, setting an average carbon cost of $8 per tonne (Canada Gazette, Part II, vol. 153, No. 14, July 10, 2019, at pp. 5387-88 and 5391).

[339] I stress Part 2 here because, in analysing the scale and sweep of discretion granted to the federal Cabinet under Part 2 of the Act, the majority vastly understates what Part 2 actually does. For example, after referring to the federal Cabinet's power under Part 2 to regulate and issue orders that take it deep into matters of industrial policy, the majority says that, like in Part 1, "no aspect of the discretion provided for in Part 2 permits the Governor in Council to regulate GHG emissions broadly or to regulate specific industries in any way other than by setting GHG emissions limits and pricing excess emissions across the country" (para. 76). But this ignores the detailed regulation-making powers in Part 2, including the federal Cabinet's discretion to set — on an industry-by-industry basis — output-based pricing standards under the Regulations, and to select which industries are exempt from having to pay the Part 1 fuel charge so as to preserve their international competitiveness. Rather than establish minimum national standards, therefore, it seems more correct to say that the Act empowers the federal Cabinet to establish variable and inconsistent standards for an array of different industrial activities.

[340] It follows from the foregoing that the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 of the Act ought to be characterized separately. And it also follows from the foregoing that the pith and substance of Part 1 of the Act is the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel. The pith and substance of Part 2 of the Act is the reduction of GHG emissions by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure.

B. Classification

[341] I now turn to determining the class of subjects — that is, the heads of power under our Constitution — to which each of the enactment's two dominant subject matters belongs. While the Attorney General of Canada and my colleagues in the majority have rushed directly to consider whether the Act's dominant subject matter fits within the national concern branch of POGG, doing so is unsound as a matter of constitutional methodology: generally, courts should look first to the enumerated powers, resorting to the residual POGG authority only if necessary (Hydro-Québec, at para. 110, per La Forest J.; see also Hogg, at pp. 17-4 to 17-7; and D. Gibson, "Measuring 'National Dimensions'" (1976), 7 Man. L.J. 15, at p. 17).

(1) Provincial Jurisdiction

[342] It must be remembered that the Act's entire scheme is premised on the provinces having jurisdiction to do precisely what Parliament has presumed to do in the Act — that is, to impose carbon pricing through a comparable scheme.

[343] Provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights authorized by s. 92(13) stands out as the most relevant source of legislative authority for the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 of the Act. Regulating trade and industrial activity, all within the boundaries of specified provinces, is indisputably captured by this broad head of power, which includes the regulation of business not coming within one of the enumerated federal heads of power, as well as, of course, the law of property and of contracts (Hogg, at pp. 21-2 to 21-3 and 21-8 to 21-10; Citizens Insurance Co. v. Parsons (1881), 7 App. Cas. 96 (P.C.), at p. 110; Lederman, at pp. 603-4). Indeed, as I have explained, the Act operates as a backstop, operating only where provincial legislative authority is not exercised, or not exercised in a manner acceptable to the federal Cabinet.

[344] The majority acknowledges the importance of s. 92(13), emphasizing its importance for Quebec. Ironically, as I shall explain below, that importance is reinforced by Quebec's conspicuous absence from s. 94's provision for the uniformity of laws governing property and civil rights — an important feature of the terms on which Quebec entered Confederation, and which the majority ignores. Further, the majority's meager appreciation of s. 92(13)'s significance is made evident both by the majority's description of it as a tool merely for preserving "regional and cultural diversity" (para. 210), and by the hard reality that, under this legislation, the authority of Quebec and the other provinces under s. 92(13) is now subordinate to federal authority. To announce that the new national concern test invented by the majority is both "rigorous" and a "meaningful constraint" on federal power does not make it so (para. 210). With respect, and as I shall also explain, the majority's new test, far from constraining federal authority, instead enables it to encroach on provincial authority, notably that under s. 92(13).

[345] The provincial residuum in s. 92(16), granting authority over all matters of a local or private nature, could also authorise Parts 1 and 2 of the Act in the alternative (Hogg, at pp. 21-4 to 21-5).

[346] Part 2 of the Act, as a deep foray into industrial policy, also falls within matters of provincial legislative authority granted by s. 92(10) over local works and undertakings. Also relevant to Part 2 of the Act — with its emphasis on heavy industrial emitters, trade exposure, and international competitiveness — is s. 92A. This head of power gives the provinces the exclusive jurisdiction to make laws in relation to the exploration, development, conservation, and management of non-renewable natural resources in the province. Though not intended to derogate from the existing powers of Parliament, the resource amendment fortifies the pre-existing provincial powers in this area and gives the provinces indirect taxation powers, and greater control over, their natural resources (W. D. Moull, "Section 92A of the Constitution Act, 1867" (1983), 61 Can. Bar Rev. 715, at p. 716; Ontario Hydro v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 327, at pp. 375-77; Westcoast Energy Inc. v. Canada (National Energy Board), [1998] 1 S.C.R. 322, at para. 84).

[347] The foregoing identification of several areas of provincial legislative authority over the dominant subject matter of a federal statute should — and, as a matter of this Court's constitutional methodology, always has — led this Court to the conclusion that the statute is ultra vires Parliament (barring application of the double aspect or ancillary powers doctrines). As McLachlin C.J. wrote for the majority in Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 453, at para. 19,

> [t]he first step in determining the validity of the amendments brought by by-law No. 260 is to identify their dominant characteristic. This is known as the "matter" of the legislation. Once the matter of the legislation has been determined, the next step is to assign this matter to one or more heads of legislative power. If the matter comes within one of the heads of power allocated to the provinces under the Constitution Act, 1867, then the impugned law is valid. If it does not, then the court must consider whether the prima facie invalid law is saved by the doctrine of ancillary powers. [Emphasis added; citations omitted.]

[348] And so, in this case the identification of several applicable provincial heads of power should truly be the end of the matter. This is because all such heads of power, including those I have just identified as applicable here, are, by the terms of s. 92 (and s. 92A(1)), matters over which provincial legislatures "may exclusively make Laws". And, by the terms of s. 91, the POGG power applies only "in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces". While the constitutional text of "not coming within the Classes of Subjects . . . assigned exclusively to . . . the Provinces" is recounted in passing by my colleagues in the majority, they give it no consideration (Chief Justice's reasons, at para. 89). Instead, they offer up bromides about the need to "maintain the autonomy of the provinces and respect the diversity of Confederation" (paras. 4, 48-50 and 89-90) — which assurances are belied by majority judgment's eliding of clear constitutional text that was intended to maintain that very provincial autonomy and diversity. The objection, therefore, remains unanswered: the exclusivity of provincial jurisdiction over matters falling under s. 92 is fundamental to the Canadian brand of federalism, and was a unique and deliberate choice by the makers of our Constitution who were concerned about federal overreach via the POGG power — a concern, until now, shared by this Court.

[349] The language of "peace, order, and good government" (often in the form of "peace, welfare, and good government", or "welfare, peace, and good government") was frequently included in Imperial constituting documents long before the Constitution Act, 1867 (appearing, for example, in the Royal Proclamation 1763 (G.B.), 3 Geo. 3 (reproduced in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 1); the Commission appointing James Murray, Captain General and Governor in Chief of the Province of Quebec, November 21, 1763 (reproduced in Sessional Papers, vol. XLI, 3rd Sess., 10th Parl., 1907, No. 18, at p. 128); the Quebec Act, 1774 (G.B.), 14 Geo. 3, c. 83 (reproduced in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 2); An Act for the better regulating the Government of the Province of the Massachuset's Bay in New England (G.B.), 1774, 14 Geo. 3, c. 45; the Constitutional Act, 1791 (G.B.), 31 Geo. 3, c. 31 (reproduced in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 3); An Act to make temporary Provision for the Government of Lower Canada (U.K.), 1838, 1 & 2 Vict., c. 9; the Union Act, 1840 (U.K.), 3 & 4 Vict., c. 35 (reproduced in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 4); An Act to provide for the Government of British Columbia (U.K.), 1858, 21 & 22 Vict., c. 99; and the Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865 (U.K.), 28 & 29 Vict., c. 63). (See, generally, S. Reid and M. Scott, Interpretative note on the terms "Peace, order and good government" and "Peace, welfare and good government", April 7, 2020 (online).)

[350] What is different, however, about s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 is the caveat that laws made under the POGG power may "not com[e] within the Classes of Subjects . . . assigned exclusively to . . . the Provinces". While the above-listed constitutional documents all contain a caveat, it was to the effect that the law-making power being conferred should not be exercised in a manner inconsistent with the laws of the Imperial Parliament. For example, the Royal Proclamation cautioned that laws enacted for the "Peace, Welfare, and good Government" should be "as near as may be agreeable to the Laws of England". But our Constitution imposed a new kind of caveat, by its terms clearly designed to preserve the integrity of provincial legislative authority. And it makes clear that the federal law-making authority for the peace, order, and good government of Canada was intended to be subject to the division of powers. Within their areas of legislative authority, provinces are not only sovereign, but exclusively so. Hence the constitutional impossibility of the Act's backstop model: if the provinces have jurisdiction to do what the Act does — and, that is, again, the very premise of the Act's scheme — then the Act cannot be constitutional under the national concern branch of POGG.

[351] Again, my colleagues in the majority do not grapple with this fundamental objection, despite accepting that the provinces have the jurisdiction under ss. 92(13) and (16) and 92A to do precisely what the Act does (para. 197). Instead, they accept the submissions of the Attorneys General of Canada and of British Columbia that something else is going on here, that some aspect of the Act is truly and distinctly national in scope and lies outside provincial jurisdiction which can be regulated by Parliament under the POGG residual authority over matters of national concern. While these submissions are premised on what I have explained is an inadequate description of the pith and substance of the Act, I now turn to show that this view is unsustainable on this Court's jurisprudence.

(2) The National Concern Branch of POGG

(a) Defining the Matter of National Concern

[352] The Attorneys General of Canada and British Columbia urge us to find that their proposed characterizations of the pith and substance of the Act are one and the same as the matters of national concern falling under the POGG power. This point reveals a lack of clarity in the jurisprudence, stemming from the particular way in which the division of powers analysis proceeds under POGG relative to the enumerated heads of power under s. 91. As I have explained, where an enumerated head of power is relied upon, the pith and substance of the impugned law is identified at the characterization step (for instance, "enhancing public safety by controlling access to firearms through prohibitions and penalties" in Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 783, at para. 4), and that pith and substance is then classified under a head of power or class of subjects (in that case, the criminal law power in s. 91(27)).

[353] The analysis proceeds somewhat differently, however, where, as here, Parliament relies upon the national concern branch of POGG as the source of its authority to legislate. After identifying the pith and substance of the impugned law, and after deciding that it does not fall under an enumerated head of power, the reviewing court must then consider whether the matter said to be of national concern satisfies the requirements stated in Crown Zellerbach. If so, the matter is placed under exclusive and permanent federal jurisdiction. The question arises, however, whether the pith and substance of the impugned legislation should or can be coextensive with the matter of national concern, or whether the matter of national concern should or can be broader than the pith and substance of the legislation. The POGG jurisprudence offers little guidance on this point. The cases have described the matters of national concern both broadly (as in Johannesson v. Municipality of West St. Paul, [1952] 1 S.C.R. 292 (aeronautics) and Ontario Hydro (atomic energy)) and narrowly (as in Munro v. National Capital Commission, [1966] S.C.R. 663 (the development, conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region in accordance with a coherent plan)), depending on the particular question to be resolved. What the cases have not done — with the possible exception of Crown Zellerbach — is include, within the description of the matter of national concern, the legislative means of the particular statute under review. (In Crown Zellerbach, the matter of national concern is described at p. 436 as both "[m]arine pollution" and "the control of marine pollution by the dumping of substances", although later cases have described the matter of national concern identified in Crown Zellerbach as only "marine pollution", without the additional reference to legislative means: see Hydro-Québec, at para. 115, and Friends of the Oldman River Society, at p. 64.)

[354] As a general proposition, if a proposed matter of national concern is described more narrowly — for instance, by including legislative means — it will be easier for that matter to qualify under the test for applying the national concern doctrine stated in Crown Zellerbach. This is because, again generally, it is easier to demonstrate that a narrowly defined matter has a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern. And, of course, the narrower the matter, the less the impact on provincial jurisdiction. The majority accepts the proposition that identifying the matter of national concern is simply a matter of identifying the pith and substance of the statute under review, which can, as here, include legislative means. Indeed, the majority says it must be so; one must always be the same as the other (paras. 115-16). But accepting this view effectively confines Parliament to that particular legislative means in responding to the matter of national concern. This would be unprecedented and undesirable. The arguments of the Attorneys General of Canada and of British Columbia illustrate this point.

[355] The Attorney General of Canada urges us to find that the matter of national concern to be recognized under POGG is precisely the same as its proposed pith and substance of the law, namely, "establishing minimum national standards integral to reducing nationwide GHG emissions". The Attorney General of British Columbia similarly urges us to accept the matter of national concern in the same terms as his proposed pith and substance of the law: ". . . establishing minimum national pricing standards to allocate part of Canada's targets for GHG emissions reduction". To be clear, then, each of these submissions couple a description of the legislative means (minimum national standards) with the purpose of the law.

[356] Considering first the Attorney General of Canada's proposed matter of national concern, I have already explained that it is not a court's place to consider whether regulatory measures are "effective" or "integral". Doing so is no more appropriate at the classification step than it is at the characterization step — and, in any event, the efficacy of legislation is irrelevant to distinguishing an area of distinctly federal jurisdiction from that of provincial jurisdiction. What is of greater significance here is the invocation, common to the proposals of the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorney General of British Columbia, of "minimum national standards". As I have also explained, when used to characterize the pith and substance of the Act, this phrase is empty and misleading, and it can be rejected for that reason alone. But reliance upon "minimum national standards" is even less tenable as a proposed matter of national concern. Indeed, its acceptance as such would work pernicious effects on federalism.

[357] By way of explanation, the Attorney General of Canada urges us in his factum to find that a matter formerly under provincial jurisdiction is "transformed" (how, he does not say) into a matter of national concern when "minimum national standards" are invoked. This is simply not possible. Were it so, Parliament could unilaterally create an area of distinctly federal jurisdiction from matters that fall within exclusive provincial jurisdiction simply by doing the very thing that exclusive provincial jurisdiction was intended to preclude: legislating a national standard in respect of that matter. So understood, every subject matter listed under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 could be viewed as having a national component. The possibilities are endless: "minimum national standards" governing hospital and health care administration; "minimum national standards" governing the availability of bilingual municipal services; "minimum national standards" governing the location or construction of hydroelectric generating stations; "minimal national standards" of second-language education in public schools; or "minimum national standards" governing the content of public school courses in 18th century Canadian history.

[358] For this to serve as a basis for recognizing that some aspect of an area of provincial jurisdiction is truly and distinctly "national" in scope, and therefore actually lies outside provincial jurisdiction, "is to create something out of nothing and to subject every area of provincial jurisdiction to the potential setting of national standards that denude provincial power" (D. Newman, "Federalism, Subsidiarity, and Carbon Taxes" (2019), 82 Sask. L. Rev. 187, at p. 199). It represents a model of supervisory federalism. This is all but acknowledged by my majoritarian colleagues who, in minimizing the Act's effects on provincial authority, repeatedly stress that provinces are "free" to "implement their own GHG pricing mechanisms", to "prescribe any rules for provincial pricing mechanisms", to "design and legislate any GHG pricing system", or to "design any GHG pricing system they choose" — but then adding, every time, the caveat "as long as" (or "provided") they are "sufficiently stringent" to meet "the federally-designated standards", or "targets" (paras. 27, 61, 65, 72, 79, 81, 178, 179, 183, 186, 200 and 206 (emphasis added)). In other words, the provinces can exercise their jurisdiction however they like, as long as they do so in a manner that the federal Cabinet also likes. And yet, "[e]nsuring provincial compliance with Parliament's wishes" is hardly an appropriate basis for recognizing a new matter of national concern (J. Hunter, "Saving the Planet Doesn't Mean You Can't Save the Federation: Greenhouse Gases Are Not a Matter of National Concern" (2021), 100 S.C.L.R. (2d) 59, at p. 79).

[359] Much the same can be said about British Columbia's submission that "allocat[ing] part of Canada's targets for GHG emissions reduction" is an appropriate matter of national concern. As I have already explained, this is not an accurate description of the pith and substance of the Act. More to the point, however, the notion of allocating national targets encounters the same objection as Canada's minimum national standards: it is an artifice which, once grafted onto matters that are plainly of provincial jurisdiction (as the backstop scheme of the Act itself contemplates) adds nothing. And like minimum national standards, it can be applied to open up any area of provincial jurisdiction to unconstitutional federal intrusion once Parliament decides to legislate uniform treatment in the form of mandatory, national "targets". In this sense, there is no difference between Parliament legislating national standards and legislating national targets.

[360] British Columbia responds to this concern by raising the provincial inability test, coupled with a submission that, in most areas of provincial jurisdiction, there is no need for Parliament to interfere by enacting national targets. This is because, the argument goes, provincial legislation on such matters — for instance, education — has primarily intra-provincial impacts, such that the costs and benefits of the legislature's policy choice are felt principally within the province. Education is therefore said to be unlike GHG emissions, since minimum national standards in education "would not indivisibly address a provincial inability" (A.F., Attorney General of British Columbia, at para. 49).

[361] But this submission misconceives the proper focus of the provincial inability test, a subject to which I will return below. For now, it suffices to observe that the existence of extra-provincial impacts does not mean that uniform legislative treatment is truly essential — as is made clear by considering, with reference to Anti-Inflation, the extra-provincial inflationary impacts of intra-provincial economic activities. It hardly seems likely that a similarly imaginative argument in that case about imposing "minimum national standards" or "allocating national targets" related to the containment and reduction of inflation would have moved Beetz J. from his conclusion that inflation was inappropriate as a matter of national concern.

[362] More fundamentally, I reject the idea that adding "minimum national standards" or the "allocation of nationwide targets" to a proposed matter creates or identifies a distinctly federal aspect of that matter. On this point, various parties invoked the concept of "systemic risk", borrowed from the securities references — as indeed does the majority (at paras. 176 and 182) — to support a finding that the proposed matter met the requirements of the provincial inability test. In the 2011 Securities Reference, this Court accepted that federal securities legislation engaged trade as a whole (as is required under the trade and commerce power), but nevertheless found that the law went too far by delving into "detailed regulation of all aspects of trading in securities, a matter that has long been viewed as provincial" (para. 114 (emphasis in original)). A more focussed law that was "limited to addressing issues and risk of a systemic nature that may represent a material threat to the stability of Canada's financial system" was later upheld in the Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, 2018 SCC 48, [2018] 3 S.C.R. 189 ("2018 Securities Reference") because "the regulation of systemic risk in capital markets goes to promoting the stability of the economy generally, not the stability of one economic sector in particular" (para. 111 (emphasis in original)).

[363] The submission that the proposed matter is suitable as a matter of national concern because it addresses the systemic risks of climate change has superficial appeal. But this ignores fundamental differences between the respective analyses under the POGG national concern doctrine and under the s. 91(2) trade and commerce power. The federal power to regulate trade and commerce has no requirement for singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility. On the contrary, subjects like competition law or systemic risk to capital markets can be diffuse and permeate the economy as a whole, and yet still validly fall under the federal trade and commerce power (see, for instance, para. 87 of the 2011 Securities Reference, which discusses the diffuse nature of the competition law that was at issue in General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 641). "Systemic risk" is, therefore, an ill-fitting concept to borrow from the s. 91(2) analysis.

[364] Finally, I note that, in advancing an expansive national concern doctrine so as to augment federal power, both the Attorney General of Canada and the majority rush past s. 94 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which provides that "the Parliament of Canada may make Provision for the Uniformity of all or any of the Laws relative to Property and Civil Rights". As that section makes clear, the Constitution already contemplates that Parliament might wish to enact uniform laws related to property and civil rights in the provinces, as it does by the Act. But s. 94 also imposes certain constraints: it does not apply to Quebec and, in the provinces where it does apply, it requires the consent of the provincial legislatures.

[365] In other words, in bypassing s. 94 so as to embrace their centralized vision of Canadian federalism, both the Attorney General of Canada and the majority would (1) strip Quebec of its protection from federally imposed uniformity of laws relative to property and civil rights, and (2) write out of the Constitution the requirement for provincial consent elsewhere. This deprives the provinces, and Quebec in particular, of part of the bargain negotiated among the partners, without which "the agreement of the delegates from Canada East . . . could [not] have been obtained" (Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at paras. 36-37). As the Privy Council recognized more generally in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion, [1896] A.C. 348, at p. 361, s. 94 "would be idle and abortive, if it were held that the Parliament of Canada derives jurisdiction from the introductory provisions of s. 91, to deal with any matter which is in substance local or provincial, and does not truly affect the interest of the Dominion as a whole".

[366] It is no simple matter to tinker with the Constitution. This is why that task is left by the amending formula to legislatures, who can deliberate upon the complexities in depth, and not to courts which lack the necessary institutional competencies to navigate those complexities — as here, where, by engorging federal power as it does under the residual POGG power, the majority not only risks doing violence to s. 92 (and, for that matter, to s. 92A), but also trips over s. 94.

[367] This goes to a more fundamental point. As I will discuss below, both the Attorney General of Canada and the majority speak of a "balance" — the Attorney General of striking a "balance of federalism", and the majority of a "federal-provincial balance" (R.F., at para. 69 (emphasis deleted); Chief Justice's reasons, at paras. 102, 117 and 134). But what my colleagues in the majority do not appreciate is that they are undoing a balance. And that is because, as difficult as it may be for them to accept, the "balance" that they presume to strike, and that they would have the judiciary strike in future cases, has already been struck by Part VI of the Constitution Act, 1867 ("Distribution of Legislative Powers"). The role of the courts is not to strike a balance, but to maintain and preserve the balance that is already recorded by our Constitution in its division of powers. As this Court wrote in Reference re Firearms Act, "it is beyond debate that an appropriate balance must be maintained between the federal and provincial heads of power" (para. 48 (emphasis added)). Section 94, like ss. 91 and 92, is part of a larger package that itself, and as a whole, reflects a "balance" that was agreed to by both the federal and provincial levels of government or their colonial predecessors.

[368] Of course, re-balancing may occasionally be desirable or necessary — hence, for example, the negotiations that led to s. 92A, and hence certain particulars of the amending formula. But when that need arises, if it arises, it is not in the gift of either the Attorney General of Canada or of the Court to meet it. Indeed, their attempting to do so simply upsets the balance — by, as here, effectively stripping Quebec of an immunity held for over 150 years under the Constitution of Canada, which immunity protected, among other things, Quebec's rights to the use of civil law in private matters, guaranteed nearly 250 years ago by the Quebec Act.

[369] For all these reasons, the matters of national concern proposed by the Attorneys General of Canada and British Columbia are constitutionally untenable. While it is unnecessary to resolve here the question of whether a newly recognized matter of national concern under POGG can ever be so narrowly defined to encompass only the pith and substance of the impugned law (and including the legislative means), I offer the following observations. As noted by Huscroft J.A., in dissent, describing the new matter of national concern so narrowly in effect constitutionalizes the law under review, and the particular means it adopts (2019 ONCA 544, 146 O.R. (3d) 65, at para. 224). It also risks the analysis devolving into results-oriented thinking, which must be avoided in the division of powers analysis (Chatterjee, at para. 16). Further, Crown Zellerbach suggests that the broader approach is appropriate. Recall that once a matter is recognized to be of national concern under POGG, Parliament is granted an "exclusive jurisdiction of a plenary nature to legislate in relation to that matter, including its intra-provincial aspects" (para. 433). This language suggests that, in relation to a matter of national concern, Parliament is granted a scope of jurisdiction — and the ability to employ means — beyond that specifically contemplated by the law under review.

[370] All this said, I decline to conclude that, as a general proposition, it would never be appropriate to describe a matter of national concern so narrowly as to encompass only the law under review and the legislative means it employs. Still, in the case at bar, a broad characterization of the national concern is unavoidable. Defining a matter of national concern that encompasses both the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel (Part 1) and the reduction of GHG emissions by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure (Part 2) requires broad strokes. The legislative means employed by Parts 1 and 2 are mutually distinct. Indeed, each is quite different from the other, sharing only a purpose: the reduction of GHG emissions. This, and my conclusion stated above that the definition of the matter of national concern should not tie Parliament to a particular legislative means, tend to support the identification of the matter said to be of national concern as the purpose of the Act: the reduction of GHG emissions. The only remaining question, then, is whether the reduction of GHG emissions satisfies the test stated in Crown Zellerbach for a valid national concern.

(b) Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[371] "The reduction of GHG emissions" does not meet the requirements of Crown Zellerbach. This would be so, even if it were appropriate to consider each of the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 as proposed matters of national concern, since the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel (Part 1) and by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure (Part 2) each fail to meet the requirement of distinctiveness. Neither of these matters is distinct from matters falling under provincial jurisdiction under s. 92. I begin, therefore, by considering why the pith and substance of each of Parts 1 and 2, respectively, fail to meet the requirement of distinctiveness (even if they were appropriate matters of national concern). Then, I consider why the proper matter of national concern as I understand it ("the reduction of GHG emissions") fails to meet the requirements of singleness and indivisibility.

(i) The Pith and Substance of Each Part Is Not Distinct

[372] Here again, the backstop model of the Act is of significance. The principal difficulty in finding that the reduction of GHG emissions (whether by raising the cost of fuel, or by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure) has the requisite distinctiveness to be recognized as a matter of national concern is illustrated by the very quality of the scheme that Parliament has legislated. Through the Act, Parliament encourages provinces to enact substantially the same scheme to serve the same regulatory purpose of altering behaviour. Again, this demonstrates that Parliament has legislated in respect of a matter that falls within provincial legislative authority, specifically, ss. 92(10) (local works and undertakings), (13) (property and civil rights), (16) (matters of a local nature) and 92A (natural resources). The Act's backstop scheme admits of no other conclusion (Newman, at p. 197). This is much like Hydro-Québec, where the legislation contained no opt-out for the provinces, but rather empowered the Governor in Council to exempt provinces that had equivalent regulations in force (para. 57, per Lamer C.J. and Iacobucci J., dissenting, but not on this point). The observations of Lamer C.J. and Iacobucci J. on this point are therefore apposite:

> The s. 34(6) equivalency provision also implicitly undermines the appellant's submission that the provinces are incapable of regulating toxic substances. If the provinces were unable to regulate, there would be even more reason for the federal government not to agree to withdraw from the field. Section 34(6) demonstrates that the broad subject matter of regulating toxic substances, as defined by the Act, is inherently or potentially divisible. [para. 77]

[373] Proponents of the Act urge us to find that, even if the Act and provincially legislated GHG pricing schemes address the same matter, they each address different aspects of that matter. This argument rests on the applicability of the double aspect doctrine, whose application here the majority not only accepts but describes as inevitable whenever minimum national standards are employed (Chief Justice's reasons, at paras. 125-31). But the majority is simply wrong — the double aspect doctrine has no application here.

[374] The double aspect doctrine arose because "some matters are by their very nature impossible to categorize under a single head of power: they may have both provincial and federal aspects" (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 30). It therefore contemplates that "both Parliament and the provincial legislatures can adopt valid legislation on a single subject depending on the perspective from which the legislation is considered, that is, depending on the various 'aspects' of the 'matter' in question" (para. 30). Whether the doctrine applies to the national concern doctrine of POGG is a question of some controversy, given this Court's statement in Crown Zellerbach that Parliament acquires "exclusive jurisdiction of a plenary nature to legislate in relation to" the matter of national concern (p. 433; see, for instance, Lacombe, at paras. 26-27). Assuming without deciding, however, that the double aspect doctrine may, in some instances, apply to matters of national concern recognized as such under POGG, it has no application here.

[375] As the provinces clearly have jurisdiction to establish standards of GHG price stringency in the province, this leaves as the only difference between the federal aspect and the provincial aspect "minimum national standards". Obviously, adopting "minimum national standards" as part of the matter of national concern allows the majority to invoke the double aspect doctrine, since it has defined the matter in terms of something (enacting "national standards") which, as a practical matter, only Parliament could possibly do. And just as obviously, when the matter is defined in terms of something only Parliament could possibly do, whatever it is that the provinces are doing must be something different. This reasoning, however, could easily be applied to create federal "aspects" of all sorts of matters falling within provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, the majority suggests just that, acknowledging that whenever the device of "minimum national standards" is used, a double aspect "will inevitably result" (para. 129).

[376] The device of minimum national standards, combined with the double aspect doctrine, artificially meets many aspects of the Crown Zellerbach test, as diluted by the majority. By definition, "minimum national standards", being national, would presumably, and in every case, qualify as "qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern" and as "predominantly extraprovincial . . . in character" (Chief Justice's reasons, at para. 148). And, of course provinces, being provinces, are unable to establish binding minimum national standards (para. 182). Further, because the Act leaves the provinces free to adopt their own schemes as long as (or provided) they meet federal approval, the impact on provincial jurisdiction is "qualified and limited" (paras. 198, 205 and 211). In short, the device of "minimum national standards", where applied, deprives the majority's framework of much of its "exacting" quality.

[377] It is, however, this simple. While the double aspect doctrine "allows for the concurrent application of both federal and provincial legislation, . . . it does not create concurrent jurisdiction" (2011 Securities Reference, at para. 66 (underlining added)). Like the POGG power itself, the double aspect doctrine must be carefully constrained and applied with caution, because its casual and undisciplined application in the majority's reasons runs the near-certain risk that ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 will be merged into a "concurrent field of powers governed solely by the rule of paramountcy of federal legislation" (Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 749, at p. 766). It was for this very reason, in Bell Canada, that Beetz J. cautioned that the doctrine "must not be [used] to create concurrent fields of jurisdiction . . . in which Parliament and the legislatures may legislate on the same aspect"; rather, it must be applied only "where the multiplicity of aspects is real and not merely nominal" (p. 766 (emphasis in original)).

[378] Nearly all of the parties and intervenor Attorneys General — aside from the Attorneys General of Canada, New Brunswick and British Columbia — expressed concerns about the application of the double aspect doctrine here. The Attorney General of Quebec offers a particularly compelling and constitutionally sound encapsulation of the problem with the majority's invocation of the double aspect doctrine in this case, and of the damage to the federation that will follow. The Attorney General of Quebec — no stranger to carbon pricing and legislative action to mitigate climate change — says that the proposed matter does not contemplate two aspects of the same matter; rather, it contemplates the same aspect of the same matter. And because the provinces may legislate in this area only where such legislation meets the criteria unilaterally set by the federal government, defining the matter so as to artificially conjure a double aspect effectively amounts to a transfer of jurisdiction from the provinces to the federal government. This was, of course, also the point of the majority of the Court of Appeal of Alberta: the Act purports to do exactly what the provinces can do, and for precisely the same reason (2020 ABCA 74, 3 Alta. L.R. (7th) 1, at para. 209). There are simply no distinctly federal aspects of the reduction of GHG emissions that cannot be divided among the enumerated heads of power. And describing the imposition of "minimum national standards" as the distinctly federal aspect of the matter simply brings us back to the arguments that, as I have already explained, get the Attorney General of Canada nowhere. Since such matters fall squarely within provincial jurisdiction, they cannot be matters of "national concern", given that POGG is a residual power.

(ii) "The Reduction of GHG Emissions" Is Not Single or Indivisible

[379] It is, of course, true that aspects of "the reduction of GHG emissions" may be distinct from matters listed in s. 92. Like "inflation" or "the environment", its nature is inherently diffuse, and it therefore would not entirely fall within provincial jurisdiction. Aspects of "the reduction of GHG emissions" would likely come within, for instance, exclusive federal powers over trade and commerce, navigation and shipping, and interprovincial or international works and undertakings (ss. 91(2) and (10) and 92(10)).

[380] But this is of no assistance to the majority here. While aspects of "the reduction of GHG emissions" may be distinct from matters falling under s. 92, as a matter of national concern it still fails to meet the Crown Zellerbach requirements of singleness and indivisibility. In Crown Zellerbach, it was "not simply the possibility or likelihood of the movement of pollutants across [the boundary between the territorial sea and the internal marine waters of a state]", but "the difficulty of ascertaining by visual observation" that boundary that meant uniform legislative treatment was required for marine pollution (p. 437). This proposition could not be clearer. The matter was indivisible in that case not because pollutants might cross an invisible boundary; rather, the matter was indivisible because of the difficulty of knowing the source and physical location (federal territorial seas vs. provincial inland waters) of the pollution at any given time, and therefore whose regulatory and penal provisions might apply.

[381] Here, however, the territorial jurisdiction from which GHG emissions are emitted is readily identifiable. The matter is divisible, because whenever fuel is purchased, or an industrial activity is undertaken, no question arises as to physical location and, therefore, no difficulty arises in identifying whose jurisdiction might apply. Responsibility for the reduction of GHG emissions among the provinces can therefore be readily identified for regulation at the source of such emissions. This is not a concern which, absent exclusive federal jurisdiction, the provinces could not address. Rather, both Parliament and the provinces may within their respective spheres of legislative authority "operate in tandem" to reduce GHG emissions (Hydro-Québec, at para. 59). The reduction of GHG emissions therefore lacks the degree of unity required to qualify as an indivisible matter of national concern.

[382] My majoritarian colleagues say that I have overstated the regulatory uncertainty aspect of Le Dain J.'s reasoning in Crown Zellerbach. They say that there are many routes to establishing indivisibility (at para. 193), and I agree, as does my colleague Rowe J. (see para. 548). My point is not that regulatory uncertainty is a precondition to finding a matter of national concern. Rather, it is that, where the matter in question otherwise lacks specificity and unity — as is the case here, where the matter under consideration is the reduction of GHG emissions, as opposed to, for instance, the matter in Munro — the fact that harms may cross borders is not enough to make out indivisibility. Something more is required, and in Crown Zellerbach, that was the regulatory and penal uncertainty stemming from an inability to know the jurisdiction in which the pollution had been dumped (p. 437), since the crane depositing the woodwaste in that case was mobile, fixed as it was on a scow. That uncertainty is absent here, and so relying on cross-border harms is simply not enough to make out indivisibility. The emission of GHGs, whether from a factory or an automobile, can be connected to the source province. GHG emissions are therefore divisible. This understood, "nationwide GHG emissions" are nothing more than the sum of provincial and territorial GHG emissions (Hunter, at pp. 75-76).

[383] Of course, uniform legislative treatment in the area of GHG emissions reduction might be desirable, as it might assist Canada in meeting its international commitments in relation to GHG emission targets. But the desirability of uniform treatment is hardly the marker of a matter of national concern. Here, the non-participation of one province does not prevent any other province from reducing its own GHG emissions. While a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of GHG emissions may cause more emissions from that province to cross provincial boundaries, that is precisely what this Court held was insufficient to meet the requirement of indivisibility in Crown Zellerbach. To be clear, even if this could be said to meet the provincial inability test — that is, even if Crown Zellerbach could be read as understanding "provincial inability" as including a provincial failure to act — my conclusion on this point would not change. This is because, properly understood — and contrary to the framework developed by the majority — the provincial inability test is but one indicium of singleness and indivisibility.

[384] Further, I agree with the majority at the Court of Appeal of Alberta, at para. 324, that > there is no evidence on this record that anything any one province does or does not do with respect to the regulation of GHG emissions is going to cause any measurable harm to any other province now or in the foreseeable future. . . . The atmosphere that surrounds us all is affected largely by what is being done, or not being done, in other countries. Four large countries or groups of countries, the United States, China, India and the European Union generate, cumulatively, 55.5% of the world's GHG emissions.

[385] Obviously, uniform legislative treatment might be desirable in that it could alleviate concerns about carbon leakage. But, and again as the Court of Appeal of Alberta observed, the evidence on this record of the harms of interprovincial carbon leakage is equivocal at best. Indeed, it tends to suggest that, in most sectors and for most provincial economic activity, such concerns are insignificant (E. Beale, et al., Provincial Carbon Pricing and Competitiveness Pressures, November 2015 (online), at p. II; Working Group on Carbon Pricing Mechanisms, Final Report, fn. 23; Sask. C.A. reasons, at para. 155, per Richards C.J.S.). This falls well short of establishing the majority's peremptory assertion that uniform treatment is essential to address carbon leakage concerns (paras. 183 and 186). And in the absence of actual evidence on this point, the majority's implicit proposition that Part 2 of the Act is desirable to address concerns about carbon leakage asks us to judge the wisdom of this particular policy choice, something that has no bearing on the analysis.

[386] In sum, the reduction of GHG emissions as a matter of national concern fails to meet the requirements of singleness and indivisibility. Like the containment and reduction of inflation, the reduction of GHG emissions > is an aggregate of several subjects some of which form a substantial part of provincial jurisdiction. It is totally lacking in specificity. It is so pervasive that it knows no bounds. Its recognition as a federal head of power would render most provincial powers nugatory.

>
> (Anti-Inflation, at p. 458)

(c) Scale of Impact

[387] Even were the reduction of GHG emissions a single and indivisible area of jurisdiction, its impact on provincial jurisdiction would be of a scale that is completely irreconcilable with the division of powers.

[388] The power to legislate to reduce GHG emissions effectively authorizes an array of regulations, "the boundaries of [which] are limited only by the imagination" (Sask. C.A. reasons, at para. 128). It extends to the regulation of any activity that requires carbon-based fuel, including manufacturing, mining, agriculture, and transportation. Indeed, Part 2 of the Act, much like the impugned law in the 2011 Securities Reference, descends into the detailed regulation of industrial GHG emissions reduction by imposing different carbon prices on different industrial activities. As Huscroft J.A. recognized, in dissent, the power to create minimum standards for GHG emissions could potentially authorize minimum standards related to home heating and cooling, public transit, road design and use, fuel efficiency, manufacturing and farming prices (Ont. C.A. reasons, at para. 237).

[389] Unlike previously recognized matters of national concern, including aeronautics, the development and conservation of the national capital region, atomic energy and marine pollution, the power to legislate to reduce GHG emissions has the potential to undo Canada's division of powers. It is in this respect comparable to the broad topics of environmental regulation and inflation, which this Court has expressly refused to recognize as independent legislative subjects. GHG emissions simply cannot be treated as a single regulatory matter, "because no system in which one government was so powerful would be federal" (D. Gibson, "Constitutional Jurisdiction over Environmental Management in Canada" (1973), 23 U.T.L.J. 54, at p. 85).

[390] In an attempt to minimize the scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction, the Attorney General of British Columbia reminds us that the Act does not forbid any activity, but only increases the cost of certain activities. The Act, he argues, is not about regulation, but pricing; it does not allow the federal Cabinet to determine who may emit GHGs or set conditions on how they do it, but rather allows anyone to emit GHGs if they pay for it (A.F., at paras. 19-21). It follows, on this reasoning, that any impact on provincial jurisdiction is minimal, particularly compared to what it might have been had Parliament resorted to its criminal law power, for instance, to prohibit GHG emissions.

[391] The majority adopts this line of argument, describing "establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions" as an exclusively "pricing-based formulation" of the Act's pith and substance (para. 57). As it explains, "the focus of the [Act] is on national GHG pricing" (para. 60; see also para. 70). In so concluding, the majority stresses that "the [Act] does not require those to whom it applies to perform or refrain from performing specified GHG emitting activities", or "tell industries how they are to operate in order to reduce their GHG emissions" (para. 71). Rather, it says, the Act simply "require[s] persons to pay for engaging in specified activities that result in the emission of GHGs" (para. 71) — in other words, "just paying money".

[392] This view ignores two problems. First, "just paying money" is an odd way of describing the impact of a law. The goal of the financial charges — "just paying money" — is to influence behaviour, in this case both consumer and industrial. And that is precisely the point. As Canada's Ecofiscal Commission observed during oral submissions, Part 2 of the Act "uses pricing to achieve its environmental goals" (transcript, day 2, at p. 77). Further, poised as they are to affect the cost of fuel and dictate the viability of emissions-intensive trade-exposed industries, the charges imposed by the Act stand to have a profound effect on provincial jurisdiction and the division of powers.

[393] The point is that "just paying money" hardly captures the intended impact of the Act, let alone its potential impact. And yet, this is central to the efforts of the Act's proponents, including the majority, to downplay what the law actually does. Indeed, the majority takes matters even further, by stressing how minimally, in its view, the Act actually impacts provincial autonomy. Provinces, observes the majority, may still choose any type of carbon pricing regime they wish. "[F]lexibility and support for provincially designed GHG pricing schemes" remain the order of the day, and provinces are "free to design and legislate any GHG pricing system" they wish, "as long as", of course, their schemes are "sufficiently stringent" and meet the federally-designated standards (Chief Justice's reasons, at paras. 79 and 200 (emphasis added)). This leads to an impact on provincial jurisdiction that is, in their view, "strictly limited" (para. 200). This, like the flawed idea that the Act is just about paying money — as opposed to the discouragement or prohibition of an activity — informs much of the majority's classification analysis. It is simply unsustainable.

[394] The second problem with the "just paying money" line of defence is that the contrasting degree of potential impact on provincial jurisdiction of a hypothetical law validly promulgated under Parliament's criminal law power, or its taxation power for that matter, has absolutely no bearing on whether another matter should be recognized as a matter of national concern. Contrary to the submissions of the Attorneys General of Canada and British Columbia at the hearing of these appeals, the Constitution does not require provinces to happily accept a severe intrusion on their jurisdiction under POGG simply because Parliament could have passed a criminal law. Likewise, an intrusion into provincial jurisdiction is no less severe simply because it leaves the provinces with authority to enact more stringent regulatory requirements. This argument misses the point of the division of powers analysis, which — pace the majority — allows no recourse to balancing or proportionality considerations. The Constitution Act, 1867 does not permit federal overreach as long as it preserves provincial autonomy to the greatest extent possible. It sets out spheres of exclusive jurisdiction. It divides powers — exclusive powers — between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. And within their sphere of jurisdiction, the provincial legislatures are sovereign, which sovereignty connotes provincial power to act — or not act — as they see fit, not as long as they do so in a manner that finds approval at the federal Cabinet table (see H. Cyr, "Autonomy, Subsidiarity, Solidarity: Foundations of Cooperative Federalism" (2014), 23 Const. Forum 20, at pp. 21-22). The very idea of recognizing federal jurisdiction to legislate "minimum national standards" of matters falling within provincial jurisdiction is corrosive of Canadian federalism.

(3) Other Sources of Federal Legislative Authority

[395] While the Attorney General of Canada focused his submissions on the national concern doctrine, at the conclusion of his factum he pleads, in the alternative, that "Part 1 of the Act is validly enacted under Parliament's taxation power" and, further, that "the entire Act is validly enacted under the emergency branch of Parliament's POGG power, Parliament's criminal law power, or other existing heads of power, as argued by various Interveners" (R.F., at paras. 167-68 (emphasis added)). Yet, no actual argument is advanced by the Attorney General on any of those potential sources of Parliament's authority, or for that matter on anything other than the national concern branch of POGG. Indeed, that appears to have been the basis upon which Parliament understood itself as proceeding since, when asked during debate about the Act's constitutionality, the reply of the Minister of Environment and Climate Change was to identify that climate change was a "national concern" (Debates of the Senate, vol. 150, No. 275, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., April 2, 2019, at p. 7714 (Hon. Catherine McKenna)). But now, in a storm, any port will apparently do.

[396] Despite the Attorney General's evident lesser degree of commitment here, I now turn to address the various sources of federal authority "argued by various Interveners".

(a) Gap Branch of POGG

[397] Several interveners urged us to consider the gap branch of the POGG power as a possible source of federal jurisdiction for the Act. For instance, the intervener Athabasca Chipewyan First Nation submitted that the three branches of POGG must be read "fluidly" and that the "scientific newness" of climate change — being a matter unknown at the time of Confederation — should militate in favour of the validity of the Act. A version of this idea finds support in academic scholarship. Professor Newman, for instance, suggests that POGG's national concern branch and gap branch are one and the same (pp. 195-96 and fn. 47).

[398] I agree with Rowe J. that the case law does not support a distinction between the "gap" and "national concern" branches of POGG. Regardless of whether the "gap" branch is understood as housing "new" matters that did not exist at the time of Confederation or as requiring a lacuna in the text of the Constitution, all such matters must still pass the national concern test. As such, the scientific newness of climate change has no bearing on my analysis. As I have already explained, resort to this branch of POGG is not possible here, given that the pith and substance of each of Parts 1 and 2 of the Act are properly classified under provincial heads of power.

(b) Emergency Branch of POGG

[399] The emergency branch of POGG was also proposed as a possible basis for federal authority by several interveners including the David Suzuki Foundation, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Intergenerational Climate Coalition, the Athabasca Chipewyan First Nation, and the National Association of Women and the Law and Friends of the Earth. It is curious that the majority does not consider this, since its reasons speak in such terms, describing climate change as "an existential challenge[,] a threat of the highest order to the country, and indeed to the world" (para. 167; see also paras. 187, 190, 195 and 206). Further, the emergency branch's requirement of temporariness means that the majority's unconstitutional transfer of jurisdiction from the provinces to Parliament would do less damage to Canadian federalism, and for less time, lasting only until this crisis passes.

[400] It is a problem for the Act — although presumably a problem that Parliament could have corrected had it wished to proceed in reliance upon the emergency power — that it does not expressly provide for temporary operation. As I have already recounted, however, the Act by its terms is intended to change behaviour. The preamble to the Act anticipates what will follow: ". . . increased energy efficiency, . . . the use of cleaner energy, . . . the adoption of cleaner technologies and practices and . . . innovation . . . ." In other words, while the Act does not come with a "best before" date, it does contemplate an end. And while at the outset of an emergency it will often be difficult or impossible to identify with any precision when it might end, the emergency branch has been applied in circumstances where it is reasonably apparent that the emergency will, at some point, end. Indeed, the point of action is presumably to do what is necessary to ensure that the emergency will end. For that reason, "Invocation of exceptional measures is typically justified on the basis that the ordinary system is not up to handling the threat and that, once the crisis passes, the usual state of affairs can and will return" (S. Burningham, "The New Normal": COVID-19 and the Temporary Nature of Emergencies, June 4, 2020 (online) (emphasis added)).

[401] This is not to suggest that Parliament would have lacked "a rational basis" to act here, as required by the caselaw on the emergency branch. Rather, my point is that the Attorney General has not done the necessary (or any) work to show that Parliament justifiably relied upon its emergency power as a source of its authority. This stands in contrast to Anti-Inflation, where Parliament manifested such reliance (by specifying an expiration date), and where the Attorney General of Canada made full argument on the point (pp. 383-84 and 417-18).

[402] I should add that the intervener the David Suzuki Foundation urges us to find that the Act's temporary character is to be found in its preambular references to Canada's commitments under the Paris Agreement, U.N. Doc. FCCC/CP/2015/10/Add.1, December 12, 2015, and that those commitments come with the clear deadline of 2030. Hence, the intervener submits, the Act implies a 10-year timeline to achieve required reductions, and it urges us to read in that deadline, by designating an end date to the jurisdiction of Parliament to authorize the Act (I.F. (38663 and 38781), at para. 36). While this is an intriguing proposition, considering time-delimited jurisdiction in the emergency doctrine analysis would require a departure from this Court's jurisprudence. It would also ask this Court to attempt to forecast when a given emergency may end, an issue usually left to Parliament (and rightly so, given the relative institutional competencies). The current record before this Court is inadequate to support designating 2030 as a suitable end date, or any other year for that matter, for Parliament to lose legislative competency in this area.

[403] Furthermore, the role of this Court — the Attorney General of Canada's concluding sentences of his factum notwithstanding — is not to root around the Constitution or constitutional doctrine to scrounge up some basis, any basis, to rescue federal legislation. (This is particularly so where, as here, the exceptional residual authority of POGG is contemplated and the dominant subject matter of the impugned statute is consigned by our Constitution to the provinces.) The proper question to ask is, therefore, not whether the Act is potentially salvageable under the emergency branch of POGG, but rather whether Parliament, in passing the Act, did so relying on its legislative authority under the emergency branch of POGG. Both the response of the Minister of Environment and Climate Change to a question about the source of Parliament's authority, and the submissions of the Attorney General of Canada, make clear that it did not.

(c) Criminal Law

[404] The criminal law power can be addressed briefly. While the precise scope of this power remains uncertain in this Court's jurisprudence, it is tolerably clear that its exercise requires a legislated prohibition that is accompanied by a penalty and backed by a criminal law purpose (Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17, at para. 67). As I have explained, however, the pith and substance of the Act relates to a scheme of monetary disincentives intended to discourage, rather than prohibit, certain activity. The offences and penalties in the Act are incidental to its true regulatory nature and, accordingly, the criminal law power is not applicable.

(d) Taxation

[405] The Attorneys General of Saskatchewan and Ontario argue that Part 1 of the Act imposes a tax, and ask this Court to conclude that the Act violates the principle of no taxation without representation, which principle is guaranteed by s. 53 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (see Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Assn. v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 15, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 470, at para. 71).

[406] Section 91(3) of the Constitution Act, 1867 authorizes the federal government to raise money by any mode or system of taxation, which provides broad jurisdiction to impose both direct and indirect taxation. But as broad as the taxing authority is, it is "subject to the ordinary principles of classification and colourability that apply to all legislative powers" (Hogg, at p. 31-2 (footnotes omitted)). Not every monetary levy is a tax. While monetary measures that relate in pith and substance to the raising of revenue for federal purposes are classified as taxation (Re: Exported Natural Gas Tax, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 1004, at p. 1070; see also Westbank First Nation v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 134, at para. 30), other monetary measures are regulatory charges that must be supported by some other head of power (Westbank, at para. 23; Exported Natural Gas Tax, at p. 1068).

[407] This Court has stated the relevant criteria for distinguishing between a tax and a regulatory charge. One consideration applied in the most recent cases has been that regulatory charges are typically connected to a broader regulatory scheme (see, e.g., Westbank, at paras. 44-45; 620 Connaught Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2008 SCC 7, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 131, at paras. 30-47). And so here, the Attorneys General of Saskatchewan and Ontario argue that the fuel charge under Part 1 of the Act is not connected to a broader regulatory scheme. While that is so, it is not dispositive, since regulatory charges need not always be connected to a broader scheme. In particular, there are cases where the charge itself is the scheme (Westbank, at para. 32).

[408] What is dispositive, in my view, is whether the charge is implemented primarily for a regulatory purpose, as opposed to a revenue-raising purpose. If so, the charge should be considered regulatory (Westbank, at para. 32; Exported Natural Gas, at p. 1070). In Exported Natural Gas, this Court concluded that one such regulatory purpose is to generally discourage certain behaviour (p. 1075). While the Attorney General of Ontario argues that we should not be so quick to label charges as regulatory, the conclusion I reach supports Canada's division of powers. It "would afford the Dominion an easy passage into the Provincial domain" were every monetary measure to be regarded as a tax (Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, [1937] A.C. 355 (P.C.), at p. 367).

[409] As I have explained, the charges imposed by the Act, in pith and substance, relate to the regulatory purpose of changing behaviour, for the broader purpose of reducing GHG emissions. The Act's provisions reveal that it does not relate to the raising of revenue for federal purposes. It is therefore unnecessary to consider s. 53 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

(4) Broad Delegation to the Cabinet

[410] As a final comment to my analysis of the constitutionality of the Act, I observe that the provinces arguing against the Act's constitutionality placed significant emphasis on the scope of delegated authority found within it. This emphasis is understandable, as the sweep of delegation granted by the Act to the Cabinet is breathtakingly broad. Indeed, the Act goes so far as to delegate authority to amend portions of the Act itself through a Henry VIII clause (s. 168(3) and (4); see also Sask. C.A., at paras. 361-66, per Ottenbreit and Caldwell JJ.A., dissenting). The majority notes this, but then speaks reassuringly of how the federal Cabinet's discretion is constrained by the purposes of the Act and specific guidelines in the statute, and how any listing decision by federal Cabinet can be judicially reviewed (paras. 72-76).

[411] But this is an incomplete response. The majority does not mention that failure to comply with the purposes of an enabling statute such as the Act would signify not only that the impugned regulations are ultra vires the enabling statute, but that it may also be repugnant to the division of powers. Nor does the majority explain just how a court is to review regulations for compliance with the division of powers.

[412] Further, the examples given by the majority of how a regulation may fail to conform to the purposes of the Act are not enlightening. For example, the majority posits that federal Cabinet "could not list a fuel . . . that does not emit GHGs when burned" (para. 75). That may be so, but what the majority might also have wished to consider is the obvious possibility that the federal Cabinet will discriminate against provinces or industries in a way that has nothing to do with "establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions". Indeed, this is a particular risk with Part 2 which, as I have explained, does not exist to establish such standards.

[413] In the absence of useful guidance from the majority on this point, I endorse that provided by Rowe J., both as to the imperative that the division of powers — no less than the purposes of the Act — confines the exercise by the federal Cabinet of Parliament's delegated authority, and as to the appropriate methodology for reviewing regulations for compliance with the division of powers.

[414] Further, my brevity on this issue should not be taken as agreement with the majority's response to my colleague Côté J.'s reasons on this point. Indeed, the majority largely misses the point, treating the matter of the Henry VIII clause as simply one of administrative law (since regulatory decisions can be judicially reviewed), ignoring the potentially significant separation of powers concerns that Côté J. identifies. I see those concerns as raising serious questions which, given my conclusion on the Attorney General of Canada's reliance on the national concern doctrine, are unnecessary for me to decide here.

IV. Canada's Proposed "Modernization" of Crown Zellerbach

[415] While counsel before us did not advance this submission, the Attorney General of Canada urges us in his factum to "modernize" the national concern doctrine under POGG in an effort to make it easier for matters — including the one proposed here — to be recognized under the doctrine. I respond to it here because aspects of the proposal were adopted by my colleagues in the majority.

[416] Instead of speaking about a new matter or a provincial matter that has a national aspect, the Attorney General of Canada speaks of matters having been "transform[ed]" in a way that is "constitutionally significant" (R.F., at para. 69). How a matter is "transformed" — and, who or what does the "transforming" — is not explained. Nor is it explained what "constitutional significance" requires.

[417] This is, I observe with as much regret as astonishment, an unserious submission from the chief law officer of the federal Crown. The Attorney General of Canada has a responsibility to the whole country to support and act within, not ignore or undermine, Canada's federal structure: "Because the [Attorney General] is the chief law officer of a democratic government, she must be a guardian of the rule of law. As such, the [Attorney General] is held to a standard of accountability that is unique, that extends beyond the standard that applies to an ordinary litigant" (F. Hawkins, "Duties, Conflicts, and Politics in the Litigation Offices of the Attorney General" (2018), 12 J.P.P.L. 193, at p. 193). As noted by Professor K. Roach, "[t]he Constitution . . . imposes and entrenches special restraints and obligations on the government as part of the supreme law of the land" ("Not Just the Government's Lawyer: The Attorney General as Defender of the Rule of Law" (2006), 31 Queen's L.J. 598, at p. 610).

[418] Federalism is an essential feature of our Constitution. The Attorney General of Canada must defend it, not undermine it by casually and recklessly urging upon this Court some vaguely conceived notion of "transformation", so meaningless as to effectively deprive the provinces of the opportunity to respond substantively to it, but yet so clearly intended to effect the expansion of federal jurisdiction.

[419] Beyond the cant of "transformation", the most we have by way of a concrete proposal from the Attorney General on this point is that a national concern must be "distinctly national", as measured by the provincial inability test borrowed from the general branch of the federal trade and commerce power, and that it must be reconcilable with the division of powers (or, as the Attorney General now calls it, "the balance of federalism"; R.F., at para. 69 (emphasis deleted)).

[420] It is on the first of those considerations — that a national concern must be "distinctly national" — that I wish to focus, since it is embraced by the majority in its dilution of the Crown Zellerbach test (para. 177). This abandons this Court's jurisprudence, since — under Crown Zellerbach — provincial inability is but one indicator of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility, while under Canada's proposed framework it becomes the singular test for distinctiveness (R.F., at para. 70).

[421] The respective tests for provincial inability, as set down for the national concern branch of POGG in Crown Zellerbach and for the trade and commerce power in General Motors, are different from each other. In Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. described the provincial inability test as an inquiry into "the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspects of the matter", a threshold that would be met "whenever a significant aspect of a problem is beyond provincial reach because it falls within the jurisdiction of another province or of the federal Parliament" (p. 432, citing Gibson (1976), at p. 34). In General Motors, however, Dickson C.J. described the provincial inability test in the fourth and fifth factors of the analysis under the general branch of the federal trade and commerce power as follows: ". . . the legislation should be of a nature that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of enacting" and ". . . the failure to include one or more provinces or localities in a legislative scheme would jeopardize the successful operation of the scheme in other parts of the country" (p. 662).

[422] It is important to note that, despite being released one year after Crown Zellerbach, the Court in General Motors made no reference to Crown Zellerbach, or to its test for provincial inability under the national concern doctrine of POGG. Presumably, it did not occur to the Court to do so, since each test has its own aim, distinct from the other. The General Motors test for provincial inability focusses on the prospect of a legislative scheme not working unless it is national in scope. By contrast, the Crown Zellerbach test for provincial inability is firmly focussed on the nature of the problem as being one which cannot be overcome without national action. This is fatal to the Attorney General of Canada's submission. As I have already explained, while this Court held in the 2018 Securities Reference that legislation aimed at "systemic risk in capital markets" can meet the test for provincial inability under the General Motors factors (paras. 111, 113 and 115), it does not follow that "systemic risk in capital markets" is a matter sufficiently singular, distinctive and indivisible to make it an appropriately recognized matter of national concern under POGG. Legislation that passes the General Motors test can be aimed at a problem that is diffuse — such as the elimination of anti-competitive behaviour — yet still engage trade as a whole.

[423] Provincial inability, as an indicium of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility, was intended in Crown Zellerbach to confine POGG as a residual power by filtering matters that could fit under any enumerated head of power, including trade and commerce. The point is that, by its residual nature, the national concern branch of POGG must not include matters that satisfy the trade and commerce test. Hence, while the control of systemic risk was recognized as a valid federal objective under the trade and commerce power in the 2018 Securities Reference, it would not qualify as a national concern under POGG, failing under "distinctiveness" (since it falls under the trade and commerce power) and "indivisibility" (because of its pervasive and diffuse character).

[424] The Attorney General of Canada's argument on this point is also revealing. The proposed "modernized" framework includes the General Motors provincial inability test, squarely aimed at provincial legislative inability, as the sole criterion to determine whether a matter is "distinctly national". And this is because such a framework would support Canada's submission that the provinces acting in concert would be legislatively unable to pass mandatory minimum national standards related to GHG emissions. But such an approach ignores the important statement in Crown Zellerbach that the provincial inability test is but "one of the indicia for determining whether a matter has that character of singleness or indivisibility required to bring it within the national concern doctrine" (p. 434).

[425] As the above analysis suggests, Canada's proposed framework would make it easier for a matter to be recognized as a national concern under POGG whenever minimum national standards are said to be required. The departure from this Court's jurisprudence that Canada proposes — and that the majority pronounces — would therefore enable the federal government to more easily invade provincial jurisdiction, and has the potential to upset the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution.

[426] As Abella and Karakatsanis JJ. forcefully expressed in their concurring judgment in Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, the doctrine of "[s]tare decisis places significant limits on this Court's ability to overturn its precedents" (para. 255). While the Court was divided in Vavilov about whether those strictures were satisfied, the point is that horizontal stare decisis promotes certainty and predictability in the development of the law, contributes to the integrity of the judicial process and safeguards this Court's institutional legitimacy (paras. 260-61). If this applies to our statements of the law governing the standard by which judges review the decisions of administrative tribunals, it surely applies to our precedents on adjudicating the division of powers under the Constitution.

[427] In my view, the high threshold for departing from the long-established principles set down in Crown Zellerbach is not met here. And putting even that determinative consideration aside, at the very least, and for the sake of doctrinal clarity, I say with respect that the majority should acknowledge that it is completely re-writing the framework for the national concern branch of POGG. Instead, it insists upon linking its novel framework to Crown Zellerbach, as if its reasons represent not the confusing and confused eliding of the constraints of Crown Zellerbach that I will now demonstrate them to be, but as something of an inevitable and even obvious exegesis. I turn, then, to the majority's framework.

V. The Majority's Dilution of Crown Zellerbach

[428] The majority accepts aspects of the Attorney General of Canada's proposal to "modernize" the national concern doctrine, but takes it further still. And so — although this appears nowhere in this Court's judgment in Crown Zellerbach — the majority divines from that judgment, at paras. 142-66, the following "three-step process" (para. 132):

1) Threshold question: is the matter of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole to warrant consideration under the doctrine?

2) Singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility: as this is not a "readily applicable legal test", the two "principles" that follow must be satisfied (para. 146).

    a. First, the matter must be "specific and identifiable" and "qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern" (para. 146 (emphasis added)).

        Three factors or considerations may inform whether something is "qualitatively different":

        i. Whether "the matter is predominantly extraprovincial and international in its nature or its effects" (para. 151);

        ii. Whether international agreements related to the matter exist; and

        iii. Whether "the matter involves a federal legislative role that is distinct from and not duplicative of that of the provinces" (para. 151).

    b. Secondly, federal jurisdiction should be recognized "only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter" (para. 152).

        Three factors must be present:

        i. The "legislation should be of a nature that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of enacting" (para. 152);

        ii. The "failure to include one or more provinces or localities in a legislative scheme would jeopardize the successful operation of the scheme in other parts of the country" (para. 152); and

        iii. A "province's failure to deal with the matter must have grave extraprovincial consequences" (para. 153).

3) Scale of impact: this requires the court to balance the intrusion on provincial autonomy against the impact on other interests that will be affected if federal jurisdiction is not granted.

[429] As will be apparent from the above, the majority has accepted Canada's proposal that principles from the trade and commerce jurisprudence ought to be adopted into the national concern analysis. But the majority adds additional elements that were previously considered irrelevant to the national concern analysis. I will discuss each of them in turn.

A. "Threshold Question": Whether the Matter Is of Sufficient Concern to Canada as a Whole

[430] The majority's new framework requires a reviewing court to ask whether "the matter is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole to warrant consideration under the doctrine", which, we are told "invites a common-sense inquiry into the national importance of the proposed matter" (para. 142). While framed as "a threshold question", I observe that the importance of the matter implicitly permeates the entire analysis, reappearing in the majority's discussion of "scale of impact", where that step of the test is understood as an exercise in balancing "competing interests" (paras. 142 and 160).

[431] My colleague Rowe J. addresses why importance should not be a relevant consideration under "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility". It therefore suffices for me to stress two points here.

[432] First, the majority reasons appear to suffer from the misconception that, if a matter is important, it follows that it is a matter for Parliament and the federal government. This is remarkably dismissive of provincial jurisdiction. I agree with Professor Gibson, who says:

> If importance of the subject matter is the measure of "national dimensions" there can be little hope for federalism in Canada's future. Since there are very few functions of government which are not of great importance, to grant federal jurisdiction over all such functions would be to make the supposedly autonomous provincial legislatures mere "tenants at sufferance" of the federal Parliament.
> ((1976), at p. 31)

[433] Secondly, in considering the importance of the matter urged by the Attorney General of Canada, the majority emphasizes that carbon pricing is "a necessary tool", an "essential elemen[t]", and a "critical measure" (paras. 169-70). But these considerations have no bearing on the division of powers. I acknowledge that the majority might be taken as responding to this point by positioning this as only a "threshold" question. Even so understood, however, the majority's analysis allows the efficacy or wisdom of a policy choice to colour the analysis that follows. It is, in effect, a backdoor to injecting into the division of powers framework the judiciary's views of such matters. In a literal and dangerous sense, this risks politicizing the judiciary, pulling it (as here) into expressing views not on the constitutionality of one side or another on deeply contentious policy questions within the federation, but on their merits.

B. Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[434] The majority explains that the phrase "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" does not articulate a "readily applicable legal test" (para. 146). It should, the majority says, therefore be understood in light of two "animating" principles: ". . . first, federal jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine should be found to exist only over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern; and second, federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter" (para. 157).

(1) The First Principle: "A Specific and Identifiable Matter That Is Qualitatively Different From Matters of Provincial Concern"

[435] Under the principle that singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility will require "a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern", the majority identifies three factors "that properly inform th[e] analysis" of whether something is "qualitatively different" (paras. 146-47).

[436] The first factor is "whether [the matter] is predominantly extraprovincial and international in character, having regard both to its inherent nature and to its effects" (para. 148). It is far from clear what my colleagues in the majority understand by a matter's "inherent nature". They appear to equate it with a matter's "character and implications" (para. 173). But the meaning of a matter's "implications" is not explained (aside from a reference to "serious effects that can cross provincial boundaries", at para. 148). And identifying a matter's "predominantly extraprovincial and international . . . character" by considering its "inherent nature" appears to veer into presupposing the answer to the very question that the framework is intended to address: whether the matter is a national concern. None of this is helpful.

[437] The second factor is whether international agreements related to the matter exist (para. 149). This, as Rowe J. makes plain, undermines Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, [1937] A.C. 326 (P.C.). Further, it serves as no constraint whatsoever on the recognition of a national concern. That is, while the absence of international agreements will not militate against recognition of a national concern, the presence of such agreements — depending on their content — may support recognition of a national concern.

[438] The third factor is "whether the matter involves a federal legislative role that is distinct from and not duplicative of that of the provinces" (para. 151). Here, the majority says that this factor is satisfied, because the Act works "on a distinctly national basis" — echoing the language urged upon us by the Attorney General of Canada — in establishing minimum national standards to meet Canada's obligations under the Paris Agreement, which constitutes a federal role in pricing that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern (para. 177).

[439] In other words, the majority says that "minimum national standards" can qualify as a national concern under POGG because, inter alia, they work in a national way. But this simply illustrates how the concept of minimum national standards has been employed to create a federal aspect of the matter out of thin air. How else, after all, would national standards work, if not nationally? This consideration adds nothing to the analysis, and therefore achieves nothing except to facilitate the recognition of Parliament's legislative authority over a matter simply by casting Parliament as doing something that Parliament almost always does: legislating in a national way, by creating minimum national standards.

[440] None of this supports the majority's reference to having developed an "exacting" test with "meaningful barrier[s]" (para. 208). Rather, and as I have already observed, it is a departure from Crown Zellerbach that operates not to constrain the recognition of POGG matters, but effectively to facilitate it via the artifice of "minimum national standards".

[441] In its dilution of the national concern test, the majority has lost sight of what that test is supposed to achieve: the identification of matters that are distinctive (being different from those falling under any other enumerated power, and thus beyond the constitutional powers of the provinces to address), and indivisible (being a matter for which responsibility cannot be divided between Parliament and the provinces). While the majority's "principle" of "qualitativ[e] differen[ce] from matters of provincial concern" (para. 146) echoes Crown Zellerbach's requirement of distinctiveness, its three "factors" in effect adulterate that requirement to the point that there is no principle left. Almost any provincial head of power is open to federal intrusion simply by recasting the federal matter as one of "minimum national standards".

[442] This leaves, of course, Crown Zellerbach's requirement of indivisibility — which is nowhere accounted for in the majority's dilution. While the majority does caution that "the matter must not be an aggregate of provincial matters" and insists that the "requirement of indivisibility is given effect through [the two] principles" set out in their framework (at paras. 150 and 158), this does not capture the concerns of Beetz J. in Anti-Inflation. In that case, Beetz J. explained that matters like inflation are aggregates of subjects coming under federal and provincial jurisdiction, and that they lack a degree of unity that makes them indivisible. The point is that many matters, like inflation, are qualitatively distinct from provincial heads of power, but they still do not qualify as a national concern under POGG because they are not indivisible, since they can be divided between both orders of government. Yet, and as Rowe J. explains, the majority now allows for such matters to be subsumed under federal jurisdiction as a national concern, thereby discarding Beetz J.'s careful, compelling and (until now) important judgment in Anti-Inflation.

(2) The Second Principle: "Federal Jurisdiction Should Be Found to Exist Only Where the Evidence Establishes Provincial Inability to Deal With the Matter"

[443] The majority says that "federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter" (para. 152). The "starting point" for this analysis, says the majority, is the understanding of provincial inability stated in the fourth and fifth indicia from the General Motors test (para. 152). To this, they add that "a province's failure to deal with the matter must have grave extraprovincial consequences" (para. 153). These three factors must be satisfied to meet the criterion of provincial inability, which is now a necessary but insufficient condition for the recognition of a matter of national concern (para. 156).

[444] I have already described the problem with using principles from the trade and commerce jurisprudence in the national concern analysis in responding to the submissions on this point from the Attorney General of Canada, which is that reliance on the test governing the federal trade and commerce power is inappropriate; the tests for provincial inability are different, and the point of the provincial inability analysis was — before now — to filter out matters that could fit under any enumerated head of power, so that POGG would be truly residual. But there are other problems with this "principle", as stated by the majority.

[445] First, by forcing trade and commerce jurisprudence into the national concern test, the majority requires constitutional incapacity to establish provincial inability (para. 182). The majority analogizes to the 2018 Securities Reference, in which provincial legislation addressing systemic risk was considered unsustainable because of the ability of the provinces to withdraw at any time. But it will always be the case that provinces are unable to fetter themselves against future legislative action. This requirement is therefore meaningless.

[446] Secondly, in discussing the final requirement, the need for "grave extraprovincial consequences", the majority furnishes examples which are indeed grave, including serious harm to human life, contagious disease, and arms trafficking

[447] Finally, the majority also stresses the requirement of "grave extraprovincial consequences" as demonstrating the "exacting" nature of its test (paras. 155, 208-9 and 211). But this standard is peremptory, almost uselessly subjective and susceptible to change (as the majority's description of the extra-provincial harm in Munro as "meaningful" makes clear (para. 154)). And far from constraining federal intrusion, this standard effectively invites it into other areas of provincial jurisdiction whose exercise could also cause "grave extraprovincial consequences", such as public health and pandemic response (pace the majority's reference to "one province's failure to deal with health care", at para. 209), the management of provincial public lands, the construction of hydroelectric dams, the development and management of non-renewable and forestry resources, the inflationary effects of intra-provincial trade and commerce (including the regulation of wages and prices) and the management of prisons. Simply put, the gravity of the extra-provincial consequences should not and (until now) has not dictated the outcome of the provincial inability test.

[448] For my part, rather than dilute Crown Zellerbach so as to assure the Act's constitutionality, I consider myself bound by its understanding of provincial inability.

The reason why is illustrated by this Court's decision in Anti-Inflation. While controlling inflation could undoubtedly meet aspects of the provincial inability test — in the sense that part of the matter is beyond the scope of provincial legislative authority to address — this Court held that controlling inflation does not qualify as a matter of national concern, because it is divisible ("an aggregate of several subjects", at p. 458). In other words, it is possible for a matter to be characterized by provincial inability, while still failing to satisfy the requirement of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility. This surely means that, where extra-provincial effects are such that all or part of a matter is beyond provincial legislative power to address, this is an indicator — but no more — that the matter may be distinct from provincial jurisdiction and have extra-provincial aspects that are indivisible from its local and private aspects. In other words, the insight of Crown Zellerbach obtains: consistent with the residual nature of POGG, federal usurpation of what was formerly within provincial jurisdiction is possible only where a matter has become distinct from what the provinces can do, and yet cannot be separated from what the provinces can do. In such a case, resort to POGG, and in particular its national concern branch, is necessary to preserve the exhaustiveness of the division of powers.

C. Scale of Impact

[449] The final step in the majority's diluted reformulation of the test for national concern requires the reviewing court to determine "whether the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction is acceptable having regard to the impact on the interests that will be affected if Parliament is unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level" (para. 196). The "impact on provincial jurisdiction" is considered, then weighed against other "interests", which requires the court to "balance competing interests" (para. 160). This is yet another departure from Crown Zellerbach, in which this Court said that a matter of national concern must have "a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution" (p. 432). Curiously, while the majority cites to this passage, it then abandons it, seeking to reconcile the impact on provincial jurisdiction not with the division of powers, but with the importance that the reviewing judge ascribes to other "interests" (para. 206).

[450] The judicial role in federalism disputes is properly confined to identifying the boundaries set by the Constitution that separate federal from provincial jurisdiction. In the context of considering the "scale of impact", this entails looking to the scope of provincial powers affected and the impact on the relative autonomy of Parliament and provinces. It also requires carefully considering the contours of the matter said to be of national concern, as it is only where the matter has "ascertainable and reasonable limits" that it can be said to have "a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power" (Crown Zellerbach, at pp. 432 and 438). Determining the contours of jurisdiction and the effects of legislation is what courts do. The role of the judiciary, properly understood, does not extend to evaluating the importance of other interests that could be affected if the provinces are not supervised in the exercise of their jurisdiction. That is the stuff of policy-making, not adjudication. This distinction, which appears to elude the majority, was once thought uncontroversial at this Court (see Vriend v. Alberta, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 493, at para. 136).

[451] But the real problem with my colleagues' scale of impact analysis is their significant understatement of the intrusion into provincial jurisdiction effected by the Act. It will be recalled that the majority finds that the impact on provincial jurisdiction is limited, in part because the "impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate is minimal" and "strictly limited", since provinces "are free to design and legislate any GHG pricing system as long as it meets minimum national standards of price stringency" (paras. 199-200 (emphasis added)). As I have noted, this ignores the detailed industrial regulations authorized by Part 2 of the Act. But it also ignores that the federal benchmark is not static, and can be set to an increasingly stringent level so as to correspondingly narrow provincial jurisdiction in the field. It is only by ignoring such things that the majority is able to claim that the federal power that it recognizes here is "significantly less intrusive than [that recognized] in Crown Zellerbach" (para. 201).

[452] More fundamentally, and even if federalism were a thing whose terms were not constitutionally enshrined but could instead be judicially balanced, the majority's overall approach is not one of balance. Rather, the majority puts its thumb heavily on the federal side of the scale — by legitimating as a national concern the device of "minimum national standards" on matters of importance that otherwise fall within provincial jurisdiction, and by insisting that doing so still preserves provincial autonomy (as long as it is exercised in accordance with federal priorities). Parliament now knows how to ensure that the balance will always tip its way, whenever provinces choose to exercise their legislative authority in a way that impedes the federal agenda.

[453] Even the Attorney General of Canada was not so bold as to ask for a weighted scale, much less a redefined framework that accounts for other interests that should have no bearing on the division of powers. And yet, the majority has given him just that.

VI. Conclusion

[454] The Act's subject matter falls squarely within provincial jurisdiction. It cannot be supported by any source of federal legislative authority, and it is therefore ultra vires Parliament. This Court, a self-proclaimed "guardian of the constitution" should condemn, not endorse, the Attorney General of Canada's leveraging of the importance of climate change — and the relative popularity of Parliament's chosen policy response — to fundamentally alter the division of powers analysis under ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and, ultimately, the division of powers itself (Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, at p. 155).

[455] The majority's reasons for judgment are momentous, and their implications should be fully and soberly comprehended. This Court once maintained that the Constitution, underpinned as it is by the principle of federalism, "demands respect for the constitutional division of powers" (2011 Securities Reference, at para. 61; see also Reference re Secession of Quebec, at paras. 56 and 58). But in its unfortunate judgment, the majority discards that constitutionally faithful principle for a new, distinctly hierarchical and supervisory model of Canadian federalism, with two defining characteristics: (1) the subjection of provincial legislative authority to Parliament's overriding authority to establish "national standards" of how such authority may be exercised; and (2) the replacement of the constitutionally mandated division of powers with a judicially struck balance of power, which balance must account for other "interests".

[456] No province, and not even Parliament itself, ever agreed to — or even contemplated — either of these features. This is a model of federalism that rejects our Constitution and re-writes the rules of Confederation. Its implications go far beyond the Act, opening the door to federal intrusion — by way of the imposition of national standards — into all areas of provincial jurisdiction, including intra-provincial trade and commerce, health, and the management of natural resources. It is bound to lead to serious tensions in the federation. And all for no good reason, since Parliament could have achieved its goals in constitutionally valid ways. I dissent.

ROWE J. —

[457] The national concern doctrine is a residual power of last resort. I have come to this view through a close reading of R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., [1988] 1 S.C.R. 401, and the cases that preceded it. Faithful adherence to the doctrine leads inexorably to the conclusion that the national concern branch of the "Peace, Order, and good Government" ("POGG") power cannot be the basis for the constitutionality of the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, S.C. 2018, c. 12, s. 186 ("Act").

[458] My focus is mainly doctrinal. To attain the objectives sought by the federal structure, and for courts to be accountable to the public in how they exercise their power as umpires in federalism disputes, doctrinal coherence, clarity and predictability regarding the division of powers are essential (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 23; Quebec (Attorney General) v. 9147-0732 Québec inc., 2020 SCC 32, at para. 3).

[459] First, I discuss the principle of federalism and the division of powers: the starting point for a complete understanding of the national concern doctrine. Second, I discuss the residual and circumscribed nature of the POGG power, rooted in s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. While some commentators refer to the existence of three branches of POGG — gap, national concern, and emergency — in my view, the case law does not support a distinction between "gap" and "national concern", nor is such a distinction useful. Rather, what commentators refer to as "gap" and "national concern" is better understood as one manifestation of the cumulatively exhaustive nature of the division of powers, and the residual nature of POGG. Third, I apply this understanding to the national concern test set out in Crown Zellerbach, and interpret the concepts of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility", "provincial inability" and "scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction" accordingly (p. 432). The national concern doctrine applies only to matters that are distinct from those falling under provincial jurisdiction and that cannot be distributed between the existing powers of both orders of government. In addition, their recognition under POGG cannot upset the federal balance. Fourth, I compare this approach to the approach urged on us by the Attorney General of Canada. Finally, I address an entirely distinct matter: the methodology for reviewing regulations for compliance with the division of powers and how it may apply to regulations made under the Act. In the result, for these reasons and those of Justice Brown, which I adopt, the legislation is ultra vires in whole.

I. Federalism and the Division of Powers

[460] This case requires a careful consideration of one of the fundamental underlying principles animating the Canadian Constitution: federalism (Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 32). The "primary textual expression" of the principle of federalism can be found in the division of powers effected mainly by ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (Secession Reference, at para. 47; Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17 ("Reference re GNDA"), at para. 20).

[461] An essential characteristic of the distribution of powers is its exhaustiveness, which precludes legislative voids (Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, 2004 SCC 79, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 698, at para. 34; Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 693, at para. 44). Exhaustiveness reconciles parliamentary sovereignty and federalism: it ensures that there is no subject matter which cannot be legislated upon and that Canada, as a whole, is fully sovereign.

[462] The principle of federalism pursues some well-known objectives: "to reconcile unity with diversity, promote democratic participation by reserving meaningful powers to the local or regional level and to foster co-operation among governments and legislatures for the common good" (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 22). The distribution of powers, in turn, was not random; rather, it was designed to achieve these objectives. It accommodates diversity between provinces — by allocating considerable powers to provincial legislatures to allow them pursue their own interests — and their desire for unity — by granting powers to Parliament when they share a common interest (Secession Reference, at paras. 58-59; Reference re GNDA, at para. 21). The federal structure protects the separate identities of the provinces from being subsumed under a unitary state.

[463] The federal structure was an essential condition for Confederation. Many provinces would not have supported the project of Confederation without the adoption of a federal form (Secession Reference, at para. 37; see also Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, [1937] A.C. 326 (P.C.) ("Labour Conventions"), at pp. 351-53). In other words, "[w]ithout federalism, Canada could not have formed or endured" (Newfoundland and Labrador (Attorney General) v.

Uashaunnuat (Innu of Uashat and of Mani-Utenam), 2020 SCC 4, at para. 240, per Brown and Rowe JJ., dissenting). Consequently, courts interpreting the division of powers must be careful not "to dim or to whittle down" the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, and its underlying values, or "impose a new and different contract upon the federating bodies" through an exercise of interpretation (In re Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada, [1932] A.C. 54 (P.C.) ("Aeronautics Reference"), at p. 70).

[464] The Canadian federation guarantees the autonomy of both orders of government within their spheres of jurisdiction. Their relationship is one of coordination between equal partners, not subordination (Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 837 ("Securities Reference"), at para. 71; see also Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada v. Receiver-General of New Brunswick, [1892] A.C. 437 (P.C.), at pp. 442-43). The guarantee of provincial autonomy to facilitate the pursuit of collective goals has particular salience for a province like Quebec, "where the majority of the population is French-speaking, and which possesses a distinct culture" (Secession Reference, at para. 59; see also Labour Conventions, at pp. 351-52).

[465] Autonomy, rather than subordination, entails that provinces have the right to "legislate for themselves in respect of local conditions which may vary by as great a distance as separates the Atlantic from the Pacific" (Labour Conventions, at p. 352). As Professor Pigeon (as he then was) explained:

> The true concept of autonomy is thus like the true concept of freedom. It implies limitations, but it also implies free movement within the area bounded by the limitations: one no longer enjoys freedom when free to move in one direction only. It should therefore be realized that autonomy means the right of being different, of acting differently. This is what freedom means for the individual; it is also what it must mean for provincial legislatures and governments. There is no longer any real autonomy for them to the extent that they are actually compelled, economically or otherwise, to act according to a specified pattern. Just as freedom means for the individual the right of choosing his own objective so long as it is not illegal, autonomy means for a province the privilege of defining its own policies. [Emphasis added.]
> ("The Meaning of Provincial Autonomy" (1951), 29 Can. Bar Rev. 1126, at pp. 1132-33)

[466] Thus, federalism recognizes that "there may be different and equally legitimate majorities in different provinces and territories and at the federal level" (Secession Reference, at para. 66).

[467] Embracing differences between the provinces also has instrumental value. Allocating powers to the provinces may produce policies tailored to local realities, since provinces are "closest to the citizens affected and thus most responsive to their needs, to local distinctiveness, and to population diversity" (114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), 2001 SCC 40, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 241, at para. 3; see also D. Newman, "Federalism, Subsidiarity, and Carbon Taxes" (2019), 82 Sask. L. Rev. 187, at pp. 192-93). In addition, provinces can serve as "social laborator[ies]" when they enact innovative legislative policies that can be "tested" at the local level (P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp. (loose-leaf)), vol. 1, at s. 5.2, referring to New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262 (1932), at p. 311, per Brandeis J.).

[468] The judiciary is charged with delimiting the sovereignties of both orders of government, guided by the "lodestar" of the principle of federalism (Secession Reference, at para. 56; Securities Reference, at para. 55). More specifically, in R. v. Comeau, 2018 SCC 15, [2018] 1 S.C.R. 342, this Court explained that "[t]he tension between the centre and the regions is regulated by the concept of jurisdictional balance" (para. 78 (emphasis added)).

[469] Division of powers disputes must be resolved in a way that reconciles unity and diversity. This cannot be achieved by merely determining which order of government "is thought to be best placed to legislate regarding the matter in question" (Securities Reference, at para. 90). Functional effectiveness is often erroneously equated with centralization and uniformity and eclipses the value of regional diversity (see, e.g., J. Leclair, "The Supreme Court of Canada's Understanding of Federalism: Efficiency at the Expense of Diversity" (2003), 28 Queen's L.J. 411). As Professor Beetz (as he then was) explained:

> [TRANSLATION] As a result, Quebec jurists can only be suspicious of the argument that, for example, legislative authority must be commensurate with the problem to be resolved. They find, first of all, that this is not a legal argument, but a political and functional reason to amend the constitution if necessary. Next, they find, from a political standpoint, that it is a permanent argument, one that is favorable to a concentration of powers in the federal government, since the problems to be resolved will obviously not stop increasing in intensity, in complexity and in their ramifications. [Emphasis added; footnote omitted.]

("Les Attitudes changeantes du Québec à l'endroit de la Constitution de 1867", in P.-A. Crépeau and C. B. Macpherson, eds., The Future of Canadian Federalism (1965), 113, at p. 120)

[470] Rather than the functional approach, Professor Beetz argued for [TRANSLATION] "further development and clarification of concepts, [and for] analytical jurisprudence" (p. 120). This is consistent with the view that at every step of the analysis, courts must assess "constitutional compliance, not policy desirability" (Comeau, at para. 83).

[471] In recent years, this Court has adopted a flexible, cooperative conception of the division of powers. This approach accommodates overlap between valid exercises of federal and provincial authority and encourages intergovernmental cooperation (Reference re GNDA, at para. 22; Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, 2018 SCC 48, [2018] 3 S.C.R. 189, at para. 18).

[472] Cooperative federalism, however, cannot override the division of powers or "make ultra vires legislation intra vires" (Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, at para. 18; see also Rogers Communications Inc. v. Châteauguay (City), 2016 SCC 23, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 467, at para. 39). Moreover, while it encourages cooperation between orders of government, it does not impose it (J.-F. Gaudreault-DesBiens and J. Poirier, "From Dualism to Cooperative Federalism and Back? Evolving and Competing Conceptions of Canadian Federalism", in P. Oliver, P. Macklem and N. Des Rosiers, eds., The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (2017), 391, at p. 391; Securities Reference, at paras. 132-33). Finally, precise and stable definitions of the powers of the two orders of government are an essential precondition to cooperative federalism. Without them, the "respective bargaining positions of the two levels of government will be too uncertain for federal-provincial agreements to be reached" (W. R. Lederman, "Unity and Diversity in Canadian Federalism: Ideals and Methods of Moderation" (1975), 53 Can. Bar Rev. 597, at p. 616).

[473] Respect for the principle of federalism is essential in deciding these appeals. This Court is called to determine, primarily, if the Act can be upheld as an exercise of Parliament's authority to enact laws under the national concern doctrine. This involves consideration of the purposes sought by the choice of a federal structure, the logic of the distribution of powers, and a careful examination of the jurisdictional balance between both orders of government.

II. POGG Is Residual and Circumscribed

[474] The Attorney General of Canada seeks to uphold the Act as a valid exercise of Parliament's jurisdiction under the national concern doctrine of its "Peace, Order, and good Government" power. The exhaustive nature of the division of powers, discussed above, means that matters that do not come within the enumerated classes must fit somewhere. This is dealt with by two residual clauses: one federal, and one provincial.

[475] The federal residual clause, which I refer to as the "Peace, Order, and good Government" or "POGG" power, comes from the opening words of s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867:

> 91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say . . . .

[476] The provincial residual clause is s. 92(16) of the Constitution Act, 1867:

> 92. In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,
>
> . . .
> 16. Generally all Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province.

[477] Collectively, the federal and provincial residual clauses ensure that the division of powers is exhaustive. The role of POGG is thus limited to instances where the matter does not fall under any enumerated heads and cannot be distributed among existing heads of powers. Notably, by the operation of s. 92(16), POGG does not apply to matters of a "merely local or private Nature". This residual and circumscribed understanding of the POGG power informs my understanding of the national concern test. I justify this understanding of POGG first, through a close reading of the text of ss. 91 and 92, and second, through a close reading of the case law.

[478] In the analysis that follows, there are two points which could be seen as unorthodox. The first relates to residual authority in the division of powers. It is commonly accepted that POGG is a grant of residual authority to Parliament. What is less widely accepted is that s. 92(16) is a residual grant of authority to provincial legislatures. My view is that both provisions confer residual authority, as I will explain below. The second point is that, properly read, the jurisprudence supports a view of POGG as having two branches, "national concern" and "emergency". The (third) "gap" branch constitutes part of "national concern", which is Parliament's general residual power. I would underline that my analysis of the Crown Zellerbach framework would be the same even if there is only one residual authority (POGG) and even if there are three branches to POGG ("national concern", "gap" and "emergency"). Thus, my conclusions are in no way dependent on these two points. Nor do these two points affect my critique of the augmentation and extension of "national concern" urged on this Court by the Attorney General of Canada.

A. A Close Reading of Sections 91 and 92

[479] While the statement of the heads of power set out in 1867 could not contemplate the changes in technology and society that would follow, that statement was exhaustive. The heads of power must be given meaning in a changing world; a living tree capable of growth and development but grounded in natural and fixed limits (Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at pp. 135-37; see also Reference re Employment Insurance Act (Can.), ss. 22 and 23, 2005 SCC 56, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 669, at para. 45). This is accomplished through a flexible, progressive interpretation of the division of powers, but one that begins with and is constrained by the "natural limits of the text" (Marcotte v. Fédération des caisses Desjardins du Québec, 2014 SCC 57, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 805, at para. 20, quoting Canada (Attorney General) v. Hislop, 2007 SCC 10, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 429, at para. 94; see also Quebec (Attorney General) v. 9147-0732 Québec inc., at paras. 8-13).

(1) POGG Is Residual to Section 92

[480] The wording of s. 91 provides textual support for the view that the POGG power is residual to s. 92. Section 91 confers the power to legislate for peace, order and good government "in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces". As Professor Lysyk points out, it does not confer a power to legislate "in relation to peace, order and good government" ("Constitutional Reform and the Introductory Clause of Section 91: Residual and Emergency Law-Making Authority" (1979), 57 Can. Bar Rev. 531, at p. 541 (emphasis in original deleted)). Rather, the power is to legislate "in relation to matters" that do not fall under any provincial, enumerated head of power (p. 541 (emphasis added; emphasis in original deleted)):

> In other words, Parliament is not authorized to legislate in relation to a matter caught by the provincial categories simply because it might in some sense be thought to qualify as contributing toward the "peace, order and good government of Canada". [p. 542]

[481] Further, as Professor Gibson explains, every conferral of provincial legislative jurisdiction is qualified by words such as "in the Province", including s. 92(16). The result is that the POGG power is limited to only those matters that are not of a provincial nature; in other words, it confers Parliament jurisdiction over matters with a "national dimension" ("Measuring 'National Dimensions'" (1976), 7 Man. L.J. 15, at p. 18).

[482] Thus, focusing on "peace, order, and good government" is "unproductive", because it provides little assistance in drawing the line between provincial and federal areas of competence. In addition, it "tends to draw attention away from the central question pointed to by the introductory clause, namely, whether the matter to which an enactment relates is one 'not coming within' the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to provincial legislatures" (Lysyk, at p. 534; see also J. Leclair, "The Elusive Quest for the Quintessential 'National Interest'" (2005), 38 U.B.C. L. Rev. 353, at pp. 358-59).

[483] A general power to legislate "in relation to peace, order and good government" would also be incompatible with the intention to create a robust sphere of provincial jurisdiction to protect the autonomy of the provinces. Section 92(13), in particular, grants the provinces jurisdiction over "Property and Civil Rights in the Province", which was understood as "descriptive of the full range of civil law, as opposed to criminal law" (Lysyk, at p. 544). In Citizens Insurance Co. of Canada v. Parsons (1881), 7 App. Cas. 96 (P.C.), Sir Montague Smith similarly observed that the words of s. 92(13) were "sufficiently large to embrace, in their fair and ordinary meaning, rights arising from contract" (p. 110). He held that there is no reason for holding that these words are not used in their "largest sense" in s. 92(13) (p. 111).

[484] As a result, the general POGG power does not confer authority to Parliament to enact laws of a local or private nature, or related to "property and civil rights" under the guise of "peace, order, and good government". As Lord Watson observed in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion, [1896] A.C. 348 (P.C.) ("Local Prohibition"), at pp. 360-61:

> . . . the Dominion Parliament has no authority to encroach upon any class of subjects which is exclusively assigned to provincial legislatures by s. 92. These enactments appear to their Lordships to indicate that the exercise of legislative power by the Parliament of Canada, in regard to all matters not enumerated in s. 91, ought to be strictly confined to such matters as are unquestionably of Canadian interest and importance, and ought not to trench upon provincial legislation with respect to any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92. To attach any other construction to the general power which, in supplement of its enumerated powers, is conferred upon the Parliament of Canada by s. 91, would, in their Lordships' opinion, not only be contrary to the intendment of the Act, but would practically destroy the autonomy of the provinces. If it were once conceded that the Parliament of Canada has authority to make laws applicable to the whole Dominion, in relation to matters which in each province are substantially of local or private interest, upon the assumption that these matters also concern the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion, there is hardly a subject enumerated in s. 92 upon which it might not legislate, to the exclusion of the provincial legislatures. [Emphasis added.]

(2) POGG Should Be Understood as Residual to the Enumerated Heads of Section 91

[485] While case law has consistently held that POGG is residual to the provincial enumerated heads, this Court's approach to whether it is residual to the federal enumerated heads is not so clear.

[486] Some early cases treat the POGG power as residual to both the provincial and federal enumerated heads of power. For example, in Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider, [1925] A.C. 396 (P.C.), Viscount Haldane said that courts should first ask whether the subject matter falls within s. 92. If it does, the court asks whether it also falls under s. 91. Only if the subject "falls within neither of the sets of enumerated heads" would POGG be considered (p. 406 (emphasis added)).

[487] However, some commentators have claimed that POGG is not residual to the enumerated federal heads of power because the enumerated federal heads are only illustrative of "peace, order, and good government" (see, e.g., B. Laskin, '"Peace, Order and Good Government' Re-Examined" (1947), 25 Can. Bar Rev. 1054, at p. 1057).

[488] Moreover, in some cases this Court has held that a matter may fall within the POGG power or another enumerated federal head of power (see, e.g., Ontario Hydro v. Ontario (Labour Relations Board), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 327, which concluded that nuclear power fell either under the declaratory undertaking power (s. 92(10)(c)) or national concern; In re Regulation and Control of Radio Communication in Canada, [1932] A.C. 304 (P.C.) ("Radio Reference"), which concluded that the matter could fall under the POGG power or the interprovincial undertakings power (s. 92(10)(a)); and Aeronautics Reference, which appeared to conclude that the matter fell under both s. 132 and the POGG power). While there is nothing wrong with making alternative findings, these cases could be read as indicating that it is possible for a matter to fall both within the POGG power and within a federal enumerated head of power at the same time.

[489] In my view, this approach is wrong. I agree with Professor Hogg that the POGG power is residual to the enumerated provincial and federal heads of power, and that "matters which come within enumerated federal or provincial heads of power should be located in those enumerated heads, and the office of the p.o.g.g. power is to accommodate the matters which do not come within any of the enumerated federal or provincial heads" (s. 17.1). Contrary to Professor Laskin's view (as he then was), I do not understand a number of the enumerated heads of power assigned to Parliament, such as its power over copyrights (s. 91(23)), to be merely examples of a broad power to legislate for peace, order, and good government. Rather, many had to be specifically enumerated to avoid falling under the large scope of provincial jurisdiction over "property and civil rights" (s. 92(13)) (Leclair (2005), at pp. 355-57; Hogg, at s. 17.1; Lysyk, at p. 539).

[490] There is no reason to hold that a matter falls under POGG when it comes within an enumerated head of jurisdiction. As Professor Hogg explains, the normal process of constitutional interpretation, like the interpretation of any statute or contract, is to rely first on a more specific provision before resorting to a more general one (s. 17.1). Resort to the general over the specific improperly treats the specific as redundant. Moreover, as Professor Abel argues, the more specific will usually be more defined and less contentious, and courts should not waste time arguing about the outer limits of the more general and diffuse when it is not necessary. In doing so, they would avoid the difficult question of whether a matter is of a "merely local or private" nature or if it has reached a national dimension so as to fall under POGG ("The Neglected Logic of 91 and 92" (1969), 19 U.T.L.J. 487, at pp. 510-12).

[491] When we are classifying the subject matter of an enactment, we are therefore first trying to classify it among the exclusive heads of power assigned to the federal and provincial legislatures. If the matter cannot fit within any enumerated head, only then may resort be had to the federal residual clause. This methodology helps ensure that the federal residual power cannot be used as a tool to upset the balance of federalism by stripping away provincial powers.

(3) The Parallel Structure of the Provincial and Federal Residual Clauses Supports a Narrow Understanding of POGG

[492] The federal residual clause has typically been seen as the sole residual power, such that all matters "not coming within" those assigned to the federal and provincial legislatures come within federal power (Hogg, at s. 17.1). However, there is a strong case for viewing the opening words of s. 91 and s. 92(16) as setting out a "parallel structure of complementary federal and provincial residua" (Leclair (2005), at p. 355 (emphasis added)).

[493] There is much to be said for the theory that the two sections "complement and modify each other", with the federal residuum dealing with matters "of a general character" and the provincial residuum encompassing matters "of a merely local or private nature" (Lysyk, at pp. 534 and 536-38). Indeed, the two sections have been said to strike a "careful balance . . . with matters potentially regulated at the federal level already within the enumerated provincial powers or ultimately covered within this last clause on matters of local concern" (Newman, at p. 192). Professors Hogg and Wright similarly say:

> . . . there is a plausible argument that the Constitution Act, 1867 includes not one, but two complementary residuary powers. This argument, in turn, strengthens the view that the Act, as drafted, was intended to form the foundation for a federal system that is less centralized than many English-Canadian commentators have supposed. [Footnote omitted.]
> ("Canadian Federalism, the Privy Council and the Supreme Court: Reflections on the Debate about Canadian Federalism" (2005), 38 U.B.C. L. Rev. 329, at p. 338)

[494] As the Attorney General of Quebec argues in this case, the scope of s. 92(16) must be interpreted as a counterbalance to the introductory paragraph of s. 91 to reflect the constitutional principle that both Parliament and provincial legislatures must be seen as equals. Accordingly, when determining if a matter falls under POGG, it is relevant to consider if it is of a "merely local and private nature" such that it would fall under s. 92(16) (see H. Brun, G. Tremblay and E. Brouillet, Droit constitutionnel (6th ed. 2014), at pp. 599-600).

[495] There is also support for this understanding of the relationship between the POGG power and s. 92(16) in the case law. In Local Prohibition, at p. 365, Lord Watson explains:

> In s. 92, No. 16 appears to [their Lordships] to have the same office which the general enactment with respect to matters concerning the peace, order, and good government of Canada, so far as supplementary of the enumerated subjects, fulfils in s. 91. It assigns to the provincial legislature all matters in a provincial sense local or private which have been omitted from the preceding enumeration, and, although its terms are wide enough to cover, they were obviously not meant to include, provincial legislation in relation to the classes of subjects already enumerated. [Emphasis added.]
> (See also Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 662, at p. 700.)

[496] In Reference re The Farm Products Marketing Act, [1957] S.C.R. 198, this Court also addressed the residual nature of s. 92(16), and explained that "[h]ead 16 contains what may be called the residuary power of the Province . . . and it is within that residue that the autonomy of the Province in local matters, so far as it might be affected by trade regulation, is to be preserved" (p. 212). More recently in Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 457, McLachlin C.J. stated that s. 92(16) along with s. 92(13) are "often seen as sources of residual jurisdiction", and LeBel and Deschamps JJ. stated that s. 92(16) "can also be regarded as a partial residual jurisdiction" (paras. 134 and 264; see also R. v. Hauser, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 984; and Schneider v. The Queen, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 112).

[497] The parallel structure of the residual clauses contributes to the balance of powers within the Confederation and ensures that, as society changes, more and more matters are not enveloped exclusively within federal competence (Lysyk, at p. 534; Newman, at p. 192). Accordingly, the residual scope of the POGG power is narrowed by s. 92(16), which applies to matters that are of a local and private nature even if they do not come within any other enumerated head of power.

[498] For clarity, this understanding of the relationship between s. 92(16) and POGG differs from the understanding of the Court of Appeal of Alberta majority. In my view, POGG is residual to all enumerated provincial heads of power, including s. 92(16). Matters that formerly fell under any enumerated provincial head of power can come to extend beyond provincial competence and, where the Crown Zellerbach test is met, come within POGG.

B. A Close Reading of the Case Law

[499] A review of POGG case law reveals that courts have long struggled to define its contours in a way that preserves the division of powers. The result has been doctrinal confusion and categories that lack clarity. Many commentators speak of three separate POGG branches: emergency, national concern and gap. Professor Hogg explains that matters falling under the "gap" branch are not just "new" in the sense that they do not come within any enumerated head of power, but rather "depend upon a lacuna or gap in the text of the Constitution", where "the Constitution recognizes certain topics as being classes of subjects for distribution-of-power purposes, but fails to deal completely with each topic" (s. 17.2). Though the terminology between commentators differs, the schema is similar (see, e.g., G. Régimbald and D. Newman, The Law of the Canadian Constitution (2nd ed. 2017), at c. 6; P. J. Monahan, B. Shaw and P. Ryan, Constitutional Law (5th ed. 2017), at p. 264; Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at p. 584).

[500] In my view, the POGG jurisprudence should be read as signaling the existence of just two branches: a general residual power and the emergency power. What some commentators have named "gap" and "national concern" are simply manifestations of the exhaustive nature of the division of powers, and the residual nature of the POGG power. Matters that do not come within any enumerated head of power or cannot be distributed among multiple heads of power must fit somewhere, and they belong under POGG when they pass the Crown Zellerbach test. A close reading of Crown Zellerbach reveals that the test set out in that case applies to both "national concern" and "gap" cases, and this affinity between "gap" and "national concern" informs my understanding of that test.

(1) The Early Development of the POGG Power

[501] From the beginning, courts have treated the POGG power as residual, only relevant where a matter does not come within the enumerated classes of subjects. The early cases reveal no distinction between "gap" and "national concern", but rather a distinction between a general residual power and the emergency power. In either instance, the courts emphasize that POGG is a category of last resort, and the importance of keeping the doctrine circumscribed and narrow, so as to properly preserve the sphere of provincial jurisdiction.

[502] The earliest cases of Parsons and Russell treated s. 91 and POGG essentially as one: if a matter did not come within a s. 92 head of power, it fell somewhere within s. 91 (Parsons, at p. 109; Russell v. The Queen (1882), 7 App. Cas. 829 (P.C.), at pp. 836-37). In Russell, Sir Montague Smith upheld the Canada Temperance Act, noting that temperance was a subject "of general concern to the Dominion, upon which uniformity of legislation is desirable, and the Parliament alone can so deal with it" (p. 841 (emphasis added)).

[503] In Local Prohibition, Lord Watson upheld a provincial local-option temperance scheme quite similar to the federal one in Russell, under s. 92(13) or (16). While noting that there may be matters not coming within the enumerated heads of s. 91 or 92 that fell under federal power, Lord Watson cautioned that such non-enumerated matters "ought to be strictly confined to such matters as are unquestionably of Canadian interest and importance" and should not trench upon provincial subjects at the risk of destroying provincial autonomy (p. 360). He then made the frequently cited statement:

> Their Lordships do not doubt that some matters, in their origin local and provincial, might attain such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion, and to justify the Canadian Parliament in passing laws for their regulation or abolition in the interest of the Dominion. But great caution must be observed in distinguishing between that which is local and provincial, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, and that which has ceased to be merely local or provincial, and > has become matter of national concern, in such sense as to bring it within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. [Emphasis added; p. 361.]

[504] Following Local Prohibition, the Privy Council, per Viscount Haldane, ignored this passage and the national concern idea for many years. Instead, POGG was seen as encompassing only emergencies (Hogg, at s. 17.4(a); Fort Frances Pulp and Power Co. v. Manitoba Free Press Co., [1923] A.C. 695 (P.C.), at pp. 703-6; Snider, at pp. 405-6 and 412). These cases represent the first scaling back of national concern. At the same time, they illustrate that the courts have long been concerned with ensuring provincial legislatures did not lose their powers.

[505] In 1931, national concern seemed to resurface in the Aeronautics Reference, which reiterated that matters can attain "such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion" (p. 72). Ultimately, the Privy Council held that aeronautics fell within federal jurisdiction, essentially under s. 132 of the British North America Act, 1867 (the treaty power). In the Radio Reference, Viscount Dunedin held that Parliament had jurisdiction to regulate radio communication based on both the interprovincial undertaking power and POGG. He noted that the British North America Act, 1867, was silent on the ability of Canada (as opposed to the "British Empire" in s. 132) to enter treaties and thus did not authorize treaty-implementing legislation. POGG therefore filled what appeared to be a gap.

[506] Next, a series of "new deal" cases in 1937 reverted to the idea that POGG applied only to emergencies (see Hogg, at s. 17.4(a)). Among these was the Labour Conventions case, in which Lord Atkin held that neither the Aeronautics Reference nor the Radio Reference stood for the proposition that legislation to perform a treaty was an exclusively federal power. For division of powers purposes, there was "no such thing as treaty legislation as such" (p. 351); rather, provinces could legislate over aspects of treaties falling under s. 92 and Parliament over aspects falling under s. 91.

[507] National concern re-emerged in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Canada Temperance Federation, [1946] A.C. 193 (P.C.). Viscount Simon held that Russell was not based on the emergency branch and that POGG was not confined to emergencies and could encompass matters of "concern of the Dominion as a whole" (p. 205).

[508] As the foregoing discussion demonstrates, early POGG cases suffered from a series of twists and turns, with various "national concern" statements infusing them at various points. As I read the above cases, the common theme is this: courts rely on POGG to give effect to the exhaustive nature of the division of powers, but courts have always been cautious to guard provincial jurisdiction and ensure POGG does not become a vehicle for federal overreach. With this backdrop, I turn to Crown Zellerbach and its survey of the modern case law on POGG.

(2) The Modern Development of the POGG Power and the "National Concern" Test from Crown Zellerbach

[509] In Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. set out the modern "national concern" test. A close reading of Crown Zellerbach and the cases on which Le Dain J. relies reveals that his test applies both to what commentators refer to as "national concern" cases and "gap" cases: both are manifestations of the exhaustive nature of the division of powers and the residual nature of the POGG power. Both types of cases must have the requisite "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" and must have a "scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution" (p. 432).

[510] In Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. surveys a number of POGG cases. The first one of note for our purposes is Canada Temperance Federation, where Viscount Simon set out the following formulation of the test:

> In their Lordships' opinion, the true test must be found in the real subject matter of the legislation: if it is such that it goes beyond local or provincial concern or interests and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the Dominion as a whole (as, for example, in the Aeronautics case and the Radio case), then it will fall within the competence of the Dominion Parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, though it may in another aspect touch on matters specially reserved to the provincial legislatures. [Emphasis added; footnotes omitted.]
>
> (Canada Temperance Federation, at p. 205, as cited in Crown Zellerbach, at pp. 423-24.)

Here, we have the Aeronautics Reference and the Radio Reference being cited as examples of "national concern" cases.

[511] Applying Canada Temperance Federation, this Court held that aeronautics fell under POGG apart from any question of a treaty power (as in Aeronautics Reference) and that legislation establishing the National Capital Commission could be upheld under POGG (Johannesson v. Municipality of West St. Paul, [1952] 1 S.C.R. 292; Munro v. National Capital Commission, [1966] S.C.R. 663).

[512] Le Dain J. then reviews Re: Anti-Inflation Act, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 373, a case which provided important statements on both the emergency branch and the national concern branch. In Anti-Inflation, Laskin C.J., writing for a majority on this point, upheld the federal Anti-Inflation Act under the emergency branch of POGG. Although he wrote in dissent on the emergency power, Beetz J.'s reasons on national concern attracted a majority (p. 437).

[513] Beetz J. noted that national concern leads to exclusive, permanent federal competence and expressed serious concerns about a fundamental shift in the division of powers arising from recognizing inflation as a matter of national concern, as various provincial matters could be transferred to Parliament. In his view, if inflation were recognized as a matter of national concern, "a fundamental feature of the Constitution, its federal nature, the distribution of powers between Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures, would disappear not gradually but rapidly" (p. 445; see also p. 444).

[514] In Anti-Inflation, at p. 457, Beetz J. appears to have grouped what some commentators would call "gap" and "national concern" cases together, and understood them to be motivated by the same underlying logic:

> In my view, the incorporation of companies for objects other than provincial, the regulation and control of aeronautics and of radio, the development, conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region are clear instances of distinct subject matters which do not fall within any of the enumerated heads of s. 92 and which, by nature, are of national concern. [Emphasis added.]

[515] This statement groups together the incorporation of federal companies and radio (referring to Parsons and Radio Reference, cases commentators typically characterize as "gap" cases) with "conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region" and aeronautics (referring to Munro and Johannesson, cases commentators typically characterize as "national concern" cases) (Régimbald and Newman, at paras. 6.5 and 6.21; Hogg, at ss. 17.2 and 17.3).

[516] Beetz J. understood each of these subject matters as not falling within any enumerated head and as being "of national concern" (p. 457). Beetz J. goes on to explain, at p. 458, that such matters must not be > an aggregate but ha[ve] a degree of unity that [makes them] indivisible, an identity which [makes them] distinct from provincial matters and a sufficient consistence to retain the bounds of form. The scale upon which these new matters enable[s] Parliament to touch on provincial matters ha[s] also to be taken into consideration before they [are] recognized as federal matters . . . . [Emphasis added.]

[517] These constraints apply both to "national concern" cases and to the cases some commentators understand to be "gap" cases. They allow courts to ascertain whether the matter is of a truly national dimension (rather than local) and whether it has sufficient unity to be recognized as a matter under POGG rather than subdivided among existing heads of jurisdiction. I note that Beetz J. expressed that he was "much indebted" (p. 452) to an article by Professor Le Dain (as he then was) for his doctrinal statement on POGG (see G. Le Dain, "Sir Lyman Duff and the Constitution" (1974), 12 Osgoode Hall L.J. 261).

[518] Later in Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. refers to Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Attorney General of Canada, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 914, where Estey J. illustrated the range of federal jurisdiction under POGG, characterizing the POGG doctrine as falling into three categories:

> . . . (a) the cases "basing the federal competence on the existence of a national emergency"; (b) the cases in which "federal competence arose because the subject matter did not exist at the time of Confederation and clearly cannot be put into the class of matters of a merely local or private nature", of which aeronautics and radio were cited as examples; and (c) the cases in which "the subject matter 'goes beyond local or provincial concern or interest and must, from its inherent nature, be the concern of the Dominion as a whole'", citing Canada Temperance Federation.
> [Emphasis added.]
> (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 428, citing Labatt, at pp. 944-45.)

[519] Here, Estey J. (at p. 944) has characterized aeronautics and radio as examples of matters which "did not exist at the time of Confederation" and "cannot be put into the class of matters of merely local or private nature" (category "b" above), unlike Viscount Simon in Canada Temperance Federation, who saw these cases as examples of national concern in the traditional sense (category "c" above). This is indicative of a relationship or overlap between both categories, which Le Dain J. later reconciles.

[520] Le Dain J. then cites Dickson J.'s dissenting reasons in R. v. Wetmore, [1983] 2 S.C.R. 284, who read Anti-Inflation and Labatt as establishing two branches: an emergency branch and a general residual branch, the second of which could be sub-divided into categories "b" and "c" from Labatt:

> In the Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 373, Beetz J., whose judgment on this point commanded majority support, reviewed the extensive jurisprudence on the subject and concluded that the peace, order and good government power should be confined to justifying (i) temporary legislation dealing with a national emergency (p. 459) and (ii) legislation dealing with "distinct subject matters which do not fall within any of the enumerated heads of s. 92 and which, by nature, are of national concern" (p. 457). In the Labatt case, supra, at pp. 944-45, Estey J. divided this second heading into (i) areas in which the federal competence arises because the subject matter did not exist at the time of Confederation and cannot be classified as of a merely local and private nature and (ii) areas where the subject matter "goes beyond local or provincial concern or interests and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the Dominion as a whole". This last category is the one enunciated by Viscount Simon in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Canada Temperance Federation, [1946] A.C. 193, at p. 205. The one preceding it formed the basis of the majority decision in Hauser that the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. N-1, came under the peace, order and good government power as dealing with "a genuinely new problem which did not exist at the time of Confederation". [Emphasis added.]

[521] Le Dain J. did not draw a distinction between "gap" and "national concern" cases. Rather, he appeared to understand the two non-emergency POGG categories set out in Labatt as falling under a general, residual branch of the POGG power, to which the following national concern test applies:

> From this survey of the opinion expressed in this Court concerning the national concern doctrine of the federal peace, order and good government power I draw the following conclusions as to what now appears to be firmly established:
>
> 1. The national concern doctrine is separate and distinct from the national emergency doctrine of the peace, order and good government power, which is chiefly distinguishable by the fact that it provides a constitutional basis for what is necessarily legislation of a temporary nature;
>
> 2. The national concern doctrine applies to both new matters which did not exist at Confederation and to matters which, although originally matters of a local or private nature in a province, have since, in the absence of national emergency, become matters of national concern;
>
> 3. For a matter to qualify as a matter of national concern in either sense it must have a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern and a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution;
>
> 4. In determining whether a matter has attained the required degree of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern it is relevant to consider what would be the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspects of the matter. [Emphasis added.]
> (Crown Zellerbach, at pp. 431-32)

[522] On my reading, Le Dain J. subsumed all non-emergency POGG cases into one test, which is "separate and distinct from the national emergency doctrine" but applies to both "new matters which did not exist at Confederation" and "to matters which, although originally matters of a local or private nature in a province, have since, in the absence of national emergency, become matters of national concern". The requirements of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility and an assessment of the scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction apply for a matter to qualify as a matter of national concern "in either sense".

[523] Therefore, while some commentary speaks of "emergency", "gap" and "national concern" as three separate branches, in my view it is more accurate having regard to the case law to say there are two branches: emergency and a general residual power, to which the national concern test applies.

[524] This is consistent with Beetz J.'s approach in Anti-Inflation and the view Le Dain J. expressed when he wrote on POGG as a professor. Indeed, he seemed to view all non-emergency POGG cases as subsumed under the "general power", which was decidedly residual:

> . . . the issue with respect to the general power, where reliance cannot be placed on the notion of emergency, is to determine what are to be considered to be single, indivisible matters of national interest and concern lying outside the specific heads of jurisdiction in sections 91 and 92.
> (Le Dain, at p. 293; see also Lederman, at p. 606.)

[525] Le Dain J.'s view as a professor and Beetz J.'s reasons in Anti-Inflation should inform the interpretation of the test set out in Crown Zellerbach, as subsuming "gap" and "national concern". This reading of Crown Zellerbach is also shared by some commentators. Dwight Newman says that POGG "applies only in the context of what would otherwise be a gap in the structure" and "the case law does not support the three-branch description of [POGG]" (pp. 200-201).

[526] If "national concern" and "gap" are understood as separate, it is easy to mistakenly understand "gap" as the sole residual power, and to fail to appreciate the residual nature of "national concern". Rather, what some commentators call "gap" and "national concern" have the same underlying logic. They are both manifestations of the exhaustive nature of the division of powers, and the residual nature of POGG. This close affinity between "gap" and "national concern" is crucial to a proper understanding of the Crown Zellerbach test: all matters of national concern must fill a kind of "gap" in the sense that they do not fit under the enumerated heads, and, conversely, all matters that do not fit under the enumerated heads must still pass the national concern test to be within federal jurisdiction. Historical newness is irrelevant in ascertaining the existence of a constitutional "gap". Le Dain J. is clear in Crown Zellerbach that the test he sets out applies to historically new matters and matters that have come to extend beyond provincial competence and "become" matters of national concern. When I say that the matter must fill a kind of "gap", I simply mean that the matter does not fall under any enumerated head of power, and cannot be divided between multiple enumerated powers.

[527] As I explain below, "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility", "provincial inability", and "scale of impact" should be understood so as to give effect to the residual nature of the POGG power, and filter out any matter that could fall under an enumerated head of power, including matters that are of a "merely local or private Nature" falling under s. 92(16), and matters that could be distributed among multiple heads.

[528] I pause here to note that the emergency branch, too, can and should be understood as residual to the enumerated heads of power. Viscount Haldane, the architect of the emergency doctrine, "employed expressions which suggest a temporary transcending of the confines of the provincial heads of power" (Lysyk, at p. 549). Cases invoking the emergency branch indicate that in an emergency, a new aspect of government business arises that extends beyond provincial competency (Fort Frances, at p. 705; Snider, at p. 412; see also Lysyk, at pp. 548-51). For clarity, the fact that the emergency branch should also be understood as residual does not mean matters classified as emergencies need to pass the "national concern" test set out in Crown Zellerbach. Indeed, Le Dain J. specifically clarified that "[t]he national concern doctrine is separate and distinct from the national emergency doctrine" (p. 431).

(3) Going Forward

[529] The arc of the POGG jurisprudence has been an effort to navigate such that the division of powers is collectively exhaustive, in a way that respects provincial jurisdiction. The national concern doctrine, when properly applied, plays an essential role in achieving this. Matters that do not come within one of the enumerated heads of jurisdiction and that cannot be separated and shared between the enumerated heads of jurisdiction of both orders of government, do not fit comfortably within the division of powers. In order to maintain exhaustiveness, such matters fall under the general residual power of Parliament by virtue of their "distinctiveness" from matters under provincial jurisdiction and their "indivisibility" between various heads of jurisdiction. But when the doctrine is improperly applied, POGG ceases to be residual in nature. When that is so, it can become an instrument to enhance federal and correspondingly decrease provincial authority.

[530] The POGG case law reviewed above is at times amorphous and difficult to organize, but one common denominator runs throughout: courts must be careful in recognizing matters of national concern and heed the consistent warnings from the case law, because the national concern branch has great potential to upset the division of powers (Local Prohibition, at p. 361; Canada Temperance Federation, at pp. 205-6; see also R. v. Hydro-Québec, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 213, at paras. 67, 110 and 115).

[531] Once a matter is qualified as "of national concern", Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over the matter, including its intra-provincial aspects (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 433). Thus, as the Attorney General of Quebec argued, an expansive interpretation of the doctrine can threaten the fundamental structure of federalism and unduly restrain provincial legislature's law-making authority. It would allow Parliament to acquire exclusive jurisdiction over matters that fall squarely within provincial jurisdiction and flatten regional differences, including Quebec's ability to retain exclusive control over [TRANSLATION] "all powers deemed essential to the survival and flourishing of its distinct cultural identity" (E. Brouillet, La négation de la nation: L'identité culturelle québécoise et le fédéralisme canadien (2005), at p. 299).

[532] Courts should never start a division of powers analysis by looking to the federal residual power (Gibson (1976), at p. 18). This approach helps guard against an unwarranted and artificial expansion of federal jurisdiction. While the national concern doctrine allows courts to recognize Parliament's jurisdiction over matters that used to fall under provincial jurisdiction, there is no corresponding transfer of matters that are no longer of national interest to the provinces (Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at pp. 589-91). Rather, recognizing a matter of national concern has the effect of "adding by judicial process new matters or new classes of matters to the federal list of powers", which "would belong to Parliament permanently" (Anti-Inflation, at pp. 444 and 458). Therefore, to preserve the federal balance, courts should treat POGG as a power of last resort.

[533] Some more recent case law from this Court recognizes this. For example, in Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 3, this Court declined to uphold federal legislation under the POGG power and stated that "the solution to this case can more readily be found by looking first at the catalogue of powers in the Constitution Act, 1867" (p. 65 (emphasis added); see also Hydro-Québec, at paras. 109-10).

[534] My view of the national concern test gives effect to this truly residual understanding of POGG. The scope of the national concern doctrine must be limited to matters that cannot fall under other heads of jurisdiction and that cannot be distributed among multiple heads, thus filling a constitutional gap. Accordingly, the doctrine only applies to matters which are truly of "national concern", as opposed to matters of a "merely local or private nature" that fall under s. 92(16).

III. The National Concern Doctrine

A. Singleness, Distinctiveness, Indivisibility

[535] In Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. explained that "[f]or a matter to qualify as a matter of national concern . . . it must have a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern" (p. 432). A close reading of Le Dain J.'s reasons in Crown Zellerbach and of Beetz J.'s influential reasons in Anti-Inflation reveal that "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" should be understood purposively, as a way to identify matters that are beyond the powers of the provinces, and cannot be divided between both orders of government, which must fall under the general federal residual power in order to fill a constitutional gap.

[536] Beetz J.'s reasons in Anti-Inflation are an essential starting point to understand how matters can qualify as of "national concern". Beetz J. explained that matters of national concern have only been recognized "in cases where a new matter was not an aggregate but had a degree of unity that made it indivisible, an identity which made it distinct from provincial matters and a sufficient consistence to retain the bounds of form" (p. 458 (emphasis added)). The matter at issue in Anti-Inflation, the "containment and reduction of inflation", did not meet such requirements:

> It is an aggregate of several subjects some of which form a substantial part of provincial jurisdiction. It is totally lacking in specificity. It is so pervasive that it knows no bounds. Its recognition as a federal head of power would render most provincial powers nugatory. [p. 458]

[537] In Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. noted that the majority of the Court in Anti-Inflation "held that the national concern doctrine applied, in the absence of national emergency, to single, indivisible matters which did not fall within any of the specified heads of provincial or federal legislative jurisdiction" and referred to Beetz J.'s reasons extensively (pp. 426-27). Thus, it appears that Le Dain J. understood Anti-Inflation as standing for the proposition that the national concern doctrine applies when two conditions are met: first, the matter does not fall within (i.e. it is distinct from) the enumerated heads of jurisdiction and, second, it is single and indivisible.

[538] The issue in Crown Zellerbach was whether "marine pollution" could qualify as a matter of national concern. More specifically, the question was whether "the control of pollution by the dumping of substances in marine waters, including provincial marine waters, is a single, indivisible matter, distinct from the control of pollution by the dumping of substances in other provincial waters" (p. 436 (emphasis added)). Le Dain J. proceeded in two steps, in line with Anti-Inflation. First, he determined that marine pollution was sufficiently distinct from the pollution of other provincial waters because of the distinction between salt and fresh water. Second, he determined that the distinction was sufficient to conclude that marine pollution was a single and indivisible matter.

[539] These cases demonstrate that the requirements of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" serve the purpose of identifying matters that are truly residual in two ways. That is, the matter must be "distinct" from provincial matters and must be incapable of division between both orders of government such that it must be entrusted solely to Parliament. These requirements give effect to the general residual power of Parliament under POGG and ensure that there is no jurisdictional gap in the division of powers. They apply to both "new matters" and to matters which, although originally falling under provincial jurisdiction, have come to extend beyond the powers of the province and, due to indivisibility, must be entrusted exclusively to Parliament.

(1) Importance Is Irrelevant

[540] Given the residual nature of POGG, the importance of a matter has nothing to do with whether it is a matter of national concern. In the Insurance Reference case, the Supreme Court and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council made plain that the importance of a subject did not mean that it had attained a national dimension so as to transfer matters from provincial to federal authority (In re "Insurance Act, 1910" (1913), 48 S.C.R. 260, at p. 304, aff'd Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Alberta, [1916] 1 A.C. 588 (P.C.), at p. 597, cited in Le Dain, at pp. 276-78; see also Anti-Inflation, at pp. 446-50). The role of the general residual power is to maintain the exhaustiveness of the division of powers, not to centralize "important" matters that can be legislated upon by the provinces or by both orders of government. This would severely undermine the principle of federalism (Gibson (1976), at p. 31; see also Hogg, at s. 17.3(b)). For instance, provinces have jurisdiction to legislate in relation to education and the national concern doctrine cannot displace such authority simply because of the importance of the matter.

(2) Distinctiveness

[541] First, the impugned matter must be distinct from matters falling under the enumerated heads of s. 92 (Anti-Inflation, at p. 457). This will be met when the matter is beyond provincial reach, including because of the limitation of provincial jurisdiction to matters "in the Province" (see Gibson (1976), at p. 18). This inquiry includes consideration of the provincial residuum: if the matter is of a "merely local or private Nature", it would fall under s. 92(16).

[542] For example, federal legislation regulating the insurance business could not be sustained under POGG because it was not distinct from provincial matters. Provincial legislatures could have enacted legislation "substantially identical" under their authority to make laws in relation to civil rights and matters of local interest, under ss. 92(13) and 92(16) (In re "Insurance Act, 1910", at pp. 302-3, per Duff J.). Similarly, "[t]he brewing and labelling of beer and light beer" did not transcend the provincial authorities' powers so as to give rise to a matter of national concern. On the contrary, Estey J. noted that there had been "legislative action duly taken in this field by the provinces" (Labatt, at p. 945).

[543] By contrast, marine pollution was found to be sufficiently distinct from pollution in other provincial waters, which fall under provincial jurisdiction (Crown Zellerbach, at pp. 436-38). Likewise, the subject of aeronautics was found to "transcen[d] provincial legislative boundaries" (Johannesson, at p. 309, per Kerwin J.).

[544] I would add that the matter must also be distinct from matters falling under federal jurisdiction, as POGG is purely residual. Of course, since division of powers disputes typically pertain to the boundaries between provincial and federal jurisdiction, in practice, distinctiveness is mainly considered with respect to provincial powers.

(3) Singleness and Indivisibility

[545] Second, as the Attorney General of Quebec correctly argued, even if the matter does not come within an enumerated head of power, it must be single and indivisible to fall under POGG rather than an aggregate that can be broken down and distributed to enumerated heads of jurisdiction (Lederman, at pp. 604-5). In other words, the fact that provinces are unable to deal with a matter is insufficient to conclude that it falls under POGG. The nature of the matter must be such that it cannot be shared between both orders of government and that it must be entrusted to Parliament, exclusively, to avoid a jurisdictional vacuum. This will be the case when the matter has a degree of unity and specificity that makes it indivisible or where the intra-provincial and extra-provincial aspects of the matter are inextricably interrelated (Anti-Inflation, at p. 458; Crown Zellerbach, at p. 434).

[546] For instance, diffuse matters such as "inflation", "labour relations" and "the environment" are distinct from matters falling under s. 92; they are not of a "merely local or private Nature" (s. 92(16)) and cannot be fully regulated by the province. However, they cannot be assigned to Parliament exclusively since they are divisible aggregates of several subjects cutting across provincial and federal jurisdiction (Anti-Inflation, at p. 458; Oldman River, at pp. 63-64). They do not have a singleness such that they must be regulated exclusively by Parliament to avoid a jurisdictional gap.

[547] Such general categories should be viewed as "outside the system . . . [and] subdivided into appropriate parts so that necessary legislative action can be taken by some combination of both federal and provincial statutes" (Lederman, at p. 616; see also D. Gibson, "Constitutional Jurisdiction over Environmental Management in Canada" (1973), 23 U.T.L.J. 54, at p. 85, cited in Oldman River, at p. 63). This is not a flaw of federalism, since we ought to reject the view that "there must be a plenary jurisdiction in one order of government or the other to deal with any legislative problem" (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 434). Rather, these matters are properly dealt with through federal-provincial agreements, what Professor Lederman calls "[t]he essence of co-operative federalism" (p. 616). Accordingly, resort to the general federal residual power is not necessary to preserve the exhaustiveness of the division of powers.

[548] This Court has found that certain matters have the requisite singleness and indivisibility to fall under the general federal residual power rather than be distributed between federal and provincial heads of powers. For instance, the conservation of the National Capital Region was, by nature, a specific matter with a degree of unity that made it indivisible (Anti-Inflation, at pp. 457-58; Munro, at pp. 671-72). In Crown Zellerbach, the majority of this Court found that marine pollution was a single and indivisible matter in part because "the difficulty of ascertaining by visual observation the boundary between the territorial sea and the internal marine waters of a state creates an unacceptable degree of uncertainty for the application of regulatory and penal provisions" (p. 437). The interrelatedness of the intra-provincial and extra-provincial aspects of the matter was such that marine pollution could not be shared between both orders of government if it were to be regulated. On this view, if it did not fall under the general federal residual power, neither Parliament nor provincial legislatures could have effectively legislated upon marine pollution, which would be inconsistent with the exhaustive division of powers.

[549] Singleness and indivisibility are thus means to determine whether the matter truly lies outside the enumerated heads or if it is merely a "new nam[e]" applied to "old legislative purposes" that can be distributed among existing heads of jurisdiction (Le Dain, at p. 293).

B. Provincial Inability

[550] In Crown Zellerbach, Le Dain J. held that in evaluating whether the matter has a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility, "it is relevant to consider what would be the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspects of the matter" (p. 432). This factor is known as the "provincial inability" test.

[551] Once again, it is essential to look at the genesis of the provincial inability inquiry to understand what it sought to accomplish and its role in the national concern doctrine. The provincial inability inquiry has been designed to control the centralization of powers and to limit the extension of the national concern doctrine to matters that are "beyond the power of the provinces to deal with" and that must be legislated upon by Parliament, exclusively (Gibson (1976), at pp. 33-34 (emphasis deleted); see also Leclair (2005), at p. 361; Crown Zellerbach, at pp. 432-33).

[552] In Labatt, this Court held that matters would meet this "test" when interprovincial cooperation is realistically impossible because "the failure of one province to cooperate would carry with it grave consequences for the residents of other provinces" (p. 945, citing P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (1977), at p. 261). In such cases, the matter is effectively beyond the power of the provinces to deal with it.

[553] This background sheds light on the purpose of the concept of provincial inability: to help identify potential jurisdictional voids or gaps, which may indicate that a matter has a national dimension so as to fall under POGG to ensure the division of powers is exhaustive. The underlying purpose of the provincial inability inquiry is essential to understanding its iteration in Crown Zellerbach.

(1) Extra-Provincial Effects Are Relevant to, But Not Determinative of, Provincial Inability

[554] First, "extra-provincial effects", on their own, are insufficient to satisfy the "provincial inability" test. Rather, the extra-provincial effects must be such that the matter, or part of the matter, is beyond the powers of the provinces to deal with on their own or in tandem.

[555] I acknowledge that this is not the only way to read Crown Zellerbach. Read in isolation, Le Dain J.'s reasons could suggest that provincial inability is met whenever there are considerable effects on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the intra-provincial aspects of the matter. In my view, this understanding cannot be correct. Understood this way, provinces would be "unable" to legislate with respect to many matters that were expressly entrusted to them. For example, if a province did not deal effectively with the administration of justice in the province (s. 92(14)), this may have grave consequences for residents of other provinces — the absence of any criminal prosecutions in an entire province would surely have spillover effects for neighbouring provinces. However, I would not say that this mere possibility makes all provinces "unable" to administer justice in the province.

[556] Clearly, some extra-provincial effects are compatible with provincial jurisdiction, considering that, under the federal structure, provinces can adversely affect extra-provincial interests if they are acting within their sphere of jurisdiction (Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at pp. 592-93; Hogg, at s. 13.3(c)). If the pith and substance of provincial legislation comes within the classes of subjects assigned to the provinces, incidental or ancillary extra-provincial effects are irrelevant to its validity (Global Securities Corp. v. British Columbia (Securities Commission), 2000 SCC 21, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 494, at paras. 23, 24 and 38; British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473, at para. 28). Given the potential displacement of provincial authority, courts should have a "strong empirical base" for concluding that the extra-provincial effects are such that the matter is beyond the powers of the provinces to deal with on their own or in tandem (K. Swinton, "Federalism under Fire: The Role of the Supreme Court of Canada" (1992), 55 Law & Contemp. Probs. 121, at p. 136; Leclair (2005), at p. 370).

[557] Evidence that provinces are not cooperating, even combined with the presence of extra-provincial effects, is also insufficient to make out provincial inability. Provinces are sovereign within their sphere of jurisdiction and can legitimately choose different policies than other provinces. The sovereign and democratic will of provincial legislatures entitles them to agree or disagree that uniformity of laws is a desirable goal, and to change their mind in the future (Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, at para. 69; Hogg, at s. 17.3(b)). Moreover, since the possibility of one or more provinces not cooperating is always hypothetically present, such lax criteria would be ineffective protection for provincial jurisdiction (E. Brouillet, "Canadian Federalism and the Principle of Subsidiarity: Should We Open Pandora's Box?" (2011), 54 S.C.L.R. (2d) 601, at pp. 620-21). It is worth repeating that striking a balance between diversity and uniformity is precisely why the Canadian constitution has a federal structure. In certain fields, the Constitution Act, 1867, places diversity and the right to provincial difference above uniformity. This is not a defect of our Constitution, it is a strength.

(2) Provincial Inability Is Relevant to, But Not Determinative of, "Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility"

[558] Second, the residual role of the national concern doctrine explains why Le Dain J. in Crown Zellerbach indicated that the "provincial inability" test is only a "factor" to evaluate whether a subject matter has the required singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility.

[559] Many matters are "beyond the power of the provinces to deal with" but do not meet the requirements of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility, and are therefore not matters of national concern. Obviously, matters that fall squarely within federal jurisdiction are one example (i.e. currency and coinage, the postal service, etc.). This is also the case when matters are mere divisible aggregates that span provincial and federal jurisdiction (Anti-Inflation, at p. 458; Brouillet (2011), at p. 619). For instance, there is no denying that the containment of inflation is "beyond the power of the provinces to deal with", since it involves measures that fall squarely under federal jurisdiction, such as central banking measures relating to the rate of interest (Anti-Inflation, at p. 452). This does not mean that the containment of inflation has the required singleness and indivisibility to qualify as a matter of national concern since it can be divided and distributed to both orders of government. Since there is no constitutional gap, there is no need for the national concern doctrine to be applied such that the entire matter comes under federal jurisdiction.

[560] Provincial inability is no more than Le Dain J. says it is in Crown Zellerbach: an indicium of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility". Extra-provincial effects resulting in provincial inability may indicate that the matter is not of a local or private nature (i.e. "distinct" from provincial matters), or is not separable from the local and private aspects of the matter (i.e. "indivisible" or "single"). This will be the case where the extra- and intra-provincial aspects of a matter are interrelated and inseparable (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 434). This makes sense. In line with the residual role of POGG, federal authority over what was formerly within provincial competence is only justified where a matter has become distinct from what the provinces can do, and cannot be shared between orders of government because of its indivisibility. In such a case, reliance on POGG is the only way to maintain the exhaustiveness of the division of powers. Otherwise, there would be a jurisdictional void — if the federal Parliament did not have jurisdiction over such a matter, no one would.

C. Scale of Impact

[561] When determining if a matter can pass muster as a subject matter falling under POGG, the final step is to consider whether it has "a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution" (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 432). If the "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" inquiry has been carried out correctly such that reliance on POGG is necessary to avoid a jurisdictional vacuum, then the scale of impact will necessarily be reconcilable with the division of powers. This stage of the test should therefore be understood as a "check" or "litmus test", rather than as an independent requirement. The evaluation of the scale of impact on the federal balance illustrates the need for caution when determining whether a new permanent head of exclusive power should, in effect, be added to the federal list of powers (Anti-Inflation, at p. 444).

[562] This prong of the test requires courts to determine whether recognizing the proposed new federal power would be compatible with the federal structure. It does not ask whether the importance of the proposed new federal power outweighs the infringement on provincial jurisdiction. Importance is irrelevant because it does not indicate whether there is a jurisdictional gap that must be filled with the general residual power. Important matters can and should be dealt with by the provinces. Further, assessing importance requires courts to assess the desirability of certain policies, something which is not their role.

[563] Rather, the notion of scale of impact on the fundamental distribution of powers is a manifestation of the principle of federalism. As this Court held in Comeau, this principle "requires a court interpreting constitutional texts to consider how different interpretations impact the balance between federal and provincial interests" (para. 78). Professor Brouillet explains that the idea of preserving a "federal balance" ought to be a principled exercise, animated by the values underlying federalism:

> The search for a federal balance aims at keeping an equilibrium between the values of unity and diversity, whose first legal expression is laid down in the distribution of powers between the levels of government. The value of unity will be essentially preserved if the autonomy of the central government is protected, as the value of diversity will be maintained if the federated units are free from interference from the central government in the exercise of their exclusive legislative powers. [Emphasis added.]
> ("The Federal Principle and the 2005 Balance of Powers in Canada" (2006), 34 S.C.L.R. (2d) 307, at pp. 311-12)

[564] If ubiquitous, all-pervasive matters, such as "the containment and reduction of inflation", fell under POGG, they would authorize federal action that would have a radical effect on the federal balance as they would "render most provincial powers nugatory" (Anti-Inflation, at p. 458). Rather, the matter must be of a sufficiently narrow and specific nature to be consistent with the value of diversity and the autonomy of provincial governments to set their own priorities and come up with policies tailored to their unique needs (Securities Reference, at para. 73).

[565] Moreover, the fact that some matters were not assigned exclusively to either Parliament or the provincial legislatures, and instead are shared between both orders of government, must be given effect. This must not be disturbed through constitutional interpretation. In Hydro-Québec, at para. 59, Lamer C.J. and Iacobucci J., dissenting, but not on this point, made this clear in relation to the "environment" as a subject matter:

> A decision by the framers of the Constitution not to give one level of government exclusive control over a subject matter should, in our opinion, act as a signal that the two levels of government are meant to operate in tandem with regard to that subject matter. One level should not be allowed > to take over the field so as to completely dwarf the presence of the other. This does not mean that no regulation will be permissible, but wholesale regulatory authority of the type envisaged by the Act is, in our view, inconsistent with the shared nature of jurisdiction over the environment. As La Forest J. noted in his dissenting reasons in Crown Zellerbach, at p. 455, "environmental pollution alone [i.e. as a subject matter of legislative authority] is itself all-pervasive. It is a by-product of everything we do. In man's relationship with his environment, waste is unavoidable." [Underlining in original; italics added.]

[566] Although the modern conception of federalism is flexible and accommodates overlapping jurisdiction, courts must be careful not to let the double aspect doctrine undermine the scale of impact inquiry by suggesting that provinces retain ample means to regulate the matter. The double aspect doctrine recognizes that the same fact situation or "matter" may possess both federal and provincial aspects, which means that both orders of government can legislate from their respective perspective (Desgagnés Transport Inc. v. Wärtsilä Canada Inc., 2019 SCC 58, at para. 84; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 30). For example, the prohibition of driving while intoxicated can be enacted by Parliament under its power over criminal law, while provinces can legislate regarding the suspension of driving licenses for highway safety reasons, likely under their power over "property and civil rights" (O'Grady v. Sparling, [1960] S.C.R. 804; Mann v. The Queen, [1966] S.C.R. 238).

[567] The role of the double aspect doctrine is simply to explain how similar rules in otherwise valid provincial and federal laws can apply simultaneously, "when the contrast between the relative importance of the two features is not so sharp" (Rogers Communications, at para. 50, citing W. R. Lederman, "Classification of Laws and the British North America Act", in The Courts and the Canadian Constitution (1964), 177, at p. 193; Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 161, at p. 182). Thus, while this doctrine "allows for the concurrent application of both federal and provincial legislation, . . . it does not create concurrent jurisdiction over a matter" (Securities Reference, at para. 66 (emphasis in original)).

[568] As its name indicates, the doctrine only applies when a subject matter has multiple aspects, some that may be regulated under provincial jurisdiction, and some under federal jurisdiction. It is "neither an exception nor even a qualification to the rule of exclusive legislative jurisdiction" and does not allow Parliament and provincial legislatures to legislate on the "same aspect" of the matter (Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), [1988] 1 S.C.R. 749, at p. 766, per Beetz J. (emphasis in original)). As Professors Brouillet and Ryder write, "an unbridled application of the doctrine would undermine the principle of exclusiveness that forms the foundation of the distribution of powers in Canada" ("Key Doctrines in Canadian Legal Federalism", in P. Oliver, P. Macklem and N. Des Rosiers, eds., The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (2017), 415, at p. 423).

[569] Moreover, the double aspect doctrine must be applied carefully, since increasing overlap between provincial and federal competence can severely disrupt the federal balance. Under the paramountcy doctrine, "where there is an inconsistency between validly enacted but overlapping provincial and federal legislation, the provincial legislation is inoperative to the extent of the inconsistency" (Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 419, at para. 15; Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 188, at para. 11). The combined operation of the doctrines of double aspect and federal paramountcy can have profound implications for the federal structure and for provincial autonomy. I note that Quebec scholars have warned about the particular effects of an unrestrained application of the double aspect doctrine on the province's exclusive jurisdiction. To quote Professor Patenaude:

> [TRANSLATION] It is because of section 92, subsection 13, that Quebecers are governed by a distinct private law system adapted to the specificity of their culture. Any weakening of the rule of [provincial] exclusiveness signifies a possibility for the federal Parliament, in which Francophones are in the minority, to legislate, pre-eminently, in fields the framers had entrusted exclusively to the Parliament of Quebecers. . . . Quebecers cannot accept that fields of jurisdiction over which they have exclusive control can, under the guise of the aspect doctrine, pass into the sphere in which federal jurisdiction has priority of application. [Emphasis added.]
> ("L'érosion graduelle de la règle de l'étanchéité: une nouvelle menace à l'autonomie du Québec" (1979), 20 C. de D. 229, at p. 234; see also G. Rémillard, "Souveraineté et fédéralisme" (1979), 20 C. de D. 237, at p. 242.)

[570] As Professor Hogg explained, "[i]f in a nation paramount central power completely overlapped regional power, then that nation would not be federal . . . . It is only where overlapping of power is incomplete, or the scope of central control is limited, that we have a federal system" (s. 5.1(a); see also Bell Canada, at p. 766). When Professor Hogg wrote that the "nation would not be federal", he did not mean that provinces would cease to exist. Rather, he meant that where provinces become subordinate units, the nation is no longer federal in its nature. In other words, supervisory federalism isn't federalism at all.

[571] In para. 139, the Chief Justice says that my description of national concern (referred to as "two-step") is not reflective of the jurisprudence, noting Munro and Crown Zellerbach. He concludes by saying: "In those cases, this Court did not proceed by way of a two-step search for a jurisdictional vacuum; rather, it applied the national concern test to identify matters of inherent national concern." In reply, first, I would say that aside from a few shining beacons of clarity and coherence, notably Beetz J. in Anti-Inflation, the jurisprudence on national concern has been unclear, even obscure. Second, I do not agree that my description of national concern is not consistent with the jurisprudence while that of the Chief Justice is so. Neither he nor I simply apply precedent. Rather, each of us in different ways makes sense of what was written before. The two-step approach I adopt reflects the methodology Le Dain J. set out and applied in Crown Zellerbach, as I have indicated throughout. Third, the difference is not how faithfully we each adhere to a tortuous case law, but rather how we each conceive of the purpose of the national concern doctrine. For me, it is to give effect to federal residual authority over matters not otherwise assigned under the enumerated heads of power and that cannot be divided between both orders of government. For the Chief Justice it is akin to a debenture, with POGG being a general federal authority that floats over that of the provinces, and crystalizes into exclusive federal jurisdiction when a matter of "inherent national concern" is recognized. These views are fundamentally different, but neither follows directly from the case law.

[572] The Chief Justice also takes issue with my account of the national concern test. I agree that our understandings of POGG are fundamentally different. Mine is that POGG confers residual authority, by which I mean authority to legislate in relation to only those matters which would otherwise fall into a jurisdictional vacuum. As such, it can only be the basis of jurisdiction for matters that do not come within heads of power listed in ss. 91 and 92, and cannot be divided between them. Such residual authority is necessary to ensure that the division of powers is exhaustive. To put it in the simplest terms, the matters falling under the competence conferred on Parliament by s. 91 and that conferred on the legislatures of the provinces by s. 92, or any combination of the two, by definition, cannot come within a residual authority.

[573] Therein lies the conceptual difference that the Chief Justice highlights. In his framework, POGG is a primary source of authority conferred on Parliament in relation to "matters of inherent national concern" (para. 139). Moreover, it is a source of authority that can be used to deal with federal "aspects" of matters under enumerated powers within the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. Thus, he states at para. 130: ". . . where Canada is empowered to impose a minimum national standard, a double aspect situation arises: federal and provincial laws apply concurrently, but the federal law is paramount."

[574] By means of "minimum national standards", a federal aspect is generated, and this federal aspect can be used as a basis to supervise provinces in the exercise of their authority. This is not residual authority. It is the antithesis of residual authority, as it would operate to encroach on jurisdiction conferred on the provinces. Most respectfully, I disagree.

D. Conclusion

[575] The national concern doctrine must be applied with caution in light of its residual role and its potential to upset the division of powers. If the doctrine is not strictly applied so as to limit it to ensuring that the division of powers is exhaustive, the federal nature of the Constitution would "disappear not gradually but rapidly" (Anti-Inflation, at p. 445).

IV. The Attorney General of Canada's Expansive Approach Lacks Caution

[576] Repeated warnings about the misuse of the "national concern" power, notably by Beetz J. in Anti-Inflation, were all but ignored by the Attorney General of Canada in his submissions before this Court. The Attorney General of Canada did not seek to rely on the federal enumerated powers, notably taxation or trade and commerce, as the basis for the constitutionality of the Act. He did not set forth national concern as an alternative basis. Nor did he rely on the emergency branch, which confers Parliament temporary, rather than permanent, authority. (In a "throw-away" submission, the Attorney General of Canada made passing reference to these potential grounds and referred the Court to the submissions of certain interveners.) This was audacious as national concern has been recognized repeatedly as being a threat to the distribution of powers that is at the heart of the Confederation bargain. Further, the Attorney General of Canada's proposed national concern test would considerably extend the doctrine, despite this Court's call for caution when considering a doctrine that "inevitably raises profound issues respecting the federal structure of our Constitution" (Hydro-Québec, at para. 110). I would reject this doctrinal expansion of national concern. I do so for two reasons. First, it departs in a marked and unjustified way from the jurisprudence of this Court. And, second, if adopted, it will provide a broad and open pathway for further incursions into what has been exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

A. Becoming a Matter of National Concern

[577] The Attorney General of Canada argues in his factum (at para. 2) that the pith and substance of the Act of "establishing minimum national standards integral to reducing nationwide [greenhouse gas] emissions" has attained national dimensions because of its importance and the existential threat that climate change poses. This reasoning misstates what it means to attain national dimensions. A matter has attained national dimensions when it has the requisite singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility such that it cannot fit under any enumerated head or be divided among multiple enumerated heads, and a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the division of powers, as explained above. How important a matter is does not determine which order of government has jurisdiction. While the seriousness or the immediacy of the threat that climate change poses may be relevant to an argument under the emergency branch, it has no place in the national concern analysis, which is "separate and distinct from the national emergency doctrine" (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 431; see also Anti-Inflation, at p. 425).

[578] Similarly, the Attorney General of Canada also says that the presence of international agreements indicates that the matter is of national concern. This argument is not only inconsistent with the residual nature of POGG, it also undermines almost nine decades of jurisprudence beginning with the Labour Conventions case, which held that the federal government does not gain legislative competence by virtue of entering into international agreements. Rather, the federal government and the provinces must cooperate to implement international agreements that relate to matters within provincial jurisdiction. What is urged on us by the Attorney General of Canada is a means — indirect, but no less significant thereby — for the federal Cabinet to expand the competence of Parliament by the exercise of its authority in respect of foreign relations.

B. Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[579] The treatment of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" by the Attorney General of Canada conflates key elements of the test, skipping over — I would go so far as to say denying the existence of — what should be important limits on federal jurisdiction. Interpreting such limits out of existence will have profound implications for the future on issues having nothing to do with climate change.

[580] On distinctiveness, the Attorney General of Canada argues in his factum that "the subject matter and the Act target a distinct type of pollutant with indisputable persistence, atmospheric diffusion, harmful effects and interprovincial aspects" (para. 88). While the distinctiveness of greenhouse gases ("GHGs") from other types of gases may be relevant to the distinctiveness inquiry, it is only relevant insofar as the regulation of GHGs is outside of or "distinct from" provincial competence, which the Attorney General of Canada fails to adequately explain. The distinctiveness requirement is inherently incompatible with the backstop nature of the Act, which contemplates that some or all provinces could implement GHG pricing schemes that accord with standards set (from time to time) by the federal Cabinet, thereby avoiding the triggering of federal intervention. Lamer C.J. and Iacobucci J. make a similar point in their dissenting reasons in Hydro-Québec, at paras. 57 and 77. In that case, "equivalency provisions" which allowed the Governor in Council to exempt a province from the scheme if the province had equivalent regulations in force led them to reject the argument that the provinces were unable to regulate toxic substances.

[581] The Attorney General of Canada glosses over the problems with its distinctiveness argument through a proposed "modernized" national concern test that draws on the trade and commerce power jurisprudence and focuses on its version of provincial inability. This new test urged on us by the Attorney General of Canada does away with many of the requirements of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility", and simply asks is the matter "distinctly national" (para. 69). The Attorney General of Canada says this should be assessed using the provincial inability test. He says it is "more than an indicium of distinctiveness, it is the test for distinctiveness" (para. 70). In effect, the Attorney General of Canada's proposition collapses "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" into "provincial inability" — despite Le Dain J.'s caution that "provincial inability" should be only one indicium in determining whether a matter meets the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility requirements (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 434).

[582] This approach fails to give effect to the residual nature of the POGG power. It ignores Beetz J.'s caution that an aggregate of provincial and federal matters is not sufficiently distinctive and too pervasive to justify the creation of (what amounts to) a new head of power under national concern (Anti-Inflation, at p. 458). This is exacerbated by the Attorney General of Canada's reliance on the trade and commerce power jurisprudence to understand the "provincial inability" test. There is no reason why the national concern test should be informed by tests for enumerated heads of power, because the national concern test is directed towards matters that would not pass those tests. If a matter comes with "trade and commerce" or another enumerated power, then it cannot also be a matter of "national concern" if POGG is a residual power.

[583] The result is that something like the "containment and reduction of inflation", which Beetz J., with majority support on this point, held did not pass muster in Anti-Inflation, may pass the Attorney General of Canada's proposed "modernized" test. This is so because, even though such a matter could be divided between provincial and federal enumerated heads of power rendering it "divisible", the provinces, on their own or in tandem, would be unable to fully deal with it, and the failure of one province to act would endanger the interests of other provinces. This example illustrates how the Attorney General of Canada's proposal increases — I would go so far as to say transforms — the scope of the "national concern" branch under POGG.

[584] The device of "minimum national standards" makes wider still the pathway for enhancement of federal jurisdiction. The Attorney General of Canada argues that the provincial inability test is met, in part, because "no single province or territory can constitutionally legislate minimum national standards" (para. 101). But "by means of minimum national standards" could be applied to any matter, the same way "by means of the federal government" could be applied to any matter. If it could be applied to any matter, then it adds nothing meaningful to the description of a matter and has no place. Including "minimum national standards" in the matter of national concern short-circuits the analysis and opens the door to federal "minimum standards" with respect to other areas of provincial jurisdiction, artificially expanding federal capacity to legislate in what have been until now matters coming within provincial jurisdiction. This device undermines federalism by replacing provincial autonomy in the exercise of its jurisdiction with the exercise of such jurisdiction made permanently subject to federal supervision.

[585] Further, the Attorney General of Canada fails to identify extra-provincial effects that would be relevant to provincial inability. The Attorney General of Canada points to carbon leakage (interprovincial competition resulting from businesses relocating from jurisdictions with more strict climate policies to jurisdictions with less strict climate policies), but this is not the kind of extra-provincial effects that make the provinces unable to deal with the matter, on their own or in tandem. An imaginative lawyer can almost always find some effects of provincial measures outside the province (Swinton, at p. 126). This is not enough to put all or part of a matter beyond the power of the provinces to deal with. If it were, the provinces would be "unable" to legislate in many areas of provincial jurisdiction.

[586] The Attorney General of Canada departs from this Court's jurisprudence in treating "provincial inability" and extra-provincial effects as more than an indicator, and losing sight of what it is supposed to be indicating: singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility, which give effect to the residual nature of POGG. Extra-provincial effects leading to provincial inability to deal with all or part of a matter can constitute one step towards singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility. In treating provincial inability as determinative, the Attorney General of Canada reframes the national concern test so as to expand the scope of POGG beyond its proper residual nature.

[587] In effect, the Attorney General of Canada's "modernized" test does away with "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" by understanding these concepts in terms of (his version of) "provincial inability". It then renders "provincial inability" meaningless by defining the matter in terms "minimum national standards", something no province can do. By this logical sleight of hand, "provincial inability" exists whenever Parliament provides for "minimum national standards".

C. Scale of Impact

[588] The Attorney General of Canada suggests that the scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction of the Act is reconcilable with the distribution of powers, in part because of the backstop mechanism. He argues in his factum that the Act respects provincial jurisdiction because it provides provinces with the "flexibility" to implement their own GHG pricing systems and "fills in gaps" where the provincial pricing systems do not meet the "minimum national standards" (para. 6). This is presented as "cooperative" federalism.

[589] These conclusions are based on a highly centralized understanding of federalism. The Act leaves room for provincial jurisdiction only insofar as the decision of the province conforms to the will of Parliament and the federal Cabinet. Indeed, this is the whole point. It would not be a minimum national standard if it were possible to drop below that standard or ask to be measured by a different yardstick. Given the number of activities and industries that produce GHG emissions, the Act's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction would be "so pervasive that it knows no bounds" (Anti-Inflation, at p. 458).

[590] While provincial authority would remain nominally intact, in reality it would become subject to oversight by the federal Cabinet through the exercise of its ability to invoke "minimum national standards" that would override provincial measures. But provinces are not "simple agents for implementing national policies but rather . . . veritable laboratories for the development of solutions adapted to local realities" (A. Bélanger, "Canadian Federalism in the Context of Combatting Climate Change" (2011), 20 Const. Forum 21, at p. 27). The Act is not an exercise in cooperative federalism. Rather, it is the means to enforce supervisory federalism.

[591] As the Attorney General of Quebec points out, even provincial schemes that, at a given time, meet the federal benchmark would never be secure from federal displacement; as a result, the continued application and consistent operation of provincial schemes would be less predictable. This is especially the case considering that minimum national standards could be elevated to a level that completely subsumes provincial schemes. The Act effectively undermines the predictability, stability and integrity of provincial regulatory schemes. Exercise of provincial authority would be permanently contingent on the federal Cabinet's discretion.

[592] The reasoning of the Attorney General of Canada turns provincial autonomy on its head. It also suggests that Parliament could enact "minimum national standards" for a panoply of areas within provincial jurisdiction, and thereby create a federal "aspect" of multiple provincial matters. This has implications far beyond this legislation; these implications permanently alter the Confederation bargain.

[593] The double aspect doctrine does not cure this problem. The double aspect doctrine allows the same fact situation to "be regulated from different perspectives, one of which may relate to a provincial power and the other to a federal power" (Desgagnés Transport, at para. 84). The problem here is that the federal matter has been defined in terms of the extent to which it can limit the provinces' discretion to legislate: the backstop mechanism. This is not two aspects of the same fact situation. It is one aspect, and it gives the federal government the upper hand and the final say. But, that is what "minimum national standards" are intended to do.

[594] In conclusion, I would reject the Attorney General of Canada's proposed expansion of the national concern doctrine and, for the reasons of my colleague Brown J., conclude that Parliament did not have jurisdiction to enact the Act under its general residual power. However, given that the majority has concluded that Parliament has the power to enact the Act, I want to emphasize that this conclusion does not extend to the regulations made under the Act.

V. The Constitutionality of Regulations Made Under the Act Are a Matter for Another Day

[595] The Act confers exceptionally broad authority on the Governor in Council to create policy in the regulations, particularly under Part 2. Although the majority has decided to uphold the Act, the regulations are not before this Court, and may well be challenged in future cases. I take this opportunity to clarify the appropriate methodology for reviewing regulations facially enacted pursuant to a constitutional statute for compliance with the division of powers, and how this methodology may apply to regulations made under the Act. In short, the federal power when applied in the regulations must be limited to the matter of national concern in which the Act is grounded: establishing minimum national standards of price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. To establish "minimum national standards", any differences in treatment between industries or provinces in the regulations must be justified with respect to

"price stringency to reduce GHG emissions" (Chief Justice's reasons, at para. 207). Regulations that have the effect of favouring or imposing unequal burdens on certain provinces and industries in a manner that cannot be so justified would be ultra vires the division of powers.

A. Regulations Purportedly Enacted Under a Constitutional Act Can Be Unconstitutional

[596] It is possible for a statute to be intra vires, and yet for regulations facially enacted under that statute to be ultra vires on division of powers grounds. One way to see this is that such regulations are not properly intra vires the Act, insofar as they are not consistent with the purpose for which the Act was upheld (even if facially they are within the Act's wording). In Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, McLachlin C.J. assessed whether an Act was valid under the federal criminal law power, and explained that "[a]ny regulations passed under the enabling statute will be valid only insofar as they further valid criminal law goals, and they will be subject to challenge to the extent that they do not" (para. 84). As long as the regulations made under an Act reflect and further the purposes for which the Act was held to be constitutional, such regulatory schemes remain "securely anchored" in the Act and intra vires (para. 85).

[597] Certain regulation-making powers are more likely to give rise to regulations that may overstep the bounds of the division of powers than others. For example, the power to make regulations that define the mere details of a valid scheme are unlikely to affect the division of powers. Broader regulatory powers are cause for greater concern. In such cases, [TRANSLATION] "[t]he regulatory authority, which must then itself consider the limits of the power so granted, is more likely to make regulations that will be found to be unconstitutional, whereas the enabling Act, owing to the generality of the language used and to the presumption of validity of laws, will avoid such a finding" (P. Garant, with P. Garant and J. Garant, Droit administratif (7th ed. 2017), at p. 290).

[598] In this case, the Act delegates substantial authority to the Governor in Council to make regulations. The Act, and especially Part 2, could be described as "framework" or "skeletal" legislation, in the sense that much of its content is given effect by means of the regulations. In the context of framework legislation, the risk of regulations using their powers in a manner that is beyond their constitutional competence is particularly high. While the validity of the regulations the Governor in Council has made, or will make in the future, is a matter for another day, I offer some guidance on the proper methodology for reviewing the constitutionality of such regulations.

[599] At para. 220 of his reasons, the Chief Justice writes: "My colleague Rowe J. has taken this opportunity to propose a methodology for assessing the constitutionality of regulations made under the GGPPA. . . . [H]is speculative concern that such regulations could be used to further industrial favouritism is neither necessary nor desirable." This legislation is an instrument not only of environmental policy, but also industrial policy. By design, regulations under Part 2 will have impacts that vary by enterprise, sector and region. These regulations will affect the viability, for example, of natural resource industries that need to generate power at remote locations or heavy industries that require intense heat, like making cement or smelting ore. By contrast, they will have little effect on industries that are either not power-intensive (like finance) or where production is electrified (like manufacturing). While the primary purpose of the legislation is environmental protection, Part 2 is premised on tailoring the impact of emissions reduction by reference, inter alia, to economic considerations (G. Bishop, Living Tree or Invasive Species? Critical Questions for the Constitutionality of Federal Carbon Pricing (2019), C.D. Howe Institute Commentary 559). Issues as to whether regulations veer too deeply into industrial policy, thus calling into question the regulations' constitutionality, will inevitably arise.

B. Methodology for Evaluating the Constitutionality of Regulations

[600] An administrative decision to enact regulations is, presumptively, reviewed solely for "reasonableness", unless there is a reason to rebut that presumption. In Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, this Court made clear that there is no separate "jurisdictional questions" category of correctness review that would rebut the presumption, even for delegated legislation (paras. 65-66). Vavilov also adopted the view that "[w]here [the legislature] has established a clear line, the [administrative decision maker] cannot go beyond it; and where [the legislature] has established an ambiguous line, the [decision maker] can go no further than the ambiguity will fairly allow" (para. 68, quoting City of Arlington, Texas v. Federal Communications Commission, 569 U.S. 290 (2013), at p. 307).

[601] One way that the presumption of reasonableness can be rebutted, however, is when the constitutionality of a provision is in issue, including a challenge based on the division of powers (Vavilov, at para. 55). As Vavilov explained, at para. 56:

> A legislature cannot alter the scope of its own constitutional powers through statute. Nor can it alter the constitutional limits of executive power by delegating authority to an administrative body. In other words, although a legislature may choose what powers it delegates to an administrative body, it cannot delegate powers that it does not constitutionally have. The constitutional authority to act must have determinate, defined and consistent limits, which necessitates the application of the correctness standard.

Where the reason for which regulations are said to be ultra vires their enabling statute is because they are ultra vires the division of powers, this raises a constitutional question. As the standard of review may depend on the nature of the challenge and the relief sought, I will say no more about it here.

[602] As for methodology, the review of regulation for compliance with the division of powers follows the same structure as the review of legislation for compliance with the division of powers. In both cases, one must characterize the measure and then classify it. This Court explained the process for analyzing the constitutionality of subordinate legislation, specifically a municipal by-law, in Rogers Communications, at para. 36:

> In analyzing the pith and substance of the notice of a reserve, the Court must consider both its purpose and its effects: Goodwin, at para. 21; Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 693, at para. 29; Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 837, at paras. 63-64; Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 453, at paras. 20-22. The purpose of a municipal measure, like that of a law, is determined by examining both intrinsic evidence, such as the preamble or the general purposes stated in the resolution authorizing the measure, and extrinsic evidence, such as that of the circumstances in which the measure was adopted: Lacombe, at paras. 20-22; COPA, at para. 18; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 27. As for the effects of a municipal measure, they are determined by considering both the legal ramifications of the words used and the practical consequences of the application of the measure: R. v. Morgentaler, [1993] 3 S.C.R. 463, at pp. 482-83.

[603] Analyzing the pith and substance of the municipal measure at issue above is done in the same way as it is for the pith and substance of a statute. Regulations are no different (D. J. M. Brown and J. M. Evans, with the assistance of D. Fairlie, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (loose-leaf), vol. 1, at topic 13:3210; see also Labatt; Ward v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 17, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 569; Fédération des producteurs de volailles du Québec v. Pelland, 2005 SCC 20, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 292; Syncrude Canada Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2016 FCA 160, 398 D.L.R. (4th) 91; Oldman River). The underlying logic is the same: Parliament cannot via statute exercise power it does not have, and so it cannot delegate power that it does not have. Scrutiny for compliance with the division of powers can be no less, simply because Parliament has chosen to give effect to its authority through a delegate who is empowered to make regulations. A division of powers analysis begins with pith and substance, and pith and substance begins with purpose and effect.

[604] In considering purpose, courts can and should consider both intrinsic and extrinsic evidence (see, e.g., Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 453, at para. 20; see also Rogers Communications, at para. 36, per Wagner and Côté JJ., and at paras. 100-104, per Gascon J., concurring). However, certain empowering provisions are more likely than others to generate extrinsic evidence. Empowering provisions of cities, where bylaws are passed after public debate, almost always generate extrinsic evidence. Rogers Communications is an example. Similarly, empowering provisions that place a duty to give reasons on an administrative decision-maker can also be adequately reviewed for constitutionality. Regulations directed to an individual or specific site, as opposed to regulations of general application, may attract a duty of procedural fairness (Brown and Evans, at topic 7:2331).

[605] Where, however, there is no public debate and no duty to give reasons, there is no guarantee that extrinsic evidence will be created. Without such extrinsic evidence, a court's ability to effectively adjudicate the boundaries of federal and provincial powers may be made more difficult. This will generally arise with regulation-making powers.

[606] This problem is particularly pernicious where the Governor in Council is empowered to make regulations. As Cabinet deliberates in secret, submissions to it are protected from disclosure and it gives no reasons for its decisions. It is very nearly a total black box. Further, it has been said that it is not the function of a court to investigate the "motives" of Cabinet (Brown and Evans, at topic 15:3262; Thorne's Hardware Ltd. v. The Queen, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 106).

[607] It is clear that courts have the power to review the vires of subordinate legislation, even where it is promulgated by the Governor in Council, where the basis for the review is that the subordinate legislation is ultra vires on division of powers grounds. As noted, Parliament cannot delegate power that it does not have. This is fundamental. While there may be evidentiary hurdles to identify the purpose of the regulations, where a review of the validity of a regulation turns on whether or not it is ultra vires the division of powers, courts remain tasked with ascertaining the pith and substance. Courts may consider extrinsic evidence in assessing the vires of an Order in Council, and have found Orders in Council to be invalid on the basis of extrinsic evidence of purpose (see Heppner v. Province of Alberta (1977), 6 A.R. 154 (S.C. (App. Div.)), at paras. 27-43). Where available, documents such as a Regulatory Impact Analysis Statement may provide extrinsic evidence of the purpose of a regulation (Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 26, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 533, at paras. 156-57). Where there is no extrinsic evidence of purpose, courts must infer the purpose as best they can from the language of the regulation itself, and ascertain the pith and substance using that in conjunction with the effects of the regulation. The legal and practical effects of the regulations will thus likely be highly relevant to determine their pith and substance and their validity in light of federal jurisdiction over "establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions" (Chief Justice's reasons, at para. 207).

C. Empowering Provisions Under the Act

[608] I discuss a few key regulation-empowering provisions in the Act, and how such regulations may interact with the methodology set out above. The overall scheme of the Act has been explained by my colleague Brown J., and I need not repeat it here. As regulations made under the Act are not before us, I make only general observations.

(1) Part 1

[609] In Part 1 of the Act, ss. 166-168 provide the regulation granting powers. Section 166(1)(a), in combination with other sections, empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations prescribing who pays the fuel charge (and under what conditions), who is exempt from the fuel charge (and under what conditions), and the amount of the fuel charge in certain conditions (see ss. 26, 27, 40(3), 41(2), 46(3) and 48). Section 166(1)(e) gives the Governor in Council the power to make regulations "distinguishing among any class of persons, provinces, areas, facilities, property, activities, fuels, substances, materials or things". These provisions have clear potential for use that is within federal competence over establishing minimum national standards of price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. The Governor in Council could distinguish between provinces, industries, fuels, etc. if the distinction is justified in light of the goal of reducing greenhouse gas emissions, for example, by taking into account the risk of international carbon leakage and the relative effectiveness of the pricing standard on GHG emissions. Regulations that differentiate between industries on such bases may fall within the matter of national concern in which the Act is grounded.

However, the potential for "playing favourites" for reasons that have nothing to do with establishing minimum national standards of price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is obvious. Moreover, even if regulations are enacted without such favouritism, they could have the effect of unduly disadvantaging certain provinces or industries in a way that is incompatible with "establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions". Such regulations would be unconstitutional, even though the provisions that facially empower them are valid.

[610] Sections 166(2) and 166(3) give the Governor in Council the power to amend the list of provinces and areas to which Part 1 of the Act applies taking into account the stringency of provincial pricing mechanisms for GHG emissions as the primary factor. Although the Act does not define "stringency", the Governor in Council's decision to list or not list a province is nonetheless constrained by the limits of "establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions". Similar provisions exist in Part 2 as well.

[611] Section 166(4) gives the Governor in Council the power to change the fuel charge for an individual fuel, on a per-region basis. Section 168 allows the Governor in Council to make regulations in relation to the fuel charge system. Section 168(3) provides the power to modify "this Part" through regulations, and s. 168(4) allows regulations made under "this Part in respect of the fuel charge system" to prevail over "this Part" in case of conflict. This is the so-called "Henry VIII" clause. There is similar potential for abuse or unconstitutional effects in the exercise of these empowering provisions as there is in those described above.

(2) Part 2

[612] Part 2 delegates even more of the details to the regulations, and contains even more potential for overstepping the bounds of the division of powers. Part 2 of the Act creates a per-facility emissions limit. This creates the potential for improper differential treatment of facilities through the regulations.

[613] Key to the operation of Part 2 is s. 192. This section gives the Governor in Council 17 explicit regulation-making powers, including the power to make regulations respecting covered facilities and when they cease to be covered facilities (s. 192(b)) and respecting the circumstances under which greenhouse gases are deemed to have been emitted by a facility (s. 192(i)). Section 192(g) is particularly important, as it allows the Governor in Council to make regulations "respecting greenhouse gas emissions limits". Section 192(g) gives the Governor in Council power to create a scheme that defines the emissions limits: these are not otherwise defined in the statute. The only stated restriction on the Governor in Council here is that the regulations must be "for the purposes of this Division". Although the Division does not have a stated purpose, it is titled "Pricing Mechanism for Greenhouse Gas Emissions".

[614] This power to set per-facility emissions limits is at the heart of Part 2 of the Act, and it could support a wide variety of regulations. Given, however, that the Act is a "per-facility" scheme, the statute contemplates that the Governor in Council will create regulations that do not treat all covered facilities identically. This gives rise to the possibility of differences in treatment between industries that have nothing to do with the effectiveness of GHG emissions pricing in those industries. This would be inconsistent with "establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions". Regulations that impose different treatment of facilities and industries must be justified in light of federal jurisdiction over this matter, or they will exceed the powers Parliament could validly delegate to the Governor in Council.

[615] The regulations, no less than the legislation under which they are enacted, must constitute an exercise of authority that is within federal competence. If they are not, they will be ultra vires the division of powers and, thereby, void in law.

VI. Conclusion

[616] A patient and careful examination of the doctrine reveals that POGG should be, and was always intended to be, a residual and circumscribed power of last resort that preserves the exhaustiveness of the division of powers. It is only available where no enumerated head of power, or combination of enumerated heads of power, is available. The approach of the Attorney General of Canada reflects a troubling misinterpretation of and departure from Crown Zellerbach and the doctrine that preceded it. For these reasons, and those of Justice Brown which I adopt, the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act is ultra vires in whole and the reference questions are answered in the affirmative. Accordingly, I would allow the appeals of the Attorney General of Saskatchewan and the Attorney General of Ontario and I would dismiss the appeal of the Attorney General of British Columbia.

Criminal law — Appeals — Appeals to Supreme Court of Canada — Jurisdiction — Accused convicted of indictable offence at trial — Court of Appeal setting aside conviction and ordering new trial — Crown bringing appeal to Supreme Court of Canada — Accused applying for leave to cross-appeal order of new trial and requesting stay — Whether Court has jurisdiction to hear accused's appeal — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 691.

After having voluntarily taken an overdose of a prescription drug and falling into an impaired state, S attacked his mother with a knife and injured her gravely. He was charged with several offences, including aggravated assault and assault with a weapon. In unrelated circumstances, C fell into an impaired state after he voluntarily ingested magic mushrooms containing a drug called psilocybin. He attacked his father with a knife and killed him, and seriously injured his father's partner. C was tried for manslaughter and aggravated assault. Both S and C argued at their respective trials that their state of intoxication was so extreme that their actions were involuntary and could not be the basis of a guilty verdict for the violent offences of general intent brought against them. C also argued that an underlying brain injury was the significant contributing cause of his psychosis, rather than his intoxication alone, such that he was not criminally responsible.

In the case of S, the trial judge accepted that S was acting involuntarily but decided that the defence of extreme intoxication akin to automatism was not available by virtue of s. 33.1 of the Criminal Code. S was convicted of the two assault charges.

The trial judge in C's case dismissed C's constitutional challenge to s. 33.1, during which C had argued that previous decisions of the same court that declared s. 33.1 unconstitutional were binding on the trial judge. C's brain trauma was held to be a mental disorder but not the cause of C's incapacity, which was the result of the voluntary ingestion of magic mushrooms. C was convicted of manslaughter and aggravated assault.

The Court of Appeal heard appeals by S and C together and held that s. 33.1 violates ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Charter and is not saved by s. 1. S and C were therefore entitled to raise the defence of automatism. The Court of Appeal also addressed the issue of whether the trial judge in C's case was bound by precedent of a court of coordinate jurisdiction in the province to accept the unconstitutionality of s. 33.1. It held that the ordinary rules of stare decisis apply when superior courts in first instance consider whether to follow previous declarations of unconstitutionality. The trial judge was correct to decide that he was not bound by previous decisions and entitled to consider the issue afresh. In the result, S's convictions were set aside and acquittals entered. The Court of Appeal ordered a new trial for C because no finding of fact had been made in respect of non-mental disorder automatism. The Crown appeals to the Court from the Court of Appeal's decision in respect of both S and C, and C applies for leave to cross-appeal the order of a new trial, seeking an acquittal or, in the alternative, a stay of proceedings.

Held: The appeals should be dismissed. C's application for leave to cross-appeal should be quashed for want of jurisdiction.

In the companion appeal of R. v. Brown, 2022 SCC 18, the Court concludes that s. 33.1 violates the Charter and is of no force or effect pursuant to s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. That conclusion is applicable to the Crown's appeals in the present cases. In the result, given that s. 33.1 is of no force or effect, S is entitled to acquittals. He established that he was intoxicated to the point of automatism and the trial judge found that he was acting involuntarily. As for C, the Court of Appeal's order for a new trial should be upheld. C may avail himself of the defence of non-mental disorder automatism at a new trial, should it be applicable on the facts.

The ordinary rules of horizontal stare decisis and judicial comity apply to declarations of unconstitutionality issued by superior courts within the same province. A decision may not be binding if it is distinguishable on its facts or the court had no practical way of knowing it existed. If it is binding, a trial court may only depart if one or more of the exceptions set out in Re Hansard Spruce Mills, [1954] 4 D.L.R. 590 (B.C.S.C.), apply.

Accordingly, a trial judge is not strictly bound by a prior declaration by a court of coordinate jurisdiction by virtue of s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. A s. 52(1) declaration of unconstitutionality reflects an ordinary judicial task of determining a question of law. Determining whether an impugned law is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution and, if so, whether and to what extent the law is of no force or effect is no different than other questions of law decided outside the constitutional context. Judges cannot in a literal sense strike down legislation when they review the consistency of the law with the Constitution under s. 52(1). A declaration of unconstitutionality simply refutes the presumption of constitutionality; it does not alter the terms of the statute. Questions of law are governed by the normal rules and conventions that constrain courts in the performance of their judicial tasks, including applying the ordinary principles of stare decisis. A judicial declaration made under s. 52(1) by a superior court is therefore binding on other courts within the confines of the law relating to precedent.

The principle of constitutional supremacy cannot dominate the analysis of s. 52(1) to the exclusion of other constitutional principles. The legal effect of a s. 52(1) declaration by a superior court must be defined with reference to constitutional supremacy, the rule of law, and federalism. Pursuant to s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, superior courts operating within a province only have powers within the province. Federalism prevents a s. 52(1) declaration issued within one province from binding courts throughout the country. Horizontal stare decisis applies to courts of coordinate jurisdiction within a province and a constitutional ruling will bind lower courts through vertical stare decisis. Stare decisis is the appropriate framework to apply to litigation of constitutional issues, because it balances stability and predictability against correctness and the orderly development of the law. The Crown may consider an appeal when faced with conflicting trial decisions relating to a law on which the prosecution continues to rely, but is not bound to appeal declarations of unconstitutionality in criminal matters. However desirable uniform treatment of the substantive criminal law might be within or even across provinces, a decision to appeal remains within the discretion of the relevant attorney general, to be decided in keeping with its authority to pursue the public interest and the constitutional and practical constraints relating to its office.

Varying standards have been invoked to define when departure from prior precedent is appropriate, for example if it is plainly wrong, when there is good reason for doing so or in extraordinary circumstances. These qualitative tags are susceptible of extending to almost any circumstance and do not provide precise guidance. These terms should no longer be used. Judicial comity as well as the rule of law principles supporting stare decisis mean that prior decisions should be followed unless the Spruce Mills criteria are met. Trial courts should only depart from binding decisions issued by a court of coordinate jurisdiction in three narrow circumstances: the rationale of the earlier decision has been undermined by subsequent appellate decisions; some binding authority in case law or some relevant statute was not considered; or the earlier decision was not fully considered, for example if it was taken in exigent circumstances. Where a judge is faced with conflicting authority on the constitutionality of legislation, the judge must follow the most recent authority unless one or more of these three criteria are met. These criteria do not detract from the narrow circumstances in which a lower court may depart from binding vertical precedent.

An application of the doctrine of horizontal stare decisis to C's case illustrates how these criteria should work in practice. R. v. Dunn (1999), 28 C.R. (5th) 295, did not engage with an earlier Ontario decision that upheld the constitutionality of s. 33.1 and Dunn did not apply the criteria to determine whether it was permissible to depart from that precedent; therefore it was a decision per incuriam and did not need to be followed. The earlier decision considered the appropriate statutes and authorities in reaching the conclusion that s. 33.1 infringed ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Charter but was upheld under s. 1 and there is no indication that it was rendered in exigent circumstances. Therefore, that decision should have been followed by the trial judge in the constitutional ruling in C's case. On appeal, however, the Court of Appeal was not bound to follow any first instance superior court decision.

There is no statutory route for C to appeal the Court of Appeal's order of a new trial. Section 695 of the Criminal Code does not provide the Court with the jurisdiction to hear a cross-appeal by C. Sections 691 and 692 of the Criminal Code set out the jurisdiction of the Court to hear criminal appeals brought by criminal accused and represent the whole of an accused's express statutory right to appeal when their conviction has been affirmed or their acquittal set aside by the Court of Appeal. In cases like C's, where an accused, having been convicted of an indictable offence at trial, is granted a new trial, s. 691 does not provide a route of appeal to the Court. As for a stay of proceedings, it may only be granted in the clearest of cases, where prejudice to an accused's rights or to the judicial system is irreparable and cannot be remedied. The record before the Court is insufficient to conclude that C's right to a fair trial is prejudiced.

KASIRER J. —

I. Overview

[1] After having voluntarily taken an overdose of a prescription drug and falling into an impaired state, David Sullivan attacked his mother with a knife and injured her gravely. He was charged with several offences, including aggravated assault and assault with a weapon. In unrelated circumstances, Thomas Chan also fell into an impaired state after he voluntarily ingested "magic mushrooms" containing a drug called psilocybin. Mr. Chan attacked his father with a knife and killed him and seriously injured his father's partner. He was tried for manslaughter and aggravated assault.

[2] In their different circumstances, both Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Chan argued at their respective trials that their state of intoxication was so extreme that their actions were involuntary and could not be the basis of a guilty verdict for the violent offences of general intent brought against them. Mr. Chan argued in particular that an underlying brain injury was the significant contributing cause of his psychosis, rather than his intoxication alone, such that he was not criminally responsible pursuant to s. 16 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46.

[3] In the case of Mr. Sullivan, the trial judge accepted the accused was acting involuntarily but decided that the defence of extreme intoxication akin to automatism was not available by virtue of s. 33.1 of the Criminal Code. Mr. Sullivan was convicted of the two assault charges. In the case of Mr. Chan, the trial judge dismissed a constitutional challenge to s. 33.1. Mr. Chan's brain trauma was held to be a mental disorder, but not the cause of the incapacity, which was the result of the voluntary ingestion of magic mushrooms. The trial judge in his case rejected his argument under s. 16. He was convicted of manslaughter and aggravated assault.

[4] Their appeals were heard together. The Court of Appeal for Ontario held that s. 33.1 violated ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and was not saved by s. 1. As a result, both Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Chan were entitled to raise the defence of automatism. Based on the findings at his trial, Mr. Sullivan's convictions were set aside and acquittals entered. The Court of Appeal ordered a new trial for Mr. Chan because no finding of fact had been made in respect of non-mental disorder automatism in his case. The Crown has appealed both the decisions for Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Chan to this Court.

[5] In R. v. Brown, 2022 SCC 18, released concurrently with the reasons for judgment in these appeals, I conclude that s. 33.1 violates the Charter and is of no force or effect pursuant to s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. That conclusion is equally applicable to the Crown's appeals in the cases at bar.

[6] As respondent, Mr. Sullivan has raised an issue relating to the character and force of a s. 52(1) declaration of unconstitutionality issued by a superior court. He argued before us that the trial judge had been bound by a previous declaration by a superior court judge in the province that held s. 33.1 to be of no force and effect. The issue raised by Mr. Sullivan provides an opportunity to clarify whether a declaration made under s. 52(1) binds the courts of coordinate jurisdiction in future cases due to the principle of constitutional supremacy, or whether the ordinary rules of horizontal stare decisis apply. As I shall endeavour to explain, stare decisis does apply and the trial judge was only bound to that limited extent on the question of the constitutionality of s. 33.1. The right approach can be stated plainly. Superior courts at first instance may not be bound if the prior decision is distinguishable on its facts or if the court had no practical way of knowing that the earlier decision existed. Otherwise, the decision is binding and the judge may only depart from it if one or more of the exceptions helpfully explained in Re Hansard Spruce Mills, [1954] 4 D.L.R. 590 (B.C.S.C.), apply.

[7] In the result, I would dismiss the Crown's appeal in the case of Mr. Sullivan and confirm the acquittals entered by the Court of Appeal.

[8] As respondent in his appeal before this Court, Mr. Chan seeks leave to cross-appeal and, if granted, he asks that we substitute an acquittal for the order of a new trial. I would reject Mr. Chan's arguments on this point. In my view, Mr. Chan's application for leave to cross-appeal must be quashed for want of jurisdiction. I would reject his alternative argument that this Court order a stay of proceedings in respect of the very serious violent charges brought against Mr. Chan because the requirements for a stay have not been made out. In the result, I would confirm the Court of Appeal's order of a new trial.

II. Background

A. David Sullivan

[9] All parties agree that Mr. Sullivan attacked his mother during an episode of drug-induced psychosis during which he had no voluntary control over his actions. Mr. Sullivan, then 43 years old, lived with his mother in a condominium unit. He has a history of mental illness and substance abuse. Evidence adduced at trial indicated that in the three months before the attack, he was convinced that the planet would be invaded by aliens that were already present in their condominium.

[10] Mr. Sullivan had been prescribed bupropion (under the name Wellbutrin) to help him quit smoking. Psychosis is a side effect of the drug. He had experienced psychosis from Wellbutrin at least once before, shortly before the events in this case. The evening prior to the attack, he ingested 30 to 80 Wellbutrin tablets in a suicide attempt. The drugs prompted a psychotic episode during which time, in the early hours of the morning, he woke his mother and told her an alien was in the living room. She followed him into the area and, while she was there, Mr. Sullivan went into the kitchen, took two knives, and stabbed his mother six times. She suffered serious injuries, including residual nerve damage that was slow to heal. She died before trial of unrelated causes.

[11] Several neighbours saw Mr. Sullivan acting erratically outside of the building after the attack. Agitated when the police arrived, Mr. Sullivan was talking about Jesus, the devil, and aliens. He was taken to the hospital, where he had multiple seizures. The psychotic episode resolved itself within a few days. At trial, a forensic psychiatrist gave evidence that Mr. Sullivan was likely experiencing a bupropion-induced psychosis at the time of the attack on his mother.

B. Thomas Chan

[12] Thomas Chan violently attacked his father and his father's partner with a knife. Mr. Chan's father later died from his injuries. The father's partner was gravely and permanently injured.

[13] After returning home from a bar where they had consumed several alcoholic drinks earlier that evening, Mr. Chan and his friends decided to take magic mushrooms. Mr. Chan had consumed mushrooms before and enjoyed the experience. He ingested an initial dose and when he failed to feel the same effects as his friends, he took a second dose. Towards the end of the night, he began acting erratically. Frightened, he went upstairs where he woke up his mother, mother's boyfriend, and sister. Mr. Chan then left the home wearing only a pair of pants. His family and friends pursued him as he ran towards his father's home a short distance away. Mr. Chan broke into his father's house through a window even though he normally gained entry through finger-print recognition on a home security system.

[14] Once inside, he confronted his father in the kitchen and did not appear to recognize him. He shouted that he was God and that his father was Satan. He proceeded to stab his father repeatedly. He then stabbed his father's partner. When police arrived, he complied with their demands, although at one point he struggled with what a police officer described as "super-strength".

III. Proceedings Below

A. David Sullivan

Ontario Superior Court of Justice, [2016] O.J. No. 6847 (QL), 2016 CarswellOnt 21197 (WL Can.) (Salmers J.)

[15] At trial, the parties agreed, and the trial judge accepted, that Mr. Sullivan was acting involuntarily when he stabbed his mother. The trial judge found that Mr. Sullivan experienced a state of non-mental disorder automatism, attributable to his ingestion of Wellbutrin. His state was caused by a drug for which psychosis is a known side-effect.

[16] The Crown said s. 33.1 applied because Mr. Sullivan's psychosis was self-induced and therefore could not be the basis for a defence that he lacked the general intent or voluntariness for the crimes of assault. There was disagreement about whether Mr. Sullivan's consumption of Wellbutrin was voluntary. Section 33.1 would only preclude the automatism defence if intoxication was "self-induced". The trial judge found that Mr. Sullivan's intoxication was voluntary and that he knew or ought to have known that Wellbutrin would cause him to be impaired. Section 33.1 was applied. He was found guilty of aggravated assault, assault with a weapon, and four counts of breach of a non-communication order. It bears noting that Mr. Sullivan did not contest the constitutionality of s. 33.1 at trial. He received a global sentence of five years.

B. Thomas Chan

(1) Constitutional Ruling, 2018 ONSC 3849, 365 C.C.C. (3d) 376 (Boswell J.)

[17] Mr. Chan challenged the constitutionality of s. 33.1 in a pre-trial application, arguing in particular that the trial judge was bound by previous decisions of the same court, notably R. v. Dunn (1999), 28 C.R. (5th) 295 (Ont. C.J. (Gen. Div.)), and R. v. Fleming, 2010 ONSC 8022, which found s. 33.1 to be unconstitutional.

[18] Boswell J. considered whether, by reason of the doctrine of horizontal stare decisis, he was bound by a constitutional declaration by another judge of the superior court in the province that s. 33.1 was of no force or effect because it was inconsistent with the Charter. Relying on R. v. Scarlett, 2013 ONSC 562, the trial judge held that he was not so bound. Decisions from courts of coordinate jurisdiction should be followed in the absence of cogent reasons to depart therefrom. A court is bound unless the previous decision is "plainly wrong" (paras. 55-56). The trial judge reasoned that the case law on the constitutionality of s. 33.1 was "considerably unsettled" (para. 58). Although all courts had agreed that s. 33.1 violated ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Charter, courts were divided on whether it could be saved under s. 1. As a result, Boswell J. did not "feel constrained to follow one school of thought more than the other" (ibid.). In addition, none of the earlier constitutional decisions had had the benefit of the judgment of the Court in Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 S.C.R. 1101, on the relationship between ss. 7 and 1 (para. 58). He concluded that he was free to reconsider the question afresh.

[19] The trial judge then went on to decide that s. 33.1 violated ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Charter but was saved under s. 1.

(2) Judgment on the Merits, 2018 ONSC 7158 (Boswell J.)

[20] With the defence of automatism precluded by operation of s. 33.1, Mr. Chan argued that he was not criminally responsible by reason of brain trauma which, alone or in connection with the effect of the intoxicant, amounted to mental disorder under s. 16. The parties disagreed about whether Mr. Chan was suffering from a brain injury and, if so, whether it played a part in his violent conduct. Mr. Chan argued that but for the brain injury, he would not have been psychotic from consuming the mushrooms. The Crown argued that the primary cause of Mr. Chan's psychosis was his voluntary consumption of the mushrooms. The trial judge was required to consider, first, whether Mr. Chan was suffering from a mental disorder at the time of the offence and, second, if that mental disorder rendered him incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of his actions, or incapable of knowing they were wrong.

[21] Mr. Chan did not satisfy the applicable requirements under s. 16. The evidence disclosed a mild traumatic brain injury. The trial judge could not conclusively say that the brain injury rendered Mr. Chan incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of his actions or of knowing they were wrong. The progression of his psychosis suggested that the ingestion of psilocybin was the primary cause of Mr. Chan's impaired state. The judge found that "Mr. Chan experienced a sudden onset of psychosis that coincided directly with the ingestion and absorption of magic mushrooms". While the trial judge found that Mr. Chan "was incapacitated by the effects of the drugs he consumed", I note that he made no specific finding that Mr. Chan was in a state of self-induced intoxication akin to non-mental disorder automatism.

[22] Mr. Chan was convicted of manslaughter and aggravated assault. He was later sentenced to a global sentence of five years, reduced to three and a half years after credit reductions (2019 ONSC 1400).

(3) Application to Re-open Constitutional Challenge, 2019 ONSC 783, 428 C.R.R. (2d) 81 (Boswell J.)

[23] After sentencing, Mr. Chan applied to re-open the case to re-argue the constitutional issue. He said that R. v. McCaw, 2018 ONSC 3464, 48 C.R. (7th) 359, which had been rendered subsequently, declared s. 33.1 unconstitutional and therefore presented a renewed opportunity to consider the question. In McCaw, Spies J. said she was bound by Dunn. Spies J. held that once a provision is declared unconstitutional, it is invalid and "off the books" (para. 76) for all future cases by operation of s. 52(1) and as directed in R. v. Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6, [2008] 1 S.C.R. 96. In other words, judges of concurrent jurisdiction are bound by a declaration of unconstitutionality. On that basis, argued Mr. Chan, the trial judge had been bound by the prior declaration of unconstitutionality in Dunn when he considered the application of s. 33.1 here.

[24] Boswell J. dismissed Mr. Chan's application to re-open the case. McCaw was not an accurate statement of the law. Relying on Spruce Mills, a proper understanding of the rule of horizontal stare decisis is that relevant decisions of the same level of court should be followed as a matter of judicial comity, unless there are compelling reasons that justify departing therefrom. Spruce Mills set out three criteria for departure, which were summarized correctly, in his view, by Strathy J. in Scarlett as "plainly wrong" (para. 41).

[25] For Boswell J., McCaw misinterpreted the statements by McLachlin C.J. in Ferguson that an unconstitutional law is "effectively removed from the statute books" (para. 65). McLachlin C.J. did not express the view that judges of coordinate jurisdiction could not review or reconsider an order striking down a provision under

s. 52. Ferguson was not about horizontal stare decisis. Boswell J. preferred Strathy J.'s reading of Ferguson, which acknowledged the erga omnes ("against all" or, as is sometimes said, "against the world") character of a declaration of unconstitutionality but did not extend that effect to courts of coordinate jurisdiction. The question remained as to whether the prior ruling is plainly wrong and there are salient reasons for correcting the error. With respect to Dunn, there were good reasons to depart from precedent. The s. 1 analysis was plainly wrong; Bedford had changed the relationship between ss. 7 and 1. Moreover there were inconsistent rulings on the matter of the constitutionality of s. 33.1 across the country.

C. Court of Appeal for Ontario, 2020 ONCA 333, 151 O.R. (3d) 353 (Paciocco J.A., Watt J.A. concurring; Lauwers J.A. concurring in the result)

[26] The Court of Appeal allowed the appeals and held that s. 33.1 is unconstitutional and of no force or effect. The Court of Appeal's judgment on this point is reviewed in Brown and need not be recounted here in detail. For the purposes of this case, I need only note that Paciocco J.A.'s careful reasoning on ss. 7 and 11(d) has been affirmed in Brown. In addition, although my own justification analysis differs from that of Paciocco and Lauwers JJ.A., I agree with their ultimate conclusion: s. 33.1 cannot be saved by s. 1. Their conclusion that s. 33.1 is inconsistent with the Charter and of no force or effect is equally applicable in these two appeals.

[27] Speaking for the Court on this point, Paciocco J.A. addressed the issue of whether the trial judge in Mr. Chan's case was bound by precedent of a court of coordinate jurisdiction in the province to accept the unconstitutionality of s. 33.1.

[28] In his view, the ordinary rules of stare decisis apply when superior courts in first instance consider whether to follow previous declarations of unconstitutionality made by the same court. He distinguished several cases that purported to stand for the proposition that a declaration is binding on other superior court judges unless successfully appealed by the Crown (paras. 34-35, referring to Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Martin, 2003 SCC 54, [2003] 2 S.C.R. 504; Canada (Attorney General) v. Hislop, 2007 SCC 10, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 429; and Ferguson). These cases made statements to the effect that a provision inconsistent with the Constitution "is invalid from the moment it is enacted" in all future cases and is "effectively removed from the statute books" (Martin, at paras. 28 and 31; see Ferguson, at para. 65; Hislop, at para. 82). Paciocco J.A. read these cases as describing the effect of s. 52(1) declarations rendered by the Supreme Court because it is the apex court in Canada. They did not oust the principles of stare decisis generally nor did they pertain to declarations made by lower courts.

[29] If all s. 52(1) declarations were binding, wrote Paciocco J.A., accuracy would be compromised. For example, if three superior court judges in succession upheld a provision, but a fourth judge's ruling declared it to be of no force and effect, only the fourth judge's ruling would take hold within a province absent an appeal by the Crown. The development of the law would be "driven by coincidence" rather than by the "quality of the judicial ruling" (para. 37).

[30] The principles in Spruce Mills and Scarlett were affirmed. Applied to the context of s. 52(1) declarations of unconstitutionality, a superior court judge faced with a prior judgment of a court of coordinate jurisdiction should apply that precedent and treat the provision as having no force or effect unless, by exception to the principle of horizontal stare decisis, the earlier decision is plainly wrong. The trial judge was correct to decide that he was not bound by Dunn and entitled to consider the issue afresh.

[31] Having declared s. 33.1 unconstitutional and of no force or effect, Paciocco J.A. entered acquittals for Mr. Sullivan on his assault charges. Mr. Chan was entitled to a new trial, but not acquittals. The trial judge made no finding that Mr. Chan was acting involuntarily. Instead, the trial judge rejected Mr. Chan's claim that he should be found not criminally responsible, a claim that does not require the establishment of automatism. Mr. Chan should have the opportunity to invoke the defence of non-mental automatism and lead evidence in that regard at a new trial.

IV. Issues

[32] As noted, the Crown appeals on the constitutionality of s. 33.1 cannot succeed for the reasons stated in Brown. The Court of Appeal correctly concluded that s. 33.1 infringes ss. 7 and 11(d) and cannot be saved under s. 1.

[33] There are two remaining issues in these appeals:

1. On what basis can a declaration issued by a superior court pursuant to s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 be considered binding on courts of coordinate jurisdiction?

2. Does the Court have jurisdiction to hear Mr. Chan's cross-appeal? If so, is he entitled to an acquittal? If not, is he nevertheless entitled to a stay of proceedings?

[34] For the reasons that follow, I conclude on the first issue that the ordinary rules of stare decisis and judicial comity apply to declarations of unconstitutionality issued by superior courts within the same province. On the second issue, I conclude the Court lacks jurisdiction to hear the cross-appeal. I would not order a stay. The Court of Appeal's order for a new trial for Mr. Chan should be upheld, as should the acquittals it entered for Mr. Sullivan.

V. Analysis

A. Section 52(1) Declarations of Unconstitutionality and Horizontal Stare Decisis

[35] Presented in the General Part of the Constitution Act, 1982 under the heading "Primacy of Constitution of Canada", s. 52(1) provides:

> 52 (1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

[36] The parties disagree on the rules that apply after a superior court declares a law inconsistent with the Charter and thus of no force or effect pursuant to s. 52(1).

[37] Mr. Sullivan observes that at the time he was convicted at trial, s. 33.1 had already been declared of no force and effect by other judges of the superior court in the province of Ontario. He recalls that starting in Dunn, in 1999, four separate superior court judgments were rendered "striking [s. 33.1] down" (R.F., at para. 85). Mr. Sullivan says that a declaration issued by a court of coordinate jurisdiction under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 invalidates the law for all future cases. In deciding the contrary, the trial judge in Mr. Chan's case and the Court of Appeal failed to recognize the effect on the law of the declaration issued under s. 52(1). Paciocco J.A., writing for a unanimous court on this point in appeal, erred in deciding that the matter is governed by the ordinary principles of stare decisis and by adopting the test of judicial comity explained in Scarlett and Spruce Mills.

[38] Mr. Sullivan, along with a number of interveners, submit that a superior court only "discovers" that a law is unconstitutional when it issues a declaration pursuant to s. 52(1) — the law becomes of no force or effect through the operation of s. 52(1). He relies on statements from this Court which characterize a s. 52(1) declaration as rendering the law "null and void", a finding which applies "for all future cases" and that the law is unenforceable because it is "effectively removed from the statute books" (Martin, at para. 31; Ferguson, at para. 65, Hislop, at para. 82). Consistent with those statements, says Mr. Sullivan, when a superior court issues a s. 52(1) declaration of unconstitutionality, the impugned provision is nullified both prospectively and retrospectively. The intervener British Columbia Civil Liberties Association argues further that, by its nature, a s. 52(1) declaration by a superior court has universal effect beyond the parties "for all Canadians" and thus must bind courts across the country. The intervener Advocates for the Rule of Law adds that a s. 52(1) declaration derives its force from the Constitution and that permitting the government to relitigate a law's constitutionality after it has been declared of no force or effect would be inconsistent with the Constitution's remedial scheme. Finally, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association intervenes to warn of the potential undermining of the rule of law and consequential unpredictability if the ordinary rules of stare decisis apply.

[39] Although it argues that the Court of Appeal made no mistake in holding that the ordinary rules of stare decisis apply here, the Crown recalls that the matter is technically moot. Even if the trial judges were obliged to follow Dunn, this Court is not so bound and the lower courts' failure to do so has no practical impact on the outcome of these appeals. But, says the Crown, the question raised by Mr. Sullivan should still be decided.

[40] I agree that the matter can and should be decided here (Rules of the Supreme Court of Canada, SOR/2002-156, r. 29(3); R. v. Poulin, 2019 SCC 47, [2019] 3 S.C.R. 566, at paras. 18-26). The question is one of public importance to the conduct of constitutional litigation in courts of first instance in Canada. Moreover the question was carefully considered by the courts below and, in this Court, has been addressed by the parties with additional submissions on either side of the question by interveners.

[41] On the substance of the matter, the Crown argues that while s. 52(1) declarations are erga omnes in nature, they do not necessarily stand as authority for all future cases to be decided of coordinate jurisdiction or bind across the country. Mr. Sullivan's approach compromises the rule of law by allowing for erroneous findings of unconstitutionality to stand. The rules of stare decisis provide the flexibility needed to balance finality with correctness.

[42] The Attorneys General of British Columbia, Quebec and Canada intervene in support of the Crown's position. British Columbia submits that a s. 52(1) declaration should be reconsidered only where there is palpable and overriding error or where the threshold in Bedford is met. Quebec argues the "plainly wrong" standard should be qualified; a previous decision should only be set aside where there is a new question of law or a change in the situation or evidence that leads to materially different circumstances. Canada observes that disagreement between lower courts helpfully generates considered opinions upon which appellate courts can rely for their own reasoning.

[43] For the reasons that follow, I agree with the Crown that the trial judge was not strictly bound by the prior declaration by a court of coordinate jurisdiction by virtue of s. 52(1). In my respectful view, Mr. Sullivan's understanding of the effect of a declaration under s. 52(1) is mistaken. A s. 52(1) declaration of unconstitutionality reflects an ordinary judicial task of determining a question of law, in this case with respect to the consistency of a law with the requirements of the Charter. Questions of law are governed by the normal rules and conventions that constrain courts in the performance of their judicial tasks.

[44] In the result, I agree with the conclusion reached by Paciocco J.A. that the ordinary principles of stare decisis govern the manner in which a declaration issued by a court under s. 52(1) affects how courts of coordinate jurisdiction in the province should decide future cases raising the same issue. I would however clarify the situations when a superior court may depart from a prior judgment of a court of coordinate jurisdiction. The standard is not that the prior decision was "plainly wrong". A superior court judge in first instance should follow prior decisions made by their own court on all questions of law, including questions of constitutional law, unless one or more of the exceptions in Spruce Mills are met.

(1) Section 52(1) Declarations of Unconstitutionality Reflect the Exercise of Judicial Power to Decide Questions of Law

[45] I start with a simple point: in issuing a declaration that a law is inconsistent with the Constitution and thus of no force or effect, a judge is exercising an ordinary judicial power to determine a question of law. Given the nature of the power they exercise, judges cannot in a literal sense "strike down legislation" when they review the consistency of the law with the Constitution under s. 52(1). Mr. Sullivan misconstrues the power of judges when he says that the effect of a declaration of unconstitutionality is that the impugned law is removed from the statute books going forward. In our law, legislatures have the power to remove laws from the statute books, or to modify those statutes, not judges (see D. Pinard, "De l'inhabilité des juges à modifier le texte des lois déclarées inconstitutionnelles", in P. Taillon, E. Brouillet and A. Binette, eds., Un regard québécois sur le droit constitutionnel: Mélanges en l'honneur d'Henri Brun et de Guy Tremblay (2016), 329, at p. 342). Professor Pinard convincingly frames this judicial power as one grounded in legal interpretation and recalls the distinction, that she rightly says is sometimes neglected, between legal rules and the textual expression of those rules. Judges, in their interpretative task as it bears on statutory law under s. 52(1), have no power to [TRANSLATION] "alter the text of rules of written law" (p. 329, fn. 2 (emphasis deleted)). She writes:

> [TRANSLATION] Judicial review for constitutionality concerns the impugned rule, not the text of written law that expresses the rule. The necessary legislative reworking, if any, will only be done after the judgment of unconstitutionality, by the relevant legislature. [p. 347]

[46] Contrary to what Mr. Sullivan suggests, while s. 33.1 was declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution and of no force or effect in Dunn, it was not, by the effect of that judgment, "struck from the books". As I seek to explain below, when this Court in Ferguson stated that a law is effectively removed from the statute books, it was not speaking in literal terms. The effect of the judicial declaration in this case, where s. 33.1 is considered to be inconsistent with the Constitution, is not to annul the law but, as the French text of s. 52(1) makes especially plain, to declare that it is "inopérante" (see M.-A. Gervais, "Les impasses théoriques et pratiques du contrôle de constitutionnalité canadien" (2021), 66 McGill L.J. 509, at p. 521, at fn. 45, citing P.-A. Côté, "La préséance de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés" (1984), 18 R.J.T. 105, at pp. 108-10; see also F. Gélinas, "La primauté du droit et les effets d'une loi inconstitutionnelle" (1988), 67 Can. Bar Rev. 455, at pp. 463-64).

[47] A second equally simple point flows from the first and also appears to have been neglected by Mr. Sullivan. In authorizing a competent judge to issue a declaration under s. 52(1), the Constitution Act, 1982 also invites the court to decide an ordinary question of law, albeit one with constitutional implications. Specifically, s. 52(1) asks the court to determine whether the impugned law is "inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution" and, if so, to measure "the extent of this inconsistency" to decide whether and to what extent the law is of no force or effect. To do so, the court interprets the impugned law and interprets the Constitution. In Mr. Chan's case, the trial judge was called upon to determine whether there was an inconsistency between the Charter and s. 33.1. To decide that, he had to resolve the legal question relating to the meaning of ss. 7, 11(d) and 1 of the Charter and the meaning of s. 33.1.

[48] Notwithstanding the heady constitutional context, these are ordinary judicial tasks raising questions of law. Under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, courts are called upon to resolve conflicts between the Constitution and ordinary statutes (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721, at p. 746). Properly understood, the supremacy clause refers to the hierarchy of laws in the constitutional order. Superior courts are empowered to determine whether a provision is inconsistent with the Constitution in accordance with this hierarchy. These questions of law are no different than other questions of law decided outside the constitutional context (A. Marcotte, "A Question of Law: (Formal) Declarations of Invalidity and the Doctrine of Stare Decisis" (2021), 42 N.J.C.L. 1, at p. 9). Judicial review of legislation on federalism or Charter grounds has been described as a "normal judicial task" similar to the "interpretation of a statute" (P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at §5-21; R. Leckey, Bills of Rights in the Common Law (2015), at p. 55). As judicial review of legislation is an ordinary judicial task consisting of the determination of a question of law, the legal effects of the declaration of unconstitutionality that results should be governed by the ordinary rules of stare decisis (Marcotte, at p. 21). In its effect, a declaration of unconstitutionality simply refutes the presumption of constitutionality by deciding that the impugned provisions are inconsistent with the Constitution and therefore of no force or effect. It does not alter the terms of the statute (see, e.g., R. v. P. (J.) (2003), 67 O.R. (3d) 321 (C.A.), at para. 31; Gervais, at pp. 535-38).

[49] Having indicated my view that a s. 52(1) declaration of unconstitutionality is an ordinary judicial task that involves resolving a question of law rather than an expression of the authority of a superior court to alter the statute book, I now turn to the legal nature and effect of a s. 52(1) declaration beyond the parties to litigation.

(2) Stare Decisis Governs Declarations of Unconstitutionality

[50] Mr. Sullivan argues that an unconstitutional law is invalid from the moment it was first enacted, due to the operation of s. 52(1) and the principle of constitutional supremacy. In effect, s. 52(1) renders a law invalid or "null and void" retrospectively and prospectively. As a result, when a superior court "discovers" that legislation is unconstitutional, absent an appeal, the legislation is null and void for all future cases. In support of this argument, he points specifically to the judgment of Spies J. in McCaw who decided she was bound by a previous judgment of her court in Dunn declaring that s. 33.1 was unconstitutional where the Crown had chosen not to appeal. Spies J. relied specifically on Ferguson for this conclusion: "To the extent that the law is unconstitutional, it is not merely inapplicable for the purposes of the case at hand. It is null and void, and is effectively removed from the statute books" (Ferguson, at para. 65, cited by Spies J. in McCaw, at para. 60).

[51] I respectfully disagree.

[52] Understanding the comments of this Court in Ferguson requires the reader to recall the context in which that case was rendered. The Court rejected the argument, in connection with the application of mandatory minimum sentences, that individual exemptions be granted by judges from otherwise unconstitutional laws. McLachlin C.J. sought to underscore, in understandably strong language, that a s. 52(1) declaration did not operate on a case-by-case remedial basis as would a constitutional remedy available under s. 24(1) of the Charter, but instead that the issuing court's declaration that the law was of no force or effect was applicable erga omnes. The impugned legislation was not to be applied, as a matter of course, to some litigants and not others according to judicial discretion (see Ferguson, at para. 35).

[53] That said, Ferguson does not change the fact that the declaration remains an exercise of judicial power by which a judge determines a question of law. As such, the determination of that question of law is binding erga omnes as a matter precedent, according to the ordinary rules of stare decisis, and not because that law has been truly removed from the statute books (see H. Brun, G. Tremblay and E. Brouillet, Droit constitutionnel (6th ed. 2014), at para. I.54). Judges, of course, do not have that latter power. To suggest that, by its use of a figure of speech, this Court lost sight of this is, in my view, a mistaken reading of the case. I note that some scholars have similarly commented upon the formulation of the observations in Ferguson and like observations made by this Court as to the effect of a s. 52(1) declaration (see, e.g., Marcotte, at pp. 13-14 and 16-17; Pinard, at p. 349). Indeed Ferguson points to a plain understanding that the declaration issued under s. 52(1) is the exercise of judicial power that has an erga omnes vocation. I read the occasional references to s. 52(1) as judgments in rem in the cases (see, e.g., Ravndahl v. Saskatchewan, 2009 SCC 7, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 181, at para. 27), in the same way. A judgment in rem applies beyond the immediate parties but, ultimately, even in the context of a s. 52(1) declaration, it remains a judgment: an exercise of judicial power that determines a question of law (Coquitlam (City) v. Construction Aggregates Ltd. (1998), 65 B.C.L.R. (3d) 275 (S.C.), at paras. 11-17, aff'd 2000 BCCA 301, 75 B.C.L.R. (3d) 350, leave to appeal dismissed, [2001] 1 S.C.R. ix, cited in Marcotte, at p. 14, fn. 64; see also L. Sarna, The Law of Declaratory Judgments (4th ed. 2016), at p. 158). It is binding precedent, to be sure, but within the proper limits of the doctrine of stare decisis.

[54] I am thus content to read Ferguson as a useful figure of speech rather than take what the Court said in literal terms. McLachlin C.J. sought to show, in connection with the dispute as to remedy before the Court in that case, that under s. 52(1), as opposed to s. 24(1) of the Charter, the law was unconstitutional erga omnes and not on a case-by-case basis. At a technical level, it is true that the explanation for that is rooted in s. 52(1), as other cases have suggested. But ultimately, that effect requires the exercise of judicial power to declare the law to be unconstitutional. And the exercise of that power requires the judge to make a determination of an ordinary question of law: by interpreting the impugned law and the relevant provisions of the Constitution, whether the impugned law is inconsistent with Canada's supreme law. If so, then the law is, of course, of no force or effect for all future cases, insofar as that judicial declaration made under s. 52(1) by a superior court is binding on other courts and within the right confines of the law relating to precedent. Other decisions of this Court that use the language of "striking out" or "striking down" or "severing" statutory text should be understood in a similarly figurative manner, rendering the text merely inoperative pursuant to s. 52(1) as opposed to altering or repealing the text in the literal sense (see Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 467, at para. 94, and R. v. St-Onge Lamoureux, 2012 SCC 57, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 187, at para. 67, cited in Pinard, at pp. 331-34; Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679, at p. 695; Gervais, at p. 530; see also Windsor (City) v. Canadian Transit Co., 2016 SCC 54, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 617, at para. 70; R. v. Lloyd, 2016 SCC 130, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 13, at para. 15; P. W. Hogg and A. A. Bushell, "The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislatures" (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 75, at p. 100).

[55] Similarly, the principle from Martin that the "invalidity of a legislative provision inconsistent with the Charter does not arise from the fact of its being declared unconstitutional by a court, but from the operation of s. 52(1)" must be understood in its entire context (para. 28). Martin concerned the ability of administrative tribunals to consider the constitutionality of provisions of their enabling statutes (para. 27). Gonthier J. determined that an administrative tribunal empowered to consider and decide questions of law through its enabling statute must also have the power to determine a provision's consistency with the Charter because its constitutionality is a question of law (K. Roach, Constitutional Remedies in Canada (2nd ed. (loose-leaf)), at § 6:3). Such a determination is not binding on future decision-makers (paras. 28 and 31). Importantly, Gonthier J. added that only through "obtaining a formal declaration of invalidity by a [superior] court can a litigant establish the general invalidity of a legislative provision for all future cases" (para. 31), a point taken up in later cases of this Court (Mouvement laïque québécois v. Saguenay (City), 2015 SCC 16, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 153; Okwuobi v. Lester B. Pearson School Board, 2005 SCC 16, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 257, at paras. 43-44; Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, 2020 SCC 38, at para. 88). In other words, it is the constitutional determination of a superior court judge that binds future decision makers (R. v. Albashir, 2021 SCC 48, at paras. 64-65). The inconsistency spoken to in s. 52(1) is revealed through litigation, specifically the judgment that declares the inoperability of the impugned law. The doctrine of stare decisis extends the effect of that judgment beyond the parties to the case, erga omnes within the province at least — subject to the limits of the doctrine itself. The issue in these appeals concerns the binding nature of such a judgment, and, in my view, consonant with our jurisprudence, a s. 52(1) declaration establishes unconstitutionality "for all future cases" through the authority of the judgment that makes that declaration. I agree with Paciocco J.A., at para. 34 of the judgment in appeal, that Gonthier J. was not seeking to alter the principles of stare decisis in Martin.

[56] I add that this explanation does not reduce the declaration to an individual remedy, as some interveners suggest. While it is true that stare decisis pertains to the reasons given by a court and a s. 52(1) declaration is a remedy, the reasons explain the status of the impugned law in terms of its consistency with the Constitution. The constitutional status of the law is, as I say, a question of law. The scope of the legal reasoning extends beyond the individual claimant, with effect beyond the parties flowing from the binding character of the judgment as a matter of precedent (Albashir, at para. 65). The granting of a personal remedy under s. 24(1), in contrast, is a highly factual exercise, involving the application of law to a specific context — that someone has obtained a s. 24(1) remedy in a case says very little about whether a subsequent claimant is entitled to the same relief (Ferguson, at paras. 59-61; Albashir, at para. 65).

[57] In other words, in McCaw, Spies J. was right to conclude she was not free to ignore prior decisions but, with respect, she arrived at that conclusion for what appears to be the wrong reason (para. 76). It was right to say that, in considering whether to follow Dunn, the court was obliged to consider s. 33.1 as having been declared, by a judge of her court, as unconstitutional. But the result of that declaration was not that s. 33.1 was "off the books" (it remains of course on the books until Parliament chooses to remove it) (para. 76). Spies J. was bound to follow precedent because as a matter of horizontal stare decisis, Dunn was binding on courts of coordinate jurisdiction in the province as a matter of judicial comity, unless an exception to horizontal stare decisis was established. It was true that s. 33.1 was of no force and effect. It was true that the declaration in Dunn applied not just to the parties in that case but to all future cases. But, with respect, it was wrong to say that "judicial comity has no relevance to the issue before me" (McCaw, at para. 76). If she had concluded that Dunn had been rendered per incuriam ("through carelessness" or "by inadvertence"), for example, it would not have been binding on the court in McCaw based on the ordinary rules of stare decisis as interpreted in Spruce Mills. Indeed, as suggested by this Court in Martin, Spies J. could not apply an invalid law. It is certainly true, as suggested in Ferguson, that she had "no discretion" to do so (para. 35). Yet Spies J. was bound, as a matter of precedent, by the prior judgment of a court of coordinate jurisdiction to consider s. 33.1 to be unconstitutional, insofar as the doctrine of horizontal stare decisis so required.

[58] By contrast, in Mr. Chan's case, Boswell J. decided, as a matter of discerning applicable and binding precedent, that Dunn did not bind him. While he may have erred in respect of his explanation as to why Dunn was not binding, he was right to consider the matter from the point of view of binding precedent and the doctrine of horizontal stare decisis.

[59] I would add — and here I likely part company with the Court of Appeal in the present case — that the same principles apply to judicial declarations made by this Court under s. 52(1). I respectfully disagree with the view that, as the apex court in the Canadian judicial system, the Supreme Court of Canada is invested with a special mandate to strike laws from the books. The judges of this Court are judges, not legislators. If it is true that the declarations of this Court under s. 52(1) have a qualitatively different effect than declarations made by judges of other courts, it is on the basis of vertical stare decisis — the idea that other courts are bound to follow precedent set by higher judicial authority — and not because the Constitution has invested the judges of this Court with a power that is in some way non-judicial (see Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, for a related expression of this same idea).

(3) The Role of Federalism and the Rule of Law

[60] The principle of constitutional supremacy cannot dominate the analysis of s. 52(1) to the exclusion of other constitutional principles. Mr. Sullivan points to the idea that an unconstitutional law is invalid from the moment it is enacted. But the strict enforcement of such a principle "cannot easily be reconciled with modern constitutional law" (Albashir, at para. 40). Instead, it is subject to a number of exceptions and s. 52(1) must be read "in light of all constitutional principles" (Albashir, at paras. 40 and 42; G, at para. 88). In Albashir, my colleague Karakatsanis J. explained that declarations of unconstitutionality are generally retrospective, consistent with the notion that a law is unconstitutional from its enactment. However, other constitutional principles may require a purely prospective declaration of unconstitutionality or a suspended declaration. Similarly, the legal effect of a s. 52(1) declaration by a superior court must be defined with reference to constitutional supremacy, the rule of law, and federalism.

[61] It is often said there are four fundamental organizing precepts of the Constitution: federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law and respect for minorities (see Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at paras. 32, 43 and 49). Of particular importance in the context of s. 52(1), the principle of constitutional supremacy must be balanced against federalism and the rule of law (see Albashir, at paras. 30 and 34). This point has been neglected by Mr. Sullivan and some of the interveners who argue that a declaration of unconstitutionality has the effect of rendering a law null and void as "against the world" without regard for the territorial limits of the administration of justice within a province. Yet even in McCaw, Spies J. understood that effect to be limited to the province (para. 77). Author Mark Mancini acknowledges that this is linked to a proper understanding of s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which explains that because superior courts operating "within the province" only have powers within the province, courts of one province are not bound by decisions of courts of another province ("Declarations of Invalidity in Superior Courts" (2019), 28:3 Const. Forum 31, at p. 35, relying on Wolf v. The Queen, [1975] 2 S.C.R. 107; see also Gervais, at p. 561; Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at para. I.106). I agree.

[62] Federalism prevents a s. 52(1) declaration issued within one province from binding courts throughout the country: indeed, to allow a declaration of unconstitutionality issued by a superior court in British Columbia to bind a superior court, much less an appellate court, in Quebec or Alberta would be wholly inconsistent with our constitutional structure (see, e.g., Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, 2004 SCC 79, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 698, at para. 70). It cannot be the case that the supremacy clause compels this outcome, through the simple operation of s. 52(1) (see C.A. reasons, at para. 35). I understand this to be a major obstacle to Mr. Sullivan's argument, not just as a matter of the territorial scope of the effect of s. 52(1) declarations, but in respect of the theoretical basis for arguing why and how they would operate outside the confines of the ordinary rules of stare decisis. If the provision of s. 33.1 was truly "off the books" because a s. 52(1) declaration resulted in it being considered null and void, it is hard to explain why — not least from the perspective of the accused in another province — it would be null and void in one part of the country and not another.

[63] The better view is that s. 33.1 is not null and void, but inoperative by reason of a determination of law made by a judge. That determination is binding, within the province, unless there is valid reason to depart from it. The accused is free to make that argument and a court of coordinate jurisdiction is not irretrievably bound by the prior decision within the province. Needless to say, the declaration of unconstitutionality made by a superior court in one province may be followed in another province because it is persuasive (see, e.g., Parent v. Guimond, 2016 QCCA 159, at paras. 11 et seq. (CanLII); Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at para. I.105). Thus, I reject the arguments from Mr. Sullivan and the interveners that a s. 52(1) declaration is of such a unique legal character that, once a declaration is issued anywhere in the country, its effect is that the impugned legislation is "no longer in the system" from coast to coast. Instead, a s. 52(1) declaration is the end-result of a judge's ability to resolve questions of law and should be observed by courts of coordinate jurisdiction within the province as a matter of stare decisis: nothing more or less.

[64] It follows there is no supplementary power held by courts when issuing a declaration of unconstitutionality beyond the strictures imposed by the rules of stare decisis. Precedent requires judges to examine prior judicial decisions, examine the ratio decidendi in order to determine whether the ratio is binding or distinguishable and, if binding, whether the precedent must be followed or departed from (see M. Rowe and L. Katz, "A Practical Guide to Stare Decisis" (2020), 41 Windsor Rev. Legal Soc. Issues 1, at pp. 8-12; D. Parkes, "Precedent Unbound? Contemporary Approaches to Precedent in Canada" (2006), 32 Man. L.J. 135, at p. 141; see also R. v. Nur, 2015 SCC 15, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 773, at para. 71). Adherence to precedent furthers basic rule of law values such as consistency, certainty, fairness, predictability, and sound judicial administration (Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v. Saskatchewan, 2015 SCC 4, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 245, at para. 137; David Polowin Real Estate Ltd. v. Dominion of Canada General Insurance Co. (2005), 76 O.R. (3d) 161 (C.A.), at paras. 118-21). It helps ensure judges decide cases based on shared and general norms, rather than personal predilection or intuition (J. Waldron, "Stare Decisis and the Rule of Law: A Layered Approach" (2012), 111 Mich. L. Rev. 1, at pp. 22-23). The rule of law itself has constitutional status, recognized in the preamble of the Charter. It "lie[s] at the root of [Canada's] system of government" (Reference re Secession of Quebec, at paras. 32 and 70).

[65] Horizontal stare decisis applies to courts of coordinate jurisdiction within a province, and applies to a ruling on the constitutionality of legislation as it does to any other legal issue decided by a court, if the ruling is binding. While not strictly binding in the same way as vertical stare decisis, decisions of the same court should be followed as a matter of judicial comity, as well as for the reasons supporting stare decisis generally (Parkes, at p. 158). A constitutional ruling by any court will, of course, bind lower courts through vertical stare decisis.

[66] Stare decisis brings important benefits to constitutional adjudication that balance predictability and consistency with changing social circumstances and the need for correctness. As Robert J. Sharpe has observed, an incorrect constitutional decision by a court is more difficult to repair and may require legislative intervention (Good Judgment: Making Judicial Decisions (2018)). It would be unwise for a single trial judge in a province to bind all other trial judges. It is better to revisit precedent than to allow it to perpetuate an injustice (Sharpe, at pp. 165-68). Were s. 52(1) declarations strictly binding for all future cases, none of these benefits would be realized and our constitutional law would ossify. It is for these reasons that McLachlin C.J. asserted that "stare decisis is not a straitjacket that condemns the law to stasis" (Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5, [2015] 1 S.C.R. 331, at para. 44). Horizontal stare decisis attempts to balance stability and predictability against correctness and the orderly development of the law.

[67] In the absence of the supporting theory of stare decisis, res judicata on its own is not a helpful lens through which to analyse s. 52(1) declarations. Res judicata estops relitigation of disputed facts and disputed mixed questions of fact and law (B. Garner et al., The Law of Judicial Precedent (2016), at p. 374). The formal requirements of the two main branches of res judicata, cause of action and issue estoppel, will not be met in cases relitigating the constitutionality of a provision, for the simple reason that the parties will not be the same and neither will the facts. I acknowledge that courts also have inherent ability to prevent an abuse of process, which prevents relitigation of an issue where the strict test for res judicata is not met, in order to "[preserve] the integrity of the court's process" (Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, 2003 SCC 63, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, at para. 42).

[68] Stare decisis is the better framework to apply to litigation of constitutional issues, as it better guards against the relitigation of law, whereas res judicata guards against the relitigation of facts. First, abuse of process is not confined within a province and applying it to relitigation of the constitutionality of legislation would require a court to consider whether the parties are estopped from arguing the issue because a court in another jurisdiction has already decided on it. Even more remarkably, applying abuse of process to these types of cases would require a court of appeal to consider whether it should hear an appeal where a trial court in another province has already ruled on the constitutionality of an issue. Second, stare decisis and the test from Spruce Mills serve as a better guide for trial judges to determine whether to depart from horizontal precedent. At its core, this question relates to the rule of law and judicial comity. Applying abuse of process would unnecessarily confuse this analysis. Finally, courts must adjudicate constitutional issues — applying abuse of process or res judicata would prevent a court from even considering new constitutional arguments or issues. This would be unwise and would undermine constitutional supremacy. It would also prevent the courts from adapting to changing social circumstances, a fundamental feature of our constitutional order.

[69] Lastly, I note that some have been critical of the fact that the constitutional status of s. 33.1 has remained unsettled before trial courts across the country more than twenty years after its enactment by reason, in part, of a lack of appeals by the prosecution. Section 33.1 was declared unconstitutional by several trial courts in different provinces and upheld in others over this period. Notwithstanding declarations of unconstitutionality by trial courts, the Crown continued to rely on the provision in subsequent cases. One intervener before us suggested that the Crown must appeal declarations of unconstitutionality at the first opportunity or accept the lower court's conclusion for all future cases. In the legal literature, some have said that it is unacceptable, in respect of federal legislation, for a provision to be unconstitutional in one province and not in another, or for a law to be applied inconsistently within a province because its constitutionality remains unsettled.

[70] While one might well expect the authorities to consider an appeal when faced with conflicting trial decisions relating to a law on which the prosecution continues to rely, I respectfully disagree with the view that the relevant attorney general is bound to appeal declarations of unconstitutionality in criminal matters such as these. It is true that when put on notice that the constitutionality of a provision has been challenged, the attorney general has the "opportunity" to defend the impugned law and appeal a declaration of unconstitutionality where an appeal does lie (Guindon v. Canada, 2015 SCC 41, [2015] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 19; see also R. v. McCann, 2015 ONCA 451, at para. 6 (CanLII)). Yet however desirable uniform treatment of the substantive criminal law might be within or even across provinces, the decision to appeal remains within the discretion of the attorney general, who acts independently in deciding the question, in keeping with its authority to pursue the public interest (see, e.g., M. Rosenberg, "The Attorney General and the Administration of Criminal Justice" (2009), 34 Queen's L.J. 813, at pp. 819 and 825; K. Roach, "Not Just the Government's Lawyer: The Attorney General as Defender of the Rule of Law" (2006), 31 Queen's L.J. 598, at pp. 608-10, citing J. Ll. J. Edwards, The Law Officers of the Crown (1964), at p. 228).

[71] Barring an abuse of that authority, the attorney general is not answerable for the exercise of its discretion in such matters before the courts (R. v. Anderson, 2014 SCC 41, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 167, at paras. 44 and 46). The attorney general might well choose not to appeal a declaration of unconstitutionality, for example, if it felt that the matter is insufficiently developed in the decided cases for proper consideration by an appeal court or that a conviction would best be left alone. For example, there was no appeal from the constitutional ruling in Dunn notwithstanding an appeal from sentence (see, e.g., R. v. Dunn (2002), 156 O.A.C. 27 (C.A.); see also R. v. Jensen (2005), 74 O.R. (3d) 561 (C.A.)). That said, unsettled constitutional law, "and the uncertainty and unpredictability that [can] result", may of course be a matter of serious consequence (Ferguson, at para. 72, cited in Nur, at para. 91).

[72] Before us, it was argued that the peculiar circumstances of this case highlight that the constitutional status of s. 33.1 remained unsettled for a significant period of time. It is not, of course, the role of this Court to instruct the Attorney General of Canada in the exercise of its prosecutorial discretion or the other tools it has at its disposal in the exercise of its charge. I do note that the Attorney General of Canada itself has written that "the Attorney General may conclude that it is in the public interest to appeal a Charter decision to the Supreme Court of Canada in order to allow for a pan-Canadian determination of the legislation's constitutionality, as well as a pan-Canadian interpretation of the relevant Charter right" (Department of Justice Canada, Principles Guiding the Attorney General of Canada in Charter Litigation (2017), at p. 10). In making these comments, I acknowledge the constitutional and practical constraints on the office of the attorney general in the pursuit of its role as the "protector of the public interest" in the proper functioning of the criminal justice system (see, e.g., R. v. Cawthorne, 2016 SCC 32, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 983, at para. 27-28; R. v. Power, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601, at p. 616).

(4) Proper Approach to Horizontal Stare Decisis

[73] Horizontal stare decisis applies to decisions of the same level of court. The framework that guides the application of horizontal stare decisis for superior courts at first instance is found in Spruce Mills, described by Wilson J. as follows (at p. 592):

> . . . I will only go against a judgment of another Judge of this Court if:
> (a) Subsequent decisions have affected the validity of the impugned judgment;
> (b) it is demonstrated that some binding authority in case law, or some relevant statute was not considered;
> (c) the judgment was unconsidered, a nisi prius judgment given in circumstances familiar to all trial Judges, where the exigencies of the trial require an immediate decision without opportunity to fully consult authority.

[74] The Spruce Mills criteria have been followed in numerous cases across Canada. However, the analytical framework has, at times, been blurred and the criteria have occasionally been of difficult application. Varying standards have been invoked to define when departure from prior precedent is appropriate. For example, some have held that a prior decision can be ignored if it is "plainly wrong" (R. v. Green, 2021 ONSC 2826, at paras. 9 and 24 (CanLII)), when there is "good reason" for doing so (R. v. Kehler, 2009 MBPC 29, 242 Man. R. (2d) 4, at para. 42), or in "extraordinary circumstances" (R. v. Wolverine and Bernard (1987), 59 Sask. R. 22 (Q.B.), at para. 6). The standards of "plainly wrong", "good reason", and "extraordinary circumstances" are qualitative tags susceptible of extending to almost any circumstance and do not provide the same precise guidance that Spruce Mills does (see S. Kerwin, "Stare Decisis in the B.C. Supreme Court: Revisiting Hansard Spruce Mills" (2004), 62 Advocate 541, at p. 543, fn. 33). These terms should no longer be used. In particular, the phrase "plainly wrong" is a subjective term and suggests that a judge may depart from binding precedent if they disagree with it — mere personal disagreement between two judges is not a sufficient basis to depart from binding precedent. The institutional consistency and predictability rationales of stare decisis are undermined by standards that enable difference in a single judge's opinion to determine whether precedent should be followed. It is also not the case that a court can decide a question of law afresh where there are conflicting decisions.

[75] The principle of judicial comity — that judges treat fellow judges' decisions with courtesy and consideration — as well as the rule of law principles supporting stare decisis mean that prior decisions should be followed unless the Spruce Mills criteria are met. Correctly stated and applied, the Spruce Mills criteria strike the appropriate balance between the competing demands of certainty, correctness and the even-handed development of the law. Trial courts should only depart from binding decisions issued by a court of coordinate jurisdiction in three narrow circumstances:

1. The rationale of an earlier decision has been undermined by subsequent appellate decisions;

2. The earlier decision was reached per incuriam ("through carelessness" or "by inadvertence"); or

3. The earlier decision was not fully considered, e.g. taken in exigent circumstances.

[76] First, a judge need not follow a prior decision where the authority of the prior decision has been undermined by subsequent decisions. This may arise in a situation where a decision has been overruled by, or is necessarily inconsistent with, a decision by a higher court (see Rowe and Katz, at p. 18, citing Kerwin, at p. 542).

[77] Second, a judge can depart from a decision where it was reached without considering a relevant statute or binding authority. In other words, the decision was made per incuriam, or by inadvertence, a circumstance generally understood to be "rare" (see, e.g., The Owners, Strata Plan BCS 4006 v. Jameson House Ventures Ltd., 2017 BCSC 1988, 4 B.C.L.R. (6th) 370, at para. 132). The standard to find a decision per incuriam is well-known: the court failed to consider some authority such that, had it done so, it would have come to a different decision because the inadvertence is shown to have struck at the essence of the decision. It cannot merely be an instance in which an authority was not mentioned in the reasons; it must be shown that the missing authority affected the judgment (Rowe and Katz, at p. 19).

[78] Third and finally, a judge may depart where the exigencies of the trial required an immediate decision without the opportunity to consult authority fully and thus the decision was not fully considered. An unconsidered judgment is not binding on other judges (Rowe and Katz, at p. 18, citing Spruce Mills, at p. 592).

[79] These criteria define when a superior court at first instance may depart from binding judgment issued by a court of coordinate jurisdiction and apply equally to a prior ruling on the constitutionality of legislation. Where, as here, a judge is faced with conflicting authority on the constitutionality of legislation, the judge must follow the most recent authority unless the criteria above are met. In such a situation, the judge must, in determining whether the prior decision was taken per incuriam, consider whether the analysis failed to consider a binding authority or statute relevant to the legal question.

[80] To be plain: these criteria do not detract from the narrow circumstances outlined in Bedford, at paras. 42-45, describing when a lower court may depart from binding vertical precedent.

[81] I will now turn to whether it was appropriate for the trial judge in Mr. Chan's case to depart from Dunn and decide the constitutionality of s. 33.1 afresh.

[82] Application of the doctrine of horizontal stare decisis in Mr. Chan's case illustrates how the Spruce Mills criteria should work in practice. At the time of Boswell J.'s constitutional ruling, there were four known decisions from the Ontario Superior Court, three of which held that s. 33.1 was unconstitutional. The most recent of these was Fleming. Fleming relied wholly on Dunn and, as a result, it is most appropriate to apply the Spruce Mills criteria to Dunn.

[83] Boswell J. cited the correct principles from Spruce Mills but, respectfully, erred in applying them. First, he concluded that he "[did] not feel constrained to follow one school of thought more than the other" because trial courts across the country had expressed different views on the constitutionality of s. 33.1 (para. 58). The conventions of horizontal stare decisis apply within the province and so the trial judge was required to consider the Spruce Mills criteria with specific reference to previous rulings within Ontario. The presence of conflicting decisions is not a reason to sidestep the Spruce Mills analysis. Second, in the Application to Re-open the Constitutional Challenge, he concluded that McCaw — which held that it was bound by Dunn — was "plainly wrong" (paras. 14 and 34). The "plainly wrong" standard no longer adequately summarizes the whole of the applicable Spruce Mills criteria.

[84] Instead, Boswell J. should have looked to the substance of Dunn to determine whether it had been overruled by a higher court, had been decided per incuriam, or had been taken in exigent circumstances. That would have revealed that Dunn did not engage whatsoever with the earlier Ontario decision in R. v. Decaire, [1998] O.J. No. 6339 (QL) (C.J. (Gen. Div.)), that upheld the constitutionality of s. 33.1. Since Dunn did not apply the Spruce Mills criteria to determine whether it was permissible to depart from Decaire, Dunn was a decision per incuriam and did not need to be followed. The trial judge should have then reviewed the substance of Decaire to determine whether that decision should be followed based on the Spruce Mills criteria. That would have revealed that Decaire considered the appropriate statutes and authorities in reaching the conclusion that s. 33.1 infringed ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Charter but was upheld under s. 1. There is also no indication that Decaire was rendered in exigent circumstances. The trial judge therefore should have followed Decaire in the constitutional ruling. Of course, on appeal, the Court of Appeal was not bound to follow Decaire or any other first instance superior court decision.

[85] Finally, it bears recalling that McCaw was decided shortly after the constitutional ruling in Mr. Chan's case. The court in McCaw did not have the benefit of Boswell J.'s reasons in Mr. Chan's case for upholding s. 33.1, as the pre-trial constitutional decision had not yet been published while awaiting possible jury deliberations (Application to Re-Open Constitutional Challenge, at para. 9). In circumstances such as this, where a court had no practical way of knowing that the earlier decision existed, the judgment will not bind a subsequent court, unless it has been brought to the court's attention or the court is otherwise aware of it (see Kerwin, at p. 551).

[86] To summarize, a court is required by the principles of judicial comity and horizontal stare decisis to follow a binding prior decision of the same court in the province. A decision may not be binding if it is distinguishable on its facts or the court has no practical way of knowing it existed. If it is binding, a trial court may only depart if one or more of the Spruce Mills exceptions apply.

[87] I will now turn to Mr. Chan's cross-appeal.

B. Is There Jurisdiction to Hear Mr. Chan's Cross-Appeal?

[88] Mr. Chan argued in his application for leave to cross-appeal that s. 695 of the Criminal Code provides this Court with the jurisdiction to hear his cross-appeal, which allows it to make any order that a court of appeal "might have made". He points to R. v. J.F., 2008 SCC 60, [2008] 3 S.C.R. 215, where this Court granted leave to an accused's cross-appeal and entered an acquittal in place of a new trial. I disagree. In my view, his application for leave to cross-appeal should be quashed for want of jurisdiction.

[89] Sections 691 and 692 of the Criminal Code set out the jurisdiction of this Court to hear criminal appeals brought by criminal accused. An accused may appeal where their conviction for an indictable offence has been confirmed by the Court of Appeal (s. 691(1)) or where acquittal at trial has been set aside by the Court of Appeal (s. 691(2)). Sections 691(1) and (2), along with s. 692 (which has no bearing on this case), represent the whole of an accused's express statutory right to appeal when their conviction has been affirmed or their acquittal set aside by a Court of Appeal. In circumstances like those of Mr. Chan, where an accused, having been convicted of an indictable offence at trial, is granted a new trial, s. 691 does not provide a route of appeal to this Court.

[90] There is no other statutory route for Mr. Chan to appeal the Court of Appeal's order of a new trial. Section 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26, which does give this Court jurisdiction to hear an appeal of a final order of a Court of Appeal, cannot ground jurisdiction for a cross-appeal by Mr. Chan because s. 40(3) precludes it:

> (3) No appeal to the Court lies under this section from the judgment of any court acquitting or convicting or setting aside or affirming a conviction or acquittal of an indictable offence or, except in respect of a question of law or jurisdiction, of an offence other than an indictable offence.

In other words, where a person is convicted of an indictable offence but subsequently has that conviction set aside, there is no right of appeal to this Court under s. 40 (see R. v. Hinse, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 597, at para. 18). The combined effect of s. 40(3) and ss. 691 and 692 "excludes many criminal appeals from the ambit of s. 40(1)" (R. v. Shea, 2010 SCC 26, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 17, at para. 3, per Cromwell J.).

[91] Respectfully, J.F. does not assist Mr. Chan. The parties in J.F. did not make submissions on whether the accused in that case had jurisdiction to cross-appeal. Where a case is heard but jurisdiction is not discussed, the case is not an authority that the Court has jurisdiction (Saumur v. Recorder's Court (Quebec), [1947] S.C.R. 492, at pp. 497-98). It is well understood that this Court's jurisdiction is statutory — a prior decision of this Court which did not address jurisdiction cannot displace clear statutory language (Kourtessis v. M.N.R., [1993] 2 S.C.R. 53).

[92] During oral argument, counsel for Mr. Chan also referred the Court to R. v. Warsing, [1998] 3 S.C.R. 579. In that case, the Court held that the British Columbia Court of Appeal did not have jurisdiction to order a limited new trial on the issue of not criminally responsible on account of mental disorder because it would have restricted the accused's right to control his defence. This Court ordered a full new trial instead. Warsing is distinguishable here because it did not substitute an order for a new trial for an acquittal — it maintained the same order but varied the scope of the new trial. On the specific question of whether this Court has jurisdiction to hear a cross-appeal, Warsing is also distinguishable on the basis that no cross-appeal was filed. It was appropriate for the Court to rely on s. 695(1) in that case because it had jurisdiction to hear the appeal and it was merely varying the order which the Court of Appeal ought to have made. As s. 695(1) provides, this Court "may, on an appeal under this Part, make any order that the court of appeal might have made and may make any rule or order that is necessary to give effect to its judgment".

C. Disposition of the Appeals

(1) Mr. Chan

[93] Given the lack of jurisdiction to substitute an acquittal, it would be unwise to comment further on the substance of Mr. Chan's application to cross-appeal. Since this Court has held that s. 33.1 is unconstitutional and of no force or effect in Brown, Mr. Chan may avail himself of the defence of non-mental disorder automatism, should it be applicable on the facts. He will have the opportunity to lead evidence in that regard.

[94] Counsel for Mr. Chan submitted in oral argument that a stay of proceedings is warranted if there is no jurisdiction to hear the cross-appeal (transcript, at p. 154). If a retrial occurs, Mr. Chan argued, the Crown will very likely take the position that Mr. Chan is not criminally responsible by reason of a mental disorder — a position the prosecution forcefully opposed at his first trial. The evidence he led at his first trial to support the finding that he was not criminally responsible under s. 16, including highly personal evidence of his concussions, learning disabilities, and depression, would be used against him in his retrial. He argues that it is fundamentally unfair.

[95] Assuming without deciding that a stay could be ordered in such circumstances, I would decline to do so here. There is an insufficient record before the Court to order a stay of proceedings. I am unable to conclude, based on the nature of the proceedings below, that a stay is warranted. I hasten to add that a future trial judge may find otherwise if the evidence put forward and the nature of the proceedings warrant. A stay of proceedings may only be granted in the "clearest of cases", where prejudice to an accused's rights or to the judicial system is irreparable and cannot be remedied (R. v. Carosella, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 80, at para. 52; R. v. Babos, 2014 SCC 16, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 309, at para. 31, both quoting R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at paras. 68 and 82). The test for a stay has three components: 1) there must be prejudice to an accused's fair trial right or to the integrity of the justice system that will be perpetuated or aggravated through a trial or its outcome; 2) there must be no alternative remedy capable of remedying the prejudice; 3) where it is unclear whether a stay is warranted after the first two steps, the court must balance the interests in favour of a stay against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits (Babos, at para. 32).

[96] Mr. Chan's arguments with respect to the prejudice he might suffer relate to a future trial, not the proceedings below. I am unable to conclude, on the record before the Court, that Mr. Chan's right to a fair trial has been prejudiced. A trial judge is best positioned to determine whether such prejudice arises in the future and, if it does, what the appropriate remedy may be (O'Connor, at paras. 68 and 82). For example, a trial judge would be capable of excluding evidence if the Crown sought to marshal it in a prejudicial manner.

[97] I add that it remains an open question whether it would be in the public interest to proceed with Mr. Chan's prosecution again, or whether there is a reasonable prospect of conviction. This case is, to use the words of the trial judge, a tragic case with a tragic result. It is also true that Mr. Chan has been charged with serious violent crimes. The final decision on how to proceed rests with the Crown and in my view, this Court is not best placed to consider the matter further.

(2) Mr. Sullivan

[98] The trial judge found that Mr. Sullivan was acting involuntarily when he attacked his mother. The common law compels an acquittal in such an instance. He was nevertheless found guilty, due to the operation of s. 33.1. The Court of Appeal declared that s. 33.1 is of no force or effect, set aside the conviction, and substituted an acquittal.

As I concluded in Brown, the Court of Appeal was correct that s. 33.1 is unconstitutional. Mr. Sullivan established at trial that he was intoxicated to the point of automatism owing to his Wellbutrin overdose. Given that s. 33.1 is of no force or effect, I would confirm the conclusion of the Court of Appeal that Mr. Sullivan is entitled to acquittals.

VI. Conclusion

[99] I would dismiss the appeals. The application for leave to cross-appeal by Mr. Chan should be quashed for want of jurisdiction. In the result, I would confirm Mr. Sullivan's acquittals and the order of a new trial for Mr. Chan.

THE VILLAGE OF KELLIHER (DEFENDANT) ..... APPELLANT;

AND

A. C. SMITH (PLAINTIFF) ..... RESPONDENT.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR SASKATCHEWAN

Negligence—Municipal corporations—Councillor of municipality injured while operating municipality's fire extinguisher—Responsibility for injury—Degree of care—Duty of municipality—Duty of councillor operating the machine—Liability—Volenti non fit injuria—Doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher—Expert evidence—Charge to jury—Jury's findings.

Plaintiff, as a councillor of defendant village, acting under authority of a village by-law, took charge of operation of its chemical fire extinguisher at a fire, turned the crank which broke the sulphuric acid bottle (to generate pressure) and was severely injured by an explosion, which occurred because the bolt holding in place the covering of the sulphuric acid chamber was not screwed down. The extinguisher had been kept in a pool room. The village council had appointed the village constable as "fire chief," and required him to keep the extinguisher "in proper working shape." Plaintiff sued the village for damages. The jury found that plaintiff's injury was caused by defendant's negligence in "not having their fire extinguisher properly inspected and kept in perfect working order"; that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence "only to the fact that he was a councillor on the date of the fire, but not negligent in the operation of the fire extinguisher at the time of the fire." The Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan (25 Sask. L.R. 65), reversing judgment of Taylor J. (24 Sask. L.R. 198), gave judgment to plaintiff for damages. Defendant appealed.

*PRESENT:—Duff, Newcombe, Rinfret, Lamont and Cannon JJ.

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Held (Duff and Newcombe JJ. dissenting) that the appeal should be dismissed.

Per Rinfret, Lamont and Cannon JJ.: It was for the jury, on all the evidence, to say whether the proper inference to be drawn was that the acid chamber covering was loose because the fire chief had failed to tighten the bolt when he had last recharged the extinguisher or to inspect it properly afterwards, or that some third person had unscrewed the bolt (as to interference by a third person, the onus was on defendant to establish it, or at least to shew such probability that the jury would infer it: Dominion Natural Gas Co. v. Collins, [1909] A.C. 640). Also the question of plaintiff's negligence was one of fact for the jury; it was for them to say whether or not, in his operation of the extinguisher, he had failed to exercise the care which a reasonably prudent and careful man would have exercised in like circumstances. Unless plaintiff had reason to suspect that the fire chief had not done his duty as to inspection, the jury was entitled to find plaintiff not guilty of negligence in assuming that he had. There was evidence from which the jury might find that plaintiff's injuries were caused by negligence of defendant, and also that plaintiff's conduct in operation of the extinguisher was free from want of care. The maxim volenti non fit injuria did not apply; plaintiff, who was unaware that the covering was not properly fastened, neither appreciated the danger he was running nor voluntarily incurred the risk (C.P.R. v. Fréchette, [1915] A.C. 871, at 880, cited). The first part of the jury's finding as to contributory negligence, viewed in the light of the circumstances and the judge's charge, meant that the only negligence of which they found plaintiff guilty was that he shared with his fellow councillors in their representative capacity in not seeing to it that the extinguisher was duly inspected and kept fit for immediate use. As to this, it has long been established law that a person is not liable in his individual capacity for a tort committed in his corporate capacity (Mill v. Hawker, L.R. 9 Ex. 309, at 321, and other cases cited). The objections by defendant to the judge's charge to the jury were not maintainable. Taken as a whole, it did not direct that there was an absolute duty on defendant to keep its extinguisher from doing harm (Doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher, L.R. 3 H.L. 330, discussed, and held not to apply, the extinguisher having been brought to the village for common protection of the corporation and its citizens as individuals; Rickards v. Lothian, [1913] A.C. 263, at 280; Hess v. Greenway, 48 D.L.R. 630, cited), but impressed upon them that the only basis on which defendant could be charged with liability was negligence; his direction that the care to be observed by defendant must be commensurate with the danger of harm involved, was a proper one. His direction to disregard the evidence of one F., an inspector for the fire commissioner of the province, to the effect that one operating the extinguisher should see that the covering was tight before breaking the acid bottle, was unobjectionable, as the elements did not exist to justify its admission as expert evidence, and the jury were as capable as the witness of forming a correct judgment as to plaintiff's acts.

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Per Duff and Newcombe JJ. (dissenting): The risk of escape of the liquid to the injury of persons in proximity was one which it was the absolute duty, in point of law, of any person working the machine, to avoid, if reasonably possible. Plaintiff knew of the danger if the covering were not tight, and to ascertain and correct the condition was a simple and quick operation. It was the duty of the municipality, at the time of actual operation, not to release the acid without first seeing that the covering was securely fastened. The acts of plaintiff in his operation of the machine were the acts of the municipality, and its said duty was equally his duty; he owed a duty to it to see that the responsibility resting upon it, in respect of the precautions to be observed in working the machine, were, so far as reasonably possible, discharged. He was not entitled to assume that, because of instructions given to the "fire chief," the covering was tight, in view of the facts (known to plaintiff) that the machine had been exposed in a place open to the public, that it could be made unsafe very easily, that, by reason of the fire chief's other duties, a periodical inspection was the utmost that could be expected, and in view of possibility of neglect by the fire chief, the simple nature of the precaution required at the moment of operation, and the magnitude of the danger. The direct and proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries was his own neglect. Further, there were errors in the charge to the jury, as to the extent of defendant's duty, and in withdrawing from the jury F.'s evidence as to the proper, known and recognized method of working the machine; which errors in the charge, were the action not to be dismissed, would be ground for a new trial.

APPEAL by the defendant from the judgment of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan (1).

The action was for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff through the explosion of one of the defendant's chemical fire extinguishers, the operation of which extinguisher the plaintiff (who was a member of the council of the defendant village) had taken charge of at a fire, the cause of the accident being, so plaintiff alleged, the defendant's negligence. The trial judge, Taylor J., on certain findings of the jury and his construction thereof and his view of the law bearing on the matters involved, dismissed the action (2). The plaintiff appealed, and the defendant cross-appealed (against certain findings of the jury as perverse and on other contentions). The Court of Appeal (1) allowed the plaintiff's appeal and dismissed the defendant's cross-appeal, set aside the judgment below and directed that judgment be entered for the plaintiff for the amount awarded by the jury ($1,250.26 for special damages, and $5,200 for general damages; no appeal was taken as to the amount assessed). The material facts of the case, the findings of the jury, and the issues in question, are sufficiently stated in the judgments now reported.

The appeal to this Court was dismissed with costs, Duff and Newcombe JJ. dissenting.

P. H. Gordon, K.C., for the appellant.

P. M. Anderson, K.C., for the respondent.

The judgment of the majority of the court (Rinfret, Lamont and Cannon JJ.) was delivered by LAMONT, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan (1) in favour of the plaintiff in an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by him through the explosion of one of the defendant's chemical fire extinguishers at a fire which occurred in the Village of Kelliher on the evening of December 22, 1927. The defendant's extinguisher consists of a forty gallon cylindrical tank on wheels to which a hose is attached. Attached to it also is a framework whereby the machine can be pushed or pulled as required. Towards the rear end but inset in the top of the tank in a separate chamber is a glass bottle of sulphuric acid holding about three pints. This chamber is covered with an iron dome covering, convex in shape. Over this dome is an iron circular band which is bolted to the tank. Through the centre of this band is an iron screw bolt which when screwed down tight holds the iron dome firmly in its place so that no gas or liquid can come out of the top of the sulphuric acid chamber. The tank is filled with a solution of water and bicarbonate of soda. To put the extinguisher in operation at a fire the sulphuric acid bottle has to be broken. This is done by turning a crank on the outside of the tank which causes a hammer on the inside to strike it. The acid then mingles with the solution in the tank and generates a high pressure of carbonic acid gas which forces the mixture through the nozzle of the hose upon the fire and smothers it. The extinguisher was kept in the village pool room because it was a central place and was always warm in winter.

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Lamont J.

About eight o'clock on the evening of December 22, 1927, an alarm of fire was given in Kelliher, and the plaintiff, who was a general merchant and also a member of the village council, ran to the pool room and, with a Mr. Wilson, got one of the two extinguishers owned by the defendant and pulled it to the fire. Having got it in place, the plaintiff turned the crank and broke the sulphuric acid bottle to generate pressure. In a few seconds the dome covering of the sulphuric acid chamber blew off and a stream of sulphuric acid struck the plaintiff in the face, burning him severely and practically destroying his eyesight. The dome blew off because the iron bolt for holding it in place had not been screwed down. This was shewn by the fact that the threads on the bolt had not been injured. It was the duty of the fire chief, H. G. Clark, to keep the extinguishers in good working order.

At the trial the plaintiff's contention was that his injuries were caused by the failure of the defendant to maintain the extinguisher in a safe and proper condition for use; while the defendant contended that the explosion was due to the plaintiff's want of care, (a) in attempting to operate the extinguisher without first seeing that the bolt which held the dome cover in place had been screwed down tight, and (b) in that he and his fellow councillors had not kept the extinguisher in proper condition for use. The defendant also set up that the plaintiff was well aware of the danger, and voluntarily accepted the risk. The material questions, and the answers of the jury thereto, are as follows:—

Q. 1. Was the injury to the plaintiff on the 22nd December, 1927, caused by the negligence of the defendants?—A. Yes.

Q. 2. If so, in what did such negligence consist? Give particulars.—A. For not having their fire extinguisher properly inspected and kept in perfect working order.

Q. 3. Do you find the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence?—A. Yes.

Q. 4. If so, in what did such contributory negligence consist? Give particulars.—A. Only to the fact that he was a councillor on the date of the fire but not negligent in the operation of the fire extinguisher at the time of the fire.

On these findings the trial judge dismissed the action (1).

The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal and the defendant served notice of cross appeal stating that on the hearing it would contend that there was no evidence upon which a jury could reasonably find that the defendant was guilty of negligence, nor could they reasonably absolve the plaintiff from contributory negligence in his operation of the extinguisher at the fire, and that their answers on both points were perverse. The notice further stated that the defendant would contend that the maxim volenti non fit injuria should be applied in this case. The Court of Appeal allowed the plaintiff's appeal and dismissed the cross appeal (1). From that judgment this appeal is brought.

Before us counsel for the defendant again advanced the argument that the answers of the jury to Question 2, and the latter part of their answer to Question 4, were perverse and contrary to the evidence; and he stressed the fact that the extinguisher was kept in a place open to the public, any one of whom might have unscrewed the bolt which holds in place the iron dome.

The jury had before them the fact that the defendant had brought to the village as a fire fighting apparatus this chemical extinguisher which was a highly dangerous instrumentality unless care was taken to keep the dome covering of the sulphuric acid chamber tightly fastened. They knew that the extinguishers were kept in the pool room and that the defendant intended and expected its citizens, on hearing an alarm of fire, to go to the pool room and get the extinguishers and take them to the fire where they were to be used in fighting the flames. To be effective for that purpose the extinguishers were required to be in a condition in which they could be immediately and safely operated. In his charge the trial judge instructed the jury that if the municipality keeps a machine which is dangerous, or potentially dangerous, it assumes the responsibility of keeping it from doing harm; that if the machine is kept to be used at fires and there is an extra danger in its use, then there is upon the municipality so providing it a duty to take precautions to avoid that danger and that the duty was commensurate with the danger involved. The council recognized its obligation in this respect and had notified the fire chief that it was his duty to "keep the extinguishers in proper working shape". The jury had also before them the fact that, in August, the fire chief had recharged the extinguishers, which necessitated taking the dome covering off the sulphuric acid chamber, and that neither extinguisher had thereafter been used until the fire in question. The fire chief in his evidence stated that he knew the bolt had been screwed down after the extinguisher had been recharged or he would not have left it. This the jury may have thought was reasoning rather than recollection, at any rate it was for them to say whether or not they would accept the evidence. They had also before them conclusive evidence that when the other extinguisher was taken to the fire the wheel that opens the valve which permits the mixture to flow through the hose was stuck fast and could not be turned. This fact alone was evidence that there had been no proper inspection of the extinguishers and entitled the jury, if they thought fit, to reject the evidence of the fire chief and the overseer that they had inspected the extinguishers a few days before the fire and that everything was in good order. There was also the fact that, although for years the extinguishers had been kept in the pool room, no one had ever improperly interfered with them. It was for the jury, on all the evidence, to say whether the proper inference to be drawn was that the dome covering was loose because the fire chief had failed to tighten the bolt when he recharged the tank or to properly inspect the extinguishers afterwards, or that some third person had unscrewed the bolt, which is the only other explanation suggested. As to interference by a third person, the onus was on the defendant to establish it or at least to shew such a probability of its having taken place that the jury would infer that it had. Dominion Natural Gas Co v. Collins (1).

On the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence, the jury had before them an account of the acts of the plaintiff shewing just what he did and how he did it. They had also his testimony that he saw nothing to indicate that the dome covering was loose or to direct his attention to it, and that he assumed the fire chief had obeyed the council's instructions and kept the extinguishers in proper working order. With all these facts before them it was the duty of the jury to say whether or not, in his operation of the extinguisher, the plaintiff had failed to exercise the care which a reasonably prudent and careful man would have exercised in like circumstances.

(1) [1909] A.C. 640.

For the defendant it was pointed out that there was in force a village by-law which enacted that "the overseer of the village, or in his absence any member of the council, whom failing, the fire inspector, shall be the director of operations at" a fire, and it was urged that this imposed upon the plaintiff the duty of making sure that the extinguisher was in a condition in which it could be used with safety before putting it in operation. The by-law does not in terms require a councillor directing operations at a fire to make an inspection of the extinguisher before putting it in operation. That was the duty of the fire chief, and unless the plaintiff had some reason to suspect that the fire chief had not done his duty the jury were entitled to find that he was not guilty of negligence in assuming that he had. Furthermore, it must not be forgotten that in taking charge of the extinguisher at the fire the plaintiff was fulfilling an obligation imposed upon him in his official capacity by the by-law. In the absence, therefore, of a statutory provision making a councillor individually responsible for the failure of the fire chief to obey his instructions, which the by-law does not do, or casting on a councillor the duty of personal inspection of the extinguishers, the whole question of the plaintiff's negligence was a question of fact for the jury. I, therefore, agree with the Court of Appeal that there was evidence from which the jury might find, not only that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the negligence of the defendant, but that the conduct of the plaintiff in his operation of the extinguisher at the fire was free from any want of care on his part.

The argument of the defendant's counsel that this was a proper case for the application of the maxim volenti non fit injuria, cannot be supported. In C.P.R. v. Fréchette (1), the Privy Council held that to establish this defence it must be shewn, (1) that the plaintiff clearly knew and appreciated the nature and character of the risk he ran, and (2) that he voluntarily incurred it. In the present case the plaintiff was not aware that the dome covering was not properly fastened and, therefore, he neither appreciated the danger he was running nor voluntarily incurred the risk.

As far as the matters before the Court of Appeal are concerned there is only one question which, in my opinion,

(1) [1915] A.C. 871, at 880.

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Lamont J.

requires consideration, and that is: what did the jury mean by their finding that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence "only to the fact that he was a councillor on the date of the fire"? Their express finding that he was "not negligent in the operation of the fire extinguisher at the time of the fire" shews that the negligence of which they found him guilty as a councillor did not include any want of care on his part in his operation of the extinguisher from the moment it reached the scene of the fire. From that moment he is absolved from any charge of contributory negligence. With negligence on the part of the plaintiff in the operation of the extinguisher excluded, the answer of the jury is, to my mind, intelligible, and their meaning reasonably clear viewed in the light of the circumstances and the instructions given to them. By their answers to the first two questions they had found the defendant guilty of negligence causing the plaintiff's injuries. The defendant could only act through its council. The negligence of the defendant was, therefore, the negligence of its council. In his charge the trial judge said:—

> Some things are more dangerous than other things and if it is highly dangerous, very dangerous, the law imposes on the municipality the duty to protect against that danger. They cannot escape the duty that is put upon them by simply delegating it to someone else. It is insufficient to pass a resolution requiring someone or some persons to inspect the machinery and let it go at that.

This the jury would understand referred to the direction of the council to the fire chief to keep the extinguishers in good working order which the fire chief admitted involved the duty of an inspection. By reason of this direction the jury knew that the defendant village could not escape liability on the ground that the council directed the fire chief to perform a duty which the law cast upon the council itself. What the jury meant, therefore, by their answer, in my opinion, was that the only negligence of which they found the plaintiff guilty was that which he shared with his fellow councillors in their representative capacity in not seeing to it that the extinguishers were duly inspected and kept fit for immediate use. At first sight it might seem that the jury by finding the plaintiff guilty of negligence as a councillor "on the date of the fire," had in mind some specific dereliction of duty by him as councillor on that date. I do not think, however, that the words mean, or were intended to mean, anything more than that the plaintiff was, on the day of the fire, a councillor and, as such, he had failed to see that the duty resting on the council had been performed. That this was the jury's meaning seems established by the fact that, once negligence in the operation of the extinguisher was eliminated, there was no negligence of which the plaintiff, under the circumstances, could be guilty except a breach of duty in his representative capacity, and it has long been established law that a person is not liable in his individual capacity for a tort committed in his corporate capacity.

In Mill v. Hawker (1), Kelly, C.B., said:—

> I conceive it to be settled law that no action lies against the individual members of a corporation for a corporate act done by the corporation in its corporate capacity, unless the act be maliciously done by the individuals charged, and the corporate name be used as a mere colour for the malicious act, or unless the act is ultra vires, and is not, and cannot be in contemplation of law, a corporate act at all.

See also Mahoney v. Guelph (2); Harman v. Tappenden (3).

The only other contention made was that there should be a new trial, because the trial judge failed to properly direct the jury in three material particulars:—

(a) that he instructed them that the law imposed upon the defendant the duty of keeping and maintaining at all times the fire extinguisher in a safe and proper condition at their peril;

(b) that he failed to instruct them as to the degree of care to be exercised by the plaintiff in handling the extinguisher; and

(c) that he directed them to disregard the evidence of Johnson and Furby as to the way of operating the extinguisher.

These objections had been taken at the trial although a new trial was not asked for in the court below.

The portion of the charge objected to under (a) reads:—

> Persons having highly dangerous articles assume the responsibility of keeping them safe. It was the duty of the defendants to maintain the same, to maintain the fire extinguisher, "in a safe and proper condition for use and operation as required." As it is put in one case "they are bound to keep it secure at their peril."

It was contended that, by the use of the words "at their peril", the trial judge instructed the jury that there was an absolute duty resting upon the defendant to keep its extinguisher from causing harm, and that the law did not impose such an onerous duty but only imposed the duty of using a reasonable, or at most, a high degree of care. I do not think the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (1) has any application to a case like the present. That rule provides that any person who, for his own purposes, brings on his land or keeps or collects there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, keeps it at his peril. If it escapes and does harm to others, the owner is responsible independently of the existence of either wrongful intent or negligence on his part. The rule, however, only applies where the dangerous agency is kept by the defendant for his own purposes. It, therefore, has no application where, as here, the extinguisher was brought to the village for the common protection of the corporation and its citizens as individuals. Rickards v. Lothian (2); Hess v. Greenway (3). Although the trial judge, in instructing the jury as to the degree of care required from the defendant, did use a phrase which, if it stood alone, might be understood as imposing liability without any negligence on the defendant's part, a perusal of his charge makes it very clear that he impressed upon the jury that the only basis upon which the defendant could be charged with liability was negligence on its part—that is that the defendant village through its council had failed to observe that degree of care which a careful and prudent man would have observed under the circumstances. He told the jury that the care which it was the defendant's duty to observe must be commensurate with the danger of harm involved. This, in my opinion, was a proper direction. It may be that the use of a particular instrumentality might be attended with such extraordinary risk that the only care commensurate with the danger would be such care as operates to prevent injury. In my opinion this objection cannot be maintained.

The portion of the charge referred to in (b) reads:—

> When it comes to the standard of duty to be observed by the plaintiff to guide you in determining whether he has been guilty of contributory negligence or not it is not so easy to put it into words. He was bound to use such care as a reasonable and prudent man in like circumstances would use, such care as a reasonable and prudent man in the circumstances would observe. You are the judges of that standard.

To this Mr. Gordon, counsel for the defendant, states his objection in the following language:—

I think your lordship should have informed them what a reasonable and prudent man would have done with full knowledge of the danger that he was encountering in breaking the bottle.

As the plaintiff was unaware of the special danger he was encountering through the dome covering not being fastened, I do not see that the trial judge could have been more explicit on this point than he was without invading the province of the jury. In Sherman & Redfield on the Law of Negligence, 6th ed., par. 53, page 105, the learned author says:—

There are no abstract rules, defining so clearly the duties of men, under all circumstances, that the court can state them without passing upon any question of fact. The extent of the defendant's duty is to be determined by a consideration of all the surrounding circumstances. The law imposes duties upon men, according to the circumstances in which they are called to act. And though the law defines the duty, the question, whether the circumstances exist which impose that duty upon a particular person, is one of fact. In very many cases the law gives no better definition of negligence than the want of such care as men of ordinary prudence or good men of business would use under similar circumstances. Of course, this raises a question of fact as to what men of this character usually do under the same circumstances. This is a point upon which a jury have a right to pass, even though no evidence of the usage were given; for they may properly determine the question by referring to their own experience and observation. Indeed, they must do so; since expert evidence on such points is usually not admissible.

The instruction to disregard the testimony of Johnson and Furby, complained of under (c), had reference to the opinion each expressed that, in operating an extinguisher such as the defendant had, it was the duty of the operator to ascertain if the dome covering was properly fastened before breaking the bottle of sulphuric acid. Johnson was the village blacksmith, and Furby was an inspector for the fire commissioner for the province, whose duty it was to go to the various cities, towns and villages to see if the fire equipment of each was in order. In effect what these witnesses were being asked was whether or not the plaintiff, in operating the extinguisher the way he did, had been guilty of negligence which contributed to his injuries. This was surely the province of the jury. It was contended that the testimony was admissible because the witnesses were experts. In Beven on Negligence, 4th ed., at page 141, the author says:—

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Lamont J.

To justify the admission of expert testimony two elements must coexist:

(1) The subject-matter of the inquiry must be such that ordinary people are unlikely to form a correct judgment about it, if unassisted by persons with special knowledge.

(2) The witness offering expert evidence must have gained his special knowledge by a course of study or previous habit which secures his habitual familiarity with the matter in hand.

In my opinion, the jury were just as capable as the witnesses of forming a correct judgment as to the plaintiff's acts, and the evidence does not disclose that either of the witnesses had ever operated a similar fire extinguisher. The object of expert evidence is to explain the effect of facts of which otherwise no coherent rendering can be given. Carter v. Boehm (1).

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

The judgment of Duff and Newcombe JJ., dissenting, was delivered by DUFF, J.—This is one of those cases in which the plaintiff's sufferings evoke naturally the compassion and sympathy of everybody, and I add, without the least hesitation, having considered the circumstances fully in every one of their aspects, in my own mind, a feeling of profound regret that the village community, represented by the appellant municipality, should have thought it right that his claim for compensation should be considered and determined on strictly legal principles. The duty of this court, however, is a rigorous one; here, the claim must be investigated and decided dispassionately, as matter of legal right.

The respondent was severely injured, having (inter alia) his sight gravely impaired, through the escape from a "chemical" fire extinguisher of liquid under high pressure heavily charged with sulphuric acid.

For the sake of clearness, it is convenient here to describe the fire extinguisher. The extinguisher, which is of a design in common use, consists of a cylindrical tank carried on a frame between two wheels about three feet high. At one end there is a handle used to pull or push it when required. At the same end is a leg or prop to hold the tank in a horizontal position. At the top of the tank and at the end nearest the handle is an opening through which the extinguisher is charged. The tank is first filled with a solution of water and bicarbonate of soda. Inside the opening is a cage in which is placed a bottle of sulphuric acid. Over the opening there is a metal dome held firmly in position by a screw-bolt which is screwed into the opening. A lever passes through the top of the screw-bolt, by which it can be tightened or loosened readily by hand. As to this end of the tank, set in the centre of it, there is a handle that, when pulled, throws up a hammer which breaks the bottle containing the sulphuric acid, which then becomes mixed with the solution of bicarbonate of soda. Carbonic acid gas is developed and the pressure of the gas forces the solution through a hose connected with the tank. There is also a pressure gauge and valve which must be opened to enable the liquid to escape. The pressure indicated on the valve is as high as 200 pounds.

The respondent was one of the village councillors, and, a fire having broken out in the village, he was (in execution of his duty as he conceived it) in charge of the extinguisher at the scene of the fire, when he was injured.

The respondent says that he pulled the handle attached to the hammer, breaking the bottle of sulphuric acid, and called upon a bystander to open the valve connected with the hose, which he says was done, when the metal dome was forced from its place and a jet of liquid emerged which struck him in the face. There was no dispute that the dome could not have been firmly screwed into its place or that the escape of the liquid was due to this.

His claim against the appellants was based upon a charge of negligence. The duty, stated in general terms, in which he alleged the municipality had failed, is accurately defined in the finding of the jury, as a duty to have "their fire extinguisher properly inspected and kept in perfect working order". The particular matter in which the municipality is alleged to have made default (the matter intended to be designated by the finding of the jury) was the failure at all times "to keep the cap closed"—to quote the words of the trial judge. The jury found in favour of the respondent, and an appeal to the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan was dismissed (1).

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Duff J.

Before proceeding to comment upon the legal contentions, it is essential to make plain the actual position of the respondent and to outline the steps taken by the municipality for the care of the two fire extinguishers which it possessed. The village had statutory authority to "make provision for protection against fire"—I am quoting the summary of the legislation given by the trial judge in his charge. Acting in part, no doubt, under that authority, the council had passed a by-law containing this clause:—

43. The Overseer of the Village, or in his absence any member of the council, whom failing, the fire inspector, shall be the director of operations at, and regulate the conduct of all persons assisting in the suppression or extinguishment of fires, and he may call upon any person present at any fire to render every assistance in his power to suppress and extinguish the same.

The learned trial judge instructed the jury that the council had exceeded its powers in professing to make it obligatory upon councillors to perform the duties prescribed in section 43. As to that, I express no opinion, and it may be that the direction has no bearing upon this appeal. At all events, in the view I take upon other aspects of the case, the point is unimportant. The by-law does clearly authorize the councillors, in the contingency defined, to take charge (to direct operations and to regulate the conduct of persons assisting); and to that extent it is clearly intra vires. The respondent in what he did acted upon the authority embodied in the by-law. That is left beyond doubt by his own evidence.

Q. When you four men were over there was there any one taking charge of this?—A. I did.

Q. Why did you?—A. I was the only councillor present.

Q. What authority as councillor did you have to do this?—A. Well, I have authority from the by-law.

Q. What by-law?—A. By-law No. 34, Fire by-law.

Mr. ANDERSON: I would like to put that by-law in as an exhibit.

His LORDSHIP: I would like to know if he was familiar with that by-law.

Mr. ANDERSON: Were you familiar with that by-law?—A. I was.

His LORDSHIP: How and when? It may be most material. How and when?

Q. Were you familiar with that by-law before the time of this accident?—A. Yes, I was.

Q. Do you remember what year it was passed in?—A. 1926.

Q. How did you familiarize yourself with it?—A. Well, I was on the council. When I went into the council it was the natural thing to go into the by-laws and read them up.

Q. And you did familiarize yourself with by-law No. 34?—A. Yes.

The municipality had no proper place of its own where the extinguishers could be stored; and they were kept in a pool room, where, it is admitted, they were accessible to the public. There was a great deal of discussion at the trial as to the duties of one Clarke, who is generally referred to as the fire chief. In point of fact, Clarke was, and had been for years, the village constable charged with the duties incident to that office, as well as the duties of caretaker of the rink, receiving a wage of $30 a month. In 1927, he complained to the council that he had not access to a number of hand extinguishers which were left in the custody of individuals in their houses, and asked for authority to inspect them. A by-law was passed appointing him Fire Chief and he was then instructed by the village overseer and the plaintiff, to quote the plaintiff's evidence, "to look after these fire extinguishers and see they were kept in proper working order and kept in some safe place". No additional wage was attached to the new office, and admittedly there was no intention to change the place of storage of the fire extinguishers with which we are concerned. It was the duty of Clarke, from time to time, to recharge the extinguishers; and they had been recharged on some day in the late summer or early fall.

The learned trial judge held, and so instructed the jury, that the appellants were under a legal obligation "to maintain this extinguisher in a safe and proper condition for use and operation as required." They were bound, he said, "to keep it secure at their peril." This obligation included, he held, the specific legal duty "to keep the cap closed." In the Court of Appeal, the duty of the appellants, by Mackenzie J.A., is described in the terms of the jury's finding to have the extinguishers "kept in perfect working order." This view he grounds apparently upon "the emergency conditions under which such apparatus must often necessarily be used" * * *

There can be no question as to how the accident happened, in that the metal cap covering the chamber was loose and so permitted the expulsion of the acid upon its release from the chamber. It is denied that it became loose when the extinguisher was taken to the fire. It must therefore have become loose while it was being kept in the poolroom. The council, however, had appointed Clarks as fire chief for the very purpose of keeping it in proper working order. Therefore Clarke must have been derelict in his duty and so have rendered the defendant liable.

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Duff J.

Turgeon J.A. puts the case in a rather different way. He says:

> The defendant corporation, in order to secure its own property and the property of its citizens against the spread of fire, purchased this extinguisher and kept it, ready for use, in a place accessible to the public; and it was intended and desired that the public, in case of fire, should take the extinguisher, convey it to the place required, and operate it. Admittedly, the extinguisher contains a dangerous substance, sulphuric acid, and is sure, or almost sure, to cause a serious accident, when operated, unless it is in perfect condition; that is, unless (for the purposes of this case) the metal cap above referred to is firmly bolted down.
>
> In these circumstances, and assuming that the jury accepted this evidence, which they had the right to do, I think that the least that can be said concerning the defendants' liability is that they were under obligation to take all reasonable precautions to keep this machine in safe condition, having regard to the dangerous nature of its contents and to the fact that, when wanted, it would be wanted in a hurry and that the call for its use might come at any moment of the day or night, and considering also that it was lodged in a place accessible in daytime to many people, uncovered, and unprotected in any manner from the curious and the meddlesome, and that it might be made unsafe very easily, by a simple turn of the wrench.

In view of the course of the trial, and the expressions of opinion just quoted, it is important to recall that on this appeal we are only concerned with negligence causing the injury to the respondent, negligence, to quote the phrase of Lord Cairns, dans locum injuriae; and that the appellants can be held responsible to the respondent, in law, only for breach of some duty owing to him which they have violated, and the violation of which was the direct cause of the harm of which he complains. We are not now to consider the rules or principles which might come into play, if somebody, with no express authority from the appellants, had taken possession of this machine and in ignorance of the working of it had, through his ignorance or unskilfulness, been the cause of an injury to a bystander. In such a case, we should have to investigate the question of the responsibility of the appellants for the acts of the person working the machine. There is evidence in the by-law before us, that such a procedure was not contemplated by the municipality; and whether the municipality did order its affairs in such a way as to preclude it from disputing responsibility in such circumstances, is a question which might involve debatable issues of law and fact. Had the unskilled person who had assumed the responsibility, in his ignorance, of working the machine, been himself injured, a further question, still, might arise. These points are not now before us.

The respondent, throughout the occurrences, was acting, as he says, under the authority vested in him as councillor. The machine when under his control was under the control of the municipality, his acts were the acts of the municipality—in taking the machine to the scene of the fire, in releasing the sulphuric acid, and setting up the pressure which was the immediate agency in expelling the liquid that so grievously disfigured him. This last mentioned act was the decisive, the effective act, and, to repeat, it was the act of the municipality, as well as that of the respondent.

Now, as regards third parties, the responsibility of the municipality for the consequences of this act is indisputable. A great deal is said, in the charge and in the judgments, about the importance of keeping the metal cap always securely fastened in preparation for any sudden emergency requiring the employment of the extinguisher. But whatever may be said about that, it is self-evident that the necessity of that precaution could never be so palpable as at the very moment when the machine is to be put into operation. There can be no room for argument upon the point that at that moment, it was the duty of the municipality to see that the dome was securely fastened.

One must visualize the situation in the concrete. Several persons were in close proximity to the machine. All these were exposed to the danger of the gravest injury if the solution in the tank, instead of being forced through the hose, were expelled through the aperture intended to be sealed up by the metal dome. The risk of the escape of this liquid was a risk, which it was the absolute duty, in point of law, of any person working the machine, to avoid, if reasonably possible. Moreover, in point of fact, there was no necessity, no sort of excuse, even, for incurring such a risk. We have not here the case of a pressing emergency, in which some desirable precaution could only be observed at the cost of dangerous or even inconvenient delay or of serious loss of efficiency. To ascertain whether the tank was securely closed, and if not, to screw in the cover, and make the machine absolutely safe, was the work of an instant only, and of course an operation of the very simplest character. It was therefore, plainly, the duty of the municipality not to incur the wholly needless and useless risk of the liquid escaping, by releasing the sulphuric acid without first seeing that the covering was securely fastened.

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Duff J.

This was equally the duty of the respondent. He was engaged personally in working the machine. He was cognizant of all the facts. He says he knew and appreciated the character of the risk.

Q. You knew exactly how these things functioned at the time of the accident?—A. I did.

* * * * *

Q. You knew you had to direct operations?—A. I did.

* * * * *

Q. You did not forget the dangerous machine you were handling at all did you?—A. I don't think so.

* * * * *

Q. You were of course aware that the cap holding down the sulphuric acid would have to be tight or there would be danger?—A. Certainly.

* * * * *

I shall presently comment upon the excuse the respondent proffers. At this point, I wish to emphasize again the fact that the respondent had assumed charge of the machine under the authority given by the by-law, that is to say, he had assumed the duty of "director of operations" on behalf of the municipality. In this capacity, he was bound to see that the responsibility resting upon the municipality, in respect of the precautions to be observed in working the machine, were, so far as reasonably possible, discharged. That duty he owed to the municipality.

The respondent's justification for his heedless act is that the "fire chief" had been instructed to keep the extinguishers in good order and he assumed that he had done his duty.

I do not desire to speak with severity, but I cannot forbear observing that unless we are to put out of sight completely the considerations just mentioned, it is difficult to take this explanation seriously. The respondent knew, as everybody did, that the extinguishers were kept in a place open to the public by day, "uncovered, and unprotected in any manner from the curious and the meddlesome, and that it might be made unsafe very easily by a simple turn of the wrench", to quote Turgeon, J.A.; he knew, of course, none better, that the village constable, the caretaker of the rink, receiving a wage of $30 a month, who acted as "fire chief", was not intended to keep these machines under constant guard; that consistently with due attention to his other duties, a periodical inspection was the utmost that could be expected from him; and the respondent himself says that Clarke would have discharged his duty by inspection once a month.

It seems unnecessary to say that the danger which attended the working of the machine depended upon the state of the tank, not in the previous month or week or day, but upon its state at the moment; and that the duty of the respondent to take precautions, was a duty to be exercised with reference to the conditions of the moment, and not to those of some anterior time.

Reverting to the excuse advanced, I do not accept the argument that, in any relevant sense the respondent was entitled "to assume" that Clarke "had done his duty". Having regard to the magnitude of the danger to which the unsuspecting bystanders were exposed, if the cap was not securely fastened, the respondent was not acting reasonably in taking it for granted, as a fact governing his actions, that Clarke, in exercising his functions, had been at all times free from the common human faults of inattention, forgetfulness or even neglect; ordinary care involves, in the circumstances in which the respondent was acting, the highest degree of care; he was not proceeding conformably to that standard in staking the safety of the bystanders upon the assumption which he puts forward as his excuse. But let us put this aside. Let us suppose that Clarke had performed every duty expected of him in his capacity as "fire chief"; that he had examined the extinguisher, not within the preceding month (according to the notion of the respondent as to his duty), but within the preceding week, or for that matter, within the preceding twenty-four hours, and that, in fact, he had left the cap securely fastened; and let us suppose, furthermore, that this was known to the respondent. I do not agree that in such circumstances, knowing also, as the respondent did, that the machine had, in the meantime, to quote Turgeon, J.A., again, been exposed in a place open to the public "uncovered, and unprotected in any manner from the curious and the meddlesome", and that it might have been "made unsafe very easily" by a touch of the hand—I am unable to agree that such knowledge would have afforded an answer to a claim by Martin, for example, whose clothes were ruined, and who only escaped disfigurement because the respondent's body served him as a shield.

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Duff J.

Having regard to the ease with which the cap could be loosened, and the risk, so vividly described by Turgeon, J.A., of its being found in that condition, and the simple nature of the precaution required, a finding exonerating the respondent from responsibility in face of such a claim could not, in my judgment, be sustained as reasonable.

The direct and proximate cause of the respondent's painful injuries was, I regret to say, his own neglect.

This is sufficient to dispose of the appeal. But I cannot take leave of the case without commenting upon another aspect. The learned trial judge told the jury:—

> The by-law makes him a director of operations, but in terms the by-law does not require him to check over the machinery to see that it is in good order. He was entitled to assume, unless he had a good reason to know, such a good reason that he ought to know to the contrary, he was entitled to assume that the municipality had performed its duty to have this machine in safe and proper condition for use and operation. The duty was imposed upon them by law to do so, and he was entitled as all men are entitled to assume that they had performed their duty.

Unfortunately, the case, perhaps, has become a little obscured by the use of vague general language to describe a simple concrete matter. The controversy at the trial turned, as it now turns, upon the responsibility for the act by which, on the occasion of the fire, the sulphuric acid was released and became mixed with the solution of bicarbonate of soda, at a moment when the simple precaution (to securely fasten the metal dome) known by everybody to be essential, had not been observed.

The passage quoted would, in light of the preceding passages in the charge, convey to the jury the idea that the law imposed upon the municipality the duty to see that, at all times, whether the tank was in use or not in use, the dome was so fastened, and that the respondent was entitled to assume this duty had been performed. Neither the respondent, nor anybody, supposed for a moment that such a duty rested upon the municipality; and the respondent knew that the municipality had made no pretence of performing such a duty.

In laying down such a rule for the guidance of the jury, the learned judge was plainly wrong; and the mischief could not be corrected by some not very precise observations as to what the respondent might be presumed to know as to the practice.

The learned judge quite failed to make it plain to the jury, as he should have done, that, as regards precautions, the critical moment was the moment when the bottle was broken, and that, in the circumstances, the duty, not to break the bottle in the absence of the obvious precaution, was a duty of the most imperative character.

The learned judge also gravely erred in rejecting the evidence of Mr. Furby, an inspector for the fire commissioner of the province. The learned judge had, as we have seen, instructed the jury that it was the duty of the municipality, a duty imposed by law, to have the machine at all times "in safe and proper condition for use and operation." The negligence imputed by the jury to the appellants was "in not having" the extinguisher "kept in perfect working order." It is plain from this answer that the charge had created, in the minds of the jury, the impression that the duty defined by the learned judge in respect of the maintenance of the machine, was a duty owing to the respondent, in the circumstances in which the respondent took possession of the machine; and, further, that this duty involved the obligation to have the metal dome fastened tight at that moment. I pass over the question as to the character of the duty (if any), as to the condition of the machine at that moment, owing by the municipality to the respondent. Even if the rule were accepted, as the jury understood the learned judge to have laid it down, viz., that the municipality was under an obligation to keep the extinguisher "in perfect working order," it is not open to dispute, on that hypothesis, the jury should have been instructed that, in passing upon the question whether the obligation had been performed, they should consider very carefully whether the extinguisher was not in fact "in perfect working order" or "in safe and proper condition for use and operation." The learned judge ought also to have told the jury that in considering that question, they must take into account the ordinary and proper method of working the machine. Obviously, it would be difficult to say whether or not the machine was in perfect working order without knowing how the machine was to be worked.

KELLIHER (VILLAGE OF) v. SMITH.

Duff J.

I find myself quite at a loss to conceive on what ground the evidence of the inspector for the fire commissioner could properly be withdrawn from the attention of the jury. The proper method of working the machine, he explained, is not to break the bottle until after the exit into the hose is opened and the metal dome securely fastened. He explained that instruction to this effect is regularly given to the fire chiefs in the cities, towns and villages of the province, as well as to councillors. This was evidence, not merely as to the proper method of working the machine, but evidence, also, as to the known and recognized method of working it, and it ought not to have been withdrawn from the jury. The jury should have been told that, if that evidence was accepted, they could not properly find that the machine was not " in perfect working order " when it came into the hands of the respondent.

It is clear to me, as I have already said, that the respondent's claim fails, because his injuries were due, not to the violation of any duty which the municipality owed to him, but to his own neglect to perform his duty to the bystanders and the municipality; but, for the reasons that I have just given, it is equally plain that if the action were not to be dismissed, there must be a new trial on account of the errors into which the learned trial judge fell in his charge to the jury.

The appeal should be allowed and the action dismissed. The appellants would perhaps consider whether they should ask for costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA

Criminal law — Defence of insanity — Hypomania — Accused knew actions to be wrong — Delusion that immune from punishment if caught — Whether or not accused rendered incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of his act — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, s. 16.

Evidence — Hearsay — Whether or not trial judge erred in treating as factual the hearsay evidence on which expert opinion based.

Respondent was found not guilty on account of insanity, of importing cocaine into Canada and of unlawful possession of cocaine for the purpose of trafficking. A hypomaniac, respondent knew he was doing wrong but believed that, if caught, he would not be punished. The trial judge found that respondent's incapacity to appreciate the nature and quality of his acts met the test of s. 16(2), and more particularly, that he did not "appreciate" the consequences of punishment associated with the commission of the offence. This appeal is from a judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal upholding the verdict reached by the trial judge.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

The defence of insanity was not open to respondent. Accused's failure, because of his delusions, to appreciate the penal sanctions attaching to the crime did not bring him within the ambit of the first arm of the insanity defence. The requirement that the accused be able to perceive the consequences of the physical act is a restatement, specific to the defence of insanity, of the principle of mens rea as a requisite element in the commission of a crime. The mental element must be proved with respect to all circumstances, and consequences, that form part of the actus reus. Punishment is not an element of the crime itself, but may be the result of the commission of the criminal act. "Wrong", used in the second half of s. 16(2), means wrong according to

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE LA COLOMBIE-BRITANNIQUE

Droit criminel — Défense d'aliénation mentale — Hypomanie — Actes que l'accusé savait mauvais — Illusion d'une immunité contre toute peine — L'accusé était-il incapable de juger la nature et la qualité de son acte? — Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, chap. C-34, art. 16.

Preuve — Ouï-dire — Le juge du procès a-t-il commis une erreur en traitant comme des faits les éléments de preuve par ouï-dire sur lesquels était fondée l'opinion de l'expert?

Accusé d'importation de cocaïne au Canada et de possession illégale de cocaïne en vue d'en faire le trafic, l'intimé a été déclaré non coupable pour cause d'aliénation mentale. Victime d'hypomanie, il savait que ce qu'il faisait était mauvais, mais croyait que, si on l'y prenait, il resterait impuni. Le juge du procès a conclu que l'incapacité de l'intimé de juger la nature et la qualité de ses actes satisfaisait au critère énoncé au par. 16(2) et, plus particulièrement, qu'il «ne se rendait pas compte» des conséquences pénales liées à la perpétration de l'infraction. Le pourvoi attaque un arrêt de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique qui a maintenu le verdict rendu par le juge du procès.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi est accueilli.

L'intimé ne peut invoquer la défense d'aliénation mentale. Son incapacité, en raison d'hallucinations, de se rendre compte des sanctions pénales dont l'infraction est assortie ne fait pas jouer en sa faveur le premier volet de la défense d'aliénation mentale. L'exigence que l'accusé soit capable de percevoir les conséquences de l'acte matériel constitue une réitération, propre à la défense d'aliénation mentale, du principe de la mens rea en tant qu'élément nécessaire de la perpétration d'un crime. Il faut prouver l'existence de l'élément mental relativement à toutes les circonstances et à toutes les conséquences qui font partie de l'actus reus. La peine n'est pas un élément du crime lui-même, mais elle peut être le résultat de la perpétration de l'acte criminel. Le mot «maulaw, and as it has been established that respondent's act was forbidden by law, respondent's inability to "appreciate" the penal consequences was irrelevant to the question of legal sanity.

Irresistible impulse does not exist as a defence but may be symptomatic of a disease of the mind giving rise to a defence of insanity. The trial judge's comments were made in the context of his consideration of the insanity defence and specifically rejected a defence of diminished responsibility.

The trial judge erred in accepting as factual much of the hearsay evidence related by an expert in the course of giving his opinion. The expert's opinion, however, was admissible even if based on second-hand evidence, for that opinion is not determinative of an issue but a question of fact to be accepted or rejected as the judge or jury see fit.

APPEAL from a judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal (1981), 60 C.C.C. (2d) 49, 21 C.R. (3d) 63, 29 B.C.L.R. 212, dismissing an appeal from a judgment of Spencer C.C.J. finding respondent not guilty on account of insanity. Appeal allowed.

Josiah Wood, for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DICKSON J.—Robert Mark Abbey was tried by a judge sitting alone on two charges (i) importing vais» employé dans la seconde partie du par. 16(2) signifie mauvais selon la loi, et vu qu'il est établi que l'intimé a commis un acte illégal, son incapacité de «juger» les conséquences pénales n'a aucun rapport avec la question de l'aliénation mentale au sens de la loi.

L'impulsion irrésistible ne constitue pas un moyen de défense, mais elle peut être symptomatique d'une maladie mentale donnant lieu à une défense d'aliénation mentale. Le juge du procès a fait ses observations dans le cadre de son étude de la défense d'aliénation mentale et il a formellement rejeté l'existence d'une défense de responsabilité atténuée.

Le juge du procès a commis une erreur en acceptant comme des faits une bonne partie des éléments de preuve par ouï-dire relatés par un expert au cours de son témoignage. L'opinion de l'expert est toutefois recevable, même si elle est fondée sur un ouï-dire, car cette opinion n'est pas déterminante, étant au contraire une question de fait que le juge ou le jury sont libres d'accepter ou de rejeter.
